HISTORY OF THE FORERUNNER

When The Forerunner began in 1981, God directed a few individuals to start a publication which would reach the young people of this generation with the message of Truth. The method was calculated: to boldly penetrate the minds and hearts of students with biblical truth by invading the most strategic strongholds of atheistic humanism - the university campuses of America. The Forerunner was a lonely voice in a vast wilderness of student apathy and pessimism during those first few months, but the news of a growing conservative movement began to flourish by late 1982. By 1983, thirty-five conservative newspapers had been started on major secular campuses.

The number more than doubled by 1985. Even at the U.C. Berkeley campus, which has long carried the reputation of being the most liberal of academic institutions in the U.S., students were following that trend: One survey proved that twice as many Berkeley students considered themselves conservative as did those in 1971. Today there are hundreds of conservative and Christian newspapers on otherwise liberal university campuses!

All during this time, The Forerunner was addressing issues which were at the center of campus debate. We presented biblical alternatives to Marxism, feminism and welfare statism. We challenged the student audience to re-evaluate the propaganda and liberal bias that they are continuously subjected to in the classroom. We were determined to bring American students face to face with the realities of the Word of God as it applies to modern life and controversial social issues.

This newspaper has gone out like seed on what was originally dry and rocky soil. But over the past fifteen years God has obviously been watering and plowing the ground to make it fertile for a spiritual harvest. The spiritual climate of America's youth is obviously changing: the stolid pessimism of the past is being replaced by a reawakening to traditional values, to patriotism, and to morality.

But we cannot stop here! The war of ideas on the American campus is far from being over. So we encourage you to make use of these articles from The Forerunner!

NOTE: The articles on this page appeared in The Forerunner during the time when I was the managing editor (1989-1994).

The Anvil that Has Worn Out Many Hammers

Nineteenth century writer H.L. Hastings once forcibly illustrated the unique way in which the Bible has withstood the attacks of skepticism:

"Infidels of eighteen hundred years have been refuting and overthrowing this book, and yet it stands today as solid rock. Its circulation increases, and it is more loved and cherished and read today than ever before. Infidels, with all their assaults, make about as much impression on this book as a man with a tack hammer would on the Pyramids of Egypt.

"When the French monarch proposed the persecution of Christians in his dominion, an old statesman and warrior said to him, 'Sire, the church of God is an anvil that has worn out many hammers.' So the hammers of infidels have been pecking away at this book for ages, but the hammers are worn out, and the anvil still endures. If this book had not been the book of God, men would have destroyed it long ago. Emperors and popes, kings and priests, princes and rulers have all tried their hand at it; they die and the book still lives."

"No other book has been so chopped, knived, sifted, scrutinized, and vilified. What book on philosophy or religion or psychology or belles lettres of classical or modern times has been subject to such a mass attack as the Bible? With such venom and skepticism? With such thoroughness and erudition? Upon every chapter, line and tenet? The Bible is still loved by millions, and studied by millions.

ABC-TV raises time-worn allegations

By Jay Rogers

The November 21, 1991 broadcast of ABC-TV's Prime Time Live raised some allegations against three prominent charismatic ministries based in Dallas, Texas. The questions raised centered around how the personalities involved heal the sick and how they spend ministry funds. These type of charges are usually directed at new ministries which suddenly come into prominence. There is often a hidden agenda of the accusers to discredit Christianity, regardless of the sincerity of the ministers.

The same time-worn assertions have been with us for almost 2000 years. In the first century, the Apostle Paul was falsely accused of ministering for personal gain, although he supported himself through his occupation as a tent maker (1 Thess 2:3-9; 2 Thess. 3:7-9). The Apostle admitted, however, that there were some who preached out of selfish motives, but that others preach out of love (Phil. 1:15-18).

In the 19th century, the Salvation Army was the target of the same allegations. William Booth, the founder, was often accused of taking money for himself out of the millions he raised for the poor and sick. Booth was, in fact, supported by donations of private supporters who looked after his family's welfare. Today, few people question the integrity and Christian charity of the Salvation Army.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA (FR) - Some Hollywood columnists have called her a profit-hungry writer cruelly capitalizing on the mistakes of her movie star mother. But Bette "B.D." Hyman says she hopes that her mother will be able to experience the saving power of Jesus Christ, and she continually prays for her.

After publishing her first book, My Mother's Keeper, which chronicled her life with film legend Bette Davis, Hyman wrote a sequel, Narrow is the Way, which is the story of her faith in Jesus Christ. The first book was written "as a plea for her to hear me before it was too late," Hyman said. "I also believe that it gives an insight into aspects of her struggles that are of interest." Her faith in Jesus Christ, she said, helped her cope with the subsequent publicity surrounding the controversial book.

Although to date Bette Davis has not become a Christian, and rarely communicates with her daughter, Narrow is the Way echoes B.D.'s hope for salvation and reconciliation with her mother.

Five turbulent yet peaceful years have passed since B.D. and her husband, Jeremy, became Christians. Both of their sons, Justin and Ashley, are also Christians. Their conversion from agnosticism began when a Christian businessman unexpectedly visited them during the winter on their farm in Pennsylvania. "A man came to the door to deliver books for the Chamber of Commerce, and I agreed to buy one. It was the middle of winter, so we invited him in." Mr. Serafino Fazio, a West Virginia businessman and outspoken Christian, was "half frozen," and starved for outside company when they invited him into their home.

"We were bored and decided to bait the holy roller," said B.D. "If there was one thing Jeremy liked more than prying into other people's business, it was cornering holy rollers and arguing with them." Educated in England, Jeremy Hyman went to church six times a week and twice on Sunday when he was a child. "He liked to say that he had not graduated from school but had escaped from church. But he and I were devout agnostics and considered religion to be for people who needed something to lean on. We only went to church for weddings, funerals and the odd christenings and were happy to keep it that way."

B.D. related that they tried to trick the Christian gentleman with loaded questions. "We asked Serafino three questions: 'Who do I have to give money to?,' 'Who's church do I have to join?,' and 'What kind of religion is this?' He didn't quote any scripture, but said that Christianity wasn't a religion because religion is man-made. We didn't have anything in common, but invited him over for dinner a few times until he had to return to his office in West Virginia."

The businessman sparked Mrs. Hyman's curiosity about Christianity and she began watching "The 700 Club" and reading the Bible. "I was interested, but I wasn't doing anything about it until a few weeks later," she said. "It was 7:20 a.m., and I had just put my son on the bus. Suddenly, I was surrounded by the presence of Jesus and felt urged to make a solid commitment to Jesus Christ. I made a commitment, but didn't tell Jeremy about it."

She told her husband two nights later about her decision, but he viewed it as a temporary, emotional experience. "It was strange because we had been married for 20 years and this was the first time I stepped out and did something before my husband. We discussed Jesus a lot, and I asked him what it would take for him to believe. He said if I got healed of my back condition then he could believe."

B.D. lived on pain pills and had a rare disease which rotted the ligaments in her back and caused them to literally wither away. "I was watching Pat Robertson on 'The 700 Club' when he began to pray for someone with my condition," she explained. "He described my age, location, and back problem. The show had a one week tape delay, but I knew it was me he was talking about. I claimed it and was instantly healed!"

That same day she did some heavy lifting in her barn, and realized that she was healed. "I didn't take any pills, and by the end of the day I did calisthenics. I was exhausted. But at home, when my husband Jeremy looked at me, he got teary-eyed and said, 'The Lord is real.' " He soon became a Christian as a result of the miracle.

B.D. said her mother responded to her newly found faith by asking questions about Christianity. She even watched a few segments of "The 700 Club" because of her daughter's testimony. However, the rift in their relationship continued to grow as B.D. grew in her faith. Eventually her mother stopped writing or calling her. In the meantime, the Hyman family moved to the Bahamas and joined an Assembly of God Church.

After a whirlwind three-week book tour for Mother's Keeper, in which she was interviewed by U.S.A. Today, People, television talk show hosts, newscasters, and radio reporters, she returned to the Bahamas and began writing the sequel. "I wanted everyone, particularly Mother, to know that joy, to know that oneness with the universe and its Creator. It suddenly became important that I write to my mother. My book was in stores everywhere but it wasn't enough. I had to let her know where I was and what I was doing. I had to remind her that nothing was over unless she wanted it to be over. I had to write to her and keep on writing.

"She wouldn't answer my letters - I couldn't even be certain that she would read them - but it was important to tell her that I loved her. Perhaps she would save the letters and take them out in moments of loneliness. She would know that I was still thinking of her. I wondered whether she would be angry that my life was better than ever and so full of joy. Would she try to figure out why? Was there really a chance that something, sometime, would awaken in her the knowledge that there was a gaping lack in her life?

"... What can convince her that we have to measure up now in order to inherit the future? What can convince her that fame cannot work a ticket to heaven, that Oscars will not fit the keyhole? What can possibly convince her that the only way is to say, 'I accept you, Jesus, as my personal Lord and Savior?'"

"I don't know what will convince her, and it doesn't matter that I don't know. God knows ... I won't preach - I won't even try to witness - I'll just let her know what's going on in my life and that I love her. Publishing my book has solved my problem but not hers. Praying for her isn't enough. The least I can do is give the Holy Spirit the opportunity to work in her through the expression of my love."

Today, B.D. and her family reside in Charlottesville, Virginia and her husband, Jeremy, is an illustrator of children's books.

Short Meditations on the Bible and Peanuts

By Robert L. Short

Q. What's the best thing you can do for yourself and others?

A. Know the Bible!

"Jesus answered them, 'How wrong you are! It is because you don't know the Scriptures or God's power.'" - Matthew 22:29 TEV

When Jesus made this statement to the Sadducees, they weren't discussing little questions. They were discussing some really big ones. These are the only questions the Bible and Jesus are interested in - the really big ones. For the most part, they are interested in meaning, not means. They discuss ultimates, not penultimates. The author of the book of Revelation talks about "the four corners of the earth" (Rev. 7:1, 20:8). Does this mean that John thought that the earth was shaped like this page, with flat corners? Maybe so. Maybe not.

Apparently the question didn't bother him very much, or he would have mentioned it. No, John wasn't interested in the physical shape of the world but in the spiritual shape the world was in. We're asking the Bible the wrong questions when we come to it with our little questions. Its purpose is to answer the questions that really bother us the most and are the hardest for us to handle.

None of us can escape these big questions any more than we can escape seeing Woodstock's single giant question mark here. These questions are to us what this question is to Woodstock: bigger than we are. They are also over our heads. Nevertheless, most of us are forced to come up with at least some provisional answers for these big non-provisional questions.

But what if our answers are wrong? This would mean we'd be basing our entire lives on something that wasn't true. We'd be embarking on a long trip, but sailing on the wrong ship. And in the case of others, we'd constantly be suppling them with incorrect information.

When Snoopy attempts to write a book on theology, he hits on what he considers the perfect title: "Has It Ever Occurred to You That You Might Be Wrong?" Good question. This is the first question of all good theology. "How do we know right from wrong?" "How do we know the truth?" Or "Can we know the truth?"

Also notice this: Jesus didn't say, "In my humble opinion, it seems to me that you may be somewhat mistaken;" or, "Perhaps we should all think about this a little more." No, he said bluntly, "How wrong you are!" You are wrong because your knowledge is inadequate; "You don't know the Scriptures or God's power." Evidently, for Jesus, these were the two sources that held the answers to life's really big questions. If he's right, and we don't want to be wrong, then obviously this is the best thing we can do for ourselves: Know the scriptures!

Shouldn't we also know God's power? Yes. But this is not anything we can do for ourselves. If it were, this would be a power we could control. It would not be God's power but ours.

- Robert L. Short

A timely and provocative conversation between faith and culture, Short Meditations on the Bible and Peanuts is Robert L. Short's follow-up to the 25th anniversary of the best seller The Gospel According to Peanuts. Charles M. Schulz, who became a Christian after his mother's death in his early twenties, and Short, a theologian, team up using humor to make us think seriously.

Like The Gospel According to Peanuts and Parables of Peanuts, Short uses Peanuts comic strips to provide us with insightful glimpses into Truth. This was a perilous experiment that came off.

Short Meditations on the Bible and Peanuts, by Robert L. Short, will be available beginning in October through Westminster/Knox Press for $7.95.

But Is It Art?

By Arianna Stassinopoulos Huffington
Author of Picasso: Creator and Destroyer

In the fall of 1989, 14 photographs by Robert Mapplethorpe were sold at auction at Christie's for $129,690. In the same week, 23 Mapplethorpe photographs were sold at auction at Sotheby's for $396,275. Art dealers were furiously bidding against each other for photographs of leather-clad men and cropped close-ups of an "obscene" nature. Once more, hype is confused with art in the "bazaar of the bizarre" that our culture has become.

At the height of the controversy surrounding Mapplethorpe's photographs, the Whitney museum took a full-page ad in the New York Times to protest the cancellation of a Mapplethorpe show by the Corcoran Gallery in Washington. "ARE YOU GOING TO LET POLITICS KILL ART?" the ad asked in block letters. A Mapplethorpe photograph of a tulip was used for illustration.

Of course, the trustees of the Whitney knew as well as the rest of us that Mapplethorpe's fame and his one-man shows at the Whitney and other venerable institutions around the country were not based on his photographs of flowers. But the trustees also knew that the ad would have been self-defeating in terms of garnering public support if it were illustrated by one of Mapplethorpe's photographs celebrating sadomasochism, which Mapplethorpe, in a farewell interview before he died of AIDS, described as sex and magic.

Yet it was precisely these photographs of torture and degradation that put Robert Mapplethorpe on the map, otherwise known as "the cutting edge" of art - what our culture decides is worth exhibiting, reviewing and talking about. If art is in danger of being killed, as the Whitney ad implies, it is our culture, not politics, that is the culprit. In fact, Congress is not the right forum for the particular debate. The larger issue is not what art is supported by public funds, but what art is encouraged and rewarded by our culture.

At the moment, art that deals with rage, violence, disgust and brutality rises to the top. The message from the art world is clear: life is rotten, human beings are rotten, love is rotten, society is rotten. Art that may show the darkness but also gives us a glimpse of the light beyond is seen as too "soft," too unrealistic.

What Tom Wolfe said in The Painted Word is even more valid today: "If a work or a new style disturbed you, it was probably good work. If you hated it, it was probably great ... To be against what is new is not to be modern. Not to be modern is to write yourself out of the scene. Not to be in the scene is to be nowhere." As a result, the art world has for years not been stuck in the very modern and very adolescent stage of rebellion.

There is another world - of light, spirit, harmony and truth that seems foreign to our contemporary culture. Schumann said in the 19th century, "To send light into the darkness of men's hearts - such is the duty of the artist." He would be hard to put to find many such artist thriving today.

In all the huffing and puffing and booming of art that celebrates darkness and inhumanity the same note is struck; how powerful the work, how exquisite the technique! The fact that adding elegance to brutality only helps to desensitize us to its reality is glossed over. And our response has nothing to do with defending our civil rights and a lot to do with losing our capacity to be shocked.

There have been great photographers who have captured strong images of violence and cruelty intending to shock us, often to shock us into action - such as Jacob Riis with his pictures of children working in coal mines.

But when we detach ourselves from the brutality and admire the technique, we are conceding that human beings are inert things to whom you can do anything, sometimes in the name of art, sometimes in the name of sexual kicks, sometimes in the name of the state. It is a concession we cannot afford to make - the first step on the road to Auschwitz and the Gulag Archipelago.

Discussing the arts controversy on "Phil Donahue" two years ago, I told Tim Rollins, a young artist on the panel who works in the South Bronx helping children transmute violence into art, that Robert Mapplethorpe might have benefited greatly from working with him. He replied that Mapplethorpe's violence was between consenting adults. I asked him if he also thought that the consent of his followers in Jonestown exonerated the Rev. Jim Jones.

"Jim Jones," he answered, "was not an artist." This is a succinct expression of the feeling prevalent in our culture that there is one moral standard for ordinary mortals and another for artists.

"Just pronounce the magic word 'art' and everything is OK," wrote George Orwell 45 years ago in an essay on Salvador Dali. "So long as you can paint well enough to pass the test, all shall be forgiven you." And then he made the ultimate pronouncement not only on Dali but on the whole debate on art and morality:

"One ought to be bale to hold in one's head simultaneously the two facts that Dali is a good draftsman and a disgusting human being. The one does not invalidate, or, in a sense, affect the other. The first thing that we demand of a wall is that it shall stand up. If it stands up it is a good wall, and the question of what purpose it serves is inseparable from that. And yet even the best wall in the world deserves to be pulled down if it surrounds a concentration camp. In the same way it should be possible to say, 'This is a good book or a good picture, and it ought to be burned by the public hangman.' Unless one can say that, at least in imagination, one is shirking the implications of the fact that an artist is also a citizen and a human being."

Our culture would do well to take Orwell's words to heart. The rest of us have a duty to distinguish constantly between the true and the false. And perhaps to follow the example of the small boy in the fairy tale who had the courage to cry out that the emperor wore no clothes.

Our secular culture is finding it increasingly hard to satisfy on a purely aesthetic diet the spiritual instinct in us that longs for a larger meaning. With an almost pathetic desperation, we overestimate the significance of everything "artistic," including Andy Warhol's cookie jars, with ever-diminishing emotional returns. But aestheticism - the notion that all of existence can be sanctified as an aesthetic phenomenon - is exhausted. Its champions, still dominating the art world while fighting off a nasty case of existential dread, have failed to recognize that it is the connection between the aesthetic and the ethical that gives art its dignity, its meaning, and its power. It is not an explicit socio-realistic connection made by the artist, but a connection made within ourselves when art pierces through all the crusts of our narrow interests and preoccupations and liberates the truth and the vision of wholeness we carry with us.

Dick Tracy

What is Behind the Popularity of this Summer's Hottest Blockbuster?

By Robert Nolte

ORLANDO, FL - Not since Chariots of Fire rumbled out of Hollywood have we seen such blatant heroism as Dick Tracy shows us in Disney's recent hit movie.

Tracy is so heroic that an obviously impressed audience rose to its feet and gave the movie a standing ovation last month in Orlando, Florida, during a world premiere screening. I haven't seen such obvious affection for a movie in years.

Why? Has Tracy touched a deep chord in us that strums when men act with integrity instead of compromise?

Having mused over the Tracy epic for several days, I have come to some conclusions:

* When Tracy refuses a bribe, the gangsters are incredulous. So is the audience. Perhaps we are jaded by past movie "heroes" who violate the law (re: "the end justifies the means" philosophy). At any rate, when Tracy comes along and in a masculine way turns aside temptation, something deep within us responds.

* Even Madonna cannot bring down the high moraled detective. Fidelity has fallen on hard times these days but Dick Tracy is not of their generation. Instead, he leaves us with a message that commitment to Tess Trueheart has its own rewards.

* And the gangsters offer insight by their refusal to be manipulated by "Big Boy," a visionary gang leader who seeks to rule over a cabal of hooligans. Like the citizens of Iron Curtain nations, the mobsters seek to throw off the yoke of the despot.

Should we really analyze a movie that probably was designed just to entertain us? Does a comic book character have anything to say to such a distinguished generation as ours?

I don't know, but if you study an audience as they watch Dick Tracy, you will probably get some insights into what people long for: simpler times, honest cops, good triumphing over evil and men of character who can overcome temptation.

There was a hunger in that theater audience to see a man of virtue, troubled yet triumphant over life issues that all of us face. Tracy was tempted by the lustful beauty of Madonna but he had his eyes on a higher prize than momentary gratification.

Movie goers that sat around me were stunned when Tracy spurned the bold advances of a scantily-clad Madonna playing Breathless Mahoney. Such purity in men is seldom seen on the silver screen.

When Tracy asks Mahoney whose side she is on, the temptress replies, "The side I am always on. Mine." As the plot unravels, a scriptural principle unfolds that not even the most obtuse movie fans can miss. In trying to save her life, Mahoney (Madonna) loses it when she is shot to death at the end of the drama.

Tess Trueheart, on the other hand, is willing to give up Tracy whom she has loved for years. She leaves town thinking she will start a new life without Tracy but through a series of plot twists, is reunited with Tracy. Willing to lose her own life, she embodies one of Jesus' most dramatic teachings: "Whoever wishes to save his life shall lose it; but whoever loses his life for my sake shall find it."

Aside from the moral messages and possible Christian extrapolations, there is something much more powerful going on in Dick Tracy that should encourage every Christian. The movie offers hope and a possibility that external evil can be conquered as well as the beast who lives within every man.

Movies these days are looking for messiahs and Dick Tracy is no exception. "Only Dick Tracy can save us," is a stanza from one of the musical numbers. Tracy, in fact, does save the city from a powerful crime syndicate and in that, I suppose, he represents a type of messiah-figure.

And, oh, how the movie theater audience I was sitting with wanted a savior! For those few, brief movie moments, a wave of desire for salvation swept across the auditorium. Normally tough urban citizens became vulnerable and dared to believe that men could live virtuous lives.

In that pristine moment, I longed to roll another film that told of Jesus and the redemption He offered all men.

But it was not to be. Theater patrons filed out of AMC 6 smiling, clapping and talking about the Great Tracy. I wanted to preach but took solace in the fact that this crowd was ripe for revival. These people were looking for a hope they had only caught a glimpse of in the life of a big city detective.

They had seen a man who lived with a clear conscience and now they were ready to meet the God who cleanses every man's conscience. A God who can even use a Disney picture.

Don't Touch That Dial

By Barbara Hattemer and Robert Showers
(Huntington House Publishers)

Book Review:

If you believe that the present generation is at risk from sexually explicit entertainment, this book contains information for action against the pornography which is prevalent in modern media. Covering subjects such as pornography, media violence, heavy metal music, MTV, horror movies and slasher films, this work includes cases where community leaders, parents, and media outlets have collaborated in regulatory efforts for the sake of the future of the community: the children. The authors, National Family Foundation President Barbara Hattemer and attorney Robert Showers, cull under one resource the research conducted by internationally recognized experts.

The Fiber Optics Revolution:

How it will change your life

* A 19-year-old college student races home through the streets of Kiev, Ukraine. He rushes into his flat with an eight millimeter camera under his arm. He flips on the five switches to his home video recorder, CD-Rom player, MacIntosh computer, hard drive and fax machine. The whole room whirs. He begins to "pour" the video tape he just shot onto his CD-Rom disk. Views of a mass baptism of hundreds of young people in the river Dnieper that occurred just an hour earlier are edited. He filters out imperfections in the images. As soon as he edits a 15 minute clip, he dials a phone number in America and transmits the image.

* A 35-year-old lawyer from Bolivia attends a presidential prayer breakfast in Lima, Peru. Two cabinet members - both evangelical Christians - make short speeches on the heritage of Simon Bolivar and the importance of religious liberty. The president signs a document affirming the right of the people of Peru to religious freedom. The document is an amendment to their constitution. All the while the Bolivian lawyer carefully records the event on film.

* A black journalism student in South Africa films a political demonstration from her second story apartment balcony in Braamfontein. On the plaza below, thousands of political demonstrators from rival parties shout slogans at each other. Words turn ugly and rocks are thrown. In the center of the street, a young man stands on the edge of a fountain and lifts his voice. Soon the crowds' foment begins to quell. A supernatural peace pervades the plaza as this man preaches the gospel of Jesus Christ.

* In a mountainous region of north-central mainland China, a group of teenagers sit in a large thatched hut and share a meal. Their fellowship dinner gives way to a time of song, dance and worship of the one true God. They are all poor, but are full of happiness. After an hour of jubilation, the sick people of the village are brought in. They lay hands on them and speak in another language. One woman's club foot is miraculously transformed into a normal shape. Other people scream and shake violently as the young prayer teams take turns casting out devils. All the while a camera whirs in one corner of the dimly lit hut.

The Fiber-Optics Network

A middle-aged couple sit in their apartment in north central Florida. The phone rings several times exactly at noon and a wall-sized screen only one-half inch thick flashes on. The screen soon divides itself into four sections and shows an image in each quadrant.

Images from China, Ukraine, South Africa and Peru play for a few minutes each and then the screen goes black. The woman sits at a small computer in the corner of the room, clicks the mouse a few times and places each piece of film footage - stored digitally on a CD-Rom superdisk - into a folder on the computer's desktop. Each image is edited for length.

At five o'clock exactly, the couple stares into three cameras automatically run by a pre-programmed format. The large screen in the background scrolls a script up the wall. As they stare at each quadrant of the screen one camera microphone records their message. They report on five incredible moves of God in countries experiencing a spiritual awakening. No hype is needed; the images speak for themselves.

Unlike many Christian television shows of the '80s and '90s, no appeal for money is given. A few hundred faithful subscribers watch the show faithfully each night. The few dollars they pay each month - much in the same way they would tip a newspaper boy - pay not only the couple's salary but also buy extra cable access. The show is beamed into thousands of other homes for free on thousands of community access stations around the country.

The show is called "Awakenings in the World Today." Many people are touched by the Holy Spirit just by witnessing these great moves of God.

The Coming Transformation of Media

Does this sound like science fiction to you? It might seem hard to imagine, but - depending on the market and the investments made in technology - this will become reality within five to 10 years. Advances in fiber optics technology - phone lines transmitting light instead of electricity - will enable individuals to transmit larger amounts of information across ultra-thin cables.

Computers will send information in the form of text, graphics, digitalized sound and video across these lines as easily as we now make or phone call or send a fax. Images will be sent instantaneously across the ocean through cable avoiding the cost of satellite transmission. The possibility of transmitting television images from home to home will make every person a television broadcaster.

For the same amount of money that it takes to make a five-minute long distance call, you will be able to "download" hours of continuous video-tape. The information will be compressed so that the actual transmission may take only a few minutes.

CD-Rom super-disks will be developed that can store over 1 million megabytes of information each. Telecomputers will be developed which may put you in touch with anyone in the world face to face. This new ability to send digitalized information will revolutionize every aspect of human life.

Imagine being able to tap into vast resources of information. For a nominal fee you will be able to dial up the Library of Congress and scroll through millions of titles, authors and subjects the same way that you look through card catalogs in local libraries. You will be able to find any book that is in print and order it via telephone line. The entire book will be transmitted through cable and show up on your computer screen. The books you check out will be yours to keep if you choose to store the information. The fee for the copyright will show up on your telephone bill.

Subscribe to your favorite magazine and you will receive not only the usual text, color graphics and photos, but also live video footage, computer animation and a human voice simulator of your choice which is able to read you the articles as the text scrolls up a separate screen. The magazine is less the creation of the publisher than it is networks of information banks which feed digitalized sound, video and other bits of information into your home computer via fiber-optic cable. You will be able to manipulate the feed to choose various types of sight, sound, animation and human voice which will enhance the magazine articles.

Dial another number and choose to view digitalized video from any feature length movie ever recorded. Choose to view an obscure film from the 1930s while your computer automatically transcribes the dialogue on a separate screen and even adds color and music to enhance the action. Choose to view a silent movie from the 1920s and your computer will add voices, color, music, and animation to modernize the film.

Businesses will be revolutionized as well. American, Japanese, German and Russian businessmen will form joint ventures over the phone lines. Multi-screen displays will simulate board meetings and even do the translation work from one language to another. Meeting minutes will be kept by a computerized stenographer. Many businesses in the U.S. will begin to hire more employees on a contract basis. More office workers will base themselves out of their homes saving time on travel, money on office space and clearing up many of our cities traffic problems during rush hour and reducing air pollution.

The biggest changes will come as highly centralized organizations become decentralized. Pyramidal structures will become inverted opening up the way for the average person to become entrepreneurial, self-reliant and individualized. The fiber-optics revolution will further the spread of democracy and free market economics in the whole world.

The top entertainment networks will not be organizations such as CNN, ABC, NBC or CBS. The television networks will not be run by the media elite, but more and more by ordinary people. Soon public television networks will form to produce more viewer supported productions. As people tire of the familiar talking heads of corporate TV, more locally produced shows will become popular nationwide.

We have seen this phenomenon occur on a small scale with cable-TV and satellite transmissions picking up local "superstations" such as Ted Turner's CNN and local programming that becomes nationally syndicated due to some quirk of mass appeal.

The truth is that the American public is growing tired of television entertainment of the lowest common denominator. Even cable-TV, which offers a wider variety of choices, has not been able to offer a higher quality of programming. That is why we have become deluged by such low appeal listings as Donahue, the Atlanta Braves vs. whomever, Judge Wapner, the Playboy Channel, an aerobics workout, etc. As the fiber-optic network develops, media stars will become less like Ted Turner and more like the characters of Wayne's World.

Many people who normally despised NBC's long-running Saturday Night Live show took notice last year when a feature length movie spin-off of a SNL skit grossed $100 million. The premise of Wayne's World is that two nerdy, post-teen-but-not-yet-adult, heavy-metal heads do a cable-access talk show from their basement in Aurora, Illinois. Their show is nothing more than youth culture humor in a 10-minute format.

When a TV executive "discovers" Wayne Campbell and his friend Garth, he decides to buy their show for $10,000 and tries to exploit it for its commercial value. But in commercializing the show by employing slick production methods, he destroys its appeal to youth. Soon metal heads and TV execs clash, providing the film's sole conflict.

The success of Wayne's World proved that many people will choose something that is unpolished and intelligent over a high budget production that is slick and meaningless. The main reason why Wayne's World (both the film and the show-within-the-show) was so popular is that it expressed the heart-cry of the baby boomer and younger generation. Today's youth are tired of TV's talking heads and want more reality.

As Wayne Campbell says about the TV executive: "Do you ever get the feeling that he isn't one of us? I mean ... it's as if he wants us to be liked by everybody."

The nature of mass media is that it gravitates to the lowest common denominator in its demographic search for the "typical viewer." Meanwhile, people are literally starving for reality. Network executives gear TV shows for mass market appeal and not for quality or artistic value. This is why TV is so homogenized and boring. With the exception of the Public Broadcasting Service, television stifles individual creativity and doesn't allow truly talented people to gain the spotlight. In order to become successful in any type of mass media, the young professional must first become neutered and domesticated and forced to conform to a centralized, corporate entity.

Renaissance, Reformation, Revolution

The last time a revolution of such a lasting impact occurred was after the invention of moveable type in the 15th century. When Johannes Gutenberg invented the printing press, it supplied the media equipment to set off a cultural revolution in Europe.

But what did Gutenberg produce? Most people know that he printed a copy of the Bible and mistakenly think that this caused a revolution in Europe among the common people. In actuality, this Bible was in Latin and had no relevance to the common man. Gutenberg made his living by the printing of indulgences. A high priced commodity in those days, thousands of Gutenberg's parchments were sold by unscrupulous monks to the illiterate masses in barter for a supposed absolution from purgatory.

The Gutenberg revolution actually did not take place until almost a hundred years later when Martin Luther touched off a controversy over his 95 theses. Luther understood the value of the printing press as a medium to reach the common people. Thousands of tracts and pamphlets were distributed by the Lutherans. The Bible was translated into German by Luther himself and this new medium of print in the common language of the the people is what touched off the true revolution.

Like the Christians of the 15th century, our generation has failed to foresee the significance of the fiber-optics network. Until now our use of television as an evangelistic medium has been marred by the scandals of televangelists. Some believe that the effectiveness of television for the evangelical church is over. But our century is similar to Gutenberg's: it will be the 21st century church that fully utilizes the medium of television.

In any generation there are two types of people who have the means to reach an audience: the Renaissance man and the Reformation man. The Renaissance man is the master of a medium such as art, politics or music. He understands how to hold an audience's rapt attention. But often, the Renaissance man has no message to communicate. The Reformation man is someone who holds the message. He has the keys to truly revolutionize the world. The problem with the Reformation man is that he often has no audience.

In the middle ages, the Renaissance man would be someone like Michelangelo who painted the Sistine chapel. The Reformation man would be someone like John Hus who was burned at the stake for challenging the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church.

Every so often there appears a rare individual who is combination of each: the Renaissance-Reformation man who both understands his audience and has a message to communicate. Such a man was Martin Luther. He not only had a message as a reformer, but was also a radical innovator of the media. He was a pioneer of a new type of multi-media which combined the skills of the orator, writer, printer, artist and musician. Luther was a true Renaissance man, but he was also the Reformation man. It is this explosive combination that produces a revolution that can change the world.

In our generation the Renaissance man would be a late night comedian like Jay Leno who has mass appeal but no serious message. The Reformation man would be an evangelist like Jerry Falwell, who has a message but no mass appeal outside of his own following.

We are still waiting in our generation for some of these rare individuals to appear who have a revolutionary message to solve many of the world's problems. These men and women will also relate to their generation in a relevant way. Instead of mimicking the same slick methods of network television, this new breed of Christians will be the pioneers in the new medium of fiber-optics. They will utilize every new technology available to bring forth their prophetic message.

The people who are chosen for this time will be revolutionaries. Those who are destined by God to be a part of this movement will be on the vanguard of a new era of renaissance, reformation and revolution.

Is There A Resurgence of Values in Hollowood?

By Leilani Corpus

Could Hollywood be groping for goodness after several decades of decadence? There have been some noticeable changes lately. Script- writers are creating heroes that hew to traditional values. Over the last several years, families have become desirable themes - and recently even babies have made a splash at the box office ("Three Men and a Baby" has been a success story for one studio).

Strangely enough, there is a genuine heritage of Christian values in the legacy of Sunset Boulevard. As early as 1932, Christians worked closely with producers, directors, scriptwriters, and even the stars to keep motion pictures and radio and television programs relatively free of immoral and anti-Christian themes.

Christian television producer Theodore Baehr said this "period of grace" existed from 1932 until 1966, when a Motion Picture Code that applied the Ten Commandments to motion pictures was followed and even enforced. The code also became a standard for the radio and television industry. For Hollywood filmmakers, the code was enforced by representatives of the Catholic Church as well as many Protestant denominations. These church leaders read every movie script and approved them under the terms of the code.

Those terms stated that there would be no sex, violence, profanity, obscenity, or nudity in movies that were produced by the major studios. Under Section 8 of the code, it was declared that no religion could be mocked, and that ministers could not be portrayed as comic characters or villains.

There was, in fact, a fear of God in our nation during that time - and moviemakers were obliged to be respectful. Most were, and many created motion pictures that reflected the place of esteem that Christianity held in America. Today, however, the Motion Picture Code is just a token standard to appease conscientious viewers.

As a boy, I remember Saturday afternoon movies where cowboys and Indians fought and died; but never in these films did the perishing writhe in slow motion, with blood gushing from wounds and curses coming from their mouths, as they often do in today's cinema. There was death and tragedy in those old movies, but even in the worst of them parents had little fear that sexually explicit, four-letter words would be carried home by 8-year old Johnny.

In one vintage film, hard-drinking Gary Cooper actually comes forward in an oldtime revival meeting to give his heart to Jesus Christ. "Sergeant York" follows his life of Christian virtue as he becomes a hero in World War I and ultimately receives the Medal of Honor.

Another great film is "It's a Wonderful Life" starring Jimmy Stewart. Directed by Frank Capra, a Hollywood legend who contributed much to producing films of high moral quality, this classic has become so celebrated that practically every network airs the film every year during the Christmas holiday season. A recently made film, "Jesus of Nazareth" is aired every Easter by NBC. This classic has been acclaimed as one of the best films on the life of Christ.

Frank Capra apparently worked with ease under Hollywood's moral code. During these halycon years of the 1930s and 40s, the entertainment industry thrived. A slogan of the period was "Movies are Better Than Ever." Suddenly, however, in the mid-1960's, Christians began to pull out of their commitment to Hollywood. Denominational groups withdrew their representatives, "for different reasons with the same consequences," says Baehr. "One denomination decided things would continue to go well even if it did not bother to read the scripts, failing to keep in mind the sinfulness of man."

Baehr continued by saying, "Another denomination decided that all television, movies, and entertainment programs were bad and left the industry wide open for anti-Christian influences. Several other denominations decided that the Motion Picture Code was too restrictive. This group, represented by the National Council of Churches, felt that movies should be more realistic ... so they worked for the abolition of the code. The offices in Hollywood that read scripts for the denominations were closed, and the people who read the scripts were put out to pasture after some bitter battles."

According to Baehr, many people in the motion industry were "deeply hurt" when the churches pulled out. A former president of Paramount Pictures, a Baptist, said he felt abandoned when they left. Some believe the exodus brought a curse on Hollywood because the industry began a decline that it is just now beginning to shake off.

Television became formidable competition for movie houses, and thousands closed around the U.S. The star system was broken and producers began to find other cities - and nations - in which to make their movies. Huge studio lots were sold off and even the most glittering names - MGM, Warner Brothers and Paramount - were stung by the downturn.

Amazingly, the few virtuous films that were made began to gain attention. "Chariots of Fire"(1983) is seen by many as a the turning point. Since the appearance of this Academy Award winner, profit-conscious producers have become less fearful of making a motion picture that has a Christian message. "Tender Mercies," "The Mission," and "Places in the Heart" are a few of the most recent films that have won public acclaim from Christians and secular audiences.

But there is still much work to do in Hollywood and in the film community. A small enclave of Christian artists, actors, writers, and producers is busy "salting" the industry as much as possible; but there is a need for young people to invade the field in much greater numbers. Despite the perverted language and violence on the screen today, there are some good signs. Warner Brothers Pictures President Barry

Reardon affirmed his desire to produce moral, wholesome films at the National Religious Broadcasters conference in Washington D.C. last month. Past-president of Columbia Pictures, David Pittman, producer of "Chariots of Fire" and "The Mission," agreed with Reardon at the NRB conference. These men are working to turn back the tide of evil in Hollywood but they need other professionals to join them on the battle lines.

One of the giants of the cartoon industry, Hanna-Barbera, is now producing video cassettes for children on the lives of great biblical heroes such as David, Joshua, etc. There are Bible studies at NBC and other studios, and a group of Christian scriptwriters who are churning out movies and television series. In 1985, Franky Schaeffer and another Christian put together a production company to make films with a moral as well as a Christian message.

Tony Salerno, formerly of Agape Force, is heading up one of the most ambitious projects to train young people to reach the masses with the gospel through all types of media. A former CBN producer has started a film summer camp guided by professional Hollywood directors and technicians to train young Christians as actors who can appear in full-length motion pictures. The three-month summer program is held near Hollywood and draws on some of the biggest names in the industry. Part of involvement in the movie camp demands a radical commitment to the Lord Jesus. The camp includes Christian speakers, devotions, and evangelism to insure that the natural high-ego temptation of the entertainment world does not ensnare the young participants.

With all that is going on in the film and television industry, it is obvious that God has not given up on Hollywood - even though some Christians may have. It's not time to write off the industry. Instead, it is time to penetrate and reform this significant part of our culture.

An Insight Into Hollywood Standards

by Joseph Farah

Last year, one of United Artists Pictures surprise hits was "Child's Play," a horror film about a diabolical and murderous spirit that inhabits a doll and terrorizes a mother and her son. Not only did the moderate-budget screamer gross $35 million in theatrical release, it also sold more than 200,000 video cassettes.

Therefore, by Hollywood standards the film, starring Catherine Hicks and Chris Sarandon, was a natural for a sequel. Producer David Kirschner and director John Lafia were set to start shooting the sequel on Oct. 15, 1989, when United Artists (UA) movie President Richard Berger called to say "Child's Play II" was dead.

The decision to kill the project has horrified the Hollywood establishment because it was made not for financial reasons, but for considerations of taste. UA, you see, is about to be purchased by an Australian group that thinks horror films, while profitable in the short term, are destructive to the image and long-term success of the company.

"Why would you make a film like this?" David Evans, who will be the new chief executive of UA, asked of Kirschner. Startled and puzzled, Kirschner pointed out that it was a sure thing. He explained that Universal Studios built its entire foundation on horror films. Gore, excessive violence and shock had long been a Hollywood tradition.

As befuddled as Kirschner was, the rest of the industry was even more perplexed by this unusual programming decision based on higher standards and moral values. "I think the decision is insane," one unnamed studio chief told the Los Angeles Times. "The one thing they don't have is product." A top Hollywood agent asked: "Since when had anyone in this business drawn a line that means not making money?"

Indeed, when word got out that "Child's Play II" had been turned down by UA, every other studio in town immediately went after it. Conventional wisdom held that the film had the potential to be another long-running series like "Friday the 13th" or "Nightmare on Elm Street." Paramount, Warner Bros., Columbia, 20th Century Fox, the Price Co., Carolco, New Line, and even Disney all expressed interest, but Universal appears to have the inside track on distribution rights. Kirschner plans to shoot the film as an independent production.

Still, there is concern throughout the business about UA's apparent prohibition on horror and what its officials describe as certain other "exploitation genres." Admission by industry insiders that Hollywood actually "exploits" audiences is considered a form of heresy within the establishment. The industry is still spoiling over a campaign for "higher standards" waged by British producer David Puttnam during his reign at Columbia. Even current UA honcho Berger reportedly disagrees with the decision of the Australians.

Meanwhile, the new team, which includes Christopher Skase, chairman of the Gintex Group, and Evans, is due to take over the company September 30. Evans said he did not want the company associated with any film that connected a child with murder. One source said the new rules would prohibit films like "The Bad Seed," "The Omen" and "The Exorcist" from being made by UA.

The development raises some interesting questions: Is it possible that foreign ownership will actually bring some standards to Hollywood? With the entry of the Japanese and Australians into mainstream Hollywood production, will studio executives be more likely to begin questioning the long-term implications of producing exploitative entertainment? Will the bottom line remain the only criterion for determining which projects are pursued?

In Hollywood lately, there's been much concern expressed about pollution of our environment. Rarely if ever, however, have the self-righteous activists in the entertainment industry bothered to look in the mirror and examine the kinds of effluents they themselves are spewing into our homes and theaters. They apparently believe the environment is limited to the air, the water and the earth, and that pollution of the mind is somehow less important than pollution of the body.

At a time when criminal and sexual violence are reaching epidemic proportions in our urban areas, few Hollywood executives have been willing to reflect honestly on how their own products may be helping to spread such diseases. In fact, the widespread gratuitous sex and ultra-violence in the media is certainly having a far greater impact on our society's values than the occasional public service messages encouraging recycling and preservation of the rain forest.

Whether moved to do so entirely by public relations motivations or by genuine ethical concerns, UA officials are Hollywood pioneers in the art of restraint and self-control. While it is too early to begin celebrating the redemption of Hollywood, the incoming team at UA at least deserves some credit for bucking the tide.

Please contact Mr. David Evans to thank him for his stand against exploitation films and his decision to drop "Child's Play II" from the United artist production schedule. He needs your encouragement since many Hollywood leaders have expressed their displeasure at his morality. His address is: Mr. David Evans, President, United Artists Pictures Inc., 450 N. Roxbury Drive, Beverly Hills, CA 90210.

Amidst much media hype, several of Hollywood's summer movies are poised to become listed among the most financially successful films of all time. Movie critics were predicting that despite the springtime advertising blitz, movies such as Batman, Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade, Star Trek V, and Ghostbusters II were destined to bomb at the box office. However, the public showed no boredom with sequels and Batmania, and soundly proved these predictions wrong. If you are like most Americans, you should be able to easily match the following descriptions with the above titles:

- * The crew of the Enterprise is hijacked by Sybok, an Epicurean Vulcan, and Captain James T. Kirk, Dr. McCoy and Mr. Spock, recently recalled from shore leave, are led "where no man has gone before."
- * New York City is besieged by ghosts, spooks, poltergeists and spirits. The team of Venkman, Egon, Ray and Winston, coaxed out of retirement, are able to enlist the aid of a Carpathian spirit to combat psychomagnatheric slime.
- * Gotham City is plagued by a psychopathic killer named Jack Napier, alias The Joker. Bruce Wayne, a millionaire dilettante turned costumed vigilante, uses technological sophistication to bring the vicious killer to justice.
- * Dr. Henry "Indiana" Jones, an eminent archaeologist, embarks on yet another adventure in a quest to rescue his obsessive father from the Nazis, and survives an assortment of cliffhanger episodes to foil their plan to dominate the world.

Even at face value, these are familiar plots, recognizable to even those with only a passing acquaintance with pop culture. It is a mystery to movie critics to explain why the American movie going public has become so enraptured with such predictable fare. Why are the judicious, discerning and culturally literate people of America spending millions on mindlessly repetitive entertainment?

If we consider the great need in America today for role models, do the characters give us any clue to the immense popularity of these movies? Consider the characters offered as heroes to the American audience: a pointy eared Vulcan; a 1930s styled, Saturday matinee serial hero; a comic book super hero; and former Saturday Night Live/SCTV cast members doing a take-off on an Abbot and Costello movie. Are these the central figures on which we are to pattern our lives?

Two of these movies, Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade and Batman, are already two of the top money makers of all time. The first Ghostbusters movie was the most popular comedy film of all time; the second installment promises to do equally as well.

What is behind America's fascination with ghosts and superheroes?

Upon closer examination, it becomes apparent that it is not the plots or characterizations of any of these movies that provides a source of compelling fascination; it is their themes which draw us. On the surface, these movies offer simple themes - a science fiction story, a comedy, a comic book motif, and a matinee serial. These genre are extremely different from one another. The common denominator is that, although they differ in form and content, every popular movie this summer seems to have had an underlying spiritual theme.

A culture devoid of spiritual values has sought to fill the vacuum with heroes who give us hope and pose answers for the problems that threaten to destroy our society. America has heard some bold suggestions from several all-too-familiar, yet well-loved characters this summer as they attempt to answer the question: "What is the meaning of life?"

Perhaps, in our sophistication as a technologically-fixed society, we have been too preoccupied with materialism to ask this question ourselves. Or perhaps we were just too embarrassed to admit that we didn't have all the answers. The most popular movies of the summer of 1989 all ask spiritual questions. They all make use of concepts that are other-worldly, yet these ideas are not too escapist for us to easily miss their relevance.

Star Trek V introduces a new character of interest to devoted followers of the ever popular science fiction series. Sybok is the half-brother of Spock. Trekkies will immediately notice that Sybok's temperament is diametrically opposed to his stoic logician brother, Spock. Sybok has rebelled against Vulcan culture by daring to hold faith in inner feeling and emotion, rather than logic, as the pathway to the truth. Long banished from his world, Sybok has conspired to attempt the discovery of Shakarii (which, of course, in Vulcan means heaven).

"Every culture in existence shares a belief in a place from which all life sprang," Sybok explains. "To Terrans it is Eden; to Vulcans it is Shakarii ..." Sybok is also a healer ministering deliverance from painful memories through a modified version of the Vulcan mind meld. According to Sybok, this is a victory won "by faith." He later adds, "By making you face your pain and draw strength from it."

If all of this isn't an overload to our material-worldly conditioned minds, consider the following exchange between Kirk and Sybok as the exiled Vulcan explains his reason for hijacking the Enterprise:

Sybok: "My vision given to me by God."

Kirk: "You're ... vision?"

Sybok: "He awaits for us on the other side."

Kirk: "You're mad!"

Sybok: "Am I? We'll see."

Is all that makes Ghostbusters II so popular its spectacular special effects and deadpan one-liners from Bill Murray? The first Ghostbusters was the highest grossing comedy of all time. The Ghostbusters movies rely heavily on proven formulas, but is there an unseen element that is drawing record audiences? Dialogue from the first movie reveals a humorous yet insightful glimpse of spiritual realities.

Winston: "Hey, Ray ... Do you believe in God?"

Ray: "Never met Him."

Winston: "Well I do ... I love Jesus' style ... the Bible about the last days when the dead would rise from the grave?"

Ray: "I remember Revelation 7:12, 'And I looked as he opened the sixth seal. And behold, there was a great earthquake and the sun became as black as sackcloth and the moon became as blood.'"

Winston: "Judgment Day..."

Ray: "Judgment Day (shrugs) ... Every ancient religion has its own myth about the end of the world."

Winston: "Myth? Ray, has it ever occurred to you that maybe the reason why we've been so busy lately is that the dead have been rising from the grave?"

Ray: (Pauses) "How about a little music."

Another long hyped movie promises to break all box office records. The appeal of Batman has been staggering. In addition to ticket sales, the movie has generated millions of dollars in the merchandising of Bat paraphernalia. It has become bigger than the California Raisins. What is behind the obsession with a man in a cape and a mask?

Ever since the success of Superman and its sequels, the movie industry has been keenly aware of the lucrative possibility of bringing comic book characters to life. But Batman taps into the darker areas of the soul. Says production designer Anton Furst, "We wanted Gotham City to be disquieting, forbidding, dangerous. We took the worst aspects of New York and condensed them, and then stretched them up vertically."

Into this setting, add one restless, emotionally scarred Dark Knight and you have a metaphor describing our disturbed society. Batman acts as a vigilante who offers power, righteousness and invincibility in a world that is seemingly spinning out of control. Batman offers us humanistic justice; lacking superhuman powers, he relies on technology and imagination to arrive at a post-modern perfection. Batman is an image that people have been craving; he gives us someone to emulate. The key to his immense popularity lies in the idea that through human efforts we can solve our internal conflicts and confront the problems of our society.

Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade offers the final installment of the Raiders series. This time Dr. Jones is searching for the Holy Grail - the cup that Jesus drank from at the Last Supper. Moments from the film's dialogue provide us with glimpses into spiritual truths. The Grail is described as "the cup that holds the blood of Jesus Christ." We are told that the keeper of the Grail possesses "a spring inside him welling up to eternal life."

The senior Dr. Jones, Indiana's father, is so obsessed with this search that he says, "The Grail is the only thing that matters ... The quest for the Grail is not archaeology; it's a race against evil." Later in the movie we see that the Grail does indeed heal and give eternal life.

Film makers at the end of the 1980s have discovered that formulas for success often include the interweaving of a heavy spiritual theme throughout an otherwise light-hearted plot. They have discovered that, although many Americans like to see themselves as sophisticated, relying on modernistic explanations for everything, they respond favorably to themes that touch a deeper pulse.

Counterfeit Spirituality

Author Winkie Pratney has described the four-stage process by which a culture is emptied of spiritual mores and is filled with substitutes which provide a counterfeit spirituality. In less than a generation, America has come from being an irreligious material culture, to a New Age of psychic technology. For the past 40 years, America has been in a spiritual revolution. From the conservative post-war years when the Judeo-Christian concept of God was freely accepted - to the present where society has become thoroughly secularized, the spiritual needs of the people have been in a state of flux.

- In the 1950s, Americans forgot about God. Thirty or more years ago, Church attendance was at an all time high, but religion had become a status quo experience. The '50s was a period in which Christianity became culturally irrelevant to the youth of America.

- In the 1960s, Americans forgot God's laws. This was the most turbulent decade in recent history in which Christian values were scorned and discarded by the youth. The end result of the '60s was the Woodstock nation - a drug induced orgy together with rock music symbolized rebellion against God's laws.

The absence of God and His laws created a spiritual vacuum. This dilemma was succinctly articulated by Grace Slick of the Jefferson Airplane, "When the truth is found to be lies/ And all the joy within you dies/ Don't you want somebody to love?" America was ready for new gods and new laws.

- In the 1970s, America made up new gods. After the emergence of the "flower child" generation, new religions, such as Transcendental Meditation and a whole variety of cults, made inroads into our culture. The most popular of these new gods was, of course, SELF. The children of the '70s became known as the "me" generation.

- In the 1980s, America made up new laws. A society had been formed without ethics. A mass amnesia had set in and most were unaware that they lived in what was once a Christian nation. At the end of the '80s, America had become a value free society. The revolution had been completed.

This is a replay of deception carefully orchestrated by a subtle enemy. The original pattern of spiritual revolution, or "How to Destroy a Society in Four Easy Steps," is found in Genesis 3:1-4.

"Now the serpent was more crafty than any of the wild animals the LORD God had made. He said to the woman, 'Did God really say, (Forget God) "You must not eat from any tree in the garden?"' ... 'You will not surely die,' (Forget God's laws) the serpent said to the woman. 'For God knows that when you eat of it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God (Make up new gods), knowing both good and evil'" (Make up new laws).

The Answer to the Search

God created each one of us for fellowship with Him. After the Fall, God sent His only Son to pay the price for our sins so that fellowship with Him may be maintained. Until recently, the message of salvation was readily received in America. But many rejected faith in Jesus and instead created a society which exists in a God-shaped vacuum.

The most popular movies of the summer indicate that people are restless and searching for answers. This trend shows that many are desiring spiritual rest. Each one of these movies attempts to fill a void that is in all of us.

In Ghostbusters II, the premise is that New York is threatened by slime that is psycho-reactive. The evil unleashed on the city is a reflection of the bad vibes which characterize the Big Apple. As in the first movie, New York City is presented as a city possessed by evil spirits. This is a spiritual insight much closer to the truth than most New Agers would care to admit. The police are powerless to do anything, as are religious leaders and the mayor. "So who ya gonna call?"

Batman presents us with a similar view of the city. The Joker symbolizes the rash of serial killers and violent crime which is out of control in our society. Unable to offer a cure for our diseased society, film makers have given us a savior. Batman represents justice in a nation without God. Unlike Superman, he is a mere man; Batman suggests to us that we can become like God - that through our own efforts we can save ourselves.

In Star Trek V, we find the crew of the Enterprise truly fulfilling their mission: "to boldly go where no man has gone before." It is surprising to note that the highly intelligent and logical Spock at no time denies that God exists. In the wake of recent scandals in televangelism, is it possible that God has found a Vulcan to spread the gospel? It is refreshing for audiences to see Mr. Spock going "In Search of God."

As Sybok correctly tells us, inner healing is found by faith. One element is missing, however - only Jesus Christ has the power to heal sickness and the pain of past memories.

The saving grace of Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade is the presence of the elder Dr. Henry Jones, played by Sean Connery. Dr. Jones sincerely believes that eternal life and the power to heal are found in the cup used by Jesus. But he neglects to answer one question: "What was in the cup?"

According to the Bible, the cup is "Father ... not what I will, but what You will" (Mark 14:36). In this passage, Jesus prays to His Father indicating His willingness to go to the cross. His obedience made your obedience possible. Repentance, turning from what you want and what you desire, is a necessary part of true salvation. However, you cannot save yourself; repentance merely puts you in a position to receive the great gift of eternal life that a loving God has for you.

Eternal life is knowing God. Although the summer's most popular movies deal with the theme of man's great spiritual need, they skirt the central issue - that this new life is found in a relationship with Jesus Christ. This answer has not been directly given, but hopefully many are asking the same question posed by Dr. "Bones" McCoy at the end of Star Trek V: "I was speculating: Is God really out there?"

Jewish Journalist Speaks Out

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - An outspoken Jewish journalist, known for his conservative commentaries on political life in the U.S., has joined forces with Christians in America to protest the controversial new movie "The Last Temptation of Christ." Don Feder, of the Heritage Features Syndicate, brought a forceful indictment against Universal Pictures in one of his recent editorials, which appeared in the conservative weekly newspaper Human Events as well as many local publications.

"As a Jew," stated Feder, "I doubt I can be accused of sectarian bias in the controversy at hand. I do not believe in the deity of Jesus Christ. I do believe in respecting the faith of those who regard him as their savior."

In his editorial, entitled "Hollywood Sullies Christianity," Feder criticizes Universal Pictures for its claim that Christian opposition to "The Last Temptation" is censorship: "Does freedom of expression require that every concept be explored; must every idea, no matter how bizarre and abhorrent, be articulated? Not merely expressed, but turned into a silver screen extravaganza? Is it essential to the furtherance of religious inquiry that Hollywood concoct a sex life for Jesus? Reasonable limits, self-imposed, are not the same as censorship. The boundaries should be set by decency and sensitivity to the deeply held sentiments of our neighbors."

Feder points out that Hollywood executives have been hypocritical in their treatment of Christians in motion pictures. While the character of Jesus is slandered in "The Last Temptation," the Islamic prophet Mohammed was treated with extra respect in "Mohammed, Messenger of God," a film produced ten years ago. "In this dramatization," stated Feder, "the Prophet isn't shown on screen or his voice heard by the audience, for fear of affronting devout Moslems."

Last Temptation: A Financial Loss

TUPELO, MI (EP) - Christian activists who protested the movie "The Last Temptation of Christ" won a tremendous victory, according to the American Family Association (AFA). The AFA says Universal Pictures suffered a humiliating financial loss of $10-13 million because of successful boycott efforts.

About one percent of the roughly 13,000 theaters in the country have shown the movie, and so far Universal has reportedly recovered less than $4 million of their $15-17 million investment.

"The Christian community has won a tremendous victory," claims Rev. Donald E. Wildmon, executive director of the AFA. "We joined hands and worked together and accomplished what appeared to be impossible. Against tremendous odds - millions of dollars in promotion by MCA/Universal, all the support MCA/Universal could rally in the Hollywood community, and hundreds of articles and broadcasts praising the movie and criticizing those who protested - the Christian community succeeded. It shows what we can be accomplished when we join together in a common effort."

Wildmon, a United Methodist Minister, says it was hypocritical of MCA/Universal to defend the release of the movie as an exercise of First Amendment rights when they had put a "gag rule" in effect for their theater managers, forbidding them to speak about the movie to the media, and thus denying their own employees the same First Amendment rights they claimed to be protecting.

"AFA joined other Christian organizations - broadcasters, para-church ministries, denominations, etc. - in protesting the movie," notes Wildmon. "The secular critics, and many Christian media, reported that the protest ensured success. 'Christians should have said nothing about the movie,' the critics said. 'All the protest did was help ensure the movie's success.' But it didn't happen.

"AFA distributed radio spots to about 900 Christian radio stations and most stations used the spots repeatedly. AFA also produced a television special which was shown on more than 50 Christian TV stations. Thousands of pastors in local churches called their people to action, and the members responded. Millions of Christians signed petitions and sent them to their local theaters, and hundreds of thousands of others called and wrote. Their efforts were successful."

AFA expects that "Last Temptation" will be nominated for some Oscar awards. "That is one way Hollywood has of rewarding its own," explains Wildmon. "Just remember that all the nominations and voting are done by people in the industry, people who for the most part want to help MCA/Universal save face."

Life After Television

By George Gilder

RECOMMENDED READING: By the author of Wealth and Poverty, Life After Television deals with the telecomputer, a powerful interactive system connected by fiber-optic threads to other PCs around the world. It will change the way we do business, educate our children and spend our leisure time. It will imperil large, centralized organizations: television networks, phone companies, government bureaucracies and multinational corporations. George Gilder proposes an optimistic scenario: the United States has only to unleash its industrial resources to command the "telefuture," in which new technology will overthrow the stultifying influence of mass media, renew the power of individuals and promote democracy throughout the world.

Ludwig van Beethoven

"It was not a fortuitous meeting of chordal atoms that made the world. If order and beauty are reflected in the constitution of the universe, then there is a God."

Ludwig van Beethoven is considered by many to be the world's greatest composer. From the time he was born in 1770, Beethoven faced overwhelmingly difficult circumstances. The defining tragedy of his life, and the one which diminished his performing career, was his growing deafness. It was this miserable affliction that intensified the tumultuous eruption of emotion which is found throughout Beethoven's life and music. As Beethoven's deafness increased, he withdrew more and more into the work of composing and into his intimate and unorthodox relationship with God.

Discerning Beethoven's belief is no easy task. All his biographers agree that he was intensely spiritual. But his untraditional faith makes it difficult to categorize the composer. Beethoven, like many geniuses, was a very complex man with eclectic interests and influences. Beethoven was born and baptized into a Roman Catholic family. His mother was very pious. In his youth, he attended a variety of churches and his principle teacher, Christian Gottlob Neefe, was a Protestant believer. Beethoven's letters and diaries contain dozens of devout references to God, giving evidence of strong conviction. His relationship to God was deeply personal, and he turned to God to make sense out of life's unfairness.

To a close friend in 1810, he confessed an almost childlike faith: "I have no friend. I must live by myself. I know, however, that God is nearer to me than others. I go without fear to Him, I have constantly recognized and understood Him."¹

Beethoven owned both a French and a Latin Bible and late in life he prayed with his young nephew almost every morning. His library included such Christian devotionals as Thomas a Kempis' The Imitation of Christ and a very heavily marked copy of Christian Sturm's Reflections on the Works of God in Nature. And of course Beethoven composed some of the most profound Christian masterpieces of history.

Beethoven's complex personality traits leave the world's greatest musicologists at odds on the subject of the composer's faith. Perhaps the best clues to his personal beliefs can be found in Beethoven's music - music which reveals the man himself. The portrait of Beethoven's life which emerges from historical accounts, his own written reflections and his music is one of tremendous achievement in the face of unimaginable difficulty and tragedy. Hearing loss would present a severe trial to anyone, but for a musician - indeed, a master musician - deafness was devastating.

Nevertheless, Beethoven was determined to prevail and to continue in his art, which he considered a sacred trust placed upon him by his Creator. It is astonishing to study the complexities and beauty of his late works and to realize that, except in his imagination, he never heard them performed. Beethoven's principle virtue was his sheer determination to overcome. The judgement of a man's greatness is not only to be measured in the mission he accomplishes, but in the obstacles he has overcome in the process.²

Media Bias in America

"And that's the way it is(n't)"

By Loren Mitchell

You are from a large city in America. You haven't attended church in years and claim no particular religious affiliation.

You don't believe in God but you do hold lots of other beliefs - such as a woman's "right" to an abortion, and homosexuality is okay, and gays should be allowed to teach in public schools, and capitalism is dangerous and evil.

You voted Democratic in every presidential election since 1960, including McGovern in 1972. A registered Democrat, you campaigned with Gary Hart, and Mondale-Ferraro and you worked in the White House when Jimmy Carter was president.

Your heroes are Jane Fonda, Gloria Steinem and Ted Kennedy. You rank Castro and Daniel Ortega above Ronald Reagan and Jerry Falwell. You favor nuclear disarmament, affirmative action, hiring homosexuals, government redistribution of wealth and gun laws. You oppose school prayer, capital punishment, defense spending and aid to anti-communist forces.

You are a self-described "liberal," rabidly anti-Christian and pathetically out of touch with the mainstream. Yet oddly enough, that mainstream looks to you each day for information!

Who are you?

You are a reporter.

Or, maybe a TV anchorman. You work for a major daily newspaper, or perhaps a magazine, or one of the networks. You write for the Washington Post, the Los Angeles Times, The New York Times, Newsweek, or TIME.

The organization you work for gives millions of dollars for such groups as the National Organization for Women (NOW), People for the American Way, the ACLU, and Planned Parenthood.

The company you work for is among the handful of organizations based in Washington or New York that are responsible for generating every single national news story in America. You, and other anti-American, anti-Christian liberals have the eyes and ears and hearts of the American public. America trusts you.

Evidence of Media Bias

Through a series of nine polls, most of which were conducted by outside sources, the editors of a new book, And That's the Way it Is(n't) by Bozell and Baker, have examined the political beliefs of those working for the major media.

What do Reporters Believe?

The 1981 Lichter-Rothman study surveyed political attitudes and voting patterns of 240 journalists working for such major media as The New York Times, the Washington Post, US News and World Report, the Wall Street Journal and all the networks. Key findings included:

- * 90 percent favored abortion.
- * 80 percent supported affirmative action.
- * 81 percent voted Democratic in every election from 1964-72.
- * Most blamed the U.S. for Third World poverty.

An excerpt from that study says journalists emerge "as strong supporters of environmental protection, affirmative action, women's rights, homosexual rights, and sexual freedom in general.

Liberal Sources

Not surprisingly, these journalists turn to liberal individuals and organizations as supposedly independent sources for news reports. Leftwing congressmen, Ralph Nader, various anti-nuclear groups, Jane Fonda ... these are just a few of the sources considered credible by the media elite.

Bozell and Baker present a 1985 poll by the Los Angeles Times which produced results supporting the Lichter-Rothman findings. The bottom line is that America's newsrooms are liberal hotbeds far out of step with the American public.

And, in The Future?

Things may get worse. An excerpt from a Lichter-Rothman study published in the Washington Journalism Review states, "If today's media elite is one of the most liberal, anti-establishment groups in American society - politically alienated from traditional values and institutions - tomorrow's media elite is likely to be more so. That is what our survey of Columbia University School of Journalism students revealed."

The survey of media elite and future reporters found:

- * More than 80 percent of each group seldom or never attend religious services.

* Less than eight percent attend church regularly and nearly half claim no religious affiliation.

The Real Conflict

There was a time when the nation's leading newspapers took seriously the Kingship of Jesus Christ, when Monday's edition included lengthy reports on Sunday's sermons. Many fail to recognize that the hideous profile of the modern media is the direct result of its wholesale rejection of Christ.

While presenting the media conflict as a liberal vs. conservative issue, we might fail to realize that the good and evil are not represented by opposing ends of the political spectrum. The nation's press are wretched and evil because they are anti-Christian, not because they are liberal and Democratic.

As John Lofton states: "The Lord considers equally reprehensible any humanistic agenda that denies His authority and rule. The Bible - not the Republican platform is the standard by which we must judge the mass media."

Perhaps surprising to some, there is much that can be done to not only counter but reverse the disturbing trends documented by Bozell and Baker. Consider what can be done:

The Solution

First and foremost, individuals must commit their whole lives to the Lord Jesus Christ. This means that we will study the Bible to find out what it says about affirmative action, national defense, and economics. God is the author of all truth, therefore to understand events accurately we must learn a Biblical worldview.

The same holds true for reporting the news. The news is not fair and accurate as long as it comes from a reporter or an organization holding to an anti-Christian worldview.

We must immediately cease listening to the counsel of the wicked. God's word clearly prohibits and condemns such activities, yet the large percentage of Christians in America each day take counsel from the networks and the daily newspaper.

If you depend on any of the major print or broadcast media as a primary source of information, then you are allowing your understanding of world events to be molded by servants of Satan. There are only two kingdoms - Christ's and Satan's - and the majority of the media is clearly in the latter.

The necessity of alternative news sources has never been greater. Start subscribing now. Such alternatives are available, you just have to look a little harder to find them.

Sadly, the major media is entirely non-Christian. There is not one major daily or even a single network that applies God's biblical principles to the media. This must change. Products which are indispensable to the worldly reader or viewer yet founded on distinctly Christian principles must be financed. This will take money, time and commitment - but let's get started!

The Nature of Conspiracies

By Gavin Quill

In the world of media, we are hearing a lot about conspiracies these days. It seems that one of the quickest short cuts to the best seller list is to use the word "conspiracy" in your title. Conspiracy theories abound throughout our modern culture, but it appears that no community is more enamored of them than evangelical Christians. A lot of time and energy is spent researching suspicious movements and institutions in an effort to divine their mysterious evil intentions. Even more time is spent worrying about potential frightening outcomes should any of these groups achieve their objectives. With all the critical tasks facing the Church in America, have we ever stopped to consider whether a conspiracy obsession might be distracting us from more important responsibilities?

Let's start by defining conspiracy. Literally it means "breathe" (spiro) "together" (con). Webster's dictionary (1828) says that to conspire is to "breathe together, to band together, to agree or to concur to one end." At this level of definition then, we are all conspirators. Any two or more people sharing even the thinnest common interest are by definition conspirators to some extent. Any time two people interact you have all the necessary raw materials for a conspiracy to be hatched. All that is needed is agreement toward a common end.

This perspective quickly deflates the mysterious and fearful image we have of conspirators. "We have seen the enemy and he is us." Conspiracy is so commonplace that it is really quite mundane. We recognize that man must breathe to survive. But as social creatures, men must also breathe together too survive. Husbands and wives, families, roommates, sports teams and business partners all conspire together to achieve common goals every day. Most of us are probably involved with a dozen or more conspiracies at the same time.

There are three distinct types of conspiracy: (1) Conscious (2) Unconscious (3) Unwitting. Distinguishing between them is critical if we are to properly analyze the actions and intentions of everything from grammar school social cliques and inner city youth gangs to political parties, religious groups and multi-national corporations.

* Conscious conspiracies are made with people that you know or people that you know about.

* Unconscious conspiracies exist between people and groups that are either unaware of each other's existence, unaware of the common purpose they share or, though aware of these things, are not organizationally linked in any tangible manner.

* Unwitting conspiracies exist where the participants are directed by unperceived spiritual forces.

On the surface these groups might even seem like they are working at cross purposes, but unbeknownst often even to themselves, they are really coordinated, guided or inspired by either the Holy Spirit or by demonic forces. The same conspiracy can operate in more than one dimension simultaneously, and there can be various combinations and relative weightings between these dimensions. We can even find all three types being manifested in unison to achieve the same common purpose. For example, most Christians working with their local prayer group, church or denomination are completely unaware of what millions of other Christians are doing in countless groups small and large around the world.

At the same time, the Holy Spirit is collectively guiding and strategically coordinating all of their activities according to a Master plan that no individual piece can comprehend. On the other hand, a devout believer in a new age cult conspires with his compatriots to proselytize others with his gospel of TM, yoga, crystals, astrology, ascended masters etc., but he is unaware that his fundamental assumptions about the nature of divinity, sovereignty, law and judgement are the same as those espoused by Marxism, evolutionism, Buddhism, Hinduism and a host of other "isms" that deny the truth of Christianity. And neither he, nor his unrecognized co-conspirators in the panoply of "isms" realizes that they are all unwitting executors of Satan's relentless efforts to thwart the purposes of God for the human race.

We should recognize that conspiracies can be either open or hidden, and that they can be either good or evil. Open conspiracies, even if they are evil ones, are of little threat to a vigilant people, while closed ones are only dangerous if their goals are evil. Open conspiracies of any kind are relatively harmless, because the affected parties can see the danger far off and plan accordingly (unless their eyes are shut). And closed ones should not immediately be considered dangerous.

Businessmen and sports teams are not in the habit of announcing their game plans to the world, yet their private plotting is legitimate. At the same time, Jesus said that "everyone who does evil hates the light and will not come into the light for fear that his deeds will be exposed" (John 3:20). Therefore we should expect that evil conspirators will place a high premium on the secrecy of their real intentions. In fact, the degree to which they feel free to reveal their true objectives is the degree to which the light of truth and morality has been extinguished from our society. The cockroaches only come out when the lights go off.

Our Founding Fathers understood man's conspiratorial capacity for both good and evil, and they had a specific plan for controlling it: they instituted a free market for conspiracies. That's right. In fact, this was one of the most unique aspect of our new Christian constitutional and republican form of government. James Madison took great pains in the Federalist Papers to elaborate on the genius of this approach as it pertained to partisan efforts to gain control of the Federal government. Remember that political movements are one form of large scale conspiracy.

Yes, every group would want to implement its own narrow agenda through the apparatus of the new central government, and yes, some of these groups might have immoral, dangerous or tyrannical intentions. Yet as long as political participation remained a free market commodity, the competing interests of multiple parties (that is, multiple groups conspiring to legislate their particular agendas), would serve as a forceful cross-checking mechanism that would never allow too narrow a group to enforce its will on the entire citizenry.

Thus evil conspiracies could never achieve widespread success, at least not without first converting a sizable portion of the population to their viewpoint. And of course, in the realm of open discourse the Founders were confident that the proponents of scriptural truth would be the ones to benefit from the persuasion and conversion process.

Evil conspiracies only become a significant threat when they manage to achieve some level of institutional power monopoly. The institution could be the military, civil government, public education, major universities, professional guilds (i.e. the ABA for lawyers), or the mass media (from Hollywood to CNN). Once they control such seats of power, malicious conspirators too often choose to fortify themselves, denying equal access to all other points of view. They may even try to entirely purge all expression of the viewpoints they find most odious. This is exactly what has been happening to the Christian community in the United States during the past several decades.

But how has Christianity arrived at such a precarious position if this nation was founded as a Christian nation with full civil and religious liberties? Were the Founders mistaken in their belief that truth can't lose in a fair fight? No, they were correct, but their optimism assumed that the advocates of righteousness (that is those who conspired to advance the Christian faith), would be vigilant, diligent, forceful and faithful in their labors. The power behind all conspiracies is action. Truth has a power of its own, but it must still be contended for. Evil can win if righteousness defaults. And evil has this advantage: fallen man's strong natural inclination to sin. Therefore, evil conspiracies have an inherent momentum, derived from their built-in appeal to fallen men. Godly conspirators can never rest. Moral vacuums naturally fill with wickedness, but virtue must be pumped in. Godliness does not advance by osmosis.

After the Civil War, American Christians began a long downward spiral of laziness, apathy, and excessive pietism. We ceased to promote our common interest in throughout our culture. That is, we ceased to conspire. Having stopped breathing together, we as a Body became increasingly weak. Evil conspirators though small, unorganized and incompetent at the start, slowly won out against our ever more meager opposition. Once they gained a temporary victory and obtained institutional power, they then sought monopoly power through the destruction of the same free market which permitted their rise (the very free market which Christians created).

It was not until the door got slammed in our face and the army of politically correct heresy hunters started combing the streets that parts of our community began to awaken from our decades-long stupor. Unfortunately, most of our Body is still asleep. Hardly more than a few fingers on one hand have begun to once again conspire together for the promotion of Christian civilization in our nation. But that can and will change, and a proper understanding of the nature of the conspiracies and conspirators that oppose us will be a critical part of that change.

In an article to be published in a later issue, we will examine why we should avoid excessive entanglement with conspiracy theories. We'll see how our all too common obsession with conspiracies makes us appear foolish to unbelievers, and how it causes us to overestimate the strength of both Satan and his earthly surrogates while underestimating the power of God and of God's children. We'll also look at how too much conspiracy thinking reinforces faulty eschatology, makes us reactive and defensive, creates fear and paralysis, and helps us to rationalize our failures.

"Shelter From The Storm" by PowerSource

By Leilani Corpus

GAINESVILLE, FL (FR) - A Christian song about child abuse became one of the top 10 hits on secular radio stations throughout the U.S. during the last few weeks of 1987 and prompted several child abusers to seek rehabilitation.

A woman told a Fort Worth radio station that the song forced her to think of how she'd beaten her child. "I realized that the cycle of abuse was continuing with this generation. ... The cycle stops with this letter," she wrote.

The song is from the album "Shelter From The Storm" by PowerSource, a Bedford, Texas-based evangelical youth chorus featuring nine-year-old soloist Sharon Batts.

The song begins, "Dear Mr. Jesus, I don't understand why they took her Mom and Dad away. I know that they don't mean to hit with wild and angry hands. Tell them just how big they are, I pray." Dear Mr. Jesus, they say that she may die. Oh, I hope the doctors stop the pain. I know that you could save her and take her up to the sky so she would never have to hurt again."

The record cracked Billboard magazine's Hot 100 singles chart at 63. It was considered a fast-rising song, according to Thomas Noonan, the magazine's director of charts. "This falls into a different category," Noonan said. "It's a topical record that happened to hit on a sensitive area at a sensitive time. This kind of phenomenon is exciting to our business."

The nine-year-old vocalist Sharon Batts appeared with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers National Football league team at a benefit for child abuse crisis centers in the Tampa area in December. She said she is pleased when she hears stories of people who have been touched by the song. "It makes me feel good because I know that those people haven't had help," she said.

About 100,000 copies of the single have been ordered, although only 15,000 copies have been sold. Sharon's mother, Jan Batts, is the group's creative director. "It has just grown so fast," she said. "It's difficult to say it's under control."

The Gospel Workshop for Children Inc., a non-profit, non-denominational group, started PowerSource five years ago to produce records and videos for troubled children who have no one to help them. The group commissioned songwriter Richard Klender to write "Dear Mr. Jesus" at the suggestion of a board member who had been abused as a child.

In some cities, record stores and radio stations are joining to sell the album and are giving the profits to local child abuse crisis centers. Proceeds from orders made directly to PowerVision will be used to offset distribution costs which the tiny record label has accrued, Batts said.

Telling It Like It Is(n't)!

By Loren Mitchell
3/91

The following statistics were compiled by using various methods, including surveys, studies, random sampling and a computer program called "Nexus." This program can scan thousands of news stories and find out things such as how many time Republicans are called "rightwing" and Democrats "leftwing."

* Donations from news organization to political groups overwhelmingly go to leftwing causes. Groups receiving the funds also receive an inordinate amount of coverage from the organizations making the donations.

* In 650 articles published in TIME, Newsweek, The New York Times, and the Washington Post, U.S. Senator Jesse Helms (R-NC) was negatively labeled 10 times more often than U.S Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA).

* A similar study found the Christian conservative group, Concerned Women for America, was negatively labeled 24 times more often than the National Organization for Women, a pro-abortion group. (NOW claims 160,000 members compared to 6000,000 CWA members.)

* Researchers found that reporters used "pro-choice" 97 percent of the time but seldom said "pro-life," instead employing the negative "anti-abortion."

* 90 percent of all Associated Press stories from Moscow were rewrites from TASS or other official USSR agencies.

* Of nearly 200 minutes of network coverage on human rights issues, 188 minutes were devoted to abuses committed to U.S. allies. Communist atrocities received less than 10 minutes coverage.

* Between September 1988 and May 1989, while Congress debated aid to the Contras, news reports were blatantly pro-Sandinista.

* Major media have totally ignored the Communist genocide that resulted in the death of three million of the eight million people in Cambodia.

* Attorney General Ed Meese, a Republican, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, Jim Wright, a Democrat, were both accused of ethical violations in 1988-89. Meese, who was later vindicated, received 17 times more news coverage by print media than Wright, who resigned in shame. The press commonly referred to the sleaze factor" in reporting the Meese investigation. Wright was portrayed as a "victim" of a "partisan atmosphere" and a casualty of an "ethics war."

Unholy Hollywood

Violence: The Mainstreaming of Mayhem

In 1967, Warren Beatty released his famous gangster movie, Bonnie and Clyde, and immediately caused a sensation - it was no ordinary cops and robbers film.

At first it looks like we are being treated to a comedy. As a young couple Warren Beatty and Faye Dunaway are endearing and naïve. Before long we are identifying with the characters. Then suddenly the film takes an explicit turn into violent savagery. The scenes of graphic violence culminate with the famous death scene in which Beatty and Dunaway are gunned down on the side of a country road - riddled with literally hundreds of bullets in slow motion.

Who would have thought this groundbreaking film for violence would have led to the release of films that have made the scenes of cannibalism, mutilated organs, and other blood and guts common fare for the 1990s?1 The first to use slow motion filming sequences to draw audiences into the "feel of the killing," Bonnie & Clyde crossed the line of acceptability by portraying a hideous and violent act in an artistic manner.

But today, Bonnie & Clyde seem tame in comparison with the abundance of violent flicks ranging from Nightmare on Elm Street's Freddy Krueger, a child-killer who has become a cartoon hero, to a killer, "Buffalo Bill" who skins his female victims in Silence of the Lambs. Buffalo Bill is eventually tracked down by an FBI agent assisted by an incarcerated psychopath serial killer, "Hannibal the Cannibal," Lecter who was a psychiatrist before he was imprisoned for killing and eating his female victims.

The top grossing movie of 1991 features graphic footage of skinned female corpses, a policeman's corpse strung up above Hannibal's jail cell, with his shirt open to a partially skinned chest. Buffalo Bill, a former patient of Lecter's, is a frustrated transsexual whose modus operandi is that he covets women's bodies. As an added twist, Hannibal escapes and the movie closes with him calling the FBI Agent and telling her that he will not attack her. I'm sure we'll be seeing a sequel with the escaped cannibalistic killer.

Although the scenes were reminiscent of Alfred Hitchcock's shadowy style in heightening suspense, the bloody sequences were obviously framed to nauseate and turn stomachs. Renny Harlin, director of Die Hard 2 said "Today we have the technology to do sequences that are louder and bigger and more effective than before."2

And Harlin aptly demonstrated this in Die Hard 2, as viewers watched 264 people die - counting the 200 who were killed in the plane crash scene - as well as eyes being sprayed into; a man being crushed by moving luggage rollers; a man's neck being sliced; and Bruce Willis biting flesh off a man's hand and stabbing a man's eye with an icicle.³ Expletives were used 125 times throughout the movie.⁴

In another blockbuster movie, Robocop, 32 people get killed.⁵ A man melts from toxic waste and subsequently gets run over where we watch his head slowly decapitated from the crash, rolling down the street.

Martin Scorsese, director of Goodfellas, a blood and bullets tale about gangster life said, "Maybe we need the catharsis of bloodletting and decapitation like the ancient Romans needed it, as ritual but not real like the Roman circus."⁶ Scorsese should know, since he also directed movies such as Taxi Driver and Mean Streets. An academy award nominee, Goodfellas also had a high dose of profanity with 282 expletives throughout the film. Scorsese has admitted that his movies are therapy for his personal "anger, rage and craziness."⁷

In an interview with the Los Angeles Times, Scorsese concedes that films such as Taxi Driver are "morality plays for myself ... I've just found myself lucky to express my personal feelings on film, because that's my medium."⁸ (In a future article, we'll be exploring how filmmakers such as Scorsese are using their creative genius to crusade for their personal beliefs.)

In the good old days of gangster and war movies, and classic westerns, the bad guys were shot, sliced, hung, stabbed and killed by the good guys. Of course, this was after the enforcement of the Hays Production code in 1934 which stipulated that violence on the screen could not inspire imitation.⁹ Only justifiable violence could be portrayed.

Prior to enforcement of the Hay's code, the grandfather of the Motion Picture Association's rating board, representatives of Catholic and Protestant churches across the nation were upset about the graphic violence and sex on the screen.¹⁰ In 1932 alone, there were 34 violent gangster films.¹¹ The glamorization of sex and violence roused churches into action.¹² The National Legion of Decency, an alliance of Catholic and Protestant churches, opened up an office in Hollywood in 1934.¹³

The group under the leadership of Joseph Breen enforced a stricter rating code than the Hays office. Every movie in Hollywood was reviewed by the group before being released. No violence was allowed, except to kill the bad guys. The code banned nudity, but kissing was allowed. Any derogatory references to clergy or religion were not allowed.¹⁴

Today's brutally violent sequences have evolved into another slick tool of the entertainment industry. As former national PTA president Ana Kahn stated, film "violence is so gratuitous - not necessary for the plot. It is not natural violence, but violence thrown in to shock and titillate."¹⁵

Violence on the increase

Since 1968, there has been a 1,983 percent increase in R-rated films.¹⁶ In 1968 there were 838 G-rated films.¹⁷ In 1989, there were nine.¹⁸ That same year there were 357 R-rated films, which was 67 percent of all the films that were released.¹⁹ With less G-rated films, audiences for these R-rated films are getting younger.

According to a USA Today poll, more than 80 percent of children ages 11 to 16 were admitted into R-rated movies.²⁰ And with youth being the biggest audiences, producers will insert more violence and sex to get the PG-13 or R-rating.²¹ Most of the films produced are targeted towards this age bracket.

Critics predict that meat movies in the genre of the Texas Chainsaw Massacre will increase. "As the old-style sex film fades into oblivion (no more taboos remaining to violate), the meat movie phenomenon will sweep the nation. (Plenty of taboos left here: murder, necrophilia, cannibalism, etc.)" said Lew Brighton, a San Francisco film critic who reluctantly reviewed Texas Chainsaw Massacre when it was first released.²²

Some would contend that certain types of violence are acceptable. The Bible, particularly in the Old Testament, is full of graphically violent acts. It is true that the Bible is replete with passages of men and women being stabbed, hung and whole nations being exterminated. In a passage in Judges, a woman kills a man by driving a pin through his head.²⁷

"But Jael, Heber's wife, took a tent pin, and a hammer in her hand, and went softly to him (Sisera) and drove the pin through his temples and into the ground; for he was in a deep sleep from weariness. So he died" (Judges 4:22).

Sisera was an army captain who was fleeing from his defeated army on the battlefield. After many years of oppression under the Canaanites, the Israelites rose up and fought for their freedom. Sisera was hiding in a woman's tent while his soldiers were slaughtered on the battlefield. There is an element of justice for the woman who drove the pin through Sisera's head and killed him. Passages with elements of violence had meaning within its context, and reinforced an overall theme such as justice long overdue being served.

But the graphic scenes of random slaughter and mutilations that have recently been on our TV and movie screens have been showcased strictly for shock value. Instead of reinforcing and supporting an overall theme, long drawn out sequences of violent acts have become more common. And violence in the genre of Texas Chainsaw Massacre is glorified.

Of course, violence has been with us since the beginning of time and there is no way we can avoid violent sequences in cinema. But have we become a society that is brutalized and desensitized from it such as the Germans during Hitler's occupation? The German people were primed for the violence they daily witnessed on their streets, during World War II, by the plethora of underground pornographic movies and above ground dark thriller films that were popular in the 1920s.²⁸

A writer for the London Times noted this phenomenon in an article about the impact of such films on the minds of the German people at the end of World War II. He stated that "a man walking down a tree-lined suburban street, and suddenly something violent occurs. This appeared time and again, in one setting or another, until the German audience became accustomed to the idea that violence is an ordinary, ongoing part of everyday life." Terror appeared as a part of everyday life.²⁹

Then there are the Romans who producer Martin Scorsese referred to that enjoyed watching people being torn apart and eaten by lions in their coliseums. Has our TV screen and movie theatre become another coliseum of ecstatic violence? Has mayhem gone mainstream?

Social researchers predict that with gore becoming a regular part of the average American's entertainment diet, that violent crimes will continue to escalate.³⁰ Within the past 30 years, there has been a 300 to 500 percent increase in violence.³¹ In the U.S. more than 22,000 men, women and children die every year in handgun accidents, suicides and murders.³² And compared to Japan, a person in the U.S. is six times more likely to be burglarized, 10 times more likely to be murdered and 208 times more likely to be robbed.³³ Violent crimes are on the rise. The perpetrators of those crimes are those within the age group of 15 to 24 years old, who are also the biggest consumer of R-rated films.³⁴

Are our children being affected?

Incidentally, violent crimes show a marked increase after 1957, with the release of more violent TV programs and movies.³⁵ Here are some pretty frightening statistics. Today's children and adolescents spent more time watching television - 15,000 hours than they do in school, which is 11,000 hours.³⁶ In that time they will have watched approximately 180,000 murders, rapes, and armed robberies and assaults.³⁷ By the time they turn 18, they will have seen 200,000 violent acts on TV, including 25,000 murders.³⁸ By the time they turn 70, they will have watched 7 straight years of TV.³⁹ Adults spend 40 percent of their leisure time watching TV.⁴⁰ This places TV viewing third, just behind sleep and work in weekly hours spent by adults.⁴¹

And according to a recent survey, 76 percent of those polled agreed that "TV has more influence on most children than parents have."⁴²

Today kids are exposed to unusually high doses of violence - 21 incidents during each hour of television on Saturday and Sunday mornings. Researchers found that children who viewed ordinary violent television for children during a break from nursery school at noon became more aggressive in everyday playground interaction than children who viewed non-violent programs. With TV becoming the electronic babysitter, exposure to violence typically begins by watching Saturday morning cartoons.

Approximately 94 percent of these cartoons have violent themes and cartoon violence has continued to increase. Fifty percent of the cartoons monitored by the National Coalition on Television Violence were found to glorify violence or use it to entertain. In fact, Saturday morning cartoons have three times as many acts of violence as prime time television. ABC on the average has 26 acts of violence per hour in its Saturday morning cartoon programming.⁴³

The bad guys get killed and the good guys live in shows such as the Mutant Ninja Turtle series, Roadrunner, Bugs Bunny and Popeye. But the violence portrayed in popular cartoons seems cute and harmless, especially with the miraculous recoveries of the coyote from his foiled chases of the roadrunner. The first Mutant Ninja Turtle movie had 150 violent fighting acts.⁴⁴

Researchers found that kids imitated the turtle heroes karate chops. In a survey conducted on educators, Hanne Sonquist, a member of the board of the National Association for the Education of Young Children expressed the concerns of educators regarding children imitating the turtle heroes style in handling conflict. "The way the Ninja turtles work out their difficulties is by socking each other and knocking each other out," she said.⁴⁵

From their Saturday morning cartoons, children grow up accustomed to watching violence on prime time TV shows, movies, videos and cable TV. The early evening "family hour" has especially high rates of violence. Nearly nine out of every 10 of these hours contain some violence.⁴⁶ With violence becoming more common, children are learning to enjoy it and expect it.

Fifteen hundred 10 to 11 year olds in 34 schools in Australia were asked to describe the favorite scenes in their videos they watched. The most enjoyable were: "Where the man takes the heart out of another man," in Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom; "When the teacher cuts the punk's arm with the saw," in Class of '84; "When the killer chops the lady into a hundred pieces," in the Texas Chainsaw Massacre; another favorite was "Where the girl chopped off her dad's head and ate it as a birthday cake," in Friday the 13th.⁴⁷

Friday the 13th was slated to become a cartoon series. However, network executives got cold feet after they found out that they couldn't get advertisers for the slots. The idea was aborted.⁴⁸ But the famed teen killer, Freddy Krueger, has become a cartoon hero.

Krueger has been hailed as a folk hero - the "Mickey Mouse of the 1990s."⁴⁹ In 1990, Krueger's series and videos grossed more than $300 million.⁵⁰ Today kids can buy Krueger talking dolls, a squeezable head that spits water, a Krueger glove with the scissor fingers, and many others. The plastic razor tipped glove is modeled after his weapon he uses to mutilate and kill teenagers in their sleep. Toddlers and young children are introduced to Krueger toys by playing with Freddy and Victim Spitballs-rubber balls that feature faces of Freddy and a startled victim.

In a poll conducted by the National Coalition on TV Violence, children ages 10 to 13 said they knew more about Freddy Krueger than Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, or Martin Luther King.⁵¹ Eighty-nine percent said they saw at least one episode of Nightmare on Elm Street, and 62 percent said they saw at least four episodes.⁵² One 10 year old said he liked Freddy Krueger because he kills people. Krueger mania among children doesn't seem to be waning soon.⁵³

Why are children crowing a teenage murderer and molester a hero? Is it a lack of role models and heroes that are worth following? Or are they following their adult predecessors in honoring and glorifying meaningless violence? Krueger's notoriety has lasted a decade, and may be a prophetic sign of the enemy's designs for this generation. In one segment Krueger declares that he is god, before slashing his victim to death. His pseudo-deity is reinforced by his unstoppable evil rampages. With Krueger's coffers being filled up with teenage victims on the screen, and dollars from his toys, what will Hollywood fabricate next to entertain our children?

On Screen and in Society

From cartoons to movies, our appetites are being conditioned for meaningless violence. Instead of violence being used against propagators of evil in our society, it has become a means of entertainment. Instead of content, storyline, and plot being emphasized or reinforced, violence is celebrated.

Violent criminals are glorified and escape retribution. Krueger continually returns to claim even more teenage victims. And although Bonnie & Clyde got their just desserts in the end, they were considered the Robin Hoods of poor whites in the South and therefore celebrities.

Shoot-outs, a killer chopping a woman into 100 pieces, or cutting someone's arm off with a saw begin to look like "beautiful violence," as the psychopath rapist and killer Malcolm in A Clockwork Orange described his hideous crimes. And most of the victims of violence are usually women, elderly, and minorities.

Stanley Kubrick's A Clockwork Orange which garnered a New York Film Critics award and several academy award nominations, was considered a landmark for acceptable violent cinema. The 1971 film has six rape scenes. It opens up with Malcolm and his cohorts at a "milk" bar full of white female mannequins in bondage positions.

Recently a teenager was sentenced to life in prison without chance for parole for fatally stabbing and strangling a friend. Michael Anderson, 18, says he was inspired by repeatedly viewing A Clockwork Orange. He strangled and stabbed six times, 17-year-old Karen Hurwitz, with a martial arts sword.⁵⁴

Some researchers defend watching violence by saying it acts as a catharsis, or outlet for violent energy. But a study conducted by Berkowitz and Rawlings shows that those who watch violent movies, but appear to have reduced aggressive or anti-social behavior, were constrained from acting out the scenes they viewed due to inhibitions.⁵⁵ Violent and sadistic acts on the screen become lessons for potential criminals. Dr. David Pearl of the National Institute for Mental Health said that television violence provides how to do it training.⁵⁶

An example of those who have taken their cues from television shows are the following. Six youth took their cues from a 1973 film, Fuzz on ABC, which showed hoodlums in Boston burning derelicts to death for fun.⁵⁸ A few days later they poured gasoline over a 24-year-old homeless woman and burned her to death. In another case, a 14-year-old boy accidentally killed his brother with a gun, imitating a scene he had watched in Dirty Harry.⁵⁹

A middle-aged couple were abducted and killed by two teenagers who had a fascination with violent movies.⁶⁰ Seventeen-year-old Joseph Passeno and 16-year-old Bruce Michaels randomly chose their victims. The motive for the abduction and killing has stumped psychiatrists and parents in Michigan. However, the only clue that psychiatrists have been able to ascertain is their fascination with violent movies. In fact, Michaels described the killing as something akin to a sequence on a horror film.⁶¹

Clearly our television sets and movie screens are the Roman coliseums of yesterday. Although the victims are not 'real' and a product of a screenwriter's imagination, the real victims are those on the streets. The victims are the homeless woman who was burned to death and the boy who was shot to death. The victim is a woman who was assaulted, raped, and murdered in front of 40 witnesses who did nothing. The victim is the 17-year-old who bled to death in front of 11 subway riders who watched the attack. The victim of this mainstream media mayhem is us.

And there doesn't seem to be an end soon to the mayhem on the screen being projected onto society. In fact, the American Psychiatric Association has found that there is a direct link between the violence on the screen and society. TV and film violence is responsible for 50 percent of the violence in our society according to their research.

Dr. Brandon Centerwall of the American Psychiatric Association estimates that there would be 10,000 fewer murders, 70,000 fewer rapes, 1 million fewer motor vehicle thefts, 2.5 million fewer burglaries and 10 million fewer larcenies here each year if not for violent TV and movies.

Movie industry executives defend their violence by saying it sells tickets and anyone can turn the channel or choose not to watch a film.⁶² But as one lady responded to a movie industry executive at a congressional committee hearing on violence in the media, "You're telling us to turn off the water. But the water is still poisoned."⁶³

There is poison in the water and the movie industry needs to be held responsible. But we are allowing this poison to flow freely in our homes and are actually enjoying it. According to a survey by Dr. Ted Baehr, Christians are watching the same amount of R-rated movies as non-Christians.⁶⁴

What does the Bible say about viewing violence? In Psalms 101:3, David says, "I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes; I hate the work of them that turn aside; (it) shall not cleave to me." The word "wicked" thing is translated from the Hebrew word, belial, which means anything that is unprofitable. In Psalms 12:8 God warns, "The wicked walk or prowl about on every side, as vileness is exalted (and baseness is rated high) among the sons of men." As we honor vileness by paying for it and watching it, we are exalting wickedness.

We need to repent of honoring vileness and present our body as a living sacrifice to the Lord. This means placing our eyes, our ears, our minds and soul before Him. In Romans 12:1 we are exhorted to "make a decisive dedication of your bodies presenting all your members and faculties as a living sacrifice, holy (devoted, consecrated) and well pleasing to God, which is your reasonable (rational, intelligent) service and spiritual worship" (Amplified Bible).

The Winans

Review: Time to Make a Change

"Growing up in Detroit, we as brothers were taught the importance of family by our parents (who, by the way, were teenagers when they married). We were also taught the importance of God, good work ethics and education.

"Our parents having been thrust into the duties of adulthood at such an early age meant that sacrifices had to be made. As we look back over our shoulders in retrospect, we realize that we were poor, if you measure wealth by material acquisition, but rich if you measure it by LOVE.

"Staring coldly into the face of the present, we see many of the values that we held dear as children discarded and considered a philosophy whose time has come and gone. God has been snatched out of the conscience of our youth, family ties have been severed, good work habits exchanged for "get rich quick" schemes and our public school systems have been reduced to detention centers.

"As a psalmist once penned, 'Righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to a people.' The hope in this very bleak and dismal picture is that we can make a difference.

"If we return to what made us secure as individuals, return to what made us whole as families, if we return to what made us strong as a people and return to what made us great as a nation ... then we have reason to sing!

"We urge you to return with us. For it is time to make a change."
- The Winans

Appearing recently on the "Arsenio Hall Show," one of the highest rated shows in the nation, host Arsenio Hall asked the Winans why their albums didn't include love songs or pure pop music.

Pastor and group leader Marvin Winans responded, "People say 'if you would change (to pop music) you would sell millions of albums,' and maybe we could, but our conviction is that the reason we're here is that we have a message to deliver ... that you can be young and enjoy Jesus and go to church and do the right thing."

"What you're saying," Hall summarized, "is that everything has to be lyrically sound in the Word?"

"Exactly!" replied the Winans.

Return is the Winans' new recording which focuses on the problems of modern society and our need to return to God. Musically, the recording combines elements of pop, jazz, rap, and classic Motown.

Return is a highly successful attempt at "crossover" music, an effort to appeal to secular radio listeners with a Christian message by using contemporary styles without compromising a clear gospel message.

"It's Time," the first single from Return reached No. 5 on Billboard's Hot Black Singles Chart, and the album soon became commercially successful selling over 300,000 units in the first two months after its release.

Stevie Wonder, who has told of his recent conversion, is featured in a solo vocal on "Everyday's the Same." The phenomenal radio success with both Christian and secular Urban Contemporary stations confirms the broad appeal of this recording.

Yet lyrically, the Winans keep far from compromise singing about the joy of being "free from a life of sin," and about the need of prayer, walking through the tough times and keeping strong in faith. This is a recording that is having a positive effect on the culture of our nation.

Affirmative action ineffectual says Washington Post columnist

GAINESVILLE, Florida - Affirmative action doesn't help poor people, Washington Post columnist William Raspberry said at the University of Florida on October 4th.

Raspberry, who spoke as a part of UF's People Awareness Week, said affirmative action helps people who already have jobs instead of the unemployed. "It's people like me and my colleagues that affirmative action helps," he said. "Not the people in the streets."

Raspberry said everyone - not just U.S. Supreme Court Justice (then nominee) Clarence Thomas - has a problem with affirmative action on some level. "Nobody believes in giving extra points to those who are scorned," Raspberry said. "We don't like awarding prizes based on ethnicity."

Creating opportunities and getting everyone to the same starting line is what is important, Raspberry said. "Then everyone's got to run for themselves."

Raspberry said it is difficult to explain long-term opportunities to inner-city black males, whose lives mirror "live for today" attitudes, which often involve drug use.

"You and I are afraid to do what they do. We're afraid it will shorten our lives or hurt our reputations," he said. "Those are long-term concerns. To those kids, long term is next weekend. Our social policy reflects this, since we try to directly supply needs instead of enabling others to help themselves. Positive feelings are the result of an individual's efforts, not government action."

"I think that's why people hate welfare and public housing even when they depend on welfare and public housing," Raspberry added. "The only qualification for them is to be a failure."

Raspberry, whose urban affairs column is syndicated nationwide by the Washington Press Writers Group, joined the Washington Post in 1962. He received the Capital Press Club's 1965 "Journalist of the Year" award for his coverage of the Watts riots in Los Angeles.

Washington Post columnist William Raspberry spoke to hundreds of University of Florida Students on October 4 during UF's People Awareness Week.

Black History Month 1988

As we celebrate Black History Month in 1988, we recall our rich heritage, filled with courage, heroism, and the memory of the sacrifice of countless men and women who gave their lives for freedom. Looking at the past, we see how far we've come. Living in the present, we see how far we still must go. But more importantly, we must look at the future. We must ask ourselves: what steps must we take to realize the equality and freedom that we have yearned for as a people since the captivity of our ancestors?

Although we have advanced economically and socially in so many ways, most blacks are still wounded, angry, and hurt. Though the medals of economic and social attainments have been awarded to us, we are still being held back by spiritual bondage.

An alarm has been sounded by the media as reports are released describing the plight of Black America. From the breakdown of the family, to the rise in teen-age pregnancy, to the slumping number of blacks entering college, and now to the sobering fact that 25 percent of all AIDS cases are black people - even though we make up only 10 percent of our society - it has become obvious that we must have an accurate diagnosis of our problem in order to reach a solution.

Although the chains of slavery have been removed from us, we remain enslaved unless we find true spiritual freedom. Jesus Christ once said, "What does it profit a man, if he gains the whole world and forfeits his own soul?" (Matthew 16:26). We as black Americans must face up to these words.

Observing the symptoms that are ailing many blacks in America today, we must conclude that we have a heart problem. Though many blacks attend church and live outwardly religious lives, the truth is that most of us are broken, disillusioned, and bitter. Most of us are not living victorious Christian lives.

Why? Many of us have made unforgiveness and bitterness against whites an idol in our lives. We sit in the church pews and profess allegiance to a God of love and forgiveness, yet we constantly nurse our hurts. But Jesus stated it plainly when He said: "If you do not forgive men, then your Father will not forgive your transgressions" (Matthew 6:15).

The Pharisees in Jesus' day faithfully attended religious functions and kept all the rules, yet He was not pleased with them. These people did not understand that it is His love and His Spirit that is to rule our lives - not rules. We need to learn this lesson, too. Only when we experience a living, loving relationship with Jesus Christ can we experience the kind of freedom that we are all longing for.

Have you been looking to social and economic gains to heal the wounds in your spirit?

A new generation of black Americans is emerging today, and they are looking at a heap of shattered dreams for the promise of a better future. We must point them to the only pathway that leads to freedom - obedience to God's Word. As we are immersed in a loving relationship with Jesus Christ, and as we deny our own selfish desires for His cause, we will see that the ultimate issue in our struggle was not racial. Our deepest need has always been the need for a Savior - which God has provided through Jesus Christ.

A New Era for Black Leadership

By Clarence Thomas
U.S. Supreme Court Justice

Much has been said about blacks and conservatism. Those on the Left smugly assume blacks are monolithic and will by force of circumstances always huddle to the left of the political spectrum. The political Right watches this herd mentality in action, concedes that blacks are monolithic, picks up a few dissidents, and wistfully shrugs at the seemingly unbreakable hold of the liberal Left on black Americans. But even in the face of this, a few dissidents like Thomas Sowell and J.A. Parker stand steadfast, refusing to give in to the cult mentality and childish obedience that hypnotize black Americans into a mindless political trance. I admire them, and only wish I had a fraction of their courage and strength.

Many pundits have come along in recent years, who claim an understanding of why so many blacks think right and vote left. They offer "the answer" to the problem of blacks failing to respond favorably to conservatism. I, for one, am not certain there is such a thing as "the answer." And, even if there is, I assure you I do not have it.

I have only my experiences and modest observations to offer. I was raised to survive under the totalitarianism of segregation, not only without the active assistance of government but with its active opposition. We were raised to survive in spite of the dark oppressive cloud of governmentally sanctioned bigotry. Self-sufficiency and spiritual and emotional security were tools to carve out and secure freedom. Those who attempt to capture the daily counseling, oversight, common sense, and vision of my grandparents in a governmental program are engaging in sheer folly. Government cannot develop individual responsibility, but it certainly can refrain from preventing or hindering the development of this responsibility.

Animosity from Other Blacks

I failed to realize [early in my conservative years] just how deep-seated the animosity of blacks toward black conservatives was. The dual labels of black Republicans and black conservatives drew rave reviews. Unfortunately the raving was at us, not for us. The reaction was negative, to be euphemistic, and generally hostile. Interestingly enough, however, our ideas themselves received very positive reactions, especially among the average working-class and middle-class black American who had no vested or proprietary interest in social policies that had dominated the political scene for the past 20 years. In fact, I was often amazed with the degree of acceptance. But as soon as "Republican" or "conservative" was injected into the conversation, there was a complete about-face. The ideas were okay. The Republicans and conservatives, especially the black ones, were not.

Our black counterparts on the Left and in the Democratic Party assured our alienation. Those of us who were identified as conservative were ignored at best. We were treated with disdain, regularly castigated, and mocked; and of course we could be accused of anything without recourse and with impunity. I find it intriguing that there has been a recent chorus of pleas by many of the same people who castigated us, for open-mindedness toward those black Democrats who have been accused of illegalities or improprieties. This open-mindedness was certainly not available when it came to accusing and attacking black conservatives, who merely had different ideas about what was good for black Americans and themselves.

Reckless Media

The flames were further fanned by the media. I often felt that the media assumed that, to be black, one had to espouse leftist ideas and Democratic politics. Any black who deviated from the ideological litany of requisites was an oddity and was to be cut from the herd and attacked. Hence, any disagreement we had with black Democrats or those on the Left was exaggerated. Our character and motives were impugned and challenged by the same reporters who supposedly were writing objective stories.

Unfortunately, it must have been apparent to the black liberals, and those on the Left that conservatives would not mount a positive (and I underscore positive) civil rights campaign. They were confident that our central civil rights concern would give them an easy victory since it was confined to affirmative action - that is, being against affirmative action. They were certain that we would not be champions of civil rights. Therefore, they had license to roam unfettered in this area claiming that we were against all that was good and just and holy, and that we were hell-bent on returning blacks to slavery. They could smirk at us black conservatives because they felt we had no real political or economic support.

GOP's Failure of Principle

But conservatives must open the door and lay out the welcome mat if there is ever going to be a chance of attracting black Americans. There need be no ideological concessions, just a major attitudinal change. Conservatives must show that they care. By caring I do not suggest or mean the phony caring and tear-jerking compassion being bandied out today. I, for one, do not see how the government can be compassionate and then only with their own money, their own property, or their own effort, not that of others.

According to our higher law tradition, men must acknowledge each other's freedom, and govern only by the consent of others. All our political institutions presuppose this truth. Natural law of this form is indispensable to decent politics. It is the barrier against the "abolition of man" that C.S. Lewis warned about in his short modern classic.

This approach allows us to reassert the primacy of the individual, and establishes our inherent equality as a God-given right. This inherent equality is the basis for aggressive enforcement of civil rights laws and equal employment opportunity laws designed to protect individual rights. Indeed, defending the individual under these laws should be the hallmark of conservatism rather than its Achilles' heel. And in no way should this be the issue of those who are antagonistic to individual rights and the proponents of a bigger, more intrusive government. Indeed, conservatives should be as adamant about freedom here at home as we are about freedom abroad. We should be at least as incensed about the totalitarianism of drug traffickers and criminals in poor neighborhoods as we are about totalitarianism in Eastern bloc countries. The primacy of individual rights demands that conservatives be the first to protect them.

Responsibilities of Freedom

But with the benefits of freedom come responsibilities. Conservatives should be no more timid about asserting the responsibilities of the individual than they should be about protecting individual rights.

The principled approach would, in my view, make it clear to blacks that conservatives are not hostile to their interests but aggressively supportive. This is particularly true to the extent that conservatives are now perceived as anti-civil rights. Unless it is clear that conservative principles protect all individuals, including blacks, there are no programs or arguments, no matter how brilliant, sensible, or logical, that will attract blacks to the conservative ranks. They may take the idea and run, but they will not stay and fraternize without a clear, principled message that they are welcome and well protected.

Conservative Gadget Ideas

I am of the view that black Americans will move inexorably and naturally toward conservatism when we stop discouraging them; when they are treated as a diverse group with differing interests; and when conservatives stand up for what they believe in rather than stand against blacks. This is not a prescription for success, but rather an assertion that black Americans know what they want, and it is not timidity and condescension. Nor do I believe gadget ideals such as enterprise zones are of any consequence when blacks who live in blighted areas know that crime, not lack of tax credits, is the problem.

Blacks are not stupid. And no matter how good an idea or proposal is, no one is going to give up the comfort of the leftist status quo as long as they view conservatives as antagonistic to their interests, and conservatives do little or nothing to dispel the perception. If blacks hate or fear conservatives, nothing we say will be heard.

Evangelism on Black History Week

EAST LANSING, MI (FR)-Black History Week on the Michigan State University this year was not the usual rehash of the painful rift of prejudice between the blacks and whites. Instead, several black students heard a different message on the need for modern day Martin Luther Kings.

Major McIntyre, an evangelist with Maranatha Campus Ministries, spoke before 425 people at the MSU campus and left with a standing ovation. In his address, he compared Martin Luther King to Moses. "He heard the cry of the black man, of the oppressed," McIntyre said. "He had a vision and went to the mountain top. He was a man inspired by God. He headed straight for his destiny and did not stop."

McIntyre said King delivered black people from the perils of a segregated society so that they can now honor God with their changed lives. As the result of McIntyre's message, two black students said they discovered a personal relationship with Jesus Christ

Keith Walton, a sophomore in interior design, said his life is different since his conversion. "I have a lot more self-discipline and control in my life, because I lean upon the Lord now," Walton said.

Eighteen-year-old Yvette Bryant, a freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said, "When I heard Major speaking, it touched me. I realized that I shouldn't be enslaved to sin, and I was challenged to give my whole life to Jesus." Bryant said for the first time in her life she is reading the Bible.

City officials have asked McIntyre to return next year to give another commencement address during Black History Month. McIntyre is the director of the Maranatha Campus Ministry at Mississippi State in Starkville.

Black America: Your Destiny Awaits You!

By Johnny Hunter

One thing that has hurt the black community of America is that we have had much of our history torn from us because of slavery. No one ever came to America like blacks; no other people were sold and beaten like slaves. If you take away a person's history, then they have nothing. Blacks still haven't overcome this.

Even worse than the lack of a history is the fact that many blacks have been "sold" a bill of lies by the liberal media. Many are going against everything that we were ever taught morally. What is happening to the black family now is even more destructive than when we were on the plantations.

We have been suckered into killing our own children. Abortionists have killed more of our black children than the Ku Klux Klan could ever lynch. In 1985, blacks were counted as 12 percent of the population, but we were counted in 30 percent of the abortions! Three million black children never lived to see the light of day.

Even black ministers have misrepresented us. Black leaders tell youth that they can be somebody and then turn around and march with groups who are in favor of child killing.

The only way that blacks are going to overcome is to get back to biblical principles. We are going to have to realize that much of liberalism is going against everything we believe. I believe sincerely that Christianity is the most powerful key to freedom. Once any group gets away from it, they are in trouble.

The black editor of Issues and Views, Elizabeth Wright, led the fight against the pro-homosexual agenda when books such as Heather Has Two Mommies were being promoted in the schools. But the dominant media culture has not shown this. When the NAACP endorsed homosexual "rights" a local NAACP chapter that picketed their national convention because they didn't want homosexuality being portrayed as compatible with civil rights. But the media didn't cover this either.

With the pro-life issue, the media does not show the many blacks who are involved in the fight against abortion. Members of my church marched on Mother's Day at Niagara Falls in support of life because we wanted to show a strong black presence. But the television cameras only showed the white marchers. We saw a camera man stop his camera when he came to my wife and walk all the way down to next white man and turn the camera back on! The liberal media is trying to cover up the blacks who are doing what they consider to be "not politically correct."

Blacks need to be awakened to join the Christian movement in working to reform our nation. Blacks need to wake up and realize that we have been lied to and cheated by the liberal media and government.

Right now we're being told that whites don't really care about what we are going through. White Christians need to reach out to blacks and be willing to help with the problems.

Blacks and whites need to work together to solve the problems that face us. Black churches have been fighting poverty and crack houses in their neighborhoods. The problem is often with the police forces who won't enforce the law. They claim that they don't have enough power to protect themselves. But in some places, such as Baton Rouge, Louisiana, blacks and whites from the churches are united together and are doing something to stop the problem. It's beautiful to see that happening.

God is raising up a new generation of black leadership. These are people doing exploits in many different areas.

John Thompson of Adolescent Resource Centers of America showed me a letter written by a condom manufacturer. It specifically said that condoms cannot stop the AIDS virus because of the size of the intrinsic voids in the rubber. While sperm cells are 50 microns in diameter, the voids in the condom are five microns in diameter. However, the AIDS virus is .1 microns in diameter or 50 times smaller than the intrinsic voids in a condom. Naturally, a condom can stop a sperm cell, but it cannot stop the AIDS virus from passing through.

Yet we have Planned Parenthood handing out condoms to our black boys and even our black girls so that they can give them to boys. They treat our young people like dogs; even though we are a people of moral values. John Thompson is fighting against groups like Planned Parenthood even though he is just a young black minister.

We need more Christian black athletes like Barry Sanders of the Detroit Lions who will begin to stand up for abstinence. What bothers me the most about black Christians is when God puts them in key positions and they keep quiet. They don't want to be role models and get involved in issues that are controversial. They need to understand that there are children who are dying and are depending on them.

Every black person living can rise to the top. But the liberals have fed us a lie in saying, "We've got to take care of you." Keeping blacks on welfare is just as bad as keeping them on the plantation. Black churches need to start raising up some responsible men who will realize that they don't need the welfare system and do some things to start helping themselves.

There are a lot of things that other cultures do to make it here in America that we are not doing. Why can Asians come over here to America and prosper? They don't come in with all the baggage that we had from slavery, of course. But Asian families can analyze our system and make it work for them. If they all have to live in the same house, work the same job, or pitch in to start a storefront, they do what it takes to succeed. The black community lacks the family cohesiveness to work together and do what it takes to succeed.

The welfare system has destroyed the family unit. If a young girl gets pregnant, she can get more money from the government if she doesn't get married. This is putting the black community into bondage. Black leaders should stop hollering for hand outs. We need to wake up, pull together and do what it takes to restore the family.

Every black child is a child of destiny. If a child has a vision, no matter what it is, he can do what it takes to overcome his situation. Who knows whether the poorest child won't be the one to eliminate poverty in our nation? I believe that every child has the opportunity to succeed.

Martin Luther King:

A Modern Day Prophet

Where are the modern day prophets? At crucial times in history God has always raised up prophets. They are men and women who love the truth more than they love their own life. They are the heroes of a generation. God is looking for such people today. He is looking for those to whom He can trust to deliver His words to this generation. The prophets' success has always been found in their faithfulness to stand by the word of the Lord and their fearlessness in the face of danger. They were men and women who had conquered the fear of death.

Civil rights leader and 20th century prophet, Martin Luther King, Jr., once declared: "Until you conquer the fear of death, you don't know what freedom is!" King led a group of 8,000 civil rights protestors in an historic march to Montgomery, Alabama. His address given in Montgomery echoes the cry of the prophets of all ages:

"We are on the move now and no wave of racism can stop us. The burning of our churches will not deter us. The bombing of our homes will not divert us. The release of their known murderers will not discourage us. We are on the move now, like an idea whose time has come. Not even the marching of mighty armies can halt us. We are moving to the land of freedom.

"I know you are asking today, 'How long will it take?' Someone is asking today, 'How long will prejudice blind the eyes of men?' I come to say to you this afternoon, however difficult the moment, however frustrating the hour, it will not be long, because truth crushed to earth will rise again!"

"How long? Not long! Because no lie can live forever! How long? Not long! Because you shall reap what you sow! How long? Not long! 'Truth forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne, yet that scaffold sways the future, and behind the dim unknown, standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own.'

"How long? Not long! Because the arch of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice. How long? Not long! For mine eyes have seen the coming of the glory of the Lord. He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored. He has loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword. His truth is marching on!

"He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat. He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat. O, be swift my soul to answer Him, be jubilant my feet! Our God is marching on! Glory! Hallelujah! Glory! Hallelujah! His Truth is marching on!

Such sentiments live and burn in the hearts of God's prophets.

Louis Farrakhan

By Jay Rogers

Louis Farrakhan is known by his followers as being "a better orator than Martin Luther King Jr., a better author than Norman Mailer, a better diplomat than Henry Kissinger, and more handsome than Muhammad Ali." Let's take a look at one the best known and most articulate Black Muslims in America and his ideology.

According to founder Wallace D. Fard Muhammad, the Muslim Cult of Islam started in July 4, 1930. Ford proclaimed he was sent to wake "the black nation to the full range of the black man's possibilities in a world temporarily dominated by the blue-eyed devils." He taught that the African American culture was unique and separate from that of "the Caucasian devils."

The Muslim Cult of Islam lasted almost four years under the leadership of Fard until his departure in 1933. According to his son's mother, Hazel Barton, he was never to be seen or heard from again.

Elijah Poole, Fard's first assistant and one of his most loyal followers, told members of the Cult that Fard "had returned to Allah" and that Poole had been selected to succeed him. He changed his name to Elijah Muhammad and moved the sect, now called the Nation of Islam, to Michigan and then to Chicago: the "New Mecca."

Elijah Muhammad (Poole) continued the same hard line of dialogue as his predecessor. He taught that blacks were the "original people" and whites were "devils," an "artificial mutation" created by an evil scientist.

Elijah was honored at the Black Muslim Annual Convention in Chicago on February 25, 1962. The late America Nazi Party founder George Lincoln Rockwell said, "Elijah Muhammad is the Adolf Hilter of the black man."

Louis Eugene Wolcott, also known as "Calypso Gene," an inspiring singer and songwriter with a "smooth charismatic stage presence" and a voice that rivaled that of the legendary Harry Belafonte, was an entertainer insured of a promising and successful career. Wolcott's childhood experience of open rejection of African Americans in a neighborhood predominantly Jewish at the time, coupled with the racial discrimination of the past, fueled his disdain for whites and the Jewish community.

In 1955, Wolcott accepted a friend's invitation to a rally given by Elijah Muhammad's organization. This event would change him from an inspiring singer into devoted follower of Elijah. He told an associate that the rally resulted in his "rebirth" experience.

Wolcott changed his name to "Louis X" according to Black Muslim tradition, and later to Louis Farrakhan. The "X" denoted "unknown," indicating that the true heritage of African Americans was stolen during the slave trade.

Farrakhan became a member of the Nation of Islam under the leadership of Malcolm X in 1955. Louis worked diligently learning the teachings of Elijah Muhammad and eventually moved up into ranks of leadership in the movement. He eventually became "the Honorable Elijah Muhammad's national spokesman."

As head of the Harlem Mosque from 1965 to 1975, he became well known in the community. His messages at rallies across America conveyed African American separatism, economic rebirth and a continual attack of whites and Jews.

In 1977, two years after the death of Elijah Muhammad, Farrakhan formed his own sect patterned after the Nation of Islam. White supremacists have found common ground with Louis' desire for separate territories for African Americans and whites. Their solidarity has grown stronger around their disdain for the Jewish community.

Farrakhan continues today with recruitment of youth gang members, prison inmates, college educated youth and the African American middle-class with the same message that many critics term as "words of hate and racism." In a speech given March 11, 1984, Farrakhan proclaimed, "Some white people are going to live but (God) don't want them living with us. He doesn't want us mixing ourselves up with the slavemaster's children, whose time of doom has arrived."

The New Segregation

Shelby Steele
2/93

The civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s culminated in the 1964 Civil Rights Act and the 1965 Voting Rights Act - two monumental pieces of legislation that have dramatically altered the fabric of American life.

During the struggle for their passage, a new source of power came into full force. Black Americans and their supporters tapped into the moral power inspired by a 300-year history of victimization and oppression and used it to help transform society, to humanize it, to make it more tolerant and open. They realized, moreover, that the victimization and oppression that blacks had endured came from one "marriage" - a marriage of race and power. They had to stop those who said, "merely because we are white, we have the power to dominate, enslave, segregate and discriminate."

Race should not be a source of power or advantage or disadvantage for anyone in a free society. This was one of the most important lessons of the original civil rights movement. The legislation it championed during the 1960s constituted a new "emancipation proclamation." For the first time segregation and discrimination were made illegal. Blacks began to enjoy a degree of freedom they had never experienced before.

Delayed Anger

This did not mean that things changed overnight for blacks. Nor did it ensure that their memory of past injustice was obliterated. I hesitate to borrow analogies from the psychological community, but I think that one does apply: Abused children do not usually feel anger until many years after the abuse has ended, that is, after they have experienced a degree of freedom and normalcy. Only after civil rights legislation had been enacted did blacks at long last begin to feel the rage they had suppressed. I can remember that period myself. I had tremendous sense of delayed anger at having been forced to attend segregated schools. (My grade school was the first school to be involved in a desegregation suit in the north.) My race, like that of other blacks, threatened for a time to become all consuming.

Anger was both inevitable and necessary. When suppressed, it eats you alive; it has got to come out, and it certainly did during the 1960s. One form was the black power movement in all of its many manifestations, some of which were violent. There is no question that we should condemn violence, but we should also understand why it occurs. You cannot oppress people for over three centuries and then say it is all over and expect them to put on suits and ties and become decent attaché-carrying citizens and go to work on Wall Street.

Once my own anger was released, my reaction was that I no longer had to apologize for being black.

That was a tremendous benefit and it helped me come to terms with my own personal development. The problem is that many blacks never progressed beyond their anger.

The Politics of Difference

The black power movement encouraged a permanent state of rage and victimhood. An even greater failing was that it rejoined race and power - the very "marriage" that civil rights legislation had been designed to break up. The leaders of the original movement said, "Anytime you make race a source of power you are going to guarantee suffering, misery and inequity." Black power leaders declared: "We're going to have power because we're black."

Well, is there any conceivable difference between black power and white power? When you demand power based on the color of your skin, aren't you saying that equality and justice are impossible? Somebody's going to be in, somebody's going to be out. Somebody's going to win, somebody's going to lose, and race is once again a source of advantage for some and disadvantage for others. Ultimately, black power was not about equality or justice; it was, as its name suggests, about power.

And when blacks began to demand entitlements based on their race, feminists responded with enthusiasm, "We've been oppressed too!" Hispanics said, "We're not going to let this bus pass us by," and Asians said, "We're not going to let it pass us by either." Eskimos and American Indians quickly hopped on the bandwagon, as did gays, lesbians, the disabled and other self-defined minorities.

By the 1970s, the marriage of race and power was once again firmly established. Equality was out: the "politics of difference" was in. From then on, everyone would rally around the single quality that makes them different from the white male and pursue power based on that quality. It is a very simple formula. All you have to do is identify that quality, whatever it may be, with victimization. And victimization is itself, after all, a tremendous source of moral power.

The politics of difference demanded shifting the entire basis of entitlement in America. Historically, entitlement was based on the rights of citizenship elaborated in the Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution. This was the kind of entitlement that the original civil rights movement leaders claimed for blacks: recognition of their rights as American citizens to equal treatment under the law. They did not claim, "We deserve rights and entitlements because we are black," but, "We deserve them because we are citizens of the United States and like all other citizens are due these rights." The politics of difference changed all that. Blacks and other minorities began demanding entitlement solely based on their history of oppression, their race, their gender, their ethnicity, or whatever quality that allegedly made them victims.

Grievance Identities

By the 1980s, the politics of difference had, in turn, led to the establishment of "grievance identities." These identities are not about such things as the great contributions of women throughout history or the rich culture of black Americans. To have a strong identity as a woman, for example, means that you are against the "oppressive male patriarchy" - period. To have a strong identity as a black means that you are against racist white America - period.

You have no choice but to fulfill a carefully defined politically correct role: (1) you must document the grievance of your group; (2) you must testify to its abiding and ongoing alienation; and (3) you must support its sovereignty. As a black who fails any of these three requirements you are not only politically incorrect, you are a traitor, an "Uncle Tom." You are blaming the victim, you are letting whites off the hook, and you are betraying your people.

In establishing your grievance identity, you must turn your back on the enormous and varied fabric of life. There is no legacy of universal ideas or common human experience. There is only one dimension to your identity: anger against oppression. Grievance identities are thus "sovereignities" that compete with the sovereignties of the nation itself. Blacks, women, Hispanics and other minorities are not even American citizens anymore. They are citizens of sovereignties with their own right to autonomy.

The New Segregation on Campus

The marriage of race and power, the politics of difference, and grievance identities - these are nurtured by the American educational establishment. They have also acted on that establishment and affected it in significant ways. After a talk I gave recently at a well-known university, a woman introduced herself as the chairperson of the women's studies department. She was very proud of the fact that the university had a separate degree-granting program in women's studies.

I stressed that I had always been very much in favor of teaching students about the contributions of women. But I asked her what it was that students gained from segregating women's studies that could not be gained from studying within the traditional liberal arts disciplines.

Her background was in English, as was mine, so I added, "What is a female English professor in the English department doing that is different from what a female English professor in the women's studies department is doing? Is she going to bring a different methodology to bear? What is it that academically justifies a segregated program for women, or for blacks, or any other group? Why not incorporate such studies into the English department, the history department, the biology department or into any of the other regular departments?"

As soon as I began to ask such questions I noticed a shift in her eyes and a tension in her attitude. She began to see me as an enemy and quickly make an excuse to end the conversation. This wasn't about a rational academic discussion of women's studies. It was about the sovereignty of the feminist identity, and unless I tipped my hat to that identity by saying, "Yes, you have the right to a separate department," no further discussion or debate was possible.

Meanwhile, the politics of difference is over-taking education. Those with grievance identities demand separate buildings, classrooms, offices, clerical staff - even separate Xerox machines. They all want to be segregated universities within the universities. They want their own space - their sovereign territory. Metaphorically, sometimes literally, they insist that not only the university but society at large must pay tribute to their sovereignty.

Today there are some 500 women's studies departments. There are black studies departments, Hispanic studies departments, Jewish studies departments, Asian studies departments. They all have to have space, staff, and budgets. What are they studying that can't be studied in other departments? They don't have to answer this questions, of course, but when political entitlement shifted away from citizenship to race, class and gender, a shift in cultural entitlement was made inevitable.

Those with grievance identities also demand extra entitlements far beyond what should come to us as citizens. As a black, I am said to "deserve" this or that special entitlement. No longer is it enough just to have the right to attend a college or university on an equal basis with others or to be treated like anyone else. Schools must set aside special money and special academic departments just for me, based on my grievance. Some campuses now have segregated dorms for black students who demand to live together with people of their "own kind." Students have lobbied for separate black student unions, black yearbooks, black homecoming dances, black graduation ceremonies - again all so that they can be comfortable with their "own kind."

One representative study at the University of Michigan indicates that 70 percent of the school's black undergraduates have never had a white acquaintance. Yet, across the country, colleges and universities like Michigan readily and even eagerly continue to encourage more segregation by granting the demands of every vocal grievance identity.

A Return to a Common Culture

Colleges and universities are not only segregating their campuses, they are segregating learning. If only for the sake of historical accuracy, we should teach all students - black, white, female, male - about many broad and diverse cultures. But those with grievance identities use the multicultural approach as an all-out assault on the liberal arts curriculum, on the American heritage, and on Western culture. They have made out differences, rather than our common bonds, sacred. Often they do so in the name of building the "self-esteem" of minorities. But they are not going to build anyone's self-esteem by condemning our culture as the product of "dead white males."

We do share a common history and a common culture, and that must be the central premise of education. If we are to end the new segregation on campus and everywhere else it exists, we need to recall the spirit of the original civil rights movement, which was dedicated to the "self-evident truth" that all men are created equal.

Even the most humble experiences unite us. We have all grown up on the same sitcoms, eaten the same fast food and laughed at the same jokes. We have practiced the same religions, lived under the same political system, read the same books and worked in the same marketplace. We have the same dreams and aspirations as well as fears and doubts for ourselves and for our children. How, then, can our differences be so overwhelming?

UF Law Professor Combats Racism

GAINESVILLE, FL (FR) - As racism rears its ugly head throughout the nation, the need for compassionate and enlightened thinking swells. Incidents of racism in northeastern regions of Boston and New York, and the formation of groups like the skinheads and neo-Nazis have intensified the commitment of civil rights proponents everywhere.

At the University of Florida College of Law, Professor Anthony E. Cook is researching and advancing the causes entrenched in the hearts and minds of Black Americans through his scholarship and ministry. As a professor and part-time minister who is actively engaged in community service, Cook is committed to merging the realities of daily life with his vocation.

"There is an interplay between what I do as a legal scholar and what I do as a minister," Cook says. "I try to see how my activities in the community can inform my legal scholarship and how legal scholarship can inform my community activities."

In a recent interview to be published in the Harvard Law Review, Cook presents the life and work of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., as a paradigm example of the necessary interplay between scholarship, ministry and community service. The article attempts to advance the concept as a way of approaching the problems of racism and inequality.

At Mount Carmel Baptist Church in Gainesville, Cook preaches once a month, counsels young adults and organizes youth projects. He is also a member of a local anti-drug task force and the Coalition Against Bigotry.

In all his work, Cook aims to raise consciousness concerning the problems of racism, poverty and crime. "We need more people thinking about the problems facing poor people and other oppressed groups in our society. Individuals who can transcend limitations should take advantage of opportunities to serve as role models or moral leaders to assist others."

"Growing up across the road from a country church instilled a lot in me," he said. "And my parents really expected a lot and encouraged me in every way. Consequently, I was a hard worker."

HONG KONG (EP) - Chinese bookstores are now carrying thousands of copies of the Bible which have been printed in the Communist country on the Western-sponsored Amity Press. It is believed that this is the first time this has happened since 1949.

Purchasers are not required to register their names or sign any documents to obtain copies of the Bible, as was previously believed. And though the availability of the Bible has not been advertised, the entire first shipment of Bibles was sold in its first month, according to News Network International.

The sale of the Bibles is an historic breakthrough, according to Peter MacInnes, the newly-appointed general manager of Amity Press. "In the long term, the most efficient avenue for distributing Bibles in China is not through church agencies, but through bookstore chains, and I hope this will become a more common method of distribution in the future," he said.

Amity Press has printed about 100,000 cross-reference Bibles and 300,000 non-cross reference Bibles since its inception in October, 1987. A version of the Bible in simplified script should be typeset by the end of this year. Problems with quality control that have kept production at a minimum promise to improve as the staff gains expertise, said MacInnes.

Evangelist Graham Talks with Chinese Leaders During Recent Visit

For the first time, American evangelist Billy Graham was invited by Communist Party leaders into the People's Republic of China. Graham was hosted during his April visit by Prime Minister Li Peng, one of the five members on the Standing Committee of the party.

"We don't have the same God, but that doesn't matter," Li said in his welcoming remarks for Graham, according to the New York Times News Service. "It doesn't prevent us from having a good talk together."

Graham did not reveal any details of his private discussion with Li to the press, urging that the questions be posed to the Chinese. Asked of his impression of Li, he said: "I was tremendously impressed with his warmth, his courtesy. He certainly knew a lot about religion."

Graham also met with a group of students and teachers at Beijing University during his visit. "They were interested in philosophy and religion," he said. "They asked why I believed in God."

The fundamental purpose for his trip was to present "the Gospel of Christ," and "to make a contribution to world peace." This was Graham's first trip to China. During his stay he preached four times to Chinese audiences.

Since the Cultural Revolution ended in 1976, Christianity has been increasingly tolerated in the People's Republic under the umbrella of officially approved churches. The government says there are four million Protestants and more than three million Catholics. The State Department offers an estimate of 10 to 20 million Christians.

There is also an underground church which is experiencing phenomenal growth - comprised of Christians who do not wish to take part in government-controlled churches. An unknown number of Chinese have been imprisoned for their religious beliefs, some of whom have been designated by Amnesty International, the human rights group, as prisoners of conscience.

Prior to his visit, Graham told reporters that he would only raise the issue of imprisoned Christians "indirectly" in his discussions with Chinese officials.

"I talked about human rights," he explained. "There are some things I think I can accomplish in a private way." He preferred not to criticize the government directly. He also said he was not discouraged by China's government policy of atheism: "There is something innate in man," he said. "Man is not born to atheism. He is born to believe. They're not different deep down in their search for meaning. The message is always the same."

Evangelist Billy Graham, during his recent visit to the People's Republic of China, had an unexpected private meeting with Prime Minister Li Peng to discuss Christianity and its potential role in China. Sources say the unusual Saturday afternoon meeting lasted 50 minutes.

The Chinese press reported parts of the discussion, which observers saw as a sign that Li wanted certain things to be acknowledged publicly, including a rare admission: "The Chinese constitution guarantees freedom of religious belief. But in the past we didn't practice it in full. We are trying to correct the past ..." Li also said China needs "moral power" and "spiritual forces" if it is to prosper and be strong.

Graham was quoted as urging Li to study the life of Christ. The meeting was reported on Chinese national television and in the press. Millions who never heard of Graham became acquainted with his name and mission.

Graham was hosted by leaders of the China Christian Council (CCC), and the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries. He told them he had come for four reasons: to see his wife's birthplace at a former medical mission compound in the Jiangsu province, to learn about China, to proclaim the Gospel, and to help build bridges of friendship and understanding.

Accompanied by his wife, Ruth, his son Franklin, and a small team, he spent a week in Beijing, then Jiangsu Province, Nanjing, the central coastal city of Shanghai, and finally Guangzhou. He preached to overflow crowds at CCC churches and met with independent house church leaders and government leaders of all the cities in Beijing, Shanghai, and Guangzhou.

Sources say China is experiencing dramatic church growth. In Shanghai, Graham met with Wang Mingdao, 86, one of the most prominent figures in Chinese church history. Wang suffered much persecution and spent years in prison.

Graham also addressed academic gatherings in Beijing, Shanghai, and Nanjing. According to a department head at the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences in Beijing, Graham's meetings with scholars was the first time Christianity was ever discussed there seriously. At other academic sessions, teachers, and students quizzed him on moral and spiritual issues.

For many Protestant leaders, Graham's visit signaled the best climate in church-and-state relations since the Communists came to power in 1949.

Billy Graham's visit to China: Retrospect

House church leaders in China said Dr. Billy Graham's controversial visit did three things which they could not have accomplished, according to Ron McMillan, Open Doors News Service's Asia Correspondent.

First, he shared Jesus Christ with many top communists who hold enormous power in China today. Secondly, Graham made a vigorous case for Christianity and its positive role in China's development at a time when a critical new law on religion is being drafted in the government. House church leaders expressed hopes that his efforts may result in a more sympathetic law towards religious freedom.

Thirdly, he was able to discuss the message of Jesus Christ with atheistic scholars at several educational establishments. He gave brief lectures and fielded the questions of academicians at Beijing University, the Academy of Social Sciences, and other colleges.

Graham was hosted by two opposing organizations: the Chinese Association for Friendship with Foreign People, which opened doors for him into the Communist establishment, and the China Christian Council. Initially, house church leaders were wary of Graham's patronage of Communist leaders. However, the prevailing opinion was that Graham had done the best he could under difficult circumstances, and he did not let the house church movement down. He ensured this to a degree by meeting privately with a group of house church leaders in Beijing, and by visiting Wang Ming Tao in Shanghai, the 87-year-old patriarch of the home church movement. Graham also brought extended greetings to a large gathering of believers at an independent house church in Canton.

More importantly, he resisted labeling evangelical ministries who refuse to work through the Three Self Patriotic Movement, an arm of the communist government responsible for monitoring religious activity, as "anti-China." Religious leaders who have visited China in the past have been urged to make such statements.

His visit ironically ended in controversy over the arrest of a house church leader, Xu Yongze, who was on his way to hear Graham preach in Beijing. Xu has been described as the "Billy Graham of China." The stubborn refusal of the Ministry of National Security to even admit that Yongze was in their custody served as a strong reminder to the watching world that the Chinese Church is still suffering under strong persecution.

Bush Election & China Missions

SAN JOSE, CA (EP) - Popular Chinese evangelist and missionary leader Nora Lam believes that the election of George Bush as U.S. President will be beneficial for the Church and missions in China.

"Reaction to Bush has been good in China," she explains. "George Bush was the only candidate who has lived and worked in China as a diplomat, and Chinese authorities know and understand his viewpoints quite well." Bush previously served in China as a U.S. diplomat.

Lam added, "This victory vote has increased Chinese hope for more friendship between our peoples, and that is good for Chinese believers because it will help ensure the continuation of trends to lift restrictions on the freedom of all Christians - but especially Evangelicals."

Lam's private endorsement during the campaign, and photos of Lam with candidate Bush, were used in the Chinese mass media over the last few weeks. Her friendship with Bush has become widely known in China.

Photos of Lam with Bush are being distributed to pastors of unregistered house churches in China, where they are often prominently displayed. In China, where friendship is revered as "the source of all progress," Lam's past connections with the Reagan White House have been a source of courage and confidence for local pastors. Having friendships abroad is valued by leaders of both the official and unregistered churches of China, and strengthens their bargaining position with local communist leaders.

Lam is identified with the China's evangelical community and house church movement. She travels in the U.S. as a banquet speaker, and has led over 4,000 Americans on missionary tours of China and the Orient since she fled religious persecution in her homeland during the Mao Tse Tung era.

China's Awakening - True Testimonies

A spiritual awakening is taking place in the People's Republic of China which has been attracting the attention of concerned government officials for several years. But the growth of Christianity in this nation, already occurring at record rates, has a unique characteristic which makes it especially hard to reckon with: it is accompanied by documented, New Testament-style miracles. When people are actually raised from the dead or supernaturally healed in broad daylight by Christian believers, as they are today in China, the Church becomes a force which is difficult to challenge.

Mrs. X (names in this story have been withheld) is a 40-year-old government informer who attended a Christian crusade meeting with the intention of gathering evidence against the Christians and to report on their activities. When she returned to her home in the evening, she began bleeding from the nose, eyes, ears, and mouth, and could not stop the strange phenomenon.

Her daughter-in-law, upon seeing her, was very frightened and began to cry. Then, her daughter-in-law remembered hearing about Christians who could heal the sick, and took her to a home church. The government informer realized her sin, repented, and her bleeding stopped. House church leaders today report that this woman's story has been used as an effective warning to other government informers.

Mr. Z was a 26-year-old production cadre in a rural commune. He was also a Party intellectual who strongly opposed all superstition and idol worship; in fact, he liked to harass religious people. However, he had a serious disease that had been deteriorating his body for about one year.

"Although I had been taking medicine every day and had daily treatments, the pain remained," he told one source. "My family was then very poor and, in any case, medicine was scarce. I was suffering physically and mentally."

He went to the commune's clinic for help, but the nurse wasn't there so he went to her house. There he met the nurse's mother, who told him about Jesus Christ and explained the gospel to him. She then prayed for his disease to leave. "The pain vanished at once," said Mr. Z. Because the infamous "Gang of Four" was in political power at the time, he was sworn to confidentiality about the experience.

A few months later Mr. Z witnessed a miracle that few Western Christians have ever seen. "One night," he related, "a [Christian] brother came to my house and wanted to preach the gospel after dinner. So we ate and then set off on our journey on bicycles."

"After cycling 10 miles, we arrived at a small village where this brother's father-in-law lived. He was extremely sick, so we used the opportunity to preach to the villagers, proclaiming that Jesus can heal. But while we preached, his father-in-law died."

"More and more people crammed into the house. Then the Holy Spirit urged me to pray. I asked everyone to kneel and close their eyes. I believed that God wanted to save the dead man. The brother and I held up the corpse and prayed, 'O Jesus! You are the true God and want to save everyone, even this man, even this man!'"

"The father-in-law revived and came back to life. Every person witnessed this and agreed that Jesus is the true God. They said to one another, 'Today we have heard the Gospel. Not only that, we have seen God's power!'"

Such experiences are not uncommon among Chinese Christians today. In fact, there are many stories like this one which have never been reported in the West. Brother Zhu Bao-Shan is a preacher in the Henan province. He was arrested in the spring of 1986 after the government-controlled church - called the Three Self Church - accused him of preaching without their permission.

On the second day of his imprisonment, he prayed and asked the Lord why this would happen. God told him he would be in prison for 20 days, and that he would lead 17 convicts to Christianity.

Brother Zhu shared the gospel faithfully, but only met with ridicule and rejection from all the prisoners. On the 14th day of his imprisonment, a brawl broke out and one of the prisoners was killed in the skirmish. Because the jailers knew they would have to give an account for the incident, they went to Brother Zhu and said, "We heard you Christians have power to pray for the dead and bring them to life."

They then made Zhu a promise: "If you pray for this dead prisoner and he comes to life, you will be released. Otherwise we will sentence you to 15 years of prison." The prisoner had been dead for seven hours and 20 minutes. Zhu prayed and the prisoner was miraculously revived. When Zhu was released six days later, he had led 17 convicts to Christ just as the Holy Spirit had told him earlier.

Mr. Zhu continued his ministry until March of 1987, at which time he was arrested again. However, during that one year of freedom, he had led 3,000 to Christ. He is currently in prison.

Although Chinese Christians have lived under this constant threat of imprisonment, suffering, and persecution, their most critical problem is the shortage of Bibles.

In one province there are 60,000 Christians, but only six reference Bibles between them. The Bibles are 30 years old and printed in old script. The Christians take turns borrowing the Bibles and faithfully copying them by hand every day until their fingers become swollen. In another village, some 60 to 80 people became Christians, but they only had two to three Bibles between them. They told Western visitors that they were willing to pay any price for additional copies of the Scriptures.

The "house church" movement in China is growing phenomenally in many rural areas where the Three Self Church has no control. Its leader and founder, Wang Ming-Dao, has been under constant attack from the government. Bishop K.H. Ting, president of the government-controlled China Christian Council, has warned house church leaders that evangelistic work violates government policies.

"It is strictly forbidden for any person to come to mainland China to preach the Gospel, to establish churches, to establish any church work or participate in any religious activity without permission of our two Christian organizations," according to Ting.

Today there are an estimated 50 million believers in China, and at this present rate of growth the number may surpass 100 million in 14 years time. Because of this rapid increase in the numbers of Christians, and the strict government policies aimed at limiting church growth, many rural parts of China have an average of only one Bible for every 500 to 2,000 Christians.

What does the future hold for the Church in Communist China? Although government restrictions are not likely to stop overnight, it is very likely that policies will become more and more relaxed as more government officials become Christians. Reports are already being circulated about officials in all levels of the communist government who are having personal encounters with Jesus Christ.

On one of the most prestigious campuses in the People's Republic of China, Beijing University, students instigated the destruction of a four-story tall statue of revolutionary leader Mao Tse Tung. Destruction of the statue was perceived by university officials as a move to lessen the late leader's influence.

The statue was a national monument in front of Beijing University's main library and was one of the largest in the nation. An American student told the Associated Press that all that remained of the monument were the pedestals and some rubble.

The day before the statue toppled, workers were seen laboring on the statue under bright lights and it has been covered by scaffolding and plastic sheeting for more than a week. However, students said it was being cleaned and repaired.

At 5 a.m. the next morning, when the plastic sheeting was removed, the concrete statue was sawed off at the feet and came toppling down, leaving a dent on the pavement, a student said. Statues of Mao, bare-headed, wearing a long windblown overcoat with a hand raised in greeting, were once fixtures in nearly all institutions and official compounds.

However, no new statues have been erected in recent years. This is significant of the official Chinese attitude toward Mao, one of the founders of the Chinese Communist Party, which has changed from unquestioning allegiance to the position that he was a great man who made major mistakes.

A poster criticizing the students' action was put up briefly that morning on a campus bulletin board, and several Chinese students expressed regret over the demolition of the figures. "Taking it down was unnecessary. He was an important historical figure, for good or for bad. We can judge for ourselves," one student said.

Several professors disagreed. A middle-aged professor who helped erect the statue in 1967 said, "It's a symbol of an era, and that era is over. Taking it down is only natural."

SANTA ANA, CA (NNI) - A Shenzhen University professor told participants in an international seminar on Confucianism and Christianity that more and more Chinese people today are looking for spiritual fulfillment. Though he did not offer any specific statistics, Associate Professor Liu Xiaofeng said China is experiencing a growth in believers and a decrease in followers of Marxism.

Liu said he believed more research on Christianity is necessary to "help people understand religion and not blindly oppose it," according to a July 23 report in Asian Focus. Because of a lack of understanding and the impact of communist propaganda during their childhood, Liu alleged that many young people reject Christianity while at the same time they express a need to fill a spiritual vacuum. Liu attributes this change to the effects of the Cultural Revolution which "shook their belief in Marxism."

China watchers say the West has long realized this spiritual vacuum existed among the young people, but this is the first time a Chinese academician has admitted it. According to the Chinese Church Research Center in Hong Kong, "Christians outside China welcome professor Liu's assessment and his recommendation that young people's prejudice against Christianity be removed."

Chinese Youth

BEIJING, China (EP) - Chinese youth are attending church by the hundreds out of curiosity to see what the church has to offer that Marxism does not, according to a recent foreign report.

A Beijing University student said, "We feel Christianity is more closely tied to human nature than orthodox Marxism. Students are trying to find something that is more connected with their daily life."

The party is reportedly more tolerant of religion than it was during the 1966-1976 Cultural Revolution when churches were destroyed and believers were driven underground. Over the Christmas holidays, hundreds of young Chinese people crowded into churches all across the nation.

In Guangzhou, formerly Canton, in southern China, the crowd attempting to enter the Sacred Heart of Jesus Cathedral for a midnight mass was so large that priests refused admission to some. "If you are not Catholic you should not come in," said one church assistant who refused admission to a young man who could not provide his Christian name.

The Communist Party has banned proselytizing by Christians in China. It is widely known, however, that a number of foreign teachers come to China hoping to spread their faith. Christians still constitute a small minority of the population, but church officials and others say the number is growing.

Report from China's Church

by Chris Woehr

SANTA ANA, CA (ODNS) - China's itinerant evangelists and unregistered house church leaders report growing efforts by official government agencies to stifle church activities and say it is the "worst" wave of persecution since the "great tribulation of 1983."

Citing numerous acts of violence against Christians in at least five separate provinces, including Jiangsu, Jiangxi, Fujian, Henan and Shanxi, Dr. Jonathan Chao, executive director of the China Church Research Center in Hong Kong, said the recent purge is directly related to the downfall of Party Secretary General Hu Yaobang on January 17, 1987.

At that time, conservative members of the Chinese Communist Party initiated action against negative Western influences which they referred to as an "anti-bourgeois liberalization campaign." This was "supposed to be confined to the party, yet records of the Jiangsu provincial committees of the Three-Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM) and of the China Christian Council (CCC) indicate that they have held meetings to implement the spirit of anti-bourgeois liberalization among the Protestants," Chao stated.

According to Chao, "many house meetings, including those registered with the TSPM, were told to close down." He added that local TSPM officials are working in full cooperation with civil authorities to find unregistered meeting points by "dispatching spies to discover underground house church activities, and hence putting pressure on [these] house churches to stop meeting."

More importantly, Chao revealed that local TSPM officials of Jiangsu province have resolved to "terminate independent itinerant preaching," according to records of the TSPM and CCC meetings. As a result many house churches throughout China have stopped meeting and itinerant evangelists are fleeing to avoid arrest.

Arrest lists are now surfacing throughout north and central China, with one list naming as many as 3,270 house church leaders. According to Chao, local party officials are telling the TSPM committee members that "Christians are growing too fast and therefore some administrative measures must be taken."

"The rate of growth since 1982 has been tremendous," Chao said. "In 1982 the house churches circulated a Christian population count ranging from at least 35 million to as high as 55 million, and those are the numbers we have been using for about five years now." He concluded that if the Public Security Bureau admits the presence of 50 million Christians in China today, then the number must actually be much higher.

Chao speculated that Christians may actually number around 75 million today, based on the expectedly conservative numbers classified by the government.

1/89

NANJING, China (NNI) - China's Protestant Christian population is now "approaching five million" in 5,000 churches, according to Three-Self leader, Bishop K.H. Ting. "Church buildings," said Ting, "have for the last nine years been increasing at the rate of three every two days." This is believed to be the first time the figure of five million believers has been used by a Three-Self leader.

Ting also talked about a more worrying trend - pressure on the church from leftist cadres - and revealed that the China Christian Council had sent letters of protest to certain provincial governments who had toughened their religious policies in the past year.

Speaking in a News Network International interview in Nanjing on October 17, Bishop Ting maintained that this growth of roughly one million in the past year was due not so much to more Christians being discovered as more churches were opened, but to an increase in new converts to Christianity as seen in applications for baptism. Said Ting, "In the hearts of the Chinese people there is an emptiness and they don't find fulfillment elsewhere ... eventually they come into contact with the church and they are satisfied."

Chinese Church Resurges After Beijing Massacre

HONG KONG (NNI) - During the few months after the Beijing massacre of June 3-4, the leftist campaign to punish the leaders of the pro-democracy movement has left the Chinese church relatively unscathed. More surprisingly, as researchers from various evangelical ministries return from their first trips into China since the crackdown, they report a buoyant mood among local Christians. Students are turning to Christianity in considerable numbers, and demand for evangelistic tracts has increased.

One house church leader in the coastal city of Xiamen said, "It has never been easier to witness for Christ in China than during this past month." He added, "Because we Christians have become a curiosity ... we are the only group in this society that still has any hope for the future ... everyone else lost hope on June 4, and they want to know why we are not depressed at the prospect of a less prosperous China."

It is among the student population that initial evangelistic successes have been reported. In Xiamen, one house church baptized 60 recently converted students on June 13. The ceremony was held out of doors in broad daylight. Another house church in the northern port city of Qingdao, Shandong Province, welcomed 300 students into the fellowship in July.

Many Christians attribute the resurgence to the aggressive evangelism conducted among students at the height of the pro-democracy movement. House church Christians in Beijing assiduously gave out tracts in Tiananmen Square during the month of May. One leader even held open air meetings. He said, "In the square, and only in the square, there was total freedom. There were no forces of law and order anywhere, and we could talk on any subject, or give our opinion about any person - even Mao - without fear."

Pictures and camera footage seen in the U.S. of the thousands of demonstrators that jammed Tiananmen Square in Beijing in June did not capture the image of a large white banner with the sign of the cross and Chinese characters proclaiming "God Loves the World!" on it. Christian students had joined the demonstration and were openly witnessing to their faith, according to a Christian journalist based in the U.S.

One church leader led his congregation into Tiananmen Square carrying a 10-foot cross. Instead of shouting political slogans, the Christians sang hymns of praise. Students explained to other demonstrators that Christianity is the only foundation for true democracy, leading to an animated discussion, according to Dan Wooding, a Christian journalist who has done extensive reporting on countries that are closed to the gospel.

Certain literature distribution agencies say they have never experienced more urgent demands for Bibles and evangelistic material. Remarkably, the borders into China, especially into southern China, have remained open and few literature distribution ministries have suffered any major dislocation of their Bible courier programs.

CHICAGO, Illinois (FR) - The First Congress of the Chinese Students in the U.S.A. convened in Chicago, Illinois, on July 28, paying a tribute to those who gave their lives to a democratic China in Beijing and declaring the formation of the All-America Chinese Students Union.

Over 400 delegates representing 200 campuses in America united with the stated purpose "to push forward the Chinese democratic movement." A manifesto declaring the Chinese student's commitment to promote democracy in their motherland was written and stated in part:

"We hereby proclaim our persistent pursuit for democracy, which includes our claims for such human rights as life, freedom, property and pursuit of happiness ... Our cause, for which numerous Chinese with lofty ideals have devoted their lives since the May 4th movement, is based upon the intuitive and common knowledge in the whole civilized world. It represents a historical trend of human society progressing from barbarism to civilization, from backwardness to advancement. This trend cannot be defied by any force."

After the opening ceremony, all the key leaders of the democracy movement who had recently escaped from China spoke at a press conference. These leaders included Mr. Yan Jiaqui, a former consultant of Communist Party chief, Zhao Ziyang; Mr. Wuerkaixi, one of the student leaders in Beijing and the President of the Beijing Independent Student Union; and Mr. Wan Runnan, the General Manager of the Stone Corporation and an influential Chinese businessman.

Mr. Yan claimed that China needs free elections so that Chinese people have to choose their representatives and government officials.

Mr. Wuerkaixi replied to the question of whether they want to overthrow the communist government: "I have never said that we want to overthrow the communist government. We simply want to see opposition political forces emerging to compete with the communist party and the Chinese people have the right to choose among them."

Mr. Wan told reporters that they are in the process of forming an organization called the Front for Democratic China. The purpose of this organization is to provide a means of uniting various Chinese democratic organizations.

Jesus Fever in China

BEIJING, China (FR) - Chinese youth are becoming disillusioned with empty Marxist slogans and corruption in the Communist party and are turning to Christianity in record numbers, according to a recent report in Newsweek. "So many Communist Party members don't practice what Marxism preaches," said Chen Yinghui, a Protestant student at Beijing's teachers' college. "They give us nothing to believe in."

Another student agreed with Yinghui: "Party members are not the ones helping others. They just do things to get ahead. But Christians do good deeds without telling anyone about it." Although few students attend church, Bibles which were once forbidden are now being purchased at more than double the official price.

Party officials have become concerned about "Christianity fever" and recently reviewed an internal report on the reasons for the growing popularity of Christianity, especially among intellectuals and young people. The report was prepared by the Hong Kong-based Chinese Church Research Center and compiled by two writers from the New China News Agency who visited several cities. The writers described the growth of "Christianity fever" as being due to government corruption and the Communist party.

According to the report, some Chinese have turned to Christianity to find happiness or because Christians have shown them kindness. However, the report added that most of the Christian activities are harmless to the development of the country's socialist civilization.

Before Chairman Mao Tse Tung came to power, there were only 700,000 Chinese Christians in his country. Today there are more than 10 million, and every 36 hours Christian officials claim that a new church opens up somewhere in China. "Society has a need for Christianity," related Kang Xueqing, a stout, silver-haired pastor at Beijing's Protest Chongwenmen Church. "People are looking for reliable and believable things, and they find that God is dependable." Kang spent 10 years being "re-educated" in a factory, in which he was forced to bow 100 times to a picture of Chairman Mao. But he returned to the church full-time in 1979 after Deng Xiaoping came to power.

President George Bush and his wife recently visited Kang's church during their recent whirlwind tour of Asia. Their daughter Dorothy was baptized there as a teenager, 14 years ago, when Bush was head of the U.S. mission to China. In those days services were held in a single room at another location, and attendance was restricted to foreigners, according to church sources. Bush described the church as "our home away from home" in the 1970s, and he borrowed a theme from sermons Billy Graham preached in China last year: "Some things change, some things never change."

The congregation laughed when he told how he rode a bicycle to services years earlier. However, on this occasion he arrived in a 20-car motorcade. Kang, 67, was Bush's tennis partner as well as pastor when

Bush was based there. He gave the Bushes hymnals and a Chinese Bible, along with a tape cassette of choir music for Dorothy. Bush in turn gave Kang a black leather pulpit-size Bible. Bush said, "Sometimes our problems can seem bigger than life itself, intractable and fearsome. But I am convinced that with each other, that with our faith in God, we can meet any challenge, and we will."

In a culture that upholds atheistic values, church leaders are careful not to offend the government or the Communist Party. Foreign evangelists are outlawed, but underground churches are growing at the same rate as the official church, due to missionaries who pose as tourists or teachers.

The Largest Remaining Communist Nation

By Fred Schwartz

3/93

Some contend that the regime in China is communist in name only. They point out that the authorities are now permitting limited economic freedom which they believe is incompatible with communism and socialism. Is this clear or wishful thinking?

Was Mao Tse-Tung a communist? Did he and his communist colleagues rule China for decades? During the communist campaign to conquer China, many influential voices claimed that the Communist Party, which Mao led, could not be genuinely communist because it was distributing land to the peasants instead of collectivizing it. Thus, so the claim went, they were actually agrarian reformers.

History reveals how wrong these judgments were. Collectivization of land had to wait until the communist conquest of China was complete.

When the communists use the word "socialism," they are referring to the "first stage of communism," during which the Communist Party holds a monopoly of political and economic power. The founder of the modern communist movement, Lenin, defined socialism as. "The dictatorship of the proletariat, plus electrification." This can be translated as, "The monopolistic rule of the Communist Party, plus industrialization." This describes the present situation in China as well.

The regime in China is definitely Marxist-Leninist in practice as well as in name. It is a communist regime. During "socialism" any economic system is permissible as long as the Communist Party controls all the levels of power. By the use of these levers, it can change the economic system by unilateral decision whenever it chooses to do so.

According to reports, China is presently making considerable economic progress. This is due to the installation of what the communists call, "a Socialist Market Economy."

A sporting analogy may shed a little light on what is meant by a "Socialist Market Economy." Consider a fictitious organization we may call "The Communist Football League." This league is owned by a group of gangsters who operate it for personal power and profit. They divide the territory and organize a football team in each designated area. They make sure that the manager of each team is a member of the gang. The leader of the gang directs the managers to select coaches and players and to decide upon and enforce the conditions of employment. The leadership of the gang also designs the rules of the game and chooses the umpires.

Under the previous socialist regime of "Command and Administer," the communist gang decided everything. It chose what games would be played, who would score the touchdowns and which side would win. The "progressive" leaders insisted that all points should be shared equally.

Since the players had little incentive, the games were insipid and the crowds diminished. The gangsters, therefore, decided to establish a football market. Each team would be permitted to do its very best to win and the winners would be rewarded both financially and emotionally. Almost immediately there was a surge of interest and excitement in both players and fans and the profits of the gang improved.

As long as their power to control was not threatened, the gang could applaud the new system. The important fact to remember is that the communist gang still retains power in China and it can use this power if conditions develop that threaten their authority. They used their power in the Tiananmen Square massacre and they can do so again as long as they retain the will to do so.

Their master, Lenin, taught that three things are necessary for a popular revolution to overthrow an existing authoritarian government. These are: 1) Mass popular discontent, 2) An organized party to harness and direct public discontent, and 3) A collapse of the unity and will of the existing authority.

The vital question which the future will answer is: "Will the Socialist Market Economy create the conditions for a successful popular revolution which overthrows the gang?"

The Mandate For China:

A Great Task Awaits the Church

By Jay Rogers

2/94

With China up before the U.S. Congress for most-favored-nation tariff status next June, human rights are expected to be an issue. The formerly communistic regime is taking a bent towards capitalism. But the government is still totalitarian in many ways. The Clinton administration is expected to push for human rights in China. This could result in an opening of China for the gospel to be preached openly as was the case in the Soviet Union in the summer of 1990.

Deng Xiao Peng, now 89, is China's last dictator. When Deng dies or leaves office, the military and communist party leaders, which dominated China for so long, are not likely to rule much longer. No one knows exactly what route China will take, but social and economic change is sure to follow the Deng regime.

Christians in China are still arrested and thrown in prison. They are seen as dissidents and enemies of the state - and rightfully so. The Church in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe played a role in overthrowing the communist regimes.

The real hope of China are the nation's youth. Over 50 percent of the 1.3 billion population are under the age of 25. China's university students especially hold the brightest promise of reforming that nation. And on the university campuses - ever since June 1989 when over 1000 were slain by government troops - more and more students have been rejecting Mao and Marx and embracing Jesus Christ.

In the perspective of history, what happened in Tiananmen Square, when over 1000 pro-democracy students were slain in the streets by government soldiers, will probably be seen not as the end of a decade of reform and increasing freedom, but as the beginning of an age of change.

It was also the time when China's intellectuals began to consider Christianity in a search for truth and meaning. In defeat, students and intellectuals have learned much - including the true nature of their atheistic government. The storming of Beijing on June 4, 1989, enraged and alienated a generation of China's brightest and best, not just in the capital, but across the country.

The events of June 4, 1989 have served as another turning point in Chinese history, but they have also acted as a catalyst in turning thousands of Chinese students to Christ. In many respects, the spiritual awakening within the Chinese intellectual community has no historical parallel in Chinese history.

Since the student massacre, Bible study groups have begun on many Chinese campuses, now joined by undergraduates, graduates, professors and researchers. Also, since the mid-1980s there has been a marked growth of Chinese teachers and professors who have become Christians. Throughout a number of Chinese cities, professors are now supporting and encouraging Christian student groups.

Further, in many Chinese cities new Christian fellowship groups have been established. Some of these university fellowships number at over 100 students. There remains a tremendous openness to the gospel among China's intellectual community.

Christians outside of China must now consider creative ways in which to establish a partnership with Chinese Christian intellectuals in order to facilitate their effectiveness in evangelizing and training this new generation of Christian students who are part of the legacy of Tiananmen Square.

Dennis Balcombe, a missionary to mainland China, travels frequently into the country from his church in neighboring Hong Kong. Says Balcombe, "During the past few years, one of the greatest outpourings of the Holy Spirit in history has been witnessed in China - it is estimated that there are now between 90 to 100 million Christians attending the house churches."

The Chinese revival is a revival of young people, says Balcombe. Those who were born since the communist revolution in 1948 are turning to God in great numbers::

"In one district of central China there has been tremendous growth of the house churches. In 1976, there were only two Christians in this region and they had been converted before the Maoist revolution in 1949. Now there are 10,000 Christians in this area. This work was pioneered by two Christian men who came from a distant city to preach. When miraculous healings took place, the entire village was converted. This revival has since spread throughout many other villages in this region.

"This revival has not come without persecution from communist government authorities. One 22-year-old sister from one of these villages was put in prison in the summer of 1990 for holding a house meeting. While she was in prison 70 people and two of the prison guards accepted Christ. The Chinese Christians are not discouraged by the persecution. They are praying for their government leaders to know Christ."

The Pro-Democracy Revolution in China:

An Eyewitness Shares His Testimony

By Jay Rogers

MANILA, Philippines (FR) - After losing his passport during the Beijing massacre, a Chinese exchange student returned to Manila last June with an exciting and insightful story to tell.

Due to the sensitive nature of this story, however, we are unable to use this student's real name. "Ching" was instrumental in planting an underground "house church" on the Xiamen University campus which grew to over 100 believers in less than two years. He also knew many of the Christians who were standing up for democracy in China, and was being watched by Communist Party authorities several months before he left the city of Xiamen.

At the time of the Beijing massacre, Ching informed us, there were many pro-democracy rallies taking place on university campuses all over China. The rally on the Xiamen University campus was organized by a Christian whom Ching had personally led to the Lord. The number of students attending this rally was so large that the University administration was forced to cancel classes that week.

Ching became a Christian two years ago during Maranatha Campus Ministries' outreach in the Philippines. Evangelist Greg Ball and Los Angeles Lakers power guard A.C. Green staged a basketball exhibition game to attract the Filipino students in Manila. Ching remembers being confronted with the Gospel by Greg Ball: "A preacher during an outreach here said to me, 'Hey young man - you're in darkness! You need to get out!' That was Greg Ball speaking, but I knew that it was the Lord's voice. I responded to an altar call and the Lord pulled me out of that darkness."

Ching was born and raised in the Philippines, which has millions of indigenous Chinese. Although he was not from China, by a quirk of Filipino law he was living in the Philippines on a mainland Chinese passport. When he gave his life to the Lord during the Maranatha outreach, Ching had already been planning for six months to be an exchange student at Xiamen University in the People's Republic of China. He went to pursue his studies only six weeks after he first gave his life to the Lord. He was already committed to Jesus Christ and did not doubt his salvation, so he went to China - although he did not relish the idea of missing fellowship for six months.

When Ching first arrived in China he did not have a burden for the people. "I didn't care - all I wanted to do was sightsee or shop." But one day he had an experience which drastically changed his life.

Ching remembers standing near his dormitory and looking across a courtyard. "I saw a Chinese student walking in the darkness and the Lord spoke to me. He showed me that there were millions of people in China, just like this one, who were not saved and that they were going to hell."

After that experience, Ching wanted to share with the Chinese people but felt he didn't know how since he was so young in the Lord. Later that year, Ching met a Christian man who needed help smuggling Bibles into China. He prayed about it and the Lord told him to extend his stay in China. Ching responded to the great need in China for Bibles and Christian literature. He would take Bibles to leaders of house churches, who would then distribute them to the people.

Four months later the Lord spoke to Ching again: "I don't want you to be afraid any longer. I want you to share the Gospel boldly with people." Ching was not politically minded then - "I just wanted people to be saved," he said. "I started going door to door in the dorms sharing the Gospel with the students. It really touched my heart to find the people so open."

Ching started to become bold in witnessing. Teaching the little he knew in Bible studies, with the aid of another Filipino exchange student who had been a Christian for a longer period of time, Ching began to see God move through his evangelism.

"One time," he said, "I invited 15 of these people to an evangelistic meeting and seven of them got saved."

Often when witnessing to students in their dorm rooms, they would make Ching wait until they brought 10 or more students back to hear what he had to say. He had gained so many converts during this time that he often had to go to Hong Kong to smuggle Bibles back into the country for them.

After one semester as an exchange student, Ching transferred to Xiamen University feeling that the Lord wanted him to labor there. All the people in Ching's church were either new believers or were saved in a chain reaction through other new believers. As of last spring, during the time of the Beijing massacre, the church had rapidly grown to over 100 people. Ching had been a new believer, and had had no teaching or discipleship prior to arriving in China, but God used him in a powerful way.

"We saw several people in the PLA security get saved," Ching said. The PLA (People's Liberation Army) is responsible to rid the Chinese Republic of Christians who go door to door evangelizing. There were also students saved at the University who were Communist party members.

When asked if Christians were behind the pro-democracy movement, Ching said, "Some of the older Christians in China think that the call for democracy is a worldly struggle. But this is not true of new Christians. The rally in Xiamen was started by a guy who I led to the Lord and is a very good friend of mine."

Ching led this student leader to the Lord one night when he was out walking on his campus. As he walked along, praying for people's hearts to be opened to hear the Gospel, the Holy Spirit alerted him to a friend of his walking in the distance.

"Hey! I haven't seen you in such a long time!" Ching called him to come over, "I want to share something nice with you!" The student walked up and Ching said, "I want to share the Gospel with you - Have you ever heard of the Gospel of Jesus?" Ching told him the story of Nicodemus and explained what being "born-again" means. Then he simply asked him, "Do you want to be born-again?"

Ching's friend responded enthusiastically, "Yes! I've always wanted to be born-again!" he said. "I've been searching for answers all my life. I've been studying philosophy trying to make some sense of this life - but this right here is the answer!"

Ching told his friend about being filled with the Holy Spirit. "You mean - there's more?" his friend asked. Together they went to see some of the Christians in Ching's church. They laid hands on this student and he started speaking in tongues.

"This is the guy who started the rally," Ching related. "He came to me later and said, 'I want you to support this. We have to talk to the school authorities. There is so much injustice committed at this school. We just want to talk with them and tell them we're being repressed. It's not something violent - we just want to talk with them.' I don't know about the demonstration in Beijing, but the one in Xiamen was started by a Christian."

Ching was unable to give his friend any money; at this point the PLA security had been scrutinizing him very closely. "I told him that he should consult the Lord to see if these demonstrations are of God. The last I heard he was in trouble with the school authorities and he might have been expelled from school."

Going from door to door, sharing the Gospel boldly with Chinese students in the dormitories, brought Ching a sharp rebuke from a Communist Party official shortly before he left Xiamen.

"I heard you preaching a religion," the woman warned him.

"I am not preaching a religion," Ching told her. "I am preaching Jesus."

She then warned him further, "China is free; you can believe anything you want, but the students are supported by the State. They are supposed to be Marxist and you are changing their minds."

"China is still very feudalistic," Ching told us. "Although there is a democracy movement, there is no freedom of expression. They say that there is freedom of religion and point to the people going to church; but this is the Three Self Church. When you go to a state operated church, you don't hear the Gospel. Some churches even preach the Communist Party's politics. People cannot believe what they want to believe. So there is really no freedom in China."

God has given Ching a burden for mainland Chinese students. There is a great openness among these young people - they have a great hunger for the Gospel. He related to Steve Murell, pastor of the Maranatha Church in Manila, that China makes the Philippines look like "a post-Christian, backslidden nation." There is even a greater spiritual hunger among the Chinese students in Xiamen City than there is in the Philippines, which has been experiencing a mighty revival.

"The situation in China is amazing," he said. "When I talked to the Chinese people, I saw so much emptiness in their lives that it made me want to cry. Financially, they have nothing. Emotionally, they are always hurt. Physically, there is so much injustice and repression. Jesus is the only answer."

Ching said that some of the Christians from the University had gone to Beijing to the student demonstration during the week long fast. He was not there himself, but he knew that some of the students fighting for liberty in Tiananmen Square were Christians. To this day, he doesn't know what happened to his friends that were in the demonstration - if they were killed, arrested or made it out of the city.

In fact, it was a miracle that Ching was able to leave the mainland. He had been travelling to Hong Kong every six weeks to smuggle Bibles into the country for the new believers on campus. When the massacre broke out he was in Hong Kong. He lost his return train ticket when the Chinese government declared martial law and put an end to all travel into the country. Had he been in the mainland, he would have been stuck there indefinitely.

Ching believes that the Spirit of God is moving through the democracy movement letting the people know that they need to be saved. "I am sure that the Lord is going to continue to move in China," Ching said optimistically.

He believes that the Lord has used the massacre to expose Communism. "After this, the Chinese are going to see the truth about Communism. Most Chinese do not believe in Communism, but there are still some that think it is great. But now more people will come to the realization that they can no longer believe in something that is so evil."

In the few months before Ching left Xiamen, students were coming to know the Lord in increasing numbers. "It was unbelievable," he said. "I had never seen anything like this before."

Although he was in Hong Kong during the massacre, Ching has talked to many Chinese coming back from the mainland: "They say that China is going backwards; economically, it is much worse off." Ching believes that this will only increase the Chinese people's hunger for the Gospel.

Ching has a burden to go back to China. After studying one more year in Manila, he plans to return to China to the great work of grace he has begun in Xiamen City.

"After I finish school, I am going to try to find a job in China so that I can go back. I can probably get a job as an English teacher or as a translator in a company. I want to be able to share the Gospel because I really believe that God is going to bring democracy to China."

During the time he is in Manila, Ching plans to organize a team of people who are interested in going to China as English teachers and businessmen: "I have this vision to go to China and bring in a group of Christians. When I go to China I am going to look for jobs for them. You are not allowed to go in as a full time missionary, but you can be a missionary by being an English teacher." He added, "It is very easy for an American to go to China to teach English."

When asked if his vision included the universities in China, Ching said, "My vision is for the Chinese people in general, but given a choice, I would like to work on a campus. Xiamen University, for instance, is a potpourri; it is a mixture of all the most intelligent people in China. Beijing University is like the Harvard of China. All the future leaders of China are trained there. That is the hope of China."

"There is so much idol worship in the villages; I have a burden for that too. There are millions of people in idol worship - whole towns. But I still feel that to reach out to the Chinese students is so important, because they are going to be the future leaders of China. Some of them are Communist Party members, some of them are going to be government officials. If they become Christians, China is going to have hope. I am not discounting the fact that others should also be reached, but the students are China's hope."

On a final note Ching added, "I would ask the people in the United States to continue praying for China. Pray for the missionaries that are already there. There is so much to be done. I would hope and pray that God would continue to send people out into the harvest."

Pro-Life Victory!

The U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service is considering changes which would make a clear statement to the world that abortion kills babies and violates human rights. The Chinese government currently forces women to have an abortion after the birth of their second child. If the regulations take effect, refugees fleeing communist China because of its population policy may be granted political asylum in America. Coerced abortion would then entitle women to the same refugee status as religious or political persecution.

China's History in Providential Perspective

4/92

At one time the Chinese worshiped only one supreme God, whom they called Shang Ti, the "Heavenly Emperor." There is evidence of this in their language and their philosophy. A Chinese missionary, Dr. C.H. Kang has revealed that the earliest Chinese knew about the Creation, the Fall, the Flood, and the Tower of Babel at least five centuries before the birth of Moses.

The classical Chinese character for "to create" consists of the radicals for "dust" or "mud," a "mouth" or "person," "movement" or "life," and "able to walk"; this hidden truth remarkably reflects the biblical account of Man's creation: "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed (with His mouth) into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul (not an infant; an adult able to walk)."

The ancient Chinese were a free people offering oxen and sheep in sacrifice to God much in the same way as the ancient Hebrews. However, the Chinese were deceived into idol worship and embraced false religions such as Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism. They were then subjugated to feudalistic dynasties under many emperors for 5000 years.

The latest series of emperors were the Ming dynasty (1368-1644) and the Manchu Ch'ing dynasty (1644-1912). During this time, Europeans attempted to open up China to the West, but the Ming and Manchu rulers did all in their power to hamper Western influence. After 1860, the British were able to establish a trading colony at Hong Kong. This made it possible for missionaries to bring the gospel to China's millions. The Bible was translated into Chinese by Robert Morrison and an army of 800 missionaries caught the vision of Hudson Taylor, founder of the China Inland Mission. The gospel began to reach China's vast heartland.

In the 20th century, Nationalists led by Dr. Sun Yat-sen, a Christian man (although weak in faith), overthrew the Manchus and established the Republic of China (1911-1912). China was convulsed by civil war among competing warlords and gangs of bandits terrorized the southern countryside. Sun reorganized the Nationalist Party in 1919 and began receiving aid and advisors from Russia in 1923. Meanwhile in Russia, the Bolshevik revolution occurred. As the Communists took control of the Russian Empire, their first goal became to take China for communism. The same year that Sun died, 1925, the Communist Party was established in China. They focused on the university campuses and the youth. One of the young people the Chinese Communist Party reached was Mao Tse-tung.

Chiang Kai-shek, commander of the Chinese army became the new leader of the Nationalists. By 1927, Chiang had broken with the Russians and began the long civil war against the Chinese Communists. Chiang's hopes to unite China under Nationalist rule and to make needed economic, political and social reforms were dashed when Japan seized Manchuria in 1931 and invaded China in 1937. The civil war ceased as both Communist and Nationalist factions struggled against Japan.

After the war ended with Japan's surrender in 1945, the Chinese civil war broke out again with renewed ferocity. The Russians turned over Manchuria to Mao Tse-tung and funded the overthrow of Chiang's regime. By 1949, Mao was solidly victorious and he proclaimed: "The Chinese people have stood up at last." He proclaimed a "New China," and began a long policy of exterminating all landlords and capitalists.

From 1966 to 1976, Mao began China's "Cultural Revolution," a policy against intellectuals and religious people in China. Millions of people were killed and Mao became the greatest mass murderer in world history. During this time, young people marched in the streets holding the Little Red Book - the sayings of Chairman Mao. Millions of people worshipped Chairman Mao; the Church was persecuted, thousands of pastors were killed, church buildings were seized, and Bibles were destroyed. The Church was forced to go underground; Bibles were hand copied and memorized.

From 1960 to 1970, the older Christians - about one million believers - began to pray. The Holy Spirit was poured out on China and miracles, signs and wonders began to take place. When the Holy Spirit was poured out, many people began to reject Mao and turn back toward God. Buddhism, Taoism, and Confucianism had also been exterminated by Mao. Providentially, a spiritual vacuum had been created into which the gospel is now exploding.

Today there are an estimated 90 million Spirit-filled believers who make up China's underground House Church movement. The revival in China is a revival of young people who were born since the Communist Revolution. They have been raised to believe in Communism, evolutionism, and atheism. But today, millions of these young people are part of the "Jesus Revolution." Many former Communists are now preaching the gospel. They are calling China back to the one true God.

BEIJING, China (NNI) - Thousands of Chinese students are turning to the Christian faith in the bitter aftermath of the brutal suppression of the pro-democracy movement on June 4, 1989, but the Chinese church is experiencing difficulties discipling these new intellectual converts.

Since June 4, China's official Three-Self Protestant churches have been swamped with students inquiring about the Christian faith. In Beijing's Haidan Church, one member said, "We are mobbed; it takes me two hours to get from my pew back out the door because so many students are asking me about my faith." House church leaders in Beijing have also been inundated, "We are totally overwhelmed by the student converts," said one leader.

Sobered by the brutality of the June massacre, and disillusioned with the system that instituted it, China's students are now seeking fulfillment in a relationship with Jesus Christ. "Christianity is very realistic," said one student. "Unlike our Chinese religions, it starts from the premise that what is wrong with the world is mankind, not circumstances - this attracts us!"

A Christian professor in Beijing added, "June 4 has impressed upon the people that man is bad; but all the Chinese religions teach that man is good, so they have to turn to Christianity."

Significant outbreaks in conversions have been reported in seven cities: Beijing, Shanghai, Xian, Ningbo, Wenzhou, Fuchow, and Xiamen. According to reports by Chinese students, in at least five of these cities an estimated ten percent of the student body has turned to Christianity.

The student revival is so immense that government sanctioned churches are having difficulty coping with the number of student converts. Most of the students do not appear to be settling in the government-sanctioned Three-Self Protestant churches. Complaining of shallow teaching, students are moving on to house churches where they say they receive more substantial pulpit instruction.

Difficulties have arisen in house churches now flooded with students. Leaders say that it is not just because of the difficulties in discipling so many at once, but in coping with the peculiar needs of recently converted intellectuals. Other house church leaders confess they are unable to answer many of the specific queries of the new converts, and are urgently calling for the delivery of apologetic literature. Some students in Beijing have even resorted to hand-copying key apologetic works.

Spiritual Hunger Sparks Revival

Among Chinese Intellectuals

3/90

"It's all because those soldiers on June 4th used real bullets to shoot the people. If they had used rubber bullets there would be no revival among the students today."

- Beida University Student

Behind these emotional words, spoken in December by a young man called Jiang, a recently converted student from China's premier Beida University, lies a brilliantly cogent argument - one which goes at least some way to accounting for a remarkable phenomenon in modern China. Namely, the turning of thousands of Chinese intellectuals away from a Maoist to a Christian faith.

Because the Chinese government put down the pro-democracy movement with such ferocity and cruelty, China's students saw two truths clearly for the first time in their lives, which set them on the road to Christianity.

First, they saw that the Chinese Communist Party could no longer be trusted. "Before June 4, we were all quite 'pink' in our attitude to the government. We were the elite of society, and hoped to receive the plum placements in China at the end of our courses," said Jiang.

"To be rebuffed with such murderous ferocity by a government we thought was flexible enough to make real changes woke us up to the fact that we must no longer have any faith in the system."

The disillusion was bitter. As a Christian teacher involved in the demonstrations said in December, "We are all still in a state of shock. It never crossed our minds that the government would do such a terrible thing as order the army to mow down defenseless civilians."

The second truth that dawned on Jiang was a startlingly simple one: People are evil. Yet in a Chinese context, this is a radical conclusion. As a Christian professor in Beijing said, "All our religions for the past 5,000 years, including Maoism, teach that man is basically good, and only circumstances make him bad."

"We saw pure evil ..."

The brutality of the massacres in Tiananmen square was inexplicable to the Chinese people. "We saw pure evil," said a Beijing surgeon, "and it horrified us." Fright, horror, fear, and shock are still written on the faces of the Beijing student population eight months later.

One young woman said, "In our dorm we heard that the PLA was shooting students, but that seemed ridiculous, so I went to the square with my boyfriend." She related, with tearful eyes, how she watched him approach a soldier to ask about the reports, then saw him wheel around in terror. He was shot in the back of the head at point blank range.

Sobered by the carnage, and disillusioned with the system that instituted it, students began to look for spiritual comfort. But which religion should they choose?

Jiang explained, "We could not try any of the Chinese religions like Confucianism, Taoism or even Buddhism, because they were based on a premise that people are morally good!" He said, "I turned to Christianity because it seemed the only realistic religion ... it told us we had evil tendencies, but that this evil could be conquered."

Are claims of revival far-fetched?

Admitting his argument is in no way a complete explanation of why China's students are converting to Christianity, is Jiang's claim of revival far-fetched?

According to Dr. Leslie Francis, a Christian academic specializing in Chinese intellectual history, and a visitor to Beijing in December, "The turning of students to Christianity since June 4 involves not merely hundreds, but thousands throughout China." She added, I would rate this as one of the most significant periods in the history of Chinese intellectualism."

Sources among the student population confirm this turning. Students have indicated that at several of China's most prominent universities, as much as 10 percent of the student body has been converted to Christianity. In some cases, entire dorms or even faculties have become Christian.

A veteran foreign teacher related how he attended church in July and was pinned to his seat after the service for two hours by inquisitive students asking questions about his faith. He said, "In five years in China, I have never seen anything like it. It was an explosion of interest in the Christian faith, and all the Three-Self churches I know here are just overwhelmed by the numbers coming to the services."

The Christian broadcasting company, Trans World Radio, reported it had received a letter from a member of the Hua Xiang Three-Self church in Fuchow sharing that a staggering 8,000 students had come to that church since June 4, inquiring about the Christian faith.

House church leaders in the major cities also report being inundated with converted students asking to be disciplined. A leader of a large house church in northern Beijing said, "Frankly, we cannot cope with the disciplining of these new converts."

Even the press is starting to notice. In fact, they have been the first to use the term "revival." In the Chinese language newspaper Ming Bao in Hong Kong, it was reported, "There has been a revival of religious interest in China ... more students are going to church at Christmas time than ever before."

A new phenomenon among Chinese intellectuals

The teachings of Jesus Christ have attracted thousands of battered and disillusioned students. A Beijing professor contends that "students are attracted to the twin notions of absolute truth and unconditional love that are enshrined in the Christian faith."

To a people weary of the relativism and the constant revision of Marxist tenets, to say nothing of their distaste for the lying that is so much a part of life, a religion which professes to have truth which is intrinsically objective, unalterable, and pure, is indeed a great attraction. As one student said, "I cannot tell you what a relief it is not to have to believe a lie, or live a lie anymore!"

China's intellectuals are becoming Christians in unprecedented numbers today. In Chinese intellectual history, and in Chinese Christian history, this represents a completely new phenomenon.

It remains to be seen whether traditional house churches can provide a suitable context for nurturing the majority of these new intellectual converts. It could be that an entirely new strand of Chinese Christianity has come into being as a result of the tragic events of 1989 - a strand that will stand on its own.

The difference these new believers may make to the fabric of Chinese society could be crucial, especially in these uncertain days. Dr. Leslie Francis envisages a bloody overthrow of the Chinese government sometime in the next two years. She argues, "All the elements that historically signal the end of a dynasty are in place - rural discontent, urban unrest, military regionalism, economic stagnation, and an inept government.

Yet there is a new factor which may sway the inexorable laws of history. Speaking to intellectuals in 1977, a certain Chinese philosopher asked, "Why was MAO so great?", and answered, "Because we were all kneeling down." China's intellectuals are kneeling down again in 1990, but this time no longer to Mao, but to Jesus Christ.

HONG KONG (NNI) - Over 1,000 foreigners are teaching English inside China today, and the vast majority of them are evangelical Christians. Indeed, according to Thomas Lawrence, coordinator of a training agency for Christian teachers about to enter China, this is an imbalance preferred by Chinese educational authorities.

"In one major city," Lawrence said, "if an applicant leaves blank the section on religion in the application form, the Chinese automatically reject that person. They prefer Christians."

Over the past few years, as China has opened up and invited English teachers as well as foreign professionals to work in the country, Christians have impressed the Chinese authorities in two major ways. First, they have higher moral standards than many of their non-Christian counterparts. Second, they are often more willing to cope with the primitive and frustrating conditions that accompany teaching inside China.

Lawrence said a teacher in China today has to handle a bewildering array of problems ranging from electricity blackouts during classes and shortages of suitable textbooks, to poor living conditions and social isolation. But by far the greatest frustrations occur in the classroom situation. Said Lawrence, "It is quite common to be asked to teach oral English in a class of 25, when the maximum for an oral class should be no higher than six."

Asked if any Christian teachers had been thrown out of the country for sharing their faith, Lawrence replied, "If they preach the gospel in place of teaching English they may be ejected, and this has happened in a very few cases." He stressed that their ejection stemmed basically from failing to do the job they were hired to do. He added, "Witnessing should be outside the classroom context, occurring naturally as friendships are made with the students."

China continues to present an open door to Christian professionals who are dedicated to their field of work, able to endure hardship, and content to share their faith with discernment.

Tiananmen Square Massacre

6/89

The drama unfolding in the People's Republic of China before the watching world is not only setting the stage for a political revolution ... it is signaling a spiritual awakening of massive proportions. Influenced by a fast-growing Christian revival, as well as by the Christian ideas of Western democracy, Chinese young people are now questioning Marxist ideology - and they are making it clear to their elders that they are willing to die for their beliefs.

Ever since the Cultural Revolution, youth under age 18 have not been allowed to attend an official church, read the Bible, or be baptized. The combination of a lack of spiritual values, discontent with the tenets and ideas of the Communist Party, and increasing openness to Western ideas, is now driving the youth and workers alike to the streets of Beijing to demonstrate for democracy.

A Beijing missionary who was imprisoned for 10 years in a labor camp for his beliefs said recent events in China are an encouraging sign of increasing openness to Christianity. The missionary, who could not disclose his name, helped start several underground "fellowships" on Beijing campuses. Although the pro-democracy movement is not yet inundated by Christians, he said the youth are "opening up their minds." Chinese Christians are supportive of the new movement.

The last few months of protest has been considered one of the most extraordinary events to be witnessed in any Communist country, and "the biggest display of defiance in the 40-year history of Communist China," according to the Washington Post. "This was a major breakthrough in modern Chinese history," said Roderick Macfarquahar, director of Harvard's Fairbank Center for East Asian Research. He said it was the first time since 1949 that a demonstration by society against the state was made successfully in the face of a powerful government.

The recent carnage in Beijing left an estimated 3000 people dead and 12,000 wounded, and plunged the nation into massive upheaval. According to latest reports a key army unit was fighting against another unit.

Students told reporters that soldiers stacked the bodies killed in Tiananmen Square into a pile, doused them with gasoline and cremated them, which made it impossible to identify the bodies or keep a tally of the dead.

A price is being paid for demonstrating. After General Secretary Zhao Zinyang indicated his support for the students, he was put under house arrest. He also made a comment on national television about political reform needing to be in step with economic reform. After a week of being under arrest, Zhao was reinstated in his position. Some observers have said that Chairman Deng Xiaoping was using Zhao as a scapegoat. Zhao was reported as saying to a student on a hunger strike, "I came too late, too late. I should be criticized by you."

The student-led protest forced officials to alter Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's schedule during the historic Sino-Soviet Summit in May, although the students indicated in a letter that they supported Gorbachev's reforms in the Soviet Union. Gorbachev didn't take sides in the hunger strike or the demonstrations, but he told a Chinese reporter that the demonstrations made him "nervous," and urged officials to negotiate a settlement of the crisis.

In the second massive demonstration, Chinese government staff and workers joined the students for the first time. "With corrupt internal affairs, how can we talk about foreign affairs?" said a banner carried by staff members of the Foreign Ministry. Workers were warned for several weeks not to participate in marches because they could lose their jobs. But the threats did not stop them. "We support the students and are not afraid of being fired," chanted workers from a Beijing heavy crane factory. They were joined by workers from several hotels and soldiers of the People's Liberation Army who left their detachment to join the demonstration. "If your sister or brother were in the square, what would you do?" one of the soldiers told the Washington Post.

"Give me Liberty or Give me Death"

The sons and daughters of intellectuals and government officials who are members of the Communist party have started one of the largest movements for democracy in recent Chinese history - a movement which has grown in the last few months from being a nuisance to a catalyst for splits within the Beijing leadership. As an Associated Press reporter wrote, "They are (China's) future scientists, writers, teachers and diplomats. And they are calling for a new China, one that is democratic, one with a free press and one that respects human rights."

One of the student movement's most prominent spokesmen, Wuerkiaxi, said he could be sentenced to jail for 10 years or death. But he says he cannot stop mobilizing opposition to corruption, bureaucracy, and the lack of democracy. His father, a communist cadre who edits and writes for a living, cries for his son everyday and urges him to stop his rebellious activities. Wuerkiaxi's sentiments regarding the party are a reflection of a new generation of Chinese youth.

Another student, the son of a county official in China's northwest, says, "This is not the China that I want to be a part of." Li Quiang grew up with privileges due to his father's position in the party: "There were big meals, TV sets. We never paid for anything. Last month we got a new video [VCR]; now we have three," he said. "I didn't think this was strange until I left home and found out that governments aren't supposed to work like that." One of his classmates, the daughter of a doctor, agreed with Li: "I know I don't understand democracy. But my worry now is not with the future, it's with the present. We have a system that is rotten."

campuses and several other cities jammed into Tiananmen Square for a hunger strike. The demonstration was the climax of protest activity which started in April with over 150,000 students marching on the square, the symbolic center of Beijing, to demand democratic reforms.

Prior to the hunger strike, students led an 11-day campaign which began spontaneously as a 10-mile march from Beijing University to Tiananmen Square. Shouting "Rang kai, rang kai," ("Give way! Give way!") through a barricade of over 100 police and a battalion of soldiers, student delegations from over 30 campuses poured into the square bearing signs trumpeting their demands for more democracy, less corruption, and accurate press coverage.

They were cheered on by crowds of office workers who lined the streets, climbed trees, threw food, and blocked troops from approaching them. Thousands of non-students also joined them despite official warnings. Beijing residents said the army and security forces had made their greatest show of force in recent memory. "We all want political change," a middle-aged office worker told Newsweek. "We are all fed up with the government's mistakes."

The students and workers were responding to a scathing editorial published in The People's Daily which denounced the movement by saying they were creating a conspiracy to "poison people's minds, create national turmoil and sabotage the nation's political stability." Days before the Beijing march, 10,000 local party leaders gathered in the Great Hall of the People and listened to a tape of Deng's announcement that, "We must crack down on these students whatever the cost." He was quoted as saying, "I had hoped that I wouldn't have to spill blood. But if we have to do so, then we will."

But the students still nervously rallied. "Without democracy, it would be better to be dead," said a 26-year-old graduate student of politics. Another student shouted, "We've been under a communist system for 40 years, and we're still living in hell! Why can they have democracy in America, and we can't have it here?" On an ABC newscast, Chinese students read a line from the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal ..."

Revolution and Revival

The ideas which fomented revolution within the hearts of the Chinese students were from various Western writers and civil rights activists. On several banners were emblazoned slogans from Patrick Henry, such as his famous cry, "Give me Liberty or Give me Death!" Considering themselves patriots, the students quoted Abraham Lincoln and Thomas Jefferson as well as the Chinese Constitution.

"Certainly there is a generous mix of ingredients fueling Chinese discontent," said David Hardin, a senior news analyst. "There is the Gorbachev model of political reforms within a communist state - surely the envy of would-be Chinese reformers. There is, in a manner that cannot be calculated, the influence of thousands of Chinese who have studied abroad - some 40,000 are currently attending U.S. colleges - and who have returned with their quotes from Patrick Henry."

But it is not only political revolution brewing among Chinese youth. A spiritual revival is underway. After Hu Yaobang was ousted, government policy towards church activities became more restrictive. Conservative Maoist forces within the Communist Party campaigned against Western influences and, as a result, several Christians were persecuted.

Despite the repressive measures, such as the state policy which does not allow youth under 18 to attend church activities, some young people have been arrested and beaten for preaching the Christian gospel. Ever-increasing numbers of Chinese are being drawn to Christianity. Not only is the political conscience of the students being awakened, especially by writings from the West, but their curiosity about Christian values is being aroused like never before. The world is now seeing the truth of the words of the Apostle Paul written in the First Century: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Corinthians 3:17). The great outpouring of the Holy Spirit which has been taking place in China in recent years is now manifesting itself in the political realm.

In many provinces, young Chinese are laying down their lives for the gospel. An example is a 14-year-old girl who was senselessly beaten for preaching. Leona Choy, a missionary, described the scene to Christian Mission: "When she revived, she sensed that her beating had won the sympathy of many onlookers. So she began to preach some more. Her words were few and her voice low, but what she said penetrated hearts. The people began crying out, repenting of their sins, and asking Jesus to save them," Choy said.

Ten young Christian men and women went to a commune to preach but were dragged and beaten by police with electric shock sticks. "The power of God came forth as they preached with tears streaming down their faces. Passers-by and street vendors, Christians and non-Christians alike, stood and listened. People came under conviction. Even the fortune tellers were moved by the Holy Spirit and burst into sobs. Many forgot their food, their work, or even to return home."

Choy told Christian Mission, "Even though the young preachers were exhausted, the crowd would not let them quit. As shops closed and factories let out, hundreds of employees joined the crowd. This was too much for the authorities. They laid hands on the preachers, dragged them away one by one, bound them with ropes, and began beating them. They slapped their faces with shoes and knocked them unconscious. But every time the young people came to, they resumed praying, singing and preaching."

This type of determination and resolve is apparently at the root of the Chinese student uprising. A Beijing missionary said that the student movement is "definitely beneficial for Christians. Religious activity is under state control, but the police are too busy dealing with political demonstrations to exercise church control." Since the Communists came to power in China, Christianity has grown exponentially. "There are 30 to 50 times more Christians," said one Beijing source. "There are 30 to 50 million Christians, and we're definitely seeing a revival among the underground churches."

What will be the final outcome? It is most likely that within a few more years the repressive communist system in China will be quietly swallowed up by the growing Christian movement. A new generation of young Chinese leaders, motivated by new-found ideas of Christian liberty and individual freedom, will then begin to construct a new society built on Christian principles.

Youth Revival in the People's Republic of China

By Jay Rogers

Reported by Dennis Balcombe

"Look among the nations! Observe!
Be astonished! Wonder!
Because I am doing something in your days -
You would not believe if you were told."
- Habakkuk 1:5

God is presently doing a marvelous and amazing work in the People's Republic of China.

A young preacher stands before a packed underground house church in the Zhenping district in Henan, China. "We can see that God is already working," he exclaims. All around him young people sit on the floor of the packed room looking up at him attentively.

"The time has come - We must preach the gospel - We must rise up and make warfare for the Lord - We have to go forth in the name of the Lord and heal the sick - We must now rise up and cause the gospel to burn throughout this land!"

The crowd bursts into singing but is not led by a choir or music group. People from the congregation take turns leading the singing. The worship and praise lasts for over an hour.

This is known as the House Church movement - there are now tens of thousands of unregistered churches like this one throughout the People's Republic of China. These Christians are often young and have an intense love for the Lord and each other. House meetings are usually packed - sometimes throughout several rooms. The time is spent taking bread and grape juice in communion with God, preaching, singing psalms, hymns and praise songs - and joyfully singing and dancing which can last for hours.

When these Christians meet they take communion remembering the Lord's death and resurrection, but also signifying that they are one body. All the Christians of this district are truly one. This is a church movement that exists without denominations, divisions or ministry positions. There are no titles of prestige here; each believer sees himself as a servant of Jesus Christ; they simply call themselves "brothers," and "sisters" in the Lord. The believers meet from house to house, district to district, and see themselves as one church. Preachers are sent out to travel in other regions of China and preach the gospel. Many new believers are being added each day and new house churches are being planted.

During the past few years, one of the greatest outpourings of the Holy Spirit in history has been witnessed in China - it is estimated that there are now between 90 to 100 million Christians attending the house churches.

The Chinese revival is a revival of young people. Those who were born since the communist revolution in 1948 are turning to God each day by the thousands. All over China thousands of young people are entering the ministry to preach the gospel.

* One 16-year-old girl gave her life to preaching the gospel. She witnessed to her music teacher in school. He gave his life to the Lord and also entered the ministry.

* Another young brother had a tremendous hunger for the Word of God. He began praying and was provided with a Bible (a rare possession since Bibles are restricted by the communist government). He began memorizing portions of scripture and now travels from district to district preaching.

* Many children are being filled with the Holy Spirit, pray in public, and evangelize their schoolmates.

* A thirteen-year-old girl travels with other evangelists and shares the gospel with children she meets in other villages.

* A 20-year-old woman talks about her experiences in evangelism and the people she has seen miraculously healed. She started preaching when she was fifteen.

God is using young people at this time. In village after village, house churches are springing up and it is happening through the preaching of young people. The Chinese say that this is a fulfillment of Joel chapter two: "And it will come about after this that I will pour out My Spirit on all mankind; and your sons and daughters shall prophesy. Your old men will dream dreams and your young men will see visions" (Joel 2:28).

In the past few years, the Church in China has been stripped of all religious traditions of both East and West. The Chinese are returning to the Christianity exemplified in the New Testament.

In one district of central China there has been tremendous growth of the house churches. In 1976, there were only two Christians in this region and they had been converted before the Maoist revolution in 1949. Now there are 10,000 Christians in this area. This work was pioneered by two Christian men who came from a distant city to preach. When praying for two people to receive the Holy Spirit, the people started speaking in tongues. The onlookers were amazed. When other instances of miraculous healings took place, the entire village was converted. This revival has since spread throughout many other villages in this region.

This revival has not come without persecution from communist government authorities. One 22-year-old sister from one of these villages was put in prison in the summer of 1990 for holding a house meeting.

While she was in prison 70 people and two of the prison guards accepted Christ.

Another 26-year-old preacher was forced to march in the streets by the authorities with a sign around his neck reading: "This man has been using religious superstition to promote counter-revolutionary activities."

But today many former communists are giving their lives to Jesus Christ. The Chinese Christians are not discouraged by the persecution. They are praying for their government leaders to know Christ.

This has happened, in the words of the Apostle Paul, "to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed, through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God" (Romans 15:18,19).

Back to The Forerunner!

Four Centuries of Faith at Harvard

By Jay Rogers

3/93

"After God had carried us safe to New England, and had builded our houses, provided necessities for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship, and settled the civil government: one of the next things we longed for, and looked after was to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity; dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches when our present ministers shall lie in the dust."

This 17th century passage is familiar to all Harvard undergraduates, the words being inscribed on the northern panel of the Johnson Gates leading into Harvard Yard. This passage is taken from New England's First Fruits, published by Samuel Eliot Morrison. It is the earliest account of Harvard which appeared in London in 1643. This same document cites the rules and precepts of Harvard:

"Let every student be plainly instructed and earnestly pressed to consider well the main end of his life and studies is to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternal life, John 17:3 and therefore to lay Christ in the bottom, as the only foundation of all sound knowledge and learning."

The founders of Harvard were, of course, the Puritans. Far from being the reactionary, dogmatic, judgmental, intolerant primitives, that modern students often imagine, these were an enlightened people who wished to cast off the darkness of Europe's feudal past and forge a new type of society. They imagined that they were building the New Jerusalem and ushering in the Golden Age.

Samuel Eliot Morison, foremost Harvard historian, describes their ideology as follows: "The Puritan creed ... stimulated mental activity on the part of those who professed it," with the ministers maintaining "Open-minded and receptive attitudes toward scientific discoveries." The Puritan religion provided the "dynamic motive for the intellectual movement in New England ..."

Far from being ethereal mystics, the Puritans believed that Truth, in part, was knowable through the five senses and through empirical research and reasoning. But the idea that all Truth was knowable could only be fathomed in the realm of Faith, they argued. Visitors to Harvard need only to view the Harvard seal on one of the gates to see this illustrated. A stone rendering of the Harvard seal portrays three books - two are set faced up, while the third is displayed face down. A people who viewed all symbols as having great meaning no doubt meant this third book to signify the Truth that was hidden from reason. This was the Truth that could come only through divine revelation or Faith.

Before we dismiss the Harvard founders as being crude and unsophisticated, we should remember that it was their form of civil government, although not perfected, which became the working model for the world's first successful democracy. This form of government is being imitated all over the world in our day.

The Puritans' search for Truth and the perfect society, though unrealized, should be viewed with admiration to all who pass through Harvard's gates, or by anyone who enjoys a measure of liberty in today's world. They were truly prophets having foresight four centuries beyond their time.

Steps Toward Academic Excellence

A visiting author teaches students "How to study smarter - not harder - and get straight "A's"

GAINESVILLE, Florida (FR) - When Richard Little was a college freshman in 1982 at the University of Miami, he took 12 courses and managed only one "A" during the entire year. A bright student, he resolved to try harder the next year. However, he managed only two "A's" in all 12 courses the second time around.

Having learned that he could earn "C's" with little effort, he was baffled as to why much effort yielded the same results. He knew that it wasn't because of his intelligence level, so he embarked on a search to discover the answer to his dilemma. After hanging around with some "A" students, he found, to his amazement, that they didn't study any harder than he did! What was it that made the difference?

During the next three years, he learned the secret to success. Little decided he would put all of this material in a no-frills study guide, The Smarter Student: How to Study Smarter, Not Harder, and Get Straight A's. This guide includes information on: the education system, the fundamentals, good study habits, study secrets, how to read a book, how to write a research paper, how to take a test, stress, and a direct and sensible way which insures success.

Little believes that most students have the ability to receive "A's" in 90% of his classes. Speaking recently at the University of Florida in Gainesville, Little's seminar was so popular that many students were turned away due to overcrowding. At the seminar, he outlined his method of success which consisted of (1) taking action consistently, (2) viewing failure as opportunity, and (3) focusing on the positive.

Little's 40 page booklet is available for $5.95 plus $1.90 shipping, by writing to Student Publications, 3555 NW Federal Hwy Suite 100, Jensen Beach, FL 34957.

America's Best Colleges

A U.S. News and World Report Special Issue (October 15, 1990) included an annual ranking of America's best colleges. The system used to rank 1374 four-year colleges was based on a numerical score representing the quality of academic reputation, student selectivity, faculty resources and student satisfaction.

The top 25 big universities and small colleges were chosen in view of the overall quality of each school. These were institutions which had "first-class students, top faculty and a reputation for excellence." Most of these schools could also be called "the most famous schools in America."

The best big universities were chosen for a blend of matchless scholarship and research and a superb range of academic choices. The top ten, in order of rank, were: Harvard, Stanford, Yale, Princeton, California Institute of Technology, MIT, Duke, Dartmouth, Cornell and Columbia.

Choosing Harvard as the country's leading university may seem a bit redundant. However, this is the first time since 1983 that Harvard has finished first on U.S. News' list. Founded in 1636 as a school for ministers, Harvard is both the richest and oldest learning institution in the country. The campus sprawls along the Charles River in both Cambridge and Boston and boasts 10 graduate schools and more than 90 libraries. The university has been a pioneer in innovative education since its beginning and has provided the training ground for the nation's political and intellectual establishment.

In choosing the top 25 best small colleges, the same criteria was applied. To many, small, liberal arts colleges represent what higher education is all about. The top ten small colleges were: Amherst, Swarthmore, Williams, Bowdoin, Wellesley, Pomona, Wesleyan (CT), Middlebury, Smith, and (tied in a three-way place for tenth) Davidson, Vassar and Carleton.

Amherst College had a strong showing in the intellectual achievement of the students. According to one Amherst College professor, the students arrive with a self-confidence that comes from prior academic success and readily adapt to the method of Socratic debate that is the backbone of most of the school's courses. Nestled in the picturesque Pioneer Valley of Western Massachusetts, Amherst College shares the academic resources of four other schools in the area, in a consortium which provides the greatest range of interdisciplinary programs available anywhere in the country.

The educational institutions of our country provide the foundation for our quality of life. New discoveries, expert knowledge and highly trained people are the contributions to our society that these institutions produce. Significantly, the two winners in this year's U.S. News survey, Harvard and Amherst have notable histories as Christian institutions.

Although the students and faculties of these two schools may have forgotten, Harvard was founded "For Christ and the Church," and Amherst's frequent revivals in the early history of the school made the college one of the focal points of the Great Awakening in the 1800s. These schools remain great today because God Himself had a hand in bringing them into being.

Banning Prayer in Public Schools Has Led to America's Demise

A recent statistical analysis by David Barton graphically illustrates how America has plummeted from righteous living, prosperity and success in the last quarter century. Consider the following chart compiled from his study, America: To Pray or Not to Pray. 1

As you might have already noticed on Mr. Barton's graph, America's moral decline rapidly accelerated following one event - the U.S. Supreme Court's removal of prayer from our nation's schools. On June 25, 1962, 39 million students were forbidden to do what they and their predecessors had been doing since the founding of our nation - publicly calling upon the name of the Lord at the beginning of each school day.

The New York school children which prompted the Engel vs. Vitale ruling had simply prayed: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence on Thee and beg Thy blessing over us, our parents, our teachers and our nation."

America has experienced radical decline in each of the four areas which the children's prayer touched upon: youth, family, education, national life. Minor recovery has occurred only since 1980 when the election of President Reagan brought forth a renewed emphasis on "traditional" values.

The removal of prayer from our schools was a violation of the third commandment which commands us "not to take the name of the Lord in vain." By the judicial act of forbidding invocation, the Court audaciously elevated a secularized system of education beyond the authority, reach and blessing of God Himself. Worse than taking the Lord's sacred name in vain is treating it with contempt, denying it rightful place and stripping it from public use and even from the lips of children. Jesus' own expressed desire, "Let the little children come to Me, and do not forbid them" was also violated by these judges, many of whom were raised in Christian homes.

But there was actually a gross violation of the third commandment by the U.S. Supreme Court a year earlier. A ruling in 1961, I believe, paved the way for stripping the Lord's name from our children's lips. In Torcaso vs. Watkins, the court overruled a provision of the Maryland Constitution which made "a declaration of belief in the existence of God" mandatory for holding public office.

Roy R. Torcaso, a Maryland resident and an avowed atheist, was refused a notary public commission when he would not subscribe to the required oath. His case was brought before the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court ruled to sanction atheism and overruled the Maryland Constitution.

Rev. T. Robert Ingram records columnist Felix Morley's shrewd observations on this 1961 ruling in his study, The World Under God's Law. Mr. Morley, writing in the Nation's Business September 1961, pointed out "the absurdity of having an official administer to others oaths in the sanctity of which he does not himself believe."

The effect of this ruling is not just to eat away at the sacredness of the name of God, but to eliminate the sacredness and thereby the substance of the oath itself. With solemn oaths and binding contracts between individuals removed, the state eventually sits where God ought, and only the state's cause is held valid. There is no longer an absolute and just legal basis for judging "between a man and his brother," much less a man and his neighbor (Deuteronomy 1:16, 17). All affairs of life become subject to state, rather than individual control.

Rev. Ingram documents and points out that "a broad, organized attack reaching into high places is under way to remove the third commandment from legal standing in the United States and throughout the world." He points out that, "the World Court, for example, presumably the new fountain of justice, or a prototype of the socialist dream of world government, has no provision for 'taking the name of God' - no oath." The Socialist agenda of world domination makes no place for solemn "swearing" between individuals.

Jesus' teaching on oath-taking recorded in Matthew 5:33-37, while often misinterpreted, is actually a strong affirmation of the third commandment and a clear warning that "the Lord will not hold him guiltless who takes His name in vain" (Exodus 20:7).

Besides forbidding perjury, (calling God to witness a lie) and false swearing, this passage also forbids all rash and unnecessary swearing, and especially warns against promissory oaths - that require a performance. Our "Yes" should be "Yes," and our "No" should mean "No." If understood, our word uttered in integrity should of itself be a sufficient and proper bond.

The "evangelical prophet," Oswald Chambers (1874 - 1917), saw that the empty promises made by so many Christians actually result in great "spiritual leakage." He admonished his followers: "Always beware of vowing, it is a risky thing. If you promise to do a thing and don't do it, it means the weakening of your moral nature. We are all so glib in the way we promise and don't perform and never realize that it is sapping our moral energy."²

Think then, what happens to a nation rife with perjury, broken marriage covenants, unforgiveness, cults with demonic covenants, extortion, bribery, libel, slander, profanity, hypocrisy, idle talk, and lawsuits initiated solely for revenge and personal gain. We are living witnesses that truly "the Lord does not hold such a nation guiltless."

Regardless of how the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled, we must each, as Oswald Chambers declared, realize that "God's laws are not watered down to suit anyone; if God did that He would cease to be God. The moral law never alters for the noblest or the weakest; it remains abidingly and eternally the same."

After more than 25 years of severe moral decline is it not time to repent, reverence the name of the Lord, reinstitute and keep the third commandment?

British Education: Keeping The Faith

By Garry J. Moes

LONDON (CR) - Of all the remarkable achievements marking Britain's conservative shift, few are more stunning than a recent act of Parliament requiring state education in the United Kingdom to be distinctly Christian in character.

The new law went into effect September 5th, following several months of negotiation over wording designed to guarantee respect for other faiths. The legislation, contained in amendments to Britain's long-standing Education Reform Bill, was spearheaded by the Conservative Family Campaign, a Christian action group headquartered in Surrey.

Specifically, it requires that compulsory religious education in state schools be "in the main Christian" and that the daily act of worship in state schools likewise be Christian in character. The legislation includes "provisions and caveats" for students from non-Christian faiths, according to Graham Webster-Gardiner, chairman of the Conservative Family Campaign.

Nearly as noteworthy as the legislation itself was the alignment of forces for and against the pro-Christian amendments, officially sponsored in the House of Lords by Baroness Caroline Cox. Not so surprising was the opposition of Britain's socialist Labor Party and a variety of liberal church interests who saw the legislation as a threat to religious pluralism. What was truly remarkable was the support given by key leaders of non-Christian faiths whose interests allegedly would be jeopardized by the new law.

Among such supporters was Lord Jakobovits, chief rabbi of the House of Lords, who underscored the sweeping significance of the legislation during floor debate in the upper house. "If we consider religious faith and precept as the spiritual lifeblood of the nation and all its citizens ... indiscriminate mixing of blood can prove dangerous and so can the mixing of faiths in education," Lord Jakobovits said.

He offered as an example of how that principle applies to Jews the testimony of Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, principal of Jews' College. In a radio meditation, Rabbi Sacks described how he was raised at a primary school which was devoutly Church of England and where Jewish boys had their separate Jewish assemblies.

Rabbi Sacks related: "The effect of this schooling on our Jewish identity was curious. It made us, of course, acutely aware that we were different. But because those around us were taking their religion seriously, it made us consider our Judaism seriously, too ... So it isn't strange that all this produced a rabbi. From living with those who valued their traditions, I learned to cherish my own."

Lord Jakobovits noted that two Newcastle teachers had complained in a report called "Crisis in Religious Education" that today's school children have been losing the chance to grow as practicing Christians. "They might, I think, have gone further still; for if Christianity suffers, so, in a curious way, does every other faith as well," Rabbi Jakobovits observed.

Graham Webster-Gardiner said the opposition of liberal churchmen showed "how riddled the Body of Christ is with secular humanism not only in the apostate Church but seemingly reliable organizations. It just emphasizes the necessity for Conservative Family Campaign to exist and how vital it is for us to continue to speak out for Christian values and standards in society."

Baroness Cox, in promoting the measure, said, "Many parents and teachers had been expressing grave concern over what has been happening in many schools, where religious education and worship have either become secularized and politicized, or been transformed into a confusing multifaith mixture which does justice to no faith and may destroy all faith."

During debate, Lord Home said claims by some members of Parliament and certain church leaders that Britain is no longer a Christian country were "too facile a judgment." Noting that Britain has an established church headed by the queen and that Parliament itself begins its daily proceedings with the prayer "Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings ..." Lord Home concluded: "All that is not a sham. It is real, and our young people ought to know the story of Christianity and the commitment of their predecessors to its values. Far too many of them do not know about that today."

While the United States has from its beginning vigorously avoided an "established" church, Lord Home's conclusion is clearly applicable to the American situation as well. For without a doubt, the United States was founded and built upon the same Christian commitment and values, vital roots which have been totally severed from the public educational nourishment of American schoolchildren.

Lord Charteris of Amisfield (Independent) told his peers that there is grave danger in a "multifaith approach" to education.

"I think it is a mistake and dangerously wishy-washy," he said. "It is absolutely right that children should learn about faiths other than their own and learn to respect them. But, unless they really know one, they will not really know anything worth knowing about any. I believe we have a great opportunity to redeem the past. If we fail to grasp it, future generations will not easily forgive us."

Viscount Buckmaster, claiming to speak for Britain's Moslems, said adherents of Islam also supported Lady Cox's amendments because "Moslems feel very strongly that Christian education in our schools should be given a more positive image."

Lord Thorneycroft, a Conservative Party member, said the floor speech given by the chief rabbi highlighted the fact that the legislation does not require "Jews to become Christians, but ... Christians to become Christians. With the West Indians clamoring for it, with the Moslems praying for it, and with the Jews urging it in this House, what case is there for not having Christian education in the schools?"

"What is the alternative? I ask that deep thought be given to this matter. The amendment [offered] by Lady Cox goes to the root of the alternative, which is some kind of multifaith education. The Chief Rabbi called it a 'kind of religious cocktail.' The right reverend Prelate the Bishop of London said that he is nervous of compulsion. So am I. I would be most nervous of compelling people to have a multifaith education."

Christian education advocates in America, Australia, France, Scandinavia and other highly secularized or pagan lands may consider the adoption of legislation similar to the British amendments a virtual impossibility. But those with such despairing views should consider the spiritual climate in Great Britain a few years ago, and even today. If such a step can be accomplished in a nation whose population has been regarded as overwhelmingly apathetic or hostile to true faith for many decades, it can surely be accomplished in countries, such as the United States, where vast majorities still claim a Christian faith and millions actively pursue it for the reconstruction of their society.

A Brief History of Christian Influence in U.S. Colleges

Harvard had been founded in 1636 by Puritan Calvinists who recognized the necessity for training up a clergy if the new Bible commonwealth was to flourish in the wilderness.

Since 1620, some 17,000 Puritans had migrated to New England, and they wanted ministers who were able to expound the Scriptures from the original Hebrew and Greek, as well as be familiar with what the church fathers, scholastic philosophers and reformists had written in Greek and Latin.

The kind of teaching that Harvard College was to provide was spelled out in its "Rules and Precepts" as follows:

Let every Student be plainly instructed, and earnestly pressed to consider well, the maine end of his life and studies is, to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternal life, John 17:3, and therefore to lay Christ in the bottome, as the only foundation of all found knowledge and Learning...

Secularization of the American university begin with the takeover of Harvard by the Unitarians in 1805. Actually, the Unitarian takeover was preceded by a protracted struggle between orthodoxy and liberalism, which began in 1701 when Increase Mather stepped down from the presidency. The liberals, who had obtained a definite majority in the governing Corporation, elected John Leverett as president of Harvard College. Leverett, a religious liberal and a layman, set the college on its course away from Calvinist orthodoxy.

Gentlemen vs. Scholars

Under Leverett, Harvard became known as a place where young men became gentlemen rather than scholars. Leverett differed from his predecessors, who regarded Harvard merely as a seminary for orthodox Congregational ministers. According to Samuel Eliot Morison's Three Centuries of Harvard:

Former presidents liked to refer to Harvard men in commencement orations and the like by the Old Testament phrase filli prophetarum, "Sons of the Prophets." Leverett called the alumni harvardinates, or "Sons of Harvard."

It was also under Leverett that Harvard began attracting the unfavorable attention of the press, which reported on students living "in riot and luxury." Leverett's own diary reveals that the faculty was having plenty of trouble with "profane swearing," "riotous Actions," and "bringing Cards into the College." An undergraduate's diary of the time notes that the students were frequently slipping off to Boston for horse races, private hangings, and other diversions. Liberalism was already producing its inevitable by-products.

In 1720, Thomas Hollis, a London merchant, endowed the Hollis Professorship of Divinity, Harvard's first professorial chair; in 1721, Edward Wigglesworth, a talented young cleric, was appointed to it. Although Wigglesworth satisfied the orthodox members of the Corporation as to his adherence to Calvinist doctrine, he soon showed his true colors. Morison writes:

One of the first theologians in New England who dared publicly to challenge the "five points of Calvinism," he employed the deadly method of doubt in inquiry, rather than direct attack... Wigglesworth was a prime favorite with Harvard students, and he and his son Edward, who succeeded, had a very great influence on New England theology. It was the Wigglesworths who trained the pioneers of liberal Christianity in New England - the ministers who led the way out of the lush but fearsome jungles of Calvinism, into the thin, clear light of Unitarianism.

The founding of Yale College in 1701 at New Haven, Connecticut by orthodox Harvard graduates was a reaction to the growing liberalism at Harvard. Yale, in fact, was to carry on the orthodox tradition well into the 19th century before it too succumbed to liberalism.

The Great Awakening

That the religious liberalism of the Harvard elite did not reflect the true feelings of the average man in the colonies became quite obvious during the Great Awakening, which began in the 1730s. In September 1740, George Whitefield, the fiery evangelical revivalist, arrived in Boston and addressed 15,000 people on Boston Common. He was invited to Harvard, where the students were eager and attentive, but the faculty was rather cool. On a subsequent visit to the Boston area, Whitefield was not even invited to Harvard. Henceforth, he and his followers began to denounce Harvard as a house of impiety and sin. As a result, Harvard began to suffer a decline in enrollment. Yale, on the other hand, now required that "the students should be established in the principles of religion according to the [Westminster] Assembly's Catechism." Also, every officer of the college was required to subscribe publicly to the Westminster Confession of Faith and the Saybrook Platform of the congregational churches of Connecticut before entering upon his duties. Morison writes:

On the whole, Harvard succeeded in keeping as far ahead of popular religious prejudice, and so far independent of sectarian control, as the times and circumstances made wise and possible. Too abrupt a change in religious matters would have isolated Harvard in the New England community, diminished her usefulness, and at the time of the Revolution, endangered her existence. There are still those who believe that, by keeping the Calvinist machine running, Yale and Princeton conserved certain values that were dissipated at Cambridge in the exhaust of Unitarianism; but it is difficult nowadays to imagine a Harvard linked up with fundamentalism.

Although the Great Awakening had little effect on the Harvard elite, it gave tremendous impulse to God-centered education elsewhere in the colonies. In 1746, the Philadelphia Presbyterian Synod secured a charter for the College of New Jersey, which in 1756 became Princeton College. Most of its first six presidents, Jonathan Edwards among them, had been prominent preachers in the revival movement.

In 1766, members of the Dutch Reformed Church founded Queen's College, which sixty years later became Rutgers at New Brunswick, New Jersey. In 1764, Baptists founded Brown University in Rhode Island, and in 1769 a Congregational preacher by the name of Eleazar Wheelock founded Dartmouth College in New Hampshire. Even the nonsectarian University of Pennsylvania, founded in 1756 with the help of Benjamin Franklin, welcomed preachers to edify the students. In short, the religious fervor, which also kindled the flame of freedom that brought on the struggle for independence, greatly diminished the influence of Harvard until well after the Revolutionary War ended.

Rebellion Against Calvinism

The rise of Unitarianism among the academic and merchant elite in Puritan New England might seem at first a highly unlikely occurrence. But universities, as we so well know, seem to attract men of intellectual pride who gaze longingly on the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thinking that if they eat of its fruit they will be as gods.

In 1785, under the ministry of Harvard-educated Unitarian James Freeman, the congregation of King's Chapel in Boston purged their Anglican liturgy of all references to the Trinity, thus establishing the first Unitarian church in America. Twenty years later, the Unitarian takeover of Harvard was complete.

The rebellion against Calvinism was a rebellion against the Biblical view of man and God. William Ellery Channing, a Harvard alumnus who became the leader of the Unitarian movement, explained the basis of Unitarianism at the dedication of a new Unitarian church in Baltimore in 1817. After dismissing the concept of the Trinity as "an enormous tax on credulity," he then zeroed in on God Himself:

We believe in the moral perfection of God... It is not because He is our Creator merely, but because He created us for good and holy purposes; it is not because His will is irresistible, but because His will is the perfection of virtue, that we pay Him allegiance. We cannot bow before a being, however great and powerful, who governs tyrannically. We respect nothing but excellence whether on earth or in heaven. We venerate, not the loftiness of God's throne, but the equity and goodness in which it is established...

Now we object to the systems of religion which prevail among us, that they are adverse, in a greater or less degree, to these purifying, comforting, and honorable views of God, that they take from us our Father in heaven, and substitute for Him a being, whom we cannot love if we would, and whom we ought not to love if we could.

For Unitarians, the worship of God depended on His being what they thought He should be, not what He actually was. In any case, Jesus was reduced to the status of prophet and teacher. He was divine only to the extent that we were all divine. Thus, salvation was not longer attained exclusively through Christ but through a good education and good works.

Every Man a God

The Unitarians also rejected the Calvinist view of man as being innately depraved. Man, they were convinced, was not only basically good, but perfectible. For this reason, social action became the principal mode in which Unitarians practiced their religion. They were convinced that evil was caused not by man's sinful nature, but by ignorance, poverty, and social injustice.

Thus, by eliminating ignorance (through universal public education), they would eliminate poverty and thereby eliminate social injustice. Once this was done and the happy results observed by all, the Unitarians would have proven that they were right and the Calvinists were wrong.

While the early Harvard Unitarians believed that their rational form of Christianity was quite scriptural, the newer generation, influenced by the Enlightenment and the intoxicating elixir of Hegelian pantheism, saw no reason why they should subject their emotional, spiritual and intellectual aspirations to the stultifying restrictions of the Bible.

Thus it was that in 1838 Ralph Waldo Emerson shocked the older Unitarians with his famous Divinity School address in which he offered a devastating criticism of all organized religion. Through the new movement of Transcendentalism, Emerson was able to release Unitarians from the weak bonds that still maintained their connection with the religion of the Bible. Transcendentalism was the new form of spirituality that elevated man to godhood. It was far more compatible with the Eastern religions than with the religion of the ancient Hebrews.

Meanwhile, Harvard became the Unitarian Vatican, a self-governing principality on the Charles River, a citadel of humanist liberalism. When America's oldest, richest and most prestigious university becomes the nation's foremost antagonist of orthodox biblical religion, it is bound to have a spiritually devastating influence on American cultural and intellectual life.

E.J. Kahn writes in Harvard, Through Change and Through Storm:

Other appraisers of Harvard have compared it to a tiny part of Europe - specifically, to the Vatican. Members of the Corporation, among whose responsibilities is the selection of Harvard's president, have compared themselves to the College of Cardinals.

No president of Harvard is known to have invested himself publicly with Papal stature, but the analogy has its points. Harvard has traditionally operated like a small, powerful, and subjectively infallible political entity with a worldwide constituency...

It is one of Harvard's special problems that it has long been conscious of being a super-power - King, as it were, of the academic mountain.

The road to secularization among other great private American universities was somewhat similar. Yale, Princeton, William and Mary, Brown, Dartmouth, and Columbia were founded by Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists. However, as the Protestant sects became liberal, the universities followed suit.

God and Hegel at Yale

At Yale, the departure from orthodoxy was spurred by the profound influence of German Hegelian philosophy. Georg Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831) was probably the most influential philosopher of his time - and probably the most influential of ours if we consider his influence on the Marxists who permeate American universities.

Hegel rejected the theology of the Bible and believed that everything in the universe is God. In this pantheistic universe, God was in the process of perfecting Himself through a dynamic evolutionary process known as the dialectic - a constant, endless struggle between the thesis and the antithesis, which then resolved themselves into a synthesis. This synthesis then became the new thesis, which then inevitably formed a new antithesis to continue the progressive struggle onward and upward toward perfection. It was this dialectic concept of progress that became the basis of the "progressive" movement.

Hegel also believed that man's intellect was the highest manifestation of good in the universe and that man himself was involved in the dialectic process. Karl Marx (1818-1883) adopted the dialectical concept of progress but rejected Hegel's pantheism, formulating his own concept of "dialectic materialism," which became the philosophical basis for scientific socialism and communist revolution. If revolutionaries could harness the forces of the dialectical struggle, they could lead mankind into communist utopia. By viewing the dialect as a scientifically provable force, like gravity, the communists saw themselves as a vanguard of social progress leading mankind into a glorious future.

Hegel also viewed the state as being god on earth, the ultimate authority and law in man's lives, because it represented man's collective power. It was this statist philosophy that set the stage for communism, socialism, Nazism, and two world wars. Ideas do indeed have consequences!

Skullduggery

At Yale, the departure from Christian orthodoxy was begun in 1833 with the formation on campus of an American chapter of a German secret society known as The Order of Skull & Bones. Antony Sutton, in his book America's Secret Establishment, describes The Order as a conspiracy to control the evolution of American society by putting its members in positions of leadership throughout the country:

The Order is neither "left" nor "right." "Left" and "right" are artificial devices to bring about change, and the extremes of political left and political right are vital elements in a process of controlled change... In the dialectical process a clash of opposites brings about a synthesis... This conflict of opposites is essential to bring about change... In the Hegelian system conflict is essential. Furthermore, for Hegel and systems based on Hegel, the State is absolute. The State requires complete obedience from the individual citizen... He finds freedom only in obedience to the State.

Sutton's hypothesis explains how such disparate personalities as William F. Buckley Jr., Robert Taft, and George Bush - all conservative Republicans - and Robert Sloane Coffin, John Kerry, and W. Averell Harriman - all liberal Democrats - could belong to the same secret society. It might also explain why William F. Buckley Jr. denounced Robert Welch when the latter told the American people that there was a conspiracy of Insiders who were controlling the course of events in America and the world.

Most interesting of all is how The Order has managed to gain control of American education. Three members of The Order were responsible for this development: Timothy Dwight (1849), professor at Yale Divinity School and later 12th president of Yale; Daniel Coit Gilman (1852), first president of the University of California, first president of Johns Hopkins University, and first president of the Carnegie Institution; and Andrew Dickson White (1853), first president of Cornell and first president of the American Historical Association. All three also studied philosophy at the University of Berlin.

The three most important men in the progressive education movement - John Dewey, James McKeen Cattell, and G. Stanley Hall - were all at Johns Hopkins at the same time. Hall, who was trained by Wilhelm Wundt at Leipzig, taught Dewey and Cattell the new psychology. It was also at Johns Hopkins that Dewey was introduced to Hegelianism. James McKeen Cattell later studied under Wundt in Leipzig and went on to become America's leading educational psychologist at Teachers College, Columbia University. Dewey went on to create the new progressive curriculum for the public schools, which downgraded literacy and emphasized socialization. Cattell's experiments in Wundt's laboratory were to become the scientific basis for using the look-say, whole word method in teaching reading in the primary schools.

Totalitarian Tutoring

For the last 60 years or so, American education has been in the hands of humanists, socialists, and Hegelians turning out confused Americans who are not sure where they are going or why they are going there. Yet the secular State cannot accumulate total power because our constitution stands in the way. It was written 200 years ago by men steeped in orthodox religion who knew of man's depraved, sinful nature and were determined to make it as difficult as possible for evil men to gain total political power in the United States.

There was no such constitutional tradition in Germany to prevent Hitler from becoming a total dictator and leading a cultivated, civilized nation into utter depravity and ruin. The universities of Germany were spawning grounds for the ideas that led to Hitler, and they offered no resistance when he arrived on the scene. Why should they have resisted when he was basically what they wanted?

But the scene in America is different. We can prevent the rise of one big Hitler, but we have no way of preventing the many little Hitlers from occupying positions of power and influence in our many diverse institutions, public and private. The totalitarian spirit can be found in bureaucrats, judges, legislators, educators, union leaders, etc. In fact, we even have real-live, self-admitted totalitarians in the Communist Party USA working with great dedication to turn America into a dictatorship of the proletariat, with plenty of sympathizers in our universities. One would think that the lessons of recent history would turn people away from such obvious insanity. However, Calvinists would simply remind us that man is innately depraved, a sinner to the core, attracted to evil to satisfy a variety of his carnal and intellectual lusts.

The Influence of Catholics

For a time it seemed as if the establishment of major Catholic universities in America - Notre Dame, Loyola, Holy Cross, Boston College, etc. - would offset the secularization of American higher education. Catholic educators offered some of the strongest arguments against progressive education. They vigorously defended the rights of parents and private schools. When the socialist Cardenas government in Mexico banned the operation of schools "directly or indirectly linked to any religious creed" in 1935, Msgr. Pascual Diaz, archbishop of Mexico, instructed Catholics in a pastoral letter to refuse to comply with the new socialistic education laws:

First - No Catholic can be a socialist, understanding by socialism the philosophical, economic or social system which in one form or another does not recognize the rights of God and the church nor the natural right of every man to possess the goods he has acquired by his work or inherited legitimately, or which foments hatred and the unjust struggle of classes.

Second - No Catholic can study or teach socialism, nor cooperate directly to those ends, since it contains many errors condemned by the church.

Third - No Catholic can subscribe to declarations or formulas according to which he approves, although only for appearance, socialistic education, since this would be to work against the dictates of his own conscience.

Fourth - No Catholic can approve pedagogic naturalism or sexual education, since they are very grave errors which bring serious consequences.

In saying that no Catholic can do what is prohibited, we make it clearly understood that those who do so commit a mortal sin.

It should be understood that these prohibitions are not arbitrary, but conform exactly with the general mandates of the church, which has the right, given by God Himself, to command its sons to do what is necessary for their eternal salvation and to prohibit them from doing what would carry them away from that end: proceeding in everything as a loving mother who seeks only the good of her children; when they work against what she commands, they bring down their own unhappiness.

That letter was not only signed by the archbishop of Mexico, but by eight other archbishops and thirty bishops. It is doubtful that any Catholic archbishop would put his signature on that kind of letter today, for Catholic educators, with very few exceptions, have succumbed to the same secular humanistic philosophy that now permeates all of academia.

The founding of Regent University, Pensacola Christian College, Liberty University, and other schools indicates that God-centered education is still desired by a small but growing segment of the American population. But some day the humanist State may decide that God-centered education promotes religious prejudice and bigotry; that it presents a danger to society; and that, therefore, it must cease.

Of course, the religious freedom clause in the First Amendment should make such an occurrence unlikely. But it did not stop Nebraska authorities from jailing Reverent Everett Sileven for operating an "unapproved" Christian school, nor is it stopping a number of states from prosecuting Christian home-schoolers for not complying with the education laws.

A new concept has emerged in the courts - that "state's compelling interest in education" - which is being deftly used by state prosecutors, superintendents of schools, and judges to override the Constitutional guarantee of religious freedom.

An Establishment of Religion

With our great state universities all under humanist control, and our nation's public school under similar control, it is obvious to anyone who can see that, under the guise of secularization, the humanists have created the most powerful and pervasive government-funded establishment of religion that has ever existed in the United States.

Humanism is religion. It is, in fact, Unitarianism in the guise of secular philosophy. In 1987, U.S. District Court Judge W. Brevard Hand, in Smith v. Board of School Commissioners of Mobile County, Alabama, ruled that the secular humanists philosophy is a religion. He said:

For purposes of the First Amendment, secular humanism is a religious belief system, entitled to the protections of, and subject to the prohibitions of, the religion clauses.

Edwin H. Wilson, a Unitarian minister and one of the founders of the humanist movement, took great pains to show the interchangeability of humanism and Unitarianism in an article he wrote for the Nov/December 1962 issue of The Humanist. He stated:

The American Humanist Association itself was organized ... by a group composed primarily of liberal ministers and professors who were predominantly Unitarians and considered themselves as religious humanists...

Of the 34 persons who signed the Humanist Manifesto in 1933, all but four can be readily identified as "religious humanists" ... My conviction is that a probe into what is actually believed would show that the "liberal Unitarian position" and what is generally presented as Humanism - whether as a religion or as a philosophy - differ very little.

Then there was the Torcaso case, in which the Supreme Court recognized Buddhism, Taoism, Ethical Culture, and Secular Humanism as religions existing in the United States even though they do not teach what is traditionally considered belief in God.

There is no doubt that our government education system is an illegal establishment of religion in flagrant violation of our constitution. The American people permit this system to exist mainly because of ignorance, confusion, and deference to a number of powerful and corrupt special interests. But a nation that prefers to live with lies - because it is too cowardly and corrupt to fight for truth - will have to accept the consequences of its depravity.

How Christians Started the Ivy League

Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Dartmouth - all owe their origins to the gospel.

Probably no segment of American society has turned out a greater number of illustrious graduates than New England's Ivy League. Labels like Harvard, Yale, Princeton, still carry their own mystique and a certain aura of elitism and prestige.

Yet perhaps it would surprise most to learn that almost every Ivy League school was established primarily to train ministers of the gospel - and to evangelize the Atlantic seaboard.

It only took eighteen years from the time the Pilgrims set foot on Plymouth Rock until the Puritans, who were among the most educated people of their day, founded the first and perhaps most famous Ivy League school. Their story, in brief, is etched today in an entry way to Harvard Yard:

"After God had carried us safely to New England, and we had built our houses, provided necessaries for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship, and settled the civil government; one of the next things we longed for, and looked after was to advance learning, and perpetuate it to posterity; dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches, when our present ministers shall lie in the dust."

Harvard College's first presidents and tutors insisted that there could be no true knowledge or wisdom without Jesus Christ, and but for their passionate Christian convictions, there would have been no Harvard.

Harvard's "Rules and Precepts adopted in 1646 included the following essentials: "Every one shall consider the main end of his life and studies to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternal life. Seeing the Lord giveth wisdom, every one shall seriously by prayer in secret seek wisdom of Him. Every one shall so exercise himself in reading the Scriptures twice a day that they be ready to give an account of their proficiency therein, both in theoretical observations of languages and logic, and in practical and spiritual truths...."

According to reliable calculations, 52 percent of the 17th century Harvard graduates became ministers!

Yale, 1701

By the turn of the century Christians in the Connecticut region launched Yale as an alternative to Harvard. Many thought Harvard too far away and too expensive, and they also observed that the spiritual climate at Harvard was not what it once had been.

Princeton, 1746

This school, originally called "The College of New Jersey," sprang up in part from the impact of the First Great Awakening. It also retained its evangelical vigor longer than any other Ivy League school. In fact, Princeton's presidents were evangelical until at least the turn of the Twentieth Century, as also many of the faculty.

Dartmouth, 1754

A strong missionary thrust launched this new school in New Hampshire. Its royal charter, signed by King George of England, specified the school's intent to reach the Indian tribes, and to educate and Christianize English youth as well. Eleazar Wheelock, a close friend of evangelist George Whitefield, secured the charter.

Columbia, William and Mary, Rutgers, Brown & UPenn

The first president of New York's Columbia University, first known as "King's College," at one time served as a missionary to America under the English-based "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." The Church of England established the College of William and Mary, near today's colonial Williamsburg. Dutch Reformed revivalists founded Queen's College (later Rutgers University) in New Jersey. Brown University originated with the Baptist churches scattered on the Atlantic seaboard. With the exception of the University of Pennsylvania, every collegiate institution founded in the colonies prior to the Revolutionary War was established by some branch of the Christian Church.

Even at UPenn, however, an evangelist played a prominent part. When Philadelphia churches denied revivalist George Whitefield access to their pulpits, forcing him to preach in the open, some of Whitefield's admirers, among them Benjamin Franklin, decided to erect a building to accommodate the great crowds that wanted to hear him. The structure they built became the first building of what is now the University of Pennsylvania, and a statue of Whitefield stands prominently on that campus today.

Though the Ivy League schools eventually turned secular, they fed into the mainstream of society in those earlier days a great army of graduates who could claim Jesus Christ as personal Savior and Lord, and who left a strong impact on our nation. Their presidents and their faculties helped to set a high spiritual tone, and at times their campuses in turn felt the impact of revival. The educators of early America understood that the moral climate of its schools, colleges and universities would shape its future generations, and could ultimately decide the course of the nation.

Classroom Bias

By Brent Knox

I once heard a professor say nonchalantly, "The Bible actually does teach reincarnation. Remember the story of John the Baptist? Wasn't he Elijah reincarnated? And there used to be many other Scriptural passages which taught reincarnation, but in the third and fourth centuries, biased church fathers took their scissors and cut those enlightening passages from the Bible."

All the heads in the classroom bobbed up and down in mesmerized agreement. I gaped in astonishment. I thought I had heard every possible criticism against the Bible, but this one was really incredible. It was so far-fetched that even several of the religion professors at the same university I talked to hadn't heard it. But even more astonishing was that the students in the classroom absorbed the tale as if it was gospel truth. Why? Because professors are the experts. They are scholars and have a lot of abbreviations after their names to prove it.

As a Christian student at a public university, I learned very quickly not to be overawed by professors. They are just men. And men make mistakes. In fact, the Bible reveals that man can actually suppress the truth, not because it is intellectually dissatisfying, but because of their desire for sin (Romans 1:18). Men can appear wise and learned, but actually be fools with futile thinking because of a secret rebellion in not honoring God (Romans 1:19-23).

Although not all college professors have this problem, unfortunately, many do promote unreasonable and irrational criticisms against God, His Word and His Son because their moral bias makes them unable to think correctly. Remember, your professor may be an expert in biology, but he may be foolish when he speaks fondly of our "ancestor" Australopithecus.

It's important to be able to distinguish between truth and the presuppositions of many of our country's college professors. If we can't detect when these presuppositions are leading a professor into academic error, then our faith may be weakened or destroyed by half-truths masquerading as truths. I would like to look at three of these presuppositions, or "faiths," that have invaded many of our nation's classrooms:

1. The hard-core scientists rally under the banner that says, "Prove it to me!" They say God is irrelevant because His existence cannot be proven and faith is irrational because you must abandon your intellect. But they, too, have a faith: The universe is a closed system of causes and effects; only that which is empirically verifiable is of reality; all else is meaningless. From this faith comes the belief that a scientific view of the world can give a complete picture of all that is true. But realize this: this faith is truly a faith, not a scientific conclusion.

The scientific method is not the only way to arrive at knowledge. Countless times, as I have told someone about the resurrection, I've received the retort, "Prove it to me!" It used to befuddle me. I couldn't even prove it and would leave the conversation barbecued. But now, I ask gently, "Well, can you prove to me that Julius Caesar lived and fought in the Gallic Wars?" The point is made. You cannot prove anything in history scientifically. But that doesn't make historical events any less real than $e = mc^2$.

Back in my college days, I was discussing Christianity with a chemistry teaching assistant.

"I can't believe in this Jesus stuff because it rests on so many miracles. And miracles are so unscientific," he said.

I paused and said, "That's the point. If you could explain miracles scientifically, then they wouldn't be miracles anymore."

He had never thought of that before. If there is a God, then His existence, His proofs (miracles) and His revelations would all defy the scientific method because the events must be repeated and observed a statistical amount of times. Just because science cannot observe history, revelation, God, miracles, etc., doesn't make these things irrational, questionable or untrue.

2. One pleasant afternoon at the University of Iowa, I was discussing with a group of students the morality of the Bible and that God's laws are absolutely true no matter what culture or time in history you live in. One scholarly looking student defiantly interrupted, "But there are no such things as absolutes!"

"Are you sure?" I replied.

"Yes, I am sure!" he shouted back.

"Are you absolutely sure?"

"Yes!!!" he shrieked.

"Then you are an absolutist just like me!" I said.

I thought he was going to fall off the steps. No one likes to be an absolutist.

The bias in the classroom is that no absolutes exist. But that's an impossible position. In order to be a true non-absolutist, a person must admit the possibility of absolutes and thereby the possibility of God and His revelation in the Bible. A true non-absolutist should inspect Christianity's perspective as a viable alternative view. But often, the Christian perspective on morality, ethics, the nature of man as it relates to psychology and sociology, etc., is dismissed as narrow-minded, empty-headed fundamentalists' dogma that couldn't possibly be true.

Who really is narrow-minded and biased? If you want to test this bias, try standing up in a class on Religion in America during a discussion on pluralism and state, "Jesus is the only way to God." You will see people's hair stand straight up on their neck. But if God exists and God spoke, then the statement is not absurd at all.

Because God is considered irrelevant in the classroom, there is no longer any basis from which to form opinions on morality, ethics and religion. Our society's motto has become, "Hey, it doesn't make any difference what you believe, as long as you believe it."

Well, it does make a difference what you believe! If you believe that question 2 on a multiple-choice test is option "d," does your faith make "d" the correct answer? If your test is returned and "c" is the answer, will an appeal to the professor saying, "But I believed in 'd' with all my heart" raise your score? No! (Not unless you make better appeals than I did.)

Why? Because there are correct answers and wrong answers, and a person's faith has little to do with the reality of right and wrong.

Our society has become a little schizophrenic, thinking that right answers exist for any area of life except religion and morality. Again, if God exists and spoke, then absolutes exist and we have a basis for deciding right from wrong. Yet, people reject Christianity, not because they researched the historical evidence and found it lacking, but because they simply don't like what it says. That's a classic bias.

3. Listening to a biology lecture on evolution, I heard the professor chirp, "There are other views explaining the origin of man that exist besides Darwinism. Many people believe that the world was created rather than evolved. But since those theories imply a god, we cannot discuss the merits of these theories in the classroom because the state cannot be a promoter of religion."

In one quick swipe, this professor dismissed a whole realm of scientific knowledge with the over-worn phrase "separation of church and state." Not only has God Himself been declared unscientific (remember, He is not at the end of man's leash to be examined and tested) and therefore irrational, a person cannot even discuss Him without fear of being sued by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

Proficient constitutional lawyers realize that the intent of the Constitution is to protect religion from power-hungry government rather than protect the government from power-hungry religion. The people should not be insulated from open, intellectual discussion of God and the Bible, especially if it might be all true. Actually, people use the concept of "separation of church and state" as a tool to carry out their own anti-Christian bias. It's a favorite war slogan to toss out to avoid facing the music.

To illustrate this, I knew a Christian religion professor at a state university who wrote a paper on the life of Jesus, stating that the gospel accounts were not only historically accurate, but that they were also true (heaven forbid!). The religion department shook for days.

He was asked to leave the university and join a Christian college because he was judged guilty of promoting a religion. His colleagues wanted to box him away and out of sight from students who were searching. And yet, at the same university, other professors regularly promote the theories that discredit the historicity of the gospel accounts.

Apparently, the academic ethic of "freedom to think, research and express opinions" is trashed if a man investigates the reality of Christianity.

The devil has a strategy for the classroom: to drive a deep wedge between education and Christianity, thereby keeping the Christian faith in the churches only. However, our faith is relevant to and deeply affects many disciplines - biology, philosophy, psychology, sociology, religion, business, history, anthropology, etc.

With this war of ideas going on in the classroom, as a student, you will find many opportunities to express the Christian perspective in class. But you will need to be informed to do so accurately and effectively. There are many resources available in Christian book stores that can help you be more knowledgeable. Or, you can sometimes learn about the different approaches to a subject by simply doing extra research at the library.

It's also important to approach each class with a healthy dose of skepticism, not simply accepting as the gospel truth every single thing the professor or the book states. Armed with resources independent of those the professor assigned, you will be able to think a little more intelligently and critically about the subject and will be better able to sort out truth from theory and outright distortion.

In addition, work hard at your school work. Many people think that Christians are intellectual air-heads and there is no need for you to verify their opinion.

But armed with the Holy Spirit and a storehouse of knowledge, you can come out of the classroom more convinced of your Christian faith and better able to help others come to the same conclusions.

Accuracy in Academia -

Freedom of Speech Violations Campus Report

Freedom of speech is being redefined by university faculty and administrators to protect leftist academicians from any serious challenges of their views, according to reports collected by Accuracy in Academia.

Harvard Law Professor Randall Kennedy gave a lecture recently entitled "Hey, Hey, Ho, Ho, Free Speech Has Got to Go!" Kennedy advocated the removal of freedom of speech on the grounds that "toleration has its limits." Of course, those limits would be defined by his reasoning and only his.

"Can a protester abridge the rights of a Reagan or a Republican Secretary of Defense?" a student asked during the lecture. Kennedy said he would sanction the silencing of their views, as well as those of a visiting 'contra' from Nicaragua. When a student asked how he would feel if a visiting lecturer was beaten or killed during such a protest, Kennedy remarked, "It's a close call, something I'd have to think deeply about."

Another Harvard professor, mathematics Professor Vishwambhar Pati, defended the silencing of a South African speaker by writing "... there is no provision under U.S. law that guarantees uninterrupted free speech ... [The South African's] privilege to air his views from a Harvard podium is hardly a right."

The university, which is supposed to be an arena of inquiry, testing and thinking, is becoming a haven for those who only ascribe to a certain point of view, according to an article in Accuracy in Academia's Campus Report. The article stated that Brooklyn College Professor Robert Cheery defended the silencing of government speakers in a letter:

"...[A]cademic freedom was initiated to protect those who held anti-establishment positions. Those who represent the government have more than ample access to the media so that anyone seriously interested can easily find out their position. If opponents choose to disrupt a government representative's talk, it reflects a protest against the government's policies, not an abridgement of freedom of speech."

A speech by Nicaraguan Resistance Leader Adolfo Calero was recently cancelled by a dean at Harvard University because the audience was dominated by conservatives. Prior to the speech, the same dean spearheaded a protest against Calero. Campus Report posed an interesting question at the end of their published findings: "Where is the American Civil Liberties Union and People for the American Way when you need them?"

"Are You Funding Marxist Revolution with Your Tuition?"

by Solomon Wise

Higher education. It certainly sounds prestigious. It brings to mind a group of serious students in an ivy-covered lecture hall discussing the works of Shakespeare, Jeffersonian democracy, or Adam Smith's economic principles. But today in America, higher education has taken a nosedive. In many classrooms, Shakespeare, Jefferson, and Smith are out. Marx, Castro, and a host of other radical communist thinkers are in.

And it's all done quietly and peacefully - and paid for by unknowing parents to the tune of $18,000 a year.

Radical communists teaching in U.S. universities? Surely not. If you don't believe it, perhaps you should attend the next Marxist Scholars Conference and take a tape player. The most recent of these gatherings, held at the University of California/Berkeley last November, drew 500 American professors and political activists to discuss how they could better disseminate their views into the mainstream of American thought. Their primary target, of course, is the university student.

Here are just a few remarks made at the conference by some of these professors:

* Herbert Aptheker, law professor at the University of California/Berkeley, told the audience that communists will create a "Heaven on earth."

* Another UC/Berkeley professor, Carlos Munoz of the Chicano Studies department, proclaimed that "This empire (of America) will fall, and we will contribute to its fall." Munoz went on to explain that the large-scale immigration of Hispanics to the U.S. in coming years will make California "the first Third World state" - and that communists plan to control Hispanic votes.

* Philosophy Professor Jack Pitt of California State University/Fresno said that "teaching is important to those of us on the left" because the classroom is one of the "institutions which disseminate ideology that renders [the ruling class's] control acceptable ... it is essential that we see ideology as contested terrain, as one of the sites where the class struggle is waged." Pitt said he identifies himself as a Marxist to his students only "if it's a matter of class solidarity."

* A high school civics teacher from San Francisco, and member of the executive board of the American Federation of Teachers, told the audience that high school students should be a prime target of their doctrines: "Our need, as educators and as Marxists, is to teach our young people what the correct choices are ... I teach my students how to find examples of ethnocentrism, Eurocentrism, racism, bias, distortion

He also explained that many immigrants who come to America believe "the myth that America is the land of freedom," and come with anti-communist sentiments. But he assured the audience that he was not giving up the fight: "We need more Third World teachers in our classrooms. We need more Marxists in our classrooms. We need more progressiveness in our classrooms. That's where the future is: in the classrooms."

* Roberto Rivera is an ethnic studies professor at San Francisco State University. Rivera explained why he uses the radical teachings of Paulo Freire, a Brazilian revolutionary, to prepare his students for revolution. "The Nicaraguan revolution is where it is," Rivera said, because they have used Freire successfully in the classroom. He also predicted that the communist revolutionary forces in El Salvador and Guatemala would prevail because "they're using Freire well."

* Howard University Political Science Professor Michael Parenti pointed out to the audience that the First Amendment is not the enemy, but how it is used by the ruling class. Parenti also added that the appointment of another conservative to the U.S. Supreme Court would "lead to the end of democracy."

* Ric Holt, a Northwestern Missouri State professor, told the group how he opens students' minds to Marxist ideas. Early in the semester, he takes students to watch bankrupt farms being auctioned off as "the generations lose everything they own."

Of all the special guest speakers at the Marxist Scholars Conference, the largest percentage of speakers were professors who hold degrees in traditional academic subjects as well as more recently invented disciplines such as Native American studies, Black studies, and Chicano studies.

Conference organizer Jack Kurzweil of San Jose State University said that the November meeting was the largest Marxist Scholars Conference in history. The principal sponsors were the Marxist Educational Press, directed by a professor from the University of Minnesota, and the Berkeley chapter of the Union of Radical Political Economists.

In early February of this year, Secretary of Education William Bennett made some fiery comments about the academic establishment which drew sparks from college presidents around the nation. Bennett said: "The American people are beginning to wonder whether the emperor - higher education - has any clothes." Bennett charged that higher education is losing credibility because faculty members are trashing traditional disciplines for trendy, soft-headed courses.

"Is this what parents are being asked to pay $18,000 a year for?" Bennett asked.

Yes, Mr. Bennett, on many American campuses today, parents are paying that kind of money to send professors like Aptheker, Munoz, Pitt, and Parenti to meetings like the one I have described. In their meetings, they are discussing the most practical and effective ways to overthrow the American system as we know it. Parents are also paying roughly $18,000 a year for these radical teachers to indoctrinate their children in hostile ideologies.

The radical elements in U.S. academia say it's time for revolution. I agree. I say its time for students, parents, and university administrators to revolt against this madness that is being masqueraded as academic curriculum. Pressure needs to be put on these anti-intellectuals: either they change their militant views, or they're out of a job. It's time that we Americans stop financing our own downfall.

Parent sued by teacher for calling classes "occultic"

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) --The mother of a 6th grade student was sued for slander by a Colorado school teacher for calling curriculum "occultic." Sandy Montoya was one of three parents who complained to the Adams County, Colorado, School District Number 123, about what their children were being taught.

The parents told school officials that their children were taught about firewalking, guided imagery, color healing, and touch therapy. They said they thought the curriculum was "occultic" and dangerous, especially if their children tried firewalking at home.

According to the parent's reports, the teacher told students her experience of walking barefoot across hot coals and not burning her feet. For color healing, she discussed the practice of mentally identifying pain and illness by color, weight and size, in an attempt to rid the body of pain.

She explained touch therapy as being similar to acupuncture, but using external hand and finger pressure rather than needles to relieve pain or sickness.

The teacher called the parent's criticism "slander," and filed suit. She won a settlement of $110,500, and Sandy Montoya had to pay $27,500 of the judgment.

Montoya recently filed an appeal before the Colorado Court of Appeals. If the decision is upheld, her attorney Jordan Lorence, said, "It would be ominous, because it could chill all parental criticism of the public school system." Lorence is the assistant general counsel for Concerned Women of America. "This case sends a message to parents, 'if parents criticize the public school system, they'll get sued,'" he said.

Lorence said the case was setting dangerous precedent because it meant that if a parent decided to censure the public school system they could get sued. "Our basic argument is that parents have the constitutional right to criticize public schools and should have the absolute right to do so," he said.

According to traditional American jurisprudence, he said, the parents control education of their children and delegate the authority to the schools. "If what the school teaches is objectionable, they should have an absolute right to criticize."

These kind of cases are coming up, he added, "because we're seeing an increasing paganization and a declining of Christian values in our public schools."

The Marxist Assault on the Curriculum

By Lee Grady

The anti-intellectuals have struck again. This time, they're after the control of the basic freshman curriculum.

Most colleges in America today require some type of general introductory course in Literature and Philosophy. These courses offer a required reading list of truly "Great Books" that represent our cultural heritage and give a simple understanding of the progress of civilization. Students are typically given ample doses of the ancient philosophers, the Bible, Shakespeare, Dante, Milton, and Locke ... progressing all the way to the great defenders of American democracy like Hamilton and Jefferson.

But if a certain radical element in our universities continues to have their way, the great books will be shelved forever. The freshman curriculum is now being viewed as a political tool that some radical professors would like to use in a subtle revolutionary campaign.

At Stanford University last year, 500 students and professors - joined by presidential candidate Jesse Jackson - gathered to protest a freshman course on Western literature and philosophy. Chanting "Hey hey, ho ho, Western culture's got to go," these activists were calling for a new curriculum which emphasizes non-European cultures and works by "women, minorities, and people of color."

Some educators at Stanford, along with their colleagues on other campuses which are facing similar controversies, say that our Western cultural heritage is too white, too European, and too male. They say it's time for democratic equality on the required reading list, and would like to replace Shakespeare with Confucius, Longfellow with the feminist poets, and the Bible with the Bhagavad-Gita and African tribal music. In short, they want to uproot Western traditions, and replace them with a myriad of ethnic diversities which they feel will appear less prejudiced and more open-minded.

The Problem with Relativism

University of Chicago professor Allan Bloom pointed out in his best-selling book The Closing of the American Mind that students in this country are being intellectually maimed by relativism in our classrooms. Because we have rejected moral absolutes, the curriculum has no central reference point to revolve around, and no foundation on which to rest. College-level courses have become a confusing blur because no one really knows what's right and what's wrong, what's good and what's bad.

That's the main reason why we see a movement to strike the study of Western culture from the curriculum. After all, who says Western society has ever contributed anything good to mankind? And if it did, who really knows how we could pick a "great books" list? Who knows what "great" really means anyway? What's great to me may not be so great to the next guy. And who says the Bible is worth studying? Who says the poetry of the ancient Mayans isn't just as worthy of our attention? Or the novels of Richard Wright or D.H. Lawrence or James Joyce?

When you eliminate moral values and absolute principles of right and wrong, then you are left with lots of questions and no answers. There is no more room for great books, great ideas, or great men, because there is no longer a means to measure greatness. In terms of the college literature course, that means that the Bible, the U.S. Constitution, and Paradise Lost have no meaning or value for us today.

The Spirit of Marxism at Work

There's more involved in this curriculum controversy than the natural conclusions of relativism, however. At the core of this argument is a desire on the part of some educators to tear down everything that the West stands for.

Although Marxists talk a great deal about the positive goals of their world mission - to rebuild or reconstruct society - we have yet to see anything positive happen after a Marxist revolution. The very nature of Marxism is destructive: it produces poverty, genocide, and economic collapse ... and then institutes a slave state on top of the rubble.

The motivating force at work in Marx, Lenin, and Engels was hatred and the desire to destroy: hatred of the family, hatred of private property, hatred of wealth, hatred of individual reward. These men had no plan or program for rebuilding what they wanted to tear down. Their revolution was not redemptive, simply vindictive. This is because hatred cannot produce anything positive. Evil cannot beget good.

The anti-intellectuals in our academic community who are challenging the curriculum requirements at Stanford and other universities are being motivated by this same Marxist doctrine. They cannot allow the Bible, the plays of Shakespeare, the essays of Hamilton, or the poems of Longfellow to be read in the classroom because they hate the values that these writings convey. They hate biblical morality (the strongest single influence in Western culture), the concepts of freedom and democracy, and all the other contributions of Western history that have built free and prosperous nations.

The whole goal of the new Marxist, anti-Western curriculum is to remove today's student from the values of our forefathers. They want to uproot an entire generation of young people from their entrenchment in the "narrow-minded" Western ideas of morality, property, and individual freedom under God. Then, when the operation is complete, they can interject their new, revolutionary ideas.

I am not saying that Western traditions are perfect, by any means. We are a flawed civilization with plenty of problems that were passed down from the Greeks to the Romans to the English to the Americans. But what we should be doing is looking at the positive contributions of Western society - which for the most part were all shaped by Christian ideas. How can our students ever learn to appreciate individual freedom, private property rights, the republican form of government, or representation, if they never learn where the ideas originated, or how great men worked and even gave their lives to secure them?

It's time we challenged these anti-West critics. I agree with Herbert London, a dean at New York University, who recently expressed his concern about the Stanford incident: "If there is anything the academy needs at the moment," he wrote, "it is a debunking of the debunkers. We need scholars who can affirm the best in our tradition, without fearing to discuss its flaws. We need teachers who can rediscover the substantive value of Western civilization without apologies to a brand of special pleaders standing on a soap box of gender, class, and race."¹

It is indeed ironic that these academicians - some of them with sincere intentions, perhaps - say that their battle is against prejudice. In the final judgment, it is obvious that they are the true bookburners.

Moral Education

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - America's public schools should be giving students more moral education, according to a report by a national organization that focuses on curriculum development and teaching procedures.

The Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development's report said moral education was not the "latest education fad, but a very old concept." Boston University professor Kevin Ryan, who chaired the panel, said American schools were founded with moral purpose, and offered moral education until the 1960s. Since that time, he said, schools have "stepped back" from their responsibility to teach morality.

The report noted increasing public concern over adolescent emotional problems, rising teenage suicide and murder, and unwed mothers. The report also cited public opinion polls which indicate that most Americans favor the teaching of moral behavior by public schools.

The Alexandria, Virginia-based association, which is made up of educators involved in curriculum development for public schools, defines moral education as "whatever schools do to influence how students think, feel and act regarding issues of right and wrong." The report says such education can help students become "morally mature."

The report recommends:

- * A greater place for moral education in public school curricula.
- * A cooperative effort among teachers, parents, media, courts, businesses, and civil, racial, ethnic, and religious organizations, for creating a social and cultural setting that supports moral behavior and education.
- * The establishment and publicizing of clear expectations for teachers and administrators in their roles as moral educators.
- * Increased attention to moral education in teachers' colleges and other educators' training programs.
- * The inclusion of critical thinking and decision making skills in moral education.
- * Regular assessments of the moral climate of schools and conduct of students, with the results of those assessments being made public.

The report acknowledges, however, that moral education is a possible source of controversy, including such issues as the religious underpinnings of moral behavior, how moral values should be taught, and whether moral education should strive to encourage adherence to a set of central values or to develop morally autonomous individuals.

What's wrong with the politically correct curriculum?

Just when you thought it was safe to walk the halls of academia again, illiberal liberalism is beginning to regroup. Gerald Graff, a University of Chicago English professor has founded Teachers for a Democratic Culture. Graff says he is concerned about the perception that higher education is awash in political intimidation by radical faculty leftovers from the 1960s, intent on shoving a crude ideological agenda down the throats of an unsuspecting and apolitical student body.

The problem with Graff's concern is, of course, that the perception is correct. Graff should know that he can't hold his prejudices and force others to eat them too. Why, for instance, are Shakespeare, Milton and Locke castigated as dead, white, aristocratic males, while Marx, Freud and Rousseau are crowned as messengers of truth? Perhaps it is because Marx, Freud and Rousseau are dead, white, anti-Christian males.

Court Upholds Rutherford Institute Case

Reiterating that students do not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech ... at the schoolhouse gate," a U.S. district court on December 4, 1987, ordered Pennsylvania school officials to allow three students to distribute a religious newspaper in their junior high school.

"Free speech is one of the most protected clauses in the Constitution," said John Whitehead, president of the Rutherford Institute and one of the attorneys who successfully defended the students. The Virginia-based nonprofit organization specializes in the defense of religious groups and individuals.

Bryan Thompson, Marc Shunk and Christopher Eakle, currently ninth-graders at Antietam Junior High School in Waynesboro, were suspended two years ago when they passed out copies of Issues and Answers in the school hallways before class. Issues and Answers is a free monthly newspaper published by Student Action for Christ.

The three students and their parents, represented by Rutherford attorney Larry Crain, later sued the Waynesboro school district, charging infringement of their First Amendment rights.

While school officials may lawfully impose "content-neutral time, place, and manner restrictions" on students' free speech activities, Judge Sylvia Rambo stated that testimony by Antietam principal Robert Mesaros "indicates that the religious content of the paper definitely influenced" the decision to ban its distribution. Mesaros admitted in his deposition that he feared some parents would object to their children's exposure to the newspaper.

Judge Rambo, however, quoting from a 1969 Supreme Court ruling, pointed out that banning "a particular expression of opinion" had to be justified by "something more than a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint."

Judge Rambo's November 24 opinion rejected the school district's claim that permitting students to hand out Issues and Answers would imply that the school endorsed religion, in violation of the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

The judge reasoned that since administrators already permitted other student clubs to meet in the school, "passive accommodation of one more group that was organized on the basis of religious interest would not have the effect of advancing religion." The students would simply be allowed "to avail themselves" of the limited public forum set up by the school "to promote the intellectual and social development of its students," Rambo stated.

School officials are expected to appeal the court's decision, but Rutherford attorneys expressed confidence that the ruling will hold up. "Judge Rambo provided a thorough analysis of the free speech issue," Whitehead said, "and it gives good grounds for success on appeal."

Sex Education

March 3, 1989

Classroom sex education appears to have little or no effect on altering sexual activity, promoting the use of birth control or lowering teenage pregnancy, according to a review of five studies.

"There's nothing unique about sex education as opposed to other information transmitted in school," said Dr. James W. Stout, a resident at Children's Hospital and Medical Center in Seattle and a co-author of the review.

"A person can have the information regarding their health, but it doesn't automatically translate into their behavior," he said. "A good example would be the ill-health effects of cigarette smoking, which it's probably safe to say most smokers are aware of, and yet they still smoke."

Five studies from 1980 to 1987 examined the effect of classroom sex-education programs at the junior and senior high school level on teenagers from a variety of geographical areas and racial and socioeconomic groups, the researchers said.

The sex education programs had no measurable impact on pregnancy rates, negligible effect on the use of birth-control methods and insignificant influence on teenager's decisions to engage in their first sexual intercourse, the researchers reported in the March issue of the journal Pediatrics.

"Existing data suggests that a classroom course alone cannot be expected to change sexual behavior in a direction that is in opposition to the adolescent's sexual world as it is molded by the television, motion picture, music and advertising industries, as well as peer group and adult role models," the researchers said.

BU President John Silber Announces Gubernatorial Bid

By Jay Rogers

4/90

Controversial Boston University president John Silber recently announced his intention to run for Governor of Massachusetts. Silber explained his decision to enter the political fray of the Bay State: "One of the reasons why I am in this campaign is that I am testing the proposition that rational political discussion is still possible in this country."

Silber, who is known for his polemic speaking style and strong stances, has also been credited as the man who put Boston University "back on the map." The BU president extended his philosophy of reform in education to the troubled urban setting of Chelsea, Massachusetts as Boston University took charge of the city's public school system this year.

If elected, Silber proposes to bring his life long success as an educator to the state level. Silber's "get tough" approach to educational reform includes requiring higher SAT scores for college entrants and that public school teachers pass competency tests.

Silber's penchant for controversy stems from his self-described position as a "procedural conservative and a substantive liberal." On certain issues he is profoundly conservative; his abortion stance is pro-life; his foreign policy is staunchly anti-communist and interventionist. Yet his support for social spending to aid the poor and his dedication to the public schools has placed some of his views alongside the traditional liberal politics of Massachusetts.

Although he believes that the current welfare system is disastrous, he attributes this state of affairs to misspending. Spending on education, according to Silber, is an investment in securing opportunities for future generations.

Having grown up during the Depresssion, and having had to struggle with a physical handicap, Silber has obtained a compassion for the sick and needy. Yet his tone changes when addressing the problem of the welfare state: "It must always be the overriding concern of a welfare program that welfare be liberating, not enslaving," says Silber.

His proven ability to overcome has made him a national figure, yet one of his greatest challenges will be to secure a nomination at the Democratic Party's convention in June. Silber's deviation from traditional liberal politics has earned him many enemies within Massachusetts' dominant party. Yet some political observers have suggested that it would be an unwise move for the Democratic Party to keep a candidate of Silber's stature and national reputation off the fall primary ticket.

Highest of all Silber's attributes is his incomparable intelligence and his love for debate. His ability to disarm foes using forceful eloquence has made him a media spectacle as well as a formidable political candidate. Part of the Democratic Party's reticence to his candidacy may be related to an underlying fear of the gains Silber might make against his contenders in a televised debate.

The fact remains that Silber is likely to continue to draw national media attention which will only increase his strength as a candidate. He has sought to bolster his candidacy by including a staff of experienced advisers, such as former Boston Mayor Kevin White, currently employed by Boston University as a political science professor. Furthermore, his role as an outsider to Massachusetts' politics during the state's current fiscal crisis is likely to give him appeal to working people.

As the June convention nears, Silber's stridency will be tested. His love for the battle of ideas and his brash speaking style is unlikely to change as he shifts his focus from the academic world to the political arena. However, in an attempt to reform the American educational system, Silber's strongest contribution to society will be made as his ideas are heard by the public as the national media covers his candidacy.

B.U. President Silber comments on April 1990 article:

I appreciated your letter of May 5 and the opportunity to see your article about my campaign. (The Forerunner, April 1990, "B.U. President Enters Race for Governor") I noticed a small error; Kevin White is not on my campaign staff, but he is a close friend. He plays a role in my campaign either on or off the staff. Otherwise, your summary of my objectives is superb.

A World Split Apart

Commencement Address Delivered At Harvard University

June 8, 1978

By Alexander I. Solzhenitsyn

I am sincerely happy to be here with you on the occasion of the 327th commencement of this old and illustrious university. My congratulations and best wishes to all of today's graduates.

Harvard's motto is "VERITAS." Many of you have already found out and others will find out in the course of their lives that truth eludes us as soon as our concentration begins to flag, all the while leaving the illusion that we are continuing to pursue it. This is the source of much discord. Also, truth seldom is sweet; it is almost invariably bitter. A measure of truth is included in my speech today, but I offer it as a friend, not as an adversary.

Three years ago in the United States I said certain things that were rejected and appeared unacceptable. Today, however, many people agree with what I said ...

The split in today's world is perceptible even to a hasty glance. Any of our contemporaries readily identifies two world powers, each of them already capable of destroying each other. However, the understanding of the split too often is limited to this political conception: the illusion according to which danger may be abolished through successful diplomatic negotiations or by achieving a balance of armed forces. The truth is that the split is both more profound and more alienating, that the rifts are more numerous than one can see at first glance. These deep manifold splits bear the danger of equally manifold disaster for all of us, in accordance with the ancient truth that a kingdom - in this case, our Earth - divided against itself cannot stand.

Contemporary Worlds

There is the concept of the Third World: thus, we already have three worlds. Undoubtedly, however, the number is even greater; we are just too far away to see. Every ancient and deeply rooted self-contained culture, especially if it is spread over a wide part of the earth's surface, constitutes a self-contained world, full of riddles and surprises to Western thinking. As a minimum, we must include in this China, India, the Muslim world, and Africa, if indeed we accept the approximation of viewing the latter two as uniform.

For one thousand years Russia belonged to such a category, although Western thinking systematically committed the mistake of denying its special character and therefore never understood it, just as today the West does not understand Russia in Communist captivity. And while it may be that in past years Japan has increasingly become, in effect, a Far West, drawing ever closer to Western ways (I am no judge here), Israel, I think, should not be reckoned as part of the West, if only because of the decisive circumstance that its state system is fundamentally linked to its religion.

How short a time ago, relatively, the small world of modern Europe was easily seizing colonies all over the globe, not only without anticipating any real resistance, but usually with contempt for any possible values in the conquered people's approach to life. It all seemed an overwhelming success, with no geographic limits. Western society expanded in a triumph of human independence and power. And all of a sudden the twentieth century brought the clear realization of this society's fragility.

We now see that the conquests proved to be short lived and precarious (and this, in turn, points to defects in the Western view of the world which led to these conquests). Relations with the former colonial world now have switched to the opposite extreme and the Western world often exhibits an excess of obsequiousness, but it is difficult yet to estimate the size of the bill which former colonial countries will present to the West and it is difficult to predict whether the surrender not only of its last colonies, but of everything it owns, will be sufficient for the West to clear this account.

Convergence

But the persisting blindness of superiority continues to hold the belief that all the vast regions of our planet should develop and mature to the level of contemporary Western systems, the best in theory and the most attractive in practice; that all those other worlds are but temporarily prevented (by wicked leaders or by severe crises or by their own barbarity and incomprehension) from pursuing Western pluralistic democracy and adopting the Western way of life. Countries are judged on the merit of their progress in that direction. But in fact such a conception is a fruit of Western incomprehension of the essence of other worlds, a result of mistakenly measuring them all with a Western yardstick. The real picture of our planet's development bears little resemblance to all this.

The anguish of a divided world gave birth to the theory of convergence between the leading Western countries and the Soviet Union. It is a soothing theory which overlooks the fact that these worlds are not evolving toward each other and that neither one can be transformed into the other without violence. Besides, convergence inevitably means acceptance of the other side's defects, too. and this can hardly suit anyone.

If I were today addressing an audience in my country, in my examination of the overall pattern of the world's rifts I would have concentrated on the calamities of the East. But since my forced exile in the West has now lasted four years and since my audience is a Western one, I think it may be of greater interest to concentrate on certain aspects of the contemporary West, such as I see them.

A Decline In Courage

A decline in courage may be the most striking feature that an outside observer notices in the West today. The Western world has lost its civic courage, both as a whole and separately, in each country, in each government, in each political party, and, of course, in the United Nations. Such a decline in courage is particularly noticeable among the ruling and intellectual elites, causing an impression of a loss of courage by the entire society. There are many courageous individuals, but they have no determining influence on public life.

Political and intellectual functionaries exhibit this depression, passivity, and perplexity in their actions and in their statements, and even more so in their self-serving rationales as to how realistic, reasonable, and intellectually and even morally justified it is to base state policies on weakness and cowardice. And the decline in courage, at times attaining what could be termed a lack of manhood, is ironically emphasized by occasional outbursts and inflexibility on the part of those same functionaries when dealing with weak governments and with countries that lack support, or with doomed currents which clearly cannot offer resistance. But they get tongue-tied and paralyzed when they deal with powerful governments and threatening forces, with aggressors and international terrorists.

Must one point out that from ancient times a decline in courage has been considered the first symptom of the end?

Well-Being

When the modern Western states were being formed, it was proclaimed as a principle that governments are meant to serve man and that man lives in order to be free and pursue happiness. (See, for example, the American Declaration of Independence.) Now at last during past decades technical and social progress has permitted the realization of such aspirations: the welfare state.

Every citizen has been granted the desired freedom and material goods in such quantity and in such quality as to guarantee in theory the achievement of happiness, in the debased sense of the word which has come into being during those same decades. (In the process, however, one psychological detail has been overlooked: the constant desire to have still more things and a still better life and the struggle to this end imprint many Western faces with worry and even depression, though it is customary to carefully conceal such feelings. This active and tense competition comes to dominate all human thought and does not in the least open a way to free spiritual development.)

The individual's independence from many types of state pressure has been guaranteed; the majority of the people have been granted well-being to an extent their fathers and grandfathers could not even dream about; it has become possible to raise young people according to these ideals, preparing them for and summoning them toward physical bloom, happiness, and leisure, the possession of material goods, money, and leisure, toward an almost unlimited freedom in the choice of pleasures. So who should now renounce all this, why and for the sake of what should one risk one's precious life in defense of the common good and particularly in the nebulous case when the security of one's nation must be defended in an as yet distant land?

Even biology tells us that a high degree of habitual well-being is not advantageous to a living organism. Today, well-being in the life of Western society has begun to take off its pernicious mask.

Legalistic Life

Western society has chosen for itself the organization best suited to its purposes and one I might call legalistic. The limits of human rights and rightness are determined by a system of laws; such limits are very broad. People in the West have acquired considerable skill in using, interpreting, and manipulating law (though laws tend to be too complicated for an average person to understand without the help of an expert). Every conflict is solved according to the letter of the law and this is considered to be the ultimate solution.

If one is risen from a legal point of view, nothing more is required, nobody may mention that one could still not be right, and urge self-restraint or a renunciation of these rights, call for sacrifice and selfless risk: this would simply sound absurd. Voluntary self-restraint is almost unheard of: everybody strives toward further expansion to the extreme limit of the legal frames. (An oil company is legally blameless when it buys up an invention of a new type of energy in order to prevent its use. A food product manufacturer is legally blameless when he poisons his produce to make it last longer: after all, people are free not to purchase it.)

I have spent all my life under a Communist regime and I will tell you that a society without any objective legal scale is a terrible one indeed. But a society based on the letter of the law and never reaching any higher fails to take full advantage of the full range of human possibilities. The letter of the law is too cold and formal to have a beneficial influence on society. Whenever the tissue of life is woven of legalistic relationships, this creates an atmosphere of spiritual mediocrity that paralyzes man's noblest impulses.

And it will be simply impossible to bear up to the trials of this threatening century with nothing but the supports of a legalistic structure.

The Direction Of Freedom

Today's Western society has revealed the inequality between the freedom for good deeds and the freedom for evil deeds. A statesman who wants to achieve something highly constructive for his country has to move cautiously and even timidly; thousands of hasty (and irresponsible) critics cling to him at all times; he is constantly rebuffed by parliament and the press. He has to prove that his every step is well founded and absolutely flawless. Indeed, an outstanding, truly great person who has unusual and unexpected initiatives in mind does not get any chance to assert himself; dozens of traps will be set for him from the beginning. Thus mediocrity triumphs under the guise of democratic restraints.

It is feasible and easy everywhere to undermine administrative power and it has in fact been drastically weakened in all Western countries. The defense of individual rights has reached such extremes as to make society as a whole defenseless against certain individuals. It is time, in the West, to defend not so much human rights as human obligations.

On the other hand, destructive and irresponsible freedom has been granted boundless space. Society has turned out to have scarce defense against the abyss of human decadence, for example against the misuse of liberty for moral violence against young people, such as motion pictures full of pornography, crime, and horror. This is all considered to be part of freedom and to be counterbalanced, in theory, by the young people's right not to look and not to accept. Life organized legalistically has thus shown its inability to defend itself against the corrosion of evil.

And what shall we say about the dark realms of overt criminality? Legal limits (especially in the United States) are broad enough to encourage not only individual freedom but also some misuse of such freedom. The culprit can go unpunished or obtain undeserved leniency - all with the support of thousands of defenders in the society. When a government earnestly undertakes to root out terrorism, public opinion immediately accuses it of violating the terrorist's civil rights. There is quite a number of such cases.

This tilt of freedom toward evil has come about gradually, but it evidently stems from a humanistic and benevolent concept according to which man - the master of the world - does not bear any evil within himself, and all the defects of life are caused by misguided social systems, which must therefore be corrected. Yet strangely enough, though the best social conditions have been achieved in the West, there still remains a great deal of crime; there even is considerably more of it than in the destitute and lawless Soviet society. (There is a multitude of prisoners in our camps who are termed criminals, but most of them never committed any crime; they merely tried to defend themselves against a lawless state by resorting to means outside the legal framework.)

The Direction Of The Press

The press, too, of course, enjoys the widest freedom. (I shall be using the word "press" to include all the media.) But what use does it make of it?

Here again, the overriding concern is not to infringe the letter of the law. There is no true moral responsibility for distortion or disproportion. What sort of responsibility does a journalist or a newspaper have to the readership or to history? If they have misled public opinion by inaccurate information or wrong conclusions, even if they have contributed to mistakes on a state level, do we know of any case of open regret voiced by the same journalist or the same newspaper? No; this would damage sales. A nation may be the worse for such a mistake, but the journalist always gets away with it. It is most likely that he will start writing the exact opposite to his previous statements with renewed aplomb.

Because instant and credible information is required, it becomes necessary to resort to guesswork, rumors, and suppositions to fill in the voids, and none of them will ever be refuted; they settle into the readers' memory. How many hasty, immature, superficial, and misleading judgments are expressed everyday, confusing readers, and then left hanging?

The press can act the role of public opinion or miseducate it. Thus we may see terrorists heroized, or secret matters pertaining to the nation's defense publicly revealed, or we may witness shameless intrusion into the privacy of well-known people according to the slogan "Everyone is entitled to know everything."

(But this is a false slogan of a false era; far greater in value is the forfeited right of people not to know, not to have their divine souls stuffed with gossip, nonsense, vain talk. A person who works and leads a meaningful life has no need for this excessive and burdening flow of information.)

Hastiness and superficiality - these are the psychic diseases of the twentieth century and more than anywhere else this is manifested in the press. In-depth analysis of a problem is anathema to the press; it is contrary to its nature. The press merely picks out sensational formulas.

Such as it is, however, the press has become the greatest power within Western countries, exceeding that of the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary. Yet one would like to ask: According to what law has it been elected and to whom is it responsible? In the Communist East, a journalist is frankly appointed as a state official. But who has voted Western journalists into their positions of power, for how long a time, and with what prerogatives?

There is yet another surprise for someone coming from the totalitarian East with its rigorously unified press: One discovers a common trend of preferences within the Western press as a whole (the spirit of the time), generally accepted patterns of judgment, and maybe common corporate interests, the sum effect being not competition but unification. Unrestrained freedom exists for the press, but not for readership, because newspapers mostly transmit in a forceful and emphatic way those opinions which do not too openly contradict their own and that general trend.

A Fashion In Thinking

Without any censorship in the West, fashionable trends of thought and ideas are fastidiously separated from those that are not fashionable, and the latter, without ever being forbidden have little chance of finding their way into periodicals or books or being heard in colleges. Your scholars are free in the legal sense, but they are hemmed in by the idols of the prevailing fad. There is no open violence, as in the East; however, a selection dictated by fashion and the need to accommodate mass standards frequently prevents the most independent-minded persons from contributing to public life and gives rise to dangerous herd instincts that block dangerous herd development.

In America, I have received letters from highly intelligent persons - maybe a teacher in a faraway small college who could do much for the renewal and salvation of his country, but the country cannot hear him because the media will not provide him with a forum. This gives birth to strong mass prejudices, to a blindness which is perilous in our dynamic era. An example is the self-deluding interpretation of the state of affairs in the contemporary world that functions as a sort of petrified armor around people's minds, to such a degree that human voices from seventeen countries of Eastern Europe and Eastern Asia cannot pierce it. It will be broken only by the inexorable crowbar of events.

I have mentioned a few traits of Western life which surprise and shock a new arrival to this world . The purpose and scope of this speech will not allow me to continue such a survey, in particular to look into the impact of these characteristics on important aspects of a nation's life, such as elementary education, advanced education in the humanities, and art.

Socialism

It is almost universally recognized that the West shows all the world the way to successful economic development, even though in past years it has been sharply offset by chaotic inflation. However, many people living in the West are dissatisfied with their own society. They despise it or accuse it of no longer being up to the level of maturity by mankind. And this causes many to sway toward socialism, which is a false and dangerous current.

I hope that no one present will suspect me of expressing my partial criticism of the Western system in order to suggest socialism as an alternative. No; with the experience of a country where socialism has been realized, I shall not speak for such an alternative. The mathematician Igor Shafarevich, a member of the Soviet Academy of Science, has written a brilliantly argued book entitled Socialism; this is a penetrating historical analysis demonstrating that socialism of any type and shade leads to a total destruction of the human spirit and to a leveling of mankind into death. Shafarevich's book was published in France almost two years ago and so far no one has been found to refute it. It will shortly be published in English in the U.S.

Not A Model

But should I be asked, instead, whether I would propose the West, such as it is today, as a model to my country, I would frankly have to answer negatively. No, I could not recommend your society as an ideal for the transformation of ours. Through deep suffering, people in our own country have now achieved a spiritual development of such intensity that the Western system in its present state of spiritual exhaustion does not look attractive. Even those characteristics of your life which I have just enumerated are extremely saddening.

A fact which cannot be disputed is the weakening of human personality in the West while in the East it has become firmer and stronger. Six decades for our people and three decades for the people of Eastern Europe; during that time we have been through a spiritual training far in advance of Western experience. The complex and deadly crush of life has produced stronger, deeper, and more interesting personalities than those generated by standardized Western well-being. Therefore, if our society were to be transformed into yours, it would mean an improvement in certain aspects, but also a change for the worse on some particularly significant points.

Of course, a society cannot remain in an abyss of lawlessness, as is the case in our country. But it is also demeaning for it to stay on such a soulless and smooth plane of legalism, as is the case in yours. After the suffering of decades of violence and oppression, the human soul longs for things higher, warmer, and purer than those offered by today's mass living habits, introduced as by a calling card by the revolting invasion of commercial advertising, by TV stupor, and by intolerable music.

All this is visible to numerous observers from all the worlds of our planet. The Western way of life is less and less likely to become the leading model.

There are telltale symptoms by which history gives warning to a threatened or perishing society. Such are, for instance, a decline of the arts or a lack of great statesmen. Indeed, sometimes the warnings are quite explicit and concrete. The center of your democracy and of your culture is left without electric power for a few hours only, and all of a sudden crowds of American citizens start looting and creating havoc. The smooth surface film must be very thin, then, the social system quite unstable and unhealthy.

But the fight for our planet, physical and spiritual, a fight of cosmic proportions, is not a vague matter of the future; it has already started. The forces of Evil have begun their decisive offensive. You can feel their pressure, yet your screens and publications are full of prescribed smiles and raised glasses. What is the joy about?

Humanism And Its Consequences

How has this unfavorable relation of forces come about? How did the West decline from its triumphal march to its present debility? Have there been fatal turns and losses of direction in its development? It does not seem so. The West kept advancing steadily in accordance with its proclaimed social intentions, hand in hand with a dazzling progress in technology. And all of a sudden it found itself in its present state of weakness.

This means that the mistake must be at the root, at the very foundation of thought in modern times. I refer to the prevailing Western view of the world in modern times. I refer to the prevailing Western view of the world which was born in the Renaissance and has found political expression since the Age of Enlightenment. It became the basis for political and social doctrine and could be called rationalistic humanism or humanistic autonomy: the pro-claimed and practiced autonomy of man from any higher force above him. It could also be called anthropocentricity, with man seen as the center of all.

The turn introduced by the Renaissance was probably inevitable historically: the Middle Ages had come to a natural end by exhaustion, having become an intolerable despotic repression of man's physical nature in favor of the spiritual one. But then we recoiled from the spirit and embraced all that is material, excessively and incommensurately. The humanistic way of thinking, which had proclaimed itself our guide, did not admit the existence of intrinsic evil in man, nor did it see any task higher than the attainment of happiness on earth. It started modern Western civilization on the dangerous trend of worshiping man and his material needs.

Everything beyond physical well-being and the accumulation of material goods, all other human requirements and characteristics of a subtle and higher nature, were left outside the area of attention of state and social systems, as if human life did not have any higher meaning. Thus gaps were left open for evil, and its drafts blow freely today. Mere freedom per se does not in the least solve all the problems of human life and even adds a number of new ones.

And yet in early democracies, as in American democracy at the time of its birth, all individual human rights were granted on the ground that man is God's creature. That is, freedom was given to the individual conditionally, in the assumption of his constant religious responsibility. Such was the heritage of the preceding one thousand years. Two hundred or even fifty years ago, it would have seemed quite impossible, in America, that an individual be granted boundless freedom with no purpose, simply for the satisfaction of his whims.

Subsequently, however, all such limitations were eroded everywhere in the West; a total emancipation occurred from the moral heritage of Christian centuries with their great reserves of mercy and sacrifice. State systems were becoming ever more materialistic. The West has finally achieved the rights of man, and even excess, but man's sense of responsibility to God and society has grown dimmer and dimmer. In the past decades, the legalistic selfishness of the Western approach to the world has reached its peak and the world has found itself in a harsh spiritual crisis and a political impasse. All the celebrated technological achievements of progress, including the conquest of outer space, do not redeem the twentieth century's moral poverty, which no one could have imagined even as late as the nineteenth century.

An Unexpected Kinship

As humanism in its development was becoming more and more materialistic, it also increasingly allowed concepts to be used first by socialism and then by communism, so that Karl Marx was able to say, in 1844, that "communism is naturalized humanism."

This statement has proved to be not entirely unreasonable. One does not see the same stones in the foundations of an eroded humanism and of any type of socialism: boundless materialism; freedom from religion and religious responsibility (which under Communist regimes attains the stage of antireligious dictatorship); concentration on social structures with an allegedly scientific approach. (This last is typical of both the Age of Enlightenment and of Marxism.) It is no accident that all of communism's rhetorical vows revolve around Man (with a capital M) and his earthly happiness. At first glance it seems an ugly parallel: common traits in the thinking and way of life of today's West and today's East? But such is the logic of materialistic development.

The interrelationship is such, moreover, that the current of materialism which is farthest to the left, and is hence the most consistent, always proves to be stronger, more attractive, and victorious. Humanism which has lost its Christian heritage cannot prevail in this competition. Thus during the past centuries and especially in recent decades, as the process became more acute, the alignment of forces was as follows: Liberalism was inevitably pushed aside by radicalism, radicalism had to surrender to socialism, and socialism could not stand up to communism.

The communist regime in the East could endure and grow due to the enthusiastic support from an enormous number of Western intellectuals who (feeling the kinship!) refused to see communism's crimes, and when they no longer could do so, they tried to justify these crimes. The problem persists: In our Eastern countries, communism has suffered a complete ideological defeat; it is zero and less than zero. And yet Western intellectuals still look at it with considerable interest and empathy, and this is precisely what makes it so immensely difficult for the West to withstand the East.

Before The Turn

I am not examining the case of a disaster brought on by a world war and the changes which it would produce in society. But as long as we wake up every morning under a peaceful sun, we must lead an everyday life. Yet there is a disaster which is already very much with us. I am referring to the calamity of an autonomous, irreligious humanistic consciousness.

It has made man the measure of all things on earth - imperfect man, who is never free of pride, self-interest, envy, vanity, and dozens of other defects. We are now paying for the mistakes which were not properly appraised at the beginning of the journey. On the way from the Renaissance to our days we have enriched our experience, but we have lost the concept of a Supreme Complete Entity which used to restrain our passions and our irresponsibility.

We have placed too much hope in politics and social reforms, only to find out that we were being deprived of our most precious possession: our spiritual life. It is trampled by the party mob in the East, by the commercial one in the West. This is the essence of the crisis: the split in the world is less terrifying than the similarity of the disease afflicting its main sections.

If, as claimed by humanism, man were born only to be happy, he would not be born to die. Since his body is doomed to death, his task on earth evidently must be more spiritual: not a total engrossment in everyday life, not the search for the best ways to obtain material goods and then their carefree consumption. It has to be the fulfillment of a permanent, earnest duty so that one's life journey may become above all an experience of moral growth: to leave life a better human being than one started it.

It is imperative to reappraise the scale of the usual human values; its present incorrectness is astounding. It is not possible that assessment of the President's performance should be reduced to the question of how much money one makes or to the availability of gasoline. Only by the voluntary nurturing in ourselves of freely accepted and serene self-restraint can mankind rise above the world stream of materialism.

Today it would be retrogressive to hold on to the ossified formulas of the Enlightenment. Such social dogmatism leaves us helpless before the trials of our times.

Even if we are spared destruction by war, life will have to change in order not to perish on its own. We cannot avoid reassessing the fundamental definitions of human life and society. Is it true that man is above everything? Is there no Superior Spirit above him? Is it right that man's life and society's activities should be ruled by material expansion above all? Is it permissible to promote such expansion to the detriment of our integral spiritual life?

If the world has not approached its end, it has reached a major watershed in history, equal in importance to the turn from the Middle Ages to the Renaissance. It will demand from us a spiritual blaze; we shall have to rise to a new height of vision, to a new level of life, where our physical nature will not be cursed, as in the Middle Ages, but even more importantly, our spiritual being will not be trampled upon, as in the Modern Era.

The ascension is similar to climbing onto the next anthropological stage. No one on earth has any other way left but - upward.

I liked the picture you used on the last page of The Forerunner (September 1992, p.19) about abstinence. That issue is starting to get more media coverage than usual because the New York City public school's chancellor, Joseph Fernandez, is trying to break the law. When teaching any type of sex education, a New York law says abstinence must be taught as the most effective prevention of AIDS, STDS and pregnancy. Fernandez wants to break this law by initiating a new curriculum that stresses birth control and condoms. In doing so, he is breaking the law of New York.

We've been rallying against this and a new K-6 curriculum called the Rainbow curriculum, which seeks to teach K-6 kids AIDS education by indoctrinating them toward a pro-homosexual viewpoint. This program is a cover for the homosexuals to come into the classrooms and tell kids that homosexuality is normal. The kids would be reading books like: Heather Has Two Mommies, Daddy's Roommate and Glory Goes to Gay Pride. These books show men in bed together and women going together to the doctor to be inseminated in order to have a baby. The program will also be teaching anal and oral sex to K-6 kids!

Yes, we need AIDS education, but why do kids need to be brainwashed into thinking that homosexuality is normal? This curriculum is supposed to be multicultural by including Blacks, Jews, Chinese and other cultures. However, the homosexual issue is the only topic that is supposed to be taught in every class and subject. Somehow, while teaching English or Math, the homosexual agenda must be taught. None of the other cultures are taught, only the behavior of homosexuality.

We are praying that this man is either driven out of office or that he comes to his senses. He seems literally be driven by demons of hell to have this instituted. Please pray for us about this.

HONG KONG (NNI) - Over 1,000 foreigners are teaching English inside China today, and the vast majority of them are evangelical Christians. Indeed, according to Thomas Lawrence, coordinator of a training agency for Christian teachers about to enter China, this is an imbalance preferred by Chinese educational authorities.

"In one major city," Lawrence said, "if an applicant leaves blank the section on religion in the application form, the Chinese automatically reject that person. They prefer Christians."

Over the past few years, as China has opened up and invited English teachers as well as foreign professionals to work in the country, Christians have impressed the Chinese authorities in two major ways. First, they have higher moral standards than many of their non-Christian counterparts. Second, they are often more willing to cope with the primitive and frustrating conditions that accompany teaching inside China.

Lawrence said a teacher in China today has to handle a bewildering array of problems ranging from electricity blackouts during classes and shortages of suitable textbooks, to poor living conditions and social isolation. But by far the greatest frustrations occur in the classroom situation. Said Lawrence, "It is quite common to be asked to teach oral English in a class of 25, when the maximum for an oral class should be no higher than six."

Asked if any Christian teachers had been thrown out of the country for sharing their faith, Lawrence replied, "If they preach the gospel in place of teaching English they may be ejected, and this has happened in a very few cases." He stressed that their ejection stemmed basically from failing to do the job they were hired to do. He added, "Witnessing should be outside the classroom context, occurring naturally as friendships are made with the students."

China continues to present an open door to Christian professionals who are dedicated to their field of work, able to endure hardship, and content to share their faith with discernment.

Teaching the Virtues

By Christina Hoff Sommers

Associate Professor of Philosophy, Clark University

Not very long ago, I published an article called "Ethics without Virtue" in which I criticized the way ethics is being taught in American colleges. I pointed out that there is an overemphasis on social policy questions, with little or no attention being paid to private morality.

I noted that students taking college ethics are debating abortion, euthanasia, capital punishment, DNA research, and the ethics of transplant surgery while they learn almost nothing about private decency, honesty, personal responsibility, or honor. Topics such as hypocrisy, self-deception, cruelty or selfishness rarely came up. I argued that the current style of ethics teaching which concentrated so much on social policy was giving students the wrong ideas about ethics. Social morality is only half of the moral life; the other half is private morality. I urged that we attend to both.

A colleague of mine did not like what I said. She told me that in her classroom she would continue to focus on issues of social injustice. She taught about women's oppression corruption in big business, multinational corporations and their transgressions in the Third World - that sort of thing. She said to me, "You are not going to have moral people until you have moral institutions. You will not have moral citizens until you have a moral government." She made it clear that I was wasting time and even doing harm by promoting bourgeois morality and the bourgeois virtues instead of awakening the social conscience of my students.

At the end of the semester, she came into my office carrying a stack of exams and looking very upset.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"They cheated on their social justice take-home finals. They plagiarized!" More than half of the students in her ethics class had copied long passages from the secondary literature. "What are you going to do?" I asked her. She gave me a self-mocking smile and said, "I'd like to borrow a copy of that article you wrote on ethics without virtue."

A Hole in the Moral Ozone

There have been major cheating scandals at many of our best universities. A recent survey reported in the Boston Globe says that 75 percent of all high school students admit to cheating; for college students the figure is 50 percent. A U.S. News and World Report survey asked college-age students if they would steal from an employer. Thirty-four percent said they would. Of people forty-five and over, six percent responded in the affirmative.

Part of the problem is that so many students come to college dogmatically committed to a moral relativism that offers them no grounds to think that cheating is just wrong. I sometimes play a macabre game with first-year students, trying to find some act they will condemn as morally wrong: Torturing a child. Starving someone to death. Humiliating an invalid in a nursing home. The reply is often: "Torture, starvation, and humiliation may be bad for you or me, but who are we to say they are bad for someone else?"

Not all students are dogmatic relativists; nor are they all cheaters and liars. Even so, it is impossible to deny that there is a great deal of moral drift. The students' ability to arrive at reasonable moral judgments is severely, even bizarrely, affected. A Harvard University professor annually offers a large history class on the Second World War and the rise of the Nazis. Some years back, he was stunned to learn from his teaching assistant that the majority of students in the class did not believe that anyone was really to blame for the Holocaust. The graduate assistant asserted that if these Harvard students were sitting in judgment at Nuremberg they would have let everyone off. No one was to blame. In the students' minds, the Holocaust was like a natural cataclysm: it was inevitable and unavoidable. The professor refers to his students' attitude about the past as "no-fault history."

One philosopher, Alasdair MacIntyre, has said that we may be raising a generation of "moral stutterers." Others call it moral illiteracy. Education consultant Michael Josephson says: "There is a hole in the moral ozone." Well, what should the schools be doing to make children morally literate, to put fault back into no-fault history, to mend the hole in the moral ozone?

How Ethics Courses Have Changed

First, a bit of history. Let me remind you of how ethics was once taught in American colleges. In the nineteenth century, the ethics course was a high point of college life. It was taken in the senior year, and was usually taught by the president of the college who would uninhibitedly urge the students to become morally better and stronger. The senior ethics course was in fact the culmination of the students' college experience. But as the social sciences began to flourish in the early twentieth century, ethics courses gradually lost prominence until they became just one of several electives offered by philosophy departments. By the mid-1960s, enrollment in courses on moral philosophy reached an all-time low and, as one historian of higher education put it, "college ethics was in deep trouble."

At the end of the '60s, there was a rapid turnaround. To the surprise of many a department chair, applied ethics courses suddenly proved to be very popular. Philosophy departments began to attract unprecedented numbers of students to course in medical ethics, business ethics, ethics for everyday life, ethics for lawyers, for social workers, for nurses, for journalists. More recently, the dubious behavior of some politicians and financiers has added to public concern over ethical standards which in turn has contributed to the feeling that college ethics is needed. Today American colleges and universities are offering thousands of well-attended courses in applied ethics.

I, too, have been teaching applied ethics courses for several years, but my enthusiasm for them tapered off when I was how the students reacted. I was especially disturbed by comments students made again and again on the course evaluation forms: "I learned there was no such thing as right or wrong, just good or bad arguments." Or: "I learned there is no such thing as morality." I asked myself: What it was about these classes that was fostering this sort of moral agnosticism and skepticism. Perhaps the students themselves were part of the problem. Perhaps it was their high school experience that led them to become moral agnostics. Even so, I felt that my classes were doing nothing to change them.

The course I had been giving was altogether typical. At the beginning of the semester we studied a bit of moral theory, going over the strengths and weaknesses of Kantianism, utilitarianism, social contract theory and relativism. We then took up topical moral issues such as abortion, censorship, capital punishment, world hunger, and affirmative action. Naturally, I felt it my job to present careful and well-argued positions on all sides of these popular issues. but this atmosphere of argument and counterargument was reinforcing the idea that all moral questions have at least two sides, i.e., that all of ethics is controversial.

Perhaps this reaction is to be expected in any ethics course primarily devoted to issues on which it is natural to have a wide range of disagreement. In a course specifically devoted to dilemmas and hard cases, it is almost impossible not to give the student the impression that ethics itself has no solid foundation.

The "Plain Moral Facts"

The relevant distinction here is between "basic" ethics and "dilemma" ethics. It is basic ethics that G.J. Warnock has in mind when he warns his fellow moral philosophers not to be bullied out of holding fast to the "plain moral facts." Because the typical course in applied ethics concentrates on problems and dilemmas, the students may easily lose sight of the fact that some things are clearly right and some are clearly wrong, that some ethical truths are not subject to serious debate.

I recently said something to this effect during a television interview in Boston, and the skeptical interviewer immediately asked me to name some uncontroversial ethical truths. After stammering for a moment, I found myself rattling off several that I hold to be uncontroversial:

It is wrong to mistreat a child, to humiliate someone, to torment an animal. To think only of yourself, to steal, to lie, to break promises. And on the positive side: it is right to be considerate and respectful of others, to be charitable and generous.

Reflecting again on that extemporaneous response, I am aware that not everyone will agree that all of these are plain moral facts. But teachers of ethics are free to give their own list or to pare down mine. In teaching ethics, one thing should be made central and prominent: right and wrong do exist. This should be laid down as uncontroversial lest one leaves an altogether false impression that everything is up for grabs.

It will, I think, be granted that the average student today does not come to college steeped in a religious or ethical tradition in which he or she has uncritical confidence. In the atmosphere of a course dealing with hard and controversial cases, the contemporary student may easily find the very idea of a stable moral tradition to be an archaic illusion. I am suggesting that we may have some responsibility here for providing the student with what the philosopher Henry Sidgwick called "moral common sense." (Sometimes he spoke of "established morality" as it is commonly understood and accepted.)

More generally, I am suggesting that we should assess some of the courses we teach for their edificatory effect. Our responsibility as teachers goes beyond purveying information about the leading ethical theories and in developing dialectical skill in moral casuistry. I have come to see that dilemma ethics is especially lacking in edificatory force, and indeed that it may even be a significant factor in encouraging a superficial moral relativism or agnosticism.

I shall not really argue the case for seeing the responsibility of the teacher of ethics in traditional terms. It would seem to me that the burden of argument is on those who would maintain that modern teachers of ethics should abjure the teacher's traditional concern with edification. Moreover, it seems to me that the hands-off posture is not really as neutral as it professes to be. (Author Samuel Blumenfeld is even firmer on this point. He says, "You have to be dead to be value-neutral.")

One could also make a case that the new attitude of disowning responsibility probably contributes to the student's belief in the false and debilitating doctrine that there are no "plain moral facts" after all. In tacitly or explicitly promoting that doctrine, the teacher contributes to the student's lack of confidence in a moral life that could be grounded in something more than personal disposition or political fashion. I am convinced that we could be doing a far better job of moral education.

If one accepts the idea that moral edification is not an improper desideratum in the teaching of ethics, then the question arises: What sort of course in ethics is effective? What ethical teachings are naturally edificatory? My own experience leads me to recommend a course on the philosophy of virtue. Here, Aristotle is the best place to begin. Philosophers as diverse as Plato, Augustine, Kant and even Mill wrote about vice and virtue. And there is an impressive contemporary literature on the subject. But the locus classicus is Aristotle.

Students find a great deal of plausibility in Aristotle's theory of moral education, as well as personal relevance in what he says about courage, generosity, temperance and other virtues. I have found that an exposure to Aristotle makes an immediate inroad on dogmatic relativism; indeed the tendency to dismiss morality as relative to taste or social fashion rapidly diminishes and may vanish altogether. Most students find the idea of developing virtuous character traits naturally appealing.

Once the student becomes engaged with the problem of what kind of person to be, and how to become that kind of person, the problems of ethics become concrete and practical and, for many a student, morality itself is thereafter looked on as a natural and even inescapable personal undertaking. I have not come across students who have taken a course in the philosophy of virtue saying that they have learned there is no such thing as morality. The writings of Aristotle and of other philosophers of virtue are full of argument and controversy, but students who read them with care are not tempted to say they learned "there is no right or wrong, only good or bad arguments."

At the elementary and secondary level students may be too young to study the philosophy of virtue, but they certainly are capable of reading stories and biographies about great men and women. Unfortunately, today's primary school teachers, many of whom are heavily influenced by what they were taught in trendy schools of education, make little use of the time-honored techniques of telling a story to young children and driving home "the moral of the story." What are they doing?

Values Clarification: No Right or Wrong

One favored method of moral education that has been popular for the past twenty years is called "Values Clarification," which maintains the principle that the teacher should never directly tell students about right and wrong, instead the students must be left to discover "values" on their own. One favored values clarification technique is to ask children about the likes and dislikes: to help them become acquainted with their personal preferences. The teacher asks the students, "How do you feel about homemade birthday presents? Do you like wall-to-wall carpeting? What is your favorite color? Which flavor of ice cream do you prefer? How do you feel about hit-and-run drivers? What are your feelings on the abortion question?" The reaction to these questions - from wall-to-wall carpeting and to hit-and-run drivers - is elicited from the student in the same tone of voice - as if one's personal preferences in both instances are all that matters.

One of my favorite anecdotes concerns a teacher in Newton, Massachusetts who had attended numerous values clarification workshops and was assiduously applying its techniques in her class. The day came when her class of sixth graders announced that they valued cheating and wanted to be free to do it on their test. The teacher was very uncomfortable. Her solution? She told the children that since it was her class, and since she was opposed to cheating, they were not free to cheat. "In my class you must be honest, for I value honesty. In other areas of your life you may be free to cheat."

Now this fine and sincere young woman was doing her best not to indoctrinate her students. But what she was telling them is that cheating is not wrong if you can get away with it. Good values are "what one values." She valued the norm of not cheating. That made this value binding on her, and gave her the moral authority to enforce it in her classroom; others, including the students, were free to choose other values "elsewhere." The teacher thought she had no right to intrude by giving the students moral direction. Of course, the price for her failure to do her job in inculcating moral principles is going to be paid by her bewildered students. They are being denied a structural way to develop values. Their teacher is not about to give it to them lest she interfere with their freedom to work out their own value systems.

Preferences over Principles

This Massachusetts teacher values honesty, but her educational theory does not allow her the freedom to take a strong stand on honest as a moral principle. Her training has led her to treat her "preference" for honesty as she treats her preference for vanilla over chocolate flavored ice cream. It is not hard to see how this doctrine is an egotistical variant of ethical relativism. For most ethical relativists, public opinion is the final court of ethical appeal; for the proponent of values clarification, the locus of moral authority is to be found in the individual's private tastes and preferences.

How sad that so many teachers feel intellectually and "morally" unable to justify their own belief that cheating is wrong. It is obvious that our schools must have clear behavior codes and high expectations for their students. Civility, honest and considerate behavior must be recognized, encouraged and rewarded. That means that moral education must have as its explicit aim the moral betterment of the student. If that be indoctrination, so be it. How can we hope to equip the students to face the challenge of moral responsibility in their lives if we studiously avoid telling them what is right and what is wrong?

The elementary schools of Amherst, New York provide good examples of an unabashedly directive moral education. Posters are placed around the school extolling kindness and helpfulness. Good behavior in the cafeteria is rewarded by being able to sit at a "high table" with a tablecloth and flowers. One kindergarten student was given a special award for having taken a new Korean student under her wing. But such simple and reasonable methods as those practiced in Amherst, New York are rare. Many school systems have given up entirely the task of character education. Children are left to fend for themselves. To my mind, leaving children alone to discover their values own values is a little like putting them in a chemistry lab and saying, "Discover your own compounds, kids." If they blow themselves up, at least they have engaged in an authentic search for the self.

Can There Be Genuine Moral Education?

Ah, you may say, we do not let children fend for themselves in chemistry laboratories because we have knowledge about the chemicals. But is there really such thing as moral knowledge? The reply to that is an emphatic "Yes." Have we not learned a thing or two over the past several thousand years of civilization? To pretend we know nothing about basic decency, about human rights, about vice and virtue, is fatuous or disingenuous. Of course we know that gratuitous cruelty and political repression are wrong, that kindness and political freedom are right and good. Why should we be the first society in history that finds itself hamstrung in the vital task of passing along its moral tradition to the next generation?

Some opponents of directive moral education argue that it could be a form of brainwashing. That is a pernicious confusion. To brainwash is to diminish someone's capacity for reasoned judgment. It is perversely misleading to say that helping children to develop habits of truth telling or fair play threatens their ability to make reasoned choices. Quite the contrary: good moral habits enhance one's capacity for rational judgments.

The paralyzing fear of indoctrinating children is even greater in high schools than it is in elementary schools. One favored teaching technique, allegedly avoiding indoctrination, is dilemma ethics. Children are presented with abstract moral dilemmas: Seven people are in a lifeboat with provisions for four - what should they do? Or Lawrence Kohlberg's famous case of Heinz and the stolen drug. Should the indigent Heinz, whose dying wife needs medicine, steal it? When high school students study ethics at all, it is usually in the form of pondering such dilemmas or in the form of debates on social issues: abortion, euthanasia, capital punishment and the like. Directive moral education is out of favor. Storytelling is out of fashion.

Let's consider for a moment just how the current fashion in dilemmas differs from the older approach to moral education which often used moral tales and parables to instill moral principles in students in the primary grades. Saul Bellow asserts that the survival of Jewish culture would be inconceivable without the stories that gave point and meaning to the Jewish moral tradition. One such story, included in a collection of Jewish tales that Bellow edited, is called "If Not Higher." I sketch it here to contrast the story-approach with the dilemma-approach in primary and secondary education, but the moral of the contrast also applies to the teaching of ethics at the college level as well:

There was once a rabbi in a small Jewish village in Russia who vanished every Friday morning for several hours. The devoted villagers boasted that during these hours their rabbi ascended to Heaven to talk with God. A skeptical newcomer arrived in town, determined to discover where the rabbi really was.

One Friday morning the newcomer hid near the rabbi's house, watched him rise, say his prayers and put on the clothes of a peasant. He was him take an ax and go into the forest, chip down a tree and gather a large bundle of wood. Next the rabbi proceeded to a shack in the poorest section of the village in which lived an old woman and her sick son. He left them the wood which was enough for the week. The rabbi then quietly returned to his own house.

The story concludes that the newcomer stayed on in the village and became a disciple of the rabbi. And whenever he hears one of his fellow villagers say, "On Friday morning our rabbi ascends all the way to Heaven," the newcomer quietly adds, "If not higher."

In a moral dilemma such as Kohlberg's Heinz stealing the drug, or the lifeboat case, there are no obvious heroes or villains. Not only do the characters lack moral personality, but they exist in a vacuum outside of traditions and social arrangements that shape their conduct in the problematic situations confronting them. In a dilemma there is no obvious right and wrong, no clear vice and virtue. The dilemma may engage the students' minds; it only marginally engages their emotions, their moral sensibilities. The issues are finely balanced, listeners are on their own and they individually decide for themselves.

As one critic of dilemma ethics has observed, one cannot imagine parents passing down to their children the tale of Heinz and the stolen drug. by contrast, in the story of the rabbi and the skeptical outsider, it is not up to the listener to decide whether or not the rabbi did the right thing. the moral message is clear: "Here is a good man - merciful, compassionate and actively helping someone weak and vulnerable. Be like that person." The message is contagious. Even the skeptic gets the point.

Stories and parables are not always appropriate for high school or college ethics courses, but the literary classics certainly are. To understand King Lear, Oliver Twist, Huckleberry Finn or Millemarch requires that the reader have some understanding of (and sympathy with) what the author is saying about the moral ties that bind the characters and that hold in place the social fabric in which they play their roles. Take something like filial obligation. One moral of King Lear is that society cannot survive when filial contempt becomes the norm. Literary figures can thus provide students with the moral paradigms that Aristotle thought were essential to moral education.

I am not suggesting that moral puzzles and dilemmas have no place in the ethics curriculum. To teach something about the logic of moral discourse and the practice of moral reasoning in resolving conflicts of principles is clearly important. But casuistry is not the place to start, and, taken by itself, dilemma ethics provides little or no moral sustenance. Moreover, an exclusive diet of dilemma ethics tends to give the student the impression that ethical thinking is a lawyer's game.

Three Steps Towards Virtue

If I were an educational entrepreneur I might offer you a four-or five-stage program in the manner of some of the popular educational consultants. I would have brochures, audio-visual materials. There would be workshops. But there is no need for brochures, nor for special equipment, nor for workshops. What I am recommending is not new, it has worked before, and it is simple:

1. Schools should have behavior codes that emphasize civility, kindness and honesty.
2. Teachers should not be accused of brainwashing children when they insist on basic civility, decency, honesty and fairness.
3. Children should be told stories that reinforce goodness. In high school and college, students should be reading, studying and discussing the moral classics.

I am suggesting that teachers must help children become acquainted with their moral heritage in literature, in religion and in philosophy. I am suggesting that virtue can be taught, and that effective moral education appeals to the emotions as well as to the mind. The best moral teaching inspires students by making them keenly aware that their own character is at stake.

Siberia Considered Land of Opportunity According to 6th Graders Textbook

LONGVIEW, TX (FR) - The U.S. public education system is distributing Soviet propaganda in the guise of social studies textbooks.

Sixth graders are learning that Siberia is a land of opportunity, and not the location of slave labor camps for citizens who do not conform to Soviet wishes.

Mel Gabler, educational research analyst, recently gave a presentation to the Texas State Textbook Committee in Austin, Texas, concerning several social studies textbooks which give a radically different view of Soviet life. A few weeks after the presentation, the committee voted, without comment or discussion, to recommend for adoption all of the social studies texts that had been submitted by publishers.

According to the textbook, The World Past To Present, "Young Soviet workers go east much as young Americans used to go west to make their fortunes," and "The Soviet government encourages these young people to do so. It offers them better wages, longer holidays, and life of adventure."

After reading passages that describe Siberia as a "land of opportunity" and/or a "life of adventure" the student is assigned to write an essay that describes Siberia as a land of opportunity. Students are asked to include terms such as unexplored wilderness, life of adventure, and better wages in their passages.

Soviet satellite countries are termed 'independent nations,' although they are under Soviet control. The text does not indicate that the Soviets should divest themselves of their colonies (satellites) as is stressed for Western colonies. Angola, Congo, Ethiopia, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia, and Zimbabwe are called independent nations.

The absence of civil rights in totalitarian Marxist nations is virtually ignored in the textbooks. The harsh regimentation in China is depicted as beneficial teamwork. Communism is not totalitarian, but midway between democracy and totalitarianism, according to the textbooks.

The textbook is also 20 years out of date with the civil rights situation in South Africa. Chief Buthelezi, a black moderate who is the elected leader of 7,000,000 Zulus and represents the vast majority of South African Blacks, is not mentioned, whereas Bishop Tutu who conveys the radical extremist position of the African National Congress is given prominence even though he represents only a tiny percentage of the Blacks in South Africa.

Regarding genocide, the textbook censors the fact that the Soviet Union has eliminated approximately 23,000,000 people. German atrocities are clearly set at 6,000,000. In China, the estimated number of persons eliminated in purges run from a minimum of 45,000,000 to over 80,000,000.

Traditional American values are considered a "moral equivalent" to Marxist values. The student is never told that the Marxist value system is directly opposite the values upon which our nation was founded, and which are still held by a vast majority of American citizens.

Mel Gabler and his wife, Norma, analyze and provide evaluations of textbooks and are based in Austin, Texas. For more information, write: The Mel Gablers, P.O. Box 7518, Longview, Texas 75607-7518.

Nationwide Textbook Undermines Family Values

by Ray Kerrison/Columnist, New York Post
Human Events - May 13, 1989

One of the most distressing trends in modern life is the promotion of state-sponsored decadence, where taxpayer funds are used to subsidize activities once deemed immoral.

But not even I was prepared for the appalling things they are doing at Nassau Community College in the name of education.

This college, in Garden City, [Long Island, N.Y.], has a student enrollment of 18,000. State and county taxpayers subsidize it with more than $60 million a year. It has a course called "Family Life and Human Sexuality," which 3,000 teenagers take each year. This course comes right out of a Times Square snakepit.

On the first day of class [last] spring, students were asked to get the signatures of anyone who has done any of the following: had intercourse with a prostitute, made love in the back seat of a car, seen their parents naked lately, used a condom, gone to a pornographic movie.

Later, they were invited to "try something," such as taking a field trip. The students were told: "Try to do something that will challenge your mind, expand your intellectual horizons ..."

Suggested field trips: Go to a nude beach, a gay bar, a divorce court, an abortion clinic. Also suggested: Interview a prostitute about her experiences.

So, if you see a bunch of college kids chasing a hooker down Eight Avenue, don't be alarmed. It's just some Nassau Community students challenging their minds and expanding their intellectual horizons.

A textbook for this class is titled Our Sexuality, which treats in graphic detail sexual intercourse, masturbation, wife-swapping, adultery, abortion, exotic practices.

It is big on vibrators. Samples: "Women tend to be greater enthusiasts of this technical advancement. If you want to use a vibrator for sexual pleasure, experimentation is in order. By placing it in different areas of the body or genitals, you can find what is particularly arousing." The book describes all the vibrators available, those that may or may not require an electric outlet, how best to use them, where to buy them, etc.

It discusses swinging, wife-swapping and all kinds of sexual relationships, without condemning any of them.

It has a chapter titled "Nonconsensual Extra-marital Relationships." It explains: "This form of behavior has been given many labels, including cheating, adultery, infidelity ..."

Gee. I always thought adultery was an act forbidden by God in the Commandments handed to Moses. I never knew it was a label.

Nassau Community also has sex movies. You bet it has. One is called "Sexual Intercourse," which depicts couples copulating in all sorts of exotic places, including a spinning bed. There are close-ups of male and female anatomies.

Prof. Joseph Dondero, who chairs the course, agreed that the course and films were "very graphic." He said: "If you have a film about sexual intercourse, then you show people having intercourse, and that is as specific as you can get. No one is required to take the course. It's an option. It is unquestionably one of the most popular courses on campus, and rarely do we get a complaint."

Prof. Dondero said the course "describes various behaviors, but does not endorse any of them."

Frank Russo, a Nassau resident and father of seven children, is very unhappy that his taxes support this stuff.

"Can anyone tell me what educational value there is in asking someone whether they have seen their parents naked lately?" he asked. "These people are using our tax money to destroy our values."

Russo then made this devastating observation: "I never dreamed it possible that a college student could earn three credits by going to a porno movie, visiting a hooker, turning up at a gay bar. From an academic point of view, it's a disgrace."

In his article on how New York taxpayers are subsidizing a value-free sex education course at Nassau Community College, columnist Ray Kerrison notes that a central feature of the instruction is a textbook called Our Sexuality, put out by the Benjamin/Cummings Publishing Co., Inc. According to the college, this controversial textbook is "the leading" one on human sexuality, having been adopted by over 200 schools and used by "more than 125,000 students."

The authors are Robert Crooks, who has a Ph.D. in psychology, and Karla Baur, with a master's degree in social works.

Kerrison points out that the text "treats in graphic detail sexual intercourse, masturbation, wife-swapping, adultery, abortion" and "discusses swinging ... and all kinds of sexual relationships without condemning any of them."

Indeed, we would go further, insisting the volume is more than "neutral" on the subject of various kinds of sexual behavior. From our reading, the book either implicitly or explicitly endorses homosexual and bisexual activity, blesses homosexual marriages, encourages "casual sex" to the extent of providing "guidelines" for such encounters and urges students to "set aside a block of time (at least one hour for the entire exercise)" for fondling genitals and masturbating.

It also suggests that marijuana usage is a safe and legitimate way of reducing sexual inhibitions, that "extramarital sex" can have a positive impact on people and their marriage, that children might be better raised in an "androgynous fashion" and that the U.S. should establish "a compulsory national sex education curriculum that is extended to all grade levels."

Among the colleges which use this text, according to Nassau Community College authorities:

New York State: Adelphi University, College of Staten Island, Iona College, Jr. College of Albany, St. Francis College, Syracuse University, Borough of Manhattan CC, Columbia University, Lehman College, New York University, SUNY/ Cortland, Tompkins Cortland CC, Bronx CC, CUNY/York College, Jefferson CC, Orange Co. CC, SUNY/Buffalo.

Outside of New York State: Union Theological Seminary, VA; University of Arizona; Loyola Marymount U., CA; St. Joseph College, CT; University of Miami; Emory University, GA; University of Illinois; Christian Theologic Seminary, IN; Central Baptist Theological Seminary, KS; University of North Carolina; University of Oregon.

Also: Temple University; University of Texas; University of Vermont; University of Wisconsin; Auburn University, AL; University of Arkansas; St. Mary's College, CA; Miami Dade CC; University of Florida; University of Georgia; Purdue University, IN; Michigan State; University of Minnesota; Ohio State; Penn State; Our Lady of the Lake, TX; University of Utah; Washington State.

The rest of the list can be obtained from the publishing firm.

If you want to complain to the textbook company, write to your local university officials, as well as the Benjamin/Cummings Publishing Co., Inc., 2727 Sand Hill Road, Menlo Park, CA 94025.

Steps Toward Self Education

By Jay Rogers

Recent test results have revealed that the average American student today has stronger skills in the school subjects of Math and English than the students of a generation ago. This is a result of the so-called "back-to-basics" movement which began in the early '70s. After a generation has passed it has become obvious that the back to basics movement worked - students are now stronger in basic skills than they were 15 years ago - but students today are also less well-rounded than they used to be.

The average American student can read and write well and solve basic math problems, however, there is a huge gap in what has been called cultural literacy. This means that in areas such as history, geography, civics and science, American students are poorly equipped. At the graduate level, for instance, most doctorates in science are now awarded to international students. If this trend continues, foreign countries will soon outshine the United States in scientific fields.

Another sad fact is that most Americans have only a vague knowledge of their heritage. Even as many nations of the world such as China, the Soviet Union, South Africa and those in Eastern Europe are beginning to look to American history in order to understand principles of government and liberty, as a result of ignorance, the average American student has little to share with the world.

Although this situation does not look very bright, there is a remedy. Many Americans of past centuries became successful and contributed a great deal to their society with little formal education. Many Americans of the 18th and 19th centuries were self-educated and studied well into their adult years amassing knowledge as a life long process. Voluntary self-education is needed by an entire generation of Americans in order for them to become relevant, productive members of their society.

Improving Your Cultural Literacy

The following books are recommended by the staff of The Forerunner for those who desire to reeducate themselves in the most important areas of the basic school curriculum. Please note that this list has been prepared by a Christian primarily for a Christian audience. Because Christian history and ideas have been carefully edited from the public school curriculum over the last 100 years, there is a great need to restore these truths. This list was prepared with that in mind.

CULTURAL LITERACY IN GENERAL:

E.D. Hirsch, Jr., Cultural Literacy: What Every American Needs to Know, Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. Available in most libraries and bookstores. This book has an excellent list of terms, personalities, places, and dates which are considered by the author to be necessary knowledge in today's society. This list is guaranteed to show you how much you don't know!

Allan Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind, Simon and Schuster, New York. Available in your library. A University of Chicago professor makes a strong statement against modern American education and its rejection of moral absolutes. Bloom links our current literacy crisis with this lack of moral values.

HISTORY and GOVERNMENT:

Charles Coffin, The Story of Liberty, Maranatha Publications, P.O. Box 1799, Gainesville, FL 32602. Reprinting of an 1879 classic history text. Available only from the publisher / $11.95. This 412-page illustrated volume tells the story of how civil freedom progressed from the Magna Charta to the establishing to the United States. This understanding of how freedom grew out of the growth of Christianity in Europe is missing in most history courses today.

Peter Marshall and David Manuel, The Light and the Glory, Fleming Revell Company, Old Tappan, New Jersey. Available at all Christian bookstores. A classic retelling of the early history of America without the editing of the secular humanists. This book does not glamorize our Christian founders - it tells the truth about the glories and the failures of the men and women who founded America.

James Draper, If the Foundations Be Destroyed, Thomas Nelson Publishers, Nashville. Another excellent retelling of America's history that does not apologize for our Christian beginnings. A shorter but well-documented work. Available at Christian bookstores.

Verna Hall, The Christian History of the United States of America - Christian Self-Government, San Francisco, Foundation for American Christian Education. An important collection of writings from the founders which reveal just how Christian these men were in their reasoning and philosophy. A very scholarly work best used in group study. A companion study volume is also available. Contact the Foundation for American Christian Education, Box 27035, San Francisco, California 94127.

David Stedman and LaVaughn Lewis, Our Ageless Constitution, W. David Stedman Associates, Asheboro, North Carolina. This attractive volume is the best-researched work in recent history to help make the American Constitution understandable to the common man. Available from the Stedman Foundation, P.O. Box 2909, Asheboro, North Carolina 27203.

Historical documents and papers which are also required reading:

The Mayflower Compact
The Declaration of Independence
The Constitution of the United States of America
The Gettysburg Address
Abraham Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address

LITERATURE and PHILOSOPHY

Gary DeMar, Surviving College Successfully, Wolgemuth and Hyatt, Nashville. Available at your Christian bookstore. This book, written primarily for college students, gives a good overview of the philosophies currently waging war against truth on the university campus. It is excellent material to help a student begin to formulate his own convictions about biblical truth.

Dagobert Runes, Pictorial History of Philosophy, Bramhall House, New York (or any other overview of philosophy available in your library). Every Christian needs a basic understanding of the major philosophies which have dominated different parts of the world. Another good overview is Will Durant's The Story of Philosophy, Simon and Schuster, New York. Available at most bookstores or libraries.

It is recommended that the serious student NOT begin this by reading the works of the philosophers themselves, but rather by reading an abbreviated overview of different philosophies and the men behind them. The philosophies you should study must include:

Plato and Greek thought

Islam

Marxism

Rationalism / Humanism

Buddhism and Eastern mysticism

Evolution

In studying literature, it is not necessary to read all the so-called great literary works themselves to be culturally literate. The most important goal here is to understand the concepts and philosophies which were promoted by these writers. A good way to cultivate this understanding is to read the condensed biographical sketches of individual authors as they appear in The Norton Anthologies. These literature collections can be purchased at any campus bookstore: The Norton Anthology of British Literature (I and II), The Norton Anthology of American Literature (I and II), and The Norton Anthology of World Literature.

The biographical sketches of the authors will reveal their motivation and the cultural and historical significance of their work and how their ideas have affected us today.

If we were to prepare a recommended reading list of great literature, we would select the following as the most important. These are also the books which we would recommend for children and teens to introduce them to the great books:

The King James Bible (to understand Old English language structure)

The Canterbury Tales by Geoffrey Chaucer (to understand the Protestant Reformation)

Foxes' Book of Martyrs (this book was once standard fare for children - a classic account of the lives and deaths of the heroic Christians who died for their faith)

Aesop's Fables by Aesop

Fairy Tales by Hans Christian Anderson
The works of Shakespeare
Ivanhoe by Sir Walter Scott
A Journal of the Plague Year by Daniel Defoe
Paradise Lost by John Milton
Pilgrim's Progress by John Bunyan
Treasure Island by Robert Louis Stevenson
Oliver Twist and A Christmas Carol by Charles Dickens
The works of Jonathan Edwards
Of Plymouth Plantation by William Bradford
The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin
The Last of the Mohicans by James Fenimore Cooper
The Legend of Sleepy Hollow and Other Stories by Washington Irving
The Courtship of Miles Standish and Evangeline by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow
The Adventures of Tom Sawyer by Mark Twain
Johnny Tremain by Esther Forbes

An excellent source for the best in literature for children is Books Children Love by Elizabeth Wilson, Crossway Books. Available at Christian bookstores.

GEOGRAPHY

The problem of geographic illiteracy in America is growing rapidly, mainly because the subject itself is not taught as an individual discipline in public schools; it is now incorporated into a vague "social studies" plan which has failed miserably. The only way Americans can regain their needed understanding of geography is to educate themselves with a few simple lessons.

Every home needs a globe, a world map, and a good world atlas. Good quality atlases can be purchased at varying price ranges from your local bookstore.

One easy way to become geographically literate is to practice this exercise: every time you read or hear about a place in the world with which you are not familiar, look it up in your atlas or on a map. If a newscaster mentions the Po River, the city of Lagos, or an outbreak of violence in Sri Lanka, go immediately and familiarize yourself with where these places are.

If you have difficulty in reading maps, you can read The Language of Maps, by Haig Rushdoony, Pitman Learning, 1982. This is a practical workbook for parents and students to teach map reading skills.

SCIENCE

Those of us who spent 12 years in public schools have been indoctrinated in evolutionary thought. Our minds have been strapped by deception and ignorance because of this mindset, and we all desperately need to have our minds renewed in these areas. The following books, published by Creation-Life Publishers, are recommended as the best introduction to a proper understanding of science. These books are balanced and objective. Contact Creation-Life Publishers, P.O. Box 15666, San Diego, CA 92115

Scientific Creationism by Henry Morris, Ph.D.
The Waters Above by Joseph Dillow
The Genesis Flood by Henry Morris, Ph.D.
The History of Evolutionary Thought by Bert Thompson, Ph.D.
Evolution: The Fossils Say No! by Duane Gish, Ph.D.
The Biblical Basis for Modern Science by Henry Morris, Ph.D.
Origins and Destiny by Dr. Robert Gange

This list is by no means complete. These books represent just a small sampling of the areas of learning in which most young Americans are sadly deficient. It is hoped that our readers will begin to take the challenge of self education seriously. If just least a few Americans will begin to reclaim the areas of lost knowledge which past generations mastered, this will be one step toward restoring the standard of academic excellence which this country once attained.

THEOLOGY

The following books are excellent resources for those building a library of Christian classics. These books cover a broad spectrum of Church history and theology for those who desire to better understand America's Puritan heritage as a model for rebuilding a Christian democratic republic.

Institutes of the Christian Religion, by John Calvin, William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, Grand Rapids, MI.

The Reformation in Scotland, by John Knox, Banner of Truth Trust, P.O. Box 621, Carlisle, PA 17013.

Systematic Theology, by Charles Hodge, Available through Christian Book Distributors, Box 6000, Peabody, MA 01961, 3 volumes.

A History of Chrisitanity, by Kenneth Scott LaTourette, Harper & Brothers, New York, NY, 2 volumes.

Christ's Victorious Kingdom: Postmillennialism Reconsidered, by John Jefferson Davis, Baker Book House, Grand Rapids, Michigan.

That You May Prosper: Dominion By Covenant, by Ray Sutton, Dominion Press, 7112 Burns St., Ft. Worth, TX 76118.

Unchanging Values in a Changing Society

By Erin Doherty

8/92

"There is not a shadow of right in the general government to intermeddle with religion. Its least interference with it would be most flagrant usurpation."

- James Madison

President James Madison had faith that the American People would never become so apathetic as to allow government to overstep its proper jurisdiction. Yet sadly enough, these words have come true.

The conflict over the separation of church and state is one example of how we as Americans have exchanged a moral based society of values in which there is freedom to exercise religion without restraint for a society of pluralism lacking absolutes. A clear example is the new policy accepted by many public schools regarding graduation ceremonies. Any individual, whether student, teacher, principal, etc., is forbidden to mention the deity during the exercises and must substitute the benediction, convocation, and prayers with the new title of merely an "introduction."

Prohibiting a student from sharing that God was his or her strength and inspiration during schooling is the same as prohibiting her or him from thanking parents and teachers. This is a direct violation of freedom of speech and the exercise of religion. I am offended that our elders have so small an opinion of us as teenagers that they feel that they can take away our constitutionally protected rights. I am saddened by the fact that it is most likely true that the majority of my peers don't care that their rights are being usurped, or are ignorant of the fact that this is occurring. They fail to embrace values and ideas as their own opinions, but rather operate with a sort of herd instinct, blindly following the message of watered down compromise and rejecting the legitimacy of absolutes.

What really irks me, though, is that Americans are standing by watching as the federal government moves on the offensive to enlarge its sphere of jurisdiction. We're losing by default, not bothering to show up at the game or forfeiting because of the size and the power of the other team. We figure that the government can have one little segment; that won't really effect us. But the usurpation mushrooms, until we are a people with rights theoretically but actually living in bondage as a result of forfeiting our values.

Wake up, America! Are we willing to pass on to the next generation the tenacity to fight for what we believe and stand without inhibition for principles? How can we continue to include God when He's necessary and exclude Him when He's inconvenient or when He's done with what we want Him to do? We beg him on our knees to help us win a war and keep casualties low, and when He successfully completes that, we politely show Him the exit as we go on to things we can supposedly handle on our own. How much longer can we go on basking in the benefits of His blessings, but rejecting His personal interaction within our lives and ignoring His presence? Not much longer, I'm afraid.

We must work to rebuild the Christian principles and values upon which our nation was built.

Erin Doherty is a student at the New Testament Christian School in Plymouth, MA.

Valedictorian is suing school officials for censoring her speech

MOSS BLUFF, LA. (EP) - A Louisiana high school graduate is suing her local school officials for censoring her valedictory speech at commencement. Angela Kay Guidry, who was graduated from Sam Houston High School here in May, says her principal's refusal to let her speak unless she omitted all planned religious references was a violation of her rights to free speech and free exercise of religion.

Guidry is being represented by attorneys of the Rutherford Institute, a nonprofit civil liberties organization specializing in religious freedom questions. Her attorneys are seeking a declaratory judgment protecting Guidry and other students from "interference [with] or denial of" constitutional rights.

According to the lawsuit, Guidry submitted her speech to principal Kerry Durr for review May 15. The speech began by thanking "my Lord Jesus who has allowed me to be in this position tonight." The speech went on to explain Guidry's personal source of motivation. "To me the most important thing in your life is not whether you have a good education or a good job, but whether or not you have the Lord in your life. It doesn't matter how many years you go to school or how successful you are in this life, if you're not doing it all for the Lord," stated the speech.

She planned to close the speech by explaining her belief that people needed to acknowledge Jesus Christ as Savior. "My prayer and challenge to you tonight," she had written, "is that you would seek the Lord Jesus, believe in Him, and give your heart and life to Him."

Guidry's lawsuit says that Durr read the speech and said, "You can't argue with that," but later that day guidance counselor Sylvia Seals telephoned Guidry and asked her to change the speech. A few days later, Guidry says, Seals "engaged in a tirade of criticism" within earshot of Guidry's fellow students, and when Guidry attempted to walk away Seals "grabbed her arm and continued making derogatory and slanderous remarks" about her religious beliefs.

Guidry was later told by Durr to delete all references to personal religious views so no one would be "offended" by the speech. Guidry refused, and was told she would not be allowed to speak.

The school authorities contend that Durr's decision was based on the fear that Guidry's remarks may have been taken as an endorsement of religious view by school authorities. Rutherford attorneys, however, argue that a "valedictorian address is, by its very nature, a personal bidding of farewell," and say Guidry was unconstitutionally deprived of "a meaningful opportunity to exercise her right of free speech and freely express her sincerely held beliefs."

The suit seeks declaratory judgment forbidding similar interference in the future, and compensatory and punitive damages for Seals' "inflammatory remarks impugning [Guidry's] moral character."

Value Free Education "Bankrupt" says educator

SAN DIEGO, CA (FR) - A founder of "value free education" now says he is sorry for the way his philosophy has affected America's young people, and says he owes parents an apology.

Dr. W.R. Coulson, a veteran educator and former faculty member at International University in San Diego, recently told his story in the American Family Association Journal.

In 1967, Coulson helped organize a project to test the effectiveness of what was at that time called "affective education." Funded by the R.J. Reynolds family, the famous cigarette manufacturers, the program was instituted in a system of Catholic schools on the West Coast. The goal of the program was to subvert the established educational emphasis on reason and intellectual pursuit, and to replace it with a value-less curriculum focusing on feelings.

"We thought the exploration of feelings is a more complete process and inherently more democratic," said Coulson. "Everybody has feelings. We wanted the schools to focus more on feelings, and we didn't want to get into an argument about it."

Many educators did not receive the new approach warmly, Coulson admitted: "An increasing number of faculty were becoming uneasy, suspecting they'd been led to collaborate with an enemy, an enemy with little interest in perpetuating their traditions of mindfulness." After working on the project through 1968, Dr. Coulson resigned as research coordinator. However, the R.J. Reynolds company has continued to promote the work through its multi-million dollar program called Helping Youth Decide and by independently helping an organization called Quest.

Today, Quest conducts value-free education programs in public schools for children in 50 states. The value-free approach to classroom instruction has also been adopted by other similar projects, such as Here's Looking At You, Me-ology, Project Charlie, Ombudsman, D.E.C.I.D.E., and dozens more of similar origin.

Coulson also added that the school system which provided the testing ground for the original value-free classroom - the Immaculate Heart schools - eventually collapsed. "There are no more Immaculate Heart schools," he said. "TMP was the cause: Too Much Psychology, Too Many Psychotherapists." This psychologically-based curriculum has taken deep root in American public schools today, and is evidenced by such classroom activities as "Values clarification," death education, and other exercises which attempt to deal with children's fears, sexual frustrations, and resentments rather than simply offering academic instruction.

"Youthful experimentation with sex, alcohol, marijuana, and a variety of other drugs - whatever's popular at the time - has been shown to follow value-free education quite predictably," said Coulson. "We now know that after these classes, students become more prone to give into temptation than if they'd never been enrolled. One cause lies in an educational philosophy that calls on students and teachers alike to disbelieve in the concept of temptation. Moral absolutes are routed ... in favor of a psychotherapeutic imperative."

In retrospect, Coulson said the plan "turned out to be a deadly scheme we hatched those 20 years ago. Carl Rogers (the principal investigator in the original project) died last year. He and I and our project teammates owe the nation's parents an apology."

Coulson also added that the tobacco industry - which funded the original project - has profited well by the value-free curriculum because it has encouraged experimentation with cigarettes and other drugs.

What's Wrong With Education

By Rose Weiner

What's wrong with education today? It doesn't take a great deal of intelligence or common sense to see that when 700,000 graduates can't read their diploma, the problem is that they are teaching the wrong stuff! As one corporate executive suggested, "Take a risk, try anything. Anything will be better than what you are doing now, even if it doesn't work since what your are doing does not work anyway."

For those who have thought it through, there is a solution. First of all teach the children to read properly. Throw out look and say and sight reading and teach traditional phonics that gave early Americans a 100% literacy rate. The English language is not hieroglyphics and was not intended to be taught that way.

Secondly, get rid of the the gifted program. Everyone is gifted and talented. As one corporate executive observed, the gifted program is destroying a vast amount of human potential by telling children that they are just average and can't hope to accomplish much. It is producing a two class society which we have never had. It is causing children to drop out of school believing they can't do anything anyway, to become potential risks and hazards and non productive members of society.

Get rid of the one time test to check knowledge, the rote memory, the multiple choice, fill in the blanks testing and teach young people how to think and reason. Give them enough information in the text books to really understand what they are studying instead of a presentation of a few facts skimmed off the top of the subject.

Six states are trying some new methods that appear to be working. There is not a set class length. If the class gets interested in a science project they could spend as long as three hours on it for the day. There is no promotion until skills are mastered and there is no division of the gifted. Everyone works at their own pace.

There is no classroom with a teacher dominating 85% of the instruction. The student is the worker and the teacher is the coach. Students are not divided into grade levels, the younger students are placed with the older students. The older children help the younger children. Emphasis on each one competing with their neighbor is being eliminated in favor of each one helping their fellow student and learning how to cooperated as a team.

Power and influence in back in the hands of the parents who are re-entering the classroom and getting involved with what is going on. They are holding the teachers, the principles and the school system accountable for what the students are being taught.

Education must return to the basic ideas of early American education, that became derailed before they were ever fully developed. We must get rid of the socialist thought that makes everyone dependent on the teacher. We must teach young Americans how to become independent thinkers, how to gain knowledge for themselves. We must get rid of crime in our schools and consequently deter crime in society.

As Andrew Young, Mayor of Atlanta suggested, "We must reinstate the Ten Commandments and the reading of the Bible in the classroom that gives young people the clear cut knowledge of good and evil, right and wrong."

What Happened When the Praying Stopped

ALEDO, TX (FR) - How did the removal of voluntary prayer from the schools of the United States affect our nation as a whole? That question has been answered in detail by a research company in Texas which has gathered and tabulated statistics from hundreds of sources relating to the rates of moral decline in America.

Specialty Research Associates, under the direction of David Barton, has released a report entitled America: To Pray or Not to Pray which uses over 100 pages of graphs and statistical analysis to prove that crime, venereal disease, premarital sex, illiteracy, suicide, drug use, public corruption, and other social ills began a dramatic increase after the Engel vs. Vitale Supreme Court decision was made in 1962 which banned school prayer.

Prayer in schools prior to 1962 was utilized in school districts all over the U.S. in many varieties. Some teachers used extemporaneous prayers, simply expressing their thoughts and desires; others implemented structured prayers, such as the Lord's Prayer or the 23rd Psalm, or others approved by local school boards. New York students prayed each day: "Almighty God, we acknowledge our dependence on Thee and beg Thy blessing over us, our parents, our teachers, and our nation." It was this simple prayer which came under fire and went to the Supreme Court for the landmark decision.

Says David Barton, "It is impossible to know how many of the 39 million children were involved in daily verbal prayers, but most accounts indicate that a clear majority of the students voluntarily participated in daily school prayer. Is it possible that the prayers that were being offered by these children and their teachers across the nation actually had any measurable, tangible effect?"

It was this question that led Barton to uncover the statistical proof that the removal of prayer did indeed take its toll on America. Below are just a few of the charts featured in Barton's report, with a brief explanation of each:

Figure 1: The SAT (Scholastic Aptitude Test) is an academic test that measures the developed verbal and math reasoning of a student exiting from high school or some similar type of learning facility. The results of these tests are commonly used by colleges and universities to indicate the strength of a student's academic preparation and his potential for success on the college level.

Figure 1 shows how drastically the actual knowledge of high school students began to drop at an accelerating rate after 1962. Barton notes in his report that the upturn in SAT scores since 1981 is due to the increase in private Christian educational facilities which began to flourish at that time. Statistics have proven that students from private Christian schools showed higher academic achievement and higher test scores.

Figure 2: This graph shows the increase in sexual activity in unmarried teen-age girls after the 1962 Supreme Court decision. It is evident from the figures provided that in the years previous to the removal of prayer the rates remained stable and relatively unchanged. In the post- prayer years the numbers immediately began to soar. The sudden increase on the graph appears as if a great restraining force had suddenly been removed.

Figure 3: Unwed women 15-19 years of age showed a phenomenal increase in the rate of pregnancies after the School Prayer decision. Note that the figure jumps drastically after the Supreme Court's Roe vs. Wade decision which made abortion legal in the U.S. The United States now has the highest incidence of teen-age motherhood in any Western country.

Figure 4: For the 15-19 and 20-24 age group, the rates of youth suicide remained relatively unchanged during the years from 1946 to the School Prayer decision in 1962. But in the years since, suicides among the same group have increased 253 percent, or an average of 10.5 percent per year.

Figure 5: Stability in the family has also been affected since the 1962 decision. Divorce, single parent families, couples living together but not married, and adultery are areas of family breakdown which have experienced radical growth in recent years. In the graph above, the increase in single parent families (households with only a mother and children) are detailed. Note the dotted line at the bottom, which shows the rate of growth prior to the 1962 decision.

Figure 6: Crime, productivity, and national morality had been on a fairly stable level prior to the 1962 decision, but that is no longer the case. It is obvious that such a quantity of students praying for their nation had a very positive effect on the course that this nation had taken. The rate of violent crime, as shown above, has risen over 330 percent.

If you would like a copy of America: To Pray or Not to Pray?, send $7.95 to Specialty Research Associates, P.O. Box 397, Aledo, TX 76008. All of the figures and statistics compiled in this book are taken from data made available by the Department of Health and Human Services, the Center for Disease Control, Statistical Abstracts of the United States, Vital Statistics of the United States, the U.S. Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and other official sources.

The World's Greatest Thinkers

The Advancement of Christ's Kingdom through Academia

"I Wisdom dwell with prudence, and find out knowledge of witty inventions."

- Proverbs 8:12

While many Christians of today will admit to being great thinkers, few are as notable as some of the great thinkers of past centuries. America's Christians of today might have opinions about certain areas of thought, such as science, history and technology, but have no formulated, well thought-out worldview as had the saints of past centuries.

The Christian worldview has almost always prevailed in the history of western culture. In fact, some of the greatest thinkers throughout the centuries have been Christians. These people were consistent in their application of Christianity to various intellectual pursuits. The important point is that they did not believe their faith kept them from using their minds.

* In the area of LAW, Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England has remained a classic of legal scholarship since it was first published in the mid-1700s. Blackstone defined law as "a rule of action dictated by some superior being." He claimed that God dictated laws for men, which could be discovered in nature and in the Bible: "Upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws; that is to say, no human law should be suffered to contradict these."1

* In LITERATURE, the number of great Christian writers through the centuries is astounding. To look only at England, we find that many of the greatest poets were Christians, even clergymen: John Donne, George Herbert, and John Milton. Samuel Johnson was, in his time, the leading literary critic in the English language, and the compiler of an early English dictionary. Even into this century, many leading English literary figures were Christians, including G. K. Chesterton, T. S. Eliot, C.S. Lewis, and Dorothy Sayers.

* In PHILOSOPHY, Christians dominated the West from the fifth century until modern times. The great philosophers of the Middle Ages were all theologians: Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, Anselm of Canterbury, William of Ockham. When philosophers began to abandon Christianity in the 17th century, most continued to be influenced by Christianity and to address the issues that Christians had been wrestling with for centuries. Even the "father of modern philosophy," Rene Descartes, despite the evil effects of his thought, was trying to provide a secure proof for the existence of God.

* In POLITICS, many of the important political leaders of the medieval and early modern West were Christians. Until the later Middle Ages, every king of Europe claimed to be Christ's representative on earth. In Russia, the czars claimed to be the protectors of the Orthodox Church right up to the time of the Bolshevik Revolution. In the modern era, such outstanding political figures as John Adams, George Washington, William Gladstone, and William Wilberforce were all to varying degrees professing and practicing Christians.

* In the ARTS, we discover again that most of the (sometimes anonymous) medieval painters, sculptors, and architects were evidently Christians. The great cathedrals of Europe, the magnificent stained glass windows, the colorful altar pieces, the statuary that adorned the cathedrals - all were dedicated to Christian themes, and were generally produced by Christian artisans. During the Renaissance and Reformation periods, artists began to gain more individual recognition, and we have clearer evidence that many were believers. Among these were Rembrandt van Rijn and Albrecht Durer, two Protestant painters.

* In MUSIC, much of Western music was written by Christians.² Johann Sebastian Bach and Georg Friederich Handel are two representatives of the great German Christian tradition in music. Handel's "Messiah," a series of Scripture texts set to some of the most exhilarating music ever written, is still a holiday favorite today. Everyone recognizes the tune to Handel's magnificent "Hallelujah Chorus." Bach was, if anything, even more self-consciously Christian than Handel, and dedicated many of his compositions to the glory of God.

* SCIENCE and technology in the modern world often seem to be at odds with Christianity, but this was not always the case. In fact, after Christianity had taken over the Western Roman Empire, there was an unprecedented burst of innovation in agricultural technology. The inventions included the heavy plow, crop-rotation, new types of harnesses for horses, and nailed horseshoes. Some scholars have concluded that this burst of technology, which continued throughout the medieval period in Europe, was a result of Christian beliefs and attitudes.³ Many of the leading scientists of the early modern world were also professing Christians: Isaac Newton, Johann Kepler, Robert Boyle, Lord Kelvin, Louis Pasteur, Michael Faraday, Clerk Maxwell, and many more.

BUSH POSITION:

Analysis

Vice President George Bush's record of political service and experience, when viewed apart from standard media reports, demonstrate that he was closely involved in the Reagan administration and that he shares most of Mr. Reagan's goals and objectives. A war hero at 20-years-old, later the founder of an oil company, Bush has served as a congressman, an ambassador to the United Nations, and director of the CIA.

During the Reagan administration, Bush spearheaded the task force which cut unnecessary federal regulations. An estimated 600 million man-hours of bureaucratic paperwork per year were eliminated by this effort. Bush also represented the U.S. during NATO negotiations in Brussels; after the meeting, the Soviets agreed to sign the INF Treaty and began removing their SS-20s.

President Reagan has been outspoken about the need for follow-up on his administration's efforts. "None of our achievements happened by accident, but only because we overcame liberal opposition to put our programs in place," said President Reagan at the Republican National Convention in August. "And without George Bush to build on those policies, everything we have achieved will be at risk. All the work, sacrifice, and effort of the American people could end in the very same disaster that we inherited in 1981."

The following is a brief assessment of Bush's record on key issues which are of concern to the Christian community:

* Dealing with the Drug Problem. Dukakis claims that Bush has failed to address the "avalanche of drugs ... pouring across our borders." However, Bush's record shows he was committed to fighting against drugs before it was a popular cause in the late 1960s. In his first session of Congress, Bush voted to authorize $1.5 million to start programs authorized by the Narcotic Addict Rehabilitation Act of 1966.

The following year he voted in favor of a resolution creating a Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs in the Justice Department. The resolution was rejected. In July of 1968, he voted for the Drug Abuse Control Bill which provided criminal penalties for the possession of illegally obtained stimulants, depressants or hallucinogenic drugs, and increasing existing penalties for the illegal sale of such drugs.

During the Reagan administration, Bush was appointed head of the South Florida Task Force to combat drug smugglers. The FBI was introduced into drug enforcement for the first time, and 13 interagency task forces were created. As a result, violent crime in South Florida dropped substantially in the first six months of task force operations.

Dukakis says the program was a failure; but according to official statistics, the murder rate fell by 15 percent in Dade County, 25 percent in Broward County, and the task force continues to operate. In 1983, he led the National Narcotics Border Interdiction System (NNBIS). According to Ronald Reagan, " ... if you want to see effective leadership, take a look at Vice President Bush's role in this. While others talked about leading the military into the fray against drugs, the Vice President has led."

Bush has pledged his support for the death penalty for drug kingpins. His anti-drug program consists of education and prevention; eradication and interdiction; tougher enforcement, and treatment and rehabilitation. He also advocates testing for drug use by anyone responsible for public safety, such as airline pilots or prison guards.

* Budget and Taxation. George Bush says he would ask for a balanced budget amendment, and he answers Dukakis's charge - that Reagan never submitted a balanced budget - with the counter that the Democrat-dominated Congress "appropriates every dime" of government spending. Says Bush: "I support the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction targets. Our hard work is beginning to show results. The budget deficit will shrink by almost $70 billion from last year's level. I support a line-item veto to cut the fat from appropriations bills and put the national interest above the special interests."

* Moral issues. On federal funding of abortion, Bush says, "I oppose abortion. I support an amendment. I oppose federal funding for abortion. I favor family planning that has nothing to do with abortion."

According to a campaign spokesman, Dave Sandor, Bush supports sustaining present federal funding of AIDs research and education; however, he opposes homosexuals serving as foster parents.

George Bush has been outspoken about his faith in God and has pledged to support the values of the Christian community. During his acceptance speech at the Republican Convention in New Orleans, he told the audience: "There is a God and He is good and His love, while free, has a self-imposed cost: we must be good to one another."

Bush has also pushed for voluntary school prayer, as well as defended the need of parents to receive tax-credit vouchers when they send their children to private, religious schools.

* Record on Crime. Bush recently formed the "Citizens Against Crime Coalition" which is being led by Illinois Governor Jim Thompson and Senator Arlen Specter (R-PA). "The vice president's position on crime issues are so in line with what the law enforcement and criminal justice communities stand for, that we are very enthusiastic about a Bush administration," said Donald Baldwin, executive director of the National Law Enforcement Council and co-chair of the coalition.

"The Democratic nominee has been so vague on some of the crucial issues of law enforcement that he leaves us uncertain about how he would react to our needs," Baldwin explained.

Bush's proposed program against crime is to implement new federal sentencing guidelines that mandate consistent, tougher sentencing for drug offenders; change the legal technicalities that set criminals free; and have Congress pass the Criminal Justice Reform Act.

* Defense Policy. While George Bush was a strong proponent of the INF Treaty - which calls for drastic reductions in the nuclear arsenal - he says he still believes that foreign policy development must be realistic. "From my days at the UN and the CIA to the White House, I have observed that the Soviets test every President and push every agreement to its limits and beyond. We must be vigilant, and we must be tough, and we must stand up for the values that define us as a nation."

The on-site inspection procedures which he cites as major steps forward will "demonstrate just how far the Soviets are willing to go in seeking a new kind of relationship with us ..." says Bush. On U.S./Soviet relations, Bush believes that "we must act with a strength that is not only real, but is recognized by the world as real."

On the topic of Central America, Bush says the goal is to promote peace - but not peace at any price. "Our main objective is the maintenance and establishment of governments committed to freedom and democracy, governments that respect human rights and the sovereignty of their neighbors. A peace that does not accomplish this objective is just another word for surrender."

* Child Care. Dukakis's campaign analysts are saying that Bush is seizing on the key issues of the election and is reversing his earlier position on child care. However, while Democrats are proposing subsidizing child care and creating a huge bureaucratic, state-controlled babysitting service, Bush's plan calls for a tax credit for low-income mothers deciding to stay home to take care of their children instead of succumbing to the pressures of a two-earner economy.

Dukakis's Dodd child care bill would benefit middle-income, two-earner families (because the mother must be employed to be eligible), whereas the Bush plan would exclusively benefit low-income working families - those who need it most. The goal of Bush's child care plan is to reduce the tax burden and to let families make their own decisions. It is clearly the most pro-family position.

"I do not believe the federal government should, or could afford to, provide day care services," Bush said. "But the federal government can provide leadership and research in determining what constitutes a good day care environment and can assist in weeding out of the system individuals whose criminal record make them unfit to take care of our children."

Bush is proposing a "Toddler Tax Credit" for pre-school children which would be available to all families, and would help them support and care for their children in a manner best suited to their families' values and traditions. This would encourage mothers to stay home with their children.

Bush Inauguration Speech

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - With his left hand on the same Bible that George Washington used during his swearing-in ceremony two centuries earlier, George Herbert Walker Bush took the oath of office and became the 41st president of the United States.

In a 20-minute inaugural address, Bush saw to it that his "first act as President is a prayer." Asking the audience to bow their heads, Bush prayed, "Heavenly Father, we bow our heads and thank You for Your love. Accept our thanks for the peace that yields this day and the shared faith that makes its continuance likely. Make us strong to do Your work, willing to heed and hear Your will, and write on our hearts these words: 'Use power to help people.' For we are given power not to advance our own purposes nor to make a great show in the world, nor a name. There is but one just use of power and it is to serve people. Help us remember, Lord. Amen."

Bush called for an abandonment of materialism and a return to spiritual values. "Are we enthralled with material things, less appreciative of the nobility of work and sacrifice?" he asked. "My friends, we are not the sum of our possessions. They are not the measure of our lives. In our hearts we know what matters. We cannot hope only to leave our children a bigger car, a bigger bank account. We must hope to give them a sense of what it means to be a loyal friend, a loving parent, a citizen who leaves his home, his neighborhood and town better than he found it."

He insisted, "America is never wholly herself unless she is engaged in high moral principle. We as a people have such a purpose today. It is to make kinder the face of the nation, and gentler the face of the world."

Bush touched on the abortion issue in his inaugural address, noting the plight of "young women... who are about to become mothers of children they can't care for and might not love. They need our care, our guidance and our education, though we bless them for choosing life."

Bush confidently noted, "I do not fear what is ahead. For our problems are large, but our heart is larger. Our challenges are great, but our will is greater. And if our flaws are endless, God's love is truly boundless."

Dan Quayle for Vice President in 1988

When Geraldine Ferraro was selected as Walter Mondale's Democratic running mate in 1984, after serving three terms in the House of Representatives, her experience and competence were rarely questioned. Instead, the Democratic Party was applauded for selecting someone "untested on the national stage," according to the Washington Post. This has not been the reaction to the choice of Indiana Senator Dan Quayle, who was selected to run with Republican candidate George Bush.

But, despite this media bias, The 1988 Almanac of American Politics says that Quayle "has been one of the most active and successful members of the Republican class of 1980. With choice committee assignments - Budget, Armed Services, Labor and Human Resources - he has worked harder and accomplished more than almost anyone expected."

Congressional Quarterly, a non-partisan directory of congressmen, says: "Quayle's reputation has come a long way since he joined the Senate in 1981 at age 33. Dismissed then by many as a blow-dried pretty boy with two unremarkable House terms under his belt, Quayle today is seen as a diligent senator willing to work on complicated defense issues and interested in reforming Senate procedures to make the chamber function more efficiently."

Since his appearance on the national political scene, Quayle has surprised political observers. In 1976, as a newcomer, he challenged Democrat Rep. J. Edward Roush in what political observers said was a futile race. However, Quayle beat him by a large margin. In 1980, he ran against nationally-known three-term Senator Birch Bayh and won. He won re-election with 61 percent of the vote, the largest victory in a statewide election in Indiana history.

Besides upsetting political analysts in campaigning, Quayle has taken a lead role in reforming the Senate's own procedures and has been noted in Congressional Quarterly for his work in the area of domestic policy, employment, and health matters.

Quayle, a born-again Christian who attends a conservative Presbyterian church in the Washington area, is outspoken about his moral views and has taken a strong stand on issues that are of concern to Christians:

- * Pro-life record. Quayle has consistently opposed the federal funding of abortion, and voted to amend the Constitution to overturn the Supreme Court's Roe vs. Wade decision which legalized abortion.
- * Prayer in schools. He has also backed constitutional amendments to permit prayer in government schools and other public buildings, and to prohibit the compulsory busing of students to schools other than those nearest to their homes in order to achieve racial balance.
- * Fiscal policies. In 1982 and again in 1987, Quayle voted for proposed constitutional amendments to balance the federal budget unless a three-fifths majority of Congress agreed to deficit spending. He also supported the 1981 tax-cut program.

* Defense platform. According to the Congressional Quarterly, he was a leader among Republican senators blocking consideration of a defense bill because Democrats had added language making it difficult for President Reagan to proceed with his space-based anti-missile system, the Strategic Defense Initiative.

During the drafting of the INF Treaty, Fred Ikle, former secretary of Defense, told The Washington Times that Quayle was the first to notice significant flaws in the document. Quayle led a successful fight to force U.S. and Soviet negotiators to close a loophole that seemed to allow the Soviets to build and deploy so-called futuristic warheads on missiles with ranges otherwise banned by the treaty.

Although considered an outspoken leader on defense issues in the Senate, the media has attempted to reinforce Quayle's "lightweight" image by implying that he evaded the trenches of Vietnam by using well-connected relatives to get into the National Guard. But thorough media investigations of the matter have not brought any incriminating evidence against the youthful senator.

Capt. Cathi Kiger, state public affairs officer for the Indiana National Guard, said there were vacancies in the Indianapolis headquarters detachment that Quayle joined even three months after he formally enlisted. "There is no evidence," Kiger said, "that Quayle was given special consideration."

The National Guard controversy is obviously an attempt by the media to discredit Quayle. Few news commentaries have reported that Quayle is not the only legislator to have served in the National Guard or failed to go to war. Of the 131 congressmen born from 1942 to 1950, and thus eligible for the draft, nearly two-thirds never entered into military duty of any kind, according to official statistics reprinted by The Washington Times in August of 1988. Senator Jeffrey Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat up for re-election, has not received media flack for joining the Army Reserve during the height of the Vietnam war in 1968.

James Quayle, publisher of the Huntington Herald-Press in Indiana, has released a public statement saying that the American media was irresponsible in its misrepresentation of the facts about his son, Dan, during the 1988 presidential campaign. Vice-president elect Dan Quayle's "featherweight" image, his alleged affair with lobbyist Paula Parkinson, and his stint in the National Guard were all media-manufactured scandals, said his father.

While the media portrayed Dan Quayle as a weak, inexperienced candidate who rode on the coattails of the Reagan administration during his campaign, his father, a veteran in the newspaper business, said the media failed to note the two significant victories during his son's political career.

He cited Dan Quayle's congressional victory during the election of former President Jimmy Carter, and his re-election to the Senate in 1986, at a time when the Republicans lost eight seats, as proof that his son was not simply riding on the coattails of his party to win an election.

On the media's coverage of his son's alleged affair with Paula Parkinson, Quayle said he was surprised that reporters didn't check into facts which have been public record for seven years. "She (Parkinson) never claimed that Danny was one of those (congressmen). In fact, she has specifically said he wasn't. I thought it was irresponsible for John Chancellor to make that false charge when the facts had been in the public record for seven years."

During the brouhaha over Quayle's National Guard service, a young man who described himself as a "nobody," and who is now an unemployed truck driver, enlisted in the Indiana Guard at the same time as Dan and served in the same unit with him. "I thought he made a good point when he told the press that he and Danny had entered at the same rank and came out with the same rank," said Quayle's father.

"He asked, 'If Danny had so much pull, how come he wasn't made an officer? You probably didn't hear about that. It didn't fit in with the story CBS and the others were busy trying to prove.'" Quayle related that, "in the end all they proved was that the media can be pretty vicious and irresponsible. Of course they say they are only doing their job of informing the public. Quite frankly, I'm fed up with those in the media who so blatantly use their power to try to make and break certain candidates by blowing smoke and hoping the public will conclude there must be fire."

Dan Quayle and his wife, Marilyn, are members of the McLean Presbyterian Church in a Virginia suburb near Washington.

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - In the wake of Supreme Court hearings on a key abortion case, a group of 50 Democratic congressmen have spoken out in defense of the unborn - in obvious opposition to their party's official position on the abortion issue.

Led by Rep. John LaFalce, the congressmen sent a letter to Ron Brown, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, asking that the plank regarding abortion be removed from the Democratic Party's platform. Rep. LaFalce, a New York democrat who mobilized the congressmen, called the party's stance "poor politics"; he cited that the last three presidential elections have been lost due to the crossover of Democrats with traditional values who left the party because of social issues such as abortion.

The official party platform currently states: "We believe ... that the fundamental right of reproductive choice should be guaranteed regardless of ability to pay." Abortion is considered a fundamental right which merits public funding, said LaFalce. "The Democratic party is seen more and more as the party of abortion - a sure recipe for losing irretrievably a significant segment of our traditional base of support," he said in the letter.

"This issue is not going to go away," he continued. "Nor is it likely that public attitudes on this issue will change significantly given the mere passage of time. We therefore think it politically wrongheaded for our party to be on record as favoring the use of taxpayer dollars to fund an alleged 'fundamental right' which is so strongly opposed in conscience by millions of Americans and by ourselves."

LaFalce concluded the letter by challenging the party to "alter its course." Although he has a consistent pro-life voting record, he waited until now to submit the letter because "he wouldn't be able to live with himself," according to Tom Cowley, press secretary for LaFalce. "He feels very strongly that the Democratic party is out of touch with America on this issue," Cowley said.

Michael Dukakis: A Profile

As a Massachusetts state legislator:

- * Introduced a bill to legalize abortion in Massachusetts in 1970, three years prior to the Roe vs. Wade Supreme Court decision which legalized abortion nationwide.

As Governor of Massachusetts:

- * On four occasions, vetoed legislation or a state budget because it contained restrictions on government funding of abortions.
- * Appointed an abortion advocate as Secretary of Human Services.
- * Keynote speaker at a 1986 abortion rights "celebration."

Stated position:

- * Supports the 1973 Roe vs. Wade Supreme Court decision.
- * Supports Medicaid funding of abortion.
- * The National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) says:
"As a legislator and as Governor, Dukakis has been a consistent and strong supporter of reproductive rights for women."
- * The National Right to Life Committee (NRLC) says:
"This is the most pro-abortion presidential ticket in history."

The Abortion Issue:

- * "I support the Supreme Court decision on abortion. I believe that abortion is a personal decision which can only be made by the individual woman ... I do support federal funding of abortion services ..." - Michael Dukakis

Lloyd Bentsen

Sen. Bentsen has consistently supported legal abortion on demand and federal funding of elective abortion.

Bentsen's Senate voting record according to:

- * Planned Parenthood -
43 pro-abortion votes, 2 anti-abortion votes, 5 absences.
- * National Abortion Rights Action League (NARAL) -
42 pro-abortion votes, 3 anti-abortion votes, 9 absences.

- * NARAL says:

"Bentsen has only once voted against funding [of abortion]. On the whole, Sen. Bentsen's voting record on our issue has been very good."

* National Right to Life Committee (NRLC) -

39 pro-abortion votes in support of federal funding of abortions. 1 pro-life vote, 5 absences.

[The number of votes differ because the different groups recorded slightly different time periods and issues.]

Democratic Party Platform

* Calls abortion "the fundamental right of reproductive choice."

* Calls for federal funding of abortion.

Michael Dukakis

Dukakis & Willie Horton

The Willie Horton case
10/88

In Massachusetts, first-degree murderers used to get out of prison for the weekend ...

Governor Michael Dukakis believed that it was "rehabilitative" for prisoners to be allowed to roam the streets unsupervised in what was known as the Prison Furlough Program.

That practice was finally outlawed by state legislators on April 28, 1988, after an enormous grassroots petition drive brought the issue before the people.

Here are the cold hard facts about Governor Dukakis' "experiment in justice," which has received little coverage on campaign news broadcasts:

* On June 6, 1986, convicted murderer Willie Horton was released from the Northeastern Correctional Center in Concord. Under state law, he had become eligible for an unguarded, 48-hour furlough. He never came back.

* Horton showed up in Oxon Hill, Maryland, on April 3, 1987. Clifford Barnes, 28, heard footsteps in his house and thought his fiancée had returned early from a wedding party. Suddenly Willie Horton stepped out of the shadows with a gun. For the next seven hours, Horton punched, pistol-whipped, and kicked Barnes - and also cut him 22 times across his midsection.

* When Barnes' fiancée Angela returned that evening, Horton gagged her and savagely raped her twice. Horton then stole Barnes' car, and was later chased by police until captured.

* On October 20, 1987, Horton was sentenced in Maryland to two consecutive life terms plus 85 years. The sentencing judge refused to return Horton to Massachusetts, saying, "I'm not prepared to take the chance that Mr. Horton might again be furloughed or otherwise released. This man should never draw a breath of free air again."

* Variations of this story were repeated on several occasions in Massachusetts. Confessed rapist John Zukoski, who had brutally beaten and murdered a 44 year-old woman in 1970, became eligible for furloughs and was eventually paroled in 1986. A few months later he was arrested and indicted yet again for beating and raping a woman.

* The Massachusetts inmate furlough program actually began under Governor Francis Sargent in 1972. But in 1976 Governor Dukakis vetoed a bill to ban furloughs for first-degree murderers. It would, he said, "Cut the heart out of inmate rehabilitation."

* The program, in essence, released killers on an "honor system" to see if they would stay out of trouble. On the average, convicts who had been sentenced to "life without parole" spent fewer than 19 years in prison. By March 1987, Dukakis had commuted the sentences of 28 first-degree murderers.

* Of over 80 Massachusetts convicts listed as escaped and still at large, only four had actually "escaped." The rest simply walked away from furloughs, prerelease centers and other minimum-security programs. These convicts included murderers, rapists, armed robbers and drug dealers.

* First-degree murderer Armand Therrien was transferred from a medium security prison to a minimum-security one, which made him eligible for a work-release program. He walked off and vanished in December 1987.

* When citizens began to protest, Dukakis and his aides defended the program relentlessly. One commissioner stated that furloughs were a "management tool" to help the prisons. Unless a convict had hope of parole, he argued, "we would have a very dangerous population in an already dangerous system." But, critics wondered, if armed guards can't control dangerous killers inside locked cells, how are unarmed citizens supposed to deal with them?

* It was through the efforts of a grassroots organization, Citizens Against Unsafe Society, that the issue was finally brought before the people. With mounting pressure from his own aides to sign a bill ending the program - for fear that it would hurt his presidential campaign - Dukakis signed the legislation in April of this year.

America ... do we want a president in office who would try the same "experiment in justice" on a national level?

The majority of this material was taken from the article "Getting Away with Murder," by Robert James Bidinotto, which appeared in Reader's Digest, July 1988.

Dukakis: A Card Carrying ACLU member

Do You Want A Member of the ACLU as the Next President of the United States?

"I'm a card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union."

- Michael Dukakis
New York Magazine
August 17, 1987

What is the ACLU?

* It's founder, Roger Baldwin, said this in 1920: "I am for socialism, disarmament, and ultimately for abolishing the State itself as an instrument of violence and compulsion. I seek social ownership of property, the abolition of the propertied class, and the sole control of those who produce wealth. Communism is the goal."

What does the ACLU stand for?

* Among many other things, the ACLU has worked tirelessly for many years to oppose employee drug testing, to abolish the death penalty, to remove laws against homosexual marriage, and to guarantee homosexual couples the right to adopt children. The ACLU also defends the right to distribute child pornography, and opposes the right of governments to conduct covert operations or any other form of clandestine intelligence gathering.

* The Los Angeles chapter of the ACLU recently filed a lawsuit to require the Big Brothers of America to admit homosexuals into its mentor program for fatherless boys.

* The Illinois chapter of the ACLU has defended the "constitutional rights" of a doctor who has AIDS to continue to perform invasive medical procedures on patients.

* The Official Policy Guide of the ACLU, available upon request, spells out its clear agenda for America. Policy Number 242 argues that no one should go to prison, except for such crimes ... so serious as murder or treason.

* The ACLU, which receives funding from the Playboy Foundation, has even argued in a Supreme Court case that child pornography is a form of free speech.

* Policy Number 211 states that the ACLU supports the decriminalization of prostitution and opposes state regulation of prostitution.

- * The ACLU, in the name of "privacy rights," also opposes such things as curfew ordinances for juveniles (Policy #206), sobriety road checks (#217), locker searches in high schools for illegal drugs (#76), and searches of people boarding airplanes (#270). The ACLU wants to remove all metal detectors in airports.
- * Policy Number 18 states that the ACLU does not like the "restrictive impact on the marketplace of ideas" brought on by the current motion picture rating system, which designates movies G, PG, PG-13, R and X. The ACLU would like to abolish the code. The Guide states that " ... experience has shown that ratings inevitably have serious chilling effects on freedom of expression."
- * Policy Number 84 expresses the ACLU opinion that the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance are a "violation of the constitutional principle of separation of church and state." They want to remove the phrase.
- * Policy Number 210 says that "the introduction of substances into one's own body" is a civil liberty, and therefore proposes that all drugs, including crack and angel dust, be legalized.
- * Professor William Donohue, author of the Politics of the American Civil Liberties Union, states that the ACLU policy manual also favors the removal of "In God We Trust" from all coins - a position taken by Madalyn Murray O'Hare and her American Atheists organization.

How closely connected to the ACLU is Michael Dukakis?

- * Dukakis' campaign manager, Susan Estrich, is a member of the ACLU's National Board. A long-time ACLU supporter, Estrich is the author of a chapter in the book Our Endangered Rights, an ACLU publication. Her essay, entitled "Sexual Justice" (written with Virginia Kerr), promotes "same sex" marriages and defends the rights of homosexual couples to gain custody of children.
- * Estrich, the first woman to ever run a major presidential candidacy, served as an advisor to presidential candidates Ted Kennedy and Walter Mondale. According to Newsweek (June 27, 1988), Estrich's views are "more liberal than Dukakis." Her former colleagues describe her as a "redistributionist" who wants to "take from the haves and give to the have nots."
- * Newsweek asked the question, "What would happen to Estrich if Dukakis is elected? She would probably be a prime candidate for attorney general or domestic policy advisor."

THE DUKAKIS RECORD

"I'm a strong Democrat, a liberal Democrat ."

- Michael Dukakis
Sheldon, Iowa

As the National Democratic party meets in Atlanta to nominate Michael Dukakis, they are about to adopt a short, vague platform heavy on rhetoric but light on specifics. In fact it is so vague as to beg the question:

What are they hiding from the American people?

Apparently, they are not renouncing the ultra-liberal platforms adopted by every National Democratic Convention since George McGovern was nominated in 1972. Certainly, they are not repudiating the liberal special interest groups that dominated the 1984 Mondale convention. Clearly, they are not rejecting the dangerous policies that led to the failure of the Carter Administration.

Obviously, they are hoping the American people will forget their extremist policies and believe they have changed. And truly, they should harbor that hope.

But the plan has gone awry. The problem is their nominee for President - Michael Dukakis. He is liberal in the extreme and his record shows it.

The Dukakis Record is something to hide from the American people. It is everything voters have rejected in recent elections. It is soft on crime, weak on defense, naive on foreign policy, permissive toward drugs, strong on taxes, and it rejects traditional family values.

They don't want you to see it, and we can understand why. But the American people have a right to know something of the beliefs and values of this man who would be President.

So here it is - the Dukakis Record.

CRIME

"I'm a card-carrying member of the American Civil Liberties Union."

Michael Dukakis
New York Magazine
8/17/87

- * Opposes capital punishment under any circumstances
- * Supported unsupervised weekend leave for first degree murderers serving life terms without parole
- * On average, released a first degree murderer in Massachusetts on furlough each day for the past seven years
- * Strong opponent of gun ownership and opposed compensating gun owners whose guns would be confiscated
- * Between 1975 and 1978, commuted the sentences of 37 convicted murderers and set them free, a record for the state

"The Governor's compassion is very pronounced toward criminals, but scarcely visible towards the victims of crime."

- Paul Craig Roberts
The Washington Times
3/22/88

NATIONAL DEFENSE

"Balancing the budget would require hard choices mostly on the defense side. I don't see much room for cuts on the domestic side."

- Michael Dukakis
Chicago Tribune
10/15/87

- * Opposes the Midgetman Missile
- * Opposed the development of Cruise Missiles and the deployment of the Persian Missile
- * Opposed the Trident Submarine
- * Opposes the development of a 600-ship Navy

- * Opposes testing and deployment of anti-satellite weapons - weapons even Walter Mondale supported
- * Refused to allow Massachusetts National Guard to go to Central America for two week training until ordered to do so by Federal Court
- * Opposes development of new, fast aircraft carriers
- * Opposed the introduction of every new strategic defense system during the Reagan and Carter Administrations

"In a Michael Dukakis Administration, national security is not a commitment; it is a retreat."

- Senator Strom Thurmond
7/6/88

FOREIGN POLICY

"The way to stop the arms race is to stop building and testing nuclear weapons."

- Michael Dukakis
Boston Globe
10/26/87

- * Opposed invasion of Grenada
 - * Failed to timely support anti-terrorist military action in Libya
 - * Opposes U.S. efforts to keep open sea lanes in Persian Gulf
 - * Opposes aid to freedom fighters in Nicaragua and Angola
 - * Opposed sending U.S. troops to Honduras in response to the Nicaraguan invasion
 - * Stated that the Monroe Doctrine has been superseded
 - * Active participant in the liberal nuclear freeze movement in the early 1980's
 - * Failed to support any effort in the last 8 years to resist Soviet aggression or Communist expansion
- "... his approach to foreign policy comes so close to renouncing the unilateral use of American power to protect national interests ... that it sometimes sounds as if the ghost of Eleanor Roosevelt had taken control of his body."

- David Broder
The Washington Post
2/10/88

DRUGS

"I've never done drugs, but I certainly understand why some people try it."

- Michael Dukakis
The Baltimore Sun
11/8/87

- * Vetoed mandatory sentencing for major drug dealers in 1978
- * Opposes the death penalty for drug kingpins
- * Allows first time drug offenders to go free on probation
- * Allows drug dealers to receive weekend furloughs in Massachusetts
- * Doubled the number of furloughs for drug offenders during his second term as Governor
- * Kitty Dukakis stated that the United States should weigh legalizing certain drugs

"At best, Mike Dukakis joined the fight against drugs after the people raised the issue."

- Rev. Bruce Wall
Newsday
4/26/88

TAXES AND GOVERNMENT SPENDING

"I will do for America what I've done for Massachusetts, ..."

- Michael Dukakis
U.S. News and World Report
2/15/88

- * Was the author of the largest tax increase in the history of Massachusetts, breaking a "lead pipe guarantee" not to raise taxes

* In his first term as governor, he took Massachusetts from the 22nd to the fifth highest tax burden in the country earning his state the nickname "Taxachusetts"

* Refuses to rule out new federal taxes

* Presided over the steepest increase in any state budget in U.S. history

* Opposed all attempts in ten years to cut taxes in Massachusetts

* Wants to increase the number of IRS audits

* Opposes Balanced Budget Amendment

* Called the 1981 Reagan-Bush tax cut "one of the biggest mistakes of recent American history"

"If Dukakis is elected, he would act next year as he acted last week: trim here and there, but then take a frequent flyer to the last resort [new taxes]. He would accelerate rather than break the spending urge in Congress."

- William Safire
New York Times
6/29/88

VALUES

"We've learned that we can't improve America's schools by ... putting religion back in the classroom. Good education requires more than a right wing and a prayer."

- Michael Dukakis
Times-Picayune
2/22/88

* Opposes prayer in public schools

* Supports allowing homosexual couples to adopt children

* Supports abortion on demand

* Supports amending Civil Rights Act of 1964 to include special rights for gay men and lesbians

- * Vetoed a bill which required the Pledge of Allegiance in Massachusetts public schools

"In Michael Dukakis' America, our values are forsaken values."

- Governor Guy Hunt

7/6/88

Dukakis Platform:

Analysis

Two very different roads lie before the American people in the upcoming presidential election. The choices have never been so clear in contemporary American politics. As one noted political leader recently wrote in a Newsweek commentary: "The American people are canny enough to listen to what a man is saying instead of how he says it. The 1988 election is not about style anymore than it is about competence or breeding. It is about two starkly different visions of America and how it should be led into the 21st century."

The issues at stake in this election go beyond the Pledge of Allegiance or who served during the Vietnam and Korean War. What is at stake is our entire value system. The challenge before the voters is to scrutinize the record of the two presidential candidates and the legacy they will leave behind.

Dukakis' "Miracle" Economic Policies

Massachusetts Gov. Mike Dukakis is offering the nation "post-Reagan managerial competence and better-than-Bush self-confidence."¹ He cites his "Massachusetts Miracle," the rebound of the state's economy, as evidence of his ability to manage the federal budget. A self-styled McGovern Democrat, Dukakis is considered a technocrat who is well able to build an efficient administration.

However, his "post-Reagan managerial competence" is yet to be proven among his Bay state electorate, who have said in polls with a two to one margin that they think Dukakis has been bad for the state economy. Here are several reasons why:

- * Opposition to Tax Cuts. Jack Flood, Democratic chairman of the Massachusetts State House Taxation Committee, says of Dukakis's fiscal savvy: "The national media is portraying Dukakis as a successful implementor of economic policies. But on every important economic measure affecting the state since 1980, he lost." ²

The measures he opposed, which voters passed were:

- * Proposition 2 1/2 (40% tax cut and cap) in 1980;
- * the Tax and Spending Cap in 1986;
- * the 1985 repeal of his 1975 temporary 7.5% income tax surtax.

One of his advisers, Harvard Professor Ralph Whitehead, told the Boston Globe in 1986 that without Proposition 2 1/2, Massachusetts was on its way to becoming a banana republic.

Three economic measures Dukakis introduced while governor were defeated by the state legislature. "In 1985, he proposed a damaging worldwide unitary tax on corporations. The legislature defeated it. He proposed a sales tax on real estate transactions. The legislature killed it. For three years he pushed the Massbank, a big state development bank. The legislature defeated it, again and again. It's now dead," Flood explained.

"Dukakis says he cut taxes five times in the last four years - but all of those tax cuts were proposed by our committee ... So, if Dukakis has been on the wrong side of every major economic policy issue with the voters and the legislature, would the commonwealth be better off economically today if he had won his position on all of these issues?

"Not only has this been the worst spending spree in Massachusetts history, we have almost nothing to show for it in better services. Just a bigger payroll, and a huge pension liability rising from $6 billion to $10 billion," Flood said.

* Building Mega-Budgets at Taxpayer Expense. Since the Dukakis administration began, Massachusetts spending rose 72 percent from 1983 to 1988. Prior to his administration, there were 21 states that had higher taxes than Massachusetts. After four Dukakis years, only four states had a higher tax burden. This was after his 1974 campaign promise of no tax increases. He also converted a $1 billion surplus in fiscal 1986 to a $300 million deficit in fiscal 1988, and another $200 million in fiscal 1989 - forcing a major tax increase according to The Washington Times.³

Massachusetts debt and spending is rising faster than the nation as a whole. The Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Richard Voke, a Democrat, said "My advice to the governor ... is that he shouldn't be fighting with poor people over cutting services, but cut the payroll costs. Personnel expense has risen twice as fast as expenses for the poor ... State employees have gone from not being the best paid around to being better paid than comparable positions in private industry."

Voke added that Massachusetts state employees have the second highest sick leave in the nation - almost double the national average. He explained that the current budget crisis in the Bay state was due to bad fiscal management. "There hasn't been any will to control spending in this administration for at least five years. Every year it seems every agency comes in looking for more than the other agencies."⁴

Although he campaigned on not rewarding jobs according to political patronage, the increase of contractors and consultants hired by the "03 Account" has been noted as a "flagrant abuse of this account to reward political patronage," according to the state auditor in 1986. Since 1983, the state's own direct payroll soared by 10,000 full-time jobs - which is the largest increase in Massachusetts history.⁵

Despite the budget crisis, Dukakis contends that his budgets have always been balanced compared with

Reagan's rising deficit budget. However, former Gov. Ed King, who beat Dukakis after he raised taxes, says state law requires a balanced budget. "In effect, he's trying to take personal credit for obeying the law, and that's dishonest."⁶

Ironically, the source of Dukakis' touted "Massachusetts Miracle," the economic rebound during his first term, was President Reagan. Reagan's military build-up, opposed by Dukakis, resulted in three times the national average being spent in Massachusetts, mostly on military hardware. The defense spending and research dollars resulted in the rebound.

As Boston Globe columnist David Wilson said, "The real Massachusetts Miracle may be that this activist tax-raiser didn't prevent it from happening." Using his "Massachusetts Miracle" as a model for his promised performance for the American people, he is not likely to tell us that analysts at the Harvard Kennedy School of Government say that recent growth in the state economy was minor - less than five percent. The Harvard study found that the economic strength of the state was partly due to growth in the high-technology sector.

Dukakis as Crusader for Gay Rights

Another very well-hidden fact about Dukakis is his support among the homosexual community - due to his lobbying on their behalf when he was a state legislator. "We have in Michael Dukakis a candidate who is instinctively supportive, who has a good record on gay rights, who wants our support and who can win," said Jean O'Leary, executive director of National Gay Rights.⁷

Dukakis lobbied for a homosexual rights bill in the state House, and filed five bills on the behalf of Bill Baird, who is an abortion and homosexual rights advocate.³ The bills he introduced were:

- * to repeal the law against fornication (or premarital sex);
- * repeal the law punishing blasphemy;
- * repeal the laws punishing unnatural and lascivious acts with another person;
- * repeal the law prohibiting crime against nature (bestiality);
- * repeal the law prohibiting abortions.⁸

He has stated that he supported passage of the Gay and Lesbian Civil Rights Law pending in Congress (H.R. 709) that would prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation. Last year he reassured homosexuals that he supported federal legislation banning discrimination against persons with AIDS or those with the HIV infection.

The Dukakis Record on Crime

The Dukakis prison furlough program has proven to be a political embarrassment. He insists now that he inherited it from a Republican predecessor; however, during his first term he vetoed a bill to outlaw furloughs for first-degree murderers. There were an average of 388 furloughs a year to killers. Four hundred and twenty-six prisoners, including 11 first degree killers, disappeared on the furlough program according to The Wall Street Journal.⁹

One of these murderers, Willie Horton, was convicted of slaying a Lowell, Massachusetts, service-station attendant in 1974. Despite being cited for 11 disciplinary infractions, three of them drug-related, he was given 10 furloughs since his conviction in 1975. On the last furlough in 1987, he went to Maryland where he tied and tortured a man and raped his fiancée.¹⁰

Horton was captured and sentenced to two life terms to be served in Maryland. In explaining the sentence, the trial judge said, "With all due respect to ... Massachusetts ... Horton will never return there. I am not going to take the chance that he will be furloughed or released there."

Horton became a rallying cry for Bay state protestors demanding that the program be ended. Dukakis defended the program by saying, "I think a good, strong, aggressive correctional system requires a well-managed and responsible furlough program." After irate citizens gathered 70,000 signatures for a referendum to end furloughs for those with life sentences, with opinion polls showing the question passing by a three to one margin, and a revolt in the legislature (which passed a furlough ban by a veto-proof margin), he reluctantly signed the measure.

Staunchly against the death penalty, Dukakis vetoed a capital punishment bill during his first term and regularly testifies against the measure before legislative hearings. "I don't think we've had a candidate for President so far who was against the death penalty," said Griffin Bell, former attorney general for Jimmy Carter.

Foreign Policy: Dukakis Style

In March of 1985, while returning a toast to his Chinese Communist hosts during a visit to Canton, Michael Dukakis confessed: "I was a 13-year-old boy at the Baker School in Brookline, and I was asked to debate changes in China. I delivered a ringing condemnation of the Kuomintang and strongly advocated revolution in China. So you see, you have a friend here. In fact, some friends of President Reagan occasionally refer to Massachusetts as the People's Republic of Massachusetts."¹¹

The revolution Dukakis advocated murdered millions of people and remains one of the most horrible chapters in world history. This innocent confession betrays the naiveté of Dukakis' understanding of foreign policy. On "Meet the Press," Dukakis told Washington Post columnist David Broder that the Monroe Doctrine had been superceded by the Pact of Rio, which obliged the U.S. not to interfere in the affairs of its neighbors.

On that basis, he said he would not assert American power unless these Soviet client states in this hemisphere introduced offensive weapons. However, the Rio Pact of 1947, first of the collective security agreements signed by the Truman Administration, did not commit the U.S. to passivity and non-intervention, as he claimed, but to mutual vigilance on the part of this country and its neighbors against the threat of aggression.

Clearly, his naiveté signals that the Soviets' establishment of client states in the Americas would not be considered a threat to our national security by a Dukakis administration.

Dukakis' Official Witch?

By Lee Grady
10/88

Rumors about a "state-appointed witch" linked to Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis have spread rapidly around the U.S. since the Democratic nominee began his campaign this year. To clear up the matter, The Forerunner did some extensive research and uncovered several disturbing facts.

The news about about Laurie Cabot - called the "official witch of Salem, Massachusetts" - was published by National Geographic in April, 1979. The magazine described her as a descendant of a well-known Massachusetts family. According to the article: "Ten years ago (1969) she felt drawn to Salem from her home on the West Coast. Shortly after settling in the town, she announced herself to the mayor as a witch. Since then Laurie Cabot has made a living lecturing on witchcraft and selling herbs, astrological charts, and magic mirrors."

In 1979, there were 350 witches in the Salem area. An employee at the Crow Haven Corner, Cabot's store, told us that this number has now grown to 2,000. She also stated that Cabot has launched a new organization, the Witches' League for Public Awareness, which is attempting to link witches together from all over the nation.

One spokesperson for the Salem Chamber of Commerce confirmed the statements made by National Geographic, agreeing that she was the official, state-designated witch of Salem. However, press aides at the Dukakis campaign headquarters in Boston denied the allegations. The first aide reported that Cabot had actually only received what is known as a Paul Revere Citation - which he described as a "humorous," unofficial commendation awarded to outstanding Massachusetts citizens. Cabot had been recommended for this certificate by a state legislator from her district. "The Governor did not even sign it," he added, saying that the citation only bears a facsimile signature by Dukakis.

The Dukakis-Bentson camp is concerned about the rumor. One spokesman admitted that he receives "two or three calls a day" on the matter. He also suggested that the city of Salem capitalizes on the "officiality" of Cabot because it draws tourism to the area. Each October, for example, the Chamber of Commerce sponsors a month of so-called "Haunted Happenings," that last until Halloween. In the past, that celebration has included a public seance. Salem has been historically linked to witchcraft since the late 1600s because of the Salem Witch Trials.

Terry Bergman, speaking from the Dukakis headquarters, compared the Paul Revere Citation to "making someone a Kentucky Colonel," and emphasized the humorous nature of the award. "I can't tell you how lighthearted it really is. It's a joke up there (in Salem)," she said. Bergman also attempted to defend Cabot and downplayed her involvement in witchcraft: "She's a good witch. She's not into satanism or anything." The National Geographic report, however, described a ritual led by Cabot in which a coven of her followers called upon the ancient Egyptian goddess Isis. She was also described as being involved in group chanting and displays of psychic power.

Bergman also emphasized that Dukakis has no sympathetic ties to Cabot: "Governor Dukakis doesn't believe in witches. He doesn't even believe in astrology."

Another spokesperson at the Salem Chamber of Commerce defended Cabot, but denied that she was state-appointed. Her position as "official Witch of Salem," according to the employee, is a role that has simply been accepted by the community. "She's very popular and a very nice person," she stated. Cabot is reported to be a noteworthy citizen because of all the beneficial things she has done for the community. One Dukakis aide claimed that Cabot was given the citation for her work with dyslexic children, and not for her role as a witch. However, Salem Chamber of Commerce spokesmen were unaware of such a claim.

In fact, an employee of Cabot's store in Salem did not even know about the supposed services available for dyslexic children. "If we do that," the woman said, "you can find out about it by writing the Witches' League for Public Awareness." Apparently any "community service" that Laurie Cabot is offering has been in obvious connection to her witchcraft.

A city official, who wished to remain anonymous, set the record straight by researching the records of City Council meetings. According to those notes, Laurie Cabot came to the mayor of Salem and requested that she be made the official city witch and "greeter." The Council discussed the issue, and in April of 1977 released a statement that they did not want "any person or spirit" to be the official witch of Salem. A letter was even sent to the office of Governor Dukakis in Boston to express the decision of the City Council.

However, Cabot bypassed the council decision and, with the help of a state representative, Elaine Noble, went directly to the governor. Although it is still unclear as to what exactly went on in that meeting, Massachusetts newspapers the next morning announced that Cabot had been named the "official" witch. Salem Evening News, on April 28, 1977, ran a news article with the headline, "Governor Dukakis Unwittingly Gives 'Witch' Her Wish." The story stated: "This week Ms. Cabot apparently worked her magic on Governor Dukakis, and he unwittingly did for Ms. Cabot what Salem mayors and councils have refused repeatedly."

There is still some confusion about whether the Paul Revere Citation was the document that gave Cabot this official status, or whether Dukakis simply told Cabot she had the office. Rev. Russel Ely, pastor of the Salem Christian Assembly, confirmed that this has been a mystery. He did cite, however, an article from the popular Yankee magazine (October 1986) which ran a story called "Why Salem Is in Love with Witches." That article, in describing the meeting between Dukakis and Cabot, seemed to suggest that an appointment had been made in addition to the citation. Said the report: "The petition (to make Cabot official) found its way to Governor Michael Dukakis, who, against the wishes of Salem's mayor at the time, appointed Cabot Salem's official witch and gave her a citation to boot."

Pastor Ely, who has had numerous confrontations with Cabot and other witches in Salem, said the matter needs to be clarified. "In my estimation," he said, "Dukakis needs to make this clear. But he has just ignored it." Ely confirmed that Salem, a city of 38,000 people, does have approximately 2,000 practicing witches.

"Laurie Cabot is serious about her witchcraft," added Ely. "She's also a serious businesswoman. In fact, she tells people that she is 'the American dream' because of her financial success." Cabot is very well-known across the nation, and has been featured on television talk shows including "The Oprah Winfrey Show" and "Good Morning America."

Given all of these facts, it still may not be totally clear how aware Michael Dukakis is about Laurie Cabot, or how far he went to make her an official witch. We should be alarmed about the spiritual forces at work in Massachusetts - which have, no doubt, been manipulating this campaign. The Church in America, while praying for the upcoming election, should make it a point to bind the powers of witchcraft that seem to be headquartered in the city of Salem.

The Vision

We Believe:

- * that the United States of America is a needy nation - the AIDS epidemic, abortions, drought, alleged improprieties in government, financial debt and insecurity, etc.
- * that the Church of Jesus Christ needs to repent of division, indifference, materialism, secularism, and lack of godliness.
- * that we need to turn to God in genuine humility, prayer, and repentance - II Chronicles 7:14.
- * that critical times in the Bible often resulted in 40 Days of Prayer.

Moses gave himself to prayer and fasting twice for 40 days on Mt. Sinai. The first time (Exodus 24:18-chapter 33) resulted in receiving major revelation from God - the Ten Commandments, laws, and instructions; and entreating God not to destroy the nation of Israel. The second time (Exodus 34:28-35) the Ten Commandments were renewed. Elijah spent 40 days in prayer on Mt. Horeb (I Kings 19:1-18) for personal renewal. The city of Nineveh humbled themselves, repented, fasted, and prayed for 40 days, and God changed His mind about destroying the city. Jesus spent 40 days in the wilderness defeating the devil (Matthew 4:1-11).

- * that the present national situation demands extraordinary action.
- * that the entire nation is to be called to 40 Days of Prayer September 30 - November 8, 1988 prior to our national election on November 8.
- * that all Christians throughout the land are to join in this National 40 Days of Prayer.

Implementation

We Encourage:

- * that all prayer ministries in the United States join in calling the nation to 40 Days of Prayer September 30 through November 8.

* that all denominational and other Christian ministry leaders in the United States join in calling their constituents to 40 Days of Prayer.

"... the roots of our greatness as a nation are spiritual and moral. The greatest threat to our civilization is secularization, which has eliminated the spiritual from serious discussion and precipitated epidemic moral decline which exceeds the best and finest efforts of the most powerful. Nothing is clearer than that God alone is able to rescue our decaying society; nothing is clearer than that He waits for His people to reject materialism as a way of life; and that the crisis requires repentance from worldly waywardness and devotion to prayer."

- Richard C. Halverson
Chaplain, United States Senate

* that prayer ministries, denominational and other Christian ministry groupings, local churches, city-wide groupings, families, and individuals, implement the 40 Days of Prayer as directed by the Holy Spirit.

Some possibilities include: fasting and praying the entire 40 days, fasting and praying for part of the 40 days, having special all-night prayer meetings, having early morning prayer meetings, conducting concerts of prayer, having an around-the-clock prayer chain for the entire 40 days, having special prayer retreats of several days of protracted prayer. Efforts can be sponsored by local churches, all the churches of a given city, denominationally, etc. A great variety of organizational structures can be utilized: be creative; ask God what to do and how to do it; think big, but keep it simple.

* That our turning to God in deep repentance and total dependence needs to become a lifestyle that begins before and continues after the 40 Days of Prayer.

* that reports of significant happenings be sent to the Tacoma address for sharing with others.

Blow a trumpet in Zion,
Consecrate a fast, proclaim a solemn assembly,
Gather the people, sanctify the congregation,
Assemble the elders,
Gather the children and the nursing infants.

Let the bridegroom come out of his room
And the bride out of her bridal chamber.
Let the priests, the Lord's ministers,
Weep between the porch and the altar,
And let them say, "Spare Thy people, O Lord,
And do not make Thine inheritance a reproach,
A byword among the nations.
Why should they among the peoples say,
'Where is their God?'"

The Leader America Needs

by Ray Allen

What America needs today, a good ten cent cigar won't fix. We need fundamental changes more than mere cosmetic changes. And, if we don't make some of them soon, we'll be lucky if the cigar doesn't explode in our faces one day.

But, change is usually embodied in a man ... a reformer ... a leader.

Like the little boy who cried, "The emperor has no clothes!," simple wisdom came from an unexpected source during my first attempt at sharing some of my concerns with a group of elderly citizens some 17 years ago. In the middle of my presentation, a woman suffering from advanced Alzheimer's disease turned to her fellow-listeners, and with a frightening sense of desperate conviction, cut to the heart of the matter: "We need a leader," she exclaimed.

She may have spoken out of turn, but certainly was not out of touch with reality. A need that was true then grows increasingly acute. America desperately needs a leader - a leader of a certain quality of character, and, one who follows a certain quality of vision. He must know where he's going and have what it takes to get us all there, safely.

First, let's talk about the quality of the leader. He must be a man who understands the proper stewardship of power. He must know the necessity of limiting the exercise of that power to those actions which serve the best interests of his fellow-citizens. And, he must walk with a limp. Let me explain.

The young and foolish actually believe they are invincible; that the law of cause and effect exacts its toll only on the old who are less clever than they; that good intentions are as acceptable as delivering the goods; and, that meaning well excuses unforeseen damages. Young men and young lions share these delusions.

Old men and old lions do not. Why? Because the old-timers often are still paying the painful price of careless mistakes made in moments of weakness or misjudgment. Pain is a great teacher which costs dearly. That's why they walk with a limp. If you ask a man about his limp and hear humility and wisdom in his thoughtful answer, you may have found a leader who will not blithely lead you into foolish and unnecessary danger.

Remember this; your well-being depends on it: if your leader has not learned about pain firsthand, he is likely to be willing to let you suffer some. And, he is unlikely to know the depth of his own vulnerability when his own pain gets unbearable. Untested men and freshly wounded lions are dangerous to be around when pressure or pain mounts.

Remember the disciples of Jesus at the Last Supper? When Jesus announced that one would betray Him, each asked with anguish, "Is it I?" They knew about weakness. And, each knew, from painful experience, the fragility of his own nature and will to do good. They became fruitful disciples precisely because they understood human fallibility - beginning with their own.

Second, let's discuss the quality of the leader's vision. It's no good to have a leader of proven moral character and humility, walking with a limp, if he doesn't know where he's going. He must be able to see beyond his limp to that fixed point on the far horizon where he knows we must all go if we are to fulfill our highest and noblest destiny.

He must have a vision which is consistent with the highest aspirations of those he expects to lead, not merely the sum of his personal preferences. He must lead men and women to greater liberty, greater productivity, greater wisdom, courage, virtue, kindness, and service than they believed possible; and when it's all done, he must give them the credit for their achievement. He may lead them through painful places; but, their pain should accomplish and end that is worthwhile.

I believe some current presidential candidates have the first quality of character well in hand. One candidate in particular, stands out, I think. But, I'm hearing far too little about that "destiny beyond the horizon," and, much too much about the efficiency of the journey. A trip without a fixed destination may be futile, dangerous, or both.

So, I'm asking questions aimed at the present crop of "would-be" leaders. Where are we going? Where will you take us, prospective Mr. President? Will tax-burdened Americans be allowed to keep more of the fruit of their labor? Will you help unleash America's vast productivity and creativity by rolling back the petty tyrannies of top-heavy government?

Will you isolate and scorn the tin-horn dictators who fleece their people and grow fat and belligerent while wolfing down American handouts? Will you use your moral character to inspire our own moral character; and, will you inspire us by your actions to lead among the nations of the earth in voluntary compassionate service?

Will the enslaved of the earth be liberated? Will you help us to be wise and tolerant with our allies, wise and wary when dealing with our faithless enemies? Will you help stop the killing of unborn babies? Will you stop mortgaging our children's future with budget deficits today?

Will you remember the lessons of your limp when we send you abroad on Air Force One, or gliding in isolated splendor in your gilded cage of motorcades and police escorts?

If not, future Mr. President, please spare us the agony.

America does not need a president who is merely competent. America needs a leader. An elderly woman who had already forgotten everything else she ever knew, still knew that; and, I haven't been able to forget it either.

10/88

Newsweek has led the media in labeling Democratic senator Lloyd Bentsen a "conservative," saying, "On most major issues, the Democratic vice presidential candidate stands with Bush rather than his running mate." However, a closer look at Bentsen's voting record reveals that his views are much more in line with his running mate, Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis.

When Dukakis announced Bentsen as his running mate, in an effort to gain votes from "Reagan Democrats" and the South, he caught political observers off guard; Bentsen was supposedly a "conservative." His conservatism stems from his support of contra funding, although he voted to authorize $75 million in U.S. aid to the Marxist Sandinista regime in 1980. But we need to look at the facts:

* Pro-abortion votes. Newsweek recently claimed that Bentsen is opposed to abortion, but his voting record reflects a radically different position. The Texas senator has consistently voted to weaken or abolish restrictions on the use of federal funds to finance abortions. On July 29, 1977, he voted to eliminate all prohibitions on the use of federal funds to pay for abortions, and then opposed an attempt to limit federal funding to instances where the mother's life would be endangered by a full-term pregnancy.

In 1987, Bentsen opposed amendments to bar the use of federal or District of Columbia funds to pay for abortions in the District. He also voted against a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn the Supreme Court's Roe vs. Wade decision, which legalized abortion.

* Fiscal policies. On the economy, Newsweek stated that Bentsen supports a constitutional amendment to balance the budget. Again, his voting record reflects an economic philosophy closer to his running mate, Dukakis, rather than Bush. He has voted to either increase taxes or prevent tax reductions. Although he commendably voted against a bill to hike taxes by nearly $100 billion for fiscal year 1983-1985, he later voted against an amendment expressing the sense of the senate that there should be no further tax increases until Congress reduced spending by $3 for every $1 in taxes gained from the 1982 bill (as it had pledged to do).

In 1987, he offered a motion to kill an amendment, which was approved, to express the sense of the Senate, "that the American taxpayer is already overburdened and that ... federal tax rates should not be increased in any manner whatsoever, whether direct or indirect, and no new taxes should be created."

He has also opposed many attempts to reduce the federal deficit by cutting spending. On March 31, 1987, the Senate considered an amendment to cut the Urban Development Action Grant (UDAG) which spends around $225 million annually to encourage business and other investors to revitalize various projects. For example, $3.5 million was given to Florida to renovate hotels; $10 million was given to help develop a festival market mall in Philadelphia; and $15 million was given to clear a site for a new Chrysler Plant in Detroit. Bentsen voted against cutting funds for the program.

* Defense Issues. Although the media has often stated that Bentsen supports the Strategic Defense Initiative, again his record indicates otherwise. On September 17, 1987, he voted to uphold a two-year ban on any testing or development of the SDI that exceeded the narrowest possible interpretation of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty. The day before that vote, he voted in favor of an amendment which expresses the sentiment of the Senate that the USSR violated the ABM Treaty. Why would he vote to uphold a ban when he believes the Soviets have violated the ABM Treaty?

Bentsen is one of the few remaining senators who voted in 1978 in favor of giving away the Panama Canal. This was in spite of polls, which demonstrated at the time that 80 percent of Americans opposed this move. According to the U.S./Panama Treaty signed by President Jimmy Carter on September 7, 1977, and ratified by the Senate by one vote, the U.S. agreed to turn over the canal to Panama in 1999.

The treaty was ratified in order to guarantee good relations with Panama and Latin America. However, Panama has no claim to the canal due to U.S. funding of its construction. The canal cost U.S. taxpayers $7 billion.

* Women's Issues. Like his running mate, Bentsen is an avid supporter of the Equal Rights Amendment. On March 22, 1972, he voted for the ERA. Prior to this vote, he opposed amendments to prevent the ERA from invalidating laws such as those exempting women from compulsory military service, or exempting women from combat duty. When it was obvious in 1978 that ERA had no chance of being ratified within its seven-year time limit, he voted for the 39-month extension of its ratification deadline.

The misrepresentation of Bentsen's political philosophy and background is either ignorance or a deliberate attempt to mislead voters into believing that they are electing another conservative cut from the same cloth as George Bush. Bentsen's actual voting record shows otherwise.

Accomplishments During the 1981-1989 Reagan Administration

1. President Reagan's economic policies stimulated the economy, creating 17 million new jobs. One-fourth of the new jobs were created in 68 consecutive months. Black unemployment was cut in half.
2. We were given incentives to save our money, to work, and to invest because of Reagan's tax reforms.
3. The inflation rate decreased to less than 4.4%. Family income rose 12%.
4. We are now experiencing the longest and strongest peacetime prosperity in the history of the nation.
5. We are experiencing the best peacetime relationship with the Soviet Union in our history. We have also seen the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.
6. We are now keeping the peace. We drew the line in Grenada, Libya, Afghanistan, and the Persian Gulf, and no countries have fallen to communism during the Reagan era.
7. The U.S. military was refurbished and strengthened.
8. There is now a call for prayer in schools. The Republican administration has been lobbying to give this deserved religious freedom.
9. We have seen a return to traditional values. Under Reagan, we have seen a cut in federal funding of abortions; emphasis on a strong family unit; and the development of family-oriented public policy.
10. Educational leaders are now working to sustain moral values and reestablish a clear understanding of right and wrong. The need for values in the curriculum has been trumpeted by the Reagan administration.
11. People from other nations are flocking to America to follow our example. Our principles of civil and economic freedom are now being copied all over the world.

America Just Prior to the Reagan Administration

1. Seven million Americans were unemployed.
2. We were told to live on less, to buckle our belts and to prepare for scarcity.
3. Americans went through two of the worst years of inflation in 60 years. There was a 13% inflation rate. Family income dropped and we had the highest tax bill in our history.

4. We were on the verge of a major recession.

5. With our cold wars during the '70s, we inspired our enemies not to be afraid of us. The Soviets refused to come to the bargaining table. Cultural exchanges between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. came to a halt.

6. Disarmament was considered a noble goal. We did not know where to draw the line in our negotiations with the Soviets. Three countries fell to communism under the Carter administration: Benin (1977), Nicaragua (1979), and Zimbabwe (1980).

7. Guns and tanks that did not even work were being sent to battle.

8. Young Americans were not allowed to pray in school ... even though Congress, every state house, and the Supreme Court begins business with prayer.

9. Progressive values became fashionable. Social policies emulated the values of a small, vocal minority.

10. Education did not sustain moral values. Educational curricula began to promote "alternative lifestyles," such as homosexuality.

11. America wore a "kick me" sign on its back. We lost our edge in technology and in global markets due to excessive government regulation, and high taxes which devoured capital.

Republican National Convention

Address of Rev. Pat Robertson
August 16, 1988

Four years ago, the keynote speaker at the Democratic National Convention told us that America was a Tale of Two Cities - the have's and the have-not's, the rich and the poor, the upper class and the lower class. We heard a variation on that message from Jesse Jackson and Teddy Kennedy and every Democrat who spoke last month at their convention in Atlanta. Ladies and gentlemen, the time has come to tell the truth. The message of the Democratic Party is a message of defeat, division and despair. They did not speak for the American people under McGovern or Mondale or Carter. And they do not speak for America today.

But that Tale of Two Cities was right in the way he never intended. That great novel by Charles Dickens begins with a double sentence. "It was the best of times; it was the worst of times." In 1980, Ronald Reagan and George Bush began a long journey to rescue this country from the worst of times - from double-digit inflation, soaring interest rates and widespread unemployment. As Republicans, our task in 1988 is to continue that journey and bring the greatness of America through moral strength.

Exactly two months and 22 days from tonight, some 100 million of our fellow citizens will go to their polling places to choose the future force of the United States of America. Our Tale of Two Cities is really a choice between two paths - two visions of America, two philosophies of the future.

When Charles Dickens wrote his epic novel, he described in heart-rending detail the consequences that the right and wrong choices made in two cities in Europe. In city number one, under the deceptive slogan, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," the people with revolutionary zeal threw out God, the Church, established morality, the established government, their former leaders, sound currency, and some of the private ownership of property.

Then they demanded that the new government buy them happiness. Instead of the government-inspired utopia which the people thought they would get, they got liberal divorce laws and a break-up of families, anarchy, looting, ruinous inflation and financial chaos. As the madness fed on itself, they got something much worse - the reign of terror, a time when no one's life was safe from the dreaded guillotine.

The second city followed a very different course. Their faith in God was maintained. There was even a spiritual revival under John Wesley. Respect for the rule of law prevailed. Instead of wild excess, there was self-control and self-restraint. The currency was strong, and families were stable. Private property was protected, and life was held sacred. With all its faults, England created a strong, stable, conservative government that survived with prosperity for 100 years.

So these two cities made choices in 1789 that shaped their future for decades, for generations to come.

Now, 200 years later, America faces its choice. The Democrats have given us a clear picture of their city. They offer unlimited government, massive transfers of wealth from the productive sector of society to the non-productive, and ever-increasing regulation of the daily lives of the people and their children. In the city of the Democratic Party, the liberal mindset reigns supreme. Criminals are turned loose and the innocent are made victims. Disease carriers are protected, and the healthy are placed at great risk.

In the Democratic city, welfare dependency flourishes, and no one is held accountable for his or her behavior. Society is always to blame. In the Democrat's city, the rights of the majority must always take a back seat to the clamorous demands of special interest groups. And yet, in their city, it is always the majority that must pay the bills through higher and higher taxes.

Now the Democratic Party has discovered the family. They want us all in one big family. But let's keep in mind that they want you and me to be in one family with Jim Wright as the daddy, Barbara Mikulski as the mama and Teddy Kennedy as big brother.

I can't speak for you, but I believe I would rather pick my own relatives.

To build their city, the Democratic party has selected Michael Dukakis as architect. I submit to you tonight that Michael Dukakis is the most liberal candidate for the Presidency ever put forward by any major party in the history of the United States of America.

In fact, the city the Democrats hope to build is so bad that they are ashamed to mention the word that describes who they are and what they really want to do. They don't say what it is; they just call it the "L" word. They know that their programs will require massive new revenues, but in their platform they did not mention once the vehicle they will use to raise the money. They just call it the "T" word.

Well, ladies and gentlemen, whether by silence, whether by initials, or whether in a foreign language, it's still tax and spend liberalism, and the American people are too smart to fall for it again.

There's another word that the Democrats did not mention in their platform and not once in the acceptance speech of their candidates. It's a "G" word - the name of God. Ladies and gentlemen, our President Ronald Reagan was not ashamed to ask the assembled delegates at our convention in Detroit to bow their heads in silent prayer to God. As Americans we are not ashamed to pledge allegiance to a flag that is a symbol of one nation under God. And I submit to you that our party, the Republican party, assembled here in New Orleans is not ashamed to write into our national platform our solemn resolve that the children of this country will once again be allowed to pray to God in the classrooms of America.

And as an aside, I should mention that Michael Dukakis is a card-carrying member of the ACLU [American Civil Liberties Union]. As you know, that's an organization dedicated to removing all public affirmation of religious faith in America. As President, Michael Dukakis will pack the federal courts with ACLU radicals. If there were no other reason, and there are many to deny Michael Dukakis the presidency, this is a reason enough for all of us to vote against him in November.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Republican party wants to write a tale of another city. We're the children of those who tamed the wilderness, spanned a continent, and brought forth the greatest nation on the face of the earth. We're the heirs of those who enriched the world with the electric lights, the telephone, the airplane, mass-produced automobiles, the transistor, and countless wonderful inventions, and yet, we're the heirs of a more enduring legacy than mere material progress. We are the heirs of a legacy of ideas, a legacy of freedom, a legacy of equality, of opportunity, a legacy of government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

We're the heirs of an experiment in freedom that has given hope and promise to all the people on the face of this earth. We see a city set on a hill, a shining light of freedom for all of the nations to see and admire, a city made great by the moral strength and self-reliance of her people, a city where husbands and wives love each other and families hold together, a city where every child, whether rich or poor, has available to him the very best education in the world. A city where the elderly live out their lives with respect and dignity and where the unborn child is safe in his mother's womb.

A city where the plague of drugs is no more, and those who would destroy and debase our children with illegal drugs are given life sentences in prison with no chance for parole. A city where the streets are safe, where criminals are locked up and the law-abiding can walk about without fear. A city where the water is pure to drink, the air clean to breathe, and the citizens respect and care for the soil, the forests, and God's other creatures who share with us the earth, the sky and the water. A city with limited government, but unlimited opportunity for every one of its citizens.

We are Republicans - and we believe in government that is our servant and not our master. We believe that the wisdom of the millions who make up the marketplace is greater than the wisdom of the few who serve in government. We want a balanced budget. But we feel that the way to balance the budget is to stop waste and mismanagement in government, not to raise the taxes on the people. There's a word to describe us. It's a "C" word. We are conservatives, and we are proud of it.

In November, the voters will choose their version of a tale of two cities. Some people say they don't care what choice the voters make in November. That it doesn't really matter. I say to you tonight we care because it does matter. It matters to us and our children whether we vote Democrat or whether we vote Republican. And we care whether the successor to a great President, Ronald Reagan, is a liberal who returns us to the failed policies of Jimmy Carter or a principled conservative like George Bush, who moves us proudly into the 1990s.

Etched in my mind is the memory of a 40 year-old black man. He was strong. He was honest. He was hard working. He was handsome. He was a family man with a wife and a couple of children. He was building a place for himself and his family when one day tragedy struck him. You see, he couldn't read and write. He had been running a loading dock for a fertilizer distributor. He got along by memorizing the colors of the products that he handled until the company changed the labels. And he made so many mistakes that they had to let him go.

His life is now in shambles. His pride is gone. His hopes and dreams are gone. He is one more on the welfare roles. His is one of the 30 million functional illiterates in America who have been short-changed by our educational establishment. Ladies and gentlemen, George Bush wants to be known as the education President.

Together, we can make our schools the best in the world if we follow a few simple steps. We must guarantee to our children, a disciplined, crime-free, drug-free school environment. Top school principles should be made community heroes, not community scapegoats. We must recognize that the so-called New Age curriculum of progressive education is a colossal failure and must be replaced.

We must place control of education in the hands of parents and teachers in the local communities, and take it away from Washington, the federal courts and the liberal leadership of a powerful teachers' union. We must give to every parent the maximum freedom to decide what school is best for his or her child. Empowering parents with vouchers and educational choice at the local level is an idea whose time has come.

Some would say we can never have better education without stronger families. In part, they are right. In my opinion, the break-up of the American family is the number one social problem in America today. Half of our marriages end in divorce. Over 15 million children now live with a single parent. Single women with children are the fastest-growing segment of the poor in our land. We speak of the "feminization of poverty."

What has government done about the problem? Successive Democratic congresses have raised the tax burden on parents with children an estimated 245 percent over a 20-year period. In one year, federal taxpayers' money was used to institute an estimated 225,000 divorce actions. It has been estimated that 30 percent of all divorces in America are caused by misguided welfare laws. More cruel than all this is the assumption begun by Lyndon Johnson's Great Society Programs that the poor did not have to strive to learn to compete and to excel. This attitude fostered dependency, then hopelessness, then despair. Ladies and gentlemen, we are Republicans, and we believe some basic truths here tonight:

- * Number one, government must seek to strengthen families, not tear them apart.

- * Number two, parents are responsible for their own children. If a man fathers a child, that child is not the responsibility of the city, the state, or the federal government. That child is the father's responsibility, and he and the child's mother should be made to look after the child.

- * Number three, women in our society should have complete access to challenging and rewarding careers. If women in our society do the same work as men, they should receive the same pay as men for that equal work.

- * Number four, we also need to stop punishing women in our society who choose to be homemakers. If in our society we can afford to give tax deductions and credits to working parents with children, we also can afford to give tax deductions and credits to women who want to stay at home and care for their children.

* Number five, the goal of welfare must be to restore people in crisis to dignity and useful employment, not to create a class of government dependents for whom welfare is a way of life.

Whatever the Democrats may tell you, their way is not the way to keep hope alive.

But ladies and gentlemen, hope is very much alive in America today. It is alive because our vision, the Republican vision, expresses the hopes and the dreams of the vast majority of the American people. As we leave New Orleans, we will go back to our homes confident that we are a party united around the platform that expresses the American spirit. A platform we can be proud to share with our neighbors all over this great nation.

Supreme Court & Bush-Quayle

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - For President-elect George Bush and his running mate Dan Quayle the election victory means control of the White House for four years. For Evangelical political analysts, the November 8 victory is more significant: it means conservative control of the U.S. Supreme Court for decades to come.

Bush won the presidential election with 54 percent of the nation's popular vote, and 352 electoral votes, more than the 270 electoral votes needed to win. This makes Bush the first incumbent vice president to be elected to the presidency since Martin Van Buren in 1836. As President, Bush will make appointments to the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court plays a central role in shaping the nation's social policy on issues including abortion, homosexuality, and church/state relations. After years of liberal control, the Court has become more sharply divided, with many socially significant cases being decided by a 5-to-4 vote. Supreme Court Justices are appointed for life, but since the Court's three most liberal members will be 80 or older when Bush is inaugurated, the next president is expected to be able to make appointments that will tip the Court's balance in a sharply conservative direction.

Elizabeth Kepley, director of legislative affairs for Concerned Women for America, says her organization "would be very much supportive of his choosing Supreme Court nominees who interpret the Constitution according to the original intention of the founding fathers and use judicial restraint ... We would hope that he would continue in the tradition of Ronald Reagan and choose those justices who practice judicial restraint."

Robert Dugan, director of the Office of Public Affairs of the National Association of Evangelicals, says the implications of a Bush-appointed Court are clear. "That is, of course, the major issue in all of this, given that three members of the Supreme Court will be 80 years of age or better by inauguration day. The odds are that Bush will be able to replace one or two of those in his four years, and that means it's almost certain that Roe vs. Wade [the Court's landmark abortion ruling] will be overturned. Justice Blackmun, the author of Roe vs. Wade, was afraid the current Court would overturn it, without any changes in personnel."

Dugan says a more conservative Court would also be likely to favor government accommodation of religion, rather than a strict separation of church and state. Critics of strict separation argue that under such a policy the government often appears to be actively favoring irreligion, or secularism, and penalizing church organizations for their religious nature.

Court watchers have suggested that the more moderate Bush is not as likely to appoint conservative justices as his predecessor, Ronald Reagan. But Dugan thinks Bush understands that he'll have to meet conservative expectations when Supreme Court vacancies appear.

"I think he understands," explains Dugan. "If George Bush wants to govern, and not simply be President, he has to maintain the political alliance that gave him the White House, and that means the Evangelical and conservative movements are essential to him. If he ignores their wishes when it comes to appointments of Supreme Court justices, the outcry will be heard from coast to coast. He will alienate conservatives and Evangelicals if his first appointment is a moderate. He's already got a hostile Congress; he'll need all the public support he can get to get his proposals through Congress. This Congress won't give him much of a honeymoon period."

Does Bush owe his election victory to Evangelicals? Dugan says early poll results he's seen indicate that Evangelicals supported Bush by a 2-to-1 margin, and white Evangelicals by an even broader margin. "I attribute that to the fact that the Bush campaign made the traditional values package of issues the third major thrust of their campaign," notes Dugan.

Bush was quick to express his thankfulness to God during his victory speech. "I thank God for the faith He's given me, and as I grow older, I'm more aware of the spiritual element in life, and I ask for God's help," he said.

The Democratic Fallout: It's down to Clinton vs. Brown

4/92

In last month's issue of The Forerunner, we introduced "A Series on the Presidential Candidates." In this month's issue, we had planned to cover at least three of the Democratic Party's offerings for the presidential nominee. But oh, how seasons change!

In just one month every viable Democratic challenger to Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton has dropped out of the race. In a series of primaries more resembling a demolition derby than an electoral process, every one of the Democrats have been bested by Clinton; everyone, that is, except former California Governor Jerry Brown, who maintains that he will keep Clinton from the nomination. Also, Paul Tsongas, who mysteriously left the race before an almost guaranteed victory in Connecticut, has hinted that he may reenter the race depending how he does in future primaries.

No one knows for sure exactly why Clinton seems to have lost momentum after having demolished virtually every contender. At press time, the Tsongas' vote seems to have swung in favor of the ultra-liberal Brown, rather than who would be the former Massachusetts Senator's preference: the more moderate Clinton. This indicates that the pro-Tsongas vote may have been due to an anti-Clinton sentiment among Democrats. There is a "Draft Tsongas" movement within the Democratic Party that may keep delegates away from Clinton that are crucial to his nomination.

No political commentator seems to know exactly what to make of Brown's candidacy. Every joke imaginable has been lobbed in his direction in an attempt to ridicule his quixotical image as he lunges toward the Democratic convention. Yet Brown seems destined to make a showing delegates intact. It may be that the combined showing of Brown and Tsongas could delay Clinton from the nomination long enough for mounting charges against his character to undermine his candidacy. If this scenario (although unlikely) were to happen, the Democratic convention could become a chaotic free-for-all with still more candidates entering and reentering the contest.

Meanwhile, George Bush continues to win against Pat Buchanan in every contest. Buchanan's unexpectedly strong showing will undoubtedly work in favor of maintaining a solidly conservative platform at the Republican convention. Barring some history making fluke in the electoral college process, The Forerunner predicts that George Bush will win the November 10 election and will remain our President for four more years. A third party candidacy, however, could tilt the electoral college toward another candidate, Democrat or otherwise.

Despite anger among the electorate and a strong protest vote in the primaries, President Bush is still the safest bet for conservative and Christian voters. Being the most electable candidate, however, should not give George Bush automatic approval over the other candidates. Intelligent and concerned voters should not ignore the moral strengths and weaknesses of the other candidates, and should at least seriously scrutinize them. Therefore, we will continue to examine the candidates in contention, Democratic, Republican and Independent, until the November election.

Jerry Brown - Is there a method behind his madness?

The 1992 Democratic primary process seemed destined to offer voters not just mediocrity, but boredom as well, that is, until "Governor Moonbeam" flew in on his magic carpet, and we have not lacked for entertainment since. Jerry Brown has been described in the press as a charlatan, a political changeling, an opportunist, and a fake. Harsh indictments to be sure, and probably exaggerated since nobody could be all these things at the same time. Brown's critics have countered that he requires only about 48 hours in order to cycle through each of these roles.

It is hard to place Brown in any traditional political category. To simply label him a liberal won't suffice. That term is better suited to a Jackson, Dukakis, or Harkin. Brown is a political and spiritual eclectic, espousing far left environmental policies in the same breath as he pushes a flat tax policy which is more conservative than anything Ronald Reagan ever dared to propose. Of course, that isn't such a difficult stretch after you've spent a few years attempting to integrate Buddhism and Christianity.

That's not to say Brown is a closet conservative. He merely happens to stumble across some constructive ideas as a result of his stream of consciousness approach to politics. In fact, Brown's liberal credentials are quite solid. Besides being an original champion of extreme environmental causes, he supports the imposition of a full-fledged Canadian style health care system in the U.S. He is strongly pro-abortion (not something he picked up during his years as a Jesuit seminarian), is an active supporter of much of the homosexual agenda, and is adamantly opposed to the "barbaric" concept of a death penalty. Brown has declared himself to be a kindred spirit to Ralph Nader, and has worked hard to convince Jesse Jackson to be his running mate.

Brown does differ from his liberal colleagues when it comes to lifestyle. Despite their class warfare rhetoric, liberal politicians are just as likely as any greedy, hard-hearted, country-club conservative to take full advantage of all the kingly perks which have sometimes accrued to those who wield political power in our nation. In sharp contrast to these bipartisan abuses of the public trust, Brown chose to dump the California Governor's personal limousine and jet when he took office in 1975. Then he refused to take up residence in the Governor's mansion instead opting to rent a $250/month apartment. This may have been a bit excessive, but he certainly chose to err in the right direction.

In his current presidential bid, Brown has made the cleansing of government corruption his primary focus, something few liberals or conservatives have been even willing to discuss. He presents himself as a moral crusader on behalf of Everyman, fighting to overthrow a bloated and arrogant Beltway oligarchy of career politicians and entrenched bureaucrats. His impassioned assaults are leveled without mercy against "money grubbing Congressmen" and every other species of "bought and paid for politicians." If Brown's campaign can help to make voters more aware of the sordid behavior of our governing officials and their patronage armies, then he will have made a valuable contribution toward the national reformation we so desperately need.

Not all of Brown's critics dismiss him as a flake. In fact, many believe him to be the consummate opportunist with a deliberate method behind much of his madness. They portray him as a chameleon whose flip-flops on the issues are not only frequent but fundamental. Substantive examples abound, some of them on positions which form the core of Brown's campaign platform.

Two planks in Brown's platform somehow got warped as he tried to appeal to Michigan voters. Early in the campaign, he had repeatedly attacked Tom Harkin for having taken contributions from labor unions. Yet as soon as Harkin dropped out, Jerry Brown traded in his turtlenecks for a union jacket and began to curry favor with the same union leaders, focusing on the United Auto Workers PAC which provided $1.8 million to Democratic candidates in 1990. And as the audience changed, so did the message. Gone was Brown's decade long defense of free trade and the North American common market. Whereas last year protectionists were nothing more than "crybabies who can't compete," today they are the patriotic defenders of American jobs which greedy capitalists plan to ship down to Mexico.

All this has led a disillusioned Mickey Cantor (Brown's 1976 campaign manager) to ask the obvious question, "How many times can we allow Jerry Brown to reinvent himself?" In the opinion of columnist Michael Kinsley, "Brown's campaign technique is to grab onto some issue he's shown no previous sign of caring about and then to condemn with self-righteous wrath everyone else who fails to join him immediately in his newfound faith. Of course, this assumes that Brown genuinely does believe what he is preaching.

Brown himself has offered a disturbing analogy to justify his inconsistencies. He likens politics to paddling a canoe. One must alternate between paddling on the right and left sides in order to make the canoe go straight. This is situational ethics at its worst. One would rather Brown simply confess his own double-mindedness on many of the major issues facing our nation, and retract his bid to be captain of the ship of state until he can master the basics of moral/political navigation. No country can build a prosperous future unless it is first well grounded in a set of clear and unchanging bedrock principles. National malaise is the inevitable result of the instability and insecurity engendered by leadership which can only offer a vacillating vision of the future and which lacks a reliable moral compass to keep us on course.

The Bible has a lot to say about character, integrity and leadership qualities. For example, we are told that "a fool is hotheaded and reckless" (Proverbs 14:6), and that "it is not good to have zeal without knowledge, nor to be hasty and miss the way" (Proverbs 19:2). Since these characteristics are inappropriate for any level of leadership, how much more then should they be considered disqualifications for someone seeking the presidency?

Scripture also tells us that "a man of understanding keeps a straight course" (Proverbs 15:21), but that "a double-minded man is unstable in all he does" (James 1:8). Should we not then look for leaders that exhibit clarity of vision, consistency of principle, and stability of character? If we not only apply these standards to our public officials, but actually endeavor to live them ourselves, then there is hope that as a nation we will no longer be "infants tossed back and forth by the waves and blown here and there by every wind of teaching, and by the cunning and craftiness of man in their deceitful scheming" (Ephesians 4:14). Instead, we will have taken an important first step toward the restoration of maturity, security, morality and prosperity that our nation once enjoyed.

Education: Oppose efforts to bankrupt the public school system through private school vouchers. Support site-based decision-making and public school choice, with strong protections against discrimination.

Homosexual Rights: Condemn homophobia, bigotry and negative stereotyping of all kinds. Provide civil rights protection for gay men and lesbians; repeal ban on gay/lesbians in the military.

AIDS: Declare war on AIDS and HIV disease, implement the recommendations of the National Commission on AIDS and fully fund the Ryan White Care Act, provide honest drug treatment for all addicts who seek it; guarantee access to quality care; expand clinical trials for treatments and vaccines; and speed up the FDA drug approval process.

Abortion: Stand behind the right of every woman to choose, consistent with Roe v. Wade, regardless of ability to pay, and support a national law to protect that right. Provide for the full range of reproductive choice - education, counseling, access to contraceptives and the right to a safe, legal abortion.

Arts Funding: Public support for the arts, including a National Endowment for the Arts that is free from political manipulation and firmly rooted in the First Amendment's freedom of expression guarantee.

Welfare: Should be a second chance, not a way of life. Offer a new social contract that includes investing in education and job training, and provides the child care and health care they need to go to work.

Civil Rights: Support ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, affirmative action, stronger protection of voting rights for minorities, including access to voting, and resistance to discriminatory English-only pressure groups.

Deficit: Calls for fair and shared sacrifice for the common good. Achieve defense savings; reform entitlement programs to control soaring health care costs; cut federal administrative costs by three percent annually for four years; limit increases in the "present budget" to the rate of growth in the average paycheck.

Religion and Public Life: Our future as a nation depends upon the daily assumption of personal responsibility by millions of Americans from all walks of life - for the religious faith they follow, the ethics they practice, the values they instill, the pride they take in their work.

Family: Governments don't raise children; people do. Children should not have children. We need a national crackdown on deadbeat parents, an effective system of child-support enforcement. Supports family/medical leave legislation to ensure that workers don't have to choose between family and work.

Health Care: Support universal access to quality, affordable health care - not as a privilege but as a right. Cover all Americans regardless of pre-existent conditions. Tough controls on health costs.

Policy: Call for foreign aid to be targeted at democracies, not tyrants. Swifter action to help former communist nations maintain sanctions on South Africa. Would condition favorable trade terms with China on respect for human rights, market access for U.S. goods, and responsible conduct on weapons proliferation.

Environment: We reject the Republican myth that energy efficiency and environmental protection are enemies of economic growth. Vow to protect old-growth forests and wetlands and oppose new offshore drilling. Promise a civilian conservation corps.

Firearms: Support a reasonable waiting period to permit background checks for handgun purchases, as well as assault weapon controls to ban the possession, sale, and manufacture of the most deadly assault weapons.

Crime: Create Police Corps for participants to receive college aid in return for police service. Favor innovative sentencing and punishment options, including community service and boot camps for first-time offenders; tougher penalties for rapists, victim impact statements and restitution to ensure that crime victims will not be lost in the criminal justice system.

Taxes: We will relieve the tax burden on middle-class Americans by forcing the rich to pay their fair share, providing tax relief to families with children.

Economy: Renew prosperity through public and private investment, particularly in transportation, environmental technologies, defense conversion and a national information network. Create an investment tax credit and capital gains reduction for investors in emerging technologies and new business, instead of a capital gains windfall for the wealthy.

Education: Parents should have the right to choose the best schools for their children; schools should teach right from wrong; advocate $1,000 tuition credit. Backs parents' right to educate children at home.

Homosexual Rights: Oppose efforts to include sexual preference as a protected minority under civil rights laws. Oppose recognition of same-sex marriages or laws allowing such couple to adopt children or provide foster care. Support continued ban on homosexuals in the military.

AIDS: AIDS should be treated like any other communicable or sexually transmitted disease, while at the same time preserving patient confidentiality. Oppose distribution of condoms or clean needles for drug users. Encourage prevention through education that stresses marital fidelity, abstinence and a drug-free lifestyle.

Abortion: Unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life. Reaffirm support for a human life amendment to the Constitution. Oppose public funding of abortion. Encourage abstinence education instead of school-based programs offering birth-control devices. Increase adoptions through tax credits, insurance and legal reforms. Appoint judges who respect traditional family values and the sanctity of human life.

Arts Funding: Oppose use of federal funds for obscenity and blasphemy masquerading as art. Accuses the entertainment industry, academics and Democrats of waging guerilla war against American values. Calls for a crusade against pornography.

Welfare: Regards current welfare system as anti-work and anti-marriage. it taxes families to subsidize illegitimacy. Reform should require work from those able in return for public assistance; make welfare families with children send them to school.

Civil Rights: Support various enforcement of statutes to prevent illegal discrimination on account of sex, race, creed, or national origin. We reject efforts to replace equal rights with quotas or other preferential treatment.

Deficit: At the heart of the Democrats' corruption of Congress is a fraudulent budget process. The lords of the Capitol still play the old shell game. Support a balanced budget, including a balanced-budget constitutional amendment. Reduce federal spending with a line-item veto.

Religion and Public Life: We believe in traditional family values, and in the Judeo-Christian heritage that informs our culture. America must remain neutral toward particular religions, but we must not remain neutral toward religion itself or the values religion supports. Allow voluntary prayer at community events such as commencement, and the right of students to engage in voluntary prayer in schools. Advocate the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance as a reminder of the principles that sustain us as one nation under God.

Family: Families built on solid, spiritual foundations are central to our party's inspiration. Trust parents and believe they, not courts and lawyers, know what is best for their children. The two-parent family still provides the best environment of stability, discipline, responsibility and character. Oppose parental-leave legislation in favor of agreements worked out between workers and employers. Increase income tax exemptions for dependents.

Health Care: Health care choices should remain in the hands of people, not government bureaucrats. Offset insurance costs with tax credits and deductions. Require insurers to cover preexistent conditions. Make premiums fully deductible for the self-employed. Cap malpractice claims.

Policy: Pursue security policies in partnership with other nations through the United Nations. Defends decision to grant most-favored nation trade status to China based on support for democratic reform. Reduce troop strength in Europe while maintaining military commitment and continue military ties with Israel while pursuing negotiated peace.

Environment: Progress must continue in tandem with economic growth. Crippling an industry is no solution. Bankrupt facilities only worsen environmental solutions.

Firearms: Defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms. Opposes gun control. Calls for stiff mandatory sentences for those who use firearms in a crime.

Crime: Change evidence rules that hamper prosecutions. change habeas corpus law to shorten the appeals process. Increase drug education in schools. Strengthen border patrol with necessary tools, technologies and structures.

Taxes: The only safeguard between taxpayers and Democrat tax increases is the use of the presidential veto and Republican votes in the Congress to sustain it. The tax increases of 1990 should ultimately be repealed.

Economy: Repeal recessionary tax increases enacted under the 1990 budget agreement and reduce the capital gains tax rate to 15 percent. Create federal enterprise zones and make permanent tax credits for research and development. Decrease government regulation. Increase home ownership through a $5,000 tax credit for first-time home buyers and other programs.

Mississippi Governor Kirk Fordice's comment that America is a "Christian nation" touched off a storm of controversy in November. Fordice's comment came during a meeting of Republican leaders after President Bush's loss to Bill Clinton. The remark was meant to remind people that Christian principles were important in the formation of our nation and continue to be important to the majority of Americans.

The fact that this statement should cause controversy foretells a coming resurgence of debate over the role of Christianity in determining public policy in America. It is also foretells a re-examination of our national roots - a focus that is much needed at a crucial juncture in our history.

America has lost the roots of its heritage. To recover the quality of life we knew as our kind of Western Civilization, we must rediscover the source and determine to re-establish these teachings as guidelines of conduct in every facet of our lives and teach them to our children.

What are those mysterious principles discovered by the Founding Fathers that made this a great country, envied by so many that millions endured hardship to enter and gain the freedoms, safety and opportunities found here and almost nowhere else on earth?

The answers two generations ago were taught with pride to every child in home, school and church. But somehow we have lost our way. It is imperative that we retrace our steps, learn how we became lost and recapture our inheritance through knowledge and dedication.

The United States of America is not a Christian country or state. The writers of the Constitution said, very wisely, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, prohibiting the free exercise thereof." In other words, there will be no state church (such as the Church of England), but the people may worship according to their wishes, anytime and anywhere. A "country" is a geographical area inhabited by a certain people under a particular political government.

However, the United States of America is a Christian nation. A nation is an aggregation of people bound together "by common ideals and a common purpose. A rich inheritance of memories and the desire to preserve those memories ... a nation is a spiritual entity brought into existence by complex historical conditions, by similar traditions and a similar imagination."

A nation is not produced by a common language, race, religion or geographical outline, but these things may contribute to the unity of a people - a nation. Several different "nations" make up the Yugoslavia of today. The Jewish people were a "nation" during the 40 years they wandered in the wilderness but they had no land of their own.

Our Declaration of Independence and Constitution are based on Judeo-Christian teachings. The textbook of these teachings in the Holy Bible. It is the "Owners Manual" or "The Book of Instructions" for our nation. The Founding Fathers and many others in position of authority ever since have recertified that fact. "America is a Christian nation." This does not mean that all the people were or are Christian. It merely means that there was a Christian consensus and all our founding documents, laws, moral codes and institutions are based on Christian principles from the Bible.

In broad sense Buddhism and Confucianism made China what it is. Shintoism made Japan what it is. Hinduism made India what it is. Islam made the middle east and North Africa what it is. Communism made 30 nations what they became.

Reformation Christianity made America what it is - and this is the country we choose - and so would millions of others if they could.

In an Arabian country a few years ago, a princess, daughter of a Sheik, had an affair with her boyfriend. She was taken to the village square and beheaded. This was legal, moral, and proper according to their laws based upon the Koran. This is not to say that there is nothing good in other religions. There are good teachings in most religions, and certainly many evil things have been done in the name of Christianity. But don't blame Jesus and His teachings for man's aberrations.

To know the Christian basis of our country is to learn what every schoolboy and girl learned two generations ago about the writings and early documents executed by those who built the greatest nation in all history.

1620 - The Mayflower Compact written by the Pilgrims before they got off the Mayflower said: "In the presence of God, Amen. We ... do by these presents solemnly and mutually in ye presence of God, and one another, covenant and combine ourselves into a civil body politic."

1638 - The Fundamental Orders of Connecticut (often called the first American Constitution) said, We "enter into a combination and confederation together to maintain and preserve the liberty and purity of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ which we now profess." It also stated for the first time that men's rights come from God, as later stated in the Declaration of Independence.

The Great Law of Pennsylvania Colony said, "Whereas the glory of Almighty God and the good of mankind is the reason and the end of government and therefore government itself is a venerable ordinance of God..."

1772 - Samuel Adams: "The right to freedom being the gift of God Almighty ... The rights of the colonists as Christians may be best understood by reading and carefully studying the institutes of the great Law Giver which are to be found clearly written and promulgated in the New Testament."

1777 - The First Continental Congress appropriated funds to import for the people 20,000 Holy Bibles as "the great political textbook of the patriots."

1776 - The Declaration of Independence says: "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness - That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men ... "

There you have some profound statements:

- * There is such a thing as Truth, and Truth can be known by man.
- * Men are "created" and their rights come from God, their Creator.
- * Governments exist to protect these God-given rights.

This is the very essence of our Americanism!

1787 - The Constitution was written to "secure the Blessings of Liberty."

1787 - George Washington said regarding the Constitution: "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair; the event is in the hand of God."

Thomas Jefferson, on his memorial: "God who gave us life, gave us liberty. Can the liberties of a nation be secure when we have removed a conviction that the liberties are the gift of God?"

2 Corinthians 3:17: "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is Liberty."

1787 - At an impasse of several weeks at the Constitutional Convention, Benjamin Franklin rose and said, "I have lived, Sir, a long time and the longer I live, the more convincing proofs I see of this truth: that God governs in the affairs of man. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his notice, is it probable that an empire can arise without His aid? We have been assured, Sir, in the Sacred Writings that except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. I firmly believe this." He then moved they resort to prayer.

1787 - Washington's Inaugural Address: "The propitious smiles of heaven cannot be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right, which heaven itself has ordained." All inaugural addresses and state constitutions refer to Almighty God, the author and sustainer of our liberty.

1789 - Washington's Thanksgiving Proclamation: "Whereas, it is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits and humbly to implore

His protection and favor..."

1797 - Washington's Farewell Address: "And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion."

Patrick Henry: "It cannot be emphasized too strongly or too often that this great nation was founded not by religionists but by Christians, not on religions but on the gospel of Jesus Christ."

John Quincy Adams: "The first and almost the only Book deserving of universal attention if the Bible." The highest glory of the American Revolution was this: "It connected in one indissoluble bond the principles of civil government with the principles of Christianity."

1789-1795 - John Jay, first chief justice of the United States: "Providence has given to our people the choice of their rulers, and it is the duty as well as the privilege and interest, of a Christian nation to select and prefer Christians for their rulers."

1843 - Emma Willard, educator and historian: "The government of the United States is acknowledged by the wise and good of other nations, to be the most free, impartial and righteous government of the world; but all agree that for such a government to be sustained many years, the principles of truth and righteousness, taught in the Holy Scriptures, must be practiced. The rulers must govern in the fear of God, and the people obey the laws ... A nation cannot exist without religion. France tried that and failed. We were born a Protestant Christian nation, and, as such, baptized in blood. Our position ought to be defined as that."

1861 - Abraham Lincoln: "It is the duty of all nations, as well as of men, to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God and to recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history, that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord."

1863 - Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address: "That we here highly resolve ... that this nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

1892 - The Supreme Court of the United States after citing 87 precedents decided: "Our laws and our institutions must necessarily be based upon and embody the teachings of the Redeemer of Mankind. It is impossible that it should be otherwise: and in this sense and to this extent our civilization and our institutions are emphatically Christian ... This is a religious people. This is historically true. From the discovery of this continent to the present hour, there is a single voice making this affirmation ... we find everywhere a clear recognition of the same truth. These and many other matters which might be noticed, add a volume of unofficial declarations to the mass of organic utterances that this is a Christian nation."

1983 - Oct. 4, 1982, Joint Resolution of Congress: "Whereas the Bible, the Word of God, has made a unique contribution in shaping the United States as a distinctive and blessed nation of people. Whereas Biblical teachings inspired concepts of civil government that are contained in our Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of The United States ... Whereas that renewing our knowledge of, and faith in God through Holy Scriptures can strengthen us as a nation and a people. Now therefore be it resolved ... that the President is authorized and requested to designate 1983 as a national "Year of the Bible" in recognition of both the formative influence the Bible has been for our nation, and our national need to study and apply the teachings of the Holy Scriptures."

February 3, 1983 - President Ronald Reagan issued the above requested proclamation. President George Bush declared 1990 to be the international year of Bible reading.

Considering the small sampling of evidence presented, it is no wonder that our motto: "In God We Trust" is found on all our coinage, engraved on walls of both houses of Congress, and that every session begins with a prayer by its chaplain, that a prayer room is in the Capitol with a glass window depicting Washington in prayer surrounded by a quotation of Psalm 16:1. The Ten Commandments are emblazoned on the wall in the Supreme Court just over the head of the Chief Justice as a symbol of the source of all our laws. Biblical quotations are etched on and in the Washington Monument, the Lincoln memorial, the Library of Congress and many other official buildings. Our Pledge of allegiance is to the flag of "One Nation under God."

Surely, with even these few stated facts, no intellectually honest person can deny that our nation exists on the bedrock of biblical Christianity and has so prospered. But strangely, and in spite of our strong spiritual heritage, as so often happens when man becomes prosperous and feels self-sufficient, he ignores his early teachings and begins to create for his own pleasure, an immoral society. He turns his back on God. And thus it is that we find ourselves living in the presently decadent, pornographic, licentious, violent and often godless society in fear for our own safety. If you doubt this, just read through your daily newspaper. There are always evil forces willing to contribute to the expedition of the downturn in spiritual and moral values. America was no exception.

Early in this century, some of the "intellectuals" in our society became enamored with philosophical bantering of some European philosophers of the last century. They read the doctrines of Freud, the Materialism of Feurbach, nihilism of Nietzsche, dialectic of Hegel, the communism of Marx, and of behaviorist-socialism, existentialism, rationalism, fabianism and humanism. From this gathering of intellectuals was formed the Intercollegiate Socialist Society and in promoting socialism, they became advocates of the ideology of Karl Marx. Chapters of this organization, now the League for Industrial Democracy, were formed in 125 colleges by the 1930s.

They were joined by John Dewey, who became president of the organization in 1941. John Dewey, the "godfather of progressive education," was also a member of the American Humanist Association and signed its Manifesto in 1933. Humanism teaches atheism, autonomous man, amorality, evolution and one-world socialism. Through Dewey's influence at Columbia University, the teachings of humanism permeated our educational system and excluded from our textbooks the moral and biblical teachings which were so much a part of our American culture. Now after two generations of Americans have been subjected to this "godless" philosophy through our schools, what are the results?

It has created a spiritually apathetic society that hardly murmured when in 1962, citing no precedents, a liberal Supreme Court abolished prayer from the public schools and the next year abolished Bible reading from the schools. The American public was conditioned to accept this and so from that time there was a startlingly great rise in teenage pregnancies (up 556%), venereal disease (up 226%). Family divorce which had declined for 15 years, then tripled each year since. S.A.T. scores, previously stable, declined remarkably. The high principles that made America great were lost.

A 1982 survey of top discipline problems in the public schools listed: Rape, robbery, assault, burglary, arson, bombings, murder, suicide, absenteeism, vandalism, extortion, drug abuse/pushing, alcohol abuse, gang warfare, pregnancies, abortions and venereal disease. Contrast this with discipline problems in 1940: Talking in class, chewing gum, making noise, running in halls, getting out of turn in line, not putting papers in waste baskets. What happened to our children?

People try to blame television programs, family breakdown, drugs, alcohol and many other things as the cause of this decadence. But this thinking is too superficial, it doesn't go deep enough.

We must recognize that those who create, participate in and accept the raw-sex and violence of T.V., movies, magazines and books, the casual attitude towards family breakdown, drug abuse, uncommitted sex, sodomy, drive-by shootings, wholesale murders, child molestation, racism, gay-bashing, greed and scandal in politics, business and practically all the ills of society are products of the amoral, permissive educational system and the two generations of people produced by this system and now they determine the moral tone of society.

There is no other cause for society's breakdown. Think it through! It will be interesting to see all the artifices and contortions some will go through to try to deny the truths of this study. Perhaps it takes someone more than two generations old (such as I) to note the drastic change from the peaceful, neighborly, spiritually conscious society in which I grew and was taught.

Only when enough Americans resolve to restore our national character can we hope to see a society wherein people of all classes, colors and religious beliefs can live together in peace and harmony. It is going to take a generation, but we better begin right now.

Big Government

5/88

McDonald's had $4.1 billion in sales in 1986. Add Delta Airline's operating revenues of $4.4 billion and Wal-Mart's total assets of $4 billion and the total barely exceeds the $11.96 billion dollar federal government's food-stamp program. In other words, the federal government spends almost four times the dollars on food stamps that McDonald's receives in sales revenue.

Such are the contrasts one can make comparing the 1988 Almanac figures to a copy of the 1988 federal budget. Another example: the Child Nutrition Program budgets of $3.6 billion exceeds the premium income New York Life receives from all insurance and annuity policies. Notice also I am using sales, assets, and premium figures, not profits. Company profits would be much lower. Ford and General Motors had profits in the $3 billion to $4.5 billion range.

The Department of Agriculture has a budget of $49 billion. What could you do with $4 billion? You could buy the listed assets of United Parcel Service ($4.8 billion), Coca-Cola ($8.3 billion), K-Mart ($10.5 billion), Standard Oil($15.9 billion), and Merrill Lynch ($9.6 billion). You might wonder what the Department of Agriculture does with these billions of dollars. Most of it goes for what in Europe is called Socialism.

Consider: $1.8 million to World Agriculture Outlook Board, $85.6 million to Foreign Agriculture Service, $11.9 billion for food stamps, $82.5 million for Nutritional Assistance for Puerto Rico, and $18.1 billion for the Federal Food and Nutrition Program.

When these programs are criticized, a swell of moral indignation arises. Do we not have a duty, particularly as Christians, to have compassion for those who are hungry and in desperate situations? Certainly! Yet we must not forget the eighth commandment given by Almighty God:"Thou shalt not steal."

Robin Hood was a thief. As we have seen before, the Bible forbids the fundamental practice of Socialism. It is un-Scriptural and is therefore Anti-Christ. Christians are to be compassionate with their own money. They should not encourage the State to confiscate their neighbors' money to fulfill their duty of charitable giving. Would not a politician giving his own money to charity reveal a genuinely compassionate heart - while the absence thereof exposes his hypocrisy? It costs politicians little to be generous in giving tax money away.

Scripture does give government legitimate but limited functions to fulfill as the ministers of God to the people (Romans 13:4-6). Yet Scripture does not hold government morally responsible for providing food and nutrition. This is the duty of fathers (I Timothy 3:7) and private charity,(church fathers). We must remember that government has no money of its own. Government must first take money from citizens before it can be selectively compassionate.

The Department of Health and Human Services has a $171 billion budget. This is $22.8 billion more than the combined deposits of Bank-America Corp. and Chase Manhattan Bank. What could you buy with $171 billion? You could purchase the assets of General Motors ($72.5 billion), IBM ($57.8 billion), and Ford Motor ($37.9 billion) and have $2.9 billion left! These are three of the four largest corporations in the United States.

Or, you could buy the assets of the 10 largest transportation companies, (UAL, UPS, Burlington Northern, Union Pacific, CSX, AMR, Santa Fe Southern, Delta Air Lines, Texas Air, Norfolk Southern) and have $17.7 billion leftover after subtracting the total Premium and Annuity income of the 10 largest life insurance companies (Prudential of America, Metropolitan Life, Equitable, Atena, New York Life, Teachers Insurance & Annuity, John Hancock Mutual, Travelers, Connecticut General, and Northwestern Mutual Life). Again, these are asset and income figures, not profits.

These figures need to be remembered the next time you hear a congressman complaining about the power of big corporations. When you talk of big business, the Federal government is the place to start. The phrase "Big Government" takes on new meaning when the $14 billion dollar budget of the Department of Education exceeds the assets of Procter & Gamble by a billion dollars, and the $10.5 billion budget of the Department of Energy exceeds the sales revenue of Digital Equipment by $2.5 billion! Corporations are pygmies when compared to the size and power of the Federal government.

Can the Defense Budget Be Cut?

We could go on and on but let's address the $302 billion defense department budget. Notice first that the socialistic welfare programs, both domestic and foreign, are spread throughout various departmental budgets. Together they exceed defense expenditures. (This is before $259.6 billion in the Social Security Trust Fund, the most Socialistic program of the federal government.) Why do we taxpayers spend so much on defense? Do we have that many hostile enemies - if so why? Is our country that hard to defend? Let me offer you three major reasons why we spend such mammoth amounts on national defense.

1. Have the American taxpayers decided they are morally responsible to pay for the defense of the citizens in the Pacific Basin, Middle East, Western Europe, and elsewhere? Are those peoples and countries truly that helpless to defend themselves? The international presence of U.S. military all over the globe is the primary expense factor in the Department of Defense.

We spend between $130 and $150 billion on NATO (foreign welfare?) alone - every year. A domestic defense strategy could defend our homeland at a fraction of the cost. The personnel, equipment and logistical support of U.S. military presence in every corner of the globe is truly astronomical. Also, does not our very presence fuel hostilities toward our country and lend credence to the charge of our being intruding interventionists? Have U.S. taxpayers gladly assumed these costs and risks? Perhaps they have never carefully considered it?

2. The second cause for the bloated defense budget is the millions of defense bureaucrats. Their jobs depend upon this budget and the mentality behind our defense strategy. They are the internal defense lobby, which has many similar goals as defense contractors who comprise the external lobby. Economist Thomas Sowell is right in saying that bureaucracies are wasteful by design and were never intended to be efficient. Their primary objective is to perpetuate themselves. Despite many good people in the Defense Department, we mustn't be naive. At the root, most are career bureaucrats.

3. Procurement procedure is the third major reason we are over-spending on defense. This is related to the other two, in fact all three reasons are related. Giving a bureaucracy the huge and infinitely complex task of purchasing for such a widely scattered and diverse defense complex assures procurement wastes of major proportions. Imagine the power struggles which must exist among the bureaucrats who determine how, when, and for what to disburse those billions of dollars.

Balancing The Federal Budget

Cutting defense spending involves the same things necessary to balance the whole budget. Below I briefly survey a five point plan which will give us a balanced budget with minimal economic dislocation. We begin with the assumption of a $175 billion deficit in a $1.3 trillion budget.

1. A 13.46% across-the-board cut will balance the budget. With numbers as big as we've just seen, it would not be difficult to find this much money in outright cuts. However, like taking an addict off heroin cold-turkey, the withdrawal pain might be more than our economy can take.

Cutting $175 billion of spending out of the U.S. and world marketplace, and millions of pockets, would cause severe economic disruptions. This can be eased by gradually phasing the cuts in over three years. That's just $58 billion in true spending cuts - for three years in a row. Though more difficult, this is the most compassionate method.

2. Have every budget department do an A, B, C, D prioritization of their budget. The "As" would be the most important functions performed while the "Ds" the least. This is the divide and conquer method of streamlining activities. You completely eliminate all "Ds," and as many "Cs" as possible. Alan Laikin has used this technique in business management for years. You also minimize internal wars and muster some of the bureaucrats as supporters by letting the departments do much of the prioritizing - they identify the "most cuttable" budgetary items.

3. Now, where do we get the other $117 billion balance in revenue to balance the budget? Two places - Privatization and Auction. The federal government owns over half the land in the country, along with thousands of buildings. If just 10% of all federal lands were sold annually at auction, the budget could easily be balanced. (Don't start with wilderness lands and stir up the ecologists who ignorantly assume the federal government is the most contentious landowner and protector.)

We could just close down a few military installations (domestic and foreign) and sell the assets at auction.

4. The balance could be done by privatizing government services. The Grace Commission reported hundreds of government services which could be done more efficiently by private industry. This would eventually yield tax revenue rather than expenditures, but initially would generate capitalization revenues.

How many millions of shares could be issued at $10 per share to sell the assets of the U.S. Postal System and Amtrak? Shares could be offered and given first to the employees, with the balance sold to the public. Britain did this with their telephone system and South Africa is about to do this with their $30 billion transportation system. Much the same is being planned with public housing.

Let's sell the country back to the citizens. The initial sale will soften the need and pain of too severe budget cutting, balance the budget, and privatize the nation.

5. With these done, we can then introduce a phased-in flat tax. We can begin simply with an optional 20% short-form with no interest, housing or personal deductions. If supply-side economics holds true, this will expand the economy and generate more revenue. The flat rate can be gradually reduced. Keep itemizations open for a few years to give CPAs and tax attorneys time to find less parasitic and more productive work. As voluntary compliance soars, the IRS's budget could then be eliminated!

This is a bit sketchy but the point should be clear. The budget can be balanced. Surely there are decisions to be made and there will be economic pain and dislocation for a limited period of time. But that is the price one always pays for years of excess.

The Bill Of Rights: Facing A Crisis On Its Bicentennial Anniversary

The first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States are commonly called the "Bill of Rights." What are these ten amendments? Because few Americans today have a working knowledge of what the Bill of Rights actually says, they are listed below:

I. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people to peaceably assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

II. A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

III. No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

IV. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

V. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be put in jeopardy of life and limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

VI. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

VII. All suits at common law, where the value at controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise reexamined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

VIII. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

IX. The enumeration of the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

X. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The next question is: "Whose rights are these?" According to the original Framers of the Constitution: "The individual States and the people." The Constitution as a document was originally intended to severely limit the power and authority of the federal government. The individual States and the people, however, did not think that the Constitution was sufficiently powerful enough to do this on its own, so they designed the Bill of Rights to even further limit the federal government. The Bill of Rights could more accurately be called the Bill of Limitations.

The Bill of Rights was predominantly designed to strictly limit the interference of the federal government in the affairs of the people. The Framers, and the people of that day, understood only too well what a central government was capable of, as they had seen every government on earth at that time turn into an oppressive, autocratic authority over people, with no intention of caring for the people, only caring for itself.

It is precisely this kind of central government, one which we are in danger of having today, which the Framers of the Constitution tried so desperately to prohibit. They knew the destructive power of this kind of government, and they wanted to avoid it at all costs. They also knew that a central government was the way of the worst of mankind, and that the worst of mankind was what could be expected out of man, given the fallen spiritual nature of man.

The central government encroaching upon us has been brought about, and is maintained chiefly by the actions of the Supreme Court. Thomas Jefferson saw the worst potential of the Supreme Court, and what it could do to make our government oppressive:

"We already see the power, installed for life, responsible to no authority (for impeachment is not even a scarecrow), advancing with a noiseless and steady pace to the great object of consolidation. The foundations are already deeply laid by their decisions for the annihilation of constitutional State rights, and the removal of every check, every counterpoise to the engulfing power of which themselves are to make a sovereign part.

"If ever this vast country is brought under a single government, it will be one of the most extensive corruption, indifferent and incapable of a wholesome care over so wide a spread of surface ... when all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated."

The open movement of the Supreme Court in the direction which Jefferson feared did not begin to be realized until 1872. After the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the Supreme Court began to use its language to link the Bill of Rights to the State and local governments in a way which forced them to conform to a federal standard. This was directly counter to the Framers' intentions, as this took the government out of reach of the people, removing the effectiveness and integrity of it, and placed it all in Washington, where the checks and balances were rendered in effective.

The Fourteenth Amendment was designed only to get all states to declare freed slaves as citizens, and not let the states deny basic liberties to those freed slaves which were enjoyed by other citizens. Because of the language of the amendment having extensive federal emphasis, there were many states who opposed ratification. Even in the Northern states of Ohio and New Jersey, both strong anti-slavery states, rescinded their ratifications.

Since 1872 the Supreme Court has consistently removed the rights found in the Bill of Rights from the American people, and from the individual states, and has replaced those rights with what it calls "fundamental rights" - rights which are nowhere mentioned in any documents establishing the United States or its government. These "fundamental rights" have taken precedence over the "inalienable rights" of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness mentioned in the Declaration of Independence, and the "First Amendment rights" of religious freedom, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom to petition the government to redress grievances.

The Supreme Court has made so many rules and regulations which every citizen must obey or be in violation of federal statutes, that the effectiveness of a government which is set up to protect the people, is in crisis. There is the real danger of liberty becoming a lost dream. We have, in fact, fewer liberties now than at any other time in our nation's history.

In 1965 the Supreme Court went the full course by "discovering" a right to "reproductive privacy" in the Constitution. This "fundamental right" was discovered in the "penumbras, formed by emanations from the Bill of Rights." In other words, there is nothing there. But this "fundamental right" is the direct cause of the deaths of over 27 million children, children who have been denied their "inalienable rights," and their "First Amendment rights."

The actions of the Supreme Court, by forcing the states to comply with federal regulations, have formed a central government which routinely and callously tramples the rights of its people. We have on our hands a government which has turned out to be a worse butcher than Hitler ever was. For the past 120 years, the Supreme Court has sat on its throne like a hierarchical demigod, passing down arbitrary judgments in the name of the Constitution, all the while disavowing the Framers' intent.

Can Clinton Keep His Promises?

By Andrew Sandlin

The present euphoria of the Democratic Party over the election of their first president in 16 years should be tempered by the realization that the job of serving as executive is slightly more difficult than running a successful political campaign. Clinton faces some impediments it will be difficult to overcome.

If presidential campaigns are to be remembered by buzzwords, the verbal motif of Clinton's successful 1992 campaign will be etched for many years on the minds of Americans: "change." Fatefully for George Bush, the economy dipped - or was depicted as to have dipped - demonstrably several months after he received an approval rating of 90% at the conclusion of the Gulf War; and on November third he paid the ultimate penalty suffered by any president, from Herbert Hoover to Jimmy Carter, whose policies are perceived as coincident with major economic downturns.

Not surprisingly, Clinton largely avoided other substantive issues in his campaign and hammered away at the need for change, not principally in social policy, foreign affairs or education, but in the economy. He campaigned on an explicitly "Put America First" platform (ironically, not much unlike that of right-wing Republican candidate Pat Buchanan) and consistently stressed "investment in America," a theme appealing to a large block of labor troubled by the loss of jobs to foreign markets.

Affirmation of this strategy reaped sound political benefits, but its successful implementation is dubious. There is a simple reason for this. Clinton has admitted he will raise taxes on upper income brackets in order to create jobs and, it is asserted, thus rejuvenate the economy. While many voters seemed not to mind this plan, these same voters heard the inimitable Ross Perot incessantly lament the chilling results of our monstrous deficit. Bipartisan support for a balanced budget amendment is mounting, the sort of legislation that would at least begin to reverse the deficit spending that engenders economic problems, and it is not inconceivable that such legislation may be voted into law during the Clinton administration.

This will present an insuperable problem for Clinton's economic strategy. Savings, individual or government, can occur in only one of two ways: increase income and decrease disbursements. No one would dream of suggesting the impossible and ludicrous idea that by taxation alone we can eliminate the deficit; Clinton's proposed tax increase certainly doesn't: it is designed ostensibly to bolster the economy by reducing employment. But income derived from taxation designed to reduce employment does nothing to reduce the deficit, so we're still left with the need to cut spending if we want to make a dent in the deficit. The spending cuts necessary to reduce the deficit, however, will jeopardize the types of programs Clinton's support rode into the presidency.

Of course, Clinton could veto a balanced budget amendment, but then he would only alienate a growing number of Americans apprehensive over the future of our country with such a huge (and escalating) spending deficit and fall into the same sort of government "gridlock" (another 1992 buzzword) by which Bush was plagued and which Ross Perot vocalized and exploited in his campaign.

If Clinton implements the taxation he calls his economic "investment" policy he will only compound the deficit woes, but if he supports the reduction of the deficit he cannot fulfill his campaign promises but only expect to suffer a Bush-like "Read My Lips" scenario.

Further, Clinton faces in the legislature a large Republican minority less than thrilled with his campaign promises and unimpressed by his margin of victory. For instance, Senate minority leader Robert Dole has publicly committed himself to advancing on the Senate floor the interests of the "Fifty-seven percent of Americans who ... voted against Bill Clinton." The Republicans retained sufficient seats to filibuster Democratic legislation and Clinton will soon discover the necessity of compromise with an often recalcitrant Congress, the sort of compromise to which Bush grudgingly surrendered and that Clinton exploited in his "Read My Lips" parlance and one that is not likely to endear him to the hearts of the American people.

Moreover, the dispatching of American troops to Somalia and the increasing realization that the conclusion of the Cold War has not solved all international problems, do not bode well for the new president. The embarrassment of Clinton's war record pales in comparison to the perception among the populace that he is patently inexperienced and possibly unskilled in dealing with foreign affairs.

In the "New World Order" it appears deft diplomacy will be a requisite of the successful president. Clinton shows no indications of such diplomatic deftness. Like other presidents (Reagan, for example) he can gain it by on the job training. And so long as trouble spots around the globe are relatively few and innocuous, Clinton's almost exclusive commitment to economic change will suffice. It may be found sadly lacking, however, if America is forced to deal with another case of international aggression that threatens our national interests. One does not get the impression Clinton's approval rating in an international crisis will match Bush's recent post war landslide, or perhaps even Clinton's own election percentage.

Finally, Clinton confronts (and is already feeling) the predicament of a centrist president: he is expected to please too many people. Candidates like Ronald Reagan that run on a more ideological platform find it more difficult to get elected, but when they do, they are less frequently forced to compromise and are largely free to pursue their own agenda. Centrist candidates like Bill Clinton rely on a large and heterogeneous base for election. The dilemma for the centrist is that the same base expects good returns on the investment of their vote. Since ideologues like Reagan build the strong consensus before the election, they don't need as much compromise afterward. Centrists like Clinton (and for that matter, Bush) learn too late that it is much more difficult to please citizens than to win voters.

The Democrats have been dealt a stacked deck and they will need more than beginner's luck to expect any substantial winnings.

What About Capital Punishment?

by Glenn Duneheew

Whenever you bring up the subject of capital punishment, you can always count on a lively discussion with plenty of opinions offered - along with lots of questions.

"But doesn't the Bible say 'Do not kill'?"

"Who are we to cast the first stone?"

"Isn't execution cruel and unusual punishment?"

Let's look briefly at what the Bible has to say about this subject:

What Does Capital Punishment Accomplish?

Capital punishment is meant to be a deterrent to crime, specifically murder. Gordon Tullock, of Virginia Polytechnic Institute, states: "Eighty percent of the people who seriously think about crime think of punishment as a deterrent - except for the sociologists, and they wrote all the textbooks."¹ Statistically speaking, for each prisoner executed there are 50 murders averted. This has been documented in the U.S. between the years 1967-1984.² During these years, capital punishment was abolished in most states and then reinstated with new guidelines. During the years that capital punishment was not allowed, murders began to rise.

Capital punishment places a value on human life; it says, in essence, "If you take a life, yours will be forfeited." But the concept of capital punishment did not originate with men. It was God who originated it in the days of Noah, when He said,

"Whoever sheds man's blood, by man his blood will be shed, for in the image of God He made man" (Genesis 9:6).

Murder, then, is not just a crime against man ... it is a crime against God who created man. For that reason, only the death of the murderer can satisfy God's justice. Capital punishment is detailed in many places in the Old Testament - Exodus 21:12-15; Leviticus 24:17-21; Numbers 35:9-34; Deuteronomy 21:1-9. It is also clearly affirmed in the New Testament by the Apostle Paul:

"For rulers are not a cause of fear for good behavior, but for evil. Do you want to have no fear of authority? Do what is good, and you will have praise from the same; for it is a minister of God to you for good. But if you do what is evil, be afraid; for it does not bear the sword for nothing; for it is a minister of God, an avenger who brings wrath upon the one who practices evil" (Romans 13:3-4).

In order to preserve justice and maintain peace and order on earth, God established the death penalty and the institution that is to administer it - civil government. The death penalty was given to protect the innocent, and to insure tranquility and peace in society. Furthermore, the Bible states that murder pollutes the land, and that the only way to purge the land of this curse is by enforcing the death penalty. Numbers 35:33 states: "No expiation can be made for the land for the blood that is shed on it, except by the blood of him who shed it." In other words, until justice is carried out, the nation will carry the guilt of the crime as well.

But What If You Kill an Innocent Person?

In the United States, a convicted murderer goes through a long, laborious process before he ever reaches the electric chair. Three appeals are made, and the case is reviewed by several judges. This allows for the conviction to be thoroughly examined before anyone is proven guilty. Today, the number of appeals can be up to 20. By this time there is never any doubt as to the guilt of the criminal.

The Bible gives qualifications about capital punishment - and one of them is that at least two eye witnesses must testify against the accused. The Bible also calls for the decision to be made judiciously, impartially, and with proper legal proceedings. It is not to be administered in maliciousness or vengeance. God's law also makes a clear distinction between involuntary manslaughter and premeditated murder.³

In ancient cultures, guilt by association with a crime could be punishable by death. The rule was often "Guilty until proven innocent." But the Bible brought great reforms in the understanding of civil justice in the West. The rule eventually became "Innocent until proven guilty." This is a biblical idea.

But Is Capital Punishment Humane?

In 1972, when the U.S. Supreme Court struck down every state death penalty statute in the nation, it was declared to be "cruel and unusual punishment" and a violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. Then, in 1976, the Supreme Court reversed its decision, declaring that the death penalty was acceptable as long as the Court approved of the individual state's punishment guidelines.

During the years that the death penalty was in limbo or was outlawed, the number of murders in the U.S. rose significantly - from 13,000 in 1967 to 19,555 in 1978. We should ask ourselves this question: Is it humane to allow convicted murders to continue to live, when the possibility exists that they will repeat their crime?

The founding fathers, when they coined the phrase "cruel and unusual punishment," were not thinking of execution by hanging - which was the common method of that day. During the colonial period, there were from 10 to 18 capital offenses, including piracy, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, and sodomy.⁴ Says

Raoul Berger, a Harvard law professor, "The founders were accustomed to punishments that by our standards would be regarded as excessive, and gave no inkling of an intention to bar them." Article VIII of the Bill of Rights was not written to bar capital punishment, but to prevent torture or other barbaric practices which were common in that time.

The founders of America, because of their Christian backgrounds, knew the scriptural basis for capital punishment as a deterrent to crime. Again, we must see that it is humane to kill a murderer because it is actually saving lives which might later be lost if he were to go free. This is reinforced in the Bible:

"A man of great anger shall bear the penalty, for if you rescue him, you will only have to do it again" (Proverbs 19:19).

"When the scoffer is punished, the naive becomes wise" (Proverbs 21:11).

Consider the case of child killer Jimmy Lee Gray. Gray was sentenced to death for the 1976 sex slaying of three-year-old Deressa Jean Scales. At the time Gray murdered the girl, he was on parole after serving seven years of a 20 year sentence for the murder of his 16-year-old girlfriend. Gray was finally put to death after seven years and 82 judicial reviews by 26 state and federal judges.⁵

But Didn't Jesus Abolish the Old Testament Law?

We've already seen, in Romans 13:3-4, that capital punishment is reinforced in the New Testament. We also have the testimony of Jesus Christ, who said:

"Do not think that I came to abolish the law or the prophets; I did not come to abolish, but to fulfill" (Matthew 5:17).

God's justice and His character must always be reflected in our laws. God created man in His image, but man does not always respect the value of human life. When a human life is taken, God's justice must be enacted in order to protect society. Today, because of humanism in our courts and legislatures, justice is often not administered - and in its place we see man's own ideas about what is right and wrong being promoted.

This can be seen in the fact that we justify the killing of innocent babies through abortion, but also allow convicted murderers to roam the streets on parole. Neither God's nature or love are reflected in this. Yes, God is merciful. He loves and cares for us. But His justice demands that sin be punished.

Changing America

God wants to use you to liberate our nation!

10/88

By Lori Ann Brown

No longer do I see the possibility of changing America as an impossible task. Now I see it through my spiritual eyes as a nation full of strong, young leaders who want to know God and to fulfill His destiny for their lives. I want to see righteousness and truth reign; that's why I recently left my career as an engineer to reach and to train these future leaders here on Capitol Hill.

I believe that God is going to use me to build young people into the caliber of our founders: true George Washingtons and Abigail Adamses. Young people from all over the nation come to Washington to work with their congressmen and senators. What a dynamic opportunity to reach out to them with the love of Jesus and help them find the true means of change in America. It is not too late. The Bible says, "If my people will humble themselves and pray and seek my face, I will heal their land."

Now is the time to make disciples and train leaders. I count it an honor to build the kingdom of God here on Capitol Hill. There's no end to what God can do if we only trust and believe. Watch out America! The young people of America are coming! Daniel 11:32 says, "The people that know their God shall be strong and do exploits."

A new generation of young people are rising up in America today who want to preserve this nation and their liberties. My strong hope for America is that we will not lose the great heritage and precious liberties that have been handed down to us at the cost of many lives.

My vision for America is a restored America. An America where we have experienced a national revival and have the means of preserving the fruit of that revival. An America where the people are careful guardians of their liberties. An America where freedom of religion and of the mind are so highly treasured that the people would never again allow the controlling arm of civil government to restrict its churches or its schools. An America where each man is recognized as responsible for himself, the care of his family, and the education of his children.

I see an America where human life has intrinsic value and is worth defending - especially for those like the unborn. An America whose civil government has once again become the friend of good business. An America where the civil rulers are faithful to preserve and defend the Constitution they swore to uphold, instead of bowing to the pressure of every special interest group. An America where equal justice under law has been restored, having eliminated improper distinctions on the basis of wealth or color.

My life goal is to see our federal government restored to its lawful and limited jurisdiction, to see it fully performing those duties it has been given, but not attempting to do what remains the responsibility of others. Toward accomplishing this goal, I have studied at the late Francis Schaeffer's L'Abri Fellowship in Switzerland, obtained a Masters degree in Public Policy at CBN University, and am currently serving in the office of Congressman Patrick Swindall of Georgia.

Also, I am in the process of establishing a library of American and Virginian history, in order to preserve those books which reveal the truth about our history and the godly foundations of our nation. Next year I plan to begin a Ph.D. program, studying every branch of the federal government in order to understand the Constitution and the foundational principles of our nation.

I love God, and thus I love liberty. As Patrick Henry said, "Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains or slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! - I know not the course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

Harry Bleattler
University of North Carolina

After I gave my life to Jesus in 1986, God began to show me that He desires to raise up a generation of young people who would apply His Word to every area of their lives and their surroundings. Something stirred within me and I began to read voraciously, consuming all the teaching I could find. But I asked: How can I, an undergraduate student, make an impact on the world around me? It seemed like I had so far to go and so much to learn.

As I watched the humanistic ventures of society unfold around me, I became alarmed. So I decided to jump into both campus and presidential politics. I became my county's coordinator for Americans for Robertson - and that was quite an initiation into the world of politics! Since then I was elected to the UNC Student Congress, became the Administrative Director of UNC's chapter of Students for America, and have been made the managing editor of the alternative conservative campus magazine.

And I have been doing all this while carrying a full academic load! I certainly have been busy - but God has been faithful in helping me plan my days in order to get the most accomplished. After graduating this year with a B.A. in History and Government, I plan to enroll at CBN's graduate school in Public Policy and continue to answer God's call for the reformation of society.

I see the present time as being very crucial to the future of our country. Traditional values and the Judeo-Christian ethic have suffered due to neglect and assault.

The Constitution establishes our government to be a government by the people and for the people. This means that each of us is responsible to be involved in selecting representatives who believe in our values, and to communicate with them about our concerns and opinions.

My involvement in political matters consists of reading a great deal of material each month on current events, legislation, etc. In response, I write letters to my representatives to express my views. We have also formed a group to discuss these issues and to construct and distribute a newsletter to other concerned citizens in our church and community so that they can write and get involved.

I also see it as my responsibility to financially support those organizations who lobby in Washington and distribute information to the public about issues of concern.

I have read and studied a great deal of history, and realize that the freedom we enjoy in this country was purchased with the blood of brave men willing to defend it. Even though we are not presently at war, we are still responsible to preserve our freedom and our values by getting involved.

The place where true change begins is with you and with me - on the local level.

In the city of Gainesville, Florida, where I reside, the Effective Municipal Services Committee (EMSC) can review virtually any aspect of the local government, regardless of size, and evaluate whether that department, expenditure, or policy is an effective use of the citizens' money. If it is not, the committee members advise a change and provide alternative solutions.

When I joined the committee two years ago, I had no understanding of how local government really worked. But I was willing to learn, and to sincerely try to change my community for the better. Ultimately I desired Gainesville to be a more godly city, a place where traditional values were strong.

Within a year, I was elected chairman of the EMSC. Earlier this year I was one of 18 chairman that the City Commission asked to refine, prepare, and submit a five year budget for a Capital Improvement Program. Just recently, I was appointed as a founding member of a local "Grace Commission," a committee which works with the city manager for the specific purpose of eliminating waste from the budget. This committee functions similarly to President Reagan's 1982 Grace Committee which made 2200 recommendations with proposed cost savings of $300 million over three years.

Was all this difficult? No, not particularly. There is nothing different about me that allows me to do such things, either. I am a Christian, totally devoted to the Lord Jesus, and I want Him to receive the glory He deserves in every area of life - including government. Am I doing something that only a few Americans can do? On the contrary, our government cannot correctly function without the involvement of individuals in their local governments. Its very design requires involvement. Remember, we have in this country "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." If it's not "of the people" and "by the people," it can't be "for the people."

To be able to make a change in my government, God had to change me first. He removed my verbal complaints and lack of involvement, and replaced them with a listening ear and a charge to action. I strongly encourage you to do the same.

Robert Cushing

The Bible says, "The earth is the Lord's, and all it contains, the world, and all that dwell in it" (Psalm 24:1). As Christians, we usually see that self-government, family government, and church government are under God's control; but we rarely see civil government the same way. But God created all of these and gave instruction in the Scriptures on how to exert His influence in each one of them. Why should we leave civil government out of the sphere of His reign?

If Christians avoid civil government service, then non-Christians will fill the void. Our form of government vests the power and authority in the people. To "render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's" here in America, all of us as citizens must not only pay taxes but do our part in serving the government. We must also make ourselves available to run for political office.

Christ's command to the Church is to "disciple the nations"; to work toward the goal of seeing the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of Christ. This requires the Church to lead the way in every area of national life: family, science, agriculture, the arts, education, economics, law, business, etc. As the Church begins to obey the Lord in this, we will be able to offer His answers to the problems which face mankind.

Clarence Chappell

The 1980's have definitely been a decade of change in America and in the Christian church. We have seen the radical, anti-establishment values of the '60s and '70s replaced by a more conservative emphasis morally and politically. We have seen some firsts, like a black person making a serious run for the presidency of the United States, Jesse Jackson, and a noted Christian statesman, Pat Robertson, making a credible run for the presidency as well.

I believe that this decade, and indeed this year is a time of new beginnings. I believe God has been preparing the way for new leadership, vision and direction to take place all over America. Christians are rising up and starting to make their voices heard, especially politically.

When I first became involved with organizing conservative-minded Christians in political action here in Michigan in 1983, it was very tough. Very few wanted to publicly get involved in picketing, running for office, etc. But that all changed in 1986. Spurred in part by the presidential candidacy of Pat Robertson and a change in the procedures of the State Republican Party, I was able to help recruit thousands of once politically apathetic Christians into the process as precinct delegates.

Over the next two years, these people were able to have a profound impact in the state party to help see that traditional values would reenter our two party system. I believe that this contributed greatly, along with conservative Christian involvement throughout the nation, to the 1988 National Republican Party platform being pro-life, and pro-family.

I also see God raising up Black people to take the lead in areas like fighting abortion. Because of the correlation between slavery, and abortion this is a natural for Black people to take the lead in.

Finally, my desire and vision is to see manhood and the family structure restored to our nation ... Especially in Black America, which has been so desecrated with broken homes and a lack of godly parental role models. The curse of broken and single parent homes must be broken if our nation is truly going to be strong from within again.

I am excited about what God is doing in America! I believe this is the greatest time to be serving Jesus and involved in His purposes for your life!

America needs a new future to look forward to, fixed on returning whole-heartedly to God's ways. Without a clear vision of what America should become, we will go aimlessly into our own private pursuits, providing no inspiration to the nations around us, or even to our own children. One thing we need is a strong and honorable leader for President. I hope for the day when our President will stand up for what's right: a man of genuine integrity, wisdom, and decisiveness.

We need a President of deep conviction who can cut through the confusion of a crisis situation and see the way clearly to action. He will be a man able to rise above dishonest political maneuvers, one who commands the respect of even his hateful critics. Most of all he will have great faith and trust in God, Who can give him the ability to lead America on a right course. Every time he speaks, the people will know in their hearts that it is good, and that God is using him.

But to have such a President as leader, it is first necessary that Americans open the door. I am persuaded, especially in our American system, that a nation's leader is only as good as its people deserve. We must stop being a selfish people! We must stop denying God's laws and acknowledge their eternal truth. We must become a people who fear punishment for violating His moral code.

We must see through the deceptiveness of our "good intentions" and admit that we need help. America must PRAY for guidance back to Him, so that He will provide us with a great leader.

At the University of Missouri, I find myself among students who are going to become America's leaders. On campus, I work to apply Godly character to every course of study and personal habit in my own life. I look to weigh the issues that face our society and find the truth from God's perspective. I ask for God to show me my motives and actions for what they really are so He can change me. I hope this will equip me to make my contribution to this vision for the future, and perhaps even to be an inspiration to others to do the same.

CHRIST & CIVIL GOVERNMENT: AN EXPOSITION OF PSALM 2

Thinking Americans are concerned by the growing signs of national decay. Even the foundations of our governmental structures seem to be shaking. Many are wondering if our nation will survive as a free nation much past the year 2000.

America is in the midst of an authority crisis. Who is to be the ultimate authority in our national affairs? Shall it be the Supreme Court, the Congress, the President, the majority will of the people, the opinion of experts, or some combination of these? Our answer to the authority question will determine the future of our nation.

Many are appealing to our constitution, the Declaration of Independence, or the Christian history of the United States, in attempts to reconstruct a Christian civil government in America. While these appeals are commendable, they lack the authority that is uniquely found in the Bible. Therefore, in attempting to answer the question of the ultimate authority for our government we will limit our investigation solely to God's word.

PSALM 2:1-3 - 'Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?' The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his anointed, saying, 'Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.'

Psalms 2 opens with a prophetic picture of the gentile nations (the heathen) and their rulers conspiring together in order to free themselves from the Messiah's authority.

This Psalm was written by David, the greatest of all Jewish kings during the Old Testament era. David undoubtedly saw some type of immediate application of Psalm 2 to himself. At the same time, we must remember that the greatness of David's kingship was only a shadow of the universal kingship that the coming Messiah would possess.

The apostles of the New Testament authoritatively declared that Psalm 2 found its fulfillment in Jesus Christ (Acts 4:25ff.) They also stated that David gave these predictions regarding the Messiah under divine inspiration.

God had a direct bearing on the government of the Jews during the Old Testament. Many Christians are under the impression that since the first coming of Jesus Christ, there is no longer any connection between God and government. Nothing could be further from the truth! If anything, there is an increased relation between God and civil government.

Before I go any further let me make an important point of clarification, lest I be misunderstood. I firmly believe that the Bible teaches a separation of church and state. Both church and state are two distinct spheres of government united under the Lordship of Jesus Christ. One sphere should not seek to usurp authority over the other.

It is one thing to believe in the separation of church and state. It is quite another thing to believe in the separation of God and state. Many Americans have mistaken the separation of church and state to mean the separation of God and state. This is a fatal mistake.

As we shall see in Psalm 2, any nation which seeks to separate its civil government from the government of God is doomed to destruction.

The first three verses of Psalm 2 describe the vain attempt of gentile nations and their rulers to try to become independent from the government of God. The nations and rulers referred to in these verses are non-Jewish kingdoms. The word translated "heathen" by the King James Version refers to the gentile peoples. It is in this context of a kingly messiah and his relation to the gentile rulers that we see the relationship between Christ and the civil governments.

Evidently these rulers and their subjects regard submission to the Lordship of the Messiah as some form of bondage. They view God's government as "chains" and "cords" preventing them from "doing their own thing" rather than God's will.

Many in our day argue against an explicitly Christian civil government on the grounds that it would be overly repressive. A Christian civil government would be as repressive to a nation as wings are to a bird. It is the way God made Gentile nations to fly.

Psalm 2:4-7 - He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the LORD shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

Starting in verse 4 the scene before us shifts from earth to heaven. In verses 1-3 we saw the rebellious kings of the earth. In verses 4-9 we will see the reaction and reply of the King of Heaven.

The significance of this shift of scenes cannot be overly stressed when trying to understand the relationships of Jesus Christ to civil governments. As we shall see in these verses, there is a king enthroned in heaven who is currently the ruler of the nations and kingdoms on earth. This king is Jesus Christ who has been given the name KING OF KING AND LORD OF LORDS (Rev 19:16).

Verse 4 describes an interim period. The earthly kingdoms are carrying out their rebellious schemes without a reaction from heaven. No doubt these rulers are vainly imagining that they are succeeding in their purposes. As their plans progress, so their pride increases.

God's reaction to these feeble attempts to thwart his government is laughter. Most of you have had the experience in a swimming pool when a little tyke squirms up your back and then tries to dunk you under the water. What is your reaction when the attack begins? If you are like me, you probably let it go on for a little time while you enjoy a little laughter. Then the time of reckoning comes. You lift up your attacker and throw him for a splash. After a few repetitions his enthusiasm is usually dampened.

It is not a humorous game to oppose the rule of God. There is a time gap between the beginning of a rebellion to God's rule and the punishment God inflicts for that rebellion. Verse 5 declares that the terrifying wrath of God immediately follows the laughter of God. A preacher once said, "It is not funny when God laughs."

God the Father has firmly established his son, Jesus Christ, as the Messianic King (vss. 6-7). The establishment of the Son of God as Messianic King is part of the fixed and unalterable decree of God (vs. 7). The rejection of the Messianic King by the nations of the world will not, and cannot, alter the will of God.

Many, if not most, of the popular commentators and Bible teachers in America emphatically deny that Jesus Christ has begun his kingdom reign. If this is true, then it must be affirmed that in today's world Christ has no authority over civil governments. But is it true that Jesus Christ has not yet been installed as king on Mount Zion? A wrong answer to this question could mean the wrath of God falling upon our nation.

Those who reject the idea that Christ is currently king of this world share the same method of interpreting the Bible that was used in the first century by those who failed to recognize Jesus as the Christ (i.e., the Messiah).

The common messianic expectation of the first century was a earthly king who would rule the nations with a physical sword (i.e., a powerful military force). What they did not expect was a king who would rule earth from heaven with the omnipotent Word of God. Out of the mouth of this king "comes a sharp sword with which to strike down the nations" (Rev 19:15).

Many modern prophecy experts claim that the second coming will begin the kingdom rule of Jesus Christ. They expect Jesus to be an earthly king who sits on a physical throne located in Jerusalem, Israel. The book of Hebrews sharply contradicts this teaching.

We are told in Hebrews 12 that we "have come to Mount Zion, to the heavenly Jerusalem" (vs. 22). the Mount Zion referred to in Psalm 2-6 is not the Jerusalem on earth, but the one in heaven.

In Hebrews 1 we are told that the son's throne is in heaven, not on earth. Hebrews 1:3 says that Jesus "sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high" after his sacrificial death on the cross.

Hebrews 1:8 explains that sitting on the right hand of God is equivalent to sitting on the Messianic throne and exercising the authority of the kingdom of God: "But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom.

In case anyone has not yet understood from these passages that Christ is currently ruling earth from heaven, I refer you to two summary verses in the book of Hebrews. "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens ... For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest" (Heb. 8:1&4a).

Those who expect the Messiah to sit on an earthly throne like Old Testament kings have substituted the shadow for the substance (Heb. 8:5).

Psalm 2:8-9 - "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.

God the Father promises his Son that he will extend the Messianic kingdom to the ends of the earth (vs. 8). This promise of the Father stands as the foundation for the Great Commission (Matt. 28:19-20). It was only after Jesus declared that he had received "all authority in heaven and on earth" that he commanded his disciples to carry the Gospel of the Kingdom to all nations. The Great Commission is the King's Commission!

The time for the Son to receive the nations as his inheritance began after his resurrection. The greatest advances of the Kingdom of God since the days of the Apostles have been made by those believing in a victorious kingdom that would appear on the earth before the second coming.

Christ taught his disciples to pray for the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth (Matt. 6:10). We can make this petition to the Father in the name of Jesus knowing that it will be answered. such a prayer is made in harmony with the eternal plan of God. Prayers cannot only move mountains, they can move kings and nations (Prov. 21:1). the loyal subjects of King Jesus are to daily pray for the establishment of the Messianic Kingdom on earth.

The Messiah has been given an iron rod (scepter) to rule the nations (Ps. 2:9, Rev. 12:4, 19:15). The scepter is a symbol of Christ's sovereign power with which he rules the earth as "KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS" (Rev. 19:16). Such symbolism has highly political overtones!

Psalm 2:10-12 - "Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed, ye judges of the earth. "Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling." Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

Psalm 2 concludes with a solemn warning to civil rulers. In light of the heavenly realities just mentioned, the earthly rulers are told to wise up. They must bow to Jesus Christ or perish. They are exhorted to "be wise" and cease trying to escape the dominion of the Messiah (cf. vss. 1-3).

The rulers and kings of the earth (i.e., the civil governments) are told to "kiss the Son." To kiss a king was an ancient mode of showing allegiance and doing homage.

Notice very carefully that the civil rulers are explicitly told to kiss the Son, not the Father, Jesus said. "He that honoureth not the Son honoureth not the Father which hath sent him" (John 5:23b). Civil rulers who do not express public allegiance to the Son are in rebellion against the Father. God is not honored in the nation that does not specifically and expressly honor Jesus Christ as its head. The God of the Bible demands that all nations submit to the rule of God in the person of Jesus Christ.

The implications of these Biblical declarations are startling when you realize that America no longer acknowledges itself to be a Christian nation, but a "pluralistic" one. We still acknowledge that we are a nation under God. Unfortunately, the god which we acknowledge has become a generic variety and not the God of the Bible who has revealed himself in Jesus Christ. Therefore, our nation is in rebellion to the government of God.

The United States civil government must either do homage to the Son or perish (2:12). Our nation will have the wrath of God poured out upon it if we do not repent and confess that Jesus Christ is the lawful king of America (Ps. 79:6).

Conclusion

May all people everywhere commit themselves, by the grace of God to pray for and diligently work toward the establishment of the Crown Rights of Jesus Christ over all the earth and the reformation of all aspects of American society and politics by the infallible Word of God, in the power of the Holy Spirit to the glory of the Triune God.

May we not rest until we see under the Lord's blessing, Christian individuals in Christian families and Christian churches and Christian schools and Christian businesses in a truly Christian republic with genuinely Christian elected officials and Christian judges practicing Biblical Law and passing Christian legislation.

May that day soon come when our beloved nation will publicly and officially confess:

'We the people of the United States of America, distinctly acknowledge our responsibility to God, and the supremacy of his Son, Jesus Christ, as King of kings and LORD of lords, and hereby ordain that no law shall be passed by the congress of these United States inconsistent with the will of God, as revealed in the Holy Scriptures. AMEN. SO LET IT BE.'

The False Separation of Church and State

The current debate over the so-called "separation of church and state" has caused much controversy in America in recent years. It is an argument framed by the world's political system, erroneously reinforced by the worldly religious philosophers, and, of course, undergirded by the invisible spirits of Satan.

It is designed to do one thing: ghettoize Christians, keeping them away from the real issues of discipling the nations. The Church can let the world system control mankind without a fight only if it wants to betray its Leader and condemn to earthly slavery those He died to free.

There are two basic religious systems in this world which have led nations astray. One system holds that man's destiny will come out of social restructuring (Humanism, Marxism, etc.). The other holds that, because God is a spirit or a form of higher consciousness, He is unconcerned with matter or earthly political issues.

It is this second false religious concept that has most severely deceived many God-loving Christians. This false view alleges that God is unconcerned with the real world issues of economics and politics. This is actually an Eastern mystical concept, not a Christian idea at all. Unfortunately, over the last 150 years, this Eastern mystical heresy has entered much of evangelical thought. When the Church falls into false doctrine that pulls it away from the real world, nations go into imprisonment.

Many Christians seem to think God only wants souls; that He has little use for the bodies in which those souls live. The Deceiver has persuaded the Church to buy into the old religious heresy of "dualism" - a gnostic heresy dismissed by the early Church fathers during the fourth and fifth centuries.

Gnostic dualism teaches that the world and all matter is useless, if not evil and/or illusory. "God wants spirits," it says, not bodies and the work earthly bodies can do to bring God's kingdom to the earth. Politics is seen as "worldly" to a Christian since it deals with earthly affairs. The only work of value for the Christian dualist is preparing people's spirits for heaven. Because of this heresy, Christians have been tricked away from their duty to God to rule over the earth. If matter were evil or useless, Jesus never would have incarnated Himself in a human body. He would have saved man in the form of a spirit.

Religion Is Not Just a Personal Issue

This false Eastern philosophy of dualism underpins the erroneous concept of the separation of "church and state" because it gives force to the argument that religion is a personal spiritual issue which must be separated from the real world affairs of government. If you think as a Christian dualist, you really don't care how righteous men's social orders become. The dualist is afraid that the evil world of politics will corrupt the religious purity of our spirit.

For him, keeping the Church away from the affairs of state is an obvious religious duty rather than a net of deception, woven to ensnare Christ's nations. The dualist is unable to relate to why Christ wants to assume political power on earth.

Let's examine some of the effects of the Church's dualism in today's political thought.

"The United States Constitution guarantees the separation of church and state. Everybody knows that," says the Deceiver. "The wise founding fathers wanted to make sure that they had created a free society where no one's religious convictions would be pushed off on anyone else. In order to do this, the Constitution was written to provide freedom for all religions to operate privately, and guarantees that no religion is allowed to influence or control the political world or the civil government." So argues our "reasonable" foe.

Those who have imprisoned the nations tell us that religion must be kept out of public debates, since religion belongs only in the Church, where its freedom is properly guaranteed. This dualistic doctrine of "separation of church and state" is written also into the Soviet Union's constitution, Mexico's, and most thoroughly secularized nations.

The more the nations listen to this creed of keeping religion out of the nation's schools and politics, the more society falls apart, the more anarchy reigns, the more murders and rapes and suicides take place.

Do you think the phrase "the separation of church and state" is found in the United States Constitution? If you answered "yes," you are 100 percent wrong! The Constitution never uses the phrase, "separation of church and state." The Constitution's first amendment simply says that Congress shall make no law establishing a national religion and neither shall it prohibit religion.

You couldn't have found "separation of church and state" in any state constitution back in 1789 either. All the states were openly Christian (except for Rhode Island), and most of them had state-financed churches.

It was Thomas Jefferson who used this phrase in a letter written to a group of Baptist pastors in Danbury, Connecticut in 1802. The purpose of the letter was to assure those Baptist pastors that Jefferson's somewhat unorthodox view of Christianity would not be pressed on the Church in the United States during his presidency.

President Jefferson assured them that there is a wall of separation that supposedly protects the Church from any undue meddling by the state. The irony is that the phrase never implied that the state needed to be protected from the Church: Jefferson was guaranteeing the Church the benefit of the Wall.

The contemporary anti-Christian religious establishment has turned the issue completely on its head by redefining the phrase. This trick is called "historical revisionism." Historical revisionism twists history and interprets it for one's own purposes.

Our Founding Fathers

Consider the quotes on the bottom of this page by our fathers, who wrote, influenced, and/or lived by the wisdom of the Constitution and ruled our nation. Our founders knew better than to pay attention to the dualist's lies about politics and its relationship to religion. The founders of this nation were wise enough to establish neither a state church nor make the state non-religious in its value base. Even the Supreme Court's historical findings support this view.

The Supreme Court ruled in 1799 that "by our form of government, the Christian religion is the established religion." In 1892, the United States Supreme Court in the case The Church Of The Holy Trinity vs. United States, examined hundreds of state constitutions, court cases, and other historical documents and reached the following conclusion:

"There is a universal language pervading them all, having one meaning: they affirm and reaffirm that this is a religious nation. These are not individual sayings, declarations of private individuals: they are organic utterances: they speak the language of the entire people ... These and many other matters which might be noticed, add a volume of unofficial declarations to the mass of organic utterances that this is a Christian nation (Supreme Court Case: v. The Holy Trinity, Cited: Feb 29, 1892).

The Baptists to whom Jefferson was writing feared state established churches, and feared political pressures that come with state established churches. They resented having to pay taxes to support rival churches. Their fear was rival churches, not rival religions. They were not living in a Muslim society. They were living in Christian America. Jefferson promised the church that the wall would shelter them from any growing incursions from the state.

However, the wall today does not fulfill Jefferson's design for it. For example, local cities tax church property to support the public school system. Since the public school system established our nation's values, it has become the state church, maintained with taxpayers' money and defended by the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

For over 100 years secular humanists have sold Christians on the lie that the state is to be protected from Christianity. Now that the state is huge, now that it takes four to five times God's tithe of ten percent, it has flexed its muscles and begun to wage public war on the Church.

Rewriting History and Redefining Words

The world system has spent billions of our tax dollars through public education to convince us of its view of reality, even rewriting history and redefining words. It spends billions more reinforcing these views through books, movies, magazines, and TV shows. It has dedicated itself to capturing the media, while Christians were content to live in cultural shadows.

If you have a child in public school, ask to see his American history book. See how it deals with the religious history of Christianity in America. Look very hard. You will find almost nothing, and yet there is absolutely no doubt that Christianity has been the single most dominant cultural force in this nation's history until the early 1900s.

Major religious movements that affected secular history are never even mentioned! The nations are kept in prison through the false words and false history which is their daily diet(Isaiah 5:13). For example, the great revival of 1835-45 did more to spur the Civil War on behalf of justice for the blacks than any other social force. The abolitionists came directly out of this revival in the Northeastern states. It was Christians who pressed the issue of slavery to the wall and who broke with other Christians who refused to reject slavery.

No self-respecting American historian can deny with intellectual integrity the impact of the revival on the Civil War. But search in vain for its analysis in public school books.

We are told that "to speak of religion in a public text book would be a violation of separation of church and state." Will the Pilgrims next disappear from our history books? Will the Deceiver's duped minions, the ACLU, have the United States' founding fathers as closet homosexuals who, in fact, hated the Bible and left Europe to escape religion in any form?

Over the last 100 years, the Church has "cut a deal" with Western society which was never set to paper or ever openly discussed. In fact it was not understood then, nor is it clearly understood today. The deal was this: Christians would stay out of the political world of governing and setting laws for society, and in return the state would permit the Church to evangelize freely about the future condition of men's souls.

Much of the Church increasingly backed out of political involvements because it felt guilty for a job very poorly done. Until the time of the Reformation in the 1500s, the Church had been integrally involved in the running of society and was guilty both of frequent corruption and tyranny. The Church's role in the political realm was out of balance and it had degenerated into carnal and wicked power plays. Even the unbelievers were disgusted. Instead of producing kingdom citizens who would bring God's honor and balance to the world's institutional order, it had produced many church leaders who wanted the Church to wield the sword and control all thought.

Martin Luther's ideas became more widely understood and the Church gradually withdrew from the political realm. It became carnal for Christians to be involved in the political process. "Politics is a dirty business," became the affirmation of the Church. We are told to stick to the business of saving souls. The worldly politicians and the devil loved that "deal." It left them a clear field from which to take God's earth unopposed by God's first line of defense, the Church.

Gradually, dualist thinking became the unwritten rule of Western culture: the unbelievers run the world, and the Christians order the private consciences and afterlife of their followers.

But Jesus never retreated from real life, and He challenges us not to. You cannot "Go into all the world" in order to bring it under Christ's obedience if you are lost in your narrow concern with your own soul.

Never Again

We must adopt the rallying cry of the Jews: "Never again!" For the Jews, that cry means that they will never again permit a slaughter such as happened in Nazi Germany. "Never again" carries with it the affirmation that life cannot and will not be taken without a fight. We too, must affirm that we can no longer stay off the battlefield for God's earth and his nations. Never again will we play religious pattycake outside the political arena while the unbelievers take care of the important job of running God's earth. Never again will we allow the nations of the earth to go down into the depths of human degradation and slaughter without a battle to the end.

The hypocrisy of the world system is maddening. They not only condemn conservative Christians to the private ghettos between their ears, they are also incredibly two-faced. Humanistic politicians do not think it is wrong when left-wing pastors march in support of various anti-American causes. That is considered "Christian duty." But let more evangelical elements of the Church speak, and those same liberal forces cry bloody murder.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson can run for President and not a word is spoken about its propriety, but when Jerry Falwell or Pat Robertson hazards an opinion on anything that the liberals do not like, you would think they had desecrated the flag! Whatever our problems, we have every bit as much right in the political arena as the Berrigan brothers, Bishop Tutu, or Jesse Jackson.

In redefining the "separation of church and state," liberals have temporarily gained some ground, but in the long run they have only created a much more militant kind of conservative Christian activist.

Welcome to "the Deal." It's such a deal - the world system gets the mine and the church gets the shaft! The "wall of separation" is designed to disembowel the church by cutting off its ability to shape or challenge the money, legal and power structures that run things.

The Lie: Christian Activism Will Destroy Peace and Enshrine Bigotry

In an increasingly godless society, tolerance becomes the supreme virtue and defined religious conviction becomes the supreme sin. The criminal becomes anyone whose standards are tied to God's standards. The "good citizen" becomes anyone who accepts the morality of the lowest common denominator. Excellence dies under the world system's all-tolerating hand.

Our opponents claim that active Christianity in the public sector will lead to enormous social upheaval and unrest. It wasn't the Church that started World Wars I and II, the Korean and Vietnam wars. It was the "enlightened" non-religious nations. Attacks on the Church's responsibility for civil death and the disruption of society tend to be incredibly one-sided and unbalanced.

The non-religious have caused multiplied millions more deaths and destruction than did misguided Christians - even during the Inquisition! The Church's dirty laundry is hardly worth an historical footnote in contrast to the more than 150 million plus deaths that the "reasonable and non-religious society" has brought upon us all in the 20th century. The Christians have killed their thousands, but it takes a secular humanist to kill millions.

But the world system guardians protest: they say "religion in politics will divide the country and lead to disruption of the democratic process." Do they have in mind divisions in society like the ones have already given us - divisions such as labor and management, war and peace, blacks and whites, the old and the young, males and females, and a dozen other hard-core disruptions brought upon the world by those who reject Christianity altogether? Humanists lie about history so much it defies the imagination. Humanistic "concern" for "religion disrupting the culture" is about as wicked as its own unspeakable record of human suffering.

Secular humanism wants raw power, and Christians pose a threat to its ugly intentions. Secular humanism dehumanizes people into objects, whether as the victims of abortion, pornographic exploitation, or starvation of those who are "enemies of the non-religious state" (such as in Russia, Southeast Asia, and Ethiopia). What humanism hates most about the Church waking up is that it will unmask their anti-human exploitation and take their foot off people's throats.

I've been behind the Iron Curtain and seen firsthand what a totally non-religious society looks like in its quest for the separation of church and state. One single word describes the sad eyes of its citizens and their colorless clothes and buildings. That word is DESPAIR. And now American humanists want to bring the "blessings" of a totally secular society to America.

Whether the sales pitch for secularism comes from the decadent West, with its sweet insistence that the individual is the center of the universe and that all problems will be solved with more money and time spent on self-actualizing and navel-gazing, or from the Soviets with their "kill the individualist so that all individuals can be truly free," the logic of humanism is fatally flawed. The liberators offer a third choice: the kingdom of God.

Christianity is humanism's great enemy, and the fact that humanists can recognize this reality is the only evidence I have that they can think at all! In their insane desire to separate the spiritual from the real world, they would condemn us all to a society of amoral barbarism. Their "wall of separation" between church and state is, in reality, not a wall but a coffin. But the liberators are going to dismantle this wall. Our love for people compels us to do so.

Should Church and State be Separated?

The subject of church-state relationships has once again become a live issue. Although discussions about Supreme Court decisions banning prayer and Bible reading from public schools are not the regular fare for dinner table conversation or dormitory discussion, the supposed separation of church and state is worthy of analysis.

Since January, 1982, the "separation" issue has again come to public attention as a result of a federal judge's ruling in the case designated as McLean vs. the Arkansas Board of Education. After a nationally publicized trial, the court decided that Act 590, which required public school teachers to give "balanced treatment" to both creation and evolution, was unconstitutional. The law was ruled unconstitutional, Judge Overton declared, because it violated "the separation of church and state."

In late 20th century America, the vast majority of persons have come to assume that church and state should be separated. Ever since 1947, when Justice Hugo Black wrote the majority opinion for the Everson case, the phrase "wall of separation between church and state" has become progressively ingrained into the fabric of American jurisprudence.

During the 1960s that notion successively convinced a majority of the Supreme Court to outlaw prayer and Bible reading in the public schools, as well as the posting of the Ten Commandments on classroom walls. Since those early decisions in the Engel and Abington cases, the courts of the United States have become extremely skittish about any kind of government which permits or even vaguely promotes religious activity.

In Kent vs. Commissioner of Education, the Massachusetts Court in 1980 ruled that prayers offered in the public schools, in which God was petitioned for the release of the hostages in Iran, were unconstitutional. Even though the court sympathized with the content of the prayers under attack, the judges ruled that these prayers failed their test of secular purpose because they were an appeal to the Deity.

Another case, known as Widmar vs. Vincent, has given a somewhat different twist to this whole church-state controversy. At issue were the regulations of the University of Missouri at Kansas City which prohibited religious worship or teaching in any of its buildings or on its grounds. To the delight of many Christian campus groups, the Supreme Court ruled against the University, rejecting their argument that the state had a "compelling interest in maintaining strict separation" from the church. In some cities, even your home is not a safe place for prayer and Bible study groups.

* In 1980, Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles stated that, "a Bible study would not be a permissible use in a single family residential area - since this would be considered a church activity.

* In a town near Boston, the building commissioner notified a clergyman that inviting more than four people to his home for a Bible study was violation of the "Home Occupation" ordinance.

* In Atlanta, a zoning official stated that any kind of regular home Bible study which includes non-residents is illegal without use off a special permit.

* In Maryland, two residents were issued a citation for using their home for worship services without a use and occupancy permit.

If the the present trend continues, as it very well might, it is conceivable that by the end of this century the only place where it will be legal for people to pray and read the Bible will be in our church sanctuaries on Sunday morning.

The Separation Myth

The vast majority of Americans have been taught to believe that church and state ought to be separated, within the last three decades, largely through the very courts which were designed to protect our liberties. We have allowed the Supreme Court to become our national educator without serious challenge.

We perpetuate this assumption peculiar to the United States because we fail to know our nation's history and we no longer ascribe to our words the clear meanings historically given them. If we no longer study history, we are as guilty as those men and women who sit on the bench and interpret the laws for us perpetuating the myths where intelligence and common sense ought to prevail.

According to the contemporary American myth, the relationship between church and state would look as follows:

When confronting such an image, we should ask for a definition of terms: "What do you mean by the church? What do you mean by the state?"

According to the dictionary, the word "church" means: "The collective body of Christians; any body of worshippers; the building in which worshippers gather." All creeds and all confessions describe the "church" as the body of Christ, those people who are chosen of God, or the Bride of the Savior. The "church" always refers to people. Pastors, elders, deacons, musicians, ushers, and all church members help to make up the church. The church is a body composed of people.

The "state", according to the dictionary, is a "political body; any body of people occupying a common territory. Books on political science support the idea that the state is identified as people who live in a specified territory and who are responsible to the same laws and government. The state is made up of people, just as people make up the church.

The church is not an institution consisting of archaic doctrines, stain glass windows and lifeless religious relics. The state is not a disembodied monster residing beneath a silver dome or crimped into a manila folder in some bureaucratic jungle. No, the church and the state, as Webster so clearly points out, is a collection of persons.

In reality the church cannot be separated from the state. This presumed wall of separation between church and state is a figment of someone's imagination, a thought which remains a thought and cannot become an actuality. The two are related but not synonymous. People are a significant part of both.

In the above illustration, the church is within the state - a part of it, but not equal to it. The state includes all those who live in it, both those who are members of the church and those who are not. The church is within the state, but not identical to it. When considering this separation issue, we should also ask the question: "What about that wall of separation? Does such language appear in our Constitution or in any of our laws?"

Without going into an exhaustive historical analysis, let me also assert that it was not the founding father's intention to attempt the impossible separation between church and state. The first amendment simply and clearly states that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

It should be noted clearly that Congress was thereby prevented from designating an established church; for that was to remain the prerogative of the separate states. In Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Connecticut, the established state church was the Congregational. In Virginia, it was the Episcopal. In a number of others it was more broadly specified to be the Protestant Christian Religion, with almost all the states specifying in their constitutions the religious requirements for holding office. In the Delaware state constitution, for example, it was stipulated that any person who aspired to state office would have to make the following oath:

"I, _____, do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration."

In such a religious environment, Congress saw no difficulty in appropriating tax monies for the training of ministers, paying the salaries of missionaries to the Indians, or the publication of the first American Bibles. In the summer of 1787, during the very same time that the Constitution was being drafted, Congress set aside section 16 in every township for the support of avowedly Christian public schools. In addition, Congress also stipulated that section 29 in every township be set aside for the support of religion. Congressional leaders saw themselves not as secular politicians, but as moral and spiritual guides to the new nation.

When, then, was the "wall of separation" erected?

The "wall of separation" was not firmly put in place until 1947. In that year, Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black, instead of going back to the Constitution, dug out a phrase from a letter written by Thomas Jefferson on January 1, 1802. For Jefferson it was a campaign promise to a selected group of political supporters. For us it has become an intellectual nightmare and a seemingly immovable plank in American jurisprudence.

For those Christians who teach in public schools of our land, the Supreme Court has effectively accomplished what Congress is expressly prohibited from doing. From 9 AM to 3 PM, Monday through Friday, we are told to ignore and deny the God who made us. In our classrooms and on the school grounds we may not talk to Him and we may not read His only infallible guide for life and behavior.

The American Civil Liberties Union is pleased.

The Clinton Mandate?

How was the 1992 election decided?

The electoral college landslide that put Bill Clinton into office - 370 votes to President George Bush's 168 - was the largest Democratic victory since 1964. Looking at the popular vote, however, the election was decided by a closer margin - 5.5 million votes - or five percent. It was the closest election since 1976.

Essentially, the 1992 presidential election was decided by 45 percent of the self-identified Christian community, who voted in favor of abortion and special privileges for homosexuals.

The Clinton victory is particularly sour to those who supported Bush's pro-life, pro-family stances. According to a Christian Coalition exit survey, 25 percent of all voters in 1992 identified themselves as white evangelical Christians - or 25 million voters. Only 55 percent of these voters supported George Bush. The rest were divided: 28 percent supported Clinton; and 17 percent, Perot.

This election stood in stark contrast to 1988, when Bush received 88 percent of the Christian vote. This year over eight million Christians switched over to Clinton or Perot, candidates who support abortion on demand and homosexual rights. If this same group had supported Bush in 1992, he would have won by three million votes.

Looking at the electoral college, there were 10 states that supported Clinton with a margin of less than five percent. If the Christian/conservative voters in these states had supported Bush the way they did in 1988, and he had galvanized stronger support in his home state of Maine (where Perot almost surpassed Bush), the president would have eked out a narrow electoral college victory.

Before the Christian/conservative coalition congratulates itself for remaining the strongest force in the Republican Party, we should recognize that we, the people of God, may have brought the curses of Deuteronomy 28 on our nation. These scriptures deplore sodomy and infant sacrifice as abominations in the eyes of God, and assure the nation of Israel that they would be annihilated if they practiced this type of idolatry.

For the so-called evangelicals who voted for Clinton or Perot, this is extraordinarily bad.

"For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God and if it first begin at us, what shall be the end of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" (1 Peter 4:17,18).

Communism's Poor Rewards

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - A new book about the flaws of Marxist ideology has caught the attention of policy leaders in the nation's capital, primarily because it uses facts and demographic statistics to prove that communism promotes poverty, poor health, and a myriad of other social problems.

The Poverty of Communism was written by Nick Eberstadt, a specialist in demographics and economic development at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington. With a series of carefully analyzed statistics on health care, nutrition, and education, Eberstadt reports on the quality of life in the most established communist powers: the Soviet Union, its East European clients, Mongolia, Cuba, and Vietnam.

Eberstadt says that Americans often hear about the utopian goals of communism, but are never told of the horrible realities of life in all communist nations. This situation is made worse by the fact that communist governments do not admit their problems. In fact, it has only been in the last few years that the Soviets have admitted the occurrence of natural disasters within their country.

Life expectancy averages and infant mortality rates are especially alarming in communist countries. "Measured by the health of its people," writes the author, "the Soviet Union is no longer a developed nation. There is not a single country in all of Europe, in fact, in which lives are so short, or babies' death rates so high - not even in impoverished, half-civilized Albania. In the realm of health, the Soviet Union's peers are to be found in Latin America and Asia."

Eberhardt's previous books are on the same subject: Poverty in China and Fertility Decline in the Less Developed Countries. His latest appears to be another contribution to the pile of mounting evidence against Marxism, and should serve to steer those of us in the Free World away from statist policies.

D.C. Prayer Groups

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - According to a recent report in Time magazine, the nation's capital has more prayer groups per square block than any other city outside of the Bible Belt. In the political power center of the nation, the distinctive pressures of the city have apparently driven politicians, businessmen, lawyers, and journalists to seek spiritual help. "People are always surprised to learn that there are spiritual people here in the Sodom and Gomorrah of politics," said Sen. Mark Hatfield, a veteran of the movement.

The meetings are attended by political luminaries such as Senator Sam Nunn of Georgia, Marilyn Quayle, and Mrs. James Baker. Senate Chaplain Richard Halverson explained, "In this city, it is very rare to find friendships for friendship's sake. I think it is an expression of the need to share and express feelings with people you can trust." Besides praying, group members also confide personal problems and search the Bible for answers.

There are prayer meetings in the Capitol, the State Department, the Pentagon, and the White House, as well as special groups for lawyers, real estate agents, businessmen, and journalists. When the prayer meetings began, they were geared towards men; today, however, there are sessions for couples and congressional wives. Susan Baker and Joanne Kemp lead Bible studies for several wives of White House cabinet members and other officials.

The National Prayer Breakfast, a gathering which was launched by the late Sen. Frank Carlson of Kansas, is now viewed as the most visible evidence of the spiritual tone in Washington. President George Bush, a regular churchgoer, held his initial prayer breakfast last month - an event which was attended by 4,000 people including ranking officials from all branches of government.

At this year's prayer breakfast, President Bush told the audience, "Pray not only for what we want but for what is in the heart of God for this nation. I acknowledge my need to hear from God."

Although the growth of prayer groups in Washington could lead to conspiracy theories, especially with the rise of evangelical conservatism in the 1980s, participants come from a wide variety of political spectrums and churches. "There is a religious right that is very prominent, just as there was a very activist religious left in the '60s," said Don Bonker, a liberal Democrat from Washington State who gave us his House seat for an unsuccessful Senate race. Bonker added that most of the DC prayer groups do not get involved in political matters.

Democracy: The Mandate of Heaven

12/92

Ever since the imperial days in China there has been a justification for political power that must be rooted in the morality of the rulers. This moral legitimacy for civil government in China has been termed "the mandate of heaven." Everyone recognizes that for a civil government to endure it must be right (or righteous) in the eyes of God.

In 1989 millions of Chinese people rallied together in Beijing, Shanghai and other Chinese cities, as well as cities internationally. They were convinced that democracy was necessary to correct the problems in their nation. But many people do not really know what Democracy is or what makes it work. There are certain principles that can be derived from attempts at democracy in world history that we must learn or else suffer from the awful mistakes that others have already experienced in trying to establish a free government.

The cry for democracy is common to many countries in the world today. Millions of people from every race and culture recognize the need for reformation of their society. Almost half of the world's population (2.1 billion people) live in poverty. Five hundred million live on the edge of starvation. One hundred and ten countries have been documented as violating basic human rights even to the point of torture. The number of people killed by their own totalitarian governments in the 20th century exceeds the number killed by war by almost four to one. The annual number of refugees in the world is about twenty-eight million. Added to these grim statistics are international terrorism, debt, crime, the threat of nuclear war, and escalating military coups.

In the face of such world problems there is a movement all over the world toward democracy. On every continent there are multitudes saying that this is their desire. The term "democracy" has different meanings to different people, and therefore needs definition and explanation.

Many people simply associate the concepts of freedom and democracy as the same. But, in reality, freedom is what democracy exists to protect. Protection of individual rights and liberties is the goal, but democracy is the means. Certain rights are recognized by all people as inalienable - that is, they can never be denied to anyone without injustice. Such rights as freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press, freedom of petition, and freedom of self-defense are of this nature.

All inalienable rights can be summarized in three categories: the right to life, the right to liberty, and the right to property. All human beings recognize that to kill, steal or oppress another person is wrong, whether it is done by individual or by governmental force.

The famous American President, Abraham Lincoln said that, "We all declare for liberty; but in using the same word we do not mean the same thing;... The shepherd drives the wolf from the sheep's throat, for which the sheep thanks the shepherd as his liberator, while the world denounces him for the same act; ... Plainly, the sheep and the wolf are not agreed upon the definition of liberty." Lincoln said that some believe liberty means, "that each individual in the society may do as he sees fit with himself and the earning from his labors." while others believe ..." That some persons may do as they see fit with other person's labors."

True liberty is not unbridled license. Government must provide a system of justice to address grievances while protecting the inalienable rights of individuals in the society. Therefore, the same authority structure that governs the people must also restrain the government itself.

Democracy literally means rule by the people. World history shows that when people rule their government, their rights are safer than when governed by one man or a few men. Centralized power in the hands of a few can be corrupted very easily. But it is also true that power in the hands of many people can also be corrupted.

Pure democracy as attempted by Greece in ancient history and France 200 years ago has proven to be not only impractical but also dangerous. Where people rule directly they tend to favor the will of the majority at the expense of individual rights of minorities. Tyranny, therefore, can be found in pure democracy. It can become "mob rule" and endures only until threatened minorities finally join together against the majority using force to protect themselves. The result is chaos and anarchy such as seen in the "reign of terror" in France after their revolution. The result of this is that order is usually restored only by a totalitarian government, as occurred in France with Napoleon Bonaparte. This cycle was repeated in Greek and Roman attempts at democracy.

The father of the Constitution of the United States, James Madison, noted that democracies "... had been spectacles of turbulence and contention ... incompatible with personal security for the rights of property."

Pure democracy, therefore, is to be avoided. How? By the concepts of representation and fixed higher law, which are associated with the term "republic." A free government may better be termed a representative democratic republic. Henceforth, these elements should be kept in mind when we use the general term "democracy." To say "democratic republic" or "representative democracy" would be better.

We need to define the practical aspects of democracy even further if we want to avoid the mistakes of other democracy movements of history. Now we will examine seven basic governmental structures that are necessary to protect and secure individual rights and liberties. This is the essential framework of a Democratic Republic.

Decentralization of Government

Since power residing in the people is a basic premise of democratic government, the government should be kept as close to the people as possible. This can be accomplished by establishing a small national government and strong local and regional governments.

Such a division of powers will be a safeguard against the tyranny of centralization since it will allow the people to most fully participate in government and to keep watch over the flow of power through the governing officials.

History has shown that centralization of governmental power destroys the liberty and the rights of man. The way to have good and safe government is to divide the power among the people and the localities, instead of entrusting it to one body.

Civil government in a country should be subdivided into many levels (local, regional, national). The power of each level should be clearly defined and sovereign in those defined areas. No level of government should be able to usurp the jurisdiction of another. A great majority of the power should rest on the local level.

The limited powers of the national government should be clearly defined in a constitution, and involve those things which affect the country as a whole, such as defense, foreign policy, regulation of inter-regional and foreign commerce, citizenship laws, coining money, and copyrights. All other powers should remain with the people, or with the local, and regional governments. The powers of local and regional government can be written in a regional constitution and include such things as traffic regulations, business regulations, public works, voting procedures, and law and order.

A constitution will enable the people to be able to see if the national government oversteps its authority. This usurpation of power can be resisted by the local and regional governments rallying together.

In a decentralized government a constitution, and not the national ruling party, is supreme. It should only be amended with the consent of the local and/or regional governments.

Constitutionalism

A government of liberty will be a government of laws, not of rulers or of the majority. In a pure democracy, and simple majority (just over 50%) of the people rule. The rights of the minority could be in jeopardy under such a government. Therefore, the best form of democracy will be a constitutional democracy. Here, the law is supreme, and protects the rights of all people.

Throughout most of history people have been governed by laws imposed by their rulers. In this they had no choice. In a democracy the people will form their own constitution and consent to it. Hence, the establish a government of people's law, not of ruler's law. Both the people and the rulers are subject to the law. This is essential for protecting the individual's rights to life, liberty, and property. Citizens must not only be protected from harmful acts of other citizens, but also from abuses by their own government. Since the law is supreme and not the rulers, the people will be protected from ruler's tyranny.

A constitution will define and limit the power of government. It acts as a chain to bind down rulers from misusing power. It is written so that it will not be forgotten.

Any government is free to the people under it, no matter what structure it has, where the laws rule, and the people are a party to those laws. Any government opposed to this will be one of tyranny.

A constitution formed by the people should not deny the rights of others. The laws will apply to all people equally, regardless of political position, religion, race, wealth, social status, or creed. Everyone is equal before the law in relation to protection of their life, liberty, and acquisition of property.

The source of the law of a nation will determine the degree of freedom and prosperity the people of that nation possess. The most democratic nations in history have had a law based in moral absolutes, which, in turn, have had their origin in religion. In a reality, a people's religion is the source of their law.

Separation of Powers

A difficulty in forming any government where men are over men is that you must first enable the government to control the governed and then insure that the government controls itself. Men tend to abuse power, especially if they are given too much. It has been said that all power tends to corrupt, absolute power corrupts absolutely. Due to this tendency of abuse, power must be limited in our civil rulers.

We have seen that prescribing specific powers in a constitution is one way to accomplish this. Another way is to separate governmental powers into different branches with different personnel running each branch. Every government (whether a monarchy, oligarchy, democracy, etc.) exercises these three functions: legislative - lawmaking, executive - enforcing and carrying out laws, and judicial - interpreting laws.

Separation of powers is a division of functions and personnel between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments. It is setting up three separate branches with prescribed separate functions (in a constitution), where no person should serve in any two branches at the same time. This serves as an internal control of abuse of governmental power. Since men are not angels and tend to lack self-control, separation of powers will guard against tyranny.

The French political writer, Montesquieu, write in The Spirit of Laws (1748): "When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty; because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner. Again, there is no liberty, if the judiciary power be not separated from the legislative and executive. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary control; for the judge would be then the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with violence and oppression."

Tyranny will result when legislative, executive, and judicial powers are all accumulated in the same hands, of one, a few, or many. This is also true of all rulers, whether hereditary, self-appointed, or even elected. Simply giving power to the people and allowing them to elect their leaders is not an assurance of securing liberty for all. One thousand despots would be as oppressive as one. We do not want to establish and elective despotism. Separating governmental powers into three branches is one of many controls on the government needed to keep the people's rights and liberties from being endangered.

The three branches should be independent of each other with no one branch having total control of another. As an example, the legislative branch should not be able to remove the executive or judiciary very easily; and the executive should not be able to dissolve the legislative or judiciary. While independent, these branches should not be completely separate, but should band together through a system of checks and balances. This will permit each branch to guard against one department encroaching into another, which would result in tyranny.

An example of checks and balances is the executive having the right to veto laws passed by the legislature, and the legislature being able to override the veto with a larger percentage vote by their members.

A well-defined system of checks and balances will help maintain the separation of powers in all three branches. While a separation of powers will produce some conflict between the branches of government, this will assist in preserving the three branches of government and the system of checks and balances. To preserve them is as necessary as to institute them.

Trial By Jury

In a nation under law, any violation of the law requires a judge. Wrongdoers must be punished and required to make restitution to deter crime, yet, there must be an orderly process of justice where the guilty and innocent are distinguished. Judges should not only be knowledgeable of the law, but also honest, refuse bribes, and not show favoritism.

History is replete with examples of judges manipulated by government authorities to further their political agenda. An independent judiciary is essential to ensure that the written boundaries established by a constitution are maintained. The judicial system should be made up of un-elected individuals who will not be swayed by political pressures. The courts are the ones who keep an eye on the legislative and executive branches of government and determine their faithfulness to constitutional standards.

Individual judges, even if un-elected, may at times be manipulated by other government leaders to render unjust decisions, against political opponents of the government. Therefore, in order to protect individual liberty, and guarantee a fair trial, there needs to be a judicial system that uses a jury drawn at random from society. These jury members should generally be on the same social level as the defendant. They also should be from the same city or geographical area as the defendant, yet should not know any facts about the case in advance that might color their perspective. The jury must be protected against government reprisals themselves in order to be independent. A jury of peers should be effective because it can judge of the defendant's character and the credibility of the witnesses.

There is freedom in a society that guarantees that neither life, liberty, nor property can be taken from the possessor, until a dozen or so of his countrymen shall pass their sentence upon oath against him. Government becomes arbitrary without such a system of justice. The legislature could pass oppressive laws or a judge could deliberately misinterpret the law.

The jury system was first found in British law over 1000 years ago. Governments, both fascist and communist, have forbidden trial by jury. The United States, in contrast, conducts about 120,000 jury trials each year.

Civilian Control of Police and Military Forces

Military and police power is a necessity in society to protect citizens from criminals and enemies, both foreign and domestic. A wise and prudent people will always have a watchful and jealous eye over this power. The American statesman, Thomas Jefferson, said that "the supremacy of the civil over the military authority" is an "essential principal" of democracy. His draft of the Declaration of Independence condemned the British King for rendering "the Military independent of and superior to the Civil" authorities, and also for keeping "standing Armies without the consent of our people."

World history has proven repeatedly that armies that are supposedly the "people's" - i.e. there to protect the people's interests as a whole, are in reality being used by powerful government leaders to further their goals. Many nations experience military coups regularly and the generals of the armies run the nation rather than "presidents" and constitutions."

In order to ensure civilian control of the military, a constitution should establish an elected head of state ("president") as the commander-in-chief of the armed forces in war time. However, rules for the military should be established by elected representatives of the people other than the head of state. These elected representatives should not be able to spend money for armies for more than the period of time until they face re-election. This keeps the support of the military power by the representatives subject to the approval of the people.

The officers of the armies should not be appointed by the head-of-state, but by elected representatives from their own geographical area. The majority of a nation's army should simply be working citizens who have their own weapons and can be called together quickly. By doing this, no permanent army can exist that can be taken control of by a political leader. This system allows any citizen to own his own weapon, which will give everyone the ability to defend himself, and will also give a geographic area of people the ability to defend themselves from armies that do become pawns of the government.

The police force should be locally and regionally controlled and completely separate from military power. The head of the police forces should be elected and governed by local government. The rest of the police should be hired by the government as normal employment.

A Free Market Economy

The components of a free market economy are a basic necessity for any country that desires to secure individual liberty and economic productivity. In fact, a free market economy is the natural result of ideals of liberty.

Components of a free market economy include private property rights, individual enterprise, and a free market.

Private property includes all things that belong to an individual through his own labors or which had been freely given to him. This includes land, homes, personal possessions, inventions, wages, writings. Man does not only have a right to material property, but he also has a right to what we could call "internal property" - that is, he has a right to freedom in his religious beliefs, his opinions, his speech, and his writings.

Life and liberty are of great value to preserve, but without property rights they will soon be lost. If the people have property, they will have power to secure their rights to trial by jury, liberty of the press, freedom of worship, and others. Therefore, a primary object of civil government is the security of property (both internal and external) for its citizens.

The basic idea of individual enterprise is that citizens should be free to keep the rewards of their individual labor. When people are free to acquire and own property, produce what they want, choose their occupation, live and work where they wish, acquire whatever goods and services they desire, and have access to free markets they will prosper, and consequently, cause their nation to prosper. Government should allow the people these freedoms.

In a free market people offer quality goods or services that are produced by their special talents and that they feel will be a benefit to the community. Each person is free to sell or not to sell at whatever price they want to offer, but they cannot force anyone to buy. Exchange of goods and services is voluntary and will occur as all involved believe they benefit from the exchange.

The prices of goods and services will be determined by "supply and demand." In a free market the supply of goods and services will balance out the demand for those goods and services at a price buyers are willing to buy and sellers are willing to sell. The greater the supply of any particular kind of good or service, the more the price will tend to go down. The greater the demand for any kind of good or service, the more the price will tend to go up. The government must refrain from interfering in the free market by setting prices and wages, but must protect the free market by punishing theft and fraud, and by enforcing contracts that were entered into freely.

A government must protect the people's property from unprincipled citizens, but must also constrain itself from taking the people's property or prohibiting individual enterprise and the free market. Following are a few ways the government can be constrained:

1. The constitution should guarantee private property rights, individual enterprise, and protect the free market. Ways of doing this include setting a fixed standard of weights and measures (to keep the market fair), having copyright and patent laws (which encourage initiative and inventiveness), depriving no person of property without due process of law, and taking no private property for public use without just compensation.
2. Limited taxes, that are fair and equitable, should only be imposed by elected representatives who serve a short term in office before facing reelection. Taxing power of the government should be restricted for uses specifically enumerated in the constitution.
3. An honest money and honest banking system should be established, and deficit spending should only be allowed in emergencies. These are all inflationary and is a subtle way that government "steals" money from the citizenry.

Elections of Representatives

Besides all the other safeguards against tyranny - decentralizing and separating government powers, establishing trial by jury, a civilian-controlled military, etc. - there is still one crucial part left in the framework of democracy. Although those governmental powers and offices are severely limited and checked, the men who are to fill those positions must be elected by the people and forced to face those same people frequently in order to be re-elected. This establishes accountability.

Frequent elections are essential, but also it is vital that the elections be free. This means that those who run for office can do so without restriction of being from one party. One party may possibly dominate elections but it must come through winning the battle in the free marketplace of ideas. The right of any citizen to form a party and offer candidates for election is essential.

The vote in a nation must not be compulsory if it is to be free. It must be voluntary, plus it must be available to all citizens equally, regardless of race, color, social status, religion or gender. The vote must also be by secret ballot so that no pressure nor fear of reprisal can influence the outcome.

Once the election determines the winner there must be a commitment to the peaceful transition and relinquishing of power by the previous office-holders. It is essential also that all competing candidates and parties work to be unified for the common good of the nation.

It is important, however, that not all government offices be filled by popular choice. In order to prevent the politicalization of the judiciary, for example, it would be best that judges remain appointed by elected representatives.

Another safety necessary to prevent majority tyranny and ensure more healthy gradual change in a nation would be for different portions of the legislative and executive branches, on both the national and regional levels, to be up for elections on different years. This would prevent radical changes from taking place without time for the electorate to fully weigh the potential consequences.

Downfall of Communism

by U.S. Senator William Armstrong
6/88

There is a word missing from the following quotations taken from recent news stories: "Nicaragua, Cuba and other leftist countries have played leading roles in arming and training El Salvador left-wing guerrillas since 1980 ..." (Washington Post); "The radical government that came to power in Ethiopia after the 1974 overthrow of the Emperor Haile Salassie ..." (New York Times).

"... rising hopes within President Fidel Castro's government for better relations with the United States ... the Cuban leader is successfully pursuing contacts with governments previously leery of his revolutionary ideology ..." (Washington Post).

"At Berkeley, California, more than 112 people, including black educator and activist Angela Davis, were taken into custody at the University of California after blocking the entrance to the administration building." (United Press International).

"Left-wing," "leftist," "Cuban leader," "revolutionary," "activist," "radical" - one word is conspicuous by its absence from the above characterizations.

To use it, even in circumstances where its accuracy is unquestionable, is to reveal oneself as rude, unsophisticated, and intolerant. It is in fact something of a four letter word.

The word, of course, is communist. Nicaragua, Cuba, and other communist countries are aiding the communist guerrillas in El Salvador. There is a communist regime in Ethiopia. Fidel Castro is a communist dictator and his ideology is communism. There is something jarring about seeing these obvious facts simply stated, so rare have such plain, honest descriptions become.

Most remarkable is the description of Angela Davis as a "black educator and activist." Other press accounts of her arrest note her teaching position at San Francisco State or call her "a key figure in the protest movements of the 1960s." None saw fit to mention that she was the candidate for Vice President of the United States, on the Communist Party USA (CPUSA) ticket, in the 1980 and 1984 elections. Her running mate was Gus Hall, General Secretary of the CPUSA.

To call someone who calls himself a communist a "communist" is not a provocation or slander but a plain statement of fact, mere truth in labelling. Why this reluctance to use the word that fits?

One can understand the desire not to be labelled a "McCarthyite," a "red-baiter" or a "cold-war paranoiac" by indiscriminately tossing the word "communist" at anyone who happens to disagree with you.

But this meticulous insistence on avoiding the word altogether seems to go beyond that. For example, among the euphemisms commonly employed to replace "communist," the strongest are "Marxist" and "Marxist-Leninist." This substitution is accurate, but there is something clinical about it, as if one were to insist on using "canis familiaris" every time one means to say "dog."

There seems to be more at work there than the desire not to appear provocative or unfashionable. After all, avoiding the word "communist" coincides so completely with the interests of the communists themselves. Specifically it suits their purposes that the "class enemy" (that is, most non-communists anesthetize themselves into believing that communists aren't really so different from anybody else, that, deep down, they're just like you and me).

This is not to say that those who substitute euphemisms are necessarily conscious of this. (One is tempted to call them "communist dupes," but this again brands one as a 1950s throwback). It does mean that we have a less than accurate picture of the challenges that face us in the world.

For the fact is: there is such a thing as communism, and there are people that think of themselves as communists. They have very definite ideas about how the world works and how history develops. Philosophically, they are strict materialists and militant atheists, specifically rejecting the restraints of morality accepted by most of humanity.

They are dedicated, in the words of the Communist Manifesto, to the "forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions," a statement of incredible scope. Their goal, in the words of Pravda, March 23, 1983, is: "a communist future for all mankind." And their chief obstacle is the "main enemy," the United States.

In pursuing this goal they have built a formidable network of communist-ruled states and communist-directed parties, fronts and mass organizations. Communist call this the "international communist movement" - another taboo expression for non-communists. This movement has a track record, one which even the most conservative of estimates reckons as costing tens of millions of lives.

To recognize these realities without evasion or self-deception is not to be bellicose or dogmatic: it is a necessary step in defeating the communist threat to peace and freedom in today's world. Conversely, to avoid calling communism what it is, is to fool ourselves. Hiding our heads in the sand is hardly likely to make the world a freer or safer place.

A Christian Agenda for Environmental Protection

- by Calvin Beisner

Managing the resources of the earth - a very crucial issue facing us in the 1990s - involves the planning and controlling of the raw materials which are developed for the benefit of mankind. How do we formulate public policy on the environment from a Christian perspective? Five chief standards from the Bible seem apparent to me:

1. The Dominion Mandate. The first of these appears in what theologians have called "the dominion mandate" in the opening chapter of Genesis. There God says, "Let Us make man in Our image, according to Our likeness; and let them rule [or "have dominion"] over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the sky and over the cattle and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps on the earth." And, having made man male and female, He said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it; and rule over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the sky, and over every living thing that moves on the earth" (Genesis 1:26, 28). Let me suggest three observations about this mandate.

First, the dominion mandate is, as Old Testament scholar R. Laird Harris put it, "far from specific. To have 'rule over' the earth might as easily refer to free use and development of resources as to our responsibility for their conservation. To 'rule over' the animals does not specifically say high dams for power should be rejected so as to avoid bringing an exotic type of little fish to extinction."¹ In other words, the dominion mandate cannot be packed as a pistol in the holster of either the devotees of untouched nature or the rapists of mother earth.

Second, while it may be ambiguous about other things, the dominion mandate clearly means that the earth, with everything in it - though it all belongs to God (Psalm 24:1) - was intended by God to serve man's needs. Man was not made for the earth; the earth was made for man. It is man, not the earth or anything in it, who was created in the image of God. To make man subservient to the earth is to turn the purpose of God in creation on its head.

Third, the dominion mandate does not tell us what particular uses of the earth are best suited to man's service. From this we can legitimately infer two things: (a) that God intended there to be considerable liberty regarding the ways in which we rule the earth, particularly since we differ about how we want the earth to serve us; (b) that difficult scientific and practical issues are involved in determining how best to make the earth serve us. From these two inferences we can derive a third: that we owe it to each other to be moderate and humble in our judgments of each others' views about resource management lest we mistakenly impose our own standards rather than God's.

2. Private Property. Scripture clearly approves of the ownership of private property, forbidding, as it does, all forms of theft (Exodus 20:15). In the context of resource management, granted the prevalence of statist attempts to control people's uses of property, it is particularly important to note that the Bible assigns to the owner of property absolute control over it within the limits of God's moral law (Acts 5:4, Matthew 20:13, 15). This principle tells us that the owners of resources may use them as they wish so long as they do not violate the rights of others - rights delineated in the Ten Commandments.

3. Justice. The third theological and moral standard governing our use of resources is the broad biblical principle of justice. It is important, however, that this principle be rightly understood. Justice means rendering impartially to everyone his due in accordance with the right standard of God's moral law revealed in Scripture.² What the law prohibits, we should neither do nor permit others to do; what the law permits, we may not prohibit.

Furthermore, the principle of justice prohibits force for any purpose other than to prevent or punish violations of God's moral law. Force may not be used to induce compliance with anyone's wishes outside those supported by that law. Reward, not punishment, is the proper incentive to lawful economic action; punishment should be restricted solely to violations of biblical moral law.

4. Liberty. From these first three theological and moral principles follows a fourth: liberty. If God's instruction that we "rule over" the earth and everything in it is far from specific, and if a biblical understanding of justice prohibits the use of force except to prohibit, prevent, prosecute, and punish violations of God's moral law - the doing of injustice - then it follows that in all activities not proscribed by God's moral law we have, and are to grant others, liberty.

So long as we do no injury to another, we may use what belongs to us as we please - at least we may do so without fear of human judgment. (God's judgment is another thing. He looks on the heart, not only on the outward action. He knows whether we have done something just from an unjust motive, and He judges us for that motive as well as for the act. But such judgment is impossible for human minds.)

5. Love. But the dominion mandate, private property, justice, and liberty do not exhaust the biblical principles governing resource management. A final principle is love, the selfless act of caring for the needs of others. While justice gives us the minimum standards of action, love is the high goal toward which every child of God is called to aim. It is not enough that we should refrain from injuring our neighbors; we must do them positive good.

This said, however, it is essential to note that love cannot be forced. It must be voluntary. Hence no appeal may properly be made to civil government to force actions above and beyond the minimum standards of justice. Because civil government is by nature an entity of force, the principle of love falls largely outside its capacities. It exists to enforce justice, not love.

Applying These Principles to the Environment

How might these general principles be applied to problems related to resource management? Time permits us only a brief survey of two basic points, and I cannot claim that this is an exhaustive list. My purpose is only to suggest some directions in which we might go.

First, the dominion mandate means at least that man, not the environment, is primary. Certainly the environment should be protected, but it must be protected for the sake of man, not for the sake of the environment. Anything else is idolatry of nature. 3

Second, the biblical principles of private property, justice, and liberty mean at least that no entity, private or public, has proper authority to restrict others' use of property - including any resources they own - in any way other than that required by God's moral law, particularly the fifth through ninth commandments. Civil law should prohibit and punish actual injustices to life (sixth commandment), family and other contractual relationships (fifth and seventh commandments), property (eighth commandment), and reputation (ninth commandment) by acts of violence, rebellion, unfaithfulness, theft, and fraud. It has no authority to use its legal monopoly of force for any other purpose.

This does not mean that "just anything goes." Pollution - whether toxic chemicals, noxious odors, bothersome noises, or solid waste - that causes injury to others or their property should be subject to redress through criminal and, primarily, civil action. The redress, however, should be in the form of restitution to those injured, not of fines to the state, which exists to protect and vindicate citizen's God-given rights. Scripture provides for restitution of losses due to misuse of property (Exodus 21:28-36; 22:6). However, real damage to or trespass upon property (or person) must occur in order for restitution to be justified.

Some major difficulties arise at this point. Since the Industrial Revolution, civil courts have adopted conflicting notions of property rights and pollution-related torts. Furthermore, ever-growing state ownership of property - public lands, in particular - sometimes obscures the identities of both perpetrators and victims in pollution-related lawsuits. In addition, technology has enabled us to observe and measure levels of physical invasion - by sound, lights, liquids, solids, and gases - heretofore unnoticed. This greatly complicates problems related to pollution policy.

Both biblical principle and prudence indicate that this dilemma is best resolved by tightening up the understanding of private property and its attendant rights and responsibilities rather than by transferring such rights and responsibilities increasingly to the state - the latter being the choice of many theorists and courts. Furthermore, I cannot help thinking that the current crisis in the courtroom cannot be overcome until Americans learn to trust anew in the loving providence of God and so accept most of life's inevitable suffering as from His gracious hand rather than thinking all of it must be blamed on someone else who must make restitution.

Who Should Plan and Control Resources?

It will come as no surprise now that I suggest that planning and control of resources should, except perhaps under the extremities of war, be left to the owners of the resources, within the limits of biblical moral law. There is simply no biblical justification for the civil government's attempting to control the use of private property, including natural resources, beyond those limits.

Making this work is not always simple. Problems arise in which property rights are difficult to define and determine. Ownership of water in aquifers or running streams or rivers, for example, is difficult to define, as is ownership of lakes, oceans, and the atmosphere. In some instances, it seems that the state, acting on behalf of its citizens, must take on the role of owner of some such resources. In those instances, however, the state must function as nearly as possible the way private persons function as owners of property. If it fails to enforce its own property rights vigorously enough, its citizens will suffer loss due to abuse. If it exercises too vigorous control over the resources of which it asserts stewardship, its citizens may be deprived of considerable economic advantage and production.

Devising appropriate policies in this regard is not easy, but keeping three fundamental principles in focus should at least provide a sound basis for formulating policy: (1) resources exist to serve man; man does not exist to serve them. Therefore they should be used, to the greatest extent possible, in manners best suited to the desires of the greatest number of people. (2) the state always faces the temptation to exert its will beyond proper boundaries. Safeguards against this must always be built into every policy. (3) State officials and employees are subject to the same moral frailties as private persons. Their access to the coercive capacities of the state, however, makes them potentially more dangerous to others' rights than most private persons. Strict systems of accountability, therefore, must always be part of policy.

What Are the Goals of Resource Management?

Consistent with the dominion mandate's insistence that the earth, with everything in it, was made for man, not man for the earth, the goal of resource management should be to increase the degree to which the world serves man. Since, however, different people have different needs and desires, no generalization is possible regarding what particular uses serve that goal and what ones don't. Within the limits of God's moral law, any use of resources that serves people is permissible; the more efficiently it serves them, the better it is.

In general, expansion - not contraction - of private property rights, and even the transfer of more and more property into private hands rather than state hands, should be the goal of resource management policy. Such a policy will tend to keep the power of the state within its proper bounds, and so will diminish opportunities for oppression. It will also increase people's liberty within the bounds of God's law and, simultaneously, will increase their enjoyment of the goods and services that can be provided by the use of resources.

Quote Of the Month

"Protection of the life of the mother as an excuse for an abortion is a smoke screen. In my 36 years of pediatric surgery I have never known of one instance where the child had to be aborted to save the mother's life. If toward the end of the pregnancy complications arise that threaten the mother's health, the doctor will either induce labor or perform a Caesarian section. His intention is to save the life of both the mother and the baby. The baby's life is never willfully destroyed because the mother's life is in danger."

In Search of Democracy

By Mark Beliles and Stephen McDowell

The development of civil liberties has been a slow and rocky path. As ancient family groups and tribes gradually formed into nations with organized civil structures, the tendency has always been to centralize power. People unwisely tend to put their trust in the state and collective political power rather than in themselves and God, Who is the source of all things.

The ancient empires of Assyria, Babylonia, Egypt, Greece, Rome and China are proof of this point. It has taken thousands of years to convince men that utopian ideas of centralized government remaining just and incorrupt are unrealistic.

The governments of every ancient civilization, with the exception of the Hebrew Republic, rested on the assumed natural inequality of men. The individual was regarded as of value only as he formed a part of the political fabric, and was able to contribute to its uses, as though it were the end of his being to aggrandize the State.

The wisest philosophers of antiquity could not rise above this idea that man was made for the State. They were convinced that power should rest in the hands of the one or a privileged few, who would then fashion the thought and control the action of the many. Throughout history, there has been a steady development of democratic ideas, which are in contrast to those above. We will highlight the main advancements.

The Hebrew Republic

The first genuine example of democratic government in world history is found in the Hebrew Republic established by Moses around 1300 B.C. This great emancipator provided a complete system of written civil law that was in great contrast to the ancient civilizations at that time. All other governments in the world centralized power in the hands of a king or emperor, but Moses set up a government with most powers decentralized.

Moses established a central body which governed the nation and was composed of both elected and un-elected officials. The Hebrew Republic was the first government in history to allow the people the freedom to elect their representatives. These representatives, furthermore, were limited in their decisions and actions but an absolute written moral and civil code known as the law of Moses which included the "Ten Commandments."

All of these representatives, elected or un-elected, were not allowed to govern without an official agreement or "covenant" with the people to abide within the guidelines of the written code. This covenant ceremony, established by an oath before God, was the origination of the principle that government "derive their just consent of the governed." Government based on agreement with the people was the origin of constitutionalism.

Three major principles established under the law of Moses were:

- * Decentralization of government
- * Election of representatives
- * Constitutionalism

Once the Hebrew government was conquered by other empires there was not another complete example of these principles practiced by any nation in history until the establishment of the United States of America three thousand years later.

Greece and Rome

The second major attempt at democratic government was the Greek city-state of the sixth century B.C. The Athenian lawgiver, Solon, drew up a legal system that would allow the people to make their own laws. Plato and Aristotle emphasized that a just society was one where every man is moved by concern for the common good.

These concepts were also embraced by Roman statesmen such as Cicero and Seneca in the 2nd century B.C. They proposed an impartial system of laws based on Natural Law which, Cicero said, comes from God and originated before "any written law existed or any state had been established."

The Greek and Roman theories were never as democratic as the Hebrew, however, because of their belief in inequality of men. The ideas of democracy and freedom were only extended to certain classes and all others were denied basic rights. Cicero was murdered and they reverted to complete totalitarianism to restore order.

Greek and Roman contributions to democratic ideas were therefore more theoretical than actual, but were helpful to later generations who learned from their mistakes.

The fundamental flaws of their attempts at democracy were rooted in their belief that man was naturally unequal and that only one or a privileged few were competent to govern the rest.

Christianity

A few hundred years later, Jesus Christ began to re-assert the basic Hebrew concepts of equality and liberty. Through his death and the commission He gave His followers to teach these things to all nations, the march of democracy took a major leap forward.

Christianity emphasized that, in the eye of God, all men are equal. This asserted for the individual an independent value regardless of political contribution or social class or race. It occasioned the great inference, that man is superior to the state.

Jesus specifically taught that government rulers are to be public servants. Instead of people serving government, it ought rather be fashioned to provide justice and protection for them. Government should provide this service equally to all.

Today, all of western civilization now calls its top civil rulers "ministers" which is simply another word for servants. The Christian view of man and government was a significant contribution toward democracy that made what Greece and Rome failed to achieve a possibility for future nations. The early Christian churches also established a model of self-government and unity with diversity that provided order without sacrificing freedom.

Britain

Although all of Europe was Christianized, it was the unique isolated situation that enabled the British Isles to develop their democratic institutions without interference from surrounding nations. Patrick, a Christian missionary to Ireland in the 5th century, not only spread the Christian faith but also wrote a book about the form of government established by Moses in Israel, (Liber Ex Lege Moisi, or Book of the Law of Moses).

The Irish and, later, the Anglo-Saxon governments began to establish democratic institutions. Patrick's Liber influenced the greatest Anglo-Saxon king, Alfred the Great, to copy from the Hebrew model in his Code of Laws in the late ninth century. He set an example of a king who truly saw his role as one of serving the people.

Some of the biblically derived democratic reforms that the Anglo-Saxons originated were:

- * The Common Law
- * Trial by Jury
- * Habeas Corpus: (a written warrant is required for search and seizure).

In addition, they established an elected representative body called the "Witen." Though conquered by the Normans in 1066, the march toward democratic government was revived at Runnymede when King John was forced to sign the Magna Charta. This document, drafted by the Christian clergyman Stephen Langton in 1215, affirmed in written form the basic rights such as representation, private property, and trial by jury.

The Protestant Reformation in Europe

About the same time the Ming dynasty was ousting the Mongol dynasty in China, John Wycliffe was planting the seeds for the reformation of Europe. This Christian clergyman in 1382 translated the Bible into the common English language so that people would read it and establish, in his words, "a government of the people; by the people; and for the people."

By the early 16th century, similar translations had been completed in Germany, France, and other European countries. The results were not only religious reformation but also political reformation.

The writings of Protestants such as John Calvin, Samuel Rutherford, and the Huguenots led finally to the English Bill of Rights in 1628 and the establishment of the first true democracy in modern history among the European exiles in America.

These exiles, having no other government to contend with in the New World, were the first free men to form their own government by consent through the signing in 1620 of what is known as the Mayflower Compact.

America

The Mayflower Compact was just one of 86 different constitution-like documents drafted by the 13 colonial governments in America over the 150 year period preceding the American Revolution. The first really complete constitution was written for Connecticut in 1638 by the Christian clergyman Thomas Hooker. The first "Bill of Rights" in America was written by another clergyman, Nathaniel Ward, for Massachusetts in 1641.

The Declaration of Independence, drafted by Thomas Jefferson and approved by the Continental Congress in 1776, was the most significant national document in modern times that articulated democratic ideals to their fullest extent. Thirteen years later these ideas were established institutionally in the United States Constitution.

The Enlightenment in Europe

Back in Europe the Protestant Reformation gave rise to a movement of free-thinking men who continued to influence that continent toward democracy. The English Bill of Rights was written in 1689 which established the supremacy of England's representative body known as Parliament.

A year later, the Englishman, John Locke wrote his Second Treatise on Civil Government, (1690). He had studied previous works such as the Frenchman John Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536), and the French Protestant document, A Defense of Liberty Against Tyrants (1579), which was written by Samuel de Puffendorf.

In France, The Spirit of Laws, written by Baron von Montesquieu in 1748, articulated very effectively the principle of the separation of powers into three branches with checks and balances.

Others with a more secular approach like Rousseau and Voltaire were also influential, especially in France. The French Revolution, with its Declaration of the Rights of Man, followed on the heels of the American Revolution but had entirely different results.

It followed the chaotic pattern similar to pure democratic efforts back in Greece and Rome. The "Reign of Terror," a result of mob rule, was brought to an end only by the restoration of totalitarianism under Napoleon Bonaparte.

Many other revolutions have occurred around the world since then and dozens of constitutions have been written and rewritten with little effect. One hundred and sixty constitutions exist in the world today and all but fourteen were written in the last forty years.

The average life span of a constitution today is fifteen years before a military coup or popular revolt takes place. Many countries recognize the powerful idea of democracy and offer elections that are not really free; their one-party system effectively eliminating all choice in the contests.

How can we avoid the pitfalls that many peoples have already suffered through? What are the missing parts necessary for success that have eluded many countries who have experienced a revolution such as France had 200 years ago?

The French political philosopher, Alexis De Tocqueville, offered some insightful answers. De Tocqueville realized that the American experiment with democracy was successful due to Christian principles embedded in the foundation of our Republic. Without the basic Christian principles essential to support a Democratic Republic, De Tocqueville reasoned, democracy will not work.

Margaret Thatcher Speech

LONDON (FR) - Great Britain's Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who has already earned the reputation of a moral leader, made several outspoken professions of her Christian faith while addressing the leaders of the Church of Scotland on May 21, 1988. Her speech, which immediately drew strong criticism from her opponents in Parliament, argued for the adoption of Christian policy in regards to economics. "Christianity and Wealth," the title of the address, is perhaps the most forthright statement of Christian economic policy ever made by a national leader in many decades.

In the debate that ensued Mrs. Thatcher's address, her counselors were also attacked by leaders of the liberal Labor Party. The head of her Policy Unit, free market economist Brian Griffiths, is a devout evangelical Christian and the author of books such as Morality and the Market Place and The Creation of Wealth. He is also a professor of ethics at Gresham College. The following are some of the highlights of her memorable speech.

* Regarding the Christian faith: "What then are the distinctive marks of Christianity? They stem not from the social but from the spiritual side of our lives. I would identify three beliefs in particular: First, that from the beginning, man has been endowed by God with the fundamental right to choose between good and evil. Second, that we were made in God's own image and therefore we are expected to use all our own power of thought and judgment in exercising that choice; and further, if we open our hearts to God, He has promised to work within us.

"And third, that Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, when faced with His terrible choice and lonely vigil, chose to lay down His life that our sins may be forgiven. I remember very well a sermon on Armistice Sunday when our preacher said: "No one took away the life of Jesus, He chose to lay it down.

"I think back to many discussions in my early life when we all agreed that if you try to take the fruits of Christianity without its roots, the fruits will wither. And they will not come again unless you nurture the roots. But we must not profess the Christian faith and go to church simply because we want social reforms and benefits or a better standard of behavior - but because we accept the sanctity of life, the responsibility that comes with freedom and the supreme sacrifice of Christ expressed so well in the hymn: 'When I survey the wondrous Cross/ on which the Prince of Glory died/ My richest gain I count but loss/ and pour contempt on all my pride.' "

* Regarding Christianity and public policy: "May I also say a few words about my personal belief in the relevance of Christianity to public policy - to the things that are Caesar's? The Old Testament lays down in Exodus the Ten Commandments as given to Moses, the injunction in Leviticus to love our neighbor as ourselves, and generally the importance of observing a strict code of law. The New Testament is a record of the Incarnation, the teachings of Christ, and the establishment of the kingdom of God. Again we have the emphasis on loving our neighbor as ourselves and to 'Do-as-you-would-be-done-by.'

"I believe that by taking together these key elements from the Old and New Testaments, we gain a view of the universe, a proper attitude to work and principles to shape economic and social life. We are told we must work and use our talents to create wealth. 'If a man will not work he shall not eat,' wrote St. Paul to the Thessalonians. Indeed, abundance rather than poverty has a legitimacy which derives from the very nature of Creation."

* Regarding the creation of wealth: "Nevertheless, the Tenth Commandment - 'Thou shalt not covet' - recognizes that making money and owning things could become selfish activities. But it is not the creation of wealth that is wrong, but love of money for its own sake. The spiritual dimension comes in deciding what one does with the wealth. How could we respond to the many calls for help, or invest for the future, or support the wonderful artists or craftsmen whose work also glorifies God, unless we had first worked hard and used our talents to create the necessary wealth?"

* Regarding the welfare state: "Any set of social and economic arrangements which is not founded on the acceptance of individual responsibility will do nothing but harm. We are all responsible for our own actions. We cannot blame society if we disobey the law. We simply cannot delegate the exercise of mercy and generosity to others."

* Regarding religion in the schools: "Recently there have been great debates about religious education. I believe politicians must see that religious education has a proper place in the school curriculum. The Christian religion - which, of course, embodies many of the great spiritual and moral truths of Judaism - is a fundamental part of our national heritage. For centuries it has been our very lifeblood. Indeed we are a nation whose ideals are founded on the Bible. Also, it is quite impossible to understand our history or literature without grasping this fact.

"That is the strong practical case for ensuring that children at school are given adequate instruction in the part which the Judaic-Christian tradition has played in molding our laws, manners, and institution. How can you make sense of Shakespeare and Sir Walter Scott, or of the constitutional conflicts of the seventeenth century in both Scotland and England, without some such knowledge? But I go further than this. The truths of the Judaic-Christian tradition are infinitely precious, not only, as I believe because they are true, but also because they provide the moral impulse which alone can lead to that peace, in the true meaning of the word, for which we all long."

* Regarding democracy: "When Abraham Lincoln spoke in his famous Gettysburg speech of 1863 of 'government of the people, by the people, and for the people,' he gave the world a neat definition of democracy which has since been widely and enthusiastically adopted. But what he enunciated as a form of government was not in itself especially Christian, for nowhere in the Bible is the word democracy mentioned. Ideally, when Christians meet, as Christians, to take counsel together, their purpose is not (or should not be) to ascertain what is the mind of the majority but what is the mind of the Holy Spirit - something which may be quite different.

"Nevertheless I am an enthusiast for democracy. And I take that position, not because I believe majority opinion is inevitably right or true - indeed no majority can take away God-given human rights - but because I believe it most effectively safeguards the value of the individual, and, more than any other system, restrains the abuse of power by the few. And that is a Christian concept."

Although Mrs. Thatcher's position on economics was labeled "the creed of greed" by her opponents after the speech, her lifestyle does not match the term. She has forfeited a considerable portion of her salary since 1979, refusing to accept over 11,000 pounds per year, totalling almost 100,000 pounds (or about $150,000). Her economic policies, emphasizing privatization and limited federal control, have revolutionized the British economy since she became Prime Minister.

Taken from a transcript of Mrs. Thatcher's speech reprinted in Biblical Economics Today by the Institute for Christian Economics, Tyler, TX.

Massachusetts State House

BOSTON, MA (FR) - In response to a major fiscal crisis in the state of Massachusetts, a group of disgruntled business leaders and political analysts recently formed a non-partisan coalition called Massachusetts Committee for Sound Government (MCSG) to alert the nation's media. Peter Thomas, president of the Foundation for Economic Research and spokesman for the group, said, "We have a serious deficit in our budget since Dukakis has been borrowing to pay our state payroll."

The legislators who are upset with the Dukakis administration in Massachusetts are not all Republicans, by any means. Some Democratic representatives have gone on record about their disapproval of the way the governor has handled several state-level dilemmas.

Michael Valerio, founder of Papa Gino's of America Inc., a chain of pizza restaurants, said in a letter that MCSG was formed "to counteract the overwhelming momentum of the well-oiled Dukakis machine and the unprecedented media attention it enjoys ..."

Citing New Hampshire Governor John Sununu - who said, "There is no Massachusetts Miracle; it is a mirage" - the group hopes to provide the media with objective, in-depth analyses of all Massachusetts-related issues which have a bearing on the 1988 presidential election. Thomas said, "We don't feel (Dukakis) has lowered taxes or put forth his record. We want to tell that side of the story."

"We believe that Gov. Dukakis's total lack of experience in foreign affairs would seriously undermine his ability to handle sensitive national security issues or deal with complex negotiations involving foreign powers," Valerio explained. "We feel ... that Mr. Dukakis's approach to state government has displayed an arrogance of power and a disregard of individual rights, which raises serious questions as to his ability to lead."

One cause for concern among these leaders has been the attempt by Dukakis to stop the state House of Representatives from convening until after the November election. A spokesman from the office of the state's Speaker of the House said that the governor "would feel a lot better if we didn't meet until after the election." Rep. Bob Marsh (R-Wellsley) said Dukakis did not want the legislature to convene because of a $300 million state deficit and a complicated insurance scandal which would receive media attention if the House goes into session.

Currently the Massachusetts legislature is considering amendments to a major insurance "reform measure" which Dukakis developed when he was a legislator. The state House passed a version this past June which is under consideration by the Senate.

The insurance industry in Massachusetts has been dubbed an "industry under state siege," by Detroit News columnist Thomas Sowell; currently Bay state drivers pay the highest fees in the nation. However, auto insurance companies are losing an estimated million dollars a day insuring Massachusetts drivers at the rates set by the Massachusetts Insurance Commission. Insurance companies are asking the state legislature to raise the fees 19 percent.

Insurance companies have been mandated by the state that unless they sell auto insurance, they will not be permitted to sell life insurance, home insurance or any other kind of insurance in Massachusetts. To make matters worse, the state insurance commissioner, a Dukakis appointee, has renewed all insurance companies' licenses against their will. Some companies are anxious to get out of the state because of the losses caused by these policies. The Fireman's Fund negotiated an agreement to donate $45 million to the state's high-risk auto insurance pool for the "privilege" of being allowed to stop writing any more insurance in Massachusetts.

The Kemper insurance company has paid more than $100 million for the privilege of closing down its auto insurance business in Massachusetts, while continuing to sell other insurance there.

Messiah Complex

- by Ray Allen

There's a dangerous falsehood loose in modern America. It is the illusion that we can save ourselves from chaos by changing the men at the top.

To be sure, we need leaders. But, do we need one single leader at the top who has the power to arbitrarily solve all our problems? And, if we got such a leader, might we discover that he is not what we wanted, after all?

History clearly shows that such leaders, when addicted to total power, seldom surrender it without bloodshed. Our founding fathers called these hateful and dangerous men tyrants, and they went to extraordinary lengths to protect us from authoritarian governments of individual tyrants as well as the tyranny of the 51 percent majority found in pure democracy.

Yet, today, many Americans, blinded by complex modern problems and the threat of unending chaos, talk as if they would embrace any leader or form of government which could end America's disintegration into lawless chaos. In fact some seem to prefer the idea of one centralized, all-powerful problem-solver over the decentralized stratagem of the founding fathers. Why?

Americans are infected with a Messiah Complex. We seem to want a big, benevolent tyrant who will solve our problems for us, leaving us alone to pursue our vision of pleasure without responsibilities or repercussions.

Having lost hope that we truly can govern ourselves, many are far down the road toward accepting the leadership of anyone who can establish a governing agenda for America while preserving the illusion of liberty.

I see three related reasons for our flirtation with authoritarian leaders.

1. No nation can long endure disintegration such as we will face if unable to resolve conflicting perspectives over fundamental issues like how to provide for the national defense, how compassionately to reform the welfare system and how to protect true individual liberties while restricting irresponsible forms of freedom which threaten the lives and liberties of all.

2. As democratically self-governed citizens, we voluntarily must agree upon goals, public policy issues, and, more fundamentally, values which are rooted in a broad, religious and moral consensus. Only voluntary union can end the chaos of conflicting ideologies resulting in a lasting governing consensus.

3. Americans seem hopelessly divided by deep disagreements over religious presuppositions, world views and values. That there is no modern moral consensus has resulted in a calamity predicted by James Madison in 1787.

Factionalism, Madison warned in the Federalist Papers, would give rise to a politically powerful army of special interests, each of which would selfishly control a fragment of the American political process. This fragmentation would make self-government by free men impossible, for it would destroy our ability to agree about important public policy goals and issues.

That special interest army is now upon us; its foot-soldiers addicted to the narcotic of federal funds. Virtually all would die addicts rather than face the cure of withdrawal. And, those who dole out tax dollars know they are buying votes. They, too, are addicts - addicts who crave illegitimate power.

So many Americans have fallen under the spell of these twin intoxicants that over half of all Americans now are recipients of some form of federal money - a situation which cannot continue indefinitely without national bankruptcy.

It is this budgetary crisis which threatens to unravel America's last vestiges of orderly government. We can't pay for currently budgeted guns and butter. Guess what will happen to the national consensus the day welfare checks bounce. Guess how long the Soviet Union will be restrained by treaties once our defenses are deemed ineffective. To remain vulnerable could be suicidal.

Obviously, we must hammer out a new national consensus - a governing agenda rooted in moral consensus, giving rise to a unified world view, and resulting in philosophically consistent public policy goals. But today, we are hopelessly grid-locked by the greed of competing special interests.

What lies ahead? Only three options exist so far as I can see.

We must form a new governing consensus rooted in the self-evident truths agreed to by our founding fathers. In 1776, we agreed that God created all men with unalienable rights to life, liberty (not the absence of moral restraint as in libertinism), and pursuit of happiness (family, property and personal conscience). We agreed that for these reasons (and these alone) governments are instituted among men. We again must buy in to these essentials and translate them into detailed public policy based on consensus.

Should we fail to reach a voluntary consensus which protects liberty, and controls chaos, two options remain: consensus as determined by the 51 percent majority - a consensus which shifts according to the laws of mob rule, and which historically always has led to the only remaining alternative to chaos - a tyrant who arbitrarily uses his power to dictate a governing consensus.

So, here we are, back at the beginning: What kind of government will we have? A colonial woman asked

Benjamin Franklin this question at the ratification of the U.S. Constitution. His reply: "A republic, Madam. If you can keep it."

Yes, we must have a governing consensus; but, not one purchased at the price of chains and slavery. Forming a new governing consensus must remain our job - a job better handled by problem-solving leaders on the local level - by school boards, city councils, mayors, county commissions, state legislators, state senators and governors. Remember this point at every election.

No President can save America; and, we can't afford to yield to the simplistic illusory answer of those who put unfounded hope in the top-down solution of the Messiah Complex.

New Crime Responses Proposed

By Colson & Van Ness

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - In an indictment of the nation's criminal justice system, two experts working in the field have called for a dramatic overhaul of the way America punishes offenders.

Former "law and order" presidential aide and Watergate figure Charles W. Colson, now chairman of Prison Fellowship ministries; and attorney Daniel Van Ness, head of Justice Fellowship (an advocacy group promoting reforms in the criminal justice system), have co-authored a book attacking America's current system of justice and introducing a new concept which they say would revolutionize the way we look at crime and punish its perpetrators.

"The criminal justice system in America is on the brink of incoherence," the authors argue in Convicted: New Hope For Ending America's Crime Crisis (Crossway). "Not even those who run it defend it. It is a joke to criminals, a mystery to victims, a scandal to taxpayers."

Grim prison statistics point to a seemingly hopeless situation. In mid-1988, there were 604,824 prisoners in America; 83 percent more than in 1980. The National Council on Crime and Delinquency forecasts that prison populations will increase by 50 percent in the next 10 years. Yet prison construction has not kept pace, resulting in severe overcrowding situations - federal prisons are as much as 73 percent over capacity, while state prisons operate between 105 to 120 percent of capacity.

"We need prisons for dangerous offenders," Colson and Van Ness agree. "But nearly half the people who are in prison today are there for nonviolent offenses. According to Department of Justice figures, it costs an average of $80,000 to build a maximum security cell, and an average of $15,900 a year to house a prisoner there. The nonviolent offender should be working in community service, paying back those he wronged, learning to contribute as a responsible member of society rather than sitting idly in an expensive prison cell, growing bored and bitter and plotting his next crime."

Colson and Van Ness challenge the existing system with an ambitious plan which they call Restorative Justice. These principles form the foundation of Restorative Justice:

1. Crime causes injuries that must be repaired.
2. All parties affected by crime should be included in the response to crime.
3. Government and local communities must play cooperative and complementary roles.

Programs around the country are already demonstrating the effectiveness of Restorative Justice. Prison Fellowship has for nine years conducted Community Service Projects, in which nondangerous prisoners are furloughed to repair the homes of needy or disabled individuals. All parties involved benefit from this arrangement: the prisoners contribute a worthwhile service to the community, the residents' homes are repaired, and the community gains a new perspective of the offenders. Such community programs are far less expensive to operate than incarceration, with many gaining revenue to support themselves.

The U.S. imprisons more people per capita than any nation in the world except the Soviet Union and South Africa. And yet, Colson and Van Ness contend, America's prison experiment is not working. The "lock 'em up and throw away the key mentality" that gets public officials elected has resulted in overcrowded prisons.

"If we really want to get tough on crime, let's hold offenders accountable to their victims," the authors conclude. "Let's reserve prisons for hardened criminals (where they can be incarcerated for longer periods of time), and let's put nonviolent offenders to work. Let's give victims a meaningful say in the justice process, and let's put community resources to the task of binding the wounds caused by crime."

Redeeming the Republic

By Howard Phillips

10/92

"If you don't know where you're going, any train will get you there."

Right now, our country is heading in the wrong direction because the train of civil government has been removed from the tracks carefully laid down by the Framers of American liberty.

In the Declaration of Independence it was acknowledged that "we are endowed by our Creator with certain inalienable rights." Our entitlements to life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness were inalienable because they were a gift from Almighty God - not merely the product of man's fallible and fallen reason - not simply concessions from incumbent political authorities.

In the Preamble to the Constitution of the United States, the scope of federal authority is carefully delineated: "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

It was the intended purpose of civil government to safeguard our lives, liberty and property - not to redistribute our wealth. It meant that Georgia would not be preferred to Connecticut, that Massachusetts would not have political advantages unavailable to South Carolina. In short, the general interest would be advocated, free of compromise by any special interest. Unfortunately the very word "welfare" has been corrupted and perverted to denote a process wherein the productive are indentured politically by the dependent.

The story is told of the tourist visiting our nation's capital, who is strolling down Pennsylvania Avenue, admiring the view in front of the White House, when suddenly he is accosted by a well-dressed man in a three-piece suit who pokes a pistol in his ribs and urges poignantly: "Sir, I'm sorry to trouble you. I don't like this any more than you do, but I'm collecting funds for a very worthy homeless project here in Washington, D.C. We're short of funds, so I'm taking up a collection. That'll be $100 please, or I'll blow your brains out."

Despite his declaration of charitable intent, that sidewalk solicitor was a thief. He was also a fool because, if he moved his act a few blocks uptown - to Capitol Hill - he could do the same thing by majority vote - with a larger return - and be called a congressman.

The Bible commands: "Thou shalt not steal." Theft is wrong - even when it is achieved in elegant surroundings, during broad daylight, and by majority vote.

As the French writer Bastiat observed, that which is wrong when done by an individual is no less objectionable when the act has numerous accomplices.

The Framers understood that principle and sought to carefully restrict the scope and authority of the federal government. Lest there be any doubt of their very specific, original intentions, they adopted a Bill of Rights - with Ten Amendments further limiting federal authority.

The Framers punctuated the Bill of Rights with these words, which constitute the entirety of the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

What could be more clear? Or more explicit? Yet this clear-cut language has been utterly disregarded. During his long confirmation hearings, Clarence Thomas was asked about many things, but not about those simple, comprehensive, imperative words. Perhaps to even mention the Tenth Amendment might have been considered "constitutional harassment."

Taxes, Spending and Debt

The clearest measure of the degree to which we have departed from the Founders' standard can be found in the official statistics about federal taxes, federal spending, and federal debt. Consider what has transpired in the space of only three decades:

federal spending has increase from less than $100 billion annually in 1961, to nearly $1.5 trillion during the current fiscal year. Interest on the national debt costs taxpayers a mere $6.7 billion per year in 1961. But, as spending has been steadily increased by acts of Congress, with the concurrence of every President during the past 30 years, the interest burden has also steadily, incrementally and, now, exponentially, been climbing - to $14.8 billion in 1971, to $68.7 billion in 1981 at the start of the Reagan Presidency and, most recently, to $306 billion in fiscal year 1991, which ended at midnight on September 30.

Income taxes have also gone through the roof - even though the revenues they yield for the federal government cover little more than a third of what Washington spends. In 1991, the individual income tax produced $468 billion, while Uncle Sam spent nearly three times that much - more than $1.3 trillion. With a deficit of about $269 billion, the great majority of federal outlays were paid for by revenues from sources other than the income tax.

By the way, that $468 billion tax total was about $25 billion less than the Bush administration had hoped to extract from the American people. But, in an economy weakened by burdensome regulation, high tax rates and excessive government intervention, there's only so much blood to be drawn from the stones.

In 1961, federal income taxes produced $41 billion in revenues; in 1971, $86 billion; and in 1981 - just ten years ago - we paid $286 billion in income taxes. That level of taxation seemed and was so onerous that Ronald Reagan was greatly helped in his 1980 campaign against Jimmy Carter when he promised to cut taxes. He did cut them once, in 1981. But, unfortunately, he subsequently raised income and other taxes four times, so that, when he left office in January 1989, taxes were significantly higher, across the board, than they had been on the day when he first took the oath.

The 30-year pattern of exponential spending growth and tax increases is reflected in other statistics. Corporate taxes grew from $21 billion in 1961 to $96 billion in 1991. Excise taxes were up from $12 billion to $42 billion, and Social Security taxes - in many ways the cruelest taxes of all - jumped from $16 billion in 1961 to $47 billion in 1971 to $183 billion in 1981 to the 1991 level of $371 billion.

The federal debt itself is literally almost beyond control. During the Reagan years, it was permitted to more than triple in size, from $914 billion in 1981 to roughly $2.8 trillion in 1989. As we meet here today, the debt is climbing rapidly to $4 trillion and will almost certainly reach that plateau within the current twelve-month period.

Most politicians seem blissfully unconcerned about the debt, its continuing growth and its inevitable consequences. But, according to J. Peter Grace, who heads Citizens Against Government Waste, present trends, if permitted to continue, will raise the on-budget national debt to $14 trillion before the end of the present decade - and, prevailing wisdom to the contrary notwithstanding, deficits do matter.

As I have described, the cost of servicing the debt has increased from less than $7 billion per year in 1961 to $306 billion this year, on a debt of $3.7 trillion. If the debt triples again during this decade of the 1990s, as it did in the 1980s, we can expect debt service costs to triple as well - in fact, they will likely more than triple.

That means we are only several years away from having to shell out nearly one trillion dollars per year simply to pay interest on our admitted national debt - I say admitted because the $13 trillion projected total does not include unfunded liabilities for Social Security and other programs. There, we're looking at many trillions more in obligations assumed in your name by your elected representatives.

At some point, it will be literally impossible to either raise taxes sufficiently to pay the debt interest, or to borrow more money for debt service. Like the Soviet Union today, we won't be able to pay interest on the debt without foreign charity or forgiveness of debt.

The real reason George Bush broke his "no new taxes" pledge last year was because Japan, which owes more than a half-trillion dollars of the U.S. government's debt, threatened to call in its loans and make no new ones unless Mr. Bush agreed to raise taxes.

As was reported in the Baltimore Sun of June 29, 1990, "U.S. negotiators here [Tokyo] encouraged speculation that President Bush's public reversal of his 'read my lips' campaign promise of 'no new taxes' had been timed to help persuade the Japanese that Washington is serious about attacking the huge U.S.

budget deficit, a key demand of Tokyo officials through the year of talks."

Indeed, a July 5, 1990 report by the Bureau of National Affairs Inc. said the U.S.-Japan trade accord "also commits the U.S. government to slashing its federal budget deficit through raising taxes, a pledge consistent with President Bush's indication that he is willing to consider that course."

Later in this current decade, without new borrowing or new taxes, our government will have very few choices: either sell off its assets to pay the debt interest, or declare bankruptcy and refuse to pay that which is owed, or, most likely, service the debt in discounted dollars whose real value is derived primarily from the paper they're printed on.

Under this approach, by massively inflating the money supply, we could very well wind up adding a few zeroes to each federal Reserve note in our pockets. That kind of devaluation is not without precedent. It happened in revolutionary France in the 18th century, in Czarist Russia and in Weimar Germany.

Here's what businessman Harry Figgie Jr. says about hyperinflation:

"If the U.S. fails to rein in its debt - the largest in world history and more than double the debt of the entire Third World - American businesses might find themselves facing South America's inflationary nightmare. Projections suggest that, if current trends are allowed to continue, debt could reach $13 trillion by the year 2000. At that point, our annual deficit would be as much as $2 trillion, and $1.6 trillion of that would simply be interest on the debt!"

According to a guide published by Figgie, "The classic definition of hyperinflation...is a 50 percent average monthly price rise, translating into an annual inflation rate of 12,875 percent compounded."

When hyperinflation hits America, as it will at some point in the next several years, unless there is a fundamental change of course very soon, it will dramatically intensify popular anger with politicians and increase the growing disillusionment with our political system. And, as occurred in Robespierre's France, Lenin's Russia and Hitler's Germany, the door will be open for a dictatorial demagogue - unless responsible solutions are offered which acknowledge past error and offer solid hope of a better future.

No one can predict with assurance which message people will choose, but there is no doubt that with their dollar assets virtually destroyed, they will be receptive to recommendations for change. If no one offers a good solution, they will choose among the bad ones offered. But some choice will be made.

Restoring Limited Government

In political terms, I say with confidence, no change could be put forward which would do more good than a return to the kind of limited government prescribed by the Framers 200 years ago.

The idea of turning the political clock back may be ridiculed by some, but, to my mind, it is indisputably the correct solution, in the sense of enabling us to undo so much of the harm which has been inflicted by overreaching political authorities on our nation and our people.

In 1980, after four years of Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan won his presidential debate by turning to the camera and asking the American people if they considered themselves to be better off than they had been four years earlier. On election day, they gave forth a resounding "no."

It might now be fairly asked, after three decades of a steadily expanding federal establishment: "Is America better off now than it was not four, but 30 years ago?"

Again, the answer is "no." Whereas at one point, our material circumstances improved bit by bit with each passing year, now - and this has been true since 1973 - they decline each year. Whereas, once, one breadwinner could provide comfortably for his household, now we see two and more family members working in an effort to make ends meet.

The price of more government has been less prosperity and diminished liberty. Were we not better off in 1961, before the "Great Society" and its successors, which gave us "welfare rights," EPA, the National Endowment for the Arts, HUD, food stamps, the Legal Services Corporation, "safe sodomy" subsidies, funding of Planned Parenthood, and so much more?

Consider this: No recent president has even proposed a balanced budget, let alone one which would reduce spending to appropriate constitutional levels. But, if Ronald Reagan, upon assuming office - just ten years ago - had proposed a freeze on the total amount of federal spending, and enforced that recommendation with vetoes of all appropriations in excess of the $592 spending level he inherited, then today the U.S. government would operate at a surplus without having to collect even a single penny in individual income taxes.

That's right. In 1991, non-income tax revenues to the federal government amounted to $586 billion - only $6 billion less, in static terms, than what would be needed to balance a budget frozen to the 1981 level of $592 billion.

But, the dynamic impact on the economy resulting from the extra $67 billion in uncollected income taxes which taxpayers would be permitted to save, invest and spend if their income tax dollars were kept under their own control, rather than that of federal bureaucrats would cause the economy to boom, federal relief expenditures to diminish, and federal revenues from non-income tax sources to soar.

And, of course, if the functions and activities of the U.S. government were kept within proper constitutional boundaries, then, instead of spending $1.5 trillion per year, financed by borrowing, currency inflation, income taxes, corporate taxes and Social Security taxes we could fund the entire federal government, relying merely on excises, imports and duties, with no direct capitation taxes on the citizens of the several states.

Step by step, the Framers' original constitutional design has been altered. In this century alone, radical transformations have been made. Every liberal President in the century has come to town with an agenda which has undercut the constitution, altered our political arrangements and diminished our liberty. FDR had his New Deal, JFK his New Frontier and LBJ his Great Society.

Unfortunately, even those Republican Presidents who campaigned for office as conservatives did little or nothing, once inaugurated, to reverse course or change direction. Eisenhower, Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Bush have not merely consolidated that which they inherited, institutionalizing the radical modifications introduced by their predecessors, but they have also, almost without exception, assigned hundreds of billions of dollars in additional resources to activities which, while campaigning for office, they condemned.

It's easy to conclude that every recent President, in terms of departure from constitutional principles and expansion of federal power - has been worse than his predecessor. Thus, the American people have been offered only two real alternatives: "lose fast" with the Democrats, or "lose slow" with the Republicans. But either way, we have lost.

And the conservative movement, instead of offering a "vision of victory" around which we might rally has raised up no standard more exalted than the prospect of "losing as slowly as possible."

Political conservatives have failed to reverse the tide against limited constitutional government in large measure because they have assigned their loyalty to a single political party and to particular political leaders, rather than to fixed constitutional and religious principles. At the same time, too many of us have failed to hold our public officials and political leaders accountable to the few remaining convictions which political conservatives profess to uphold.

When candidate Reagan denounced President Carter for having created a federal Department of Education, conservatives cheered. But, when President Reagan tripled the budget of the same unconstitutional establishment, conservatives averted their eyes and quieted their voices.

And look at what has been happening more recently. Last year, for example, when a special interest-oriented Clean Air bill was passed, encumbering entrepreneurship even as it provided billions in economic payoffs to "Big Business" political contributors, only six Republican Senators voted "no," and only 16 Republican members of the House did likewise.

Similarly, when President Bush promoted a so-called "Americans with Disabilities Act," which requires private employers to hire "otherwise qualified" AIDS-infected homosexuals, even for food-handling positions in restaurants, only eight U.S. senators voted "no," as did only 20 members of the House.

For several years, one of the main objectives of pro-family conservatives and Christian activists has been to stop the incredibly perverse activities of the federally funded National Endowment for the Arts, which, even as it has been stoutly defended by George Bush (who wants to increase its funding), has been awarding subsidies to self-proclaimed "artists" who use our taxes to promote blasphemy, sodomy and other forms of human corruption and degeneracy.

Yet, when the issue came to a vote earlier this year, no more than 66 of 435 congressmen voted for Congressman Phil Crane's proposal to cut off the NEA's money.

Is Reform Possible?

Now it's time to take our government back. Nor is it too late to do so, if we have the requisite desire, vision, objective, strategy and plan.

Our society faces many crises: moral, cultural, strategic, institutional and financial. Not all of our crises, by any means, can be resolved politically - but, to the extent that government has caused or compounded our problems, we can, through independent political action and a sound strategy of constitutional reconstruction, diminish their impact and mitigate their damage.

We can even hope to rebuild a society in which, once again, godly behavior is encouraged, criminal conduct is effectively restricted, and industry is rewarded. We can reconstruct our Republic without violent revolution, rampant disorder or widespread suffering.

The means for reconstruction are provided in the Constitution whenever the requisite leadership is forthcoming from either the Congress or the President, but above all, from the American people.

In order for Congress, on its own, to overcome America's mounting debt crisis and act to restore limited government by cutting federal spending down to Constitutional limits, we would have to await the unlikely prospect of some 67 Senators - enough to overcome a filibuster and override a veto - plus some 290 Representatives, the number needed to control the agenda on the House floor - prepared to act in unison.

If a President were elected this year, on a platform committed to drastic reduction in federal spending, coupled with a realistic plan to eliminate the income tax, our nation could be put back on a proper constitutional track and restored to fiscal solvency, in the space of a single four-year term.

Article I, Section 9 of the U.S. Constitution stipulates that "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law."

In Article I, Section 7, it is made clear that "Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary ... shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives."

Simply stated, that means there are only two ways for the federal government to fund its activities: Either

(1) by concurrence of the House, the Senate and the President, or (2) over the objection of the President, with 290 representatives and 67 U.S. senators prepared to override his vetoes.

Since it's unlikely that a Congress dominated by federally funded special interests will, by majority (let alone two-thirds) vote, voluntarily act to cut off the "port" to its members' political allies, then, as a practical matter, if the IRS is to be closed down and other undesirable activities terminated, that result will have to be achieved by means of Presidential vetoes, sustained by either 34 senators or 146 representatives in Congress.

The President already has the requisite authority to propose, on his own, and to dispose, so long as he has the support of one-third plus one of one House. It is not legality which is lacking, but the vision to lead and the will to act. If a President lacks the stomach to go "cold turkey" and cut the budget by two-thirds or a full trillion dollars, he can pursue the more moderate course of simply rolling back spending by one-third, to the level of one trillion dollars last obtained in 1987 near the end of Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Reviving Our Republic

Turning back the clock by a mere four or five years would not destroy the economy, it would revive it - giving back hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes and spending, so that Americans could spend their own money - instead of having it spent for them by politicians and bureaucrats.

How do we get such a President to implement such a plan? That's another story for another occasion. But let me give you a few hints: The first step is to put the idea in circulation. The second is to recruit candidates who will advocate it. Popular support will grow as the economic crisis intensifies and the failure of present approaches is made manifest.

Taxpayers will rally to the cause as they tire of their lifelong involuntary servitude to a politically preferred assortment of tax users whose votes are bought with our own money, which is confiscated by majority vote whenever Congress passes a new authorization or appropriation. With exponentially escalating debt and the prospect of hyperinflation during the next several years, the possibility of constitutional reconstruction and a return to limited government will become increasingly attractive to productive citizens who want not only to send a message to Washington, but also to change its direction.

In the past, a proliferation of special interests, like an army of greedy Lilliputians, has prevailed over a blinded "general interest," gaining their advantages via a never-ending series of multimillion dollar legislative pinpricks.

But when each member of the general interest can see personally the prospect of a huge annual pay raise - effectuated by the complete elimination of their individual income tax obligations - they will become ready to support the corollary reductions in welfare state spending which are needed to enable immediate elimination of the income tax.

At that point, a new political force will have been polarized into place, one which, in a multi-party scenario, will be able to capture the presidency and to govern effectively, with a coherent plurality, rather than an unstable media-manipulated majority of popular support.

This impending realignment will be facilitated by the breakdown and restructuring of existing political arrangements, which have kept the political "living dead" in place long since their minds and hearts have been extinguished.

The "undead" Republicans and Democrats have been kept politically alive by federal election laws which concentrate control over campaign dollars in the national leadership of the Democrat and Republican parties and by state laws, which often unfairly restrict ballot access both for independent candidates and new political parties.

The movement for term limitation, widespread outrage at congressional pay raises, pensions and perquisites, and recent demonstrations of support for "socially unacceptable" anti-establishment candidates are but a foretaste of the political earthquake we will witness during this decade.

Let us act now to prepare the alternative partisan arrangements on which we will need to rely just a few years hence. America's Founders established what became the greatest nation in history. That nation and its government are now headed toward moral suicide and economic catastrophe. Our job as inheritors of the Framers' system and as adherents of the Founders' principles is to discern the truth, tell it, and act in terms of it.

- * Let it be our vision to overcome America's mounting debt crisis and restore limited government by cutting federal spending down to constitutional limits and abolishing the individual income tax.

- * Let it be our objective to make the vision a reality through a President who will use his existing veto authority - with the support of one-third plus one the members in either the U.S. House of Representatives or U.S. Senate - to eliminate unconstitutional regulations, programs, agencies and expenditures.

- * Let it be our strategy to offer the American people a "Grand Bargain" wherein, as special interest spending is eliminated, the general interest will be advanced by defunding the Internal Revenue Service and ending all individual income tax collections.

- * Let it be our plan to secure the objective by recruiting and training volunteer activists in each of the 50 states who will create or cooperate with taxpayers' parties which share the vision - thus paving the way for an electoral college victory achieved with a plurality of popular votes in a multiparty scenario.

When the good doctor correctly diagnoses a potentially fatal disease and prescribes a painful remedy, the patient may be reluctant to act. But at some point, hopefully before it is too late, the patient may decide to accept the prescription, and by acting on it, have some hope of recovery. If the doctor fails to warn the patient and offer a cure, premature death is likely.

America is in grave condition. Let us not hesitate to warn of the cancer and offer a plan for its surgical removal.

In doing do, let us accept the advice of George Washington, our first President, who, at a critical moment during the Constitutional Convention in 1787 warned his fellow delegates: "If, to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God."

Howard Phillips is the U.S. Taxpayers' Alliance independent party candidate for President of the United States.

Prayer in Bush Administration

3/89

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - With inauguration festivities focused on public and private worship services as well as a proclamation for a national day of prayer, President George Bush has set a definite spiritual tone for his administration.

Bush opens his cabinet meetings with prayer. At one of the first meetings, Secretary of State James Baker was called on to deliver a prayer, according to White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater. At the 1989 National Prayer Breakfast in February, Bush addressed the gathering by reminding them that Americans face "tough problems and great opportunities," and urged that "we not just pray for what we want, but that we pray for what is in the heart of God for us individually and as a nation."

The president told the gathering of more than 4,000 participants that he practices thanksgiving on a daily basis and suggested that more Americans do the same. "All of us should not attempt to fulfill the responsibilities we now have without prayer and a strong faith in God," he declared. "If we are to walk together toward a more caring, more generous America," he added, "let us all share in paving the way in prayer."

Prior to his election, Bush did not talk openly or easily about his Christian beliefs. In an interview with Christianity Today (September 1988), he said that his faith "has been very personal." Yet in the same interview he stated, "There was never any doubt that the Lord Jesus Christ was my Saviour and Lord." Although many politicians have abandoned their Christian tenets upon which they campaigned in order to win the evangelical vote, Bush has increased public discussion of Christianity.

The day after his election, Bush told reporters that he and his wife had gone to church that morning because "God's help is absolutely essential." They attend church every Sunday at an Episcopal church in Washington, D.C., and have also visited other churches, including a black Baptist Church. The Bushes have said that they will not allow security precautions to hamper their worship. The First Lady told a television interviewer that one of her duties is "to get my husband to church."

Billy Graham, a close friend of the Bushes for 25 years, says he believes their faith is "strong and genuine." Graham explained, "I've had prayer with him many times and discussed spiritual things with his whole family on a number of occasions."

Reagan's Last Speech on Foreign Policy at University of Virginia

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA (FR) - President Ronald Reagan delivered his last speech on foreign policy to approximately 1,000 students and faculty in December at the University of Virginia's rotunda. The university was selected as the proper site for the speech, President Reagan said, because its founder Thomas Jefferson had a presidency which paralleled his own in many ways.

"We have seen the growth of a Jeffersonian-like populism that rejects the burden placed on the people by excessive regulation and taxation ... that judgeships should be used to further privately held beliefs not yet approved by the people, and, finally, ... the notion that foreign policy must reflect only the rarefied concerns of Washington rather than the common sense of a people who can frequently see far more plainly dangers to their freedom and to our national well-being."

On Soviet relations, Reagan explained that considerable progress has been made since the Cold War of the Carter years, and that General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev was different from Nikita Krushchev and Leonid Brezhnev. However, Reagan warned "... it could not have happened if the West had not maintained, indeed strengthened, its will, and its commitment to world freedom. So there was nothing inevitable about all of this.

"And this is the heart of my point: What happens in the next few years - whether all this progress is continued or ended - this is in large part up to us. It is why now more than ever we must not falter." Soviet relations were marked by "sterility and confrontation," he said, but now are "characterized by realistic, candid dialogue." However, "all of it is also still in doubt. And the only way to make it last and grow and become permanent is to remember: we are not there yet."

In negotiating treaties, he advised, "Trust but verify. It means keeping our military strong. It means remembering no treaty is better than a bad treaty. It means remembering the accords of Moscow and Washington summits followed many years of standing firm on our principles and our interests and those of our allies."

Reagan criticized congressional attempts to control foreign policy development. "We see it in the attempt to manage complex issues of foreign policy by the blunt instrument of legislation - such as unduly restrictive intelligence oversight, limits on arms transfers, and earmarking of 95 percent of our foreign assistance - denying a president the ability to respond flexibly to rapidly changing conditions."

The adversarial relationship between the White House and Congress in implementing foreign policy, such as in Central America, has "faltered (foreign policy) and our common purposes have not been achieved. Congress' on-again, off-again indecisiveness on resisting Sandinista tyranny and aggression has left Central America a region of continuing danger."

Reagan stated that his most significant accomplishments were the strengthening of the military and the economy. "When I took office, half of our military planes could not fly for lack of parts and about half of our ships were in port for lack of crew. My desire was to re-establish our military strength and a patriotism in which a soldier would be proud to wear his uniform. We now have more high-school graduates in the military than ever before, and this is a volunteer service."

Although college students registered the lowest turnout in the 1984 election, President Reagan noted that the 18 to 24-year-old age bracket were the "most definite supporters of the things we've been doing the last eight years." A student asked for his advice since he was "the only president we know or care to remember."

Reagan responded, "Go to the polls and make your voice heard. It is your world. You have to take the reins of government." He added that if he could lobby the audience, he would push for a line-item veto and balanced budget. However, he stated that he plans to spend his time after the inauguration on the fundraising dinner circuit, mobilizing support for such issues.

An American's Rights and Responsibilities Under the Constitution

By Erin Doherty,
10th grade - New Testament School Cedarville
4/91

"We the People."

These words are familiar enough to the average American. To some, these words bring to remembrance the long-ago act of memorizing the preamble to the Constitution in their high school days. These citizens felt comfortably secure in hearing these words, knowing that it is an all-American phrase.

To others, the clause "We the people" stirs up an intense emotional feeling of patriotic pride, the sort of feeling one gets while hearing the national anthem sung before a ball game or while watching the stars and stripes flutter softly in the breeze.

But do we understand what "We the people" really involves? Do we realize what rights we possess as Americans? Can we comprehend the vast amount of power as well as the responsibility that each citizen, male or female, young or old, wealthy or poor, regardless of race, is entitled to? I fear most do not.

We live in a day when we often forget to vote until on the way home from work, and then, because we failed ahead of time to read up on each individual candidate, we resort to voting for the candidate whose name sounds the most familiar. We live in a time in which, out of disrespect to their country, people burn the American flag out of rebellion. We live in an age in which people dread receiving jury duty, knowing that it will upset their daily routine. Have such attitudes always been prevalent among Americans? Most certainly not.

In 1787, when the Constitution was ratified, our nation had quite a different structure than what we know today. Stripped of all forms of bureaucracy, red tape, needless taxation, false gimmicks of politicians, and all of the other unattractive sides of politics, the government was a fledgling institution, just beginning to take its first steps. The citizens of America were extremely anxious to get their hands on copies of the Constitution, and before long many could recite parts, if not the whole, of this important document.

It was no news to them that they were possessors of the unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, for they had been trained in that belief as children, and were proceeding to raise up their children in the same way. They realized that the government was a creation of the people and, therefore, was subject to alteration or abolishment if need be. The citizens of America were an intelligent people that understood the value of freedom and were willing to pay any price, including death, as Patrick Henry had bluntly stated in 1775, to preserve their precious jewel of liberty.

When did today's pervasive attitudes of ignorance and apathy begin to permeate society? They came gradually, as certain key events over the years portrayed the dampening of the same eminent flame of patriotic watchfulness of the people.

* In 1895, the Supreme Court decided that the power of the jury would be lessened. No longer would the jury be able to determine both law and fact in the case, but was restricted to simply deciding if the suspect was innocent or guilty.

* In 1933, President Roosevelt took our country off the gold standard, allowing the federal government to usurp power over the economy that it did not rightfully possess by slowly infiltrating fiat money, beginning a wave of inflation and whose break on the economic shore will be felt in the next few years.

* In 1962, prayer in the classroom of a public school was prohibited and conflicts of a public school was prohibited, and conflicts over separation of church and state have been regularly increasing ever since.

* In 1988, it became a widely-spread practice to voice one's rebellious feelings toward the American government by "burning the flag," an act which, I believe, mirrors internal treasonous attitudes. Events such as these have caused us to lose sight, first of all, of the true interpretation of what the Constitution really means and, secondly, of what we are required as citizens.

When immigrants to the United States apply for citizenship, they must thoroughly study the Constitution and take a test to prove that they understand the philosophy behind the words and that they are willing to accept the responsibility of being an American. Ironically, many high schools and college seniors are graduating today without being able to remember if the words "We the people" are from the Preamble to the Constitution, the Declaration of Independence, or the Mayflower Compact!

Even more frightening is the fact that some people don't even know how many Amendments there are, as I discovered while talking to one of my state senators last year on a class field trip. When questioning a district attorney who visited my civics class last year, I was shocked to hear that in some law schools today students specializing in that field are graduating without having studied a line of the Constitution.

These situations exemplify the vast number of people across the country who are not properly informed about the Constitution. "We the people" have a job to do, and an important one at that. The epitome of an American citizen's responsibility, I believe, is to constantly keep a vigil over what is happening in government. In order to preserve our republic, it is crucial for us to be alert as to what Congress is doing.

Are our taxes skyrocketing? Well, where is our money going? Are our leaders proposing economic plans and interposing government monopolies, as well as printing endless quantities of fiat money without one cent of intrinsic value? Our Constitution is designed in such a way as to easily enable us to keep a system of checks and balances over those whom we have placed in authority.

In contrast to England's Bill of Rights, which gave instance after instance of things which the government was prohibited from doing, our Constitution simply lists precisely what our government can do. Anything outside of what is expressly granted as a power of Congress, Congress is forbidden to do. If we are familiar with these powers and keep informed about what is going on in government, we can step in immediately when we see someone go too far.

Another important aspect of checking up on our leaders is through our vote. The 26th Amendment of the Constitution states that "the right of citizens of the United States, who are 18 years of age or older to vote shall not be abridged by the United States or by any state on account of age." What was once regarded as a sacred inviolable right by our predecessors is now taken for granted or is considered an inconvenience.

Besides these responsibilities given to the people of America in the Constitution, our rights are also expressed and clarified. A right denotes responsibility, too, though. We possess the unalienable right" of liberty, but if we act foolishly and abuse it, we are sure to lose it. We were entitled to "the right to bear arms" (in the Second Amendment), but because the irresponsibility of murderous individuals, advocates of gun control are springing up everywhere.

The First Amendment explains our freedom of speech and of the press, and yet again some go to an extreme, claiming that the freedom of our actions, such as committing obscene acts on stage during a rock concert, are the same thing as free speech. People continually push the limit to see how far they can go.

"We the people" must change. We need to begin to teach our children the rudiments of our Constitution and encourage them to study the history of America. If we learn the lessons of the past, we will be safer from repeating mistakes.

As Jefferson said, "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be." As we agree to accept responsibility and become willing to be accountable for our actions, we will be taking steps in the right direction of forming "a more perfect union."

If we fail to mend our ways, our republic is headed for destruction. Yet, if we learn to guard our rights and preserve the foundations of freedom in this nation, we shall "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

California Senator Richardson Report

When a president is sworn into office, he places his hand on the Bible and swears before Almighty God to uphold the duties of that office.

It is reported that when the first four presidents of the United States were sworn into office, the Bible was opened to Deuteronomy 28. Very significant. The first 14 verses tell of the blessings that will accrue to a nation that honors God's laws. Then, from verse 15 to 68, we are told, in no uncertain terms, of the punishment that will befall nations that ignore God's commandments; 14 verses of good tidings, then 54 verses of pain!

It is quite obvious that the vast majority of American politicians give nothing but lip service to the laws which governed our forefathers' actions. God, for all practical political purposes, is extinct. Reference to Scripture is literally nonexistent, and when someone does broach the subject of religious morals, their comments are politely or humorously ignored.

During a recent discussion with my colleagues regarding billions of dollars of bonded indebtedness the California Legislature intends to offer the public, I asked if someone would comment on the moral justification for saddling future generations with a debt of such monstrous proportions. One of my colleagues jocularly responded, "I can't give you a moral reason, but I can give you an immoral one."

Everyone laughed and that ended the subject. No one felt an obligation to address the moral implications of spending borrowed money now and placing the cost upon our children and grandchildren.

Morals are laughed at, not only by those in office but by those who elect them. We are a nation that has turned away from God, and it is manifested in our every action from the office of the President on down. We cavort with our deadly enemies while we ridicule our friends. We treat Gorbachev, one of the world's great criminals, as a respected leader and fawn over brutal Marxist dictators, while ignoring the blood that drips from their hands.

Proverbs 17:15 states, "He who justifies the wicked, and he who condemns the righteous, both of them alike are an abomination to the Lord."

Scripture also tells us that God is "slow to anger," but, to paraphrase, when pushed too far, His wrath is awesome. Also, those who He has favored He holds especially accountable, and to them His anger should be terrifying. America, take note!

Why is this politician sounding like a preacher delivering a sermon? Because I believe in the Lord and I'm trying to do what Scripture commands me to do. Ezekiel 33 instructs me to warn the people even though the warning may fall on deaf ears. My duty is to obey the Lord, and to the best of my limited ability, I intend to do so.

America is in for terrible judgment ... and nothing less than national repentance can save this nation from the trouble that is just over the horizon. We are destined to wallow in our foolishness and pay the price for our stupidity. We have been given signs, but the warnings have gone unheeded. Sackcloth and ashes most assuredly are not a part of our national policy agenda!

Separation of Church and State: Has it gone too far?

By Mark Shelby

2/92

Concerning separation of church and state, here are the decisions of the modern United States Supreme Court:

- * The First Amendment has erected a wall between church and state. That wall must be kept high and impregnable. We could not approve the slightest breach.¹ Everson v. Board of Education, 1947
- * It is unconstitutional to offer verbal prayers in a school, regardless of denominational neutrality and voluntary participation. Engel v. Vitale, 1962;² Abington v. Schempp, 1963;³ Commissioner of Education v. School Committee of Leyden, 1971.⁴
- * It is unconstitutional for a student to pray aloud over his lunch. Reed v. van Hoven.⁵
- * Students have guaranteed freedom of speech and press, except when it becomes religious, at which point it becomes unconstitutional. Stein v. Oshinsky, 1965;⁶ Collins v. Chandler Unified School District, 1981.⁷
- * It is unconstitutional for a voluntary gathering of students before school to hear the prayers of Congressional Chaplains read from the Congressional Record by a student volunteer, even though the prayers are printed in a public manuscript published by the U.S. government. State Board v. Board of Education of Netcong, 1970.⁸
- * It is unconstitutional for the walls of a classroom to have the Ten Commandments on them, because it may lead the students to read them, meditate on them, respect them, or obey them. Stone v. Gramm; 1980;⁹ Ring v. Grand Forks Public School District, 1980;¹⁰ Lanner v. Wimmer, 1981.¹¹

These are only a few of the instances in which the modern Court has forcibly separated church and state. Almost all instances occur in the realm of public education. According to a poll published in Time magazine (Dec. 9, 1991, pg. 64) most of these separations are largely contrary to the beliefs of the majority of the American people.

These rulings occur predominantly in respect to education because education is the key to the morals, virtues and dignity of the society in which we will live in the future. Some of the results of these decisions by the Court are as follows:

"Recently public schools were barred from showing a film about the settlement of Jamestown, because the film depicted the erection of a cross at the settlement [despite the truth that] according to historical facts, a cross was erected at the Jamestown settlement."¹²

"In Omaha, Nebraska, 10-year-old James Gierke was prohibited from reading his Bible silently during free time ... the boy was forbidden by his teacher to open his Bible at school and was told doing so was against the law."¹³

The Courts started this decidedly un-American and subversive behavior with the Everson decision in 1947. The actions that the Court took at that time began to reverse the long standing opinions of the Court for the 150 years preceding 1947, and these recent decisions were without legal precedent, a definite taboo in the legal profession at that time.

"Why did the Court not include a precedent? The answer is simple: there were no previous cases to support its decision in this case! The Court had refused to acknowledge the existence of opinions by the Founders, Congress, previous Courts, and others, because those opinions conflicted with the position the Court now assumed. This ruling was simply a declaration of the Court's new policy, revealing the way it would now interpret the First Amendment.

"The Court employed an effective strategy to help create acceptance of the new policy: the appearance of its widespread public support ... Without legal precedents to aid them, the Court relied on purveying an image of universal acceptance and support of its new policy. This was a patient misrepresentation ... The Court had employed an effective marketing strategy, but not an honest one!

"The question remains: how could such an absurd decision occur...? The answer is obvious: these Justices were political judges, not constitutional judges. As Edwin S. Corwin pointed out in The Constitution of the United States of America [Eidsmoe, p.396], this Court, which during its tenure was able to completely remove God from education by a series of completely unprecedented decisions, did not have a single judge with any prior judicial experience! Despite the oath the Justices took upon entering office, the Court did not intend to follow the original intent and uphold the Constitution. It intended to make the nation's policies reflect its own personal philosophical views."¹⁴

The terminology that the Court used, that of a "wall of separation" between church and state was not even taken from what the Founding Fathers believed, but rather, was taken from an obscure speech given by Thomas Jefferson and was then twisted out of context.

Jefferson gave a speech to a Baptist association during his Presidency. Because he wanted to establish common ground with them in his speech, he borrowed a phrase from one of their theologians to use in his speech. The context in which he used the phrase: "wall of separation" was to reassure them that the national government would not establish a national government supported church (denomination) to be superior to all other denominations. The "wall of separation" phrase was meant as an allusion to a wall around a church to keep the government from interfering (see Barton, pp. 41-42 and Eidsmoe, p. 243).

Concerning the separation of church and state, here are the opinions of the Founding Fathers, of their contemporary statesmen, of later leaders, statesmen and Presidents, of later Congresses, and later Supreme Courts (before the current Supreme Court):

"We have staked the whole future of American civilization, not upon the power of government, far from it. We have staked the future of all of our political institutions ... upon the capacity of each and all of us to govern ourselves according to the Ten Commandments of God." James Madison.¹⁵

"Religion is the only solid basis of good morals: therefore education should teach the precepts of religion, and the duties of man toward God." Gouverneur Morris.¹⁶

"Neither the wisest constitution nor the wisest laws will secure the liberty and happiness of a people whose manners are universally corrupt." Samuel Adams.¹⁷

"Republican government loses half its value where the moral and social duties are ... negligently practiced. To exterminate our popular vices is work of far more importance to the character and happiness of our citizens than any other improvements in our system of education." Noah Webster.¹⁸

"... True religion affords to government its surest support." George Washington.¹⁹

"We have no government armed with power capable of contending with human passions unbridled by morality and religion ... Our Constitution was made only for a moral and religious people. It is wholly inadequate to the government of any other." John Adams.²⁰

"... The cultivation of the religious sentiment represses licentiousness ... inspires respect for law and order, and gives strength to the whole social fabric." Daniel Webster.²¹

"... The happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion, and morality...." United States Supreme Court, 1892.²²

"... Offenses against religion and morality ... strike at the root of moral obligation, and weaken the security of the social ties ... this [First Amendment] declaration ... never meant to withdraw religion ... and with it the best sanctions of moral and social obligation from all consideration and notice of the law ..." Supreme Court, 1811.²³

"It yet remains a problem to be solved in human affairs whether any free government can be permanent where the public worship of God, and the support of religion, constitute no part of the policy or duty of the state in any assignable shape." Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story.²⁴

"It is impossible to rightly govern the world without God and the Bible." George Washington.²⁵

"The foundations of our society and our government rest so much on the teachings of the Bible that it would be difficult to support them if faith in these teachings would cease to be practically universal in our country." President Calvin Coolidge.²⁶

"Moral habits ... cannot safely be trusted on any other foundation than religious principle, nor any government be secure which is not supported by moral habits ... Whatever makes men good Christians, makes them good citizens." Daniel Webster.²⁷

"The purest principles of morality are to be taught. Where are they found? Whoever searches for them must go to the source from which a Christian man derives his faith - the Bible. United States Supreme Court, 1844.²⁸

"... What constitutes the standard of good morals? Is it not Christianity? There certainly is none other. Say that it cannot be appealed to, and ... what would be good morals The day of moral virtue in which we live would, in an instant, if that standard were abolished, lapse into the dark and murky night of ... immorality." Supreme Court of South Carolina, 1846.²⁹

"... For whatever strikes at the root of Christianity tends manifestly to the dissolution of civil government ... because it tends to corrupt the morals of the people, and to destroy good order." Supreme Court of New York, 1811.³⁰

"... Religion ... must be considered as the foundation on which the whole structure rests ... In this age there can be no substitute for Christianity ... the great conservative element on which we must rely for the purity and permanence of free institutions." Senate Judiciary Committee, 1853.³¹

"It is impossible to enslave mentally or socially a Bible-reading people. The principles off the Bible are the groundwork of human freedom." Horace Greely.³²

"... But for [the Bible] we could not know right from wrong. All things most desirable for man's welfare ... are to be found portrayed in it." Abraham Lincoln.³³

Here is one final quote from one of our modern, most well respected Presidents:

"The basis of our Bill of Rights comes from the teachings we get from Exodus and St. Matthew, from Isaiah and St. Paul. I don't think we emphasize that enough these days. If we don't have a proper fundamental moral background, we will finally end up with a ... government which does not believe in rights for anybody except the State!" President Harry S Truman.³⁴

Don't be misled. Look at American history for yourself, instead of just taking someone else's word for it. The people teaching you this stuff don't want you to go to the sources of American history, the original documents, they only want you too read what has been said about it recently. So be radical, read the Constitution for yourself, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Northwest Ordinance, and all of the other documents important in American history. When we quit reading these things for ourselves, we become no better than cows to be herded around, led by the nose, and then indiscriminately slaughtered.

Supreme Court to Reexamine View of Church-State Relations

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - The U.S. Supreme Court will hear a number of cases exploring the relationship between church and state during its current session which began on October 2.

The Court will decide the constitutionality of the Equal Access Act, passed in 1984, which requires schools to open their facilities to religiously-orientated student groups if they permit non-religious student clubs.

On July 3, 1989, the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to hear a case called Westside Board of Education vs. Mergens. The Court will examine equal access in the Mergens case, in which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled in favor of a Christian student group that had been forbidden to meet on school grounds. The Court could also review the Garnett case, a similar case, in which the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit ruled against a Christian student group.

The Court is expected to uphold Equal Access by a wide margin.

Another case that may appear this session, but is not yet scheduled for review, involves Larry Witters, a disabled man from the state of Washington who wants to use funding from a state educational assistance program to pursue a seminary education. Previously the United States Supreme Court ruled unanimously that his individual choice to use a state education grant at a religious school did not pose a constitutional problem. But the Washington Supreme Court has since overruled the decision, claiming that the state's constitutional prohibition of establishment of religion is stricter than federal legal codes.

Witters' case is expected to win review because it involves a conflict between state and federal standards, and because the lower state court is acting out of accordance with the ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Jordan Lawrence, litigation director for Concerned Women for America, thinks that Witters' case could lead to a landmark decision by the Court. "I think it has significant implications," Lawrence said. "The case is innocently asking for the Supreme Court to review this whole area once again and adopt a constitutional principle that if the government makes money available to anyone, as an individual, they can use it to attend a religious institution. It could produce a very important decision."

Other decisions made recently by lower courts have upheld the religious freedom guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. In Denver, Colorado, U.S. District Court Judge Richard Matsch ruled that students have a constitutional right to distribute a publication at their high school that promoted Christian principles. In New Orleans, Louisiana, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit ruled that a public library in Oxford, Mississippi may not prohibit a Concerned Women for America prayer chapter from using its facilities because of the religious content of the group's meetings.

These cases and other upcoming decisions by the U.S. Supreme Court promise to reestablish and uphold the constitutional right of religious freedom, which had been denied to millions of Americans in recent years.

Two Views of Government

Puritanism vs. Pietism

By Jay Rogers

9/93

"The Lord has established His throne in the heaven and His sovereignty rules over all."

- Psalm 103:19 -

THE 1990S WILL BECOME KNOWN AS the decade of Christians in government. Even more so than in the 1980s, the evangelical Church will have a greater voice in the political process. The full impact of this surging tide will not be felt until the 1996 election and beyond.

For those who are mobilizing for action at the grass roots level, it will become increasingly important to lay a foundation based on biblical law and to avoid building party platforms based on populist conservatism. Those entrusted with the vision to rebuild a Christian democratic republic must be aware that the blueprint for reforming civil government is given only in the Word of God.

The groundswell of Christian political activism began in the early 1960s with the defeat of presidential candidate Barry Goldwater; a constituency of conservative Christians were galvanized by Goldwater who received campaign support from a well known screen actor, Ronald Reagan. In the 1970s, evangelical Christians threw their support behind Jimmy Carter - a professing believer - only to be chagrined by his support of abortion and homosexual rights. The 1980s saw the emergence of the Moral Majority and two pro-life presidents who often promoted a biblical standard of morality. At the 1992 Republican National convention, one-third of the delegates were members of the Christian Coalition.

Over the past 30 years, American evangelicals began to cast off the pietistic notion that political involvement is somehow worldly. Christians regained a sense of history through studying America's Puritan heritage. They awakened to the fact that the Church is to be the salt and light of the world and realized that they had a God-given mandate to possess the gates of the city.

But then something went awry on the way to the new millennium ...

Evangelical activists suffered a crushing defeat in the 1992 presidential election. Since many had entered into the fray of social reform within the past twelve years, they had known only victory in the presidential elections. Christian activists are now reassessing their involvement in politics after the defeat of President George Bush at the hands of Bill Clinton and Ross Perot.

Since many could not palate the defeat of a holy cause, weak reasons for the demise of George Bush were offered. Some imagined the wrath of God on our nation: "God is judging America by giving us Bill Clinton." Others concluded that there must be sin in the camp: "God is judging the religious right for a spirit of intolerance."

Christians knew by the leading of the Holy Spirit that they ought to be involved in politics. Since the basis of their commitment was experiential rather than epistemological (belief-oriented), many began asking experience-oriented questions: "What went wrong?" The Christian with a solid biblical worldview should rather assess defeat by asking: "Why do I believe what I believe?" Ideas do have consequences. Christians should look carefully at the consequences of their beliefs through a systematic study of what the Bible says about civil government.

Instead of asking epistemological questions, many "spirit-filled" Christians are now adopting views about politics totally contrary to what they once believed (and contrary to scripture). Rather than looking at the Bible, they are basing their turnabout in belief on subjective experience.

In an abrupt shift of tactics since the Clinton "victory," some among the Christian right have suddenly become disinterested in legislating according to the moral law of God. Ever since the inconceivable failure of the 1992 elections, some evangelical activists are downplaying moral issues such as abortion and homosexuality in favor of a more moderate campaign platform emphasizing tax relief, welfare and crime reform: "the concerns of the common people."

Some have gathered under this "bigger tent" not realizing that the biblical commandment to oppose child killing and sodomy is not to be bartered for a larger constituency. This is a far cry from the militant model of reform prescribed by American evangelists of past centuries.

Nineteenth century revivalist Charles G. Finney preached: "Now the great business of the Church is to reform the world, to put away every kind of sin. The Church of Christ was originally organized to be a body of reformers ... the Christian Church was designed to make aggressive movements in every direction - to lift up her voice and put forth her energies against iniquity in high and low places - to reform individuals, communities and governments, and never rest until the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High God - until every form of iniquity be driven from the earth."¹

At a time when our nation desperately needs a mighty revival in the Church and a corresponding spiritual awakening to restore the morality of our culture, Christians need to be educated all over again in the biblical basis for reformation.

Evangelicals ought to go boldly into the gates of the city with the fiery arrows of truth in one hand and the bow of judgment in the other. Shafts of truth must be directed into the opposing camp to subdue the enemy while he is even in the gates. The prophetic Church ought to be crying out with God-given wisdom in the gates of the city and in the high places of power.

Instead, the Church has leapt headlong into the dangerous waters of compromise. Some Christian conservatives have lost their way in the Clinton era of "change." They have become polluted by the very system of politics which they had hoped to reform. The attempt to strike an even keel of balance in the stormy waters of "change" reveals how far evangelicals have drifted from their theological moorings.

The city of God is now being built far off of the foundation established by our Puritan forefathers. The view of America envisioned by modern evangelicals resembles more the nostalgic television reruns of the 1950s than the powerful transforming spiritual awakenings of past centuries. The view of government offered by modern Christian activists resembles more closely that of the mystics of the Middle Ages who viewed politics as Satan's domain. They have obscured the view offered by our Puritan forefathers who saw government as an institution given by God to be reformed by His chosen elect.

Two Views of Government

There are essentially two views of government that have been held to by two groups of evangelical Christians in modern times - the Puritan or Reformed view (based on the ideals of the Protestant Reformation) and Pietist view.

* The Puritan view of government - All people are under a two-fold theocratic form of government (ecclesiastical and civil). The Church legislates the moral law of God through the preaching of blessings and curses found in God's Word (the Bible); the state enforces the moral law of God through a system of reward and punishment. Believers obey the moral law of God out of love and are subject to church discipline; sinners obey out of constraint and fear of punishment by civil judges. But both classes of men are to be ruled by the moral law of God. Human government is an institution given by God to be cared for and reformed by men.

The Puritan historical view of government is providential with Jesus Christ leading believers in His train as a captain leads an army to victory over the anti-Christian power bases of the world. The ultimate destiny of government is to establish Christ's dominion over all the earth with God's people ruling in positions of power. Christ will return to the earth when all things are subject to Him under His feet (the Church). The role of the elect is to occupy the power bases of both ecclesiastical and civil forms of government until He comes to establish greater justice.

* The Pietist view of government - Christians are under the authority of both church and civil government; sinners are under the authority of civil government only. The moral law of God rules over Christians; but since sinners are doomed to hell, they are free to do whatever they please. Civil government is a part of the world system which is controlled by Satan. It is no surprise to the pietist that so many governments are unjust and evil.

The Pietist historical view of government is conspiratorial. Government is a part of the world system which is controlled by Satan and his cohorts. The conspiracy will end in a one-world government ruled by an anti-Christ figure who will control the hearts and minds of men for a dispensational time period. The only job for the church is to preach the gospel so that some may be saved. The job of Christians in civil government is limited since politics is evil. Christians have to wait until Christ returns to the earth with cataclysmic judgment before they can rule as the elect.

The Puritan view of history and government is what resulted in America being founded as a Christian democratic republic. Throughout the early years of America's history, the plan for civil government was based on the ideals of the Protestant Reformation. As America was being explored, the Reformation was still very much in progress. In 1492, the year that Columbus first sailed to the New World, Martin Luther was a school boy singing for his supper in the streets of a small town in Germany.²

The theology developed during the 1500s by men such as Calvin, Luther, Zwingli and Knox was adopted by an enlightened few in the Church of England. These were the Separatists (or Pilgrims) and the Puritans. By the early 1600s, when the Pilgrims and Puritans began their exodus to Massachusetts Bay Colony, the ideals of the Reformation had taken hold of most of northern Europe. Yet the Reformation had its fullest expression in America.

The biblical model of reformation for church and civil government was pioneered by the Pilgrims and Puritans who settled America. This was the foundation for our democratic republic. Although Christianity in America has become increasingly diverse, every reform movement of consequence throughout American history has been neo-Puritan in character. This was true of the First Great Awakening during the time of Jonathan Edwards and also of the sporadic revivals of the 1800s which resulted in societal transformation.

Although the Christian foundation of American society has eroded today, most retain a feeling of pride that we are somehow different as a nation. We somehow believe that freedom in the world today sprang from our nation. We believe that our country is the best place in the world to live. Yet today most have an uneasy feeling that something is dreadfully wrong with us. If we are to retain today the ideals that once made us great as a nation, we need to examine our origins in order to discover the source of this problem.

Two Strains of the Reformation

To better understand how Christian Americans arrived at their present state, it will be useful to take a brief look at the schools of thought within the Reformation which were prevalent during the founding of America. These two strains have been present in the Church since the beginning of the Reformation in the 1500s. The Protestant Reformation occurred mostly in the 16th and 17th centuries and involved two groups of reformers. There were also two strains of the reformation which we will call the Pietists and the Puritans.

As we look at the two strains of the Reformation, we should remember that there is truth and error in each. All orthodox Church movements since the Reformation have restored some aspect of truth to the Church. We need to study each keeping in mind that no movement or sect of Christianity has yet come completely out of the anti-Christian darkness of the Middle Ages.

Consider the words of John Robinson to his congregation before the Pilgrims left to come to America, that "if God should reveal any thing to us by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it, as ever we were to receive truth ... (for) it is not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick anti-Christian darkness, and that full perfection of knowledge should break forth at once."

The Pietists

Pietism is a term describing not one specific church group, but a broader movement which began in the late 17th century. In earlier centuries, Pietism is discernible in medieval Roman Catholic mysticism and the Anabaptist movement. Anabaptists were reformers who believed that baptism should occur after repentance and salvation (hence the term ana- "after" baptism). Anabaptists are sometimes called "the radical reformers."

The Anabaptist movement was a manifestation of a continuing mysticism in Christianity which had always been present in the Church. These were often persecuted Christians who were impressed by the extreme wickedness of the world and sought to withdraw into communities of believers. They wanted to have as little to do with civil government and the military as possible. Some Anabaptist communities refused cooperation with civil authority entirely.³

In the early centuries, Montanists, Marcionites, Novatians and various forms of Monasticism were in this mystical tradition. In the Middle Ages, the Paulicians, the Waldensees and the Lollards were continuations of what later became known at the time of the Reformation as the Anabaptist movement. Mysticism is the belief that revelation can come directly from God. This belief was present in the early Church and continues to this day. Mystics look to the "inner light" of the Holy Spirit as the guiding source of salvation.⁴

There is validity for mysticism within the framework of Biblical orthodoxy. The problem with mysticism is when it leads to "extra-biblical" revelation. There is no doubt that there have been many true Christians among the Anabaptists. The problem has not been with conversion experience, but with the frequent doctrinal errors which came from a reliance on extra-biblical revelation. Many of the teachings proposed by the Anabaptists were based more on subjective experience than the Word of God.

One of the earliest of the mystics among the Anabaptists was Sebastian Franck, a contemporary of Luther. Franck rebelled against what he deemed excessive emphasis on the written Word. He taught that a divine element existed in all men and emphasized the inner working of the Spirit as the means to salvation.⁵ An early center of the Anabaptist movement was Zurich, Switzerland. Here Conrad Grebel and Felix Manz led a group of radical reformers who went much further away from the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church than other Protestants. The movement spread to Austria and Southeast Germany. Many missionaries were sent out to other parts of Europe and gathered Anabaptist communities.⁶

While having received some valid biblical truth, such as adult water baptism, one of the frequent mystical extra-biblical errors of the Anabaptists regarded predictions concerning the imminent return of Christ.

* Melchior Hoffman, a Swabian furrier, predicted that after his death he would return, in 1533, with Christ in the clouds of heaven, that the wicked would be judged, and the New Jerusalem be set up in Strassburg.⁷

* Jan Mathys, a baker from Holland, predicted that Munster was to be the site of the New Jerusalem. They sought to gain control of Munster and organize a Christian society. The deposed bishop of that city, aided by Catholics and Lutherans, laid siege to the Anabaptists and had the leaders tortured and killed.⁸

* Hans Hetz, a German, proclaimed that the day of the Lord was near and that the saints were to use force in rooting out the wicked before the visible reign of Christ was set up on earth.⁹

* Michael Servetus, a Spanish scholar, believed that the millennial reign of Christ was about to begin and was later burned at the stake in Geneva for teaching heresies.¹⁰

The Anabaptists were often violently persecuted, but their movement survived. In England, Independents, Baptists and Quakers developed out of the Anabaptist strain. In Germany and the low countries, the Mennonites and Amish were pacifistic Anabaptists who survived persecutions. They were later welcomed in Russia and America because of their industry and thrift.

Pietism, as mysticism's modern expression, arose out of the tragedy of the Reformation, the Thirty Year's War, which was a conflict between the pope and the Reformers. The Reformers won, however, the war left most of Germany devastated. Philip Jacob Spener, a Lutheran minister seeking to comfort the people of Germany, emphasized the mystical side of Luther's teachings. Spener hoped to cultivate a deeper spiritual life among his flock. He preached the necessity of the new birth and a personal, warm Christian experience. Pietism soon spread rapidly throughout Europe via Lutheran churches.¹¹

Pietism had its positive effect by infusing a sense of personal experience with Jesus Christ in the life of a believer. This emphasis helped the cause of evangelism. Those among the Pietists who helped spread Christianity worldwide were Count Leopold von Zinzendorf, founder of the Moravian Missionary Society, which sent hundreds of missionaries to America; Roger Williams, a Baptist, who founded Rhode Island after being expelled from Massachusetts by the Puritans; and the Quakers, George Fox and William Penn, who founded colonies in New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

The negative aspects of Pietistic thinking are: a withdrawal of Christians from society because of the belief that the world is Satan's domain; and an emphasis on the imminent return of Christ with a preoccupation with date-setting for the Second Coming.

The Puritans

The strengths of Puritan or Reformed thinking are: the belief that Christ rules over every sphere of society with Christians being stewards of the earth; and having a long term view of Christ's return with an emphasis on advancing the kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven.

The Puritans came from the Reformed tradition. The fathers of Reformed theology were Luther, Calvin, Zwingli and Knox. Unlike Martin Luther, who had mystical, pietistic leanings, the Puritans tended to be more Calvinist in their thinking.

The Puritans who arrived in America had already absorbed a century of accumulated Reformation doctrine. The Puritans were Anglican Church reformers who adopted John Calvin's theology. They were the English version of the Scottish Presbyterians. They were a part of a reformation that was still very much in progress. Yet, at the time of their arrival in the New World, the Puritans had a vision for a society built on the laws of God.

They had broken away from Episcopalian government - but not completely away from the Church of England - and now sought to create a theocratic government. They disclaimed the divine authority of lords and bishops and believed in the priesthood of the individual believer. As each believer was to be self-governing, so was each church; each family; each community; each township; each colony; etc.

The Puritans saw themselves as soldiers in a war against Satan. This small band of believers struggled against adversity to build the city of God in New England. They saw all of human history as a progression toward the fulfillment of God's design on earth.¹²

Unlike the pietistic Anabaptists, the Puritans had a long term view of history, they generally regarded the Second Coming of Christ to be far off, and they were optimistic about the attempts of Christians to reform civil government. The founders of New England were not social radicals. They disliked bishops and so they came to America to set up the city of Zion. In their doctrine of covenantalism, they saw God bringing in the kingdom in a gradual and orderly fashion. They believed that the Second Coming of Christ would not happen for centuries to come - and they were right. They understood that it was their role in society to be visible saints, to submit to church discipline and to be the light of the world.¹³

Neo-Puritanism

The contribution of the Great Awakening was a revitalized "neo-Puritanism" - a combining of personal experience with God with the complete biblical worldview of the Puritans. The Great Awakening began under the ministries of Gilbert Tennent, Jonathan Edwards and English evangelist George Whitefield in the early 1700s. These three personalities were strictly Calvinistic in their view of salvation yet they preached in such a way as to awaken sinners to a state of grace.

The mass conversions that took place during the Great Awakening were undergirded by the Puritan ethic which had been developed in the preceding centuries. It was the strength of the Reformed view of biblical social order combined with personal experience with God that led to the reformation of American society. The Great Awakening did much also to unite the thirteen colonies. This union resulted in the establishment of the United States of America a generation later. The Great Awakening encouraged people to look optimistically at life in America. The revivals of the 18th century promoted the idea that the "city set upon a hill for all the world to see" was still viable.

By 1800, what America is today as a nation had become well defined, reformed and constituted. Alexis de Tocqueville, the French social scientist, recorded in his classic work Democracy in America that Americans exhibited certain distinctions that set them apart from Europeans. It was as if God Himself had formed a new race of men and women in the earth. American idealism was so unique that it warranted an investigation. According to de Tocqueville, American idealism was characterized by individualism - a self-reliant spirit that pushed individuals to take on great responsibilities and produce great accomplishments. There was a sense of a personal responsibility to God, country and family. These were, in fact, neo-Puritan ethics.

According to Church historian Kenneth Scott Latourette: "In 1815, the Christianity of the United States, like that of the Thirteen Colonies, was still overwhelmingly Protestant.... Even more than in the Thirteen Colonies, it was showing a marked variety. To the denominations brought from Europe, several were being added. Some were divisions from the old and others were quite new. Still more than in colonial days, the Christianity of the United States represented the extreme wing of Protestantism."¹⁴

Neo-Puritanism can thus be defined as a blending together of the ethics and worldview of the Puritans with the later truths that were restored to the American Church during the Great Awakenings.

The Shift Away From Neo-Puritanism

The shift away from neo-Puritanism began in the early 1830s when the competing worldview of dispensationalism emerged which gave Pietism a systematic theology.

DISPENSATIONALISM = The idea that God has worked in different ways throughout history through different economies or dispensations. A dispensationalist makes a major division between the Covenants, God acting with wrath and vengeance in the Old Testament and with love and grace in the New Testament. Dispensationalism teaches pre-tribulational rapture, divides the end times into several dispensations and teaches a conspiratorial view of history.

* John Nelson Darby, an Irish priest (Anglican), organized a more numerous group called the Plymouth Brethren. Darby taught that the Second Coming of Christ was imminent. He rejected the creeds of the early church and believed that social reform is useless. Darby's followers concentrated on saving men and women out of the world.¹⁶

* C.I. Scofield, a Texas pastor, popularized the teachings of J.N. Darby in a systematic theology known as dispensational premillennialism. C.I. Scofield first compiled his reference Bible as a teaching aid for missionaries. It soon became one of the most widely used tools for Bible study among entire denominations such as Southern Baptists and Disciples of Christ.¹⁷

Antinomianism

Despite the fact that many of the dispensationalists stressed personal holiness, the paradigm shift of the early 1800s paved the way for an much greater evil, antinomianism, which means literally "anti-law."

ANTINOMIANISM = an anti-law position which states that man is saved by faith alone; since faith frees the Christian from the law, he no longer bound to obey the law. Antinomianism creates a system in which the laws of the Bible cannot apply to governing an individual or society.

Dispensationalism promoted antinomian thinking by deemphasizing the relationship of the Old Covenant law to the individual. In turn this led to a waned influence of Christians in society. Against the rising tide of antinomianism in both England and America, there arose a group of social reformers who countered retreat from society. Notable among these new reformers were Charles Finney in America and William and Catherine Booth in England. They were not Calvinists, however, but followed in the tradition of Wesleyan Arminianism. Although the covenantal understanding of the Puritans was not in the forefront of their theology, these revivalists brought lasting social change to their respective nations.

To the Puritans, covenantalism and the law of God were obvious foundations of Christian social order. Let's look at two of the Puritan pillars that stand in stark contrast to dispensationalism and antinomianism: covenantalism and theonomy.

Covenantalism

Covenant theology laid the groundwork for a political theory which held that state and all society came into being as a contract on the basis of God's eternal covenant. Hence, the moral law of God must be the foundation for a society's laws and government.

COVENANTALISM = The Puritans held to covenant or "federalist" theology which maintains that God operates through covenants, or eternally binding legal agreements with men. The Old and New Covenants are God's basis for governing the universe. There is no division between the Covenants. The New Covenant is built firmly on the foundation of the Old Covenant. This presupposes that the Law does not change: "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law of the Prophets; I did not come to abolish, but to fulfill" (Matthew 5:17). God is not a dispensational, evolving, developing God; He is a God that never changes: "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever" (Hebrews 13:8).

Covenantalism stands in stark opposition to the modern notion of antinomianism. Covenantalism begins with the assumption that the believer is no longer condemned by the law but justified by faith. But unlike antinomianism it answers the obvious question: Once a man is saved, is he restored to a position of law keeping or not? Yes! - Although the law can never help a man do this!

"God sent his own Son in the likeness of flesh and condemned sin in the flesh that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us" (Romans 8:4).

The work of the cross of the New Covenant is the destruction of "sin in the flesh." Once the propensity to sin is destroyed, sin is gone and the law no longer condemns us. The law is not primarily for the regenerated believer, but for the unbeliever to reveal his sin. However, this does not mean that the Covenant of the Law has passed away.

Theonomy

The Bible teaches us that the law is eternally binding as the standard of sanctification for both the individual and society. The reformers and the Puritans believed that the Church and the kingdom of God is subject to God's laws. In turn, it is the Church's mandate to advance the the kingdom of God on earth. This includes legislating the moral law of God in the nations. This concept is known as theonomy which means literally: "God's law."

THEONOMY = The belief that the moral laws of the Old Testament are still binding in the New Testament age. God's law is a standard for personal, family, ecclesiastical and civil righteousness. Civil governments are obligated to follow the moral laws outlined in the Bible. Theonomy asserts that only laws which are specifically fulfilled or changed in the New Covenant - such as dietary laws, agricultural laws, sabbath laws and ceremonial laws - are non-binding in the New Covenant age. Moral laws, such as the Ten Commandments and other commandments, are still the ethical standards for governing individuals and society.

Civil governments are obligated to follow God's moral laws. If they are not, then Christians have no real standards by which to influence legislation. There is no other standard besides the moral law of God to effect the Reformation of the America except democratic pluralism: What the majority thinks is right in their own eyes.¹⁸

Democratic pluralism has led us to the current state of affairs in our nation. In early America, there was a type of theocratic pluralism, or democracy under the moral laws of God.

Anyone who would doubt that theonomy was a vital part of the Reformation need not look to obscure sources for proof of this fact. We have none other than John Wycliffe and John Calvin as credible witnesses.

* John Wycliffe, sometimes called "The Morning Star of the Reformation," paved the way to the reformation of the laws of English society with his writings and his English Bible. John Wycliffe wrote in the preface of his English Bible: "This Bible is for the government of the people, by the people, and for the people." He was referring to church government only, but later this concept was applied to civil government.

God's moral law should be society's law; this was the point. But Wycliffe also included the phrase "by the people." In other words, the people themselves should read and know the Bible so that they shall be able to govern and be governed by biblical laws. This pattern held true throughout European history. Knowledge of the written Word of God always led to a radical departure from the government of popes and kings.

* John Calvin, in his Institutes of the Christian Religion, taught that the law of Moses has always been the principle in governing the Gentile nations. Calvin termed this state of affairs the common law of nations. Others have termed this the natural law or revealed law.

"When the gentiles, who have no knowledge of the law, act in accordance with it by the light of nature, they show that they have a law in themselves, for they demonstrate the effect of a law operating in their own hearts. Their own consciences endorse the existence of such a law, for there is something which condemns or excuses their actions" (Romans 2:14,15).

The law itself is holy and good; but it cannot make anyone, Jew or gentile, holy or spiritual. As long as a man is carnal, the law spells death. It is only through grace that we fulfill the law. Furthermore, no system of law can ever sanctify a society. However, when society's laws are based on God's laws, they can serve to teach an entire civilization about the character of God and lead some to salvation. The moral law of God serves as the standard of sanctification.

According to Calvin: "From these things one can gather ... the function and the use of the law.... While showing God's righteousness, that is, what God requires of us, it admonishes each one of his unrighteousness and convicts him of sin. All men, without exception, are puffed up with insane confidence in their own powers, unless the Lord proves their vanity. When all this stupid opinion of their own power has been laid aside, they must needs know they stand and are upheld by God's hand alone. Again since by righteousness of their works they are aroused against God's grace, it is fitting that this arrogance be cast down and confounded that, naked and empty-handed, they may flee to God's mercy, repose in it, hide within it, and seize upon it alone for righteousness and merit. For God's mercy is revealed in Christ to all who seek and wait upon it with true faith."19

20th Century Pentecostals

Most early Pentecostals embraced Scofield's eschatology. They believed with Scofield that nothing stood in the way of Christ's return, although they rejected his teaching that tongues, prophecy and other gifts of the Spirit had passed away after the dispensation of the apostolic age. Thus 20th century Pentecostals, along with most charismatics, fundamentalists and evangelicals, stand in the long line of Pietistic date-setters.

A few years ago, Edgar Wisenart, a Southern fundamentalist, published a book predicting Christ's immanent return. First, he predicted September 1988, giving 88 reasons why Christ would return in 1988. The spokesman from Arkansas revised his forecast to September 1989 when he was wrong.

Do you see a pattern emerging here? The neo-Puritans have been consistently right in their long term view of history. The Pietists and the dispensationalists have consistently been wrong in their date-setting.

Paradigm Shift 1993

As we approach the 21st century we need to ask ourselves: Where are we headed as a nation? Is America doomed? Is the world quickly sinking into a dark night of despair? Will immorality, the breakdown of the family, abortion, humanism in the schools, economic disaster, food and energy shortages characterize America's final days.

Or were the Puritans right in their view of a coming "Golden Age" that would surpass all of the greatest revivals of human history? Will we see a day when God's laws and His righteousness affect all nations? Will we see revival and spiritual awakening in our nation in the midst of the present darkness?

Rather than viewing the current decline of morals and spirituality with pessimism, we should view it as evidence that America is ready for a spiritual awakening. Revival always occurs during a time of deep moral decline. To see a Christian democratic republic rebuilt by the 21st century, American Christians need to return to the Puritan foundations. This will mean reembracing neo-Puritanism; developing a comprehensive systematic theology; reading books about Reformed theology (not the shallow self-help books churned out by the pulp mills); and building a comprehensive biblical worldview as a model to better understand and influence our culture.

We must reembrace two important pillars of the Protestant Reformation: covenantalism and theonomy. Christians ought to spend more time learning to properly interpret the Word of God and cease from Scripture twisting proof-texting as a way of discerning the times. We need to properly learn history from a providential perspective. We will never understand where we are headed if we don't know where we've been.

What we experience as a nation in the next few years will largely depend on the obedience of the Church to the Word of God. It will depend on evangelicals making the necessary paradigm shift toward a vibrant, robust neo-Puritanism.

"Who knows whether you are called into the kingdom for such a time as this?" (Esther 4:14).

Making a Difference in the U.S. Military

Col. John J. Sullivan story

BEAUFORT, S.C. (FR) - A commanding officer at one of America's Marine Corps air stations is gaining respect for more than his past aviation honors and his present leadership skills on base. This military leader is taking a bold stand for Jesus Christ, and encouraging his officers and enlisted men to do the same.

Col. John J. Sullivan, who demonstrated enough heroism in the Vietnam War to earn three Distinguished Flying Cross awards, is now bravely challenging the 10,500 people who live and work at the Beaufort Marine Corps Air Station to uphold Christian standards. And although some people see Sullivan's Christian example as unique, the Colonel sees himself as only a part of a growing spiritual revival that is occurring in the U.S. military. Just at the Beaufort station, several squadron commanders and senior staff officers join him at a weekly Bible study.

God's work in Col. Sullivan's life began years ago. His first operational tour took place in the jungles of South Vietnam, flying helicopter gunships in a sensitive area just below the North Vietnamese border near the South China Sea. He was not a Christian at the time, and actually developed a deep bitterness toward God while living in the sweltry jungles of Quang Tri Province. That bitterness became more acute when the only professing Christian in his unit became the first combat casualty.

"I just couldn't understand it," explained Sullivan. "Why would God take him? It was only later that I was able to understand that. And thank God He didn't take me then because I wasn't ready."

Human life during that grueling thirteen months in South Vietnam began to lose meaning for Sullivan. All of the men lived together in Quonset huts with no windows and no air conditioning. There were regular memorial services in the nearby chapel tent for men who died in combat, but Sullivan refused to attend. "I was angry with God. We were involved in so much killing - and human life was losing all value. Plus I had no faith. I think that's the way it was for a lot of the men - we may have started out with idealistic ideas about fighting for our country, but that was gradually reduced to a personal war of vindication."

After flying over one thousand successful helicopter missions in Vietnam, Sullivan was transferred to Okinawa. There he met his future bride, a Department of Defense schoolteacher, was married, and then returned to the States as an instructor pilot. All throughout this time, his inner turmoil and anger toward God only grew. "My heart was very hard," he admitted. "We tried to go to church a few times, but I would break out in a cold sweat after the first ten minutes."

It wasn't until the Sullivans had two young children that God began to soften the Colonel's heart and make him more receptive to the gospel. His wife, Bobbi, was still deeply interested in Edgar Cayce and reincarnation, even though they began attending an Episcopal church and leading a Sunday School class for children.

"Over a period of months," related Col. Sullivan, "I began to yield my life to the Lord. My wife also realized that her ideas about reincarnation were wrong after attending a Bible study. This was the beginning of our walk with Jesus."

Sullivan's spiritual life really began to develop in Newport, Rhode Island, where he attended the Naval War College. He continued to grow spiritually after he was relocated to the Pentagon in Washington to serve as an aircraft program coordinator. Besides attending a charismatic Episcopal church in Virginia, Sullivan became a part of a Wednesday morning Bible study for Pentagon officers and civilian employees. That weekly experience, which Sullivan described as "a tremendous boost," was something that he would eventually duplicate after being assigned to the Air Station in South Carolina.

Sullivan took command of MCAS Beaufort, which is situated in the South Carolina coastal lowlands, in early 1987. As he began to reach out with the love of Christ to the thousands of men and women on the base, and instituted a Wednesday morning Bible study and a Wednesday evening prayer group in his home, his reputation as an outspoken Christian began to circulate among officers and enlisted men alike.

"Col. Sullivan is a rarity," said Roxanne Cibuzar, whose husband is a squadron commander. "You just don't find people who love the Lord at the very top." The Cibuzars attend the Sullivan's Wednesday evening prayer meeting on a regular basis, and Roxanne also prays for the salvation of air station officers each morning with Bobbi Sullivan.

Lt. Kent Underwood, Officer-in-Charge of the Joint Substance Abuse Counseling Center at the station, is also a Christian and a member of Col. and Mrs. Sullivan's home fellowship meeting. "Col. Sullivan is a man of unquestionable character and integrity," said Underwood. "He's a fine example for all of us Marines to look up to." Underwood also added that, even though Sullivan is a strong commander who keeps the air station in complete order, he is not afraid to show humility or to openly express the love of Christ to his men. "The Colonel has prayed for me in his office when I had a need," he said.

Sullivan's Christian example has not always been appreciated, however. Shortly after he took command of the station, the Colonel decided to order pornography off of the base. Several soft-core porn magazines such as Playboy and Penthouse were being sold in the station's retail outlets, and Sullivan notified the Marine Corps Exchange that he wanted the publications out immediately.

"It took guts for Col. Sullivan to do that," said Lt. Underwood. Sullivan was both criticized and applauded by many for his action, but he held fast to the decision and began to seek God's wisdom about how to convince his men that he had made the right move.

Col. Sullivan explained what he did at that point: "I could have just sat here and dictated what will be sold and marketed at this station - I have that kind of authority. But I felt that to make a unilateral decision in an area of what most people call 'individual freedom,' I needed community support."

Sullivan then put together a presentation on pornography and how it is linked to domestic violence - which at that time was a growing problem at the air station. He then called together a group of the station's commanding officers and gave them the startling statistics about actual domestic violence problems occurring at Beaufort. Pornography was traced as one of the root causes of the ugly situation, and the statistics verified Sullivan's premise.

"Most of the commanders, after viewing the presentation, said they had no idea this was going on right here in Beaufort," said Sullivan. "They were shocked. And after that meeting I began to get support from other officers on my decision."

Community leaders in the small town of Beaufort are also appreciative of Sullivan's leadership role in the crackdown on porn. The county leadership wants to take similar action, and state congressmen are supportive of the Colonel's stand. It has set a precedent in the area which is likely to be duplicated.

Since the pornography decision, Sullivan has created a Community Advisory Group composed of non-commissioned officers, wives' groups, chaplains, and other service agency representatives. The group is responsible for helping to promote a healthy environment on the base, and to research specific topics which the community thinks might be a problem. They then recommend special courses of action to the Colonel for implementation.

Recently the station's Morale, Welfare and Recreation office wanted to bring what they called a "Ladies' Boxing Act" to the base for entertainment. Sullivan's Sergeant Major looked into the situation, and discovered that the show was nothing more than a thinly disguised pornographic presentation.

Sullivan called in his crew of community advisors. "We got the promotional video for the act, and showed it to the group," said the Colonel. "I asked them, 'Is this something that we want to promote at this station?'"

Only one viewer thought that individual Marines should have a choice in the matter, and that the show should be permitted. "Everyone else agreed that to allow such a show - which was so degrading to women - would be detrimental to the pro-family atmosphere we are trying to create on this base," added Sullivan.

Col. Sullivan and his wife are both outspoken about their views on the family. "Life in the military places a lot of strain on families," related the Colonel. "Because our squadrons are sent on assignment for six-month periods, there is a greater temptation to be unfaithful. The children also suffer from having their dads gone so much. So we have always made it a clear rule around here: God is first, your family is second, and your job is third." Bobbi Sullivan echos this sentiment whenever she is given the opportunity to speak to military wives.

The base commander's ideas have not always been readily received, but many have later consented wholeheartedly to his views after being educated. One exchange officer who had questioned the removal of pornography from the station's stores later admitted to Sullivan that he "had no idea the problem was so bad." He also pledged to do "everything he could" to promote a wholesome environment on the base.

Beaufort Air Station's Community Advisory Group is now looking at the issue of rock music and possible negative influences that the rock culture has on young people. The council has viewed several presentations on the subject, and will be making recommendations on what possible actions should be taken in regards to limiting concert ticket sales on base. "People just need to be educated on a lot of these things," said Sullivan. He predicts that the advisory group will want to show a seminar on the unreported negative influences of rock music to all the Marines on base.

To the other Christians at the Beaufort station, Col. John Sullivan is a shining example; but Sullivan himself is a modest man who speaks hesitantly about his many military honors and his achievements as base commander. He is especially excited to hear of reports from around the country of other outspoken Christians in the military.

"I know of a Christian brother on a base in North Carolina who has been baptizing men on the beach," said Sullivan. "There are also many senior officers at the Pentagon who are believers. I was told by a Christian friend that the former Commandant of the U.S. Marine Corps had attended a large Full Gospel Businessmen's Fellowship meeting in Washington. So I know that the Lord is moving among military people all over the nation."

Although recent news media reports might lead us to believe that the U.S. military is tainted by corruption and self-interest, Sullivan says that the reports concerning the recent Pentagon scandal have been distorted. "Although there are certainly many opportunities for greed and bribery in that environment, by and large, military people working in Washington have very high moral standards," related the Colonel. "There may be some civilians out there who have given in to the pressure, but my experience with military people confirms to me that this present situation at the Pentagon is not a negative reflection on our armed forces."

Sullivan added that no active-duty military personnel have been indicted in the weapons procurement scandal: "The men and women in the military believe in what they are doing and are dedicated to preserving our country and our way of life. They're sure not in this for the money! Military men and women willingly accept sacrifices often required of them, including frequent family separations, long working hours, and, occasionally, grave personal danger because of their love for this country." Sullivan related that he would like to see more in media reports about the positive contributions of servicemen, rather than the typical barrage of criticism.

With an obvious Christian revival breaking out within the ranks of our military servicemen, we can certainly anticipate more encouraging reports in the future. We can also expect more bold, courageous Christian leaders like Col. John Sullivan to emerge in the military community.

War on Drugs

by Pat Buchanan
6/88

In the war on drugs, we are a nation of wimps. We invoke the blustery rhetoric of mortal combat, and then employ tactics appropriate to a crackdown of a bingo epidemic in the parish basement.

Mayor Koch, for example, has himself approved a pilot program to provide hypodermic needles to drug addicts, so they won't catch AIDS while shooting up. The governor of New York opposes the death penalty for the cop-killer who assassinated Edward Byrne. The first lady firmly warns, 'If you are a drug user, you're an accomplice to murder,' but we don't behave that way. When basketball star Len Bias overdosed, we didn't treat him as an 'accomplice to murder.' We acted as though Len Bias were a 'victim' and we were all responsible for his death.

Exasperated, the mayor and Education Secretary Bennett want to throw the Army, Navy and Air Force into the battle, attacking cocaine dealers in their jungle hideouts in Bolivia and Peru.

Well, let me offer a dissent.

We don't need all that military hardware; and we ought not ask the armed forces to do what we lack the courage to do ourselves. We don't need to go to Bolivia or Peru to engage the enemy; he is right here in the USA. Millions of adult Americans - politicians, journalists, actors, students, businessmen, brokers - regularly use drugs, regularly collaborate with crime, regularly contribute the billions of dollars, without which those jungle laboratories would close down.

Our Latin American critics are right. Upon what high horse does the U.S. government sit to denounce Mexico for not stopping narcotics from crossing our 2,000-mile frontier, when the U.S. government can't stop drug sales in the shadow of the Capitol?

We don't need to send Green Berets to lead peasant troops into battle in the hills of Bolivia; there are drug dealers by the thousands to be found daily on the streets of our own cities. And the police know who they are.

If America's politicians truly believed drug peddlers were the greatest scourge ever visited upon our society, we would deal with them as though they were wearing the jackboots and uniform of Himmler's SS. If we truly believed narcotics traffickers were the moral equivalent of an invading, occupying army, we would be car-bombing their headquarters, shooting them on sight, lynching their collaborators, like the French Marquis and Italian partisans did.

The truth is: We don't believe what we say; our politicians only enjoy talking like that. Neither in Mayor Koch's New York, nor in Washington, D.C., is the death penalty permitted. You can make a billion dollars selling drugs to 12-year-olds, or murder 50 Edward Byrnes here, and you will never pay with your life.

All the killing is done here by the drug lords, who, unlike our politicians, are serious men. They kill one another for turf; they impose the death penalty on informants; they bribe and shoot police; they pump drugs into the veins of children; they live like monarchs and consider jail sentences part of the risk of doing business. They do all the killing, and we bluster about 'waging war.' But what kind of war is this?

The tough, hard country America once was, when the nation's style and tone were set by the returning veterans of World War II, has become a soft, weak, befuddled, mushy democracy, possessing neither the moral authority to preserve itself, nor the will to deal resolutely with enemies, foreign or domestic.

The drugs that are killing us do not afflict mainland China, or the Singapore of Lee Kuan Yew, or Turkey, or Saudi Arabia, or the Soviet Union. When those countries launch a 'war on crime,' criminals wind up, blindfolded, in front of a wall.

Do we want to stop drugs coming in? Have Congress 'declare war' against drug smugglers, establish special U.S. courts, impose a mandatory death penalty upon anyone caught bringing a seller's supply of marijuana, heroin or cocaine into the United States; and establish an expedited system of appeals, whereby those apprehended in June can be executed by September. This is what we did with the German saboteurs caught coming into the United States, who only wanted to blow up our factories, not poison our children.

In World War II, America was a serious nation, deadly serious, as the world discovered; today, we are a frivolous people, making up in rhetoric for what we lack in resolve. Why not just can all this claptrap about 'waging war' on drugs, before we become an international laughing stock?

Why has Appeal of Communism Endured for So Many?

by Patrick J. Buchanan

The year just ended, 1987, marred the 70th anniversary of the coming to power of Lenin's party. In the remarkable seven decades since the storming of the Winter Palace, that party has compiled a catalogue of crimes unique in human history.

A partial rendering would include the murder of the czar's family; destruction of the Russian Orthodox Church; the forgotten holocaust in the Ukraine; the forced famine of the '30s; Stalin's purges; the Hitler-Stalin pact; the rape of the Baltic states; the unprovoked attack on Finland; the Katyn massacre of the Polish officers; the deceptions of Yalta; the crushing of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters and the Prague Spring; the Gulag Archipelago; and the war of genocide against the Afghan people now entering its ninth year.

And, after all this terror, what has Marxist economics produced? From China to Cuba, from Ethiopia to Vietnam, one bankrupt state after another. And, for those same decades, Moscow has persecuted Russia's greatest men of letters, like Solzhenitsyn, and Pasternak, and driven her greatest artists, like Nureyev and Baryshnikov, into exile.

Despite this abominable history, however, communism retains a certain magnetism in the West. In elite American universities, some professors still proudly call themselves Marxist. From their pulpits, Christian clergymen decry any U.S. effort to remove Communist regimes in Grenada, Nicaragua and Angola. In Europe, writers and intellectuals generally believe Gorbachev's regime is a greater friend of peace than the United States.

How do we explain this continuing suspension of disbelief, despite the manifest crimes of Lenin, Stalin, Mao, Castro, Col. Mengistu and Pol Pot?

The answer, I think does not lie in a lack of knowledge about the Communist record, but, rather, in the presence of a form of religious belief.

The "Political Pilgrims" of whom Paul Hollander writes, those "useful idiots" who go abroad to Communist lands and come home singing the praises of the Brave New World, from Lincoln Steffens to Jane Fonda, do not see the misery, tyranny and moral squalor - because that is not what they went to see.

Their sudden new "faith in the atrocious systems they have just seen firsthand fills an emptiness in the soul caused by the loss of faith in the animating ideas and ideals of their own civilization. Their enthusiasm is that of the convert, because, in their hearts, they have been converted. They have, in a real sense, changed sides.

Nor should this be unexpected in our age of disbelief. Lost souls do not stay lost; they find a new faith. Ideology often fills the void left by a dying religious belief.

Communism is, in the last analysis, a Christian heresy, and it has the magnetism of a heresy. Where Christianity teaches that we are all children of God, with God-given human rights, destined for a heavenly kingdom, communism teaches there is no God, that life begins and ends here, that the Communist state is man's teacher and guide, that building paradise is the business of this world.

To those in the West who have lost faith in Judeo-Christian values, traditions and beliefs and, indeed, have come to despise their Western heritage, Communists, no matter how brutal in practice, will always have the appeal of men of action who do more than talk; thus, the party will never lack for secret admirers and self-appointed public defenders in the West.

Indeed, the alienated son who hates his father and finds happiness in his father's economic ruin is not different in attitude from the Americans who exulted in the final victories of the North Vietnamese Communists over the allies of their own country.

Seven years after his assassination, Somoza remains a reviled figure, though his crimes against the Nicaraguan people do not remotely approach the scale or scope of those committed by the decadent Sandinistas, whose survival seems the constant concern of the American Left. Why ? Because Somoza was on our side; and the Sandinistas, most emphatically, are not.

And it is, I am persuaded, not some deep-seated love of the downtrodden Xhosa or Zulu that has caused America's press and clergy to insist upon the most severe of sanctions upon South Africa. (After all, Ndebele, Hutu, Tutsi, Ibo and countless tribal peoples have been massacred in far greater numbers in modern Africa, without a peep of protest from these same sources.)

The spirit driving the anti-apartheid coalition worldwide is not love at all; it is hatred, and not just hatred of apartheid, but hatred of the Boer, hatred of Botha, his party and people, hatred of the 19th century idea they embody - the idea that the Christian West, because of the superiority of its values and the civilization those values produced, has an inherent right to rule over other peoples.

Oddly, today, it is the Soviets who have taken up Kipling's "white man's burden," who openly proclaim their inherent right to rule mankind, based upon their correct reading of history, and their party's predestined role in that history. Meanwhile, we Westerners have taken to preaching such 20th century notions as non-intervention and the equality of all states and "making the world safe for diversity," in JFK's phrase, even though that diversity, as often as not, includes a Fidel Castro as well as an Idi Amin.

Why I Oppose Marxism

by Edward Cain
4/88

* BECAUSE IT DECLARES WAR ON GOD

Marx wrote: "I wish to avenge myself against the One who rules above." Echoing Marx, an early Soviet slogan stated, "Let us drive out the capitalists from earth and God from Heaven."

* BECAUSE IT PERSECUTES CHRISTIANS

Wherever Communism comes to power, Christians are killed, Bibles are burned, churches are closed and heavy restrictions are placed on the life and witness of the Church.

* BECAUSE, BY INFILTRATING MARXISM INTO CHRISTIANITY, IT DAMNS MANY TO HELL

Liberation theology teaches class hatred, class war and violent revolution as the means of bringing about the Kingdom of God. Some embrace this message eagerly, believing that by implementing it, they are doing God's will. Others reject the message as repulsive but, because it is preached by the Church, also turn their backs on true Christianity. Both groups will go to a Christless eternity.

* BECAUSE IT ADVOCATES GENOCIDE AND THE DESTRUCTION OF MANKIND

Marx wrote: ... "I shall howl gigantic curses on mankind ... I bring the world to ruins ... that would be really living." Engels wrote: "The next world war will make whole reactionary people disappear from the face of the earth. This, too, is progress."

* BECAUSE IT PRACTICES GENOCIDE AND MASS KILLINGS

Since 1917, Marxism has caused the deaths of at least 144 million people. This figure excludes those killed in World War II.

* BECAUSE WHEREVER IT SEIZES POWER, IT CAUSES FAMINE AND MASS STARVATION

This was true of the Soviet Union in the 1920s and 1930s. It is true of Ethiopia and Mozambique today.

* BECAUSE IT PROMISES HEAVEN ON EARTH BUT PRODUCES HELL ON EARTH

It promises justice and democracy. The reality is the dictatorship of the proletariat, the rule of a tiny minority for the exclusive benefit of the minority. Over the course of 70 years Communists have jailed, tortured and terrorized hundreds of millions of people. Every year, tens of thousands of people risk their lives to flee from Marxist controlled countries such as Vietnam, Cambodia, Nicaragua, Cuba, Ethiopia and Mozambique.

 BECAUSE IT PROMISES PEACE BUT PRODUCES MILITARIZATION AND WAR

When the Marxist Sandinista revolution succeeded in Nicaragua, that country had an army of 8,000. Today, eight years later, Nicaragua, with a population of 2.5 million, has an army of 125,000! Cuba has a larger standing army than the United States! Its soldiers fight in Angola, Ethiopia, Nicaragua and Mozambique.

 BECAUSE IT PROMISES PROSPERITY BUT PRODUCES POVERTY

In Moscow it takes the average worker 54 minutes to earn enough to buy a kilo of rice, 118 minutes for 750 ml. of cooking oil and 701 hours for a color TV set. (The equivalent times for a black plant operator in Johannesburg are 12 minutes, 38 minutes and 363 hours). Basic items like meat and soap are rare luxuries. Housewives stand in line for food an average of 30 hours per week.

 BECAUSE IT HAS FAILED TO PRODUCE THE PROMISED UTOPIA IN THE SOVIET UNION AFTER 70 YEARS

Instead, alcoholism, apathy and despondency are on the increase while factory productivity, agricultural output and the quality of life are declining.

The Quincentenary and Spanish Missions:

Is the Grace of God Returning?

By Jay Rogers

8/92

Until 500 years ago, Spain was the leading nation in sending missionaries to the far corners of the world. Through Catholic monastic orders, such as the Jesuits, Dominicans, Augustinians and the Franciscans, a form of Christianity advanced in the world. Unfortunately, it was also through these orders that the great religious persecutions of the 15th century were fostered through the Spanish Inquisition under the reign of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella.

It is a little known footnote of history that 1492 is also the year that the last Jews were expelled from Spain. Shortly before Columbus' ships left the harbor of Palos, he recorded this event. The gold that was looted by the Spanish monarchs from the Moors, Protestants and Jews was used to finance Columbus' first voyage. Yet the voyage of Columbus was to open up a world where people could come and worship God in freedom.

In retrospect, this period of Roman Catholic missionary expansion represents a mixed picture. The conquistadors imposed Spanish civilization and Roman Catholicism by force, at times treating the Native Americans with cruelty. However, many of the Spanish missionaries and explorers had pure intentions. There were advances of the gospel in salvation and in educational and charitable work. But their work suffered the shame of being entangled with colonialism and the unredeemed aspects of western culture.¹

In the 1500s, the focus of world evangelism began to shift toward England, perhaps as a result of the trampling of the grace of God by the Spanish. With the coming of the Protestant Reformation and the defeat of the Spanish Armada, England gained supremacy over the seas and took up the cause of world evangelism through her own Protestant colonists.

The first Protestant missionary society was established in England in 1649. The Mayhews and John Eliot began the work of evangelizing the Indian tribes of New England in the 1640s. The Moravians sent hundreds of missionaries from Anglican churches to America in the 1700s. The Baptist Missionary Society was founded by William Carey in 1792; the London Missionary Society in 1795; the Church Missionary Society in 1799. A student movement at Williams College and Andover Seminary led to the founding of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1810.²

Now that 500 years have passed since 1492, it appears that Hispanics may once again become a dominant missionary force in the earth. Missiologists are looking to South America to be one of the focal points of revival and spiritual awakening in the 1990s. The Olympic games and the World's Fair to be held in Spain this Summer promise to bring more evangelistic activity to this nation than ever before in history.

The number "five" in Scripture is often associated with divine grace working to bring men to salvation.³ Five centuries have passed since Columbus' voyage and the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. We see a simultaneous reappearance of the Spanish world in the role of world missions. Is the grace of God that once departed from Spain now returning?

The history of Spain is a reminder to Christians in the United States today that although God may choose to use a particular nation at some juncture of history in a strategic way, his saving purposes are not bound to any political state or institution. God's grace alone is the determining factor in the advance of the Gospel of salvation.

Was America founded as a Christian nation?

There are many today who would doubt or deny that this is true. There has even been an attempt to cover up and, in some cases, to destroy the legacy of Christian thinking that has gone into the formation of our republic. Yet what were the true thoughts and intentions of the men and women who came before us?

A careful look into the past reveals landmarks which were essential in guiding America along the pathway that led us to where we are today. More often than not, at each one of these landmarks, there also appears irrefutable evidence that a sense of divine destiny accompanied the most important events of our history.

Here in part are some of these landmarks:

1490-1492 - Columbus' commission was given to set out to find a new world.

According to Columbus' personal log, his purpose in seeking undiscovered worlds was to "bring the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the heathens. It was the Lord who put into my mind ... that it would be possible to sail from here to the Indies ... I am the most unworthy sinner, but I have cried out to the Lord for grace and mercy, and they have covered me completely ... No one should fear to undertake any task in the name of our Saviour, if it is just and if the intention is purely for His holy service." (Columbus' Book of Prophecies)

April 10, 1606 - The Charter for the Virginia Colony read in part:

"To the glory of His divine Majesty, in propagating of the Christian religion to such people as yet live in ignorance of the true knowledge and worship of God."

November 3, 1620 - King James I grants the Charter of the Plymouth council.

"In the hope thereby to advance the enlargement of the Christian religion, to the glory of God Almighty."

November 11, 1620 - The Pilgrims sign the Mayflower Compact aboard the Mayflower, in Plymouth harbor.

"For the glory of God and advancement of ye Christian faith ... doe by these presents solemnly & mutually in ye presence of God and one of another, covenant & combine our selves together into a civill body politick."

March 4, 1629 - The first Charter of Massachusetts read in part:

"For the directing, ruling, and disposing of all other Matters and Things, whereby our said People may be soe religiously, peaceable, and civilly governed, as their good life and orderlie Conversacon, maie wynn and incite the Natives of the Country to the Knowledg and Obedience of the onlie true God and Savior of Mankinde, and the Christian Fayth, which in our Royall Intencon, and The Adventurers free profession, is the principall Ende of the Plantacion.."

January 14, 1638 - The towns of Hartford, Weathersfield and Windsor adopt the Fundamental Orders of Connecticut.

"To mayntayne and presearve the liberty and purity of the Gospell of our Lord Jesus, which we now professe..."

August 4, 1639 - The governing body of New Hampshire is established.

"Considering with ourselves the holy will of God and our own necessity, that we should not live without wholesome laws and civil government among us, of which we are altogether destitute, do, in the name of Christ and in the sight of God, combine ourselves together to erect and set up among us such government as shall be, to our best discerning, agreeable to the will of God..."

September 26, 1642 - The rules and precepts that were to govern Harvard were set up.

"Let every Student be plainly instructed, and earnestly pressed to consider well, the maine end of his life and studies is, to know God and Jesus Christ which is eternall life, John 17:3 and therefore to lay Christ in the bottome, as the only foundation of all sound knowledge and Learning. And seeing the Lord only giveth wisdome, Let every one seriously set himselfe by prayer in secret to seeke it of him Prov. 2.3."

Harvard College was founded on Christi Gloriam and later dedicated Christo et Ecclesiae. The founders of Harvard believed that "all knowledge without Christ was vain."

The charter of Yale University clearly expressed the purpose for which the school was founded: "Whereas several well disposed and Publick spirited Persons of their sincere Regard to & zeal for upholding & propagating of the Christian Protestant Religion ... youth may be instructed in the Arts & Sciences who through the blessing of Almighty God may be fitted for Publick employment both in Church & Civil State."

In addition to Harvard and Yale, 106 out of the first 108 schools in America were founded on the Christian faith.

April 3, 1644 - The New Haven Colony adopts their charter.

"That the judicial laws of God, as they were delivered by Moses ... be a rule to all the courts in this jurisdiction ..."

1647 - Governor William Bradford publishes Of Plimouth Plantation.

"Lastly, (and which was not least,) a great hope and inward zeall they (the Pilgrims) had of laying some good foundation, or at least to make some way thereunto, for ye propagation and advancing of ye gospell or ye kingdom of Christ in those remote parts of ye world; yea, though they should be but stepping-stones unto others for ye performing of so great a work ... their desires were set on ye ways of God, and to employ his ordinances; but they rested on his providence, and know whom they had beleaved."

April 21, 1649 - The Maryland Toleration Act is passed.

"Be it therefor ... enacted ... that no person or persons whatsoever within this province ... professing to believe in Jesus Christ shall ... henceforth be any ways troubled, molested (or disapproved of) ... in respect of his or her religion nor in the free exercise thereof ..."

April 25, 1689 - The Great Law of Pennsylvania is passed.

"Whereas the glory of Almighty God and the good of mankind is the reason and the end of government ... therefore government itself is a venerable ordinance of God ..."

May 20, 1775 - North Carolina passes the Mecklenburg County Resolutions.

"We hereby declare ourselves a free and independent people; are, and of a right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing association, under control of no other power than that of our God and the general government of Congress."

Summer 12, 1775 - Continental Congress issues a call to all citizens to fast and pray and confess their sin that the Lord might bless the land.

"And it is recommended to Christians of all denominations, to assemble for public worship, and to abstain from servile labor and recreation on said day."

Summer 2-4, 1776 - Declaration of Independence written and signed.

"We hold these truths ... that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights ... appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world ... And for the support of this Declaration, with firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence..."

As the Declaration was being signed, Samuel Adams said: "We have this day restored the Sovereign to Whom all men ought to be obedient. He reigns in heaven, and from the rising to the setting of the sun, let his kingdom come."

On the same day, Benjamin Franklin suggested that the national motto be: "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God."

Historian and philosopher G.K. Chesterton said of the founding of America that it is "the only nation in the world that is founded on a creed. That creed is set forth in dogmatic and even theological lucidity in the Declaration of Independence."

September 17, 1787 - The Constitution of the United States is finished.

At least 50 out of the 55 men who framed the Constitution of the United States were professing Christians. (M.E. Bradford, A Worthy Company, Plymouth Rock Foundation., 1982).

Eleven of the first 13 States required faith in Jesus Christ and the Bible as qualification for holding public office.

The Constitution of each of the 50 States acknowledges and calls upon the Providence of God for the blessings of freedom.

1787 - James Madison, the "architect" of the federal Constitution and fourth president:

"We have staked the whole future of American civilization, not upon the power of government, far from it. We have staked the future .. upon the capacity of each and all of us to govern ourselves, to sustain ourselves, according to the Ten Commandments of God."

April 30, 1789 - Washington gives his First Inaugural Address.

"My fervent supplications to that Almighty Being Who rules over the universe, Who presides in the council of nations, and Whose providential aid can supply every human defect, that His benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by Himself for these essential purposes."

March 11, 1792 - President George Washington:

"I am sure that never was a people who had more reason to acknowledge a Divine interposition in their affairs than those of the United States; and I should be pained to believe that they have forgotten that agency which so often manifested in the Revolution."

December 20, 1820 - Daniel Webster, Plymouth Massachusetts:

"Let us not forget the religious character of our origin. Our fathers brought hither their high veneration for the Christian religion. They journeyed by its light, and labored in its hope. They sought to incorporate ... and to diffuse its influence through all their institutions, civil, political and literary."

July 4, 1821 - John Quincy Adams:

"The highest glory of the American Revolution was this: it connected, in one indissoluble bond, the principles of civil government with the principles of Christianity. From the day of the Declaration ... they (the American people) were bound by the laws of God, which they all, and by the laws of the Gospel, which they nearly all, acknowledged as the rules of their conduct."

1833 - Noah Webster:

"The religion which has introduced civil liberty, is the religion of Christ and his apostles ... This is genuine Christianity, and to this we owe our free constitutions and government ... the moral principles and precepts contained in the Scripture ought to form the basis of all our civil constitutions and laws."

1841 - Alexis de Tocqueville (Democracy in America):

"In the United States of America the sovereign authority is religious ... there is no other country in the world in which the Christian religion retains a greater influence over the souls of men than in America."

Summer 8, 1845 - President Andrew Jackson asserts:

"The Bible is the rock upon which our Republic rests."

February 11, 1861 - Abraham Lincoln, farewell at Springfield, Illinois:

"Unless the great God who assisted (Washington) shall be with me and aid me, I must fail; but if the same Omniscient Mind and Mighty Arm that directed and protected him shall guide and support me, I shall not fail ... Let us all pray that the God of our fathers may not forsake us now."

Lincoln on the Bible:

"In regard to this Great Book, I have but to say, it is the best gift God has given to man. All the good the Savior gave to the world was communicated through this book. But for it, we would not know right from wrong. All things most desireable for man's welfare, here and hereafter, are to be found portrayed in it." (George L. Hunt, Calvinism and the Political Order, Westminster Press, 1965, p.33)

1884 - U.S. Supreme Court reiterates the Declaration's reference to our rights as being God-given.

These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, "we hold these truths to be self-evident" that is, so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement "that all men are endowed" - not by edicts of emperors, or by decrees of parliament, or acts of Congress, but "by their Creator with certain inalienable rights and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these" - not grant them but secure them "governments are instituted among men."

1891 - The U.S. Supreme Court restates that America is a "Christian Nation."

"Our laws and our institutions must necessarily be based upon and embody the teachings of the Redeemer of mankind. It is impossible that it should be otherwise; and in this sense and to this extent our civilization and our institutions are emphatically Christian ... this is a religious people. This is historically true. From the discovery of this continent to the present hour, there is a single voice making this affirmation ... we find everywhere a clear definition of the same truth ... this is a Christian nation." (Church of the Holy Trinity vs. United States, 143 US 457, 36 L ed 226, Justice Brewer)

1909 - President Theodore Roosevelt:

"After a week on perplexing problems ... it does so rest my soul to come into the house of The Lord and to sing and mean it, 'Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty' ... (my) great joy and glory that in occupying an exalted position in the nation, I am enabled, to preach the practical moralities of the Bible to my fellow-countrymen and to hold up Christ as the hope and Savior of the world." (Ferdinand C. Iglehart, Theodore Roosevelt - The Man As I knew Him, A.L. Burt, 1919)

1913 - President Woodrow Wilson:

"America was born to exemplify the devotion to the elements of righteousness which are derived from the Holy Scriptures."

1952 - US Supreme Court defines the "Separation of Church and State."

"We are a religious people and our institutions presuppose a Supreme Being ... No Constitutional requirement makes it necessary for government to be hostile to religion and to throw its weight against the efforts to widen the scope of religious influence. The government must remain neutral when it comes to competition between sects ... The First Amendment, however, does not say that in every respect there shall be a separation of Church and State."

January 20, 1977 - President Jimmy Carter:

"Here before me is the Bible used in the inauguration of our first President in 1789, and I have just taken the oath of office on the Bible my mother gave me just a few years ago, opened to the timeless admonition from the ancient prophet Micah: 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what does the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God'" (Micah 6:2).

1980 - President Ronald Reagan:

"The time has come to turn to God and reassert our trust in Him for the Healing of America ... our country is in need of and ready for a spiritual renewal."

May 3, 1990 - President George Bush proclaims National Day of Prayer.

"The great faith that led our Nation's Founding Fathers to pursue this bold experience in self-government has sustained us in uncertain and perilous times; it has given us strength to this very day. Like them, we do very well to recall our 'firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence,' to give thanks for the freedom and prosperity this nation enjoys, and to pray for continued help and guidance from our wise and loving Creator."

America's Christian Leaders: Anne Hutchinson

By Jay Rogers

In 1636, Anne Hutchinson, the wife of one of Boston's leading citizens, was charged with heresy and banished from Massachusetts Colony. A woman of learning and great religious conviction, Hutchinson challenged the Puritan clergy and asserted her view of the "Covenant of Grace" - that moral conduct and piety should not be the primary qualifications for "visible sanctification."

Her preachings were unjustly labeled "antinomianism" by the Puritans - a heresy - since the Christian leaders of that day held to a strong "Covenant of Works" teaching which dictated the need for outward signs of God's grace. The question of "works versus grace" is a very old one; it goes on forever in a certain type of mind. Both are true doctrines, however, the "Covenant of Grace" is true in a higher sense.

Anne Hutchinson's teaching can be summed up in a simple phrase which she taught the women who met in her home: "As I do understand it, laws, commands, rules and edicts are for those who have not the light which makes plain the pathway. He who has God's grace in his heart cannot go astray."

Actually, what Anne Hutchinson was preaching was not antithetical to what the Puritans believed at all. What began as quibbling over fine points of Christian doctrine ended as a confrontation over the role of authority in the colony. Threatened by meetings she held in her Boston home, the clergy charged Hutchinson with blasphemy. An outspoken female in a male hierarchy, Hutchinson had little hope that many would speak in her defense, and she was being tried by the General Court.

After being sentenced, she went with her family to what is now Rhode Island. Several years later she moved to New York where she and some of her family were massacred by Indians. One of her descendants, Thomas Hutchinson, later became governor of Massachusetts.

Anne Hutchinson pioneered the principles of civil liberty and religious freedom which were written into the Constitution of the United States. The spirit of Anne Hutchinson, the first woman preacher and fearless defender of freedom in New England, survived her persecution and death and it survives even until this day.

Anne Hutchinson's Role Debated

I have been a subscriber to The Forerunner for several years now and it seems that secular viewpoints have been creeping into some of the articles. I suspect that your research may not be as thorough as it should be.

Case in point: Anne Hutchinson "Champion of Tolerance" (April 1991). This word picture of Anne Hutchinson as one who "pioneered the principles of civil liberty and religious freedom which were written into the Constitution of the United States" does not match with the written picture of her found in Faith and Freedom - The Christian Roots of American Liberty by Benjamin Hart. The Forerunner's account matches with secular encyclopedia sketches.

In Faith and Freedom (chapter 8), Hart states that the complaint of Roger Williams and Anne Hutchinson "was that Massachusetts, too, had fallen short of the church model provided in the Book of Acts. Both thought that Massachusetts was not Christian enough, that it had failed in its mission to establish a "City on a Hill - a beacon for all the world to follow."

Williams arrived in 1631 and wanted the churches in Massachusetts to sever ties with the Church of England which he thought to be "beyond repair because of its commitment to be all inclusive and permit the unregenerate to worship alongside the saved."

On page 117 is an account of how Anne "got herself into difficulty when she launched a campaign against the minister of the Boston Church, John Wilson, whom she despised because she thought his preaching was not at all compelling ... according to her count there were only two truly Christian - 'sealed' - preachers in all of Massachusetts. They were John Cotton, whom she called the 'voice of the beloved,' and her brother-in-law John Wheelright. The rest were hypocrites, liars and on their way to perdition."

The chapter gives many more details too numerous to quote in a letter, the clashing of the two accounts regarding Anne Hutchinson and her views is loud and clear.

Whoever wrote the report calling Anne Hutchinson, "Champion of Tolerance" should do more research and Faith and Freedom is a good starting place. If Hart is correct in stating that "she was expelled because she was a religious fanatic who spent much of her time slandering the reputations of good and honorable men" and "had violated both the laws of the Bible and of acceptable conduct needed to hold society together" then further study and an article addressing this needs to be printed in your publication. I will be watching for just such an article.

Editor's Note: In our research on Anne Hutchinson, The Forerunner used accounts written by both Christian and secular sources. The purpose of placing the article on Anne Hutchinson next to the article on "Spiritually Correct Thinking" was to plant the seeds of faith and hope into the current generation. The purpose was to challenge the secular worldview which is now dictating "politically correct thinking" to our nation's college students by comparing this type of intolerance to what happened in Anne Hutchinson's day.

New book is antidote to Columbus bashing

Over the years I have greatly appreciated your fact filled publication, especially because of its detailed discussion of this nation's biblical heritage. My most recent book, Columbus & Cortez: Conquerors for Christ - is an antidote to the Columbus bashing that is so prevalent during this 500th Anniversary of his voyage, filled with fascinating details about the mission and motives of the explorers.

Columbus' Christian Character and Divine Mission

By Stephen McDowell

MUCH CONTROVERSY HAS ARISEN over the celebration of the 500th anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus. Many attacks have been leveled against him and western civilization. The target of the attacks of many is not so much against Columbus as it is against Christianity, which is the source of the values of western civilization. Fundamentally, the battle is between a Christian world view and a humanistic worldview.

To properly understand Columbus and others involved in the discovery and colonization of the Americas, we must view them in light of the world in which they lived. While Columbus had many shortcomings, his motives were most certainly Christian. Washington Irving writes of Christopher Columbus:

"He was devoutly pious: religion mingled with the whole course of his thoughts and actions, and shone forth in his most private and unstudied writings. Whenever he made any great discovery, he celebrated it by solemn thanks to God. The voice of prayer and melody of praise rose from his ships when they first beheld the New World, and his first action on landing was to prostrate himself upon the earth and return thanksgivings. Every evening the Salve Regina and other vesper hymns were chanted by his crew, and masses were performed in the beautiful groves bordering the wild shores of this heathen land. All his great enterprises were undertaken in the name of the Holy Trinity, and he partook of the communion previous to embarkation. He was a firm believer in the efficacy of vows and penances and pilgrimages, and resorted to them in times of difficulty and danger. The religion thus deeply seated in his soul diffused a sober dignity and benign composure over his whole demeanor. His language was pure and guarded, and free from all imprecations, oaths and other irreverent expressions."¹

Journal of First Voyage of Columbus

Columbus' actual journals have been lost, but two of his companions, his son Ferdinand and Bartolome Las Casas, recorded abstracts of the original journal. At places they quote Columbus and in other places they summarize his journals.²

Writings in Columbus' journal reveal his primary motives for sailing were his Christian convictions. He had a desire to preach the gospel throughout the nations, and in particular to take Christianity to the Great Khan of eastern Asia. About 200 years before Columbus' voyage, Marco Polo, who had traveled throughout parts of Asia, brought word from the Khan of a desire for missionaries to be sent to his empire. Other Khans who had ruled since Polo's time had also made this request. Columbus had studied the writings of Marco Polo's travels and was also familiar with more recent requests for missionaries to be sent to teach the Christian religion.

He opens his journal of his first voyage with the following:

"In the Name of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Whereas, Most Christian, high, Excellent and Powerful Princes, King and Queen of Spain and of the Islands of the Sea, our Sovereigns, this present year 1492, after your Highnesses had terminated the war with the Moors reigning in Europe, the same having been brought to an end in the great city of Granada, where on the second day of January, this present year, I saw the royal banners of your Highnesses planted by force of arms upon the towers of the Alhambra, which is the fortress of that city, and saw the Moorish king come out at the gate of the city and kiss the hands of your Highnesses, and of the Prince my Sovereign; and in the present month, in consequence of the information which I had given your Highnesses respecting the countries of India and of a Prince, called Great Can, which in our language signifies King of Kings, how at many times he, and his predecessors had sent to Rome soliciting instructors who might teach him our holy faith, and the holy Father had never granted his request, whereby great numbers of people were lost, believing in idolatry and doctrines of perdition.

"Your Highnesses, as Catholic Christians, and princes who love and promote the holy Christian faith, and are enemies of the doctrine of Mahomet, and of all idolatry and heresy, determined to send me, Christopher Columbus, to the above-mentioned countries of India, to see the said princes, people, and territories, and to learn their disposition and the proper method of converting them to our holy faith; and furthermore directed that I should not proceed by land to the East, as is customary, but by a Westerly route, in which direction we have hitherto no certain evidence that any one has gone..."

After reaching land, which he thought were islands off the east coast of Asia (or India), Columbus saw many natives, whom he called Indians. He spoke often of his desire to convert them to Christianity.

Friday, Oct. 12th..."As I saw that they were very friendly to us, and perceived that they could be much more easily converted to our holy faith by gentle means than by force, I presented them with some red caps, and strings of beads to wear upon the neck, and many other trifles of small value, wherewith they were much delighted and became wonderfully attached to us... I am of opinion that they would very readily become Christians, as they appear to have no religion."

Tuesday, Oct. 16th.... "They have no religion, and I believe that they would very readily become Christians as they have a good understanding."

Tuesday, Nov. 6th... "I have no doubt, most serene Princes, says the Admiral, "that were proper devout and religious persons to come among them and learn their language, it would be an easy matter to convert them all to Christianity, and I hope in our Lord that your Highnesses will devote yourselves with much diligence to this object, and bring into the church so many multitudes, inasmuch as you have exterminated those who refused to confess the Father, Son and Holy Ghost [this refers to the conflict with the Moors], so that having ended your days (as we are all mortal) you may leave your dominions in a tranquil condition, free from heresy and wickedness, and meet with a favourable reception before the eternal Creator, whom may it please to grant you a long life and great increase of kingdoms and dominions, with the will and disposition to promote, as you always have done, the holy Christian religion, Amen."

Monday, Nov. 12th... "Your Highnesses should therefore adopt the resolution of converting them to Christianity, in which enterprise I am of opinion that a very short space of time would suffice to gain to our holy faith multitudes of people..."

Tuesday, Nov. 27th... "The language of this people neither I nor any of my company understand, and we are perpetually making mistakes in our conversation with one another... Henceforth, with the permission of our Lord, I shall use my exertions, and have the language taught to some of our people, for I perceive that thus for the dialect is the same throughout. Thus we shall acquire a knowledge of all that is valuable here, and shall endeavour to convert to Christianity these people, which may be easily done, as they are not idolators, but are without any religion.... Your Highnesses ought not to suffer any trade to be carried on, nor a foreign foot to be set upon these shores except by Catholic Christians, as the object and sum of the present undertaking has been the increase and glory of the Christian religion."

Sunday, Dec. 16th... The Admiral ordered every civility to be shown them, "because," as he observes, "these are the best and most gentle people in the world, and especially as I hope strongly in our Lord, that your Highnesses will undertake to convert them to Christianity, and that they may become your subjects, in which light, indeed I already regard them."

Monday, Dec. 24th... "Your highnesses may be assured that there is not upon earth a better or gentler people, at which you may rejoice, for they will easily become Christians and learn our customs. A finer country or people cannot exist, and the territory is so extensive and the people so numerous, that I know not how to give a description of them..."

Many other actions and writings of Columbus, as revealed in his journal of the voyage, reveal his Christian motivation and reliance upon God.

Wednesday, Dec. 12th... A large cross was set up at the entrance of the harbour, upon a beautiful spot upon the western side, "as an indication" in the words of the Admiral, "that your Highnesses possess the country, and principally for a token of Jesus Christ our Lord, and the honour of Christianity."

Columbus often gives thanks to God for good weather and providentially arranging the voyage and watching over him:

Monday, Jan. 14th... He says that in spite of the bad state of his vessels he confides in our Lord, that as he has brought him to these parts, so he will in his great mercy return him; for his Heavenly Majesty knew what struggles it had cost him to set on foot this enterprise, and that he alone had favoured him before the King and Queen, all others in the most unreasonable manner opposing him.

Wednesday, Jan. 23rd... The sea all the time smooth as a river, "many thanks be to God," says the Admiral.

Friday, Feb. 1st... The sea very smooth, "thanks to God," says the Admiral.

Saturday, Feb. 2nd... The sea very smooth, thanks to God, and the air soft.

Thursday, Feb. 14th... He... comforts himself in reflecting upon the many mercies God had shown him in having enabled him to conquer all his adversities and hindrances in Castile, and accomplish his great discovery. And as he made the service of God the aim and business of his undertaking, and he had hitherto favoured him in granting all his desire, he indulges a hope that he will continue that favour, and secure him a safe arrival. Especially he reflected that he had delivered him when he had much greater reason for fear, upon the outward voyage, at which time the crew rose up against him, and with an unanimous and threatening voice, resolved to return back, but the eternal God gave him spirit and valour against them all.

Columbus desired to use the profits from the voyages to finance the liberation of the Holy City, Jerusalem, from the control of the Moslems. This is mentioned in the following entry:

Wednesday, Dec. 26th... He adds that he hopes to find at his return from Castile, a ton of gold collected by them in trading with the natives, and that they will have succeeded in discovering the mine and the spices, and all these in such abundance that before three years the King and Queen may undertake the recovery of the Holy Sepulcher. "For I have before protested to your Highnesses," says he, "that the profits of this enterprise shall be employed in the conquest of Jerusalem, at which your Highnesses smiled and said you were pleased, and had the same inclination."

Las Casas' abstract of Columbus' Journal ends with this entry:

Friday, March 15th... And here, the Admiral says, this relation ends, but that he purposes to go to Barcelona by sea, being informed that their Highnesses are in that city, there to give them an account of his voyage, in which our Lord had directed and enlightened him. For although he believed without scruple that the Almighty created all things good, that all is excellent but sin, and that nothing can be done without his permission, "yet," he observes, "it has been most wonderfully manifested in the circumstances of this voyage, as may be seen by considering the many signal miracles performed throughout, as well as the fortune which has attended myself, who passed so long a time at the court of your Highnesses, and met with the opposition of so many of the principal persons of your household, who were all against me, and ridiculed my project. The which I hope in Our Lord will provide the greatest honour to Christianity ever accomplished with such ease."

Letter of Columbus to Rafael Sanchez

After his arrival in Lisbon, Columbus wrote a summary account of his voyage as a report for Ferdinand and Isabella. It was written as a letter to Rafael Sanchez, Treasurer for Ferdinand and Isabella, and clearly reveals Columbus' Christian motivation. The following quotes are from this letter:

In his voyages, Columbus discovered many islands. He wrote, "I named the first of these islands San Salvador [which means holy saviour], thus bestowing upon it the name of our holy Saviour under whose protection I made the discovery." Other names he chose included Trinidad [for the Trinity], and Monte Cristi.

Columbus forbade his men from trading worthless articles to the Indians for things of value. He wrote:

"I prohibited their traffic on account of its injustice, and made them many presents of useful things which I had carried with me, for the purpose of gaining their affection, in order that they may received the faith of Jesus Christ, be well disposed towards us, and inclined to submit to the King and Queen our Princes, and all the Spaniards, and furthermore that they may furnish us with the commodities which abound among them and we are in want of."

"Throughout these islands there is no diversity in the appearance of the people, their manner or language, all the inhabitants understanding one another, a very favourable circumstance in my opinion, to the design which I have no doubt is entertained by our king, namely to convert them to the holy Christian faith, to which as far as I can perceive they are well disposed."

Columbus ends this letter: "The great success of this enterprise is not to be ascribed to my own merits, but to the holy Catholic faith and the piety of our Sovereigns, the Lord often granting to men what they never imagine themselves capable of effecting, as he is accustomed to hear the prayers of his servants and those who love his commandments, even in that which appears impossible; in this manner has it happened to me who have succeeded in an undertaking never before accomplished by man. For although some persons have written or spoken of the existence of these islands, they have all rested their assertions upon conjecture, no one having ever affirmed that he saw them, on which account their existence has been deemed fabulous."

"And now ought the King, Queen, Princes, and all their dominions, as well as the whole of Christians, to give thanks to our Saviour Jesus Christ who has granted us such a victory and great success. Let processions be ordered, let solemn festivals be celebrated, let the temples be filled with boughs and flowers. Let Christ rejoice upon earth as he does in heaven, to witness the coming salvation of so many people, heretofore given over to perdition. Let us rejoice for the exaltation of our faith, as well as for the augmentation of our temporal prosperity, in which not only Spain but all Christendom shall participate.- Such are the events which I have described to you with brevity. Adieu."

The Discovery of America

by Jesse T. Peck
4/92

From chapter one of The History of the Great Republic Considered from a Christian Stand-Point

This year marks the quincentenary of Christopher Columbus' first voyage and discovery of the New World. Numerous articles have been written in newspapers and magazines examining his voyage and the impact western culture has had on America and the indigenous peoples living here. We can expect many more to follow. Unfortunately, a negative view of Columbus and western culture predominates a lot of these articles.

As a general introduction to such themes this article contains a brief providential view of the discovery and exploration of the New World. While articles in Time or Newsweek or USA Today may present many historical perspectives, one that is ignored is a providential perspective, which is the view most of the people whom God used to create the history we now read about had. This is especially true of Christopher Columbus.

Jesse Peck gives such a view in the book he wrote in 1868, The History of the Great Republic. The first chapter of his book follows. In the Preface to his book, Peck writes:

Let it therefore be stated, that the theory of this book is, that God is the rightful, actual Sovereign of all nations; that a purpose to advance the human race beyond all its precedents in intelligence, goodness, and power, formed this Great Republic; and that religion is the only life-force and organizing power of liberty. If this is true, then all writers of American history must rise to this point of observation, or fail.

As certainly, therefore, as it is now as ever the right of God to reign; that he is now, as in ancient times, the common Father of our guilty race, the unchangeable Judge of all the earth; that his great and free volitions are controlled by principles of unerring righteousness; that men are, of themselves, blind and reckless in regard to the dearest interests of man, and wickedness is intensified by power, so that there is actually no hope for the downtrodden, but in God, - as sure as the verification of prophesy by inevitable history, so certainly is Jehovah today the Sovereign of all nations; and the American Republic is responsible to Him.

The old civilization required a new life. The race demanded an accession of ideas, a new theatre for the exercise of its powers and the realization of the divine purpose in the creation. Up to near the close of the fifteenth century, human governments had revealed little more than the struggles of liberty with the repressions of despotism; and God evidently intended a new and nobler development of the human race, a larger sphere for the manifestation of his providence and the exposition of his plans of sovereign control over individuals and nations.

He had given to man, as man, a strong love of liberty, the due expression and proper growth of which required room for free and independent action. Amid the despotic governments of the Old World, this would have been a moral impossibility. Such contiguity to old corrupt forms would have resulted inevitably in the infection of any new system, however just in itself. On the side of oppression, there was power; and a novel theory must have room and opportunity to experiment.

Precisely adapted to the necessities and mission of a free government, God had reserved a continent in which the savage state of its predatory tribes invited the coming-in of a high and purifying civilization. Without forgetting the just rights of the native Indians, which white man was sacredly bound to respect, it is philosophically and historically certain that Infinite Wisdom chose this land for the home of a broader liberty and higher Christian civilization than had been before known among men, and decreed the gradual occupancy of the Western World by the representatives of a new social order.

Upon the authority of ancient Icelandic manuscripts, brought forward by the distinguished antiquarian of Copenhagen, Professor C. Rafn, it is confidently affirmed that the old Northmen discovered this continent some five hundred years in advance of Columbus. Greenland was discovered in 983 by Erik the Red; and it is asserted that his son, Leif the Fortunate, in the year 1000, with thirty-five hardy mariners, landed at Helluland (Newfoundland), Markland (Nova Scotia), and Vineland (New England). He is said to have remained in the latter place for some time, where he erected large houses, named after himself, Leifbudis (Leif's booths).

Two years later, Thorwald, a distinguished brother of Leif, prosecuting these daring discoveries farther south, received his death-wound from the natives, and desired to be buried at the cape, where he thought it "Pleasant to dwell;" supposed to be "Cape or Point Aldeston, not far from the Pilgrim city, Plymouth, State of Massachusetts, where the fearless Thorwald, shortly before the sad termination of life, chiselled in Runes the exploits of his gallant crew.

In 1006, it is alleged that Thorfinn Karlsefne, "a man destined to become great," an Icelandic merchant, sailed to Greenland, where he married "Gudrid, the widow of Thorstein (a third son of Erik the Red);" after which, in three vessels, accompanied by his wife, and a crew of a hundred and sixty-five men, he sailed to Vineland, where Gudrid "bore him a son called Snorre, who was the very first child of European parents born in America."

It would seem that these "grim-visaged sea-kings of the North" continued their explorations, and attempts at settlements, down to 1347. But, by some strange influence of an invisible power, they disappeared from the continent. God threw a veil over it again until the plans of his wisdom should mature. He shut it up from the further gaze of the avaricious European until the fulness of the time was come; and then he produced the man, the idea, the impulse, which led to its discovery.

Columbus and the New World

Who can fail to trace the evidences of the Divine in the history of Columbus? Whence came the splendid poetry of that conception, which gave to him another world in the ideal before the knowledge of the real had become practicable? Why was he so far in advance of his age and contemporaries as to give him the reputation of a madman, not among the low and the vulgar alone, but among scholars, and courts far above him in opportunities and learning? Whence that lofty heroism, that indomitable perseverance, which knew no danger; which defied poverty, jealousy, and the boldest combinations of secular and ecclesiastical power?

It was not human. It was too elevated and far-reaching, too patient and enduring, too potent in resisting and wearing out opposition, too fruitful in expedients, and creative in resources, to admit of the idea for a moment. God only could have furnished such amazing foresight, such superhuman energies. He felt the stirrings of divinity within him, and claimed that he was inspired for his great mission of discovery. Still unaware of the grand designs of that Providence which guided him through all his wonderful career, he was, in his sphere, as verily the chosen instrument of God as Moses or Joshua or Elijah. Heaven directed the winds that filled his sails and brought him to the unknown land.

What he had discovered he did not know; what impulses he had given to thought and enterprise, what new life he had poured into the mind of his age, he by no means understood. How much more was necessary to the realization of the plans of Providence, and who would be the honored agents of continental discoveries, he could not tell; nor was it in any way important. He had fulfilled his mission. He was not to be the successful founder of empire. He was not to wear the diadem of royalty. Neither heir nor kindred was to be the inheritor of the vast domain which rose up dimly before him. This was God's realm, and he would take the charge of its great future. Columbus could receive his discharge from cares and from earth. He was henceforth immortal.

The Wisdom of God Above the Folly of Man

It is intensely interesting to observe the control of superior power over the devices of men for the accomplishment of high providential purposes. The success of Columbus aroused the spirit of enterprise; and navigators from different nations, with ideas wholly their own, embarked for new discoveries. But how very absurd were their views! How blind they were with respect to their true mission!

Portugal and Spain were moved by cupidity to adventurous expeditions in search for gold; but God used their hardy mariners to reveal other lands in the Western oceans. A Papal bull had divided the world of discovery between them, assuming original proprietorship of unknown as well as known portions of the globe; but God roused the spirit of exploration in another quarter.

John and Sebastian Cabot sailed in 1497, under the auspices of England, to look for land, but especially for a northwestern passage to Asia. It was not material what where their views. They might be wild and irrational: but God conducted them to the coast of Labrador, and made use of their enterprise to establish the claims of England to the first discovery of the continent; thus indicating a purpose to give the dominant influence in the New World to the Anglo-Saxon race.

In 1498, the younger Cabot, a truly great mind, moved by the same blind idea of the northwestern passage, was available in the divine plans to open to the mind of England new sources of wealth in his further discoveries, of which he was never to become the proprietor. Why, let us ask, were these illustrious navigators not permitted to live and die in Venice, or to prosecute their adventures as Italians? The answer plainly is, the Italian people were not suited in the eyes of God to the task of founding the great empire of freedom.

In 1551, the Portuguese thought they saw great gain in the returns of the ships of Gaspar Cortereal, freighted with Indians, torn from their hunting-grounds, and doomed to inexorable slavery; but Providence intended and used the voy-ages of this daring mariner to reveal to the world some seven hundred miles of the North-American coast.

Three years later, it appeared that God had given to Amerigo Vespucci the idea of a new continent, and sent him out to explore its hidden lands, and report, as he did, to Lorenzo de Medici, the accession of an additional quarter to the globe; to which, as the only desirable reward of his enterprise, he had the honor of giving his name.

France, in 1523, must also undertake the discovery of "a western passage to Cathay;" and to John Verrazzani of Florence was conceded the honor of this fresh attempt to gain the treasures of that fabled land for royal coffers. This was upon the surface; but a profounder purpose appeared in conducting him to North Carolina, and far along the coast southward and northward, where "the groves, spreading perfumes far from shore, gave promise of the spices of the East, and the color of the earth gave promise of abundance of gold." As God willed, he brought to the knowledge of the world the spacious harbors of New York and Newport, and the rugged shores of New England; but no French monarch was ever to reign over this wonderful coast, the purposes of which were yet wrapped in profoundest mystery.

Whether thirst for gold or lust of power, ambition for fame or the vagaries of fevered brains, prompted the efforts of kings and of daring navigators, human plans were tolerated and developed just so far as the profound purposes of God would allow, and no farther, and then defeated, or pressed into the service of the exalted power, which in wisdom infinite rose above and ruled over all.

The brave and reckless Ferdinand de Soto could march with the air of a conqueror through Florida, as he had done through Peru; and advance to the Alleghanies and the great Mississippi, as he did in 1542: but he could bequeath no permanent empire to the Spanish throne. The grand Valley of the Mississippi was reserved by a higher Sovereign for the hosts of freedom in the great future.

So of every act in the scene of discovery, revealing at the same time the narrow earthly schemes of human ambition, and the stern reservations and broad purposes of the Infinite Mind. Whether thirst for gold or lust of power, ambition for fame or the vagaries of fevered brains, prompted the efforts of kings and of daring navigators, human plans were tolerated and developed just so far as the profound purposes of God would allow, and no farther, and then defeated, or pressed into the service of the exalted power, which in wisdom infinite rose above and ruled over all; and the divine plan of human freedom became the controlling law of discovery upon the Western continent. So God ordained, and history reveals.

Finney Visits Boston

Charles G. Finney, the famous 19th century evangelist and revival preacher, had some unique insights into the changing spiritual conditions of Boston in his day. The "Flapjack Turning" at Harvard was the result of an emerging philosophy of Unitarianism. Today, this idea is known as Humanism. Like the humanists of our day, men such as Ralph Waldo Emerson and Charles Eliot believed that man was essentially good and denied the Trinitarian belief that Jesus, being one with the eternal God, was the only way to eternal life.

The statement below is taken from Charles Finney's memoirs:

In the fall of 1843, I was called again to Boston. When I arrived there, I found many forms of error prevailed among the people. Indeed I have found that to be true of Boston, of which Dr. Beecher assured me, the first winter that I labored there. He said to me, "Mr. Finney, you cannot labor there as you do anywhere else. You have got to pursue a different course of instruction, and begin at the foundation; for Unitarianism (Humanism) is a system of denials, and under its teaching, the foundations of Christianity are fallen away. You cannot take anything for granted; for the Unitarians and the Universalists have destroyed the foundations, and the people are all afloat. The masses have no settled opinions, and every 'lo here,' or 'lo there,' finds a hearing; and almost any conceivable form of error may get a footing."

I have since found this to be true, to a greater extent than in any other field, in which I have ever labored. The mass of the people in Boston are more unsettled in their religious convictions than in any other place I have ever labored, notwithstanding their intelligence; for they are surely a very intelligent people, on all questions but that of religion (true biblical Christianity). It is extremely difficult to make religious truths lodge in their minds, because the influence of Unitarian teaching has been, to lead them to call into question all the principle doctrines of the Bible. Their system is one of denials. Their theology is negative. They deny almost everything, and affirm almost nothing. In such a field, error finds the ears of the people open; and the most irrational views, on religious subjects, come to be held by a great many people.

History of Black America

by Raymond Houston
9/89

God established this nation under covenant with men and women who had promises from Him. In the preamble to the Constitution our founding fathers expressed their hope of this promise to "secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity." We have come to know more clearly and recognize the the hand of God in the founding of this nation. Those who came first at the risk of life and welfare were inspired by the desire to form a land where the God of creation could be worshipped freely and unhindered by government - a land where they could see the word of God fulfilled.

Not all of the people who came here would submit to the Lord. Many would turn their hearts from expressing gratitude to Him to praising themselves for their hard work. Some desired hard work made easy and the institution of slavery took force. These enslaved people were Blacks, birthed and blessed by God, but not qualified for the promises of the land.

In the midst of this godless institution, some who were inspired by the God of the covenant were keeping alive the promises for these people. A faithful few shared the word of God with the Blacks and hope was instilled. This new light in their souls was heard as they sang about their new found hope in God. Loud and clear was heard the cry of the founding fathers - Freedom!

The old Negro spirituals clearly tell us that the hope of this land had not died out and that even in the midst of the horrors of slavery God would show Himself again as the object of their hope. Controversy arose about teaching the Word of God to the slaves, but the Word prevailed and the God of creation was taught and hope in Jesus was sparked. Prayers were made both by the slaves who accepted Jesus as the answer to their dilemma and by others who knew that what was occurring was not the plan of God.

Prayers were answered and Blacks were freed, but that was just the beginning of their hope in Jesus. The majority of these freed slaves considered their release as coming from the hand of God. Now they had to learn to live as free men and women.

Today, most acknowledge that it was not man's action that set the slaves free, but the Lord of mercy and grace. This same Jesus that intervened to bring freedom to the Blacks is also the One who intervened for the first settlers of this land. God moved sovereignly to bring the first white settlers to America, to keep them alive and instruct them in His ways. For the Blacks, He did a mighty move to do away with slavery. Now the hope of the land - freedom for ALL - could be actualized.

God has always had a greater purpose for America than just founding a nation where people could say, "Let freedom ring!" Some may even deny that there is freedom for all in America. However, there is no other nation that allows freedom of disagreement with the Constitution. In America today, it is loudly and clearly made known that a new generation has arisen that turns its back on the essence and substance of our freedom. The ability to behave in such a manner clearly demonstrates that freedom exists. But not all Americans who enjoy the blessings of liberty have forgotten the God of the American Covenant. We realize that God has been merciful on our nation and gratefully thank Him.

As a Black American, I have wrestled with the question: Do I have a rightful place in this country? Can I really feel that this new resurgence of love for our land and this new knowledge of its true beginnings have a place for me? I did not know how to interpret all of this. Then the Lord remind me of how my ancestors placed their hope in Him. It was Jesus about whom they sang - and they put their hope of deliverance in Him. He reminded me that many of my people had truly feared God and had been praying, placing their life in the hands of Jesus. It was Jesus who set my people free.

It was not the will of God for my ancestors to come to this land as slaves, but God prevailed as they put their trust in Him. "And we know that God causes all things to work together for good to those who love God, to those who are called according to His purpose" (Romans 8:28).

Now I see that there is no greater place on earth for me to be than in the United States. There is no greater opportunity to fulfill the destiny of this land than in the present. As God expects America to return to its original purpose, to be a place for the growth and spreading of the gospel, He is expecting me to include myself as one who is privileged to be a part of bringing about the true destiny of this land. God has released me from the trap of the enemy, thinking I could not have full participation in turning our country back to God.

God has not left any of us without hope. This whole country has the opportunity to fulfill God's desire and be a springboard for the spreading of His word. Therefore we need to proclaim the release from the deception of the enemy that is designed to turn Blacks away from serving the God of power, love and mercy to serving themselves, which yields destruction. Let all of us not fail in sharing our nation's inheritance of the good news of release from bondage into enjoying God's blessings.

History vs. Hypocrisy: Our Nation's Founders Critique Today's Party Platform

Anyone who reads the Democratic and Republican party platforms will be surprised at how dramatically different their stated positions are from those of our elected officials when they actually get around to writing and voting on real legislation. This discrepancy is particularly acute when it comes to economic issues.

On a scale from 1 to 10, with socialism being a "1" and economic freedom with property rights being a "10," the Republican party platform merits an "8.5," while the rhetoric in the Democratic platform might earn it a "5." Unfortunately, party platforms don't carry much weight with elected representatives after election day. If the recent past is any guide, we should not be surprised to find our Republican representatives on average drifting back to about where the Democrats claim they actually stand, while the Democrats reveal that their intent is to take this nation just short of socialism.

On social issues, the gap between word and deed is not nearly so wide. Here both parties seem to be more consistent with the Democratic legislators proving to have more guts when it comes to putting into practice the radical values that they preach. The Republican's platform is no less bold in what it declares, especially given the flagrant hostility of the media to anything conservative, traditional or religious, but they somehow seem incapable of selecting candidates who are committed to their platform's social planks.

One useful way to analyze today's platforms and candidates is to compare the worldviews they hold with that of our Founding Fathers and other great statesmen from the formative years of our history. To the extent that our current political ideologies are validated by the framers of the Constitution and other noteworthy early American patriots, we can take an extra measure of confidence in them, and in the character of the candidates who espouse them. Conversely, any significant diversion from the founding principles of our nation should be a cause of great concern, and lead thoughtful citizens to question the motivation of politicians who would choose to abandon tried and proven principles of proper government, in order to pursue their newly hatched schemes of social engineering.

The Republican national convention and its platform were excoriated by a contemptuous press for their repeated references to God, morality and family values. Prime-time speeches were replete with statements echoing such platform declarations as: "We believe in traditional family values, and in the Judeo-Christian heritage that informs our culture," and, "If America ceases to be good, she will cease to be great." Media and Democratic partisan criticisms notwithstanding, let's examine the speeches and writings of several of our nation's founding heroes, to see whether or not they might have felt comfortable addressing the Republican party delegates that gathered in Houston last August.

George Washington (1st President) - "True religion offers the government its surest support." "It is the duty of all nations to acknowledge the providence of Almighty God, to obey His will, to be grateful for His benefits, and humbly to implore His protection and favor." "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports."

James Madison (Father of the Constitution) - "Religion ... (is) the basis and foundation of government ... Before any man can be considered as a member of civil society, he must be considered as a subject of the Governor of the Universe."

John Adams (2nd President) - "The first and only Book deserving of universal attention is the Bible." "Our Constitution was made only for a moral and religious people. It is wholly inadequate for the government of any other."

Samuel Adams (Father of the American Revolution) - "While the people are virtuous they cannot be subdued; but when they lose their virtue they will be ready to surrender their liberties to the first external or internal invader ... If virtue and knowledge are diffused among the people, they will never be enslaved. This will be their great security." After the signing of the Declaration of Independence: "We have this day restored the Sovereign to Whom alone men ought to be obedient. He reigns in heaven and ... from the rising to the setting sun, may His kingdom come."

Daniel Webster (Senator, Orator, Defender of the Union) - "Lastly, our ancestors established their system of government on morality and religious sentiment. Moral habits, they believed, cannot safely be trusted on any other foundation than religious principle, nor any government be secure which is not supported by moral habits."

Noah Webster (Father of American education) - "The moral principles and precepts contained in the Scriptures ought to form the basis of all our civil constitutions and laws. All the miseries and evils which men suffer from: vice, crime, ambition, injustice, oppression, slavery, and war, proceed from their despising or neglecting the precepts contained in the Bible."

Abraham Lincoln (16th President) - "It is the duty of nations, as well as of men, to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God and to recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history, that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord." "All the good of the world is communicated through this Book (the Bible); but for this Book we could not know right from wrong. All the things desirable to man are contained in it."

Wow! If these guys had attended the last Republican convention, they probably would have accused Pat Robertson of watering down the message.

Now imagine what would have happened if any of these historical luminaries had wandered into the Democratic Convention last July. What country do you suppose they would have thought they were in? Jacobin France perhaps? Do you think they would have been invited up front to speak? Well if the treatment of Pennsylvania's pro-life Governor, Bill Casey is any indication, our Founding Fathers would not only have been muzzled and unwelcome, they might have needed a police escort just to make it out of Madison Square Garden safely. While the Democrats found plenty of time for a long parade of abortion industry representatives and homosexual extremists, they refused to allow Governor Casey anywhere near the microphone. One of Casey's aids was booed and hissed for daring to suggest that some reduction in abortions would be beneficial.

This is the behavior of the party that was founded by that icon of tolerance Thomas Jefferson. The opening paragraph of their platform invokes his legacy, as they claim to have inherited his mantle of moral legitimacy. Today, though they try to usurp the authority of his moral heritage, it is certain that this year he would not have been allowed near their convention podium. The Democratic leadership's tolerance of other's views seems to have an increasingly short tether; their putative rainbow of diversity seems suspiciously monochrome.

Imagine how any speaker would have been treated who dared to utter these words: "Can the liberties of a nation be sure when we remove their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people, that these liberties are a gift from God? That they are not to be violated but with His wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just." (Religion) ... is "deemed in other countries incompatible with good government and yet proved by our experience to be its best support." "The Bible is the cornerstone of liberty; ... students' perusal of the sacred volume will make us better citizens."

No doubt these words would have ignited a firestorm of protest from every fringe pressure group in the Democratic coalition over this speaker's "patent homophobia, fascist family values and unconstitutional mingling of church and state." And so today's Democrats would have revealed their true colors by excommunicating the very founder of their own party. For these are not the words of some dreaded southern fundamentalist preacher, rather they were taken straight from the mouth of Thomas Jefferson himself.

It's amazing how the light from just a little bit of history can cut through the thickest smog of contemporary political rhetoric.

In Search of Columbus

By Jay Rogers

3/92

COLUMBUS SAILED THE OCEAN BLUE IN 1492. That's where the agreement begins and ends on the controversial subject of the quincentenary. Five hundred years ago, a small fleet of ships sailed from Spain to discover the New World, or, according to some, to rape and pillage what the original inhabitants of the Western hemisphere had been building for centuries.

The attack on 1492 is usually accomplished in the following manner: the figure of Columbus is first loaded up with all of the academic heresies of the modern day - Eurocentrism, imperialism, élitism, etc. - and the collective sins of America are weighed upon him. The second step is to portray the Native American as the mythical "noble savage" - an uncorrupted race of humanity - and pre-Columbian America as a virtuous Eden of ecological harmony and peace. The discovery of the Western hemisphere by the Spanish is thus presented as a crime rather than an event to be honored and celebrated.

It is true that some conquistadors and explorers were barbarically cruel to the native inhabitants of the Americas. Yet the European settlement of the New World should be compared to another events of its kind in history - the rise of Islam, the Norman Conquest of England, not to mention the American Indian tradition of raiding, conquering and depopulating the tribes of neighboring lands.

The presentation of the Native American as pacifist is, at best, a cinematic fantasy derived from films such as Dances With Wolves. At worst, it is the historical reality of the Inca empire - a pyramidal, totalitarian society in which the individual had no importance and virtually no existence. According to Peruvian historian Mario Vargas Llosa, the Inca civilization was founded on "a state religion which took away the individual's free will and crowned the authority's decision with the aura of a divine mandate which turned the Tawantinsuyu [Inca civilization] into a beehive."

Is it Eurocentric to be thankful for Columbus and the cutting of the Atlantic channel to allow European settlers to come to the New World? Would it be better to extol the virtues of a society in which the individual had no more rights than those of an insect?

On Columbus' foundation of discovery a society has been built in which a culture of liberty has flourished. The individual has been raised to a greater level of dignity and sovereignty than in any culture in history.

Just who was Columbus, anyway? Your interpretation of this man's accomplishment in discovering the New World may depend as much on your political alignment as on historical reality. Shrouded in an almost legendary mystique, there are only a few facts about Columbus that are usually given to history students about the character of the famous explorer. Given his importance to the current society of the Western hemisphere, the true Columbus is as mysterious and evasive a figure as one is likely to find.

Yet Columbus kept extensive diary entries, wrote letters, and signed documents which are available for our study today. Before we can make any judgments pertaining to the virtue or villainy Columbus, we should take a close look at the world and circumstances from which his quest of discovery arose.

Columbus was born in 1451 in Genoa, Italy, the son of a weaver, and early on took to the sea. "At a very young age I became a sailor, and I have continued to this day," he wrote in a letter. "The art of navigation incites those who follow it to learn the secrets of the world. For forty years I have followed this trade, and I have sailed all the navigable seas."

"Christoforo Colombo" - meaning "Christ-bearer" - is how he signed his name in letters and documents. Columbus had a deeply ingrained belief from his youth that he was God's servant: "A man to fulfill His purpose" (Isaiah 46:11). In his writings, Columbus often refers to his quest of discovery glowingly as a "holy enterprise" - an exalted mission which was to implement God's plan of redemption in history.

What was it that motivated Columbus to sail west, thus becoming renowned as the European discoverer of America? One theory that is popular, yet false, was that Columbus wanted to prove that the earth was round. (No educated person - and certainly no Mariner - in the late 15th century believed otherwise.)

Columbus was a scholarly man who collected a vast library. Four of these volumes still exist and bear marks of his note taking. In his writings to Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand, he explained that it was his learning that first put into his mind the possibility of sailing west to reach the East Indies:

"At this time I have seen and put in study to look into all the Scriptures, cosmography, histories, chronicles and philosophy and other arts, which our Lord opened to my understanding, so that it became clear to me that it was feasible to navigate from here to the Indies, and He unlocked within me the determination to execute the idea....

"There is no question that the inspiration was from the Holy Spirit, because He comforted me with rays of marvellous illumination from the Holy Scriptures. For the execution of the journey to the Indies, I did not make use of intelligence, mathematics, or maps. It is simply the fulfillment of what Isaiah had prophesied. No one should fear to undertake any task in the name of our holy Savior; if it is just and the intention is purely for His holy service. The fact that the Gospel must still be preached in so many lands in such a short time - this is what convinces me."¹

The Bible was undoubtedly available to Columbus. As a learned Italian man and having mastered several languages, he could read the Latin text of Isaiah with ease. Thus the Age of Exploration was fueled by biblical prophecy.²

As early as 1484, Columbus sought sponsorship for his voyage. After being turned down by the monarchies of Portugal, England and Italy, he finally was successful with King Ferdinand and Queen

Isabella of Spain. King Ferdinand was not in favor of Columbus' plan, but Isabella wanted to proceed. Spain was involved in a ten year war with the Moors at the time, however, and Isabella believed in doing one thing at a time. Meanwhile, Columbus enlisted the financial support of some Genoese and Florentine merchants.

King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, possibly the most murderous couple in modern European history, are central figures in this world. Charles Coffin, the 19th century historian, describes the cruelty of Ferdinand and Isabella in financing the Spanish Inquisition to persecute "heretics," in their campaign against the Muslim Moors, and in driving the Jews out of Spain:

"Men and women have their clothes ripped from their backs, and they must stand exposed before these questioners (the Inquisition).... Isabella and Ferdinand urge the men who ask questions to do their work thoroughly - to let no heretic escape, especially if they have money, for by confiscating their wealth the King and Queen will replenish their purses.... Thousands are cast into prison. More than two thousand men and women are burned - thrown into furnaces. Other thousands flee from the country.... Liberty of conscience, liberty of thought, speech, or action, are all unknown ... While Ferdinand and Isabella are thus rooting out heresy, they are trying to drive the Moors from the country.... The war against the Moors goes on. When Ferdinand and Isabella are in need of money to pay the troops, the rich Jews supply them.... Besides the five hundred thousand Jews driven out, more than one hundred thousand heretics are burned to death, or are thrown into prison, or lose their property by confiscation."3

During this time of treachery, Columbus first laid his plan of sailing west to reach the East Indies before Ferdinand and Isabella. There is no evidence that Columbus was aware of the extent of the cruelty of the Inquisition or felt any remorse that Isabella and Ferdinand had taken so much money from the people of Spain. In fact, Columbus was with the royal couple at Grenada, the sight of their last victory over the Moors. He saw the last Jews depart from Seville harbor the day before he set out on his first journey to America.

In all of his letters to the Spanish monarchs, Columbus expresses tender love and sincerity and never mentions any knowledge of their wrongdoing. Could Columbus have been ignorant of the atrocities perpetrated by his sponsors? Was it the darkness of the age that blinded him to this great evil? Perhaps it was because after waiting so many years for the war against the Moors to end, and after years of seeking support, that Columbus always blessed his King and Queen, never losing hope that the war would end and they would turn their support toward him. In any case, the explorer's character must be weighed in terms of his own actions.

On October 12, 1492, Columbus landed in the Bahamas, which he christened San Salvador, meaning "Holy Savior." Native people came to watch as Columbus knelt to pray and kissed the ground. He planted a flag of Spain and a cross on the soil of the New World. For three months, Columbus sailed among the islands, rowing up rivers, exploring coastlines, discovering Juana (Cuba) and Hispaniola (Haiti). On Christmas Eve, the Santa Maria ran aground on a shoal off of Hispaniola. Columbus took this to be a sign from God and abandoned the badly damaged ship leaving a settlement of 39 men behind to build a fort and look for gold.

That the discovery of San Salvador was the discovery of the New World was never known to Columbus and he returned to Spain triumphant believing he had found islands off the coast of Asia. Even to the end of his days he believed that he had discovered a trade route to the East Indies.

In May of 1493, Columbus set sail on his second journey with seventeen ships and 600 men. He was charged to convert the natives to Christianity and establish a trading colony. The relationship that Columbus' crew had with the natives was a mixture of admiration and cruelty. On the island now called St. Croix, Columbus and his men fought with the Caribs, natives who were cannibals. The natives of Hispaniola, who Columbus called "Indios" (believing he had reached the Indies), were admired for their beauty and friendliness, unlike the ferocious Caribs. According to Columbus' journals, the Indios were a timid people, a trait which was despised by the Spanish settlers.

They reached Hispaniola only to find that the original settlement burned to the ground. Evidently the "timid" people of the island of Hispaniola had reacted to being exploited by the first settlers. For a year and a half Columbus remained in the area of Hispaniola attempting to establish peace and order among the unruly Spanish settlers. As a symbol of his role as a peacemaker, he began to wear the habit of a Franciscan friar and continued to do so for the rest of his life. Before returning to Spain, he explored the Lesser Antilles and Jamaica.

On his third voyage, Columbus was arrested by the King's commissioner in rebellious Hispaniola. Columbus was pronounced Governor of New Spain by the King, yet his men became jealous and resentful to have an Italian set over them. They began to invent accusations and persuaded the commissioner - a vain, cruel man named Bodilla - to arrest Columbus. Thus the explorer was thrown in prison, set in chains and fetters, and sent back to Spain as a prisoner.

Columbus was outraged, yet nevertheless submitted to Bodilla. Appearing before Isabella and Ferdinand in chains, Columbus used his humiliation to pressure the king to let him continue his explorations. On his fourth and final voyage, Columbus traveled as far as Panama and was within a few miles of the Pacific Ocean. Had he gone only a few miles up a river in a small boat, he would have seen the Pacific before Balboa.

In the twelve years which followed Columbus' first journey, thousands of Indians were killed, and others carried off into slavery. The Spanish conquistadors' only purpose became to gratify their lust for gold. The jealousy of the Spaniards toward Columbus again worked against him. Although dubbed Governor of New Spain, he received no honor upon returning home for the last time. Several years after his final journey, he died in poverty in 1506.

It was the gold seized from the Moors, the Jews, and other "heretics" that financed Columbus' journeys. Yet ironically, it was the discovery of the New World which eventually led to the formation of colonies by the English a century later where religious dissenters could come to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

Charles Coffin comments on this historical irony in The Story of Liberty: "How easy it is to plan! How nice it would be if we could only carry out our plans! So we think. Why do we not carry them out? Because there are other plans besides our own. Before we get through with this Story of Liberty, perhaps we shall see that, somehow, almost all the great plans of kings and emperors have been overturned; that things have not come out as they intended. Perhaps we shall see that behind all the plans of men to advance their own interest, there will seem to be another plan - that circumstances and events will take such shape that we shall be able to discover a new arranging of things - a plan superior to all others, as if God had a plan and were behind all the overturnings and defeats of men."⁴

Mr. Jefferson Goes to Congress

By Cleon Skousen
10/92

Editor's Preface

WHO WAS THOMAS JEFFERSON? He has been described by some as a Christian patriot, a man who held to a deep belief in Judeo-Christian values; others have described him as a deist, one who held strong anti-Christian sentiment; he has also been depicted as a rationalist, a child of the Enlightenment and a great political thinker.

Having served as President of the United States, first Secretary of State, Minister to France, Governor of Virginia, and Congressman, Thomas Jefferson once said that he wished to be remembered for only three things: drafting the Declaration of Independence, writing and supporting the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom (1786), and founding the University of Virginia. Jefferson might have included a number of other accomplishments in the list - architect, farmer, collector of books, patron of the arts, violinist, skilled horseman, scientist. However, the three acts for which he wished to be remembered have this in common: they all testify to Jefferson's lifelong passion to liberate the human mind from tyranny, whether imposed by the state, church or our own ignorance.

The following account, by Cleon Skousen, describes Jefferson's role in the great years of America's destiny - 1775 and 1776 - when young Thomas Jefferson went to Congress and wrote the draft for the Declaration of Independence.

BY 1775 THE TIDE OF HISTORY WAS running fast. American blood had been shed by British Redcoats at Lexington and Concord on April 19. Then came the Battle of Bunker Hill on June 17, where over four hundred and fifty Americans were shot or bayoneted.

No doubt Thomas Jefferson was among those who wondered if King George was suffering from another of the fits of insanity which plagued him from time to time. Nothing seemed to appease the king, neither a proffered payment for the Boston tea nor pleas of loyal submission. He seemed determined to treat Americans as some of his most ferocious enemies.

All civil government was suspended in Massachusetts, and Boston was occupied first by General Gage and later by General Howe as commander-in-chief of all British troops in America. Like other Americans, Jefferson wondered where it would all end.

Jefferson was sent to the Second Continental Congress in Philadelphia, arriving June 20, 1775. He was one of the youngest members present; only John Jay of New York was slightly younger. In the fall, Jefferson had to leave the Congress because of the death of his eighteen-month-old daughter. His wife and his mother were also very ill.

1776 - The Fateful Year

There were dark forebodings as the tide of history moved in upon the American colonies in January of 1776. Word came that the American expedition to capture Quebec had failed. General Montgomery was killed and Benedict Arnold, who had been a hero in this campaign, was wounded. It was only a matter of months before the Americans were driven out of Canada completely.

Jefferson was also extremely concerned about the bad news from Boston. Washington had lost over 4000 of his soldiers. Many of those remaining were sick. Others were disheartened. When their enlistments were up, a mere handful reenlisted. And since the British would not come out and fight, Washington reported that the restless Americans passed much of the time simply fighting among themselves.

To make matters worse, King George virtually disowned the American colonies. He announced that if the colonies were attacked by foreign foes, Britain would furnish no help. American ships were declared to be "free booty," which meant it would be legal to capture any American vessel on the high seas and take it over, cargo and all. As for the crew, they would be impressed into the British navy.

It was in this dismal setting that Thomas Jefferson commenced what would turn out to be one of the most important years of his life. But he would have scarcely suspected it. His mother died on March 31, which was a great blow to Jefferson. He suffered excruciating migraine headaches for the next five weeks after his mother died.

His tensions were further aggravated when he read the six drafts which had been submitted for a Virginia constitution. All were defective, even though they had been drafted by such illustrious patriots as John Adams, Richard Henry Lee, Meriwether Smith, George Mason, Carter Braxton, Patrick Henry, and others of high repute. It was obvious that the best minds in the country were still struggling to find a proper formula for the efficient self-government of a free and independent state. Jefferson therefore decided to try his own hand at constitution writing.

In spite of his mourning and migraine headaches, Jefferson wrote three separate drafts during the next five weeks. However, he was robbed of the pleasure of delivering them personally to the legislature in Williamsburg because he was sent as a delegate to Congress. He arrived in Philadelphia on May 14, carrying the third draft in his pocket.

The longer Jefferson stayed in Philadelphia, the worse he felt. He had an intense anxiety to be in Williamsburg. Finally, Jefferson wrote a letter requesting that he be given a leave of absence from Congress so he could lend a hand in writing the Virginia constitution. Fortunately, his request was denied. Had it been otherwise he would have missed the greatest honor of his life - the privilege of writing the Declaration of Independence. Frustrated and disappointed, Jefferson sent his third draft to the Virginia legislature. However, they used only an insignificant portion of it. His constitution would have overturned the whole aristocratic structure of the state. Virginia was not yet ready for such a revolutionary change.

The Declaration of Independence

On June 7, 1776, Richard Henry Lee of Virginia introduced the fatal resolution in Congress calling for complete separation from Great Britain. Several states asked for a brief postponement of any final decision in order to get instructions from home. Meanwhile a special committee was appointed to write a formal declaration of independence. The committee consisted of Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Roger Sherman, Robert Livingston, and Thomas Jefferson.

Jefferson immediately proposed that John Adams prepare the initial draft. John Adams described what happened as follows:

"Jefferson proposed to me to make the draft. I said: I will not. You should do it."

Jefferson: "Oh, no! Why will you not? You ought to do it."

Adams: "I will not!"

Jefferson: "Why?"

Adams: "Reasons enough."

Jefferson: "What can be your reasons?"

Adams: "Reason first - You are a Virginian, and a Virginia ought to appear at the head of this business. Reason second - I am obnoxious, suspected, and unpopular. You are very much otherwise. Reason third - You can write ten times better than I can."

Jefferson: "Well, if you are decided, I will do as well as I can."

Jefferson's Preparations & Background

It is doubtful that any of the Founders could have brought to this assignment a more profound and comprehensive training in history and political philosophy than Jefferson. Even by modern standards, the depth and breadth of his education are astonishing. Here is a summary of his background which we have already mentioned briefly:

He had begun the study of Latin, Greek, and French at the age of nine. At the age of sixteen he had entered the College of William and Mary at Williamsburg as an advanced student. At the age of nineteen he had graduated and immediately commenced five years of intensive study with George Wythe, the first professor of law in America. During this period he often studied twelve to fourteen hours per day. When he was examined for the bar he seemed to know more than the men who were giving him the examination.

By the time Jefferson had reached early adulthood, he had gained proficiency in five languages. He had studied the Greek and Roman classics. He had studied European and English history. He had carefully studied both the Old and New Testaments.

While studying the history of ancient Israel, Jefferson made a significant discovery. He saw that at one time the Israelites had practiced the earliest and most efficient form of representative government. As long as the Israelites followed their fixed pattern of constitutional principles, they flourished. When they drifted from it, disaster overtook them. Jefferson thereafter referred to this constitutional pattern as the "ancient principles."

Jefferson was also surprised to find that the Anglo-Saxons somehow got hold of some of these "ancient principles" and followed a pattern almost identical to that of the Israelites, until around the eighth century A.D. It is interesting that when Jefferson was writing his drafts for the Virginia constitution he was already emphasizing the need to return to the "ancient principles."

Writing the Declaration of Independence

For seventeen days Jefferson composed and revised his rough draft of the Declaration of Independence. The major portion of the Declaration is taken up with a long series of charges against King George III. However, these were nearly all copied from Jefferson's drafts of the Virginia Constitution and his Summary View of the Rights of British America. To copy these charges into the Declaration would not have taken him more than a single day. What was he doing the other sixteen days?

It appears that he spent most of the remaining time trying to structure into the first two paragraphs at least eight of the "ancient principles" which he had come to admire. His views on each of these principles are rounded out in other writings, and from these various sources we are able to identify the following fundamental principles in the first two paragraphs of the Declaration of Independence:

1. Sound government should be based on self-evident truths. These truths should be so obvious, so rational, and so morally sound that their authenticity is beyond reasonable dispute.
2. The equal station of mankind here on earth is a cosmic reality, and obvious and inherent aspect of the law of nature and of nature's God.
3. This presupposes (as a self-evident truth) that the Creator made human beings equal in their rights, equal in his sight. (Of course, individual attributes and personal circumstances in life vary widely.)

4. These rights which have been bestowed by the Creator on each individual are unalienable; that is, they cannot be taken away or violated without the offender coming under the judgment and wrath of the Creator. A person may have other rights, such as those which have been created as a "vested" right by statute, but vested rights are not unalienable. They can be altered or eliminated at any time.
5. Among the most important of the unalienable rights are the right to life, the right to liberty, and the right to pursue whatever course of life a person may desire in search of happiness, so long as it does not invade the inherent rights of others.
6. The most basic reason for a community or a nation to set up a system of government is to assure its inhabitants that the rights of the people shall be protected and preserved.
7. And because this is so, it follows that no office or agency of government has any right to exist except with the consent of the people or their representatives.
8. It also follows that if a government either by malfeasance or neglect, fails to protect those rights - or, even worse, if the government itself begins to violate those rights - then it is the right and duty of the people to regain control of their affairs and set up a form of government which will serve the people better.

The Declaration Is Adopted

On July 2, 1776, the Congress assembled as an informal "Committee of the Whole" to freely discuss Jefferson's Manifesto of Freedom. A number of changes were suggested and debated. It was the evening of July 4 when the Congress as an official body finally approved Jefferson's somewhat modified document. There were over sixty changes but not one of the "ancient principles" was deleted.

Neither Jefferson nor the Congress called this document the "Declaration of Independence." It was the people who later gave the Declaration its immortal name.

After approval, the document was sent to a Mr. Dunlap for printing, and a copy was ordered engrossed (in large formal handwriting) for signing. The printer's copy has been lost, but the engrossed copy is preserved for public display in the Archives Building in Washington, D.C. Although Jefferson thought he remembered the delegates signing the document on July 4, it does not appear that the signing began until August 2, when the engrossed copy was ready.

Meanwhile, the Declaration was published by the Pennsylvania Evening Post on July 6, and copies were sent to the Committees of Safety in the various states by John Hancock, President of the Congress.

The first public reading of the Declaration was by the Committee of Correspondence in Philadelphia on July 8, 1776. People cheered, the bells rang, and many celebrated all night.

It is interesting that Thomas Jefferson was not identified as the author of this document until many months later. Furthermore, the names of the delegates who signed it were also kept concealed. There was fear of retaliation by the British.

This brings to mind the final sentence of the Declaration wherein the delegates stated: "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

In a figurative sense the delegates who subscribed to this document signed their names in blood. Had the Americans lost the Revolutionary War and been captured, they undoubtedly would have been tried and summarily convicted of treason. The penalty for high treason was:

To be hanged by the head until unconscious.

Then cut down and revived.

Then disemboweled and beheaded.

Then cut in quarters.

Each quarter to be boiled in oil.

The remnants were scattered abroad so that the last resting place of the offender would remain forever unnamed, unhonored, and unknown.

The Source of the "Ancient Principles"

A short time after the Declaration of Independence was adopted, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, and Benjamin Franklin were assigned to formulate an official seal for the new nation.

As mentioned earlier, Jefferson - and several of the other Founders, including the Reverend Thomas Hooker, who wrote the constitution for Connecticut in 1649 - had discovered that the most substantive principles of representative government were those practiced by ancient Israel under the leadership of Moses. Jefferson had also studied the institutes of government of the Anglo-Saxons and had found that they were almost identical to those of the Israelites.

After a brief discussion it was decided that both of these ancient peoples should be represented on the great seal of the United States.

Here is Franklin's description of the way he thought ancient Israel should be portrayed:

"Moses standing on the shore, and extending his hand over the sea, thereby causing the same to overwhelm Pharaoh who is sitting in an open chariot, a crown on his head and a sword in his hand. Rays from a pillar of fire in the clouds reaching to Moses, to express that he acts by command of the Deity. Motto: Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God."

John Adams described what Jefferson proposed:

"Mr. Jefferson proposed: The children of Israel in the wilderness, led by a pillar of cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, and on the other side Hengist and Horsa, the Saxon chiefs, from whom we claim the honour of being descended and whose political principles and form of government we have assumed."

Professor Gilbert Chinard, one of the distinguished biographers of Jefferson, states:

"Jefferson's great ambition at that time was to promote a renaissance of Anglo-Saxon primitive institutions on the new continent. Thus presented, the American Revolution was nothing but the reclamation of the Anglo-Saxon birthright of which the colonists had been deprived by 'a long train of abuses.' Nor does it appear that there was anything in this theory which surprised or shocked his contemporaries; Adams apparently did not disapprove of it, and it would be easy to bring in many similar expressions of the same idea in documents of the time."

On August 13, 1776, Jefferson wrote to Edmund Pendleton to convince him that Virginia must abolish the remnants of feudalism and return to the "ancient principles." He wrote:

"Are we not better for what we have hitherto abolished of the feudal system? Has not every restitution of the ancient Saxon laws had happy effects? Is it not better now that we return at once into that happy system of our ancestors, the wisest and most perfect ever yet devised by the wit of man, as it stood before the eighth century?"

Jefferson studied the language of the Anglo-Saxons so that he might read their laws in the original tongue. In a letter to his old tutor, George Wythe, dated November 1, 1778, Jefferson wrote that "the extracts from Anglo-Saxon law, the sources of the Common law, I wrote in the original for my own satisfaction; but I have added Latin or liberal English translations."

Congress did not immediately adopt any official seal, and as time went by other committees were appointed. Eventually, Congress adopted a simpler seal. It consisted of an American eagle on one side and an unfinished pyramid of thirteen steps on the other (representing the thirteen original colonies).

The pyramid insignia was copied from the fifty-dollar bill of the Continental currency used during the Revolutionary War. At the bottom of the pyramid were enscribed the Roman numerals for 1776, and the popular all-seeing eye of the Creator was implanted over the pyramid, symbolizing the providential power which the Founders felt had continually interceded in behalf of the cause of freedom during the War for Independence.

There were also two classical Latin mottos enscribed on the seal. One was Annuit Coeptis - He (God) hath favored our undertaking. The other was Novus Ordo Seclorum - the New Order of the Ages, or the Beginning of a New Era.

The ideas expressed in the Declaration of Independence and the Great Seal of America are more than just words - they are powerful truths. The Founders recognized that these ideas would one day change the world. Today we see these truths taking hold in former communist bloc countries as nation after nation has thrown off the yoke of tyranny. The whole world is looking to America as the architect of government founded on these great ideas. Since we have this great opportunity for leadership, we ought to hope and pray for a renaissance of these ideas first and foremost among ourselves.

Who was Thomas Jefferson?

Thomas Jefferson has been a character of interest lately, with President Bill Clinton often alluding to the third president of the United States as his role model. In October, The Forerunner, ran Cleon Skousen's article which documented some of the biblical principles which influenced young Thomas Jefferson's philosophy.

As I peruse the pages of this paper each month and am led through the history of this illustrious nation, I find myself asking the same question each time: "Where is the mention of slaves and the intensities of slavery brought upon the minds of our country's founders?" My silence is broken today, in similarity to the voice of that fiery abolitionist, William Lloyd Garrison.

When the October issue of The Forerunner mentioned Thomas Jefferson in only flattering terms, I quickly took objection.

It has been documented numerous times that great American leaders, such as George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, gained their beautifully architected plantations as well as regional prominence in society at the hands and backs of the slaves they repressed on their many properties. In fact, Thomas Jefferson is presently pointed in today's history classes as a model of contradiction - on the one hand demanding the rights of man, on the other enslaving innocent humans in his obvious white supremacy. Even in letters to his intellectual associates in Europe, Jefferson reveals his sentiments by referring to blacks as lazy, slow, unable to reason, lacking in imagination and even spoke against their "unsightly appearance."

Owning over 200 slaves, Thomas Jefferson never freed one of them - even upon his death - sighting legal reasons.

Furthermore, let us never so adore the constitution of the United States as to believe that "the language in the Constitution and the framers' concept of natural law could be construed as condemning it (slavery)," as Ron Auvil states in his article "The elections of 1856 and 1992." This is simply not true. This very document impugns itself by regarding slaves as three-fifths of one person for the purpose of apportioning taxes and representatives. The constitution also forbids congress to prohibit importation "of such persons as the several states shall think proper to admit."

The constitution serves as a written testament to the pro-slavery sentiment the conventioners were willing to adopt for a nation's founding, albeit a faulted founding.

Let not this paper serve the opponents of orthodox Christianity as testament against us by ignoring the racism their forefathers placed upon our shoulders, thus encouraging us to ignore our own sins.

Jerry D. Jones
Cleveland, Ohio

Response from The Forerunner:

So be it. Racism is a problem that has perplexed the human race since it began. The only answer to this problem is found in Christianity. This fact is attested to by the Christian faith of abolitionists such as William Wilberforce, William Lloyd Garrison, Frederick Douglass, Lyman Beecher and many other brave men and women who voiced their discontent rather than be silenced by the prevailing views of their peers.

Thomas Jefferson is to be included in this group. While it is true that Jefferson is portrayed in modern history classes as a white supremacist, a deist and a racist, this is, in fact, historical revisionism at its worst. Modern students of history ought to ignore their secular education and go straight to the facts. Students of a historical figure ought to research the character by reading the words of that man or woman themselves, not of secondary sources, as these often reflect the researcher's bias on a particular issue.

Whenever The Forerunner highlights the character of a man or woman who has contributed to our nation's Christian heritage, we are never implying that the person was without fault. We are neither attempting to prove that America is the best nation on earth; nor that our founding fathers were better than those of other nations. We are merely trying to unearth America's Christian heritage which has been obscured by modern history textbooks.

What do modern educators have to gain by distorting the true character of Thomas Jefferson? If we read the words of Jefferson himself, we find that he was silenced even in his own day. At the time of the drafting of the Declaration of Independence, Jefferson revealed his frustration with the other American delegates for ratifying a document that, in his mind, should have been passed without debate. He also records that his clause condemning slavery was censured by the committee:

"The clause too, reprobating the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa, was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it. Our northern brethren also, I believe, felt a little tender under those censures; for though their people had very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others."¹

Jefferson's anti-slavery clause originally appeared under the list of grievances to the king of Great Britain: "He has waged cruel wars against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the CHRISTIAN king of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain this execrable commerce."

In further research, we were unable to find Jefferson's negative references to blacks. We found instead numerous quotes that tend to support the opposite view: "That all men are created equal." To Jefferson, inferiority was something imposed on a people; it is only tyranny or the enslaving of a race or gender that brings repression.

For instance, on the subject of the treatment of Native American women by their men, Jefferson wrote: "The women are submitted to unjust drudgery. This is the case with every barbarous people. With such, force is law. The stronger sex therefore imposes on the weaker. It is civilization alone which places women in the enjoyment of their natural equality."²

Jefferson believed that if civilization were allowed to run its natural course, all races would achieve equality: "Before we condemn the Indians of this continent as wanting genius, we must consider that letters have not yet been introduced among them. Were we to compare them in their present state with the Europeans North of the Alps, when the Roman arms and arts first crossed those mountains, the comparison would be unequal ... How many good poets, how many able mathematicians, how many great inventors in arts or sciences had Europe North of the Alps then produced? And it was sixteen centuries after this before a Newton could be formed."³

It is true that Jefferson remained an agrarian aristocrat all his life and that his estate owned slaves, but he was a man ahead of his time. He always believed that if the citizens of our country were enlightened, that people of all races, male and female, would be entrusted with the blessings of liberty without hindrance by the federal government.

The Fire That Was Kindled in Bohemia

From The Story of Liberty
By Charles Carleton Coffin

PROFESSOR FAULFASH OF BOHEMIA, a young man who had studied at Hiedleberg, Cologne and Paris, came to England with Princess Anne, the daughter of the King of Bohemia, when she became the wife of the Prince of Wales, Richard II.

There Faulfash listens with great pleasure to Doctor John Wicklif, an eloquent young preacher, and, when he goes back to Bohemia, carries with him some of the books which Doctor Wicklif has written.

Faulfash is a lecturer at the University at Prague. He wants a reformation in the Church. He preaches that all men and women, priests and bishops - all must lead pure lives. He believes that men and women should confess their sins to God, and not to a priest; that forgiveness for sin means something more than kneeling before a confessor's box, and having a few drops of holy-water sprinkled on the head, from a sponge tied upon the end of a rod, in the hands of the priest. He does not believe that sins can be forgiven, nor that blessings can be conferred by any such mummary.

The priests denounce his preaching as blasphemous. "Professor Faulfash is a heretic," they say.

It is one word - more terrible than all others - but the professor is not disturbed by it. Instead of becoming silent, he grows more bold.

One of the priests who cry out against him is the queen's confessor, a man - John Huss - who undertakes to prove that such doctrines are heretical. He does not succeed very well, for as he studies the question he discovers that the monks and friars are leading shameful lives. More than that, he begins to read Doctor Wicklif's books and the more he reads, the more he sees that professor Faulfash and Doctor Wicklif are in the right, and himself, the monks and friars, the bishop and the Pope, in the wrong. He sees that the people ought to be permitted to read the Bible. He preaches as he thinks. He is eloquent, learned, sincere, and earnest, and people flock in crowds to hear him. The monks and the friars hasten to Archbishop Sbinco with a woeful story - that the queen's confessor is a heretic.

The archbishop determines that the young priest, although he is confessor to the empress, shall be disciplined; but the king protects him, and appoints him elector of the University of Prague.

The archbishop, in great wrath at being thus interfered with, sends word to the Pope at Rome, for these are the days when the church has two heads - one at Rome, one at Avignon.

It is not easy to stop John Huss, however, for the king is his friend, and cares not for priest or Pope. The archbishop contents himself with gathering up all the books of Doctor Wicklif that he can lay his hands upon which have been translated into the Bohemian language - all that Professor Faulfash and John Huss have written - and burning them. If the books are burned, that will stop the spread of heresy, the archbishop imagines.

Sigismund is the Emperor of Germany. He wants a council of the cardinals and other prelates of the church called to see if the church cannot be united under one Pope. The two heads are tearing each other fearfully.

The popes have stirred up wars, and armies are marching, and battles are fought, for no one knows what. The Emperor of Germany desires a settlement of the troubles, and through his influence a great council of assemblies in the old city of Constance, in Switzerland, where all questions of dispute are to be discussed.

During these months while the council is in session, one man who came to attend it, instead of taking part in the deliberations, is in prison - John Huss. He came of his own free-will - Because the emperor wished him to attend. He might have stayed away, but the emperor sent him a paper promising him protection - that he should be at liberty to come and go without molestation - that no harm should come to him while in Constance, and yet he is in prison. How happened it, when he had the emperor's promise written out on a parchment?

Because the Pope claims to be superior to the emperor. "He has the right of deposing emperors." If he has the right of deposing emperors, then he has the right to disregard the promise the emperor made to John Huss. No faith is to be kept with heretics. So finding John Huss in their power, the Pope and the cardinals have thrust him into a dungeon, and now he is to pay the penalty for being a heretic.

It is July 6th, 1415. All Constance is astir. The people from the country flock into the town, for the heretic is to be roasted to death, and they must be early on the ground to see the procession which will escort the fellow from the prison to the cathedral. It comes, the cross-bearer at the head, carrying the gilded crucifix. Then comes the Bishop of Riga in his gorgeous robes; then a company of soldiers armed with swords and lances, guarding the heretic, so that he shall not escape. The streets are thronged with people. The women look down from the quaint old windows to catch a glimpse of the wicked man as they suppose him to be.

It is not to the emperor that all the eyes are turned today, but to John Huss who ascends the platform, and mounts a table, where all can see him. He does not return the gaze, kneels, and clasps his hand and looks up to Heaven. Turning to the emperor, the bishop thus addresses him:

"It will be a just act, and it is the duty of your Imperial Majesty, most invincible Emperor, to execute this stiff-necked heretic, since he is in our hands, and thus shall your Majesty attain an immortal name, with old and young as long as the world shall stand, for performing a deed so glorious and so pleasing to God."

Then the bishop reads the charge against Huss.

"You have disobeyed the archbishop of Prague. You teach that there is a holy catholic church other than that of which the Pope is the head - a community of all the faithful ordained of God to eternal life which heretical."

"I do not doubt," Huss replies, "that there is a holy Christian church which is a community of the elect, both in this world in the other world."

"Hold your tongue! After we get through, you may answer," says Cardinal Von Cammerach.

"I shall not remember all the charges."

"Silence!" The Archbishop of Florence shouts.

John Huss drops upon his knees, and lifts his hands toward Heaven. If they will not hear him there is one who will. "O God I commend my cause to thee." The reading goes on.

"He has taught that after the words of consecration have been pronounced over the bread it is still natural bread, which is heretical."

"I have not so preached."

"Silence, heretic!"

"He has taught that a priest polluted with deadly sins cannot administer the sacrament of the altar, which is heretical."

"I still say that every act of a priest laden with deadly sins is a abomination in the sight of God."

Ah! that is a home thrust. Bishops, archbishops, cardinals, and priests, who are living with women to whom they have not been married, never will forgive the heretic for saying that.

The last charge is read: "He has contemned the Pope's excommunication."

"I have not. I appealed to him - sent messengers to plead my cause before him, who were thrown into prison. I came to this council of my own free will, with a guarantee of safe conduct from the emperor."

John Huss turns toward Sigismund, and gazes calmly and steadily upon him. "I came in full confidence that no violence should be done to me, that I might prove my innocence."

The Emperor grows red in the face, for he knows that John Huss came of his own free-will. He knows that the safe conduct which he gave has been taken away from him. He knows that ten thousand swords would leap from their scabbards, and a thousand spears would gleam in the sunlight in Bohemia, to protect the man who is gazing so calmly in his face. With shame and confusion he sits there with eyes downcast eyes. Everybody can see the reddening in his cheeks. Huss has had no trial; but an old bishop stands up to read his sentence. He is to be burned to death.

They place a paper cap on his head - a mock crown - with figures of devils upon it, and this inscription: "THIS IS A HERETIC."

"Give him over to the beadle." The emperor speaks the words, which one day will come back to trouble him. Sooner or later retribution follows crime. It may not be today or tomorrow, but it will come; and this emperor, the greatest potentate in Europe, will see his empire drenched in blood, towns and cities in flames, and the land a desolation, for uttering those words.

Out from the hall moves the procession once more. Out through the door stream the people. A fire is burning in the street, and the priests are heaping upon it books written by Huss and Doctor Wicklif.

Huss smiles when he sees the parchment volumes curling in the flames. They can burn books, but truth and liberty will still live. He walks with firm and steady steps. None of all the thousands around are so happy as he. The bishops are astonished.

"He goes as if on his way to a banquet," says Bishop Silvius.

Through the streets, where the people throng the sidewalks and look down from the windows of the loft buildings, moves the procession - out to the place where he is to be burned. What is Huss saying?

"I will extol thee, O Lord; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me." It is the thirtieth Psalm. They can burn his body, but what of that? His body is not him.

"Do not believe," he says to the people, "that I have taught anything but the truth."

No trembling of the lips - no whitening of his cheeks. He is going to testify to the truth. Why should he fear? Truth and liberty are eternal, and will live when emperor and pope have passed away. Truth makes men free, and it will be glorious to die for freedom. The fagots are piled around him - bundles of dry sticks. The executioner stands with his torch.

"Renounce your error," shouts the Duke of Bavaria.

"I have taught no error. The truths I have I taught will seal with my blood."

"Burn him."

The executioner holds his torch to the fagots. What is it that the people hear coming from that sheet of flame?

"Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

It is the song which the angels sung above the pastures of above the pastures of Bethlehem. And this:

"We praise thee, we bless thee, we worship thee, we give thanks to thee for thy great glory." It is Gloria in Excelsis.

The smoke blinds him, the flames are circling above his head. Yet the voice goes on:

"Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on me."

The flames wrap him round, his head falls on his breast. The fire does its work, and a heap of ashes is all that remains. The executioner gathers them up, and casts them into the river. The winds and waves bear them away. The particles sink to the bottom or are wafted on to the great falls at Schaffhausen, where the water foams over the granite ledges, and from thence are borne down the Rhine to the sea, as Wicklif's dust was borne on the current of the Avon and Severn to the ocean.

The priests and bishops and Pope have got rid of John Huss. Have they? By no means. It is only the beginning of their troubles with him, for the people of Bohemia resent his death. It is the beginning of a terrible war, which lasts many years, and drenches the land with blood.

The cardinals and archbishops do not forget that the man whom they have burned through reading Doctor Wicklif's books. The doctor has been dead a long while, so they cannot burn him, but it will be some satisfaction to let the world know what they would do to the doctor if he were only in the flesh, and they issue an order to dig up the bones and burn them.

Though the monks have burned John Huss and the bones of Doctor Wicklif, they have not put a stop to their preaching. Do words spoken in behalf of truth, justice, and liberty ever die?

America's Chrisitan Rulers: John Quincy Adams

John Quincy Adams was born in Braintree, now Quincy, Massachusetts, the son of John Adams, the second President of the United States. On March 4th 1825, he was inaugurated as President and served one term. His inaugural address closed with these words:

"Knowing that 'except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain,' with fervent supplications for His favor, to His overruling providence I commit, with humble, but fearless confidence, my own fate, and the future destinies of my country."

Known as a great orator, he was a popular speaker in many places. He owed his influence, not to his manner, presence or pleasing tones, but to the fact that what he said was worth hearing. When it was feared that Christian influence was waning in New England, he prepared a lecture on Truth, which he delivered in many places. The premise was: "A man to be a Christian must believe in God, in the Bible, in the Divinity of the Savior's mission, and in a future state of rewards and punishments."

Adams wrote a series of letters to his son on "The Bible and its Teachings" which were published in the New York Tribune, in which he stated: "I have myself for many years made it a practice to read through the Bible once every year. I have always endeavored to read it with the same spirit and temper of mind which I now recommend to you; that is, with the intention and desire that it contribute to my advancement in wisdom and virtue ... My custom is, to read four or five chapters every morning, immediately after rising from my bed. It employs about an hour of my time, and seems to me the most suitable manner of beginning the day."

John Quincy Adams was the only President to have ever been elected to serve as a congressman after his term as President was completed. In being nominated for this position he said: "Not in my opinion would an ex-President of the United States be degraded by serving as a selectman of his town, if elevated thereto by the people."

During his time of service as a Representative from Massachusetts he presented petitions for the abolition of slavery to Congress. On another occasion, he presented a petition against the annexation of Texas as a slave state, which was signed by several women. When these women were rebuked by Representative Howard from Maryland for turning from their domestic duties, Adams countered:

"Are women to have no opinions or actions on subjects relating to the general welfare? Where did the gentleman get this principle? Did he find it in the sacred history (the Bible) - in the language of Miriam the prophetess, in one of the noblest and most sublime songs of triumph that ever met the human eye or ear? Did the gentleman never hear of Deborah, to whom the children of Israel came up for judgment? Has he forgotten the deed of Jael, who slew the dreaded enemy of her country? Has he forgotten Esther, who by her petition saved her people and her country?"

John Quincy Adams died in the Speaker's room in Washington on February 23, 1848, while serving his last term as Representative. His last words were: "This is the last of earth. I am content."

The Man Who Preached After He Was Dead

from The Story of Liberty
By Charles Carleton Coffin

DOCTOR JOHN WICKLIF has been dead these forty years, and his bones have been lying the while in Lutterworth Church-yard; but it has been decreed by the great Council of Constance that they shall lie there no longer. A party of monks, with pick and spade, have dug them up, and now they kindle a fire, burn them to powder, and shovel the ashes into a brook which sweeps past the church-yard; and the brook bears them on to the Avon, which, after winding through Stratford meadows, falls into the Severn, and the Severn bears them to the sea.

But why are the monks so intent upon annihilating the doctor's bones? Because the doctor, who was a preacher, though he has been dead so long, still continues to preach! The monks will have no more of it; and they think that by getting rid of his bones they will put an end to his preaching. They forget that there are some things which the fire will not burn - such as truth, liberty, justice. Little do they think that the doctor will keep on preaching; that his parish will be the world, his followers citizens of every land; that his preaching will bring about a new order of things in human affairs; that thrones will be overturned; that sovereigns will become subjects, and subjects sovereigns.

A century has passed since the Magna Charta was obtained, but not much liberty has come from that document yet. The people are still villains. The kings and the barons plunder them; the monks, friars, bishops, and archbishops - a swarm of men live upon them. They must pay taxes to the king, to the barons, and to the priests; and they have no voice in saying what or how much the taxes will be. They are ignorant. They have no books. Not one man in a thousand can read.

The priests, however, are not all of them wicked. There are some who, instead of spending their time in ale-houses, or in plundering their parishioners, look kindly after their welfare. Some are learned men, educated at Oxford or Cambridge, who exhort the people to lead honest lives. The man whose bones the monks are burning was a good priest, a learned man. We may think of him as attending school, when a boy, at Oxford, graduating from one of the colleges; and, after graduating he studies theology, and become a priest, and preaches in the Oxford churches. He is so learned and eloquent that the people come in crowds to hear him.

Sometimes he preaches in London, at the preaching-place erected in the streets. He has great crowds to hear him on Sunday, and works hard through the weeks, translating a book from Latin into the English language - the Bible. The only Bibles in England are in the libraries of Oxford, Cambridge, abbeys and monasteries, and in some of the churches. They are all in Latin and Hebrew, written on parchment. Scarcely one person in ten thousand has ever read a Bible. Doctor Wicklif believes that the people have a right to read it although the Pope has forbidden its reading by any except the priests, monks, and bishops, and other prelates of the church.

But into what dialect shall he translate it? - for there is no uniform language in England. In the Eastern countries - the East Midland section, as it is called, where the Saxons first landed and obtained a foothold - the language is almost wholly Saxon; in the Southern counties - all along the South shore, where the Normans landed- the language is largely Norman.

Doctor Wicklif selects the East Midland - his own native dialect - which is spoken by a majority of the people; besides it is strong, vigorous and expressive. Many other preachers believe that the people have a right to read the Bible, and clerks are set to work making copies of the translation, which are placed on desks in the churches, and chained, so that no one can take them away.

The people listen to the reading with wonder and delight. They begin to think; and when men begin to think, they take a step toward freedom. They see that the Bible gives them rights which hitherto have been denied them - the right to read, to acquire knowledge. Schools are started. Men and women, who until now know not one letter of the alphabet, learn to read: children teach their parents. It is the beginning of a new life - a new order of things in the community - the beginning of liberty.

When Doctor Wicklif selected the Midland dialect for his translation of the Bible, he little knew that he was laying the foundations, as it were, of the strongest and most vigorous language ever used by human beings for the expression of their thoughts; but it has become the English language - the one aggressive language of the world - the language of Liberty.

It was in 1385 that Doctor Wicklif died. The grass grows over his grave. Forty-one years pass, pilgrims come from afar to visit the spot where he is buried; they break off pieces of his tombstone, and carry them away as relics. The monks and friars will have no more of that. They will not have a man who has been dead nearly a century keep on preaching if they can prevent it, for the doctor has a great following; half of England, and nearly all of Bohemia, have accepted his teachings.

The Great Council of Constance has ordered that the doctor's bones be dug up and burned; and the monks, as we have seen, execute the order. They cast the ashes into the river, and the river bears them to the sea. They have got rid of doctor Wicklif. Have they? Not quite.

America's Christian Rulers: John Winthrop

Long before becoming the governor of Massachusetts, John Winthrop had a deep understanding of God's divine purposes for the colony. "We shall be a city set on a hill," he said of Boston - where the church was the center of life during those early years of the city's history.

While en route to the New World on board the Arbella, Winthrop wrote a sermon entitled "A Model of Christian Charity," in which he outlined the purposes of God for New England. He described a harmonious Christian community whose laws and government would logically proceed from a godly and purposeful arrangement.

John Winthrop recognized the plans and purposes that Jesus Christ had for our nation. "A New Order of the Ages" was to be set up in which the individual was free to act and choose according to his free will; yet be dedicated to a lawful social order.

But Winthrop also gave a warning: "The eyes of all people are upon us, so that if we deal falsely with our God in this work we have undertaken, and so cause us to withdraw His present help from us, we shall be made a story and a byword through the world."

These and many other ideas are contained in "A Model of Christian Charity" a sermon which Winthrop delivered somewhere in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean on the Arbella. He set out clearly the revealed purposes of God and warned that the success or failure of their endeavors would depend on their dedication to the ideal of selfless community.

History shows us that this ideal was never realized. However, Winthrop himself was a man of unquestionable integrity and deep humanity. He laid the foundation for generations yet to come. God Himself will shortly raise up a new generation of young people who will be transformed by the power of the Holy Spirit.

During the past three years, Americans were made aware of the sexual and financial misdealings of two prominent television evangelists. These scandals were covered in depth by the national news media. ABC's Nightline featured a special panel of ministers called together by Ted Koppel to discuss reconciliation in the Body of Christ. Unknown to the panelists, however, the program was to be entitled "The Billion Dollar Pie."

In the wake of these scandals, a construction worker was heard to say, "If Jesus Christ was alive today, He'd drive out all these guys with a whip, just like He did to those money changers in the temple." Although this man did not profess to be a born-again Christian, his analysis was partially accurate. Jesus Christ is alive today, and He is shaking and purging His house!

In 1987, the Lord revealed His sovereign power by exposing ministries which were involved in hidden sin. The Bakker and Swaggart ordeal only scratched the surface of a Church rife with immorality and greed. One denomination reported that year that it had more cases of church discipline involving ministers in sexual immorality than ever before. It became clear that the Lord was purging self-promotion, lust, and greed from the Church.

Outside the churches, the perception gained through the news media was one of sudden devastation. But as far back as 1983, God had been warning about coming judgments in the Church. One of these warnings was given by David Minor in the mid-1980s:

"The Spirit of God would say to you that the wind of the Holy Spirit is blowing through the land. The Church, however, is incapable of fully recognizing this Wind. Just as your nation has given names to its hurricanes, so I have put My Name on this Wind. This Wind shall be named HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD. For this Wind has been sent to blow through every institution that has been raised in My Name.

"In those institutions that have substituted their name for Mine, they shall fall by the impact of My Wind. Those institutions shall fall like cardboard shacks in a gale. Ministries that have not walked in uprightness before Me shall be broken and fall. For this reason, man will be tempted to brand this as a work of Satan, but do not be misled. This is my Wind. I cannot tolerate My Church in its present form, nor will I tolerate it."

God's mandate for the Church in the '80s was drastic and succinct in view of coming judgment. There was a strong call to repentance directed to all Christian leaders: "Take some time off to let God search your heart - Get a revelation of Who Jesus Christ really is - After you can truly say that you know Him, you may bring your ministry back in a new and refined form."

Jim Bakker had been repeatedly approached by ministers within his denomination about issues concerning his personal conduct, and improprieties within the PTL ministry. But Bakker had refused to submit to their counsel. Jimmy Swaggart's good friend, David Wilkerson, had approached the televangelist prior to his downfall, saying he believed God was about to close down his ministry. Several years before, Wilkerson himself had closed his internationally-known ministry in New York City in order to withdraw and seek fresh direction from God. Wilkerson has repeatedly admonished ministers, "The one-man shows are over. The people won't have it."

Paul Cain, a minister who was prominent in the Healing Revival of the 1940s and 50s, recently reappeared in a public ministry role. Cain says many of the problems that plague the public ministries of today - pride, lust, greed, competition, and jealousy - also riddled the ministries of preachers during that earlier period. Cain was so grieved by the state of the Church during that time that he withdrew from public ministry for over 25 years.

Men such as Paul Cain are beginning to proclaim a new message for the Church which emphasizes humility, servanthood, and modest living ... rather than the extravagance and arrogance which characterized so much of Christian ministry in the 1980s.

Many other emerging leaders in the Church are predicting a wave of healing and restoration in the Church in the 1990s which will bring significant awakening. This "second wind" was also a part of David Minor's prophecy:

"Be not dismayed. For after this, My wind shall blow again. This wind will blow in equal force as the first wind. This wind too will have a name. It shall be called THE KINGDOM OF GOD. The world will laugh at you because of the devastation of the first wind, but they will laugh no more. For this wind will come with force and power that will produce the miraculous among my people and the fear of God shall fall upon the nation.

"Know this also: there will be those who shall seek to hide from this present wind. But again, they will be blown away by it. Only those who have turned their faces into the present wind shall be allowed to be propelled by the second wind. You have longed for revival and a return of the miraculous and supernatural. You and your generation shall see it, but it shall only come by My process, says the Lord.

"The Church of this nation cannot contain My power in its present form. But as it turns to the wind of the holiness of God, it shall be purged and changed to contain My glory. This is judgment that has begun in the house of God, but it is not the end. When the second wind has come and brought in My harvest, then the end shall come."

Life of the Apostle Paul

On the last day of the journey of the caravan, Mount Hermon was dropping behind. Its peaks, still under snow, rose from brown foothills white with wild flowers, but the mountain no longer looked particularly high because they were too close under it to see the summit, and the Damascus plain itself is over 2,000 feet. Far ahead, below a bare craggy hill, lay the green of the oasis, encouraging them to plod on to journey's end rather than stop, as on other days, before noon.

Paul and his party walked, while one man led their donkeys roped together a little way to the rear. The road had emptied of country people making for market. Now and again they saw sheep or goats guarded by a small boy swinging his sling, behind a rough plow, guiding his ox by a long goad or wand tipped with iron.

The sky was clear blue. Paul's memory is emphatic that there was no thunderstorm or violent wind, as some suggest who seek a natural explanation for what happened. He was not near a nervous breakdown or about to suffer an epileptic fit; not even especially in a hurry.

"Suddenly about midday a great light flashed from the sky all around me ... a light more brilliant than the sun, shining all around me and my traveling companions."

Paul and the other travelers all fell to the ground. They were appalled by this phenomenon, not just a flash but light, terrifying and inexplicable. The companions seem to have stumbled to their feet. Paul remained prostrate. For him only, the light grew in intensity. He heard a voice, at once calm and authoritative, say in Aramaic: "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute Me?"

He looked up. Within the center of the light which blinded him from his surroundings he faced a man of about his own age. Paul could not believe what he heard or saw. All his convictions, intellect and training, his reputation, his self-respect, demanded that Jesus should not be alive again. He played for time and replied, "Who are You, Lord?" He used a mode of address which might simply mean "Your honor."

"I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting. It is hard for you to kick against the goad."

Then Paul knew. In a second that seemed an eternity he saw the wounds in Jesus' hands and feet, saw the face and knew that he had seen the Lord, that He was alive, as Stephen and the others had said, and that He loved not only those whom Paul had persecuted but Paul: "It is hard for you to kick against the goad." Not one word of reproach.

Paul had never admitted to himself that he had felt pricks of a goad as he raged against Stephen and his disciples. But now, instantaneously, he was shatteringly aware that he had been fighting Jesus. And fighting himself, his conscience, his powerlessness, the darkness and chaos in his soul. God hovered over this chaos and brought him, to the moment of new creation. It wanted only his "Yes."

Paul broke.

He was trembling and in no state to weigh the pros and cons of changing sides. He only knew that he had heard a voice and had seen the Lord, and that nothing mattered but to find and obey His will.

"What shall I do Lord?"

He used the same ascription as before, but all the obedience and worship and love in heaven and earth went into that one word, "Lord." At that moment he knew he was utterly forgiven, utterly loved. In his own words: God who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' has shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

"Rise to your feet," he heard, "and stand upright and go into Damascus, and you will be told there what you are to do." He had trusted. Now he had to obey - a humbling and almost trivial first order.

When at last he stood, he was blind. He put out his hand and groped until his companions, who had been frightened even more by hearing Paul answer the inaudible, began to lead him. The riding and baggage animals had caught up and the little caravan walked toward Damascus in awed silence.

Paul moved blindly into the unknown, yet he was not in darkness but in light: "I could not see because of the brightness of that light." Though blue sky and the road's yellow dust and the green of the nearing oasis were all snuffed out, they were not missed. Light suffused his blinded eyes, his mind. And as he walked, obeying that first command from his new Master, he made the first great discovery: Jesus remained beside him, not in the form of a crucified, risen body, someone invisible yet there.

They passed the stench of the caravanserai, quiet still in the early afternoon, and went under the city gate into the broad, colonnaded Via Recta, the Street called Straight, which bisected the city. This too was comparatively still, for the shops and booths had not opened after the midday sleep, and private homes were shuttered against the sun. They reached the house of a Damascene named Judas, probably a substantial Jewish merchant, a suitable host for a representative of the Sanhedrin: the synagogue elders must have been expecting Paul, for even the Nazarenes knew he was on his way to persecute. Both sides lost sight of him. the escort delivered him and disappeared. He made no request of Judas but to be taken to the guest chamber - refusing even a meal - and left alone.

Time became meaningless. Paul heard the evening trumpet, next morning's cockcrow, the rumble of carts on the paving, shopkeepers shouting their wares, the distant murmur of bargainers, and the occasional bray of an ass. Then the stillness of midday. Paul lay on his bed, wide awake except for an hour or two of sleep, or knelt long at the bedside and then lay down again. He did not want human company, only to be alone with the Lord Jesus, as he now called Him. He soon forgot hunger and thirst His entire personality was in mutation. He was being turned inside out as he let Jesus light the recesses of his soul.

"Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" He could only reply now in the words of David's Psalm: "Have mercy on me, O God, according to Thy loving-kindness: according to the multitude of Thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions ... Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned."

He had imagined he served God. He supposed himself climbing into God's favor. He had set up his standards of goodness and compared himself with others and seen that he was good. But now, in contrast with Jesus, whose Spirit had invaded him, he knew his purity was a counterfeit of the inexpressibly Pure, the good deeds a parody of Goodness. He had been mentally and spiritually hostile to God, though honoring Him by mouth; he had been busy with evil, though punctilious in religious rites; he had been altogether estranged, fit for nothing but to crawl away as far as he could from the blinding light that was God.

Yet Jesus had grasped hold of him. Paul would afterward cite this as one of the cast-iron proofs of the Resurrection, however much men might scoff or call him a liar. God, incredibly, had raised the shattered body of Jesus from the grave so that He was alive and had confronted Paul, not to crush and destroy, not to revenge the blood of the persecuted but to rescue the persecutor and overwhelm him with love and forgiveness.

Paul knew from the bottom of his heart that Jesus was the Messiah, the Christ, the Savior of the world. This was not a conclusion of cold logic, though that must come. It went beyond intellect. He knew, because he knew Jesus.

And in knowing Jesus, he understood what had happened at the cross.

Paul in his pride and wisdom had rejected Jesus because no man could be hanged on a tree unless cursed. As he now faced his sin, he saw by irresistible intuition that Jesus indeed had carried a curse on the cross, but not His own; it was Paul's and everyman's.

Each hour that passed in blindness at the house of Judas, each day for the rest of his life would unfold a little more of the breadth and length and height and depth, but the heart of the Good news was sure, now and forever: the love of Christ, "the Son of God who loved me and gave Himself for me." Paul could instantly be treated as a man who had never sinned, be welcomed with love and trust.

The more he looked with blinded eyes at the light, the more distinct grew the fact disclosed in that instant of time on the Damascus Road: forgiveness was Christ Himself. It could not be earned; no human merit could outweigh human sin; but in having Christ, Paul had all.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

By Charles Coffin

The Christian character of President Lincoln is an American enigma. A lifelong non-churchgoer, Lincoln has been the subject of numerous speculations concerning his faith. He was more intensely spiritual than almost any other American President, yet the confusion about the genuineness of Lincoln's Christianity arises from the ambiguities of his early life. Charles Carleton Coffin, a Civil War correspondent and author of eight American history novels, published his final novel on Lincoln in 1892. Coffin provides us with a definitive answer on Lincoln's faith. An early spiritual crisis in 1841 marked a turning point in Lincoln's life:

Much has been written concerning him, and doubtless much more will be written. My acquaintance with him began in his Springfield home following his nomination for the Presidency. It was such an acquaintance as a correspondent of a leading journal was privileged to have with public men. I saw him frequently during his Presidential term, met him socially on several occasions, and walked with him through the burning streets of Richmond. In preparing this work, I have visited the scenes of his early years. From playmates of his childhood, and from those who knew him in later years I have obtained this information which may be accepted as authentic.¹

The marriage of Abraham Lincoln and Mary Todd would be a notable event. There was much preparation in the hospitable mansion of Ninian Edwards. The guests assemble; the feast is prepared; all are waiting. The evening wanes. He does not come. The guests take their departure; the lights are extinguished; the wedding feast is not eaten. Mary Todd is in her chamber, overwhelmed with mortification. Joshua Speed searches for the delinquent groom, and finds him pale, haggard, and in the deepest melancholy.² Heart-rending is the letter which he sent to his friend, Mr. Stuart:

"I am the most miserable man living. If what I feel were equally distributed to the whole human family, there would not be a cheerful face on earth. Whether I shall ever be better I cannot tell; I awfully forbode I shall not. To remain as I am is impossible. I must die or be better."³

Unmindful of what was going on around him, silent, pale, his mind tempest tossed, Mr. Lincoln was sinking into distressful melancholy. It was very kind of Joshua F. Speed, who had closed his business in Springfield, and who was going to Kentucky, to take Mr. Lincoln with him to his former home just out from Louisville.⁴ There was tenderness in the sympathetic welcome given him by the mother of Mr. Speed, a great-hearted Christian woman.

To men who think for themselves, no matter what may have been their previous religious belief, there not unfrequently comes a period of doubting. Such a period came to Abraham Lincoln. He had not forgotten his mother's teachings. He could repeat much of the Bible, but he was not moved by emotional appeals. When his first love Ann Rutledge died, and his soul was wrung with grief, no one had talked to him of divine love and eternal goodness. So far as he could see, his own life had been a failure. Hopes had not been realized, desires not gratified. He had accomplished nothing.

He is out in the desert - hungry, thirsty, weary, depressed in spirit - no star to guide him. But as angels of God came to the carpenter's Son of Nazareth, so came Joshua Speed and Lucy Gilman Speed to him.

He finds himself in a hospitable home. Flowers are blooming around it; balmy breezes sweep through the halls. He breathes an atmosphere of restful peace. A saintly woman sits by his side, opens the New Testament, and reads the words of One who Himself had been in the wilderness. She talks of God as a father, Jesus Christ as a Brother. New truths dawn upon him, and the Bible becomes a different book from what it has been in the past. Little does Lucy Gilman Speed know that God has crowned her with glory and honor, to be a ministering spirit in leading a bewildered wanderer out of the desert of despair and unbelief, that he may do great things for his fellow-men. Weeks go by, the gloom and anguish disappear. The period of doubt has gone, never to return. From that hour the Bible is to be his rule of life and duty.

His biographers - those who knew him later in life - have this to say of him: "The late but splendid maturity of Lincoln's mind and character dates from this time; and although he grew in strength and knowledge to the end, from this year we observe a steadiness and sobriety of thought and purpose discernible in his life."⁵

This estimate does not include the service rendered by Lucy Gilman Speed. When the great account is made up, and the angels of God come from the harvest fields to lay their sheaves at the feet of the Master, hers will be the changed life of Abraham Lincoln.

As this biography of Lincoln unfolds, there will be seen, as the years go by and the responsibilities of life roll upon him, a reverent recognition of Divine Providence, an increasing faith and childlike trust in God.⁶

The Mighty Scourge of War: Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address

By Stephen B. Oates

On the morning of March 4, 1865, heavy clouds moved over Washington, ranking the capital with tails of rain. At noon Lincoln made the traditional carriage ride up Pennsylvania Avenue, teeming with bands and spectators and clattering cavalry.

Ahead the new iron dome of the Capitol, crowned with a statue of liberty, moved against a somber sky. The inaugural platform stretched out from the east front of the Capitol; here Lincoln took his place, as clouds scudded across Washington's horizon, rolling and turning in the wind. Below him, he noticed Frederick Douglass in the crowd. Behind him, on the platform and along the front of the Capitol, were various officials and spectators.

Presently Lincoln rose and stepped to the speaker's stand; as he did so the sun broke through the clouds, flooding the entire gathering with brilliant light. Then the clouds closed in again. Lincoln began reading in "ringing and somewhat shrill tones, "said Noah Brooks, which "sounded over the vast concourse."

It was a terse speech, succinct and lyrical, like his address at Gettysburg. Yet his words today blazed with religious eloquence as he reiterated what he'd told a delegation of Kentuckians in the darkening spring of 1864: in his search for the meaning of this vast struggle, he'd come to view it finally as a divine punishment for the sin of slavery, as a terrible retribution visited by God on a guilty people, in North as well as South.

When the war began four years ago, he sang out, neither side expected it to last as long or grow to such magnitude as it had. Neither side anticipated that slavery might perish in the flames, "that the cause of the conflict might cease with, or even before, the conflict itself should cease."

No, Lincoln said, "each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible, and pray to the same God; and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces; but let us judge not that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered; that of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes." And God's perhaps was to will "this terrible war" on both North and South to remove "the offence" of slavery.

"Fondly we do hope - fervently do we pray - that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue, until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said 'the judgments of the Lord, are true and righteous altogether."

And if it were God's will, the country must see this grim purgation through to its Providential conclusion, when at last both sides might be cleansed and regenerated: "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan - to do all which may achieve and cherish a just, and a lasting peace, among ourselves, and with all nations."

Lincoln turned now, took the oath from Chief Justice Salmon Chase, and kissed an open Bible. Chase noted the spot - Isaiah 5:27 and 28. "None shall be weary nor stumble among them; none shall slumber nor sleep ... Whose arrows are sharp, and all their bows are bent, their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint, and their wheels like a whirlwind."

The President bowed to the cheering assembly, and an artillery salvo exploded on the wind. Then a huge procession escorted his carriage back to the White House, bleak against the clouds. Later Lincoln encountered Noah Brooks. "Did you notice that sunburst?" the President asked. "It made my heart jump."

In a reception that evening, Lincoln stood in line in the White House, shaking hands with hundreds of well-wishers. In a moment somebody informed him that Frederick Douglass was at the front door, but that the police wouldn't let him in "because he was a negro." Douglass had come to congratulate Lincoln, contending that since black men were dying in battle for the Union, they had a right to come and shake the President's hand like any other citizen: "if the colored man would have his rights," Douglass said, "he must take them."

Lincoln had Douglass shown in at once. "Here come my friend Douglass," the President announced when Douglass entered into the room. "I am glad to see you," Lincoln told him. "I saw you in the crowd today, listening to my address." He added, "There is no man in the country whose opinion I value more than yours. I want to know what you think of it." Douglass said he was impressed: he thought it "a sacred effort."

"I am glad you liked it!" Lincoln said, and he watched as Douglass passed down the line. It was the first inaugural reception in the history of the Republic in which an American President had greeted a free black man and solicited his opinion.

The North End Story

- by Jay Rogers

"The day after I gave my life to Jesus Christ, I realized that I had just put out a contract on a man to have his legs broken, and now I had to do something to stop this from happening!"

Johnny Cammarata grew up in the North End of Boston, the city's Italian section. "Everybody was poor," Johnny remembers. "In those days, every kid did something to raise a dollar - shining shoes, selling newspapers, or selling orange crates to guys playing dice games. When you got the money you gave it to your family. Everybody did something in order to help the family survive."

In the North End of Boston, organized crime was a part of the life of the Sicilian community. Johnny, along with every other young person in the neighborhood, looked to those higher up in the Mafia organization with respect.

"We used the term 'don' for the leaders of the community," explains Johnny. "There were many figureheads in the neighborhood and they were respected. If you live in an atmosphere filled with gangsters, that's what you want to be a part of when you grow up - to have money and drive fancy cars - and have power. The respect that they had came from fear. With one word they could break your legs or even have you killed. I wanted to have that power and be feared because I grew up in that environment."

Most people are familiar with the Mafia through movies like The Godfather which was compiled from different stories about different "dons" around the country. According to Johnny Cammarata, this is an accurate picture of what the Mafia was like.

"But that's big stuff," Johnny says, "That was about the heads of the Mafia families. What we were into down here was the bottom part of the families. The word 'Mafia' describes one family. Gangsters, bank robbers, racketeers and guys who were robbing trucks were not a part of the Mafia - but at the same time there was a lot of truth in that movie."

Today most of the heads of these families are in jail. Johnny realizes that he escaped this fate by the miraculous grace of God. "They got so powerful, they got so rich, they got everything they wanted, and the rest of their life they spend in a jail," comments Johnny on some of the people who grew up in his neighborhood.

Johnny knew everybody in the North End's Mafia and was involved with bookmaking, dealing stolen goods, and many other small time rackets operating out of his barber shop on Hanover Street. One time he even received money from a man who wanted someone's legs broken. A father in the community was furious with a man who was living with his daughter and who had insulted his family. Johnny arranged to have two men from South Boston break this man's legs with a baseball bat.

It was during this time that God drastically intervened in this situation changing both Johnny's life and the life of the North End community forever.

Johnny and his friend, Tony Manupelli, had been hungry to know about God and had been meeting with a Catholic priest in Johnny's basement once a week to discuss salvation history.

"But we got nothing out of it," says Johnny. "He would talk to us and we would just sit there and listen. But we had another friend, Tony Sarni, who had moved out to the suburbs and had become a Christian. He had told us about Jesus before, but we weren't ready to make a decision. About four years later, however, he came back and what he said sounded interesting, so I invited him over for coffee that night."

The night of January 3rd, 1979, Johnny Cammarata, Tony Manupelli, their wives, and some other friends listened to Tony Sarni and his wife, Michelle, tell them about a personal relationship with Jesus.

Tony Manupelli remembers this night well, "This woman, Michelle Sarni, had such a glow in her face that we didn't know what was going to happen. When she opened her mouth she spoke - we know now - the Word of God."

"And we just sat there," adds Johnny, "with our mouths open, looking at this woman with a glow on her face telling us about Jesus. Our ears were opened for the first time. The Holy Spirit filled the room that night and we both got hit. It was unbelievable! It was our turn - it was our day to get zapped. We accepted Jesus Christ in our lives and we were changed - our whole minds, our thoughts - everything about us was like a new creation."

Michelle had told the group that they should all get Bibles and begin to read the Word of God. Having never owned a Bible before, Johnny suggested that they should get a few of the small pocket Bibles he had seen nuns carry. "That way I could read the Bible when I had nothing to do in the barber shop and when someone came in I could put it away. All the people in the North End knew what I was involved in - 'And now you're reading a Bible! - Come on! - You've flipped out! - You're crazy! - You're soft! - That guy snapped! - He hit the wall!' So I didn't want anyone to see me."

The next day, God confirmed what had happened the night before by providing Johnny with a sign. Early in the morning, as Johnny was cutting hair in his barber shop, a drunk walked in and asked, "Hey, where's Johnny?" Johnny turned around to see a bum - a Scollay Square drunk.

"I'm Johnny," he said.

This man, who looked like he'd been sleeping in the gutter, reached out his hand and said, "I've got something for you." He handed Johnny three little black Bibles like the ones he had described to Tony.

Chills came all over Johnny and he asked, "Wait a minute - did Tony send you here?"

The man said, "No," and walked out into the street muttering something about finding a drink.

Johnny had never seen this man before and he never saw him again, but this incident was beyond a mere coincidence. Johnny called Tony on the telephone and said, "Tony, I got the Bibles and you're never going to believe how I got them!"

This was just the first proof of many that showed Johnny and Tony that Jesus was alive. "We were thick-headed Sicilians," Johnny explains. "You couldn't just tell me that there was a God unless I had a personal touch. You had to show me."

After this incident, Johnny suddenly remembered a disturbing fact. Just a few days before he had paid 500 dollars to have a man's legs broken. He called Tony Sarni and told him what he had done. Tony told him, "Pray on it."

"This was the first time I had ever heard this expression - 'Pray on it,'" says Johnny. "But I prayed: 'Please God don't let this happen.'"

When Johnny called the man who paid the money and told him that he was a born-again Christian and had to stop what they were doing, the man said, "Please Johnny - just this once - I'll even double the money. I'll give you a thousand dollars!"

For about two weeks, Johnny tried desperately to stop the men he had paid. Finally, one of the men came to him saying, "Johnny, here's your 500 dollars! You don't know what's going on here!" For about two weeks these men had repeatedly tried to break this man's legs but to no avail.

The first time they waited at the man's house for him, but at the right moment a police car drove up. Another time a garbage truck came by - another time a girl walked by. There were so many interruptions that it took two weeks until they finally had a perfect opportunity. When they finally had the man cornered in an alley, the younger partner went to attack with a baseball bat, but fell to the ground crying, "My heart!" He thought he was having a heart attack!

Every time for two weeks when they had an opportunity to break this man's legs, there was a strange interruption of some kind. Johnny told the man what was happening. "I became a Christian and I've been praying for God to stop this."

Johnny gave the girl's father his money back and this time they prayed for the girl. The situation worked out well when the girl moved back home and was reconciled with her family. Her father was convinced of the reality of Jesus Christ as well and prayed with Johnny to accept Jesus as Lord.

"After this experience the Lord began to clean up my life," remembers Johnny. "But it's funny how the devil works. As soon as I got born-again, he threw everything he had at me. I started to get furs coming into my house - minks and diamonds. I had to refuse some things I could have made some serious money on. But God began to clean up my life one thing at a time. That's the way the Lord works - 'Come to me the way you are' - and he cleaned up my whole life."

In the meantime, Tony and Michelle Sarni had been testifying to their church, Natick Assembly of God, about everything that had been happening in the North End. This greatly pleased many of them since there were a group of Italians in that church who had been praying for the North End for many years. The church agreed to let Michelle go out to the North End each week to hold meetings in Johnny Cammarata's basement cellar.

She began to come out every week as they held "cellar meetings" and the group began to grow one or two people at a time. This went on for two years until the group grew to 30-40 people. They began to become known in the community as the "cellar people" and soon began to attract attention. Johnny's cellar soon became too small to hold the growing group and they had to move to another cellar. People were added and they grew to 50-60 people as Michelle taught them how to praise and worship God and taught them the Word of God.

The First Miracles

When the word got out that there was a group of Christians in the North End who prayed for the sick to be healed and believed the Bible, Johnny began to be approached by many people. "This was the first time this ever happened to me," Johnny remembers. "Formerly, I had people come into the barber shop to have legs broken and to buy hot stuff. Now I had people come in to ask for prayer!"

A Catholic priest named Father Robert sent a man into Johnny's barber shop to ask the cellar group to pray for his wife who was about to have an operation to remove a cancerous tumor. Soon after they prayed, this man's daughter called Johnny on the telephone in tears: "They sent my mother home from the hospital. There's nothing wrong with her!"

This was the first miracle that the cellar group had witnessed and it sparked their fervency into a hotter flame. Soon they began praying up a storm as people began to be healed of sicknesses and they witnessed several miracles. Every week, Michelle testified to her church in Natick of more works that Jesus had done through this group in the North End.

The greatest miracle they witnessed concerned a boy named Teddy who was dying of leukemia. Teddy had been undergoing chemotherapy and had sores all over his hands and was losing all his hair. He had been to many doctors and the diagnosis was the same -it was just a matter of time for Teddy.

In desperation, the boy's father came to Johnny, "I've been to many doctors. I've prayed to Saint Luke and I've prayed to Saint Anthony - I've tried everything!"

Johnny told him, "Well, we have a Jesus who can save your son."

Johnny told him to bring Teddy down to the cellar and they would pray for him. The boy's father was willing to try anything and he brought his son back each week to hear the Word of God and to be prayed for. Teddy was drained from the radiation treatment; he would shake during the meetings. He couldn't talk; all he could do was come and sit and listen. The cellar group baptized Teddy and slowly, over a period of time, the sores on his hands disappeared and his hair grew back as the leukemia went into a stage of remission.

"Today I give him haircuts," says Johnny; and Tony adds, "Here's the punchline - he was supposed to be sterile from the chemotherapy, but today he is alive and well. He was totally healed from leukemia and is married and has three kids!"

The cellar group learned that miracles are for today. Many of them had been brought up to believe that miracles were a major thing - not for little people. Many of them had believed that not all the stories in the Bible were true. But as they prayed and believed, miracles came to pass. They learned that the whole Bible was true - if they read something in the Bible, they believed it and expected the same thing to happen to them.

After a few years of meeting in the cellar, they had had Catholic priests and Protestant pastors come down into the meetings either to check them out or to try to steal from the flock. Michelle had protected them from this, having discerned wrong intentions on the part of a few people who visited their meetings.

They decided to leave the cellar and start meeting in St. Stephens church in the North End, which is one of the historic Congregational meeting houses in the city of Boston. The building was now owned by the Catholic Church, but they were allowed to meet there under the supervision of Father Robert.

"Here we were - Christians going into a Catholic church to conduct our 'Protestant' services," says Tony. "Father Robert would say a short Catholic Mass and we would conduct a service."

By holding meetings in a church building on Hanover Street, the group experienced another surge of growth. Every Thursday night for two years, they met in St. Stephens church attracting crowds of 200-300 people.

"We got so big," remembers Johnny, "that we had more people in a night service than that church had in over a month of services. Many people were coming in and being touched by God."

"After a while, there was no Mass any more," says Tony, "because the priest that started it didn't want to be a part of it any more. They still allowed us in the church for a while, but when we started to have guest speakers come in - Pentecostal speakers - with no priests around, we were asked to leave. Now we were on our own."

They met briefly in another Catholic church on Hanover Street and again were abruptly asked to leave. "The mystery part of it," explains Johnny, "was how we used those Catholic churches to conduct our services to begin with. And we grew so big that it bothered them."

The group moved to a cafeteria, then to the basement of Christopher Columbus High School, then to a building on the waterfront called The Bath House. During this time the group had dwindled down to a core of about 50 people. Some people who were attracted to the Catholic Charismatic movement left when the group stopped saying Masses. Others left and became a part of the several Pentecostal and Charismatic churches which were being formed in the Boston area at that time.

Catholic or Protestant?

Johnny Cammarata remembers a question of great concern for many North End Italians who were experiencing a new life in Jesus Christ. "Now we weren't Catholic ... but we weren't Protestant either. We would just say, 'I'm a follower of Jesus Christ.' Down deep inside it was like giving up your family to say that you weren't Catholic anymore. It was a hard, hard thing."

Tony Manupelli remembers this conflict also: "That was a big stand to take when you finally had to come out and say, 'Hey wait a minute, I'm not Catholic.' You just didn't do that in the North End."

"We didn't want a label," says Johnny. "We just knew that Christ was alive; Christ was healing; Christ changed our whole life. I don't want to stand under a banner. I don't want to be labelled as Catholic, Protestant, Assembly of God, or Nazarene ... that's what turned me off to religion in the first place. When I was growing up, I had to go along with whatever the Catholic Church said ... whether it was right or wrong. So we stood as Christians."

For years the group had been praying that God would send them a pastor. Now the need was more apparent than ever. They recognized that they should have their own church. Although there were several leaders, including Michelle, who had emerged in the last four years from a solid core group, they now began to feel that God wanted them to have a pastor.

The search for a pastor continued as the group began to interview many people. They no longer looked to Michelle as a leader although she became a valuable resource as they began to look into her denomination, the Assemblies of God, for a pastor. Michelle was able to set up a meeting between her pastor, Jack Mitchell; the District Superintendent of Southern New England, Hugh Corey; and Johnny and Tony. About seven or eight of the leaders of the group, now known as "Hesed," went out to the meeting.

"We were about a half hour late," remembers Tony. "They told us about a pastor from Missouri who had expressed a desire to come to Boston. The only stipulation was that we would be required to find housing for him and to pay for his moving expenses. This was all new to us - Pay his ticket?! - We just rejected the whole idea. We came across as prideful and then we left."

Hugh Corey and Pastor Jack just looked at each other and decided after talking that these people weren't ready for a pastor. Michelle was hurt by the terrible way that the group had presented themselves. They were supposed to be open to anything that was offered to them. Instead, Tony told Michelle, "Look - if the Lord wants this guy to come up from Missouri - whoever he is - then the Lord will make a way."

Meanwhile, Tom Hinton, the pastor from Missouri who had the burden for the city of Boston, began to raise his own support. After several months, he sold his home, packed up his belongings and moved his family to Boston. He found an apartment through a realtor which happened to be in the North End just a few blocks away from Johnny's barber shop.

Tom began to walk the streets of Boston while praying for the city. He opened himself to the Holy Spirit's leading and one day he walked into a barber shop for a hair cut. There are probably between 10-15 barber shops in the North End, yet Tom came straight to Johnny Cammarata and sat in his chair.

As the two introduced themselves, Johnny began to cut Tom's hair. As they talked, Tom noticed a picture of Jesus hanging on Johnny's wall next to the mirror.

"Are you a Christian?" Tom asked.

"Yeah," replied Johnny.

"Born-again?"

"Yeah."

"Well I'm a pastor," explained Tom. "I just moved here from Missouri and I have a burden for this city. I've been thinking about pioneering - I want to plant a church right here in the heart of Boston."

"Really?" asked Johnny, and then he thought for a moment. "Wait a minute - You're from Missouri and you have a burden for Boston?"

"Do you know Pastor Jack Mitchell and Hugh Corey?"

"Yes," replied Tom.

"You've got to be kidding me - Did Hugh Corey ever tell you about a group of Christians in Boston who were looking for a pastor?"

"Yes," said Tom, "Something like that a while ago, but that fell through."

"I don't believe it! ... You're the same guy! ... We're the same people Hugh Corey told you about!"

Johnny was soon on the telephone, "Tony! You're never going to believe it! Guess who the Lord sent into my barber shop?!"

That night, Hesed was having a Bible study at Tony's house. It was apparent to most of them that Tom Hinton was the answer to their prayers. After much discussion they decided to dissolve the group, Hesed, and become a part of Tom's new church.

The Boston Worship Center

Today there is a thriving spirit-filled church in the heart of Boston. Tom Hinton started a church in the Marriott hotel on Boston's waterfront. The favor that Tom had with Hesed came from the fact that they believed that God had sent him to Boston. God had used Tom to build His church.

"When I look back and see the plan of God," explains Johnny, "it gives me chills just seeing how God had a hand in all of this - from the first day in that cellar, all the way up to The Boston Worship Center. I can't wait 10 years from now to see how far we have come."

"It's amazing when you think about it," explains Tony. "Ten years ago there was nothing. Now you look at a church of over a hundred people right in the heart of the community."

Eventually the church moved into a building on Salutation Street called the Children's Haven, a Baptist mission for children. Ann Kiemel Anderson, the author of several inspirational books, had a burden for inner city children and used the earnings from her books to renovate the Children's Haven and pay the staff's salary.

Ann Kiemel Anderson was another instrument used of God to build this church. She was able to raise a lot of money for the building that the Boston Worship Center eventually bought and now meet in. Today, people come from all over the city to meet and worship God. Many people have been saved in this church and have been sent out to be instruments of God and further advance His kingdom in other places.

"Every time people come," says Johnny, "they say the same thing: 'I feel a warmth here - I feel love - I feel beautiful here.' Every time we've had services, we've always had that warmth. From the first time we saw the glow on Michelle's face until today there has always been that feeling of love. The church's motto became, 'The Church with a Heart.'"

"It's an awesome thing to see God's plan for the North End," Johnny reflects, "and to see how he uses guys like Tony and I. But this is a plan that God has made and it's beautiful, beautiful thing to be a part of this plan."

Johnny freely admits: "If I wasn't born-again I'd be in jail today. Considering the things I was involved in and the ambitions I had to be a part of organized crime, I would surely be in jail. The leaders of the Mafia in the North End are all in jail today. They got so big and so powerful, but where did they end up? If you stay alive, you end up in jail. What kind of a human being do you become? You go behind bars and live like an animal."

Today, in the North End there are no more Mafia dons. Gangsters are a thing of the past. But Johnny Cammarata's life is evidence that God can touch one person and then use him to raise up a church and change a community.

Your Opinion of Columbus Reveals Your Worldview

By Mike Wade

9/92

Ask someone their opinion of Columbus and it will very likely reveal their worldview, even if they don't know what that is.

Paul Gray, writing in Time magazine last October, identified the three contemporary interpretations of Columbus and his journey. They are significant because of the opportunity they provide to understand the different ways history is revised today.

The traditional view has largely been held by Christians holding a biblical worldview, even though Gray's definition is much broader: the journey "was the first step in a process that produced a daring experiment in democracy, which in turn became a symbol and a haven of liberty."

The Politically Correct view is, of course, in extreme opposition to this. The PC Columbus is a sort of voodoo doll by which all of Western civilization may be stabbed and vilified. Here's how Gray defines it: "Indigenous peoples were doomed by European ignorance, brutality and infectious diseases. Columbus' gift was slavery to those who greeted him; his arrival set in motion the ruthless destruction of the natural world he entered."

The third view set forth by Gray is the one he affirms. It is an attempted compromise between the two, eliminating any notion of Providence yet watering down the Marxism and fascism of the PC version. It allows Columbus all the necessary gray areas to be basically a good person who brought to the New World a mixed bag of blessings and curses, and helped determine which peoples would be winners and which would be losers. It allows one to deny personal responsibility for being white without attempting to diminish the damage done to other cultures lying in Columbus' wake.

That's why the traditional view has been more or less abandoned to those upholding a biblical world view. To see Columbus as a completely positive force only makes sense if he was an agent of Providence. Columbus' hands and mouth may have brought inhumane hardship, but the Bible says it is the feet that are beautiful if they bring the Gospel.

The skeptic may ask what good the Gospel is to a society that has suffered near extinction. In the first place, in a Providential interpretation of history, it is God, not Columbus, who decides if a nation should rise and when it should fall. Secondly, it was simply His mercy that the Gospel arrived before the plagues hit. Thirdly, what God allows and what God initiates are two very different things.

It is a matter of historical fact that much cruelty occurred at the hands of both the Europeans and the indigenous tribes. In fact, the PC gloss over very quickly that the Native Americans held and traded slaves of their own and participated in barbaric warfare well before they ever met Europeans. My point is to divide between the cruelty of the adamic nature of man, regardless of his race, or the purposes of God in the year 1492.

The real question here is not why God would allow this, because if He allowed it, each of us will eventually have to give an account. The issue at hand, no matter which of the three views you have of Columbus, is: "How could man be so wicked?" The only thing that the barbarism of Adam proves is that man is in need of a Redeemer.

In the PC view, as well as Gray's compromise, there exists no such thing as absolute right or wrong, so it borders on the macabre that they take God to task for crimes they correctly identify as repugnant. Was this the attitude that caused David to shake his head and write, "The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God'"?

Columbus labored to find a passage to the Orient for the advancement of the Gospel, the glory of God, and to raise money to fight the Crusades. In so doing he helped build the New Jerusalem and the kingdom of Babylon. What he will be judged for is not how these deeds fell in line with our morality, but his conscience. What is most significant about Columbus is the mental picture of an Unlimited Power using a very limited and fallible vessel. To make a hero out of the vessel is fine. But if that's all we see, we are severely missing the point. It was God's Hand that was upon Columbus for a specific purpose. Normally, God sovereignly chooses to keep this Hand invisible, so when He allows us to see it, or at least its fingerprints, we must by all means look past the instrument.

Sadly, both Christians and non-Christians often approach the New World's discovery with a determination only to confirm their own prejudices. Our relationship with the Lord should be secure enough that we embark on a childlike search for truth. God does not need our defense. And neither is history helped by those with an ax to grind. God is glorified through the study of history because He is using the dimension of time to install His King on Mt. Zion.

Cicero defined history as "the witness that testifies to the passing of time; it illumines reality, vitalizes memory, provides guidance in daily life, and brings us tidings of antiquity." The key is one's definition of reality. In a classroom setting using atheistic logic, it is easy to argue that reality does not exist. But once Reality is properly summed up in a Person, the definition becomes more simple. To study history from a Providential perspective is to lift the fingerprints of God from the smudges and mire of man.

Phillis Wheatley: Precursor of American Abolitionism

Born in 1753 in Africa, Phillis Wheatley was kidnapped and sold at a slave auction at age seven to a prosperous Boston family who educated her and treated her as a family member. Rescued from an otherwise hopeless situation by the sympathies of the Wheatley family, Phillis learned English with remarkable speed, and, although she never attended a formal school, she also learned Greek and Latin.

It is clear that the Christian compassion of the Wheatley family was the nurturing womb in which Phillis' rare gifts were cultivated. She came to know the Bible well; and three English poets - Milton, Pope and Gray - touched her deeply and exerted a strong influence on her verse.

She became a sensation in Boston in the 1760s when her poem on the death of the Reverend George Whitefield made her famous. Whitefield, the great evangelical preacher who frequently toured New England, happened to be a close friend of Countess Selina of Huntingdon, and the latter invited Phillis to London to assist her in the publication of her poems.

Her literary gifts, intelligence, and piety were a striking example to her English and American audience of the triumph of human capacities over the circumstances of birth. The only hint of injustice found in any of her poems is in the line "Some view our sable race with scornful eye" - it would be almost a hundred years before another black writer would drop the mask of convention and write openly about the African-American experience.

Another theme, which runs like a scarlet thread throughout her poetry, is the salvation message of Christianity - that all men and women, regardless of race or class, are in need of salvation. To the students at the University of Cambridge in New England (Harvard), she writes:

While an intrinsic ardor prompts to write,
The muses promise to assist my pen;
'Twas not long since I left my native shore
The land of errors, and Egyptian gloom.
Father of mercy, 'twas Thy gracious hand
Brought me in safety from those dark abodes.

Students, to you 'tis given to scan the heights
Above, to traverse the ethereal space,
And mark the systems of revolving worlds.
Still more, ye sons of science ye receive
The blissful news by messengers from heav'n,
How Jesus blood for your redemption flows.

See Him with hands outstretched upon the cross;
Immense compassion in His bosom glows;
He hears revilers, nor resents their scorn:
What matchless mercy in the Son of God!
When the whole human race by sin had fall'n,
He deigned to die that they might rise again,
And share with in the sublimest skies,
Life without death, and glory without end.

Improve your privileges while they stay,
Ye pupils, and each hour redeem, that bears
Or good or bad report of you to heav'n.
Let sin, that baneful evil to the soul,
By you be shunned, nor once remit your guard;
Suppress the deadly serpent in its egg.
Ye blooming plants of human race divine,
An Ethiop tells you 'tis your greatest foe;
Its transient sweetness turns to endless pain,
And immense perdition sinks the soul.

Phillis Wheatley received her freedom and married a free black man in 1778 but, despite her skills, was never able to support her family. Although she died in complete poverty, subsequent generations would pick up where she left off. Wheatley was the first black writer of consequence in America; and her life was an inspiring example to future generations of African-Americans. In the 1830s, abolitionists reprinted her poetry and the powerful ideas contained in her deeply moving verse stood against the institution of slavery.

The Power of a Christian Nation: Liberty Begins Internally

by Mark Beliles and Stephen McDowell

Jesus' Ideas on Liberty

Why did Jesus come into the world? There are many answers to this question. He came to seek and to save those who are lost, He came to destroy the works of the devil, and He came to establish the Kingdom of God, to name a few.

Man lost his ability to be self-governed when he disobeyed God. This led to external governmental tyranny. Christ also came to restore to man the potential of being self-governing under God. As mankind begins to be self-governed, it will have an effect on the external government's operating on his life. Jesus came to not only bring internal salvation, but also external political freedom.

After Jesus had risen from the dead and before He ascended into heaven, He gathered His disciples together. "And so when they had come together, they were asking Him saying, 'Lord, is it at this time You are restoring the kingdom to Israel?' He said to them, "It is not for you to know times or epochs which the Father has fixed by His own authority; but you shall receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you; and you shall be My witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and even to the remotest part of the earth" (Acts 1:6-8).

Of what type of kingdom were Jesus' disciples speaking? They were speaking of an external kingdom. For centuries the Hebrew people had read the prophecies of Scripture declaring that a Messiah would come and set up His throne and deliver the people from bondage. While Jesus walked on the earth, many of His followers thought He would set up His reign at any time. They even tried to make Him King. His disciples did not understand how His Kingdom was going to come. While they had not seen it established during Jesus' ministry on earth, surely now that He had risen from the dead, He would restore the Kingdom. That's why they asked Him this question.

Jesus did not deny that an external expression of the Kingdom would come. In fact, He said that times and epochs would follow (which we can look back upon today) that would contribute to the establishment of the Kingdom and the extension of external and internal liberty "to the remotest part of the earth."

The "power" for this external establishment of liberty is the "Spirit of the Lord"; therefore, Jesus emphasized the receiving of this "power" through the baptism of the Holy Spirit. He knew the inevitable result of internal liberty would be external liberty.

God's Pathway to Liberty

God's pathway to liberty is from the internal to the external. God's desire is for an external expression of His Kingdom on earth. Yet it must first begin in the heart of man, and then it will naturally express itself externally in all aspects of society.

The Bible reveals that "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Corinthians 3:17). When the Spirit of the Lord comes into the heart of a man, that man is liberated. Likewise, when the Spirit of the Lord comes into a nation, that nation is liberated. The degree to which the Spirit of the Lord is infused into a society (through its people, laws, and institutions), is the degree to which that society will experience liberty in every realm (civil, religious, economic, etc.) Christ came to set us free (Galatians 5:1,13). Spiritual freedom or liberty ultimately produces political freedom. External political slavery reflects internal spiritual bondage.

Christianity's method of change is the same for nations as it is for individuals. As Christians, we are gradually transformed as we apply the truth of His word to our lives.

Dr. Augustus Neander reveals in his 1871 book, General History of the Christian Religion, how Christianity has historically brought about change in various nations of the world. Neander writes: "Again, Christianity, from its nature, must pronounce sentence of condemnation against all ungodliness, but at the same time appropriate to itself all purely human relations and arrangements, consecrating and ennobling, instead of annihilating them ... That religion which aimed nowhere to produce violent and convulsive changes from without, but led to reforms by beginning in the first place within - whose peculiar character it was to operate positively rather than negatively - to displace and destroy no faster than it substituted something better ..."

Christian reforms within a nation do not begin with external or violent means (quite a contrast to Marxist/Communist reforms we see today), but they begin within.

In dealing with unbiblical situations in the nations today, we must remember that reform begins within, and as we remove the bad we must simultaneously substitute something better. A government-controlled and funded welfare system is unbiblical, yet the solution is not to pass a law that immediately eliminates civil government support of the needy. Individuals and churches must begin to fulfill their God-given responsibility in this area (substitute the good) as we remove the role of our civil government.

Neander goes on to say: "Yet Christianity nowhere began with outward revolutions and changes, which, in all cases where they have not been prepared from within, and are not based upon conviction, fail of their salutary ends. The new creation to which Christianity gave birth, was in all respects an inward one, from which the outward effects gradually and therefore more surely and healthfully, unfolded themselves to their full extent. It gave servants first the true, inward freedom, without which the outward and earthly freedom is a mere show, and which, wherever it exists, can be cramped by no earthly bond, no earthly yoke. The apostle Paul says, 'He that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman.' ..."

The reason the American Revolution succeeded is because it was based upon biblical principles that had been sown in the hearts of the people for generations - the people had been prepared from within. The external social change of communism will ultimately fail. (Those living under a communist regime will tell you it has already failed.)

Before Christ, God provided civil government for His people by external law interpreted by judges and prophets. Through Christ, God released the "Law of Liberty" into society through the cleansed hearts of men. God now leads the self-governing Christian by the internal law written on his heart interpreted by the Holy Spirit. This does not mean that the Old Testament law is done away with, but that man can now carry out the law, for God has empowered us to do so. It is still true that the more a nation applies His law, the more that nation will prosper and walk in liberty. The degree to which a people apply the law personally will be reflected through their governmental institutions, for the law flows from the heart of man out to the nation.

Three Vital Foundations of a Christian Nation

Since liberty begins internally, the first step in making a nation Christian is to change the heart of man. This includes not only the conversion of men to Christ but also building virtue and morality into the heart of the people.

There are three vital foundations of a Christian government. These apply to all other institutions as well. These foundations are:

1. Religion - Christianity or Faith in God and His Word
2. Morality - Christian Character
3. Knowledge - Biblical Worldview

These are the spirit or power of a Christian nation. All three of these are necessary for the foundation of a Christian nation.

As we work to see that the "Spirit" within the people of a nation is Christian, the natural result will be forms of government, educational systems, economic systems, etc. that are Christian. This follows from the principle of power and form, for every external form is a result of an internal power.

America's form of government began as Christian. This flowed out of the Christian power within the hearts and minds of America's founders. They recognized this form of government could only be properly run by a godly people.

John Adams, the second United States President, said: "We have no government armed in power capable of contending in human passions unbridled by morality and religion. Our Constitution was made only for a moral and religious people. It is wholly inadequate for the government of any other."

The founders saw the best support of government was the freedom to worship God and obedience by the people to His precepts. George Washington stated: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to a political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of Patriotism, who would labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness ..."

He also said: "I now make it my earnest prayer, that God would have you, and the State over which you preside, in his holy protection ... that he would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, and without an humble imitation of whose example in these things, we can never hope to be a happy nation."

If the people of a nation lose their virtue, their downfall is inevitable. Sam Adams, the Father of the American Revolution, said: "A general Dissolution of Principles and Manners will more surely overthrow the Liberties of America than the whole Force of the Common Enemy. While the People are virtuous they cannot be subdued; but when once they lose their Virtue they will be ready to surrender their Liberties to the first external or internal Invader ... If Virtue and Knowledge are diffused among the People, they will never be enslaved. This will be their great Security."

When Israel was virtuous, they were invincible, but when they lost their virtue, they fell to invaders. This is true of nations today.

From the principles we have studied, we know that it is not enough for a nation to copy some external form of government to secure liberty, but that the external form must flow out of the principles of liberty within the heart of the people. Many nations in the world today have copied America's form of government, yet without the same Christian spirit that gave birth to that form, freedom, prosperity, and stability have only been short-lived.

We must also remember that changing the letter of the law to correct problems, without dealing with the spirit in the people's hearts, will usually result in worse tyranny than existed before the attempted correction. (Examples in the United States include 14th and 17th Amendments.)

A test of a nation being Christian is not that all who formed it were Christians, but that its form of government is Christian, which of necessity means its power is Christian. This means that the principles and ideas upon which it is based are biblical.

This article was taken from Principles for the Reformation of the Nations by Mark Beliles and Stephen McDowell. Published by Providence Press, it is a workbook for Christians who desire to apply their faith to the transformation of society. (See page 19 for special ordering information).

The Progress of the Gospel in England

By Jay Rogers
12/90

Many nations of the world owe a great debt to England for the spiritual heritage which this great nation has spread all over the world. To England, America owes its government, its liberty and its Christian heritage.

The following list, by no means complete, is an overview of some of the great events which chart the progress of the Gospel in England:

During the latter half of the 14th century, great forces were at work in England. The medieval world was coming to a close but the new world was not yet ready to be born. The black death had killed one-third of the people and though the crusades were over, the Hundred Years War with France was still in progress.

The peasants of England were impatient for a better life. The Church, which had brought civilization and order to medieval England, had grown in wealth and power, but there was also corruption. There were no Bibles in the English language and the Gospel became diluted with superstition and half truths.

* John Wycliffe: Called the "Morning Star" of the Reformation. Through his preaching and writing, John Wycliffe laid the foundation for the successive moves of God in England throughout history. From within the Church, voices akin to Wycliffe began to call for reform.

* William Tyndale: Known as "God's outlaw," William Tyndale, under the anointing and power of the Holy Spirit translated the New Testament Greek manuscripts for the very first time into English. He began in 1523, and under a self-imposed exile, William Tyndale, a man hunted for 12 years, running from the Church of England and the King's secret service, was the first man to print the Bible in English.

* The King James Bible: Was printed 75 years after Tyndale was burned at the stake. Although 50 learned scholars working in ideal conditions over a seven year period would translate the Bible from newfound Hebrew and Greek manuscripts, they still would only make changes in Tyndale's work amounting to nine percent. All modern scholars agree that the only explanation for this is that Tyndale was yielded to the power of God. Equally notable is the fact that in the process of translating, William Tyndale invented modern English as we know it.

* The Puritans: A movement which sandwiched the English Renaissance, the Puritans came in two waves bringing men like John Bunyan to enrich the spiritual life of England. The second wave of the Puritan revival brought Englishmen to America, first the Pilgrims and then the Massachusetts Bay Company, to plant the first permanent democratic colony in the New World. The Puritans gave America the basis for our politics and ethics as well as our rich Christian heritage.

- * William Carey: Father of the world missions movement, launched out across the world to India. In the next 50 years England sent the Gospel to Africa (C.T. Studd and Andrew Murray), to China (Hudson Taylor), to Burma, to Australia, to the Arab world, and to the Caribbean.
- * George Mueller: A great man of faith who fed, clothed and educated 2500 orphaned children every day for over 20 years.
- * William and Catherine Booth: Founders of the Salvation Army, ultimately sent their missionaries all over the world and, together with Lord Shaftsbury, took on the task of reforming child labor laws in England.
- * Charles Spurgeon: Known as one of the greatest theologians of all time. Also from London, Spurgeon was one of the last of the Puritans and is credited with further restoring biblical doctrine to the Church worldwide.
- * Evan Roberts: His consecration to prayer for 13 years brought the great Welsh Revival at the turn of this century which brought great social reform to Wales and influenced the Pentecostal revival in the United States.

Prophetic Voices Concerning America

By Jay Rogers

"There shall come a time in later ages,
When Ocean shall relax his chains
And a vast continent shall appear,
And a pilot shall find new worlds."¹

- Lucius Annaeus Seneca
Roman statesman and philosopher
4 B.C. - 65 A.D.

During the 1980s, people all over America were rediscovering our nation's Christian heritage. Many new and exciting facts were uncovered which transformed the way in which we viewed our nation's past and its future.

The faithful lives of our forefathers were investigated; the Christian basis for our Constitution was studied; new approaches to teaching America's Christian heritage in our schools were developed; political organizations and lobbying groups emerged which promoted a biblical worldview for government.

The work of researchers and political activists in uncovering our nation's Christian roots has been invaluable. However, there is yet a much deeper lesson to be learned. What was uncovered in the 1980s concerning American history will prove to be just the tip of an iceberg which reaches far into the depths of the ocean.

A vast realm of knowledge remains to be rediscovered which is based on a view of history which is entirely new to our generation.

Another View of History

This view of history, although new to our generation, was succinctly articulated by the historian Charles Coffin in 1881.² In writing Old Times in the Colonies, Coffin discovered, by tracing the progress of ideas in history, that there is a vaster meaning behind the study of history than just a list of names, places, dates and events. According to Coffin, history should not be viewed as a record of a series of events, but as an outline of the progress of ideas.

"The settlement of our country was the beginning of a new era in human affairs ... it was the transplanting of liberty to a continent where everything was new, and where the conditions that surrounded them were wholly unlike those of the Old World.

"You will notice that the beginning of our country is clear and distinct, while the beginnings of the histories of other countries are obscured by tradition or made doubtful by fable. Our early history is definite; the early history of other lands uncertain.

"The history of a nation is like the flowing of a river; there are many rivulets starting wide apart, which unite to swell the ever-deepening stream ... The tracing of the relationship of one event to another and showing their effect upon the human race, is the philosophy of history, and by studying the philosophy we are able to arrive at some conclusion as to its meaning

"I have spoken of the meaning of history. Surely it has a meaning, what else are we living for? Whichever way we turn in the material world we find things needful for our use and we think of them as God's forethoughts, and as designed for our welfare. If there is design in the material world, there must be some meaning to history, some ultimate end to be accomplished."3

This new view of meaning in history - the progress of ideas - can be understood by referring to the sources of our history - to the rivulets that flow into our nation - and by seeing that long ago there were prophetic voices which spoke of the very time at which we have arrived in our present day.

In addition to understanding that our nation was founded on biblical principles and knowing that our laws and government need to be reformed, we must add that the whole world is coming under the rulership of the same God Who spoke through the prophets who foresaw the future role of America in the world.

The Discovery of America

Around the same time that Jesus Christ was born into the world, the first mention of America as a future empire appeared in the literature of the western world. Seneca, a Roman poet and philosopher, penned the Latin verses in the chorus of Medea:

Venient annis secula seris
Quibus Oceanus vincula rerum
Laxet et ingens pateat tellus
Tethys que novos detegat orbes
Nec sit terris ultima Thule.

For centuries, these verses pointed to an undiscovered world. According to Sir Francis Bacon, they were a prophecy of the discovery of America by Columbus, and this can be seen to be true if we rely on this translation of the verses:

"There shall come a time in later ages, when ocean shall relax his chains and a vast continent shall appear, and a pilot shall find new worlds, and Thule (northern Europe) shall be no more earth's bound."

The verses of an ancient poet proved to be prophetic. These verses were used by Columbus himself as autographs in some of his works. Two copies penned in his own hand appeared in his Prophecies; another entered in his observations of lunar eclipses at Haiti and Jamaica; another still in a letter to Queen Isabella.

By these verses, Columbus sailed to discover a new world. This remarkable, yet obscure piece of verse indicates that long before Columbus came to America there was a foreshadowed glimpse of the New World.

The ancient Greek geographer Strabo, after a long life of travel, sat down during the reign of Augustus Caesar (around the same time as the birth of Christ), at age 84, to write the geography of the world. In this work, Strabo alluded to the possibility of passing straight from Spain to India and explained that in addition to the known inhabited world:

"There may be in the same temperate zone two and indeed more inhabited lands, especially nearest the parallel of Thinae or Athens, prolonged into the Atlantic Ocean."⁴

This was the voice of an ancient prophet. The remarkable accuracy of this prediction shows how close the imagination of a poet can approach the prophetic.

As we progress into the Christian era, we will find two Italian poets whose verse was rich with prophecy. One of these is Francesco Petrarca (1304-1374), who wrote before Columbus sailed:

"The daylight hastening with winged steps
Perchance to gladden the expectant eyes
Of far-off nations in a world remote."⁵

The other was Pulci (1431-1487), who, in his epic romance Morgante Maggiore, revealed an undiscovered world far beyond the pillars of Hercules:

"Know that this theory is false; his bark
The daring mariner shall urge far o'er
The western wave, a smooth and level plain,
Albeit the earth is fashioned like a wheel.
Man was in ancient days of grosser mould,
And Hercules might blush to learn how far
Beyond the limits he had vainly set
The dullest sea-boat soon shall wing her way.

"Men shall descry another hemisphere
Since to one common center all things tend;

So earth, by curious mystery divine
Well balanced, hangs amid the starry spheres.
At our Antipodes are cities, states,
And throngéd empires, ne'er divined of yore.
But see, the sun speeds on his western path
To glad the nations with expected light."6

The Spanish conquest of America by Columbus was soon followed by the Dutch, French and English, which were the four empires of the western world at this time. Soon after the European discoveries, a group of commentators appeared who saw further into the scheme of history than others.

A Prophetic Group

The voices of Christian authors and poets, men possessed of greater faculties of insight, had much to say about the destiny of our continent long before the United States came into existence. We will look at some of these prophetic voices and then, seeing what has already been fulfilled, we will learn what to expect in the future and gain a better understanding of American destiny.

As the colonies began to prosper and grow, a group of Europeans visiting America began to prophesy a new turn in history. While the colonies were still in their infancy they prophesied growth in power and civilization, heralding a Western empire.

George Herbert, the English poet, saw the Puritan emigration to America, prompted by conscience and the desire for religious liberty, and was inspired to write the famous verses:

"Religion stands on tiptoe in our land,
Ready to pass to the American strand."

Herbert died in 1632, twelve years after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, and two years after the larger movement of the Massachusetts Company which began the settlement of Boston.

These verses were almost suppressed by the English government being unsympathetic to the Puritan cause and refusing the proper license for publication. They at last yielded, however, calling Herbert "a divine poet" and expressing concern that "the world would not take him for an inspired prophet."7

Thomas Fuller (1608-1661), another English poet, being perhaps inspired by Herbert's verse, wrote:

"I am confident that America, though the youngest sister of the four, is now grown marriageable, and daily hopes to get Christ to her husband, by the preaching of the gospel."8

Another English poet, John Milton (1608-1674), author of Paradise Lost and the heroic Sonnets, wrote a treatise on the emigration of English Christians to America:

"What numbers of faithful and free-born Englishmen and good Christians have been constrained to forsake their dear dearest home, their friends and kindred, whom nothing but the wide ocean and the savage deserts of America could hide and shelter from the fury of the bishops!

"O, if we could but see the shape of our dear mother England, as poets are wont to give a personal form to what they please, how would she appear, think ye, but in a mourning weed, with ashes upon her head, and tears abundantly flowing from her eyes, to behold so many of her children exposed at once and thrust from things of dearest necessity, because their conscience could not assent to things which the bishops thought indifferent?

"Let the astrologer be dismayed at the portentous blaze of comets and impressions in the air, as foretelling troubles and changes to states; I shall believe there cannot be a more ill-boding sign to a nation (God turn the omen from us!) than when the inhabitants, to avoid insufferable grievances at home, are enforced by heaps to forsake their native country."9

Begun in the simplicity of sacrifice and courage, America grew in promise of grandeur and the hope of a better future. A sense of divine destiny was firmly implanted in the foundation of the new colonies.

Sir Thomas Browne, 1682

A contemporary of Milton, Sir Thomas Browne wrote a tract entitled "A Prophecy concerning the Future State of Several Nations," in which he predicts that "America will be the seat of the fifth empire."10 This tract was published in 1684 and is based on verses supposedly sent to him by a friend entitled "The Prophecy."

"When New England shall trouble new Spain,
When Jamaica shall be lady of the isles and the main;
When Spain shall be in America hid,
And Mexico shall prove a Madrid;
When Africa shall no more sell out their blacks
To make slaves and drudges to the American tracts;

"When America shall cease to send out its treasure,
But employ it at home in American pleasure;
When the New World shall the Old invade, Nor count them their lords but their fellows in trade;

"Then think strange things have come to light
Whereof but few have had a foresight."¹¹

All of these things have come to pass since Browne penned these verses. In fact, they only seem remarkable when the early date is considered. Although there is little need of explanation today, Browne seems to have accepted these words as genuine prophecy and provided a commentary explaining them at length shortly before his death.

Bishop Berkeley, 1726

George Berkeley, an Irish Bishop and philosopher, was planning to found a college for the colonial churches. Before sailing to America, the great future of our nation was revealed to him and he wrote his only extant poem: "Verse on the Prospect of Planting Arts and Learning in America."

"The Muse, disgusted at an age and clime
Barren of every glorious theme,
In distant lands now waits a better time.
Producing subjects worthy fame.

"Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The first four acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's Noblest offspring is the last."¹²

The meaning behind these verses seems to be the westward progress of the seat of civilization. According to Berkeley and many other observers of this time period, the arts, sciences and the gospel had always travelled westward. The next move, they thought, would be over the Atlantic to America.

Samuel Sewall, 1727

Like Berkeley, Samuel Sewall saw the sun of the empire travelling westward. A contemporary of Berkeley, Sewall was born in England and died in New England. Samuel Sewall saw in America the New Heaven and the New Earth. One of the accomplishments of this new civilization was to be the end of slavery. Sewall's tract, "The Selling of Joseph," earned him the title of the first American abolitionist.

Sewall was among the first to boldly proclaim America to be the New Jerusalem:

"Of all the parts of the world, which do from this Charter, entitle themselves to the Government of Christ, America's plea, in my opinion is the strongest."¹³

Marquis D'Argenson, 1745

A French nobleman was among the first to predict the liberation of America from the British. Despite strange eccentricities, Marquis D'Argenson was an insightful writer who began to sympathize with the American cause.

"Another great event to arrive upon the round earth is this. The English have in Northern America domains great, strong, rich, well regulated. There are in New England a parliament, governors, troops, white inhabitants in abundance, riches, and mariners ... I say that some bright morning these dominations can separate from England, rise and erect themselves into an independent republic."¹⁴

A full thirty years before the first shots fired in the War for Independence, D'Argenson preceded Turgot and John Adams in prophesying the emergence of America as a free nation.

Anne Robert Jacques Turgot, 1750

One of the most illustrious names of pre-revolutionary France, Turgot mastered studies in law, literature, science, humanities, and government. Unlike his contemporary Voltaire, he exhibited a spirit of toleration. Had Turgot's views held sway in France, the blood bath that was the French Revolution might have been averted.

In 1750, when only 23 years old in the seminary at Sorbonne, Turgot delivered a discourse on the Progress of the Human Mind in which he described the commercial triumphs of the ancient Phoenicians, covering the coasts of Greece and Asia with their colonies. He then compared the colony of Carthage, which later became an empire, to America.

"Colonies are like fruits, which hold the tree only until their maturity: when sufficient for themselves, they did that which Carthage afterwards did, - that which some day America will do."¹⁵

So Turgot, while studying theology at age 23, had the insight to realize that America was destined for the revolution which formed the United States. In the same prophetic spirit, he wrote in a letter to his friend, the English philosopher Josiah Tucker, dated September 17, 1770:

"As a citizen of the world, I see with joy the approach of an event which, more than all the books of philosophers, will dissipate the phantom of commercial jealousy, I mean the separation of your colonies from the mother country, WHICH WILL BE FOLLOWED BY THAT OF ALL AMERICA FROM EUROPE."

In the spring of 1776, Turgot then predicted the outcome of the War for Independence: "The present war will probably end in the absolute independence of the colonies, and that event will certainly be the epoch of the greatest revolution in the commerce of politics not of England only, but of all Europe."¹⁶

John Adams, 1755

Next in the line of prophets is John Adams, who needs no introduction to American readers. Together with John Hancock and his brother Samuel Adams, he is called an architect of the American Revolution.

In 1755, while teaching school in Worcester at age 20, Adams wrote a letter to one of his young friends which shows remarkable insight. After giving examples of the fall of great empires, such as Carthage and Rome, he made the following prediction:

"England began to increase in power and magnificence, and is now the greatest nation of the globe. Soon after the Reformation, a few people came over to this New World for conscience' sake. Perhaps this this apparently trivial incident may transfer the great seat of empire to America. It looks likely to me; for if we can remove the turbulent Gallics (the French), our people ... will, in another century, become more than England itself."¹⁷

Another prophetic passage appeared in 1768:

"I always consider the settlement of America with reverence, as the opening of a grand scene and design in Providence for the illumination of the ignorant and the emancipation of the slavish part of mankind all over the earth."¹⁸

On the 3rd of July, 1776, John Adams wrote in a letter to his wife Abigail:

"Yesterday the greatest question was decided which ever was debated in America, and a greater, perhaps, never was nor will be decided among men I am surprised at the suddenness as well as greatness of this revolution. Britain has been filled with folly, and America with wisdom. At least this is my judgment. Time must determine. It is the will of heaven that the two countries should be severed forever The day is past.

"The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epoch in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated, as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be celebrated with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires, and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward forevermore.

"You will think me transported with enthusiasm, but I am not. I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure that it will cost us to maintain this Declaration, and support and defend these States. Yet through all the gloom, I can see the ravishing light and glory; and that posterity will triumph in that day's transaction, even though we should rue it, which I trust in God we shall not."¹⁹

In the above lines, Adams predicts the eventual victory of the United States over England after a long struggle, and the celebration of America's Independence Day through succeeding generations in accurate detail. Another prophetic pronouncement of startling accuracy is the prediction of the extension of the English language:

"English is destined to be the next and succeeding centuries more generally the language of the world than Latin in the last or French is in the present age ... I have undertaken to prophesy that English will be the most respectable language in the world, and the most universally read and spoken in the next century, if not before the close of this."²⁰

The unfolding grandeur of the republic was revealed to the mind of Adams as he was awed by the future prospects for our nation:

"A prospect into futurity in America is like contemplating the heavens through the telescopes of Herschel. Objects stupendous in their magnitudes and motions strike us from all quarters and fill us with amazement."²¹

In a letter to Thomas Jefferson dated November 15, 1813, Adams wrote:

"Many hundred years must roll away before we shall be corrupted. Our pure, virtuous, public-spirited, federative republic will last forever, govern the globe, and introduce the perfection of man."²²

Dr. Richard Price, 1776

A dissenting clergyman from England during the War for American Independence, Dr. Price was also a mathematician, political writer and authority on financial matters. As a friend of the American cause and solid ally at a critical period, Price prophesied the dawn of a new era.

"With heartfelt satisfaction I see the revolution in favor of universal liberty which has taken place in America, - a revolution which opens a new prospect in human affairs, and begins a new era in the history of mankind ... Perhaps I do not go too far when I say that, next to the introduction of Christianity among mankind, the American revolution may prove the most important step in the progressive course of human improvement ..."

Announcing the grandeur of this new order, he states, "that it may produce a general diffusion of the principles of humanity," and may lead all mankind to see that "all legitimate government consists in the dominion of equal laws, made with common consent."

Referring to the hope of universal peace beginning in the United States, he states, that "it is not impossible but that by some such means universal peace may some time or other be produced, and all war be excluded from the world ... Why may we not hope to see this begun in America?"²³

Governor Pownall 1780

Another friend of the United States in England was Thomas Pownall, an English statesman and author. He traveled to America in 1753 and successively became the governor of Massachusetts, New Jersey and South Carolina. Pownall, after returning to England, had insight into the purposes for American Independence for the whole world.

"The independence of America is as fixed as fate. She is the mistress of her own future, knows that she is so, and will actuate that power which she feels she hath, so as to establish her own system and to change the system of Europe."²⁴

Robert Burns, 1788

The famous English poet had some prophetic lines specifically for the United States. Burns was a world renowned poet, who began as a poor plough boy struggling in a cottage in his youth. Similarly, God had favored America, having raised up a great nation up to a place of prominence in the world which began as a small band of Pilgrims struggling to survive in the wilderness.

Burns' poem, "Ode on the American War," pictured the sublime brotherhood of man following on the heels of American Liberty:

"No Spartan tube, no attic shell,
No lyre Eolian, I awake;
'Tis Liberty's bold note I swell;
Thy harp, Columbia, let me take."

"Then let us pray, that come it may,
And come it will, for a' that,
That man to man, the whole world o'er,
Shall brothers be and a' that."

Henri Grégoire, 1808

Grégoire was a French curate, Deputy and Constitutional Bishop. Prophesying the abolition of slavery, a new world order, the digging of the Panama Canal, and the ascendancy of America in changing the face of the commercial world, Grégoire showed remarkable insight.

Grégoire was for the abolition movement in France what William Wilberforce was for England. In an open letter to those still enslaved in the New World, he said:

"A day will come when deputies of color will traverse the ocean to come and sit in the national diet to swear with us to live and to die under our laws. A day will come when the sun will not shine among you except upon freemen, - when the rays of the light-spreading orb will no longer fall upon irons and slaves It is according to the irresistible march of events and the progress of intelligence, that all people dispossessed of the domain of liberty will at last recover this indefeasible property."²⁵

Later, Grégoire predicted that when the digging of the Panama Canal was completed (and event almost 100 years in the future), that America would become the most eminent economic power in the world:

"When an energetic and powerful nation, to which everything presages high destinies, stretching its arms upon the two oceans, Atlantic and Pacific, shall direct its vessels from one to the other by an abridged route, - it may be in cutting the isthmus of Panama; it may be in forming a canal communicating, as it has been proposed, by the river of St. John and the lake of Nicaragua, - it will change the face of the commercial world and the face of empires.

"Who knows if America will not then avenge the outrages she has received, and if our old Europe, placed in the rank of a subaltern power, will not become a colony of the New World?"²⁶

Thomas Jefferson, 1824

Jefferson and Adams, respectively America's third and second presidents, both died on July 4, 1824. Their deaths, both on the date of America's 48th anniversary, seem too unlikely to be coincidental. Perhaps this is yet another prophetic pronouncement speaking of America's destiny. Could this be yet another confirmation that a new world order had begun 48 years before?

Jefferson, shortly before his death, spoke of the cement of the Union which was destined to be a model for bringing about a new world order.

"The cement of this Union is in the heart-blood of every American. I do not believe there is on earth a government established on so immovable a basis. Let them in any State, even in Massachusetts itself, raise the standard of separation, and its citizens will rise in mass and do justice to themselves on their own incendiaries."²⁷

There is yet another prophecy which shows Jefferson's insight into the force of Union in our nation and foreshadows the bitterly divisive issue of slavery and the resulting Civil War. In a letter to Judge Edward Livingston, on March 25th, 1825, he wrote that the United States Constitution "is a compact of many independent powers, every single one of which claims an equal right to understand it and to require its observance."

Watching with anxiety the fortunes of the Union, Jefferson then prophesied: "However strong the cord of compact may be, there is a point of tension at which it will break."²⁸

Alexis De Tocqueville, 1835

The great French social scientist, author of Democracy in America, had many things to say about American Destiny. Perhaps the most poignant to us at this point, however, is his treatment of the subject of slavery. Like Jefferson, De Tocqueville saw the menace of the Union succumbing to the States:

"The most fearful of all the evils which menace the future of the United States springs from the presence of blacks on their soil. When we seek the cause of present embarrassment and of future dangers to the United States, we arrive almost always at this first fact, from whatever point we depart."²⁹

Then the famous sociologist predicted the eventual freedom of blacks; yet they would be oppressed by white judges; shut out from the jury; segregated in schools, theaters, churches and even at the site of the grave. Sadly, De Tocqueville's prophetic testimony rings all too true. No American can fail to be both grieved and challenged by the problems that face African-Americans even to this day.

Yet it was the opinion of De Tocqueville and many others that no permanent inequality could exist in America. In the words of a twentieth century prophet, Martin Luther King: "The arc of the moral universe is long, but it bends toward justice."

So America is moving slowly, progressively toward a state of affairs in which all men, women, and children (including the unborn) will be protected by that great statement of Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration in Independence: "We hold these truths to be self evident ... that all men are created equal."

God still has a destiny for America!

In our survey of prophetic voices concerning America, we have heard the ancient prophecies that foretold the discovery of another world. The verses penned by poets centuries before may have been in the mind of Columbus when he set out for the New World. Some today believe that Columbus died thinking he had sailed westward to the Orient, but more likely, he realized that he had truly discovered a new land.

The continent was hardly known when poets such as Herbert and Milton predicted the growth of a Western Empire. Turgot and Adams foretold of the Independence of America and the establishment of the United States all over North America.

Then came the prophecies by French, English and American sages that America would become a world power in later ages. Grégoire, Jefferson and De Tocqueville later prophesied that the issue of slavery would become divisive, yet no inequality could last forever in a nation with a destiny more powerful than war.

What more shall we say then? These men were diligent in their study of the things of God; they were well versed in biblical principles; and they had Christian character. Furthermore, their prophecies were highly accurate. Today we can still look to their words in order to understand the destiny of America.

It is surprising, therefore, that many today question the fact that these men were Christians. I would venture guess that if the aforementioned could gaze down the corridors of time and see the state of the American Church at present, that they would wonder if many of the Christians of today are genuine!

Even though the state of affairs in America today may look bleak in some respects, a gleaming ray of hope appears - God has a destiny for America! He always honors His covenants with men and our nation is based solidly on a covenant with an Almighty God. His sovereign hand is still guiding us through history.

Our nation is leading the human race in its march toward a toward a state of society that is inexpressibly grand and glorious. The future of the United States holds not a slow demise but a glorious destiny. At the end of a long list of prophecies, there appears another list yet to be fulfilled.

Resources of all kinds will multiply and increase beyond all experience; the arts will embellish the land with immortal beauty; the name of Liberty will become exalted until every person in the world will yield to its irresistible attraction; and the universal peace that is found in knowing God will become more powerful than the armed forces of any nation for the conquest of the world.

Remaining to be seen is the spread of Liberty throughout the world until the whole earth comes into a new order and the rule of Jesus Christ is supreme.

Republicans and Whigs

By Robert Fitzgerald

Where is the Republican Party headed? Will they continue to flourish? - or will we witness their disintegration in the next six to ten years?

Most politicians today would scoff at the mention of the latter question, call it reactionary and write it off as uninformed - "The thought that the 'Grand Old Party' could possibly fall out of its prominent role in the United States' political system - Absurd!"

But is this question really absurd?

Stop a moment and consider history for a moment. Between 1854 and 1856, Abraham Lincoln began to realize that the Whig Party, to which he was loyal, was nearing extinction. Whig leadership was wavering on the slavery issue, unable to come out decisively as the anti-slavery, anti-expansionist party. Those with strong moral convictions against slavery were forced to search for someone and/or some group to represent their cause for the nation.

The Democratic Party had already aligned itself with the South, not only favoring slavery in the states where it already existed but also backing its expansion to the new territories of the nation.

Because the Whigs and the Democrats would not represent anti-slavery, anti-expansionist sentiments, two fledgling parties emerged. One, the American Party, or "Know Nothings," failed to survive because they did not adopt a platform against the expansion of slavery. The second, the Republican Party, did adopt this platform.

As the Whig Party continued to hold to ambivalent opinions, members began to gravitate toward the Republican Party. The Party proved stable enough to represent the anti-slavery, anti-expansionist movement and won the trust of leaders such as Lincoln. The Whigs came unglued as a result of the strong sentiments surrounding slavery while the Republican Party flourished and brought a hero to the White House in their second attempt.

Today, the Republican Party is failing to recognize the similarities between the issues of slavery and abortion both morally and politically. In doing so, they neglect to understand the very circumstances that brought them into the position of power and influence which they enjoy today. This negligence may prove disastrous.

Current Republican leaders do not seem to realize that their party exists because of its bold stand on a vitally important moral issue. In Lincoln's day, the issue was slavery; today, that vitally important moral issue is abortion. Currently, within the ranks of the Republican Party there is growing strife and a lack of cohesiveness which is the result of a failure to make a firm stand on abortion.

Republican Party Chairman, Lee Atwater, on a national news broadcast stated: "There are no litmus tests on any issues which would be grounds for repudiating a Republican who believes in our overall philosophy." In so many words, Atwater's comment indicates that there is room in the Republican Party for candidates who support abortion.

The Whigs may have said the same thing about their party in relation to slavery. They had no litmus test for their party either, but a large segment of the American people did and the Whigs failed the test.

World Magazine (Jan. 22, 1990) quotes Vice President Daniel Quayle expressing an idea shared by many fence straddling leaders in the "Grand Old Party." Quayle says that as a whole, the Republicans "are a party of inclusion ... the tent is big enough to include pro-life as well as pro-abortion."

If one looks to history again, it becomes clear that Vice President Quayle's stance will not survive the test of time. Abraham Lincoln found himself faced with a similar dilemma on the slavery issue. Stephen B. Oates, in his book, With Malice Toward None, comments on and even quotes Lincoln's beliefs on such an all inclusive party position.

What was involved, Lincoln said, was a struggle for human liberty. In Lincoln's view, slavery embodied "the selfishness of man's nature" and opposition to it embodied man's love of justice. These two principles are "eternally antagonistic" and when brought together, they would lead inevitably to "shocks, throes, and convulsions."¹

In the same vein, pro-life and pro-abortion stances are "eternally antagonistic" and will cause "shocks, throes, and convulsions" within the Republican Party.

If this philosophy persists, the Republicans, like the Whigs, will find their tent torn asunder. Will the Republican Party learn from history or will they tragically repeat it? Will they take the fire of compromise to their bosom and suppose that they will not be burned?

Lincoln said in his Second Inaugural Address:

These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All know that this interest was somehow the cause of the war.

If there is no drastic turn around; if there is no change of heart and mind on this issue, Republicans in the future may be saying that their demise was because of philosophical and economic issues. However, history may record:

These UNBORN constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All know that this interest was somehow the cause of ...

As well as the demise of an entire political party.

The 1906 San Francisco Earthquake

By Frank Bartleman

Frank Bartleman was an early leader of the Pentecostal movement at the Azusa Street Mission in Los Angeles, California. He was a central figure in the Azusa Street revival of 1906. His reports published in the holiness press heralded a world-wide revival. Bartleman's journalism helped to inform the world of the Pentecostal renewal and was largely responsible for promoting a revival that is still spreading throughout the world. The following is an excerpt from Azusa Street, Frank Bartleman's chronicle of the birth of the Pentecostal movement.

I found the earthquake had opened many hearts. I was distributing especially my last tract, "The Last Call." It seemed very appropriate after the earthquake. Sunday, April 22, I took 10,000 of these to the New Testament Church. The workers seized them eagerly and scattered them quickly throughout the city.

Nearly every pulpit in the land was working overtime to prove that God had nothing to do with earthquakes and thus allay the fears of the people. The Spirit was striving to knock at hearts with conviction, through this judgment. I felt indignation that the preachers should be used of Satan to drown out His voice. Just as he later used them to stir up hatred and murder, during the great war. Even the teachers in the schools labored hard to convince the children that God was not in earthquakes. The devil put on a big propaganda on this line.

I had been much in prayer since the earthquake, and had slept little. After the shock in Los Angeles the Lord told me definitely He had a message for me for the people. On the Saturday after, He gave me a part of it. On Monday the rest was given. I finished writing it at 12:30 a.m. Tuesday, ready for the printer. I kneeled before the Lord and He met me in a powerful way, a powerful witness that the message was from Him. I was to have it printed in the morning. From that time until 4 a.m., I was wonderfully taken up in the spirit of intercession. I seemed to feel the wrath of God against the people and to withstand it in prayer. He showed me He was terribly grieved at their obstinacy in the face of His judgment on sin. San Francisco was a terribly wicked city.

He showed me all hell was being moved to drown out His voice in the earthquake, if possible. The message He had given me was to counteract this influence. Men had been denying His presence in the earthquake. Now He would speak. It was a terrific message He had given me. I was to argue the question with no man, but simply give them the message. They would answer to Him. I felt all hell against me in this, and so it proved. I went to bed at 4 o'clock, arose at 7, and hurried with the message to the printer.

The question in almost every heart was, "Did God do that?" But instinct taught men on the spot that He had. Even the wicked were conscious of the fact. The tract was set up quickly. The same day it was on the press, and the next noon I had my first consignment of the tract. I was impressed I must hasten and get them to the people as quickly as possible. I was reminded that the ten days I was called by the Lord to prayer was up the very day I received the first of the tracts. I understood it all now, clearly.

I distributed the message speedily in the missions, churches, saloons, business houses, and in fact everywhere, both in Los Angeles and Pasadena. Besides I mailed thousands to workers in nearby towns for distribution.

Many raved at the message. A man followed me on the street raving like a maniac. He followed me into a business house, to do me violence. But the Lord protected. He then tore my tract up publicly at the curb, to show his hate. Many threw the message down in a rage, only to pick it up again and read it. It seemed God held them to it.

Everyone was curious for the tract, though it burned the most of them like fire. Sometimes they would get so excited on the street cars they would get off before they reached their street. My very presence seemed to convict many. The message struck consternation to thousands of souls. I have never written a tract that had so much influence.

Sunday, May 11, I had finished my "Earthquake" tract distribution. Then the burden suddenly left me. My work was done, Seventy-five thousand had been published and distributed in Los Angeles and Southern California, in less than three weeks' time. At Oakland, Brother Manley, of his own volition, had printed and distributed 50,000 more, in the Bay Cities and 'round about, in about the same space of time. The following are some extracts from the "Earthquake" tract:

"But what had God to do with earthquakes? 'When Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness' (Isaiah 26:9). 'Which removeth the mountains, when He overturneth them in His anger, which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble' (Job 9:5-6). 'The mountains quake at Him, and the hills melt; and the earth is upheaved at His presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein. His fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are broken asunder by Him' (Nahum 1:5-6). 'And I will punish the world for their evil. Therefore I will make the heavens to tremble, and the earth shall be shaken out of her place, in the day of His fierce anger' (Isaiah 13:11, 13).

""Then the earth shook and trembled, the foundations also of the mountains moved, and were shaken because He was wroth. There went up a smoke in His wrath, and fire out of His mouth devoured. The Lord thundered from Heaven, and the Most High uttered His voice. Then the channels of the sea appeared, the foundations of the world were laid bare, by the rebuke of the Lord, at the blast of the breath of His anger' (Psalm 18).

""Behold, the Lord maketh the earth empty, and turneth it upside down (perverteth the face thereof), and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof. The foundations of the earth do shake, the earth is utterly broken, the earth is moved exceedingly. The earth shall stagger like a drunken man, and shall be moved to and fro. The transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it.' (Isaiah 24:1, 18, 20). 'Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with earthquakes, and great noise, and the flame of a devouring fire.' (Isaiah 29:6).

'Men shall go into the caves of the rocks, from before the terror of the Lord, when he arises to shake terribly the earth' (Isaiah 2:19). 'And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air and there was a great earthquake' (Revelation 16:17,18).

And will you claim there is no God in earthquakes? John Wesley has said, 'Of all the judgments which the righteous God inflicts on sinners here, the most dreadful and destructive is an earthquake.'" - From "Earthquake Tract," April 1906.

The San Francisco earthquake was surely the voice of God to the people on the Pacific Coast. It was used mightily in conviction, for the gracious after revival. In the early "Azusa" days both heaven and hell seemed to have come to town.

The Spirit of Massachusetts is the Spirit of America

I have enjoyed reading The Forerunner for several years now. I read the recent article on Massachusetts, and felt compelled to write a follow-up. There is much more hope and a more positive side to the history of Massachusetts than the article implies.

The Massachusetts state legislature adopted the slogan, "The Spirit of Massachusetts Is the Spirit of America," during the Dukakis administration. Although the slogan was devised as a means to secure financial gain for the Commonwealth, it is strikingly prophetic of a spiritual reality - for good or evil, Massachusetts has been the spiritual focal point of the U.S. for the past 370 years.

The politics and ethics of the United States of America were birthed in Massachusetts ... first in Plymouth, then in Boston under Governor John Winthrop. The spiritual climate of the entire nation was greatly affected by Massachusetts. The most significant event of the 1700s, barring the Revolution, was the Great Awakening which was sparked in a tiny Northampton Church pastored by Jonathan Edwards.

The World Missions Movement also had its beginning in a prayer meeting under a haystack near Williamstown, Massachusetts. Adoniram Judson and the first missionaries from America set sail from the port of Salem in 1812. In the early 1800s, the western part of the state was the center of sporadic spiritual awakenings. All of this evidence leads up to an obvious conclusion - that the spiritual history of America has had its seed in Massachusetts.

Since the beginning of the 1800s, Massachusetts has also been a bed of growing iniquity. Humanism, in the form of Transcendentalism and Unitarianism, also had its roots there. Social philosophers, such as Emerson and Thoreau, contributed to the destruction of the Christian foundations of America. In the 20th century, Marxism, humanism, existentialism, socialism, and immorality have all found a haven in many colleges and universities.

But God has a destiny for Massachusetts! He always keeps His covenants with men, and virtually every township in the Bay State is founded on such a covenant with God. Long before becoming the governor of Massachusetts, John Winthrop had a deep understanding of God's divine purposes for the colony. "We shall be a city set on a hill," he said of Boston - where the church was the center of life during those early years of the city's history.

While en route to the New World on board the Arabella, Winthrop wrote a sermon entitled "A Model of Christian Charity," in which he outlined the purposes of God for New England. He described a harmonious Christian community whose laws and government would logically proceed from a godly and purposeful arrangement. He wrote: "The Lord will be our God ... He shall make us a praise and glory that men shall say of the succeeding plantations, 'The Lord make it like that of New England ...'"

But Winthrop also gave a warning: "The eyes of all people are upon us, so that if we deal falsely with our God in this work we have undertaken, and so cause us to withdraw His present help from us, we shall be made a story and a byword through the world."

It is shameful that the current governor of Massachusetts, Michael Dukakis, stood at the podium of the 1988 Democratic National Convention in Atlanta and quoted from "A Model of Christian Charity." He stressed the themes of "charity, unity, spirit, and sacrifice," and yet censored all of Winthrop's references to God, Jesus Christ, and the Church. Yet this is indicative of how far our state and our nation have fallen.

Derek Prince, a recognized prophet in the Body of Christ, relinquished his British citizenship in the 1960s to come and live in America. It is not a light thing for an Englishman to emigrate from his beloved country, yet Derek Prince was convinced of the eminent role that America holds in reaching the world with the gospel of Jesus Christ.

In a vision, Prince described seeing a map of the United States ignite into flames. The fires began in Massachusetts, centering around the Boston area. The vision was interpreted symbolizing the outpouring of the Holy Spirit in America. I believe with many others that this fiery impulse will be the onset of a wave of revival that will sweep across the globe and bring the gospel of Christ to every nation!

Reader Curious about Highjacking of Literature

In reading the November 1988 issue of The Forerunner ("Attack from Massachusetts" by Lee Grady), the author mentions America's "rich treasury of Christian literature" which has since been removed from high school and college literature textbooks. I would very much like to know what this literature is. Could I get a book list of some sort? I am hoping you can direct me to the right source.

Editor's Note: Very few people today are aware of how our national literature has been edited and tampered with since the early 1900s. A subtle strategy by an intellectual elite to remove Christianity and morality from our letters has been progressively carried out in the ivory towers of our universities since that time. Beginning in the March issue of The Forerunner, we will be serializing an excellent manuscript by Miss Ruth Nourse entitled "The Highjacking of American Literature," which exposes this scheme.

The True Nature of History

By Ron Auvil

History can be defined as a record of past events given with interpretation as to the causes of such happenings, along with an assessment of their importance.

Applying a biblical worldview to history will find a relationship or competition between false ideologies, philosophies, religions, political structure and the Kingdom of God. The resulting picture of this competition is the true nature of history.

Unfortunately, most Christians, especially in the West, can neither explain nor understand the conflict of these kingdoms. In my experience, most saints are willfully ignorant of history as a whole, let alone history from a Christian perspective. Indeed, they regard history as a long-forgotten high school subject, rather than what it is if interpreted properly. This correct view of history is one of the greatest faith building weapons a Christian may possess.

Thus, having forgotten the heritage of Christ's advancing kingdom, Christians have been robbed of their birthright of past, present and future Kingdom glory.

How then can this tide be turned? Only by direct intervention of the Holy Spirit illuminating pastor, professor, and parishioner as to the truth of God, the purposes of God in history, and the destiny of God's people for the future! For truly a proper view of Kingdom history can not only give us a view of redemption through the ages, but can give us a vision of the end of all competing worldviews versus the plans of God on earth.

This will give the saint a confidence and sense of destiny even amidst chaos. The saints will be encouraged to erase opposing historical forces! The tide of ignorance, apathy and failure shall be turned when we grasp by faith some basic biblical truth as follows!

1. History must always be viewed on the centrality of the Lord Jesus Christ! To the believer all things are evaluated and controlled by Jesus Christ. This eliminates worldly, humanistic views of history, as well as cultic views and the wild conspiracy theories so popular in the Church today. Believe it or not, history does not revolve around the Antichrist, the European Economic Community or the nation of Israel! Rather history revolves around the expressed image of the Father's glory, Jesus Christ and His finished work at death's tree - the Cross. (Colossians 1:16).

2. Not only is history subservient to the glorious Christ, He is the essence of history. His purposes in the earth, alone, are worthy of consideration or value to the believer. While all believers "live and move and have their being" in Christ, even the idolatrous mass of humanity today are subject to His awesome, history controlling power!

3. We must find out what God has been doing in history and align ourselves with it! We can live this view of history in a practical way. Listed below are some basic principles to follow.

A. The activity and ultimate fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant has, through Christ, allowed the Church to participate in this glorious vision of fervent missionary activity, reaching every people group with the testimony of Christ and His kingdom.

B. Violent Kingdom expansion through Holy Ghost anointed preaching will harvest countless multitudes into the Church.

C. The prophetic ministry of the Church will confront idolatry, sin, and corruption in our generation.

D. The restoration of society due to the "Sun of Righteousness rising with healing in His wings" (Malachi 4:2b).

There is a great need for an all-encompassing, mighty evangelical revival and spiritual awakening in this generation. Because all power has been given to an exalted Christ, the Church can confidently proclaim the full testimony of God to all the nations of the earth and thus fulfill the divine vision of history.

Ron Auvil is a staff member of Christian Evangelistic Endeavors, a ministry dedicated to bringing a great and mighty revival to the Church and spiritual awakening throughout the nations. C.E.E. sponsors Intensive Revival School, a two year discipleship training program designed to prepare students for the ministry. Revival Flame, a bi-monthly newsletter published by C.E.E., contains articles written by staff members and revivalists of old concerning revivals past and present.

Two Views of History

12/91

"We can never know which war will be the last war. But we take as our hope the prophecy of Isaiah - 'that nation shall not lift up sword against nation.' And yes, we hope, we pray that as the years progress that the face of war will recede into our distant memory."

- President George H.W. Bush
Veteran's Day Address
November 11, 1991

With these words, President George Bush reiterated his belief in a Providential view of history. There is an undeniable promise in the Bible that nations will one day cease from war. This view was popular during the formative years of America; it took hold firmly in the years before the American Civil War; but it has finally lost its popularity in the twentieth century. Few of America's recent leaders have spoken as boldly of the biblical promise of world peace as has our current President.

George Bush was, in fact, echoing President Woodrow Wilson by proclaiming his belief that "the last war" may be on the horizon. The Veteran's Day Address should go down in history as a landmark speech. November 11th, 1918 was the day on which the Armistice ending World War One was signed. President Bush referred to the hope that the First World War should have been, in the words of President Wilson, "the war to end all wars," and reminded the American public of the great progress toward world peace which has occurred in the downfall of the communist bloc - the defeat of Saddam Hussein - and the Madrid Arab-Israeli peace accord.

This millennial hope - that progress toward a lasting peace is being made - is not as popular today as it was just 100 years ago. Most Americans and, even more sadly, most Christians of today no longer hold to a Providential view of history - a view in which the hand of God is seen to be directing the entire earth toward a glorious destiny. Instead, most have opted for a Conspiratorial view of history - a view in which human or demonic conspirators are in control of historical events and are steering the entire earth toward a one-world government, controlled by an evil, totalitarian, antichrist dictatorship.

A world without wars and diabolically evil empires doesn't seem to fit our worldview anymore, yet most of the historians of the 19th century believed in the idea of human progress. A betterment of mankind was seen as the result of divine grace flowing from the hand of God or "Providence."

If this was the prominent view only a century ago, one might ask, then why has there been such a dramatic turnaround in our worldview? To fully understand this change, we first need to compare America's Puritan beginnings in a nation totally separate from Europe, with the sudden intrusion of America as a world power into the politics of Europe and Asia in the twentieth century. We will find that the Presidency of Woodrow Wilson is the hinge upon which this turnabout occurred.

America's Beginnings

From its very beginning, the American system stood out as different from that of Europe in one major aspect: America was first colonized by Puritans. The first settlers in Jamestown were cavaliers loyal to the King. But they were interested mainly in imperialism rather than religious pursuits. Their colony under Captain John Smith perished entirely before being reestablished. Jamestown was the first successful and permanent colony in America. But there was no ongoing permanence in its early years and its success was dubious.

The next group of colonists were separatists and dissenters from the Episcopalian form of government in the Church of England - the Pilgrims - and they settled in Plymouth. The Plymouth colony first experimented with collectivism and almost failed until a model of congregational church government was adapted to a plan of civil authority by Governor Bradford in order to save the colony from starvation.

Later, the city of Boston and some surrounding communities experimented with the idea of a theocracy ruled by Presbyters as a model of civil government. This brought only intolerance and repression against until a remarkable success occurred when the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay Colonies joined to form the first truly democratic society. The wealth of the Puritans, who had flown from the oppression of King Charles of England, and the greater civil liberty afforded by the more sensible government structure of the Pilgrims, who had come to America a decade earlier, combined in a system which has continued to see success even until this day.

Other colonies, such as Connecticut, followed the example of this reformed system. This was not a denominational system, but a reformed civil government under which a society of truly Christian and morally self-controlled people could live in freedom from religious oppression and intolerance. This civil form of government was based upon a "constitution" under which the colonists lived and viewed with awe as a "compact" or a covenant with God.

Conflict with Europe

King Charles, the tyrant who had long persecuted the English Puritans, finally lost his head after a long ordeal with these new and revolutionary ideas. The flowers of liberty were even then blossoming amidst the Old World order. Oliver Cromwell, a leading Puritan statesman bent on reform and the establishment of a democratic parliamentary system of civil government, finally led a civil war against the King and his cavaliers. The Puritans, or "roundheads" as they were called, ultimately won the war and Charles was beheaded for plotting treason against the people of England. Charles' crime was that he had conspired to hire an army of Catholic mercenaries from Ireland to fight against his own people.

The success of the Puritans in England was short-lived, however, when Cromwell found that a democratic parliamentary system run by squires and lords oppressed the common people and was almost as corrupt as the rulership of the deposed evil king. Not understanding the concept of the balance of powers of republican government - a necessity due to the innate depravity of man - Cromwell ordered parliament dissolved. As Commander-in-Chief of the army he was able to seize rulership and served a short term as "Lord Protector."

Some today might see Cromwell's leadership as fascist, however, his decision was based on the encroaching threat of a Scottish army, who would have imposed a Presbyterian form of church government on England, a form only slightly more tolerable than the Episcopacy of pre-Reformation Europe. Unfortunately, Cromwell died before the democratic ideals of civil government to which he aspired had had a chance to bear fruit.

After Cromwell's death, Charles II came to power and resumed his father's persecution of the Puritans. The Puritan movement finally lost its political power base in England and the last of its statesmen, who were not beheaded, fled to the Massachusetts Bay colony (and later to Connecticut).

The tensions between the colonists and England only served to ignite passionate love of freedom in America's heart. Colonial government continued on through the Great Awakening in the early 1700's. It was in the colonial setting of Enfield, Connecticut that the great revivalist, Jonathan Edwards, first preached his famous sermon "Sinner's in the Hands of an Angry God." What followed was a revival movement in America which lasted fifteen years. The Great Awakening transformed complacent believers all across the eastern seaboard.

Jonathan Edwards took much of his philosophy from John Locke, a political philosopher whose ideas had come of age in America. The American colonies separated from England less than a generation after the Great Awakening. This was due to the influence of John Locke on the political and religious leaders of colonial America. Also popular were the Scottish Presbyterian philosophers who argued that all men in all places possess a universal moral sense of right and wrong.

This assurance made possible the overthrow of tyrants and the restoration of social order. Moral wrongs such as taxation, the imposition of Provincial governments in the colonies, and other intolerable acts by the Kings of England led to the American War for Independence (or the Revolutionary War). The Christian philosophy of government allowed men to make new earthly covenants both for the glory of God and for man's happiness on earth. The Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution are extensions of the ideas contained in the compacts and constitutions drafted by the individual colonies declaring their right to existence.

This final break with England seemed to cement in the American mind the idea that the Old World order was somehow evil in form and intent. The Bible and Christian theology had more to do with the formation of America's worldview than the mindset of Protestant Europe. Puritanism had to literally fight to carve out a place for itself in the rock of Europe's fossilized social and political structure. Yet in America, Puritan beliefs had existed prior to the establishment of the American nation. Christian principles had been built into the bedrock of American society.

The Constitution of the United States of America was a Christian document by reason of the fact that it was based on the biblical principles set down throughout the centuries by Christian philosophers. These principles, hard fought for and fiercely guarded, ensured the success of an infant nation. America would now have to stand on its own and its citizens relied on the principles contained in the Bible and faith in God to solve the crises that faced the newborn republic.

By the 1820's, improving relations with British Canada and the acquisition of Florida from Spain led to the Monroe Doctrine, which announced that North and South American countries would unite against European interference. Just as the colonies had united to fight against England, now all New World countries would unite against any foreign aggressor. Heeding George Washington's warning against "entangling alliances" which could lead to unnecessary wars, America's foreign policy toward Europe remained solidly isolationist throughout the 19th century.

The Millennial Hope for Peace

In the early 1800s, the Spirit of God moved strongly in America as it had a century earlier during the Great Awakening. It was during this Second Great Awakening that the ideas of world peace and social reform began to take root strongly among America's Christian leaders.

The greatest among these leaders was Charles Grandison Finney, the son of a Revolutionary veteran and an heir to the Pilgrim tradition of 17th century Massachusetts. Born in Warren, Connecticut in 1792, Finney moved to New York State as a child and grew up in the "Burnt Over District" of western New York, an area frequented by many revivals. In 1821, as the result of an intense religious experience, he gave up a promising career as a lawyer to become an itinerant evangelist. He was a tall, slim, handsome man with piercing blue eyes, sandy hair, and had a burning conviction that he was led by God in his effort to convert and reform the nation.

Finney was a child of his age, not an enemy of it. He wanted to help men free themselves from sin and learn to grow in wisdom and love as free Christian men and women. He was an individual who believed that the millennial age was about to dawn in America. The essence of Finney's theology lay in his attitude toward human progress, the benevolence of God, and personal holiness. Finney defined progress as the working out of God's will, and since God was by nature benevolent, His ultimate aim was to produce the greatest possible human progress in the universe.

As a result of his revival preaching, which emphasized the doctrine of holiness, Finney believed that the world would become increasingly Christian. As more and more individuals were converted, the world would become increasingly prosperous and righteous. Christians would grow in wisdom, learn all the laws of science, and someday create a world which would herald the start of God's millennial kingdom on earth. He hoped to raise up "a new race of revival ministers" who would constitute the advance guard of the world-wide evangelistic movement.

Finney was sufficiently patriotic to believe, with his Pilgrim Forefathers, that America was to become the first nation in which the whole population would be completely converted. He also maintained that "a democracy is in many respects the most desirable form of government" and that a republic is a "less pure form of self-government." According to Finney, God, who controls the outcome of all revolutions, allowed Americans to establish a republican form of government because "God always allows His children as much liberty as they are prepared to enjoy."¹

Consequently, he argued, if America continued to grow in grace and become more and more virtuous, it was probable that God, in His benevolence, would grant a democratic form of complete self-government. In the meantime, where revivals were flourishing, education would expand and social reform would continue to overcome one evil after another.

Finney believed that revivals could produce such broad and sweeping results, could reform so many individuals so completely and rapidly, that legislative attempts at reform paled in comparison. The first step toward the millennium was to convert men to Christ; the rest would follow automatically from this. Among the other reforms of the day which Finney promoted, were abolition, temperance, use of tobacco, dietary regulations, education, gambling, dueling and hygiene.²

Pessimistic, premillennial revivalists since the Civil War have usually opposed social reform on a broad scale, because they maintain that nothing but the return of Christ can possibly solve the major problems of this world. Finney did not share the view of Dwight L. Moody and other post-Civil War period revivalists that only the cataclysm of Christ's Second Coming could bring about the millennium. Not only did Finney believe that one day wars would cease and peace would reign on earth, he was optimistic enough to state: "If the Church will do her duty the millennium may come in this country in three years."³

America secures peace on its own soil

But will wars really ever cease? America has fought its share of wars on its own soil. This ended, of course, with the Civil War in the 1860s. There is not an American alive today who can remember a full fledged war being fought within the boundaries of his own nation. In this, America holds a unique position among the nations of the world.

Because of the Monroe Doctrine, America has been at peace with the nations of the western hemisphere in this century. Only communist infiltration in Latin America has periodically threatened this peace. There has not been a full scale war between America and a western hemisphere nation since the Spanish-American War, which was fought over the principles of the Monroe Doctrine.

Today no one in their right mind worries about a Canadian or Mexican invasion of the United States. Latin American countries, except for occasional terrorist insurgencies and coups, are at peace with one another. And with the toppling of the communist super bloc, even Cuba places no threat against America (as it did just thirty years ago during the Cuban Missile crisis). So why is it unlikely that such a sustained peace between nations could solidify in other areas of the world as well?

Anyone who questions the possibility of long term world peace should be reminded of the existence of slavery on our soil only 127 years ago. Before the Civil War, there were many people who believed that slavery was an immoral institution and ought to be abolished. However, few believed that slavery would ever be completely abolished in the entire world. Yet today another evil institution as old as the human race rages on everywhere. Is it any less likely that war will one day be outlawed, just as slavery has been virtually eradicated almost everywhere in the world?

The political setting of America from 1865 to 1900, mindful of the specter of the political disintegration which had gripped the nation less than a generation before, was marked a level of social turmoil greater than at any other time in history. The millennial hopes espoused Charles G. Finney began to fall into doubt. Southern Democrats, who had only recently gained control of the electorate, were bitterly opposed to the Reconstruction policies of the Republican majority. Bitter political enemies fought hard against each other in elections. America was still licking its wounds from the war and the nation remained politically divided.

If there was one policy that all Americans could agree upon, however, it was the Monroe Doctrine. Involvement in the affairs of Europe was almost universally frowned upon. The cost of fighting a European war politically and economically; and the idea of sacrificing American lives overseas seemed too great. To most Americans, the oceans still seemed wide enough to protect us from foreign invasion. Americans hoped that war could be avoided.

But then, during the administration of Woodrow Wilson, Europe began to tear itself apart.

Woodrow Wilson: An American Prophet

This entry of the United States of America into the affairs of Europe during the First World War changed the course of world history. Woodrow Wilson was the navigator of America's course during this time period. It was as if God himself had raised up a prophet to speak of things to come. At a time when America preferred isolationism to intervention, Wilson drastically changed America's role and the world has never been the same.

Woodrow Wilson was one the last of the Puritan thinkers to attain a high political office in America. As the former president of Princeton University, Wilson was deeply ingrained with a Reformation worldview of both Christianity and statesmanship. As a young boy, Wilson found faith in God and he believed from an early age that the mantle of great responsibility rested on his shoulders. He believed that there was a great task he was to accomplish with his life. In his writings there is the underlying notion that there was a God-given destiny for him to fulfill.

The Christian background of Wilson is best understood by looking at the years he spent at Princeton as a student. The curriculum of Princeton was steeped in Calvinist theology, the belief system of the Presbyterians, and today's conservative Protestants who hold to a reform theology. Calvinists believe that the Kingdom of God is being established through God's hand. Christian men and women may pursue progress and order in a chaotic world. Man's institutions are given by God to advance the Kingdom of God on earth.

This view was much different from the Lutheran and Anabaptist theology which is promoted by most modern day evangelical, Pentecostal and charismatic Christians. These people believe that the spiritual and secular worlds are incompatible. Human progress is viewed as a form of secular rebellion against God. Man's institutions are viewed as a part of the evil world system. Christians are to avoid participation in the world's institutions as much as possible.

Wilson's earliest writings are reliant on a worldview heavily saturated with the Calvinist principles which were taught at Princeton. One of his first public writings, published in the North Carolina Presbyterian, was entitled, "Christ's Army." This essay, written at age 19 together with a discourse entitled "A Christian Statesman," represents the cornerstone of Wilson's Christian philosophy:

"One of the favorite figures with sacred writers in their references to the inhabitants of this world is that of representing mankind as divided into two great armies. The field of battle is the world. From the abodes of righteousness advances the host of God's people under the leadership of Christ. Immediately behind the great Captain of Salvation come the veteran regiments of the soldiers of the cross with steady tread, their feet shod with the preparation of the Gospel of Peace, girt about with truth, their breastplates of righteousness glittering beneath the bright rays of their Master's love, each one grasping the sword of the Spirit....

"From the opposite side of the field, advancing from the tents of wickedness, come the hosts of sin led by the Prince of Lies himself, riding upon death's horse.... The foes meet upon the great battle field of everyday life. With one sweeping charge the Christian band falls upon the overwhelming numbers of the Prince of Darkness and are met with a cloud of fiery darts from the hands of the evil one. The battle waxes fierce.... Satan leads his followers to victory over the dead bodies of many a soldier of the Cross. Thus the battle of life progresses and the army of Saints ever gains ground under divine generalship; now slowly, now rapidly, driving before them with irresistible force the broken ranks of the enemy....

"Surely in this great contest there is a part for everyone, and each one will be made to render a strict account of his conduct on the day of battle.... All professing Christians are, no doubt, more or less enthused by such thoughts as these, and hope that they can feel themselves soldiers in Christ's great army; but they do not know that they are such. Why should they not know? If they would be assured of the fact that their names are in the great Roll Book, let them fight for Christ."⁴

"Christ's Army" had profound implications for Wilson's developing political theory. The Calvinist doctrine that the secular world order was established by God gave Wilson a guide in his pursuit of progress. This world order was extended into all vocations, fields of learning, civil laws and political institutions. The ideals of Christianity were extended into Wilson's view of history as well.

In an essay entitled "Christian Progress" Wilson described the Christian life as a journey toward perfection - "one attended with and obstructed by many difficulties. In order to advance, the Christian must needs strain every muscle. This strain, though necessary at all times, is not, of necessity irksome, as God's all-powerful arm is ever around us."⁵

This journey was also reflected in history as the nations progressed into an order that was more godly. Thus the millennial hope was reborn. In Wilson's view, the hand of God was not only guiding the individual Christian, but the nations as well. The result of this progress would be a world without war. As the nations advanced into greater perfection, peace and prosperity would become prevalent; war and economic turmoil would become the exception rather than the rule.

World War I and the League of Nations

Wilson later served as president of Princeton University from 1902 to 1910. He became governor of New Jersey in 1912 as a reform candidate sponsored by William Jennings Bryan. One year later he was supported by Bryan in his bid for President. Wilson's first term was marked by progressive politics which he supported out of loyalty to his Party. When World War One broke out during his first term, he promised to keep America out of the war. However, atrocities committed by the Germans on the battlefield and toward civilians led to a popular outcry against further expansion of the central European powers.

Woodrow Wilson's firm belief in the Providence of God led him to believe that war, although a horrible and un-Christian institution, may be fought according to the will of God to achieve a higher good. This was to be a war fought to keep America and the world "safe for democracy." This was to be the "war to end all wars."

America entered World War One in 1917. Wilson's childhood belief that he was destined by God to accomplish a great act for the good of mankind began to come into fruition in his mind. Perhaps the Great War would settle once and for all the need for wars. America entered the war at a crucial juncture and was responsible for turning the tide and bringing a long conflict to a swift end. In a Proclamation of Thanksgiving, November 18, 1918, Wilson spoke of the Sovereignty of God Who is "the Ruler of Nations":

"God has in His good pleasure given us peace. It has not come as a mere cessation of arms, a mere relief from the strain and tragedy of war. It has come as a great triumph of right. Complete victory has brought us, not peace alone, but the confident promise of a new day as well, in which justice shall replace force and jealous intrigue among the nations."⁶

The changing role of America in the world was based on Wilson's hope that a League of Nations with a world court to settle national differences peaceably would result from the war. Wilson's Fourteen Points for World Peace, presented to Congress in 1918, were later adopted by the allied European nations at the Treaty of Versailles conference. The American congress never ratified Wilson's desire to enter the League of Nations, however, even though he campaigned for it until he ruined his health. Wilson left the presidency greatly discouraged. Wilson believed that the formation of the League of Nations was to be the fulfillment of his God-given purpose on earth.

Wilson regarded his proposed peace terms with Germany to be a gesture of Christian forgiveness by the western alliance nations toward Germany. Forgiveness alone, in the form of requiring no reparations from Germany, could heal the wounds of war and make the world a freer place. Unfortunately for the world, the European nations rejected this part of Wilson's plan and later imposed the harsh terms of the Versailles Treaty on Germany.

World War Two was fought, sadly, due of the decision of the Allied Nations of Europe to require the terms of the Versailles treaty from Germany. The continuing isolationism of America and the hostile feelings of the economically depressed Germans toward the Western Alliance fomented hostility and allowed the Nazis led by Hitler to gain a stranglehold on Europe. Once again the world began to tear itself apart.

The hope for a lasting peace dawned again when Germany was finally crushed by the allied forces and Japan was forced to surrender by a show of newfound atomic power by America. Some thought that the grim and awful specter of a nuclear holocaust could become the sufficient deterrent to war that the superpowers needed to remain at peace with each other. But it was not to be. Instead, the Cold War blocked the hope of world peace. Forty years of mistrust and suspicion festered between the United States and the communist super bloc. Conspiratorial theories about communism abounded.

This chain of events led to the pessimistic Conspiratorial view of history which is prevalent among modern day evangelical Christians. America's millennial hope once proposed by the Puritans, Charles G. Finney and Woodrow Wilson has sunk into oblivion. Few Christians of the present generation seriously believe in the possibility of a lasting peace. This way of thinking has become so ingrained in evangelical circles that numerous Conspiracy theories have been advanced to explain current events.

How do we view the events of recent history? Three of the most positive signs of 1991: the defeat of Saddam Hussein, the break-up of the USSR, and the Arab-Israeli Peace Accord, have been interpreted by some Christians as pessimistic proofs that a Conspiracy to bring about a one-world government is at hand. This interpretation of current events would never have been the view of the Reformers, the Puritans, or the Revivalists.

If America's Christians would remember their heritage and cultivate a working knowledge of the Providential view of history, many would see the hand of God moving among the nations bringing us into a new day. Truly we stand at the dawn of a new era. The changes that have occurred in the last few years among the nations are bringing us to a time when at last Wilson's prophetic words may become a reality: Right will triumph; justice shall replace force; God will grant the nations peace; and we may walk in the confidence of a new day.

Two Views of History

Briefly, we must now look at a subject which often bitterly divides Christians. Any Christian view of history must be completed by a view of the End Times and a scripturally based view about the events which will surround the Second Coming of Christ. Rather than name two dozen or more of the prominent eschatological viewpoints held by modern Christians, it should be sufficient to divide all of these views into two broad categories: Pre-Millennialism and Post-Millennialism.

The main points of the two views are as follows.

- * The Millennium is thought to be a long period of time (it may or may not necessarily be a literal thousand years) in which the fulness of Christ's reign will come to the earth.
- * A Pre-Millennialist believes that the actual, physical Second Coming of Christ must occur prior to the beginning of the Millennium. Before the Millennium commences the Antichrist will reign in the earth.
- * A Post-Millennialist believes that Christ will physically return to the earth only after the Millennium is completed. Christ's reign over the earth from heaven increases during the Millennium as the Kingdom of God is continually advanced in the earth.

Much of the arguing between the two groups (and among factions within the groups) centers over the role of the Church during the End Times; the appearance of the Antichrist's one world government; and when the rapture is to occur. Without going into great detail, the following are the two views briefly stated:

Pre-Millennialism places the Church in a position of an "evangelism-only" role in the End Times (since Christ's Second Coming could be very near, it is necessary to save as many as possible while there is still time left); it places the appearance of the Antichrist's one-world-govern-ment somewhere during the last seven years of time; and it usually involves a Great Tribulation in the last seven years of time, during which the Church is to be raptured, or physically caught up to be in heaven with Jesus (there are several different views on when this event takes place). At the end of this Tribulation Period, the Second Coming occurs and the saints who were caught up to be in heaven for a period of time return to rule and reign with Jesus on the earth.

Post-Millennialism places the Church in a role, not only of evangelism, but of discipling the nations as well (not only will many be saved, but whole social structures will be transformed); the rule of the Antichrist is more loosely interpreted as the current world system of Satan which is being overthrown by the progressive, sovereign judgments of God; thus the Great Tribulation is viewed, not as a seven year time period, but as the sum total of all the judgments of God in history, and although the rapture is not usually focused on, it does occur at the very end of the Millennium when Jesus returns physically to the earth and the saints are simultaneously caught away to be with Jesus. Before the Second Coming, the Church's role is to rule with Christ, not in heaven, but on earth.⁷

It is easy to see which view of the End Times fits better to a Conspiratorial view of history; and which view fits better to a Providential view of history. To be fair, however, we must admit that there have been many Pre-Millennialists who have acted as though they believed in the Providence of God and have done great works to reform the nations (D.L. Moody and David Wilkerson come to mind). Likewise, there have been some Post-Millennialists who have held to wild conspiracy theories.

To promote a greater unity in the Church, eschatological differences should be put aside. The point to be made here is this: Your view of the End Times will affect how you view current events and it will even greater affect how you respond to the call of missions. If your worldview is dominated by conspiracy, then you need to change your thinking to allow the Providence of God to have full reign in the course of history and in your life.

How our thinking colors our actions

As an example of how our thinking colors our actions, I would like to relate my own experience with missionary work in Russia during the past two years:

When the Iron Curtain began to fall in 1989, there was a new opportunity to fulfill the Great Commission; Eastern European governments were literally begging to be taught by Americans how to restructure their society. Then in August of 1990, I read a news article stating that the Soviet government had now completely lifted all bans on missionary activity within the Soviet Union.

When I heard this I expected that Bible schools would be established, that Christian media resources would be developed within the Soviet Union and thousands of missionary works would begin to help establish churches. But the response has been limited. Even some of the fastest growing churches in America have yet to establish permanent works within the Soviet Union. Why? Because of an established Conspiratorial worldview in most evangelical, Pentecostal and charismatic churches.

We were told by many reputable evangelists that the door was only going to be open for a short time. This belief was consistent with the idea that the Soviet Union is somehow a part of an evil empire that will one day emerge as a part of an Antichrist government. The idea that openness could be permanent was foreign to the Conspiratorial worldview. As a consequence, an evangelism-only strategy was adopted by many churches. The lasting fruit from this type of strategy, I was told by many Russian Christians, has been more limited than from the established works built on solid foundations.

When a door opened for me to go to Russia in 1991, I was so excited that I began to plan on beginning a Russian language newspaper. I did this because I believed that the hand of God was moving the nations of that region toward reform and lasting revival. Today there is a Christian newspaper based out of the Ukraine that will help to further the current revival. If I had believed that the door was about to close, then I never would have invested so much of God's time and money in a losing cause.

Of course, it was a great risk; I could have been wrong. When the three day coup occurred last August, I even heard a famous Christian leader say on his broadcast that this was the closing of the Iron Curtain that he had prophesied. But I couldn't fathom that the God of history, Who is all-powerful, would play such a cruel trick on millions of believers, giving them such a great expectation only to allow an evil empire to close its steel trap on their hope. Rather, I interpreted the coup as the "death scream of communism." Because of a firm belief in the Providence of God, my faith was not shaken.

A Crossroads In Our History

Almost all of the great theologians of the past century believed firmly in the Providence of God, as did almost all the revivalists and all the Protestant Reformers. America was colonized and founded by Christians who held to this view. This is what gave them their vision and from their ideas came the greatness of America. From these saints we have learned a proper view of history, one which gives us great hope and confidence.

Yes, we can make progress as a nation once again. Even though many problems seem to have grown worse over the years and America currently faces serious predicaments which threaten its existence, we still may act to change our course in history.

At the deciding juncture stands the American Church. Much of our demise has to do with the rejection of the Providential worldview by the Church in favor of Conspiracy theories. In the same way that Christian truth has contributed to our country's greatness, now Christian error could lead to its demise. It is vital that Christians now throw off the yoke of crippling pessimism about America, about our leaders, and about our destiny as a people. Victory is still a possibility if we are willing as a nation, and more importantly, as the corporate Church of America, to repent of fatalism and apathy.

"Never before has there been such a great opportunity to see the Church make historic advances in world evangelization. Especially in the remaining 12,000 distinct ethnic groups worldwide representing some two billion people who have no indigenous witness of the Church among them. This opportunity is corresponding with an increase of revival understanding in America. All across the nation irrespective of denomination there is a greater acknowledgement of the need for revival, and enlarged vision of spiritual awakening, along with a rising momentum in prayer for revival.

"While all of this is very encouraging, we are still at a crossroad. Spiritually bewildered and doctrinally confused, unable to discern between revival and disaster. Many Christian authors have poured enormous energies into paper back pulp trying to sway individual saints as to their futuristic view of the Church especially the short term future of this present generation.

"The vast majority of these 'prophetic' books violate every proper method of Biblical scholarship and interpretation, and instead rely on sensational conspiracy theories, escapist delusions, fanciful speculation, and a defeatist worldview regarding the Church's role in society. The result? Baffled, schizophrenic saints who on one hand are challenged by the prospect of revival leading to increased world evangelism, yet because of a disastrous worldview believe such glory to be impossible. These are beloved saints who wish to live godly, holy lives, yet make no provision to finish the race mainly because they really do not believe they will have to finish it!"⁸

Evangelist and teacher Jeff Ziegler has recommended several steps for Christians who wish to abandon a Conspiratorial view of history:

"First, stay away from sensationalistic, conspiratorial trash! Just because a particular book may be carried by a Christian bookstore does not mean that it is doctrinally balanced or theologically correct no matter how popular the author may be.

"Second, build a library of Christian classics and sound devotional material. Gain a biblical vision from the witness of those saints who have proven the victorious Christian life to be valid. Cease from Bible mutilating proof texting and start to learn to read the scriptures contextually.

"Third, study the creeds of historic Christianity for sound declarations of Christian belief. Start with the Nicene Creed and the Apostles Creed, then graduate to the most exhaustive, complete and doctrinally correct statement of the historic Christian faith entitled the Westminster Confession. Copies of these documents may be obtained from your local library.

"However, no creed, no study aid, no matter how pure, can take the place of disciplined private prayer, devotion, and concentrated Bible study ... If you repent and ask for grace to restore your spiritual fortitude and vigor, soon you will "mount up with wings as an eagle" and soar into the glorious sunrise of revival!"⁹

What does the future hold?

Rather than be suspicious of the "true intentions" of world statesmen in their quest for peace, we should have faith in the Providence of God. As Christians, we need to remember that, as Woodrow Wilson said, "God's arm is ever around us." Temporary setbacks are not evidence that Truth will not ultimately prevail in history. We need to view history as the gradual unfolding of God's purposes for the earth. We should not be swayed by crises when they occur.

When we begin to study the millennial theology of the Puritans and the Revivalists, we will find a few happy surprises for our generation:

First, the Puritans believed that the millennium would begin to come in its fulness when the nations of the earth began to be liberated from tyranny and the Gospel was being preached in every nation. This would be accompanied by great advances in science and medicine. The Puritans who settled America believed that their model of government based on Christian charity was destined to be copied by every settlement in the New World. Ultimately, this social order would be copied by the nations of the Old World as well.

Second, the Puritan thinkers did not place an immanency on the beginning of the millennium. One hundred years after the Puritans, Jonathan Edwards placed a general date on the time period when all these things would come to pass. He predicted that the latter half of the twentieth century would bring the greatest revival in history. It would be a time when the nations would begin to stream into the Kingdom of God. During the Second Great Awakening in 1825 some revivalists thought "that the millennium was approaching. Four years later, the most conservative reckoning placed its advent at between fifty and two hundred years' distance."¹⁰

Third, a belief in post-millennialism does not imply a secular theory of progress. This way of thinking should not constrain you to place all your hopes on the United Nations or George Bush's New World Order to bring about world peace. However, a belief in the Providence of God does not constrain you to fear these institutions either. If they are institutions given by God, then they will succeed. If they are not, then they will ultimately fail. In any event, God's Providential plan for peace will prevail.

Fourth, a belief in post-millennialism does not downplay the importance of the Second Coming of Christ. It is merely a belief system about the unfolding of events before the Second Coming. Any Christian who holds to the historic, orthodox creeds of the faith should delight in the Second Coming. Complete victory should never be assumed until death itself has been vanquished. This can only happen when Christ returns. The ultimate hope of the millennium is the actual, physical return of Christ to the earth with the saints of all ages.

In the meantime, we should concern ourselves with the work that needs to be done on earth before He returns. Promoting revival and spiritual awakening among the nations, working for the reformation of social structures and governments, and the complete restoration of the experience of New Testament Christianity to the Church should be our threefold goal.

I recently watched the film Cromwell about the life of the great English statesman. And it occurred to me that God is calling Christians to do for America in the 1990s, what Cromwell tried to do for England in the 1600s. At the very end of the film, Cromwell assumes power and he says:

"I will give England back its self-respect. We will walk in this world with our heads held high. I will liberate men's souls from the darkness of ignorance. I will build schools and universities for all. This will become the Golden Age of learning. I will bring the law within the reach of every common man. There will be work and bread for all. This nation will prosper because it is a godly nation and because we walk hand in hand with the Lord!

"I will see this nation properly governed - I swear by the name of the Living God - If I have to do it myself. Dear God give me the strength to do it alone."

There are many who are called to come and work side by side, to stand at the wall and build with one hand, while we fight the enemy with the other, until this vision is accomplished. We should be excited about this great opportunity and we should, like Joshua and Caleb, not be afraid to go up and possess the land. Great victories lie on the horizon. Today is just the beginning of the Kingdom of God coming on the earth in fullness and power.

We should be thankful to God that He is letting us live to be a part of His coming glory that is going to fill all the nations of the earth. We should be grateful that He has let us live to see the day when His Kingdom will reign.

Whatever Happened to Western Civilization?

By Jay Rogers

3/92

"HEY, HEY! HO, HO!

Western culture has got to go!"

- Students at Stanford University led by the Reverend Jesse Jackson
(Presumably, meaning "it" and not the course.)

Western Civilization is under attack. In university classrooms all over America, once revered figures such as Christopher Columbus, William Shakespeare, John Milton and George Washington are now being castigated as "dead white males." The glib chant of Stanford students quoted above has become expressive of a swelling surge of protest which appeared on campuses in the late 1960s and has continued unabated to this day.

The great contempt in which the ideals and values of Western culture are held, was brought to light a few years ago at a time when Stanford required its students to take a course entitled "Western Culture." Students were required to read at least fourteen works which had defined and shaped Western civilization. The survey began with Aristotle and traced the history of great western philosophers to the present day. The course was attacked by radical students and faculty, because - after all - Aristotle and his compatriots were all dead, white males. And worse - it is imperialistic to think of Western culture as being unique or special.

Other Ivy League schools soon joined in the fray. Of course, the fight over the literary canon is more than just a battle over ideology; it a political debate. It involves a rejection of Western culture's traditional values and its authoritative works. Today the crusade against the ideology taught in Western civilization courses has become an almost universal part of academic politics. The merits of these courses have come to stand for the merits of Western civilization as a whole.

The campaign against Western culture - sometimes called multiculturalism - is not simply a call for equal time for other cultures that make up the world. Clearly this would be a noble cause. Yet more often than not the champions of multiculturalism promote an accompanying disdain for the values and beliefs that have sustained Western culture. Nobody knows for sure exactly what these people are so angry about. And even more baffling to the casual observer, there seems to be no certain agenda for reform except a destructive nihilism.

But let us propose that behind the diatribe against Western culture is an attack on the religious faith that has characterized the West. Indeed the basic theme of multiculturalism is as much anti-Christian as anti-Western. At the root of the attack on Western civilization in America is a more subtle attempt to discredit Christianity. This campaign is cleverly conceived; the tactics are usually carried out in history and literature courses.

The first step is to bring all the worst aspects of Western society into the forefront of the student's mind. Popular doctrines of late 19th century America are discussed: the idea that "might makes right," the concepts of Manifest Destiny, male dominance and white supremacy. The student is led to believe that unjust wars, imperialism, the exploitation of the Third World, the build-up of the military industrial complex, and the destruction of the rain forests are all somehow the result of a pervading insensitivity glorified in the novels of white American males.

The next phase in the plan is to equate Christianity with Western culture. By the convenience of being born American, many of the authors in question can also be presented as Christian. For instance, Herman Melville, a transcendentalist, is often presented as being a Christian simply because he uses biblical symbolism in his novels.

The next step is to introduce authors of femininity, color and Eastern religion (or merely anti-Christian philosophy) who exemplify the opposite philosophy in each vilified genre. The student is left believing that since Christianity and Western culture are inseparable, Christian ideology is also unacceptable.

In order to prove that a subtle attack on Christianity exists in modern educational systems, we need to trace the history of Western civilization back to the time of the first few centuries A.D., to a time when Christianity was part of eastern culture and the Greco-Roman worldview exemplified the West.

The study of the historical development of civilization and culture is a study of worldview. Worldview is defined as the basic presuppositions of a people in a given society; how they look at life; and the basic truths which form their values and beliefs. When we look at any civilization or culture, it is as though we are looking at a vast tapestry made up of many intertwining threads. The picture formed by this tapestry symbolizes the worldview of that civilization's culture. As each strand in the tapestry of Western civilization is disentangled before our eyes, we can see which threads originally belonged to the pagan worldview and which belonged to the Christian worldview.

The Judeo-Christian Worldview

The most important thread that defines our Western culture and has given it permanence is religious in nature. But it was more than religion that shaped the worldview of Christians during the first few centuries. There were many religions that vied for the attention of the peoples of the Roman Empire. A vast array of mixtures, philosophies and syncretism characterized the world into which Christianity emerged. The Western world of the first century A.D. was hungry for religion; yet the classical religions of Greece and Rome had little to offer. Instead many people turned to eastern mysticism and philosophy.

The Christian worldview rested on the belief in an infinite and personal God Who had spoken through the prophets of the Jews and had revealed Himself in the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. The early Christians had knowledge about God and the universe that rested with revelation and not speculation. They had absolute, universal values by which to live and by which to judge their society. Above all they had value for the basic dignity of the individual based on the belief that each man is unique and created in the image of God.

This worldview collided with force into the basic values and beliefs of the Greco-Roman system. At different intervals in the first three centuries, under ten different Roman emperors, Christians were persecuted and put to death by the Roman government. At one point, Christians were accused of atheism (because they did not worship Caesar); cannibalism (because they "ate the Lord's Body"); and incest (because of "brotherly love"). The Christian apologist, Justin Martyr (100-167 A.D.), offered a defense in a letter to these charges written to the Roman Emperor Antonius Pius.

According to his own account, Dialogue with Trypho, Justin describes how he had studied one after the other of the philosophical systems - Stoicism, Aristotelianism, Pythagoreanism, and Platonism - and then came to Christianity. One day as he stood near the Aegean Sea just outside the city of Ephesus, an old man approached him.

"Does philosophy produce happiness?" asked the old man.

Absolutely," Justin replied, "and it alone."

In an extended conversation the old man suggested to Justin that there were many questions that Plato could not answer, but there is a true philosophy with an explanation for all questions. That philosophy is Christianity. The old man instructed Justin in the teachings of the Hebrew prophets and Jesus Christ. He encouraged Justin to seek God for the opening of his understanding: "For no one can perceive or understand these truths unless he has been enlightened by God and Christ."

Justin then describes his response: "When he had said these and many other things which it is not now fitting time to tell, he went his way, after admonishing me to meditate on what he had told me, and I never saw him again. But my spirit was immediately set on fire, and affection for the prophets, and for those who are friends of Christ, took hold of me; while pondering on his words, I discovered that his was the only sure and useful philosophy. Thus it is said that I am now a true philosopher."¹

The charge that Christians were atheists was easily refuted by Justin; he did not shrink back from using Platonic dialogue and Aristotelian logic in his defense of the Christian faith, nor did he exclude his knowledge of the Greek myths and philosophies in explaining the reasonableness of Christianity to the Roman Emperor. He did so in order to make contact with the needs and interests of his age. In the end, Justin was not successful in promoting tolerance for the Christian faith among the Roman rulers; he became a martyr in 167 A.D.

The sporadic persecutions of the Christians which occurred under the Roman Emperors did not occur simply because the Christians worshiped Jesus Christ. There were many gods in the Roman world. The reason that Christians were killed was that they refused to also enter into the unity of the Roman state by worshiping Caesar. Christians worshiped Jesus as God; they worshiped the infinite-personal God only. They allowed no mixture; all other gods were seen as false gods.

"No totalitarian system nor authoritarian state can tolerate those who have an absolute by which to judge that state and its actions. The Christians had that absolute in God's revelation. Because the Christians had an absolute, universal standard by which to judge not only personal morals but the state, they were counted as enemies of totalitarian Rome and were thrown to the beasts."²

But an assimilation of Greek and Roman philosophical ideas was not viewed as a compromise of faith by all Christians. The Apostle Paul cited Greek authors when it was to his advantage. At other times he used the knowledge he had gained as a Jewish Rabbi. The early Christians understood that Divine Reason, or LOGOS, had been revealed in part to both the Jew and the Gentile. The Jews had received God's revelation through the prophets, and the Gentiles had received some enlightenment through natural reasoning and the imprint of God's design in nature.

Thus Plato and Aristotle could not be dismissed as worthless pagans. Not every idea from Greek philosophy was of God, however, and the early Christians trusted that the Holy Spirit would guide them in discerning the true from the false. They had two witnesses to Truth: the Holy Spirit residing within them and the Scriptural writings of the Prophets and the Apostles. If a pagan idea did not line up with the Word of God, it was deemed false, but whatever did agree with the Scriptures was accepted as a fragment of divine truth revealed to the Gentiles.

The early Christians did not hesitate to use this concept in spreading the Gospel: All Truth is God's Truth, no matter where it may be found. However, we will see that only a vibrant, robust Christian faith could make this distinction. In later centuries, pagan thought forms that were unbiblical and false began to slip into the worldview of Christians who depended less and less on the Bible and more and more on the authority of church pronouncements.

The Greco-Roman Worldview

Roman civilization is the direct ancestor of the modern Western world. Combined with the Greek influence, Roman law and political ideas have had a strong influence on the West.

The Roman system was an empire built on conquest with incorporation, but without representation. The secret of Rome's strength lay in the fact that she incorporated vanquished nations into her own political body. Never before had so many people been brought under one government without making slaves of most of them.

Liberty had existed before in the barbaric tribes of Northern Europe and in Greek cities. Union had existed before in the despotism of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Persia and China. Now liberty and union were for the first time joined together. The whole Mediterranean world was brought under one government; many people of absorbed nations became Roman citizens and enjoyed the protection of Roman laws. Gradually the Roman Empire became permeated with the philosophy of the Greeks and the religion of the Jews and Christians. Human life was raised to a higher plane. The Greek notion of a democracy was almost realized.

But the Roman system had its fatal flaws. Its essential vice was a lack of representation; Rome's only notion of delegated power was that of authority delegated by the government to generals and prefects who ruled the absorbed nations from a distance. The Roman Empire was unable to avoid the weakening of local governments and the spirit of personal independence. Gradually liberty was lost; and the union prevailed. The central government was strengthened and the individual gradually lost his sense of nationalism and patriotism. The lack of locally elected representatives gradually led to despotism.³

"As the empire ground down, the decadent Romans were given to a thirst for violence and a gratification of the senses. This is especially evident in their rampant sexuality.... One easily observed example of the decadence of officially sponsored art is that the fourth-century work on the Arch of Constantine in Rome stands in poor contrast to its second century sculptures which were borrowed from monuments from the period of Emperor Trajan. The sponsored art was decadent, and music was increasingly bombastic. Even the portraits on the coins became of poor quality. All of life was marked by the predominant apathy.

"As the Roman economy slumped lower and lower, burdened with an aggravated inflation and a costly government, authoritarianism increased to counter the apathy. Since work was no longer done voluntarily, it was brought increasingly under the authority of the state, and freedoms were lost. For example, laws were passed binding small farmers to their land. So, because of the general apathy and its results, and because of oppressive control, few thought the old civilization worth saving.

"Rome did not fall because of external forces such as the invasion by the barbarians. Rome had no sufficient inward base; the barbarians only completed the breakdown - and Rome gradually became a ruin."⁴

Pouring through the passes of the northern mountains, hordes of barbarians covered the fertile plains of the Italian peninsula. In the fourth century, the Vandals, the Visigoths, and other Germanic tribes, descended in periodic raids devouring the countryside, consuming crops, slaughtering livestock, burning homes and villages, and massacring the inhabitants of Rome.

When the invading German barbarians sacked Rome they also took with them the vestiges of Christianity in the form of art, literature, and a few holy men who invaded the Germanic culture with what we now know as "civilization." Through simple, passive resistance Christianity overcame the Roman Empire. By outlasting the persecutions of the Roman emperors, the Christians laid the lasting foundation of Western society, not only by becoming the predominant faith, but also by preserving many valuable features of Greco-Roman culture.

Thanks to the Monks, the Bible was preserved - along with sections of Greek and Latin classics. The old music, too, was sometimes kept alive by constant repetition. Some of the music came from Ambrose, who had been bishop of Milan from 374 to 397 and who had introduced to his people antiphonal psalmody and the singing of hymns.

Neo-Platonism

When Rome fell to the invading Germanic tribes the culture of the Eastern Roman or Byzantine Empire was separated from that of the Western Empire. The first great dividing line in history is the end of the Ancient era and the beginning of the Medieval era. This dividing line is commonly associated with the fall of the Western Roman Empire in 476 A.D. (Although some historians consider the Medieval era to commence with the death of King Charlemagne, another important figure in Western civilization.)

The most influential philosophy at this time was contained in the revamped teachings of Plato, dubbed neo-Platonism. Alfred North Whitehead has remarked that the entire history of European philosophy is a series of footnotes to Plato.⁵ Indeed, Plato understood something crucial about society: if there are no absolutes, then the individual things (the particulars) have no meaning. The absolute is that which gives unity and meaning to our world.

As a Christian philosophy, this teaching came about primarily through the writings of Saint Augustine, a fifth century Christian philosopher, and Ambrose of Milan (339-397). These two great leaders emphasized a true biblical Christianity. Yet in later centuries, the increasing reliance on Greek thought instead of Scripture led to a distortion away from biblical teaching.

Coupled with the breakdown of Roman order came a time of turmoil, frequent wars, and intellectual discontinuity in the advance of learning. Yet through the turmoil, Christianity in even a diluted form, extended a tremendous civilizing influence on the northern tribes of Europe through extending the Christianized art forms; medieval economic teaching which exalted the virtue of honest, well-executed work; an impressive network of church hospitals and charitable institutions; and impressive architecture.

The Holy Roman Empire

The Holy Roman Empire made popular what was known as "Christendom" to the pagan tribes of Northern Europe. King Charlemagne was probably the furthest thing from a "Christian" in terms of the biblical definition. He was a formidable man with colossal energy. He was also a great warrior and constantly on the campaign. By using primarily the Roman method of nation making in his conquest of the northern tribes, Charlemagne forced the inhabitants of Europe into Christian baptism (much in the same way as Roman Emperor worship was enforced a few centuries earlier) through bishops and prelates through whom Charlemagne delegated government.

Thus Charlemagne laid the foundations for feudal society. He preserved Christianity in form, but denied the free will experience of accepting Christ to the common people. The medieval institution of Christendom was introduced at this period. Europe was regarded as Christ's kingdom. Baptism was not primarily a spiritual experience, but became socially and politically significant since it denoted entrance into society. The medieval church began to stray far from the ideals laid down by the Apostles and preserved by the early church Fathers. Yet it is the medieval model of Christianity that is presented to those studying Western Civilization courses on America's university campuses.

The Holy Roman Empire of the Middle Ages was a hodgepodge of Greek, Roman, German and, yes, Christian virtues made into a feudal society. The result was a government and society structure that more resembled the Western Roman/pagan worldview than the Jewish heritage from which Christianity sprang. In fact, primitive Christianity was not Western at all, but shared the Oriental influences of the Jewish culture. Some elements of Greek culture, such as the arts, philosophy and government, were not discarded in the Medieval age.

The Bible teaches that all of man's institutions are given by God. The Christian worldview merely infuses the principles of God's Word and the spiritual life of Christ's Kingdom into each institution thereby bringing greater life and more harmonious order to society. It was beneficial for Christians of the early Middle Ages to adopt the art, philosophy and government of the ancient period. Some elements of that culture were deemed as "good" and therefore pleasing to God and were retained by the early Christians.

Art and architecture, for instance, are neutral forms with regard to the Judeo-Christian idea of good and evil. Yet the art of the Middle Ages portrays the increasing drift from biblical teaching. Michael Gough in The Origins of Christian Art writes of the change from "the acceptance of an element of naturalistic realism to a preference for the fantastic and unreal.... The last vestiges of realism were abandoned."⁶

"Byzantine art became characterized by formalized, stylized mosaics and icons. In one way there was something good here - in that the artists made their art a witness [for Christ] to the observer. Many of those who made these did so with devotion, and they were looking for more spiritual values. These were pluses. The minuses were that in the portrayal of their concept of spirituality they set aside nature and the importance of the humanity of people."⁷

The Romanesque and Gothic architecture of this period was one of the greatest developments. The first great medieval style - the eleventh century Romanesque - looked back to Roman styles. The distinguishing marks of churches built during this period were the rounded arch, thick walls and dim interiors. The Gothic style first appeared in 1140 exemplifying great artistic and structural advances. The pointed arches, the flying buttress and many large, high windows which allowed light from above to stream into the cathedral are beautiful architectural accomplishments.

The architecture of the Middle Ages also expressed the change in the prominence of biblical teaching in the Church. "During the change from the Romanesque to the Gothic, Mariology began too grow in the church. The Romanesque churches were not dedicated to the Virgin, but the Gothic churches of France were overwhelmingly dedicated to her. The birth pangs of the Middle Ages were characterized by an awakened intellectual life and an awakened piety. Yet at the same time the church continued to move away from the reaching of early Christianity as distortions of biblical doctrine increased."8

During the whole period of the Middle Ages proper (from about 500 to 1500) the pendulum swung back and forth between an attempt to reform both church and society and a retreat back into the darkness which characterized the spiritual leadership of most of the Catholic church at that time.

In the 12th century, Thomas a Beckett, no enemy to Catholicism or the church hierarchy, once told a pope to his face that the people thought that the Roman Church, which is the Mother of all Churches, behaves more like a stepmother than a mother. The Scribes and Pharisees sit there placing on men's shoulders burdens too heavy to be borne. They load themselves with fine clothes and their tables with precious plate; a poor man can seldom gain admittance."

The Conciliar Movement stood for a revival of the idea that the real authority in the church is vested not in one bishop, the pope, but in all the bishops together in a council. The Council of Constance was successful in deposing three rival popes, ending a scandalous era in the Catholic Church. The council declared that all men were directly subject to Christ, and not men, in matters of religious faith. The Councilar Movement failed, however, and the principle of monarchy rather than representation triumphed within the Roman church.

The Modern Era

The Age of Exploration, the Renaissance and the Reformation commenced the Modern era. These three revolutions occurred in Europe at about the same time. Each one of these events was fueled by biblical prophecy and signaled the advancement of Europe in three spheres of human achievement: art, politics and religion. This great step out of the Middle Ages brought the end of a political order which had dominated Europe for a thousand years.

The turning point in Christian worldview came at the time of the Reformation when Northern European Christians rediscovered the Bible. The Protestant Reformation was an attempt by the common people of Northern Europe to reclaim the experience of New Testament Christianity, both in their secular and religious lives. Many of the "Christian" structures of Europe, they found to be from either neo-Platonic, Greek, Roman or pagan origin rather than from the biblical structures of early Christianity. Many of the cultural advantages that the Northern Europeans had over the Greco-Roman culture during the time of the Reformation was that many of the features of their society were actually closer to being "Christian" than those promoted by the Holy Roman Empire.

For instance, the pagan-German moot, or town meeting, became the basis for American democracy when some of the separatist Puritans adopted it as an alternative to Episcopalian church government. Later, they adopted this structure to civil government when they came to settle Massachusetts. The town meeting was closer to the Saxon culture than the monarchy espoused by the Latinate nobles. Both structures are pagan in origin, however, representative government is endorsed in the Bible, while the monarchy is not. Much of the government that "Christian" Europe has endorsed over the centuries is actually what Jesus called "Gentile rule" and is to be condemned as demonic in origin.

The Germanic method of nation making differs from the Oriental and Roman methods which have already been discussed. The single feature of representation gives it profound significance. The other two methods of nation making require war and conquest in order to be put into operation. The German method (used by the English, and all the Teutonic tribes of northern Europe) does not necessarily require war and conquest. Wherever representational government is established, it is possible for a great nation to be formed by the peaceful union of neighboring states into a federal body. Federalism is by nature a peaceful form of government and nation making. Conquest in the Oriental and Roman sense is incompatible with it.

Federalism as a form of government was first practiced by the ancient Hebrews; the Bible records that the tribes of Israel existed in peaceful union with each other as one nation. In the beginning, they were governed by elders elected from each tribe. Then the early Christian Church took this practice from the Hebrew Scriptures. The churches instituted by the Apostles were local institutions only. Each local church was complete in itself and was related to the other churches as a portion the Universal Church. It wasn't until the Medieval Era when the Christian church at Rome began to embrace neo-Platonic philosophy, that the Roman model of civil government replaced the New Testament model of church government in the affairs of the Church.

American Culture

The foundational proposal of this article has been that Greco-Roman culture and Judeo-Christian culture are two distinct entities and must be properly discerned before any meaningful dialogue on Western civilization can occur.

American culture has been colored by the thread of the Protestant Reformation. This Christian worldview emphasized the return to a more biblical model of church government, yet also had its influence on almost every sphere of life. America is indebted to the rise of Western civilization after the Renaissance. The benefits of science, technology, medicine, art, music, constitutional government, democracy, the jury system, free enterprise, literacy, productivity, the concept of progress, the high standard of living, the raised status of women, and racial equality all had their roots in the Renaissance and the Reformation.

However, it is important to remember that the first Americans were Europeans who left the Old World during a time when the Reformation was still very much in progress. Some of the old ideas had not been completely evaluated and reformed.

American society has progressed at a more accelerated rate than any culture in history. The source of all positive progress can be traced to the Christian ideals that were brought here from Europe in the 17th century. Yet not all American ideals are uniquely Christian.

Every important issue from women's rights, to racism, morality, the arts, government, etc. can be explored from this viewpoint. Any reform movement that has done our society any good in this century has its roots in the Christian reform movements of 19th century America. No reform movement will continue to be effective unless it conforms to biblical principles.

The Drive Toward Multiculturalism

It has become the policy of much of American academia to discard all that is uniquely "Western" in favor of a worldview which elevates every other culture to a higher status. It is an obvious fact that new freedoms are emerging in the world and other cultures are fast becoming as important to the West as the Greco-Roman influence was 500 years ago.

The essential misunderstanding here is that these other cultures have elevated themselves without Christian influence. Even in the Soviet Union, prior to the break up into a Commonwealth of Independent States, dissident writers recognized that it was Christianity that held the answers for the reconstruction of their sick society. During the years of communist stagnation, one anonymously published dissident wrote:

"Mysteriously and unsuspected by the busy multitudes, Christian consciousness, once almost defunct, is stealing back. It is as if a door had opened while nobody was looking. Why is this rebirth taking place in our country, where Christianity is attacked particularly systematically and with great brutality, while the rest of the world suffers a decline of faith and religious feeling? Backsliding and denials notwithstanding, we live in a Christian culture in a Christian age, and it is Christianity that is the fermenting agent, the 'yeast of the world,' causing history to rise like dough in a trough, not only in the past but in the future as well. We are profoundly convinced that Christianity alone possesses enough motive force gradually to inspire and transform our world."9

In view of the admission of the largest communist state in the world that the atheistic philosophy is bankrupt, should leftist academicians in our own country follow suit? It is a fact that half of Africa has become Christian in the last 50 years. As much as ten percent of Communist Asia is Christian. Latin America is currently undergoing a Christian "Reformation" of its own. Millions of new evangelical believers are appearing every year in the formerly monolithically Catholic nations of South America.

At some point, the idea that Christianity should be relegated to the realm of religion (and is therefore irrelevant to the pursuit of knowledge) and has nothing to do with the progress of world cultures is going to be confronted by even the most irreligious of thinkers. When the humanist/materialist worldview is openly admitted to be false, we are going to see a revolution in the entire American university system.

The important fact to remember is that Western culture is a mixture of Christian and pagan worldviews. Once this concept has been grasped, it becomes easy to reconcile some of the atrocities committed by so-called "Christian" leaders with a respect for Western culture in general. It becomes clear where the faults with literary figures lie; and the defrocking of every major literary and historical figure becomes unnecessary. The fact that most of the "dead, white, male" authors in question were actually devoutly pagan in their worldview, does not undermine their positive contributions to our culture.

A Christian Era in World History

We are at a very significant juncture of world history. When historians look back at 1989, 1990, and 1991, the last few years will be considered watershed marks in the progress of human history. Just as the year 476 A.D. marked the end of the ancient age with the fall of the Western Roman Empire; and the year 1500 marked the end of the medieval age with the beginning of the Age of Exploration and the Reformation; so 1989 will mark the end of the Modern Age with the downfall of communism and the beginning of Islam's slide into turmoil.

We have now entered what some have called the Post-Modern Age. What part will you play in it? The direction of change in much of the Western world today involves the rejection of the philosophy of Marxism and its twin worldview: materialistic humanism. Instead many post-Marxist countries will be moving toward a Christian based reform movement. Every feature of many societies - East, West, and Third World - will be marked by a revival in interest in the New Testament and the teachings of Jesus Christ. Surely, the whole concept of progress is an arrogant idea unless Jesus Christ is at the source of all blessings.

The next era in human history may rightly be called the Christian era. The ideas and philosophies of Jesus Christ will reign in the hearts and minds of many people. Biblical prophecy indicates that a large portion of the earth will be converted to Christianity and the gospel will flourish in all the world's societies.

What type of person will be used in during this time to reform the nations? These reformers will look to Jesus Christ as Lord and God. They will express the great love of Christ to all people. Their actions, thoughts and intentions will express nothing but pure love and holiness. They will have a deep understanding of the Bible. They will be able to use biblical principles to discern the good and evil aspects of human life. They will use these principles to reform the nations without following the errors of religious political leaders of past centuries.

Many of these people will be young. People will be amazed at their wisdom and maturity. There will be an emphasis on equality in race and gender among the leaders of this movement. The university campuses of the world will become the centers for training powerful reformation leaders. They will volunteer freely to serve God. Without prior qualifications, many people will make themselves available and they will be suddenly thrust into positions of great authority and power.

If you are willing, you may be used of God to herald a revolution in world history. Jesus Christ is looking for volunteers today; men and women who desire to express his heart and character. Western civilization will be changed; Christianity will be restored to its original power and the world will never be the same.

"The Lord will stretch forth Thy scepter from Zion, saying,

'Rule in the midst of Thine enemies.'
Thy people will volunteer freely
in the day of Thy power;
In holy array, from the womb of the dawn,
Thy youth are to Thee as dew."

Westward Progress of the Gospel

- by Jay Rogers

The power of the Gospel to change nations has been seen throughout the course of history. Beginning in an upper room in Jerusalem in 33 A.D., an infant Church began to move westward, spreading the Gospel throughout the whole world. When Jesus breathed on His disciples saying, "Receive the Holy Spirit," each one was sealed for redemption, but now at Pentecost they had been clothed with the power to be witnesses to all nations.

Bringing personal salvation to individuals through the message of the Cross, the early Church also saw the power of the Gospel to transform families, communities, cities, and even entire nations. By the year 300 A.D., the early Church saw the Roman Empire come under the rulership of Jesus Christ. All those called out by God were given the task of bringing spiritual freedom to those enslaved by sin. The Spirit moved them to preach to those who felt their great need of salvation; to heal broken hearts; to open the eyes of entire cities held captive by idolatry; to spread the message of Liberty to the nations. Once their obedience was complete, they were to punish all disobedience.

Some abused this commission, however, and compromised to escape the message of the Cross. The Church lost its anointing and power of life in the Holy Spirit. Those in positions of Church authority looked to the pleasures of riches and earthly power. The needs of the poor and downcast were no longer attended to - their only consolation was in the hope of life to come.

Yet even through the centuries of the Dark Ages, there were a few who carried the torch of liberty. The true Gospel continued to travel westward bringing Christian civilization to northern Europe, planting the seeds of democracy in England, then providing nurture and growth for many colonies in the New World.

A democratic nation was formed in America by colonists who believed that all human thought must be subservient to God's word. They brought the accumulated philosophies of great Christian thinkers to the New World. Great men, such as John Wycliffe, John Hus, Martin Luther, John Calvin and John Locke, though they lived centuries before, all contributed something to the birth of a new nation. This new society was to be one in which all would have every kind of freedom and liberty.

New Colonists arrived by the hundreds of thousands from Europe. Among the new settlers were men and women of vision who desired to fulfill one divine purpose: to worship God in spirit and in truth. With one voice they echoed the prophetic cry of Moses to Pharaoh 3000 years before - "Let My people go that they may worship Me in the wilderness!"

In the early 1700s, America experienced a spiritual rebirth of such great magnitude that it became known as the Great Awakening. The Puritans had guided Massachusetts for over a hundred years, but now their dominion was waning. An eloquent and powerful preacher, Jonathan Edwards, rekindled spiritual vision in the Connecticut River Valley and the fervor spread throughout the colonies. Entire communities were transformed and the experience of the new birth became a common bond among thousands of people.

The result of this awakening was revolution and liberty. Jonathan Edwards, greatly influenced by the writings of John Locke, reiterated the purposes of the first colonists. Edwards heralded the rebirth of American philosophy - colonists had once imagined themselves as living in a redeemed land and the revivals resulting from the Great Awakening once again promoted the idea that the vision of "a city set upon a hill" was viable.

With the spiritual awakening came a revived democratic spirit. The Puritan Revival of over a hundred years earlier was a reaction against interference in the local church by Roman government structures. Each individual church now had the authority to govern itself. The dull, liturgical religion of the Church of England had always symbolized a source of oppression and a threat to true liberty. Now British authority became a symbol of tyrannical and intolerable acts against God's chosen people.

The Great Awakening gave the colonists a common experience. They began to see themselves not as divided colonies but as the United States of America. This sentiment was expressed a generation later in the writing of the Declaration of Independence:

"WE, therefore, the representatives of the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, in GENERAL CONGRESS, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World for the rectitude of our Intentions, do, in the Name, and by the Authority of the good People of these Colonies, Solemnly Publish and Declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES ... "

The American Revolutionary War occurred during a period of deep moral decline. Responses to excessive taxation by the British crown, such as riots in Boston, were not movements of the Spirit of God. However, biblical principles were so ingrained into the national consciousness that the writers of the Declaration and the Constitution had founded a nation securely on the Word of God.

The Declaration of Independence was based on the premise that "we are endowed by our Creator with certain unalienable rights: among these being Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness." The Constitution promised "to secure the blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our posterity." It was an unquestionable fact that the rights of all men were blessings given by God, and that the best laws to govern a nation would be derived from scripture. The United States government was established to protect these rights and carry out these laws. Once liberty had been established, America was ready for a new awakening.

The Second Evangelical Awakening began in camp meetings in the sparsely populated frontier. The mandate of this new awakening was found in Leviticus 25:10, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land to all its inhabitants." The initial outcome of this awakening was to soothe the wounds of the nation after the war and then to heighten the national conscience toward further reforms which were left undone by the founding fathers. Some of these reforms included the women's suffrage movement, the temperance movement, advances in public education and care for the mentally ill. The final and greatest result of the Second Great Awakening, however, was the abolition of slavery.

Charles G. Finney, the great revival preacher, recorded in his Memoirs: "I had made up my mind on the question of slavery, and was exceedingly anxious to arouse public attention to the subject. In my prayers and preaching, I so often alluded to slavery, and denounced it, that a considerable excitement came to exist among the people."¹

The excitement that accompanied Finney's revivals affected one young man named Theodore Weld. Weld was initially and vehemently opposed to Finney's work, but was converted in Utica, New York during one of Finney's meetings. Weld was a formidable enemy to Mr. Finney, but after his salvation he became an ardent supporter. Weld travelled with Finney, assisting the preacher in his meetings and later emerged as a student leader at Lane Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio. ²

Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of the revolutionary novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin, lived at Lane with her father, and was an acquaintance of Theodore Weld. Her father, Dr. Lyman Beecher, had been appointed president at Lane, and it was here that Harriet first encountered the radical abolitionist sentiments of Finney's young disciple. ³

After 18 years of living across the Ohio River from slave holding communities, and partly inspired by the moral outrage that accompanied the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, Stowe began to document cases of extreme cruelty of slave masters. The inspiration of Uncle Tom's Cabin was the result of a God-sent vision of a slave suffering, being beaten, yet forgiving his tormentors.⁴ Harriet Beecher Stowe was unprepared for the phenomenal sensation that her abolitionist novel created. Infused with the explosive spirit of the Second Great Awakening, this novel did more to increase America's outrage to slavery than did any other previous influence.

After less than a century since the signing of the Declaration of Independence, America was embroiled in a bloody Civil War. Abraham Lincoln, who had previously met with Mrs. Stowe, stood in the aftermath of the Battle of Gettysburg and gave his famous address. Standing in the midst of one of the most tragic scenes in American history, Lincoln reaffirmed the intentions of God in birthing the principles of liberty in our nation:

"Fourscore and seven years ago, our forefathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in Liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

Lincoln reminded the American people that their history and philosophy were rooted in God's Word as he alluded to the words of John Wycliffe:

"The nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the face of the earth."

In the 20th century, the Gospel has progressed further westward, sparking the Pentecostal Revival in Los Angeles, California in 1906, and then appearing more recently in the South Pacific Islands, South Korea, and the Philippines. Revivals appearing on the rim of the Asian continent are poised to invade the Bamboo Curtain, penetrating the world's greatest nations with the Gospel, bringing the fruits of freedom and liberty to the mass of humanity.

Currently, the world is in the midst of the greatest awakening in all history. Although evidence of this is scarce in England and America, two nations which have long since backslidden from God's great calling, the current awakening is spreading in the nations of the Third World. Asia, South America and Africa are the greatest recipients of an unprecedented outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

How can we know specifically what the result of this present awakening will be?

The Bible holds the answer to this question: "Surely the Lord does nothing unless He reveals His secret counsel to His servants the prophets" (Amos 3:7).

In 1958, Leonard Ravenhill published his classic book, Why Revival Tarries. This work described the backslidden condition of America and the hindrances to revival in our nation.

"At the operation of the Spirit, men at this moment 'drawing iniquity with a cart rope,' will bend as corn before the wind. The Kremlin will tremble at the news of a supernatural operation in China. May God precipitate revival in China, Russia, Germany etc. - lands scorched with the fire of militant Communism. For one reason, they need it so greatly; for another, our free nations need to be provoked, as Jonah was with Nineveh." 5

Is the "supernatural operation" in China prophetic of the student demonstration in Tiananmen Square? Is Gorbachev the leader who is trembling in Moscow? Gorbachev has expressed concern over the prospect of a student rebellion in Moscow. In a Washington Post interview, he is quoted as saying, "We, too, have hotheads who want to renovate socialism overnight."

Gorbachev appears to be a man overcome by his own creation. He was the author of glasnost; he created it and preached it around the world. The Chinese students received it and made the concept their own. The student revolt in Tiananmen Square was the fruit of Gorbachev's efforts. Unforeseen to the Soviet leader, his presence in China sparked the onset of an idea whose time had come.

The result of the current world awakening will be the downfall of Communism. China, the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will be blessed with greater fruits of liberty than America has ever experienced. God has ordained this in order to provoke our backslidden nation to jealousy.

Wherever Liberty has appeared throughout the world, it has always been the Christian community that has been at the forefront of establishing it. The Gospel's power to transform nations will continue to have its effect. What is happening in China and the Soviet Union today is the result of the faithful prayers of God's people.

Whenever an awakening appears to be taking hold of a nation, surely the result will be increasing liberty and the establishment of justice according to biblical principles. Despite the efforts of evil men to curtail the operation of the Spirit, the Gospel will continue to move westward until one day it will encompass the globe, filling all creation with the glory of God.

Looking Back at the 1980s: The World Democracy Movement

During the 1980s, the news headlines indicated that a sweeping move toward democracy, not communism, was the new trend among world governments.

Progress toward increasing freedom began slowly in the early part of the decade as Poland's Solidarity movement emerged. By 1986, a major transition in the leadership of the Kremlin was instituted when Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev introduced his policies of perestroika (reconstruction) and glasnost (openness).

The torrential force released by these new ideas culminated during this last year of the decade with student demonstrations and the resulting massacre in Beijing's Tiananmen Square. And in November, East Germany dismantled its communist government and effectively removed the scar of the Iron Curtain by opening the 28 year-old symbol of communist repression - the Berlin Wall.

What is happening in these countries is a part of an international movement toward democracy. According to Wan Runnan, a wealthy Chinese businessman and one of the key organizers of last spring's student demonstration in Beijing, "What is happening in China and Eastern Europe is a worldwide trend. Communism will come to an end at the end of the century."

In the early 1980s, Solidarity emerged as an illegal movement in Poland. Lech Walesa, leader of Poland's trade union movement, has said that Poland was "a jumping off point to the entire Eastern Bloc - and also an experiment as a base of the next ones."

Changes occurring in the Soviet Union today through perestroika, through the emergence of splinter parties in the Baltic States, and through reform in the rest of Eastern Europe could not have taken place without the efforts of the Solidarity movement. Though initially illegal, Solidarity struggled towards legal status, became legal, and was implemented by the government as a method of reform.

Now officially recognized by the Polish government, Poland's Solidarity party is challenged by high expectations, and its success will continue to serve as a model for the rest of Eastern Europe in the 1990s. In Hungary, a slightly different situation has occurred. The more democratic elements within the communist government have been able to effect reform due to the policies of Mikhail Gorbachev.

In the Soviet Union during the 1980s, a weakening economy, the death of Leonid Brezhnev, a more democratic voting process, the election of a younger, less conservative government, and the emergence of Gorbachev has paved the way for the restructuring of many aspects of the largest nation in the world.

The elimination of many communist conservatives within the Kremlin has also alleviated the mistrust of the Soviet Union among the nations of the West.

The turnaround in the Soviet Union's expansionist policies occurred in the mid-1980s when it became apparent that Soviet troops had failed to exert control over Afganistan. The Soviet republics of Armenia and Azerbaijan are now on the brink of a war over a territorial dispute; the Azerbaijani Popular Front has asserted Azerbaijan's right to secede from the Soviet Union. Should Azerbaijan secede, it is unlikely that the Soviet government would be in favor of fighting another war against united Muslim nationalists.

In the Baltic States and the Soviet Republic of the Ukraine, similar popular fronts have emerged. In the Soviet republics of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia, a nationalistic fervor has been growing so quickly that the Kremlin has taken seriously the Baltic States' threat of secession but has been unable to keep up with the demand for reform. In the Ukraine, an autonomy movement has been launched which has called for an independent Ukraine within a free union of independent republics.

The legislature of Soviet Georgia recently announced that the annexation of the republic to Soviet Union 70 years ago was the result of wrongful military intervention and that the republic has the right to secede. At a time when ethnic tensions and demonstrations for autonomy are mounting, Soviet Georgia's talk of leaving the Soviet Union further complicates the Kremlin's attempt to keep the 15 Soviet republics from dissolving into independent nations.

More recently, the nations of Eastern Europe have followed suit. In East Germany, protesters continued to demonstrate for greater freedom while the Communist Party struggled for survival. In Czechoslovakia, an estimated 30,000 protesters marched through the streets of Prague, and in Sofia, Bulgaria, thousands rallied for democratic change and demanded the legalization of independent political groups.

Impending economic disaster has sent the population of many communist countries into social upheaval. The dismantling of rigid hierarchical government structures was a necessary response to social and economic turmoil.

Perhaps nowhere was this pattern so evident as in mainland China, where the economy has been failing at an alarming rate since the massacre on June 4th. Despite the government's attempt to cover up the massacre, many Chinese know the truth about Tiananmen Square. The government, once open to reforms, responded to the May student uprising by using the most repressive measures since the Cultural Revolution. However, the winds of change are sweeping quickly through China.

Wan Runnan, one of the Chinese democracy movement's most influential leaders, is currently organizing the Federation for a Democratic China. Wan encourages Chinese students studying in foreign countries to stay overseas for as long as possible and to return to China at an opportune time.

Wan has predicted that the ensuing economic disaster will force the Li Peng regime to step down from China's leadership. At that time, Wan believes, the government will use Li Peng as a scapegoat, blaming him for China's economic woes. Li Peng will be held responsible for the massacre, and the student demonstrators will be reevaluated as patriots. Within 10 years, the current generation studying overseas will be able to play a strategic role in restructuring Chinese government and society.

The worldwide movement toward democracy is accelerating as students are beginning to question the tenets of Marxism and are embracing the democratic ideals of basic human rights and a multi-party system. Communist Party members are grappling with the reality that the system of government promised to them by their leaders has degenerated into nothing more than corrupt totalitarianism. The common people are not concerned with political philosophies, but they know that they have been exploited, and their voices, too, are ascending in a cry for freedom.

As we close out this century, we are fast approaching a time when totalitarian communism will have become an anachronistic system of a bygone era.

Sidebar: The Roots of Democracy

Democracy can be understood as a trend which has its roots in Christian philosophy. "Government of the people, by the people and for the people" is a phrase coined by John Wycliffe, a 14th century Catholic monk whose English Bible sparked a social revolution in England. Wycliffe's theology later provided the foundation for the Protestant Reformation.

The trend toward increasing liberty for the common people was continued by Christian philosophers such as John Hus, John Calvin, and John Locke. The accumulated philosophy of these great thinkers provided the basis for American democracy.

The Puritans, whose mass exodus from England in the 17th century formed one of the first permanent colonies in the New World, were the first to implement democratic government. Since that time, democracy has been consistently promoted by the Christian community. History has shown us that the nations of the world are seldom able to responsibly handle the rights afforded by democracy without a strong church upholding the moral standards of the population in that society.

The French Revolution of 1789 resulted in moral chaos and political anarchy, while America's War for Independence in 1776 provided for the creation of a stable government and a united nation. The point of division between France and America was that, unlike the French, Americans had experienced a strong renewal of Christianity during the Great Awakening several decades prior to the Revolutionary War. Americans were better able to handle the responsibility of democracy due to spiritual preparation.

The same pattern is being repeated in the communist countries of the world today. In countries where there is strong spiritual revival in the churches, such as Poland, the Baltic States, and Hungary, the democracy movement has had the strongest growth. It remains to be seen whether or not the house church movement in China, which has grown to 50 million in the last 20 years, is strong enough to provide the moral leadership needed to support a democratic society.

Are People Born Homosexual?

Dorm Bible Study Column
- by Glenn Duneheew

Anytime I discuss the Bible in relation to current issues on campus, I touch the number one fear in America: AIDS. Most people understand what it is but have sincere questions about why the disease has become such an epidemic in our society. People always ask me what the Bible says about homosexuality, and they usually have similar questions on the topic. Here are the most commonly asked questions, along with their answers from the Scripture:

"Are People Born Homosexuals?"

Homosexuality has never been a part of God's design for people - and He has never created a person as a homosexual. When He created the very first family, He gave Adam a woman to meet the need for companionship and sexual fulfillment (see Genesis 2:18-25). This has always been God's design - and it is obvious in the natural and complimentary function of the male and female sex organs and the male and female temperaments.¹

Before sin entered the world through man's disobedience, heterosexual marriage was the only sexual relationship that existed on earth. It was after man's fall that such things as polygamy (Genesis 4:19), adultery (Genesis 12:17), prostitution (Genesis 38:15), and rape (Genesis 34:2) entered the world. Homosexuality was also an obvious development - as seen by the way it gripped the society of ancient Sodom (Genesis 19:4-5).

Why, then, do so many people insist that they were born homosexuals? Many times in our lives, events happen to us that are out of our control. It is how we deal with these events that will decide our future and how we react to other situations. Young boys sometimes encounter homosexual feelings because their fathers ignored them, thus driving them to side with their mothers and eventually emulate their mothers' sexual desires. Some people deal with homosexual feelings because they were molested as children.

The point here is that many people "feel" they are homosexuals - because their desires lean in that direction. These feelings may be reinforced by a childhood experience, an unkind comment from a schoolmate, or by parental rejection. But it does not mean that the person was born a homosexual - any more than people are born murderers, thieves, adulterers, or chronic liars.

Although a person may "feel" that his or her homosexuality is natural and normal, we must realize that feelings can mislead us. In the book of Jeremiah, we are told:

"The heart is more deceitful than all else and is desperately sick; Who can understand it?" (Jeremiah 17:9).

What we may "feel" is right is not necessarily morally right. We cannot trust our feelings to tell us how to live. The bottom line here is that we must live according to the principles of God's Word, and not according to our feelings. 2

"Can a Person Be a Christian and a Homosexual?"

There is no question that the Bible condemns homosexual behavior in both the Old and the New Testaments. Let's look at two examples:

"You shall not lie with a male as one lies with a female; it is an abomination" (Leviticus 18:22).

"Or do you not know that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor the covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (I Corinthians 6:9-10).

A Christian is a person who lives in obedience to the teachings of Jesus Christ, regardless of the personal sacrifice, recognizing Christ's teachings to be ultimate truth. Such obedience is made possible when a person is "born again" as a result of faith in what Christ did on His cross to redeem sinful man. After being born again, a person is enabled to abandon all things which God declares to be sinful. As proof of his faith, a true Christian will no longer live in a state of continual sin. He will no longer be a slave to sin and he will turn from and give up all evil ways. Though a Christian may struggle with sin and temptation in different forms, he will no longer live a lifestyle which is contrary to God's Word. This is clear in the following passage:

"No one who is born of God practices sin, because (Christ's) seed abides in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. By this the children of God and the children of the devil are obvious: anyone who does not practice righteousness is not of God, nor the one who does not love his brother" (I John 3:9-10).

No one can be a Christian and remain a practicing homosexual - it is a direct contradiction of God's Word. The very nature of Christianity is that it transforms people to live like Jesus Christ.

"Can Homosexuals Be Changed into Heterosexuals?"

Absolutely. The Bible says that there is hope and freedom for the homosexual. In the previously mentioned passage from I Corinthians 6, we are told that neither the sexually immoral, nor the idolator, nor male prostitutes, nor homosexual offenders will inherit the kingdom of God. But in the verse which immediately follows that passage, we read,

"And that is what some of you were. But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of God" (I Corinthians 6:11).

Jesus Christ can change any person - regardless of the type of sin they have been involved in. No sin is too big for God to forgive. The homosexual, like anyone else, simply needs to believe in the transforming power of Christ.

"Is AIDS a Curse from God?"

Before we can answer that question, we need to first establish what is meant by a curse. A curse, in the biblical sense, is not something evil that is simply put upon a person without a reason, nor is it irreversible. God does not go around cursing people with disease. Rather, a curse comes as a direct consequence of man's actions.

The Bible tells us that God "turns people over" to their own sin, allowing the natural consequences of their sin to take effect. In other words, if a man deliberately continues to break the law of God, God does not stop him - He allows him to go ahead and suffer the effects of that sin. The Bible says:

"Therefore God gave them over in the lusts of their heart to impurity, that their bodies might be dishonored among them. For this reason God gave them over to degrading passions; for their women exchanged the natural function for that which is unnatural, and in the same way the men abandoned the natural function of the woman and burned in their desire toward one another, men with men committing indecent acts and receiving in their own persons the due penalty of their error" (Romans 1:24, 26-27).

The question is not simply "Why did God allow this disease to come upon homosexuals?" It should also be asked, "Why did these people take the risk by getting involved in illicit sex?" Thousands of people today are being diagnosed as having the AIDS virus. Hundreds of thousands of AIDS cases remain unreported. Many of those with the virus are married - thus affecting more than just the homosexual community.

God is not going around vindictively cursing people with AIDS. This deadly virus is a direct consequence of immoral behavior which is now taking its toll on the general population. This is why God warns us to stay away from sin: because it kills. God's moral law was not given to take away our happiness; it was given to protect us from our own destructive passions and sinful practices.

But one thing is for sure: the AIDS epidemic in America has caused many thousands of people to reconsider their own actions. Countless young men who may have fallen into homosexuality have abstained simply because they did not want to contract the virus. Many women have refrained from getting involved in premarital sex because of the risk involved. This is a clear demonstration of God's love: He wants to keep as many people as possible away from certain destruction. Consider this verse:

"The Lord ... is patient toward you, not wishing for any to perish but for all to come to repentance" (II Peter 3:9).

Because He will not violate any man's free will, God will allow a person to be involved in sinful practices even if that practice leads to death. But He has never desired that a man should perish, and He certainly has not brought on the AIDS epidemic to bring suffering or death.

Culture of Androgeny

Blurring the Lines Between the Genders
by Lee Grady

Does anyone remember a time in America when men were men, women were women, and the children could tell the difference?

In case you haven't noticed, the entertainment industry and the educational establishment have teamed up in the last few years to try their best at destroying traditional sex roles. We are told that in this enlightened era we need to learn to be "gender neutral." Men are encouraged to explore their "feminine side"; women are pressured to get out into the working world and fight their way up the corporate ladder.

Michael Jackson, the epitome of 1980s androgynous chic, paints a clear picture in the minds of our youth that you don't have to be male or female - you can be both. He can belt out a song and dance about "The Man in the Mirror" and sound like Lady Soul at the same time. Meanwhile, polished talk show hosts assure us that we will all eventually be bisexual, thus ridding our society forever of unwanted stereotypes.

If this confusing trend continues, a trend which author George Gilder calls "the androgynous agenda," then America's sexual landscape is going to be drastically marred beyond recognition in a few more years. Consider some of the shocking developments which are taking place in relation to male and female roles:

- * The number of male flight attendants rose from none in 1960 to a current total of over 10,000. Other traditionally feminine occupations also have experienced a surge of male interest, all the way from telephone operators to male strippers; 1
- * Most state educational budgets now call for increased emphasis and spending on girls' athletics, and less for boys', causing boys' overall participation in school athletic programs to drop from 76 percent to 50 percent; 2
- * The Boy Scouts of America, after fighting several costly legal battles, announced last year that they will not bar women from becoming leaders of scout troops;
- * Leaders of mainline Protestant denominations have called for the removal of "sexist language" in the Bible and church hymns, proposing that God Himself is both male and female;
- * Recent court decisions have mandated that the U.S. Army must admit professed homosexuals into military service;

* The state of California has now officially recognized America's first lesbian sorority on the UCLA campus. Gay rights activists praised the decision as a great victory, and are expecting similar rulings in favor of homosexual fraternities;³

George Gilder, who chronicles this erosion of the sex roles in his excellent book Men and Marriage, says the trend should alarm us: "Every year's statistics break the previous records and ever more graphic images arise to signal the passing of the sexual concepts of masculine and feminine on which Americans have based their lives and expectations."⁴ But why is it that we are experiencing this sex role crisis?

Cultural Bone Rot

Actually, what we are experiencing in the U.S. today is nothing new. It happened in ancient Sparta and in glorious Rome. It happened in 18th century France and is presently occurring in the nations of modern Scandinavia - as well as most other democracies in the West. George Gilder calls it sexual suicide. It could also be called God's cultural judgment.

It is explained very simply in a Bible passage penned by the Apostle Paul, which he wrote to the Christians in Rome at a time when the imperial capital was well on its way to becoming an androgynous society. In this classic epistle he describes in detail the fate of a culture which rejects God's authority and His immutable laws:

"For even though they knew God, they did not honor Him as God, or give thanks; but they became futile in their speculations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing to be wise, they became fools ... Therefore God gave them over in the lusts of their hearts to impurity, that their bodies might be dishonored among them ...

"For this reason God gave them over to degrading passions; for their women exchanged the natural function for that which is unnatural, and in the same way also the men abandoned the natural function of the woman and burned in their desire towards one another, men with men committing indecent acts and receiving in their own persons the due penalty of their error" (portions of Romans 1:21-27).

This passage outlines the systematic breakdown of sex roles and the entire family structure itself - a structure which God designed to be the foundation of a healthy society. In a culture where men have rejected God's government and refused to submit to His moral requirements, a process of decay is set in motion. This moral entropy begins in the minds of men; as God's enlightening presence and protective influence is withdrawn, a pall of intellectual confusion settles over the society as a whole.

This intellectual depravity, as it progresses in intensity, brings about a twisting and a perverting of all that is natural and normal. And if we interpret Paul's comments to the Romans correctly, it would appear that sexual habits and roles are the ultimate target of this cultural bone rot process. When a society has divorced itself from God, the final result will be that men stop being men, women stop being women, and the institutions of marriage and family are destroyed.

When Paul tells us that men and women "abandon their natural function," this does not simply refer to homosexuality. What is "natural" for woman? Most assuredly her natural instinct is to marry, bear children, and devote much of her life to nurturing those children. In an anti-Christian society, women abandon these instincts. They revolt against the concept of childbearing, either through abortion or through neglect of nurturing responsibilities.

What is natural for the man? The most natural, God-given male instinct is for a man to give himself to one woman as her lifetime sexual partner in marriage, providing for her and for the children which they produce together. Whenever a civilization revolts against God, men simultaneously revolt against the institution of marriage.

This revolt does not begin with homosexuality. The large-scale breakdown of marriage in this country tends to parallel with the publication of Playboy magazine and the philosophy that it began to promote in the 1950s. Hugh Hefner's revolution encouraged men to leave the confines of marital fidelity under the guise of male sexual expression. But adultery is actually a revolt against masculinity and the natural male function, because it, and the resulting divorce, actually removes men from their primary role of husband, father and family provider.

Once men have rejected marriage, the door is then opened for the onslaught of homosexuality. Children no longer have a genuine male role model in the home, and this lack of a strong father figure completes the cycle of perversion: the young sons are sent out on a desperate search for the masculinity they never found by natural means, and the wounded daughters find it forever difficult to respect men when they reach adulthood.

Stopping "Gender Neutral" Policy

America's gradual drift from Judeo-Christian morality has now led us into the danger zone I have just described. One writer recently stated that the last twenty years in this country, in terms of public policy, could be described as "the homosexualization of America." But we did not get into this predicament without the help of an elite group of policymakers who have adopted an anti-family, anti-male, and anti-female agenda.

Leaders of the feminist movement (many of them are men, by the way) have told us that traditional sex roles are oppressive to one's individuality. They tell us that marriage is institutionalized rape, and that our economy is designed to enslave women to domestic duties. They tell us that women not only belong in the White House or on the construction site or in a fighter jet, but that we have a moral imperative to discriminate against men to put them there.

According to Gilder, Americans should learn a valuable lesson from the Swedes before it is too late. Over the last 25 years, Swedish social planners under the influence of feminism began to devise national policy that directly attacked the nuclear family. Legislation was enacted which removed all special protections for married women. Tax laws eliminated the joint return for a married couple, thus forcing both married partners to pay the same in taxes even if the wife did not work.

After a few years of such policy changes, it was impossible for a husband to provide for his family on one income. Women were forced into the workforce, and children were simultaneously forced into federal day-care facilities. Housing and tax benefits were even curtailed if families refused to place their children in the day-care centers. 5

Today in Sweden, traditional male and female roles have virtually been abolished. Men can no longer act as the principal providers. Women can no longer care for their children. Marriage has become a serious economic disadvantage, therefore most Swedish young people have rejected it. Not surprisingly, Sweden is now considering legalizing homosexual marriage - and will most likely be the first country in the world to do so.

Does the story of Sweden sound like a socialist nightmare? We are much closer to copying the Swedish pattern than most of us realize. Says Gilder, "The United States is enacting many of the policies that brought sexual suicide to Sweden. Despite the defeat of the Equal Rights Amendment and universal day-care, the feminists are gaining their ends piecemeal. In particular, the decline in the value of the child deduction has shifted the tax burden onto families with children.

"Through court decisions in favor of comparable worth, through the infiltration of the schools by feminists texts and teachers, through the day-care tax credits and other subsidies for the two-earner family, and through the rapid erosion of the joint income tax return and the housewife's right to social security, feminists are winning quietly by legal and legislative action what they cannot win in referenda."6

The Swedish agenda is already being seriously discussed in the halls of Congress as a viable option for American society. A bill proposing a massive federal day-care system is in consideration during this current legislative session. The feminist rallying cry is convincing more and more mothers to pursue employment outside the home. Our current welfare system has all but destroyed the self-esteem of lower class black males, mainly because single black mothers lose economic advantages if they marry.

What we need desperately in America today is a public policy which honors the clear differences between male and female; which places marriage in an honorable and economically desirable position; which eliminates no-fault divorce; which offers protection and security to the housewife; and which encourages home child care.

We cannot allow maleness and femaleness to drift together into a vague, unisexual zone of neutrality. We cannot allow monogamous marriage to become just one of several legally accepted lifestyles. We cannot allow federal economic policies to cripple and dismember the family structure.

Returning to pro-family policies will not be easy. It will require real men to stand up in the public arena to challenge the anti-gender activists. It will demand real women to defend the paramount role of traditional motherhood. But we cannot sit idly by while the social scientists plan America's sexual suicide. The culture which refuses to acknowledge and honor the differences between the sexes will neuter itself, and ultimately fade away into a childless oblivion.

Exposing the Myths

By Brendan Murray
2/92

Myth #1 10% of the Population is Gay

Recently, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation (Glad) purchased air time on the most listened to radio show in the country. Their advertisement stated that ten percent of the population of the United States was homosexual, a statistic contradicting everyday experience.

There is but a single major source for this little tidbit of misinformation, Alfred C. Kinsey's 1948 study entitled Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, and affectionately known as the Kinsey Report. What the report specifically claimed is that 10% of white males in the United States are "more or less exclusively homosexual" for at least three years between the ages of 16 and 55. Kinsey and his cohorts determined this primarily through interviews with 5300 white males. (For undisclosed reasons, 1000 black males were dropped from the evaluation process.)

Perhaps the strangest thing about the 10% theory is that it is widely accepted today not because of the accuracy of its findings, but simply because it is cited so much. The thing that most strikingly saps credibility from Kinsey's findings is the wealth of problems with the sample used.

Approximately 25% of the 5300 individuals Kinsey used were prison inmates, who by the nature of their confinement, couldn't have heterosexual intercourse. This is never admitted directly, of course, but it is known that 37% of the sample were non-college educated, and that 75% of this group were prisoners. This translates into 1471 inmates out of a total group of 5300, a sample which is supposed to be representative of the American population. Further skewing the results is the fact that 44% of these inmates many of whom were jailed for sex offenses, had "homosexual experiences" while in prison.

In case you were thinking that this is about as bizarre a representative sample as one could conceivably imagine, it gets worse. Kinsey also admitted using "several hundred male prostitutes" in his sample. If all were included, this alone could throw off his ten percent figure by half, or more.

Psychologist Abraham Maslow showed that because of the intimate nature of sexuality studies, if one relies primarily on volunteers, as Kinsey did, one obtains an overselection of individuals who tend to exhibit unconventional or disapproved behavior. Maslow himself showed Kinsey before the publication of the report how Kinsey's particular sample would be affected. Kinsey ignored this, and in fact went on to write deceitfully on page 103 of the Male Report that how volunteering "affects a sexual history is not yet clear."

A close look at Kinsey's sample reveals flagrant disproportions between his interviewees and the population of the U.S. as a whole. For example, 78% of the sample 20 years old or older were single, as opposed to 30% of the U.S. population at large; 645 of the sample were college educated, versus 12% of the U.S. population; fully 80% of the sample were "inactive" Protestants, Catholics, and Jews who neither attended church nor participated in religious activities; and, 20% of Kinsey's married sample between the ages of 20 and 50 were "widowed or divorced," as opposed to just 3% of the U.S. at large. The list goes on, with the statistics from Kinsey's sample seeming even more absurd when we consider that we're talking about 1940s America.

So if these incongruities discredit Kinsey's 10% figure, what's the real truth? It would appear that one to two percent is the actual proportion of homosexual men in a given population, as demonstrated by two recent studies. First, David Forman, senior staff member at the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, authored a study in England and Wales between 1984 and 1987 which determined that only 1.7% of his sample had engaged in homosexual intercourse (British Medical Journal 298: 1137-1142, 1989). Second, sexual behavior researcher, Tom Smith of the University of Chicago authored a study two years ago entitled "Adult Sexual Behavior in 1989: Number of Partners Frequency and Risk." His study resulted in a figure of "less than 1% exclusively homosexual."

So it would appear that every publication or group that preaches the 10% theory are all grossly mistaken.

Myth #2

The Government Isn't Doing Enough To Combat AIDS

According to the New York Times, the government of the United States spent some $1.6 billion in the battle against AIDS during the fiscal year 1989. This enormous sum is more than the amount of money our government spends fighting all forms of cancer combined. (In addition, the Ryan White Act of 1990 authorized $4.5 billion in emergency funding for cities hardest hit by AIDS.)

Look at it this way. Every year over 500,000 Americans die from cancer; in the ten years from 1981 to the present some 116,000 Americans have died from AIDS. Yet our government continues to spend less on cancer, which kills five times as many Americans every single year as AIDS has ever killed. Put another way, over fifty times as many Americans have died from cancer over the course of the last decade as have died from AIDS, yet the fight against cancer receives less federal money than the battle against AIDS.

Thus it is even more difficult to justify in light of the fact that whereas one can usually do nothing to eliminate the risk of cancer, barring any unforeseen tragedies (such as a contaminated blood transfusion), mere behavior modification will almost guarantee that one does not contract AIDS.

We currently do virtually nothing, however, to promote such behavior modification. Consider that while the total number of deaths from AIDS in the U.S. stands, as stated above, at around 116,000, the Centers for Disease Control reported recently that in 1988 alone 434,000 Americans died from smoking, sometimes even making this dangerous behavior illegal in public places. Yet we seem unable or unwilling to discourage similarly the behavior that leads to AIDS.

Myth #3

AIDS Is Not Just a Gay Disease

The Centers for Disease Control last year reported that over 90% of all AIDS sufferers are homosexuals, bisexuals, or intravenous drug users. Heterosexuals make up barely 5% of reported cases, but a large portion of this group probably contracted the disease through promiscuous contact with members of the first group. The remaining cases are the result of secondary infections, via the aforementioned contaminated blood transfusions, for instance. In April the New York Times reported that well over 90% of all AIDS cases are male, and they're not getting it from heterosexual contact.

A second oft heard maxim: "Anyone can get AIDS" is quite true. However, anyone can also get struck and killed by a passing horse at the Kentucky Derby. The point is that you won't contract AIDS if you don't do certain things. Ultimately it is impossible to separate the genesis of AIDS (originally called GRID, or Gay Related Immune Deficiency Syndrome) from its origin and spread within the practices of a significant segment of the homosexual community.

Dr. William Foege, then director of the Centers for Disease Control, stated in the July 4, 1983 issue of Time, for example, that "The average AIDS victim has had 60 different partners in the past 12 months." It is furthermore disingenuous to claim that moral equivalency exists between those who contracted AIDS via a conscious decision to engage in high risk behavior and those who contracted it in some tragic accident.

Myth #4

Condom Distribution Is Crucial For Solving The AIDS Crisis

Condoms have been shown to have a 10 to 18% failure rate for preventing possible pregnancy. This is hardly acceptable as a measure designed to protect someone from AIDS, which is presently always fatal. In addition, the rate of failure with homosexual contact sends the failure rate skyrocketing.

Rather than groping at such pseudo-solutions we must address the unwillingness to state that only abstinence or a monogamous marriage relationship with a partner known not to have the disease will eliminate completely the risk of AIDS. This is hardly the imposition of a particular form of morality, it is common sense, and it is nothing less than a matter of life and death.

Myth #5

Someone You Care About is Gay

If you frequent the university campus, you have probably already seen the posters with this slogan: "Someone You Care About is Gay." But it's probably not true. Contrary to the implication of the message above, it is possible to live for years on a university campus without ever coming closer to a homosexual than passing distance.

All of these myths have at least one thing in common - the evasion of responsibility. Instead of accepting responsibility for their actions, the 'AIDS community' and many radical homosexuals are desperate to blame anyone or anything they can, be it the federal government, fate, the Church, or anyone who espouses moral values and common sense.

People resent this, and the net result is a society composed of disillusioned and confused individuals. Because they feel they are being deceived the general public becomes alienated, insulted, and even angry whereas their natural disposition would be one of caring and compassion. This is understandable, for the vast majority of Americans find homosexuality to be inimical to their values and beliefs, but are made to feel guilty or even somehow responsible for a horrible disease that is largely the result of behavior that they simply do not accept.

In the end, we are fortunate that in times of crisis such as these, Americans have historically joined together most strongly on consciousness of others' distress. Before completely losing this capacity, however, we must learn to effectively deal with the facts of AIDS, not the myths which a few radicals would have us believe. And we must do so quickly, for AIDS exacts a horrible, fatal price from its victims, and we may soon be too late.

In the Media Spotlight: Furor over homosexuality continues at Harvard

By Jay Rogers

4/92

In the media spotlight: TIME, CNN, and CBS News have covered the controversy surrounding Gomes' statement.

CAMBRIDGE, Massachusetts (FR) - On November 12, 1991, Peninsula, a conservative student journal at Harvard University, published its 56 page critique of pro-homosexual politics. Immediately following its release, a furor erupted which has continued unabated. Faculty members, administrators, student groups and virtually every other student publication at Harvard have denounced Peninsula's assertion that homosexuality should be viewed by society as morally wrong.

The most surprising statement came from Harvard's Plummer Professor of Christian Morals, Peter Gomes, who condemned Peninsula's homosexuality edition as a "moral mugging" and proclaimed from the steps of the Memorial Church where he presides as chaplain: "I am a Christian who happens as well to be gay."

This came as a surprise to many who have known Gomes over the years. He is one of the most widely respected ministers in America and is considered by many to be a conservative evangelical. Yet Gomes, a member of the American Baptist Churches, has skirted his own denomination's statement condemning homosexuality. This is shocking even to those who have been aware of Gomes' anti-literalist view of Scripture. According to one minister in the Cambridge area we interviewed, the Harvard professor has always maintained a weak view of Scripture as being the authoritative Word of God.

In response to Gomes' shocking revelation, a 50 member student group, Concerned Christians at Harvard, has formed with the purpose of forcing Gomes' resignation as campus chaplain. Conducting a candlelight prayer vigil at Harvard's Memorial Church in late February, Concerned Christians' founder Sumner Anderson denounced Gomes' assertion that it is acceptable to be a Christian and a homosexual.

Concerned Christians at Harvard wants Gomes to resign because he does not represent the biblical view of homosexuality held to by evangelical Christians. Yet Harvard President Neil Rudenstien dismissed the issue as not being the responsibility of Harvard to take part in a "theological debate where reasonable people of different religious persuasions hold different views."

Now that it appears unlikely that anyone in Harvard's administration will ask Gomes to resign, the Concerned Christians group faces a dilemma: How do you openly confront homosexuality as the Bible treats it - as sin - while remaining compassionate and sensitive in an otherwise unsympathetic atmosphere?

Says Peninsula editor Roger Landry, "The group started because of what Gomes taught on homosexuality - that it is not a sin. To say that the Bible is not relevant on homosexuality is to say that the Bible is not relevant on anything."

"We're walking a tightrope," Landry admits. "We're not trying to throw stones at anybody. We never thought that Gomes was an evil person. In fact, prior to his announcement, many of us thought that he was an excellent preacher. But what Sumner Anderson said is true: it's more the gospel of Gomes than the gospel of Christ. We plan to keep the prayer vigils going just to let people know that we do not agree with Gomes' teaching on homosexuality."

The Hidden Agenda of Homosexual Politics

By Erin Doherty, 11th grade
11/93

MUCH LIKE THE CONSPIRATORIAL PLOTS for the propagation and infiltration of communistic principles into society expressed by Karl Marx in The Communist Manifesto is the foreseen agenda of the homosexual community. No longer content with the heterosexual society's mere tolerance of a gay lifestyle, male homosexuals and lesbians are now demanding a total acceptance of their varying sexual expression, and they are using methods ranging from subtle, behind the scene schemes to well publicized legal proceedings.

In the past, those who wished to devise a plan to introduce homosexuality into mainstream American society surmised that a radical reform of our nation's traditional values was the only possible means. However, this rash plan has subsequently matured into a detailed, targeted, yet subtle attack on altering these values. Lest the ultimate aim of this strategy be misunderstood as a result of the seemingly less revolutionary approach, let us examine some of the characteristics, ideology, and methods of the gay community.

To begin, one must understand the ideology which a homosexual embraces (pardon the term!). "The homosexual ideology implies the intent to rearrange our perceptions, lifestyles, and legal system. In the strict sense of the term, this change is revolutionary. It requires, if it is to be effectively implemented, the careful and gradual application and transfer of power. The homosexual movement is thus not primarily a philanthropic or educational enterprise, but a hard-nosed political movement bent on changing our society."¹

Homosexuals foster a desire to establish their identity as a minority and to be given the rights that other groups are entitled to. Using a play on words with the meaning of the word "right" causes their argument to sound quite legitimate and constitutional. However, closer examination reveals that they do not refer to the God-given rights of life, liberty and property which every citizen of every country, regardless of age, gender, race or sexual orientation, is entitled to, but rather to special welfare. The Preamble to the Constitution expresses the fact that "we the people" wish to establish a form of government to "promote the general welfare," and yet homosexuals seek through the legal system to receive privileges which the average American, either single or a partner in a monogamous marriage, does not have.

One such example is seen in the homosexual's usurpation of traditional family benefits. Originally defined as "the institution whereby men and women are joined in a special type of social and legal dependence, for the purpose of founding and maintaining a family,"² the family has now been redefined as "two adult lifetime partners whose relationship is long-term and characterized by an emotional and financial commitment and interdependence."3

With the stress on sexual pleasure and the freedom of promiscuity, the homosexual lifestyle excuses the need for any self sacrifice and lasting commitment, and hardly falls under the category of the traditional family. Yet gays are able to receive the benefits of a married couple, such as lower housing costs, joint filing of tax returns, and the inheritance of property. Roommates that are single and unmarried heterosexual couples living together do not get such benefits, but an exception of several privileges has been made on behalf of the homosexuals.

Although such inconsistencies rightly invoke anger on those not favored by them, the heterosexual community has been intimidated and forced to keep silent about its grievances. Any outspoken protest either against the homosexual lifestyle or against the special welfare given to such people is charged as discrimination. Clamoring for civil rights, many gays have likened their plight to that of the blacks in the past, a minority group persecuted for its differences. However, they fail to see, or else choose to ignore, the obvious difference: one group received persecution based on its genetic traits, the other does because of sexual behavior. There is nothing morally wrong with being colored, while a homosexual's lifestyle is definitely morally wrong.

Also, many gays seem to take satisfaction in being able to aggravate heterosexuals with their sexual mannerisms, knowing they cannot complain. The scene is similar to the child who irritates his sibling to the point of tattling or reacting physically, delighting in the punishment which the parent gives to the sibling, excusing the provoker's behavior by interpreting it as an expression of his individuality. We have come to the point where it is illegal for an employer to fire a worker because he's gay or for a landlord to refuse to rent out to a blatant homosexual; this is a direct violation of private property rights. Yet it does not work vice versa, for a homosexual has the right to refuse hiring or renting to a heterosexual. The agenda plans to carry this pattern a step further, so that an individual cannot be dishonorably discharged from the army based on sexual orientation or so that a restaurant must allow homosexuals (who very likely could have a sexually transmitted disease) to work with food.

Another part of this agenda is for homosexuals to climb up to influential positions, from which they can readily share and spread their ideas. Gay professors at colleges and elementary school teachers have many opportunities to mold the studious, eager, young minds being trained and directed under their care. Teenagers in public schools receiving sex education classes and going through a period of realizing their sexual identity are sometimes taught that homosexual tendencies exist in everyone, and, as Freud said, "Only a complex pattern of social pressures ensures that so few of us act out this potential [to be both heterosexual and homosexual.]"4

A gay business executive has unlimited freedom to propagate his beliefs throughout his company. Also, now a homosexual "family" is entitled to child custody, through adoption or artificial insemination. The children raised in such an environment would logically consider homosexuality to be the correct and normal way of life, judging from the model placed before them.

To list all of the goals of the homosexual agenda would be tedious, but the ones on the forefront, in summary, are as follows:

1) Legalize homosexual/lesbian marriages; 2) Give homosexuals/lesbians parental and adoptive rights; 3) Classify HIV positive/AIDS carriers as disabled; 4) Enact "hate-crime" laws to include sexual orientation; 5) Use tax dollars to fund homoerotic AIDS/sex education in all grades; 6) Amend laws to prohibit discrimination in employment, housing, public accommodation, and public services; 7) Prohibit the military to exclude anyone because of sexual preference; 8) Repeal all state sodomy laws; 9) Repeal laws controlling the age of sexual consent."⁵

What can we do about this snowballing battle with the homosexual community? We Christians need to take some form of action soon, for since verbal protesting is not allowed, soon many heterosexuals will be moved to the point of physical aggression. It is crucial to stop the homoerotic teaching in the sex education classes so that the future generation of adults won't be encouraged to imitate such a lifestyle. We should also be aware on the state level of any bill or legislation dealing with this issue, and inform our representatives of our opinion in this matter.

Most importantly, though, we must cease to remain passive, allowing wickedness to seep openly into society and become more entrenched in our culture. We must begin to intercede for a nation on the brink of judgment and destruction as a result of Babylonian practices, and pray for wisdom on how to biblically reform our society, preserving its strong roots of moral values anchored in the rich soil of Christianity.

Liberation from Homosexuality

by Joseph Farah

reprinted from Glendale News-Press

4/88

These days, just about anything goes on commercial television: condom ads, nudity, foul language, ultra-violence.

But there is at least one thing I promise you will never see on TV. It's something so shocking, so sensitive, so taboo all network executives would agree it's off-limits, now and forever.

Though TV honchos will gladly tell you how much they hate censorship and love artistic freedom, there are limits. Where is it that they draw the line on taste and propriety? What is the one issue too hot for TV to handle? What is the one plot line you will never see developed in a television series or movie?

You will never see a homosexual quit the lifestyle and become a heterosexual.

Why is that? Is it because it doesn't happen in real life? Is it a lie? Is it because the networks are afraid to create programs about homosexuals? How can I be so sure that scenario will never find its way into prime-time?

The reason I am so confident in this prediction is [that] homosexual activists are by far the most powerful lobby group in Hollywood. And homosexual activists think it is absolutely vital to their cause to convince the public that homosexuality is a permanent condition, not a choice.

Though some might label these accusations the delusions of a homophobic, this news won't come as a revelation to anyone in the TV industry. It has been well-documented in a series of articles in T.V Guide and in the scholarly Journal of Communication.

Spokespersons for all three networks reported that gays were the most effective and well-organized of the special interest groups who lobby the television industry, reported Kathryn Montgomery, a former communications professor at Cal State L.A., in the Journal of Communication study.

In the TV Guide report, a group of TV executives unanimously agree it would be impossible to produce a show in which a homosexual decides to seek psychiatric treatment to alter his behavior. Impossible. Out of the question. End of discussion.

But isn't this censorship? How can all these open-minded liberals who make up our television programming establishment condone such artistic prohibitions?

Of course it is censorship. But the homosexual activists and their Hollywood marionettes would contend that the scenario is just not factual, it just never happens. Homosexuals don't leave the lifestyle, they contend.

But the reality is that they do.

"I've never thought about it in this light before, but it definitely is a form of censorship," says Andy Comiskey, director of Desert Stream, a Southern California-based support group for people who have left the homosexual lifestyle. "It's a false picture. It's extremely biased."

Comiskey is also president of Exodus International, a coalition of 60 ex-gay groups from all over the world. As such, he's personally aware of hundreds of people who have chosen to leave homosexuality and lead heterosexual lives.

But you would never know such people exist by watching network television - entertainment or news.

Just in the last three seasons, the networks have aired at least five entertainment programs about homosexuality that would lead viewers to believe the lifestyle is not only a healthy alternative, but for keeps.

The most controversial example was the CBS school break special last spring, "What If I'm Gay?" The show portrayed the teen-age captain of a high school soccer team who comes out of the closet after advice from his school counselor. The message for the kids: It's just an alternate lifestyle, and you can lead a happy and fulfilled life as a homosexual.

Other examples of recent pro-homosexual propaganda by the networks include:

- * In 1986, a CBS movie called "Welcome Home, Bobby" about a 16-year-old who wrestles with his sexual identity before "coming out."

- * In 1985, an NBC movie called "An Early Frost" about a young man forced to tell his parents about his homosexuality when he learns he has AIDS.

- * In 1985, ABC movie called "Consenting Adult" about how another young man tells his family he's gay.

- * In 1985, the ABC series "Hotel" included an episode in which a dying mother decides her daughter should live with homosexual lovers when she's gone.

But the most recent example of pro-homosexual propaganda on network television was the NBC News children's program "Main Street," which favorably profiled two gay teen-agers.

Here's how host Maria Shriver set up the program: "Surveys estimate that about 10 percent of all teenagers are homosexuals. Scientists don't know why. Some think it's a combination of hormonal changes and experiences in early childhood. One thing they are sure of, however: Homosexuality is not something homosexuals choose. It's just something they are or become. And they face a struggle because of it, often living in a harsh world of prejudice, sometimes even violence."

"We've monitored television as carefully as any group in the last few years," says Rev. Donald Wildmon whose [American Family Association] has pressured sponsors to hold networks accountable for their programming. "With the possible exception of a "60 Minutes" report a few years ago, there has not been a single program on television that is in any way unflattering toward the homosexual lifestyle."

Wildmon, too, calls this blatant censorship. He sees a double standard. The networks use their commitment to artistic freedom as an excuse to refuse his demands for less sex and violence and more family-oriented programming, while knuckling under to the suggestions of the Gay Media Task Force.

Wildmon, a Methodist minister from Tupelo, Mississippi, points to dozens of examples of negative stereotyping of religious figures and values on television. And, despite a vast organizational effort, he feels helpless in influencing Hollywood.

Wildmon has been accused of trying to censor what we see on television. But, in reality, Wildmon has been fighting a losing battle. The real censors are the people winning the war to control what we watch on TV.

Student journal triggers campus wide debate on homosexuality

How 56 pages unleashed a controversy at Harvard

By Jay Rogers

2/92

CAMBRIDGE, MA (FR) - Ever since November 12, Harvard University's monolithic stance on homosexuality has begun to crumble. On that date, Peninsula, a two-year-old conservative student journal, released a 56 page exhaustive volume containing its staff's year long research project on homosexual politics.

The initial response from the academic community was to label Peninsula's findings as "hate-speech." Practically every campus newspaper entered into the debate with full abandon. In the few short weeks toward the end of the semester, scores of articles were printed in campus newspapers dealing with the November issue of Peninsula, which featured a pink triangle (the symbol of pro-homosexual ideology) exploding on the front cover. The pink triangle was originally used by the Nazis to identify homosexual men who were imprisoned in Germany from 1937-1945. It took on a new meaning after World War II, however, as a symbol of oppression, a symbol of solidarity with those physically attacked for their homosexuality.

Despite the inflammatory cover, Peninsula's founding editor, Roger Landry denies the allegations of hate-speech. "Those charges are absolutely ridiculous," said Landry. "There is absolutely no hate in the issue, but rather care and compassion for those experiencing same-sex sexual attractions. ... By depicting the pink triangle in pieces," explained Landry, "we symbolize what we would like to do with this issue of Peninsula. We hope to confound, and, ultimately, discard the philosophies which account for both the pink triangle's original and current meanings - to move away from an atmosphere of hateful persecution on the one hand, and of injurious ideology on the other."

"Before our issue came out, Harvard was monolithic about homosexuality. Any person feeling attractions to members of the same sex were given but one option - to come out and admit you were homosexual and accept it as a lifestyle. Now there is a dialogue going on."

The controversy raged on through the Fall semester and into January. Everyone from the Bisexual, Gay, and Lesbian Students Association (BGLSA), to the Dean of students, Archibald C. Epps III, condemned Peninsula at a November 15 rally.

Harvard's Professor of Christian Morals admits to being homosexual

The most surprising announcement at the rally came from the Plummer Professor for Christian Morals and minister of Harvard's Memorial Church, Rev. Peter Gomes, who publicly announced for the first time that he is a practicing homosexual. Professor Gomes has been named by Time magazine as one of the top ten most respected ministers in the country, and has been a speaker at the last three Presidential inaugurations.

In a Harvard Crimson article (Nov. 18, 1991), after conceding that the November issue of Peninsula was "well-written," and showed both a "dash of compassion and a hint of counselling," Gomes stated:

"Neither I nor any other Christian who is gay need accept any longer the definition of ourselves as outside the embrace of the sacraments or ministry of the Church. Our sexual identity notwithstanding, we with our fellow believers are all a part of the fallen human race, all live in the light of the sacrifice of Christ, all share in the same and uncorrupted creation in the image of God, and all participate in the means of Grace and the hope of glory. And we do so, just as we are; fallen and redeemed; all of us."

Gomes' announcement stirred further controversy from across campus and across the nation. Harvard undergraduate Sumner Anderson wrote in a Crimson editorial (Nov. 20, 1991): "As a Christian and as a member of Memorial Church, this was one of the most disturbing events in my four years at Harvard.... (Gomes) cited his position as the Plummer Professor of Christian Morals as authority to declare that homosexual behavior is 'reconcilable' with Christianity. ... unless he openly admits homosexual behavior to be sinful, I feel compelled to call for his immediate resignation as minister of Memorial Church."

Landry offered this assessment of the magnitude of the controversy: "It is about our bucking political correctness' most sacred cow: the sexual revolution. But on a much deeper level, our issue is the first in-depth response we know of (collegiate or otherwise) to the inroads that the pro-homosexuality movement has been making into public policy over the past couple of decades."

The Peninsula staff is a small group of students at Harvard who hold to a variety of conservative and Christian ideologies in confronting issues such as abortion, "politically correct" speech, multiculturalism, and pro-homosexual politics.

"We are limited by resources and our small size," says Landry. "Liberal groups have unlimited resources, such as the daily newspaper (the Harvard Crimson) and the capitulation of the school administration toward the left. But the fact that we are labelled as 'conservative' actually helps us get across our point of view. The point of view is so unique that it has made us more salient to many people."

Landry points to the rejection of the politically correct agenda by Harvard as evidence of Peninsula's success. "P.C. has already been thrown out the windows by most Northeast schools. We were hit by P.C. before everyone else. Among students here, people are so sick and tired of the arguments. After a few issues of Peninsula and the debate in the national press, most people have admitted that the issue is ridiculous. Eventually P.C. will lose its steam everywhere."

"Some people have actually come to us and have said: 'I changed my position on abortion' or 'I changed my mind about the National Organization for Women.' There have already been some short term changes, but we are looking at the long term. When people get out of here (graduate) hopefully they will bring these points of view with them."

The Peninsula issue on homosexuality is divided into sections which deal systematically with (1) the misinformation of pro-homosexuality propaganda; (2) the causes and consequences of homosexual behavior; and (3) the alternatives to dealing with same-sex sexual attractions that the pro-homosexuality movement never mentions.

If you want to obtain a copy of the Peninsula issue on homosexuality, you may do so by writing:

Islam: Beliefs and Practices

By Jay Rogers

2/91

Today America finds itself embroiled in the midst of war which is even now lengthening. We are confronted by an enemy, not unconquerable, but surprisingly resilient.

At the center of Iraqi culture is Islam, a religion which dominates the culture, politics and lifestyle of this Middle Eastern nation. Islam is at the source of the resilience of Iraq. We find in studying Islam that there are many different sects, which correspond to denominations, each of which holds many diverse ideas and interpretations of that religion.

The beliefs and ideas that dominate much of the country Iraq are probably the most fundamental to the Islamic faith proposed almost 1500 years ago by the prophet Mohammed. Not all Muslims today will fit into this description. However, we can begin to get an understanding of the culture of Iraq by studying Islam's beginnings

The Beginnings of Islam

Islam took its rise in the peninsula of Arabia, a country of sandy deserts, fertile valleys and rock-bound coasts. The Arabs, who were the first people to embrace the religion of Islam, are identical with the Saracens or the Moors who conquered huge areas of the known world in the 7th and 8th centuries. The inhabitants of Arabia during medieval times may be divided into three classes:

- 1) Large numbers of Jews, who after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., had fled to Arabia, where their descendants had exerted a beneficial influence by their high culture and the purity of their religious faith.
- 2) Christians from the Roman Empire whom the imperial persecutions and the doctrinal controversies among the different sects had driven to settle in Arabia.
- 3) The ruling race, which was composed of the descendants of Ishmael, one of the sons of Abraham; these were the true Arabs, or Saracens. They worshiped the heavenly bodies and their most holy place was the Kaaba, in the city of Mecca. The Kaaba was believed to have been built by angels and to have been let down from heaven.

Mohammed

Mohammed was born at Mecca, in the year 570 A.D. His father was an Arab and his mother a Jewess. His real name was Abul Kasem Ibn Abdullah. His assumed name, Mohammed, is derived from the Arabic Hammada, which means "one to be praised," or "the desired one." His mother died when he was six years of age and he was adopted by his uncle, who treated him with great kindness.

According to legend, he was born with the seal of prophecy written on his back in letters of light, and three shining angels hailed him as the "Prince of Mankind." While a boy, he earned his living as a shepherd - a disreputable occupation among the Arabs, but one in which he afterward gloried, saying that Moses and David and other great prophets had first been shepherds. He never learned to read or write.

On a journey to Syria with his uncle, he passed through a number of Jewish and Christian communities, and even spent some time in a Nestorian* monastery at Bozrah, Syria, and learned much about Judaism and Christianity.

Although naturally inclined to a life of quiet contemplation, Mohammed was forced by poverty to undertake a commercial career. Mohammed made several journeys to Syria for a wealthy widow of Mecca, named Kadijah, and in his 25th year they were married. Only one child of theirs, a daughter named Fatima, survived who became a mother of many descendants of the prophet.

Mohammed proclaims himself a prophet

Mohammed often retired to the desert or the mountain for meditation and prayer. While meditating on Mount Hira, near Mecca, in his fortieth year, he fell into a trance and, as he reported, received a call from the Archangel Gabriel. In great fear he returned home and related his vision to his wife, who consoled him, and said that he had been chosen as the prophet of his people.

For a long time no other visions came, and when he determined to commit suicide by hurling himself over a precipice, Gabriel appeared to him again. Mohammed now announced himself as a prophet and the founder of a new religion. The revelations which he said were made to him continued for more than twenty years and are embodied in the Koran, which contains elements of Christianity, Judaism and the pagan Arabic religions.

The First 12 Years of Islam

Mohammed's first "revelation" took place in 610 A.D. For three years, Mohammed labored among the members of his family and his intimate friends, making about 40 converts, of whom his wife was the first. He then determined to assert more boldly his God-given office of prophet and lawgiver.

Thousands of pilgrims flocked to Mecca to visit the holy Kaaba and kiss its sacred stone. Taking his stand daily near the Kaaba, he preached the new religion and proclaimed himself the prophet of God. He boldly attacked their idolatry, and reasoned with those who opposed him. His doctrines were later committed to writing by his followers and the book was called the Koran.

During the nine years of preaching, much strife was stirred up and few converts were made. At last,

Mohammed's cousin Ali precipitated a serious conflict by declaring that he would do personal violence to such as would not recognize Mohammed as the Prophet of God.

The Hegira

The threats of Ali raised such a storm of wrath that Mohammed was compelled to flee from Mecca to save his life. His departure at this time, July 15, 622, is known as the Hegira and marks the beginning of the Muslim calendar. For ten days he and his devoted band of followers toiled over the burning sands and rugged rocks of the desert until they reached Medina, 250 miles to the north. In Medina he was hailed as a prophet and multitudes of converts were made to his faith.

He at first proclaimed that those who accepted Islam must do so voluntarily, but this principle was soon abandoned and, at the head of his conquering army, he offered the vanquished their choice of three things: The acceptance of Islam, the payment of tribute, or death by the sword.

The Return to Mecca

Within two years of the Hegira, Mohammed took the field against his enemies and routed them in battle. He then conquered several Jewish and Christian tribes and watched in prison the massacre of 600 Jews in one day, while their wives and children were sold into slavery.

In the eighth year of the Hegira, he finally marched on Mecca and captured it with little opposition. On entering the city he went directly to the Kaaba where under his orders all the idols were broken. From that time the Kaaba became the chief temple of the new worship.

In the tenth year of the Hegira, Mohammed visited Mecca with an army of 40,000 Muslims. Soon after his arrival, he was taken violently ill. Realizing that he was dying, he exclaimed, "The Lord destroy the Jews and the Christians! Let there not remain any faith but that of Islam throughout the whole of Arabia! Lord, grant me pardon and join me to thy companionship on high!"

Western Asia and North Africa

After the death of Mohammed, the caliphs continued the conquests he had begun. Caliphs were successors whose authority extended into both civil and religious affairs. They stimulated their followers with the assurance, "Before you is paradise, behind you is death and hell."

Palestine, Syria and Egypt were at this time dominated by the Greek Church. Large numbers of its adherents who had fiercely quarreled among themselves over nice points in their creed, with little care for the essentials of Christianity, easily exchanged their faith for that presented to them at sword's point.

The land in which Christ had healed and taught was quickly overrun. Syria soon yielded to the Muslim arms. Thousands of Christian church buildings in and near Antioch, Jerusalem and Alexandria were either destroyed or converted into mosques. Twenty-one years after the death of Mohammed, the rule of Islam extended over a territory as great as the Roman Empire.

Even Constantinople was besieged twice and probably would have fallen but for the severity of an unusually cold winter. In 707 A.D. the Muslims swept over the provinces of Northern Africa, bringing into subjection the entire country between the Great Desert and the Mediterranean.

The Conquest of Spain

Even the sea could not check the conquering hordes of Islam. In 711 A.D. they crossed the Strait of Gibraltar and attacked the Visigoths, whose moral and physical degeneracy was so great that they made only a feeble resistance, and Spain fell under Islamic rule.

The teachings of Mohammed spurred them to rapid conquests: "The sword," said Mohammed, "is the key of heaven and hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of Allah, a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting and prayer; whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven, and at the day of judgment his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels."

The fanaticism aroused by such words was a leading factor in his success. To the Jews and Christians, they permitted some liberty upon payment of a heavy tribute, but the idolater was compelled to embrace Islam or face slavery or death.

Plans for World Conquest

The purpose of the Islamic armies was to sweep from Arabia over the northern part of Africa, subdue Spain, conquer Gaul (France), subjugate Italy, spread the Muslim faith through Germany, overrun Greece, capture Constantinople, and finally cross over into Asia Minor (Turkey), after having converted Africa, Europe, and Asia into a vast Muslim Empire.

Encouraged by their easy conquest in Spain, the Muslims crossed the Pyrenees, and overran the valley of the Rhone. They directed their march toward Tours (shown on map: 120 miles southwest of Paris). At Tours was situated the much of the wealth of Europe at that time. The treasures of the Cathedral of St. Martin were the target of Abd-el-Rhaman, the Muslim leader, who set out to pillage it. On the road he met the brave German forces.

The Battle of Tours

On Saturday, October 11, 732, the battle began by a fierce charge of the Muslims shouting their famous war-cry, "Allah-Akbar!" (God is great!) But never before did they meet such resistance - the Germans did not yield one foot. All day long the charges were repeated, every one leaving its quota of Muslim dead.

The confident spirit with which the Muslims entered into battle gave place to anxiety and then to fear. At this moment, the German forces took up the offensive and threw themselves upon the wearied and discouraged Muslims, who were unable to resist the terrific onslaughts.

They fought bravely for a while, then fled from the field despairing and leaving everything but their horses and their arms behind them. Abd-el-Rhaman had fallen in the dreadful carnage and there was no one to rally the scattered hosts. That one afternoon, Europe emerged triumphant and their enemies were forever repelled. The Muslims withdrew into Spain, where they and their descendants remained for over 700 years and never again appeared north of the Pyrenees.

The leader of the Franks at the Battle of Tours was Charles Martel, a German king, who became the hero of Europe. The name of Charles Martel (that is, Charles the Hammer) was bestowed upon him in recognition of his great victory at Tours. His grandson, King Charlemagne, later did much to unify Europe and became the greatest figure of medieval Europe.

The lesson to be learned here is that those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it. We have recently seen the effect of Islam's goal of total world conquest on the modern political scene. A study at the teachings of Islam and how they have affected the Muslim nations should give us a good understanding of the nature of the battle America now faces.

The Koran

The Koran and the Sonna form the authoritative basis for the religion of Islam. The Koran consists of laws, histories, legends and precepts which Mohammed professed to receive directly from God or through the Angel Gabriel. Mohammed could neither read nor write; so the Koran in written form was unknown to him. It is divided into 114 chapters and it is composed absolutely without any system of arrangement. It has neither beginning, middle, nor end.

The Sonna is a commentary on the Koran and consists of Mohammed's sayings and doings, as handed by tradition and reduced to writing about a century after the Hegira.

Monotheism

The Koran opposes the polytheism of Greece and Rome, as well as the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The faith of Islam in this particular is embodied in this passage of the Koran: "There is no god but God." Abraham, Moses and Jesus are viewed by Islam as being lesser prophets than Mohammed who revealed the complete will of God to mankind.

The Final Judgment

The Koran teaches that on the last day the bodies of all persons shall rise and they shall be judged according to their good or bad conduct while on earth. After judgment, all must cross a bridge which passes over hell and ends in paradise. The bridge is finer than a hair, sharper than a sword and beset on both sides by briars and thorns. The good reach the end in safety and are welcomed by Mohammed and other prophets into an abode of bliss, while the wicked fall from the bridge into hell, where they endure endless tortures.

Prayer

Muslims are supposed to pray five times a day. A muezzin or public crier announces the time for prayer from a minaret of each mosque. While praying the worshipper must be faced toward Mecca. Prayer consists of prostrations and the recitation of passages from the Koran. Public prayers are held in mosques on Friday at noon when, in addition to the prayers, a sermon is delivered. Women are not ordinarily admitted into the mosques.

Fasts

For the space of one specified lunar month a year, a Muslim fasting season occurs. The Muslim is commanded to abstain from eating, drinking, smoking and every other kind of sensual delight from the time when it is light enough to distinguish a white thread from a black one until sunset. The Muslim fast is obligatory and is regarded as a means of gaining heaven. At other times of the year fasts are optional.

Pilgrimage, Alms and Bearing Arms

Every Muslim is expected to make at least one pilgrimage to Mecca in the course of his life. Each pilgrim marches three times around the Kaaba, a black stone supposed to have fallen from heaven with Adam, while kissing or touching the stone each time. Almsgiving is regarded as an effectual means of obtaining admission into heaven.

But Mohammed taught that the most meritorious of all actions was to propagate Islam by the force of arms. The call to take up arms against the "infidels" is called the Jihaad, or holy war, and has plagued the international scene since the time of Mohammed.

Culture and Learning

One of the positive aspects of Islam was the unification of national government and the preservation of culture and learning in the nations which they conquered. During the period of conquest the Arabs imposed their religion upon all conquered nations. But they absorbed something of every culture that they conquered - from the Persians, philosophy; from the Greeks, science and literature; from the Hindus, mathematics.

They became investigators in the fields of astronomy, chemistry and mathematics. The Arabs preserved the scientific works of the Greeks throughout the Dark Ages. Learning first returned to Europe through the Arabian schools in Spain.

Muslim men were allowed to have four legal wives. The role of women is subservient to that of men. The use of all alcoholic beverages is prohibited.

Islam seems to be a mixture of many good and evil elements. It seems that the personal failings of Mohammed brought a creed of cruelty and self-indulgence into a system that otherwise harmonized with Judeo-Christian thinking of the medieval era.

Islam legalizes the slaughter and plunder of all "infidels" and extols polygamy giving sanction to man's lowest instincts and destroying the dignity of women. Furthermore, a strong "works-righteousness" viewpoint pervades the teachings of Islam and has given rise to a proud, self-righteous attitude among those who are successful in keeping the commands of the religion.

Recent historians incline to the belief that in the beginning of his career Mohammed was a sincere and enthusiastic reformer, and some have even compared him with Jesus of Nazareth. But afterwards his motives became less pure and he became dominated by a desire for conquest. He was a better man in the period of his adversity and persecution than during his prosperity and triumph.

Like many other famous characters, he arose from poverty and obscurity to greatness and then decayed under the sunshine of wealth and power. He started with the desire to win his countrymen from idolatry to the worship of the one true God, but he gradually became ambitious to be known as the founder of a universal religion which was to be extended by the sword.

For twenty-four years he had but one wife, and he preached monogamy. However, only two months after his first wife's death, he married again and afterward had fourteen legal wives. His favorite wife, Ayesha, he married when she was nine and he was 53 years old.

"To compare such a man with Jesus," says historian Philip Schaff, "is preposterous and even blasphemous."

A Response to Islam

Muhammad the founder of Islam says: "You are not God's Son - but only a prophet."

From the Quran (Koran):

1. God (Allah) had no son (Sura 112:2,3).
2. You (Jesus) did not die on the cross (Sura 4:157 & 5:73-75).

But we say: "You are the Christ the Son of the Living God" - Matthew 16:16.

"I will declare the decree: the Lord has said unto Me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten Thee. Ask of Me, and I shall give You the heathen for Your inheritance, and uttermost parts of the earth for Your possession." - Psalm 2:7,8 (See Acts Chapter 2)

"In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through Him." - 1 John 4:9

"For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the scriptures." - 1 Corinthians 15:3,4

"The Father loved the Son, and has given all things into His hand. He that believes in the Son has everlasting life; and he that does not believe in the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God shall remain on him." - John 3:35-36

The god (Allah) of Muhammad is not the God of Christianity. Some things are not negotiable!

What Is Islam?

by Kris Tedford

A few years ago, while a student in seminary, I was reminded of the commission that Jesus gave to His disciples, "Make disciples of all nations ..." (Matthew 28:18). My memory was jogged and I realized that all people without Jesus Christ are lost. It was then that God directed my life toward the service of the neediest of all groups of people in the world - Muslims.

After graduation, while doing campus ministry at Boston University, I began to teach English to international students. It was here that I found that I enjoyed being around Muslim people. I made some extraordinary friends and found some excellent opportunities to tell people about Jesus Christ. One Muslim whom I met was a personal secretary to the head of state of a Middle Eastern country.

Unfortunately, because of the American media's portrayal of Muslims, we tend to think of them as being hijackers, kidnappers and terrorists. But I have found that most are so loving and hospitable. Arabic hospitality often puts American hospitality to shame. I also have found Muslims more open to talk about spiritual matters than Americans. If you make a friend of a Muslim, you have a friend for life.

Another misconception that many people have is that Islam is primarily a religion of the Arab world. There are, in fact, more Muslims in Europe, Southeast Asia, Africa and America than there are in Arab countries. Southeast Asia, one of the most populous areas of the world, is predominantly Muslim.

There are also many Muslims in America. Dearborn Heights, a suburb of Detroit, has America's largest Muslim population. Los Angeles also has a vigorous, growing Muslim population.

Islam is a world religion. There are Muslims in every corner of the earth. According to some reports, there are now more Muslims in the world than professing Christians, making it the world's most populous religion.

Ministry to Muslims has become my lifelong goal. Even though Muslims are thought of as being impervious to the Christian gospel, there are some positive signs that they are becoming more open than ever. Islam has its roots in Christian ideas, the difference being that Jesus is thought of as a mere human prophet inferior to Mohammed.

Most Muslim nations were Christian prior to the Middle Ages but they became weak in faith because they did not have the Bible translated into their native languages. Most of these nations rejected Christianity because the version they were experiencing was diluted with superstitions and half truths.

When Islam began to spread throughout the world during the Middle Ages, Western nations further exacerbated the the Muslim people's alienation from Christianity by trying to reconvert them using force, domination and control. Presently, the negative image that many Muslims have of Christianity comes from memories of the Holy Wars fought in their native lands.

Recently in this century, however, many Muslims have begun to turn towards Christianity. Millions of Muslims already believe that Jesus was an anointed prophet and that the Bible is the inspired word of God. More Muslims have become Christians in Indonesia, Bangladesh, Iran and East Africa in the last ten years than in the last ten centuries.

Jesus Christ Himself is moving among the Muslim people. God has begun to move sovereignly to reveal Himself to Muslim people. I am encouraging Christians everywhere to pray for Muslims, since I believe that as the result of prayer many people have had dreams or visions of Jesus Christ and have been led to know Him.

* A woman in Iran was told the name of a person in a dream. Two years later in Los Angeles, she found that person and his wife who told her about the love of Jesus. She received the Lord that night.

* The February 1990 edition of Mountain Movers magazine told of an Indonesian employee who, with his son, had seen a vision of Jesus Christ on many occasions. After a long conversation with an Assemblies of God pastor, he committed his life to the Lord.

* Christians in Los Angeles have started a church among Iranians. The Iranian people are very open to Jesus because of the horrors of the war between Iran and Iraq. Many Iranians have come to know Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior.

Last September, after searching for God's direction for my life, I made a commitment to minister full time to Muslims. If you are a Christian, I would like to ask you to pray and consider the great opportunity of laboring in the greatest harvest field in the world.

What Muslims Believe

By Jay Rogers

Islam has been called the most Christian-like, yet most anti-Christian religion in the world.

Muslims believe in one, true God, they acknowledge many truths about Jesus Christ; they accept the Bible as a divinely inspired book; they respect the Hebrew prophets; they believe in divine revelation, heaven and hell, and many other truths which correspond with Christianity.

Yet a close look at the whole religious system of Islam confirms that Muslims are, in fact, lost and need to be brought to the Truth. There are possibly more bridges between Islam and Christianity than any other two world religions, but a close examination reveals that these bridges are actually roadblocks which hinder Muslims from a clear understanding of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Belief in One God

Muslims believe in one God Who created the universe. However, the God of Islam is far removed. He is separate, aloof and impersonal. Islam offers no father-child relationship with the Almighty. Submission to Allah implies a blind surrender of a helpless slave to the tyranny of a ruthless despot.

There is a great gap between Allah, Islam's unpredictable, arbitrary God, and the dependable, faithful God of Christianity whose promises never fail to the end. Muslims deserve to hear that God loves them, that He seeks them through Jesus the Savior, that He wants to adopt them as children and take them to be with Him forever. This is the good news.

The Nature of Man

This is the greatest point of difference between Christianity and Islam. Muslims are taught that although man is weak, he is intrinsically good. What a Christian calls a sin, a Muslim calls a "mistake." The good and bad things that man brings about are not due to man's sinful nature according to Islam. Rather, man is an innocent victim of circumstance within a universal battle between good and evil.

Unless Muslims realize that no one is "basically good," they can never be saved. Bridging the gap is impossible unless a Muslim realizes that he possesses a sinful nature and can only be liberated from his slavery to sin if he accepts Jesus' victory on the cross.

Atonement

Since in Islamic belief, man is basically good and not evil, it follows that man does not really need a Savior. Therefore the death of Jesus is not only misunderstood but rejected as unnecessary. It depicts the Almighty Allah as weak and incapable of protecting His "prophet."

Muslims can be brought to God only after they realize their need for atonement based on their inability to save themselves and the conviction that Jesus is the only redeemer.

Jesus Christ - a Prophet?

All Muslims believe that Jesus is a prophet of God sent from heaven. The Qur'an speaks of Jesus as the "Word of God and Spirit from Him." Muslims believe in many of the other facts about Jesus that the Bible teaches. This is a good starting point, but in fact, the Islamic acceptance of Jesus is a great stumbling block.

What good is it to accept Jesus as a prophet, if His claim to be the Savior of the world is rejected? If Jesus claimed to be God and was not, then he must have either been crazy or had evil intentions. A Muslim is not likely to see Jesus in the true light until he becomes aware of this erroneous and contradictory idea, and transforms his convictions regarding Jesus.

Acceptance of the Bible

The Qur'an makes numerous references to the Old and New Testaments of the Bible. The Bible is considered by Muslims to be divinely inspired. Nevertheless, Islamic teaching rejects many of the claims of the Bible claiming that the original manuscripts are missing and that the Bible has been corrupted. The Qur'an is considered to be the ultimate authority which outshines the Bible.

This belief is a major obstacle in communicating the Truth to Muslims. The Bible is considered to be God's word, however, any point that diverges from the teaching of Islam is automatically considered to be a corruption. No Muslim can come to know God until he accepts the Bible as God's true Word.

Salvation

The very concept of salvation is nonexistent in Islam. The closest idea to salvation is "going to heaven." Going to heaven is based on the doctrine of balancing good deeds against bad deeds. This decision is made arbitrarily and there is no guarantee that anyone will get to heaven. If God desires, according to Islam, He may allow you into heaven, but if he does not, none of your works will get you anywhere.

Muslims live continually with this insecurity and need to understand that salvation is not a matter of "getting into heaven" but of knowing and loving God through a personal relationship with Jesus Christ. Only in knowing Christ can a Muslim obtain eternal life. This "life" is not based on good works of religious practices; it is a gift from God.

Bridging the Gap

The true "gap" is not between Islam and Christianity at all. Rather the true gap is between God and man. This gap is only bridgeable as Muslims begin to understand that they are sinners; that their sin has separated them from God; and that only in Jesus Christ is there the guarantee of eternal life.

It is not the conversion of Muslims to the Christian religion that we are seeking here, but regeneration - the rebirth and transformation of a Muslim's heart and mind. Argument and debate between two religious philosophies will lead us nowhere. Rather, the Muslim world is waiting to see a fresh demonstration of the power and love of the Spirit of God moving through His people.

This is the greatest difference between Islam and Christianity. Islam offers us a set of man-made religious rules, but Jesus offers us a relationship with a living, compassionate God Who forgives us and gives us the power to overcome evil.

Islam - Statistics

- * There are over 1 billion Muslims worldwide.
- * Almost 1 out of every 5 people in the world is a Muslim.
- * An estimated 3.5 million Muslims live in the United States.
- * An estimated 2% of all Christian workers minister to Muslims.

Argentine Legislators to Consider Religious Liberty Law

By David Miller

3/93

COCHABAMBA, Bolivia - The lower house of the Argentine Congress is set to debate a controversial draft law which, if ratified, would broaden religious rights in this traditionally Roman Catholic nation. Argentina's Minister of Foreign Relations and Culture, Angel Centeno, submitted the bill to the Chamber of Deputies last September, acting on behalf of the administration of President Carlos Menem.

The law, which seeks to reform government regulation of non-Catholic religious entities imposed during previous de facto regimes, affirms that "every person enjoys the fundamental right to freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed in the National Constitution" and states that "religious beliefs will never constitute a motive for inequality or discrimination before the law."

Navarro Floria, legal advisor to Centeno and professor of Juridicial Science at the Catholic University at of Argentina, helped frame the pending legislation because he believes it will strengthen religious liberty rights enshrined in the constitution. Says Floria. "This legislation intends to protect religious liberty."

Religious Awakening in Castro's Cuba

HAVANA, Cuba (FR) - According to a 1989 human rights report issued by the U.S. government, Fidel Castro's regime in Cuba is now classified as one of the most repressive in the world, on a par with North Korea. But close observers of the Caribbean nation say that a growing religious revival among the youth is causing a stir among the top Marxist leaders of Castro's government.

"The government seems ready to lessen pressure and provide concessions with regard to religion," said Ernesto Betancourt, an analyst with Radio Marti. In an interview with News Network International, Betancourt said the Catholic church has already been given limited concessions. "But there seems to be a growing spontaneous awakening religious feeling in Cuba. There is a craving for the spiritual among the young people which is very significant.

"People who are 'products of the revolution' are turning toward religion, and this is more so as the meat of the Marxist-Leninist theology starts losing credibility and attraction to the young people as their stated value. So the government is trying to cope, trying to channel into ways that they could use religion to reduce crime with regard to anti-social behavior among young people.

"At the same time," Betancourt added, "they are very concerned that once you start teaching individuals that they are responsible as individuals and that individualism is a part of the Judeo-Christian tradition, of course you are undermining the appeal of collectivism; so there is a basic conflict that the government can in no way resolve on the ideological level."

Fidel Castro was recently pressured by a group of internationally acclaimed writers, actors, artists, and intellectuals to schedule free elections and bring about human rights reforms. The group, which included author Saul Bellow, film director Federico Fellini, and writer Eugene Ionesco, published an open letter in 18 international newspapers which criticized the Cuban regime. Castro was reportedly "insulted and annoyed" by the letter; officials in the Cuban government held a six-hour press conference to answer questions raised about human rights violations on the island.

Missions Report: Bruce Olson's and Colombia's Motilone Indians

10/92

Since 1961, missionary Bruce Olson has labored for the gospel of Jesus Christ among the Motilone Indians deep in the jungles of Colombia's high Catatumbo region. But today Olson's most exciting missionary work still lies ahead.

In the past thirty years, Olson has founded bilingual schools, medical clinics and agricultural centers among the Motilones. His Christ-like humility and work of service to the Motilones has earned him the status of a tribal member. Indian chiefs throughout the region representing 50 tribes and half a million tribe members look to Olson with great awe and respect. He has become a friend of five Colombian presidents; has spoken before the United Nations; and has received educational awards from the Colombian government. Although he completed college only through correspondence schools, his work on translating the Scriptures into the native Indian dialects has earned him honor among linguistics scholars.

Nineteen-year-old Olson first travelled to South America with only a one-way plane ticket and $70 in his pocket. A young person with a deep burden for Colombia's hidden people, Olson set out in search of the Motilones: a fierce, primitive tribe that no white man had ever encountered and lived. Olson's adventures in Colombia brought him face to face with the Motilones when he was shot through the leg with a three foot arrow. He was brought as a prisoner to their camp to recover. "Bruchko" - the name the Indians gave him (the Motilones were not able to pronounce Bruce Olson) - eventually won over the hearts of these tribal people. Today the Motilones are almost universally converted to Christ.

Three years ago, Bruce Olson was kidnapped in the mountain jungles of Colombia and detained for nine months as a political prisoner by communist guerillas. Hoping to win him as a valuable communist leader, the communists attempted to indoctrinate him through daily political dialogues. "Papa Bruchko" - as they called him - became a source of fascination among the young recruits in training. Many of them began to join Olson in prayer and Bible study. As many as 60 communist guerillas eventually gave their lives to Christ. His refusal to join ranks with the communists earned him death threats and he narrowly escaped execution by a firing squad.

Fearing the reprisal of a united war effort of 50 jungle tribes, the guerilla leaders released Olson in the summer of 1989. The Indian tribes of Colombia had united against the guerillas in a war-pledge to defend Olson's cause if he was executed. The unity of the Indian tribes behind one white man was unprecedented in Colombia's history.

After his release, Olson found that he had become a national hero in Colombia. In the major cities, articles demanding Olson's release had appeared almost daily in the newspapers. Olson's courageous stance against the guerillas was one of the key factors which inspired the common citizens of Colombia to take a bolder, tougher stance against the drug cartels.

Since this time, the openness of the Indian tribes of Colombia to the gospel has become phenomenal. Many tribal leaders have requested that Olson begin to set up clinics, schools and agricultural centers. Some tribes have asked specifically to be taught about Jesus Christ. Olson reported recently: "In August, I was among the Cogi Indians in the mountains adjacent to Santa Marta. I baptized more than 40 adult believers. Several Motilone pastors accompanied me."

In America, the story of Bruce Olson's captivity brought unprecedented financial support for the work of Christ among the Motilones. For 28 years, Olson had operated with no official sponsorship, relying on only the contributions of friends, but when Charisma magazine ran a two part series: "Bruce Olson's Nine Month Colombian Captivity" (November & December 1989), donors gave $100,000 to help "Bruchko" continue his humanitarian efforts and evangelism among the tribes of Colombia.

In addition to providing clinical supplies, scholarships and agricultural development, Olson has built several centers for the Motilones. In a recent letter, Olson explained the uses for one of the structures he is building: "Our Tibú Community House of Twelve Cultures, which we have named in Motilone: 'Axdobaringcayra,' is well on the way to completion. ... The house will provide lodging for visiting Motilones. Tibú is the principal port of commerce for the growing tribal economy and it is the seat of government. Here we will organize Colombia's first native language regional newspaper and house staff personnel for the northeast Colombian indigenous cultural publications."

The cultural center he is now building will be a base from which to reach many of the tribal groups of Colombia. Olson reports that he still needs about $60,000 to complete this center.

Bruce Olson and the Motilone believers are the key to fulfilling the Great Commission in this area of the world. Jesus Christ has commanded us to go and "make disciples of all nations" (Matthew 28:18-20). Many of the nations - referred to by missiologists as the ETHNE, or "peoples groups" - in this area of Colombia are completely unreached with the gospel. We have an exciting opportunity to reach half a million people who have become miraculously open to the gospel in the past three years.

Castro: Marxism's Last Holdout

By Jay Rogers

3/91

It has been over two years since Fidel Castro stood boldly atop a podium in Havana on the 30th anniversary of the Cuban revolution. From the Plaza de la Revolución he shouted: "¡Marxismo-Leninismo o Muerte!" - Marxism-Leninism or death!

This was a shock for many of the Cubans listening on that New Year's Day celebration. The regimes of the most powerful dictatorships were weighed in the balance in that coming year ... and were found empty. Many of Castro's own people now find him to be insane - they now sing a song: "That Man is Crazy." And they begin to dream of a time when they will be liberated from him.

The United States' sweeping victory over the treachery of a Middle Eastern strongman has led many political analysts to focus their prognosis on Cuba and the fate of its aging dictator. The World Monitor's Georgie Anne Geyer, a reporter who has followed Castro's career for over 30 years recently suggested that Castro is "Not likely to go quietly ...

"That is what would make his end so important - and potentially so terrifying at the same time. Fidel Castro is not a man likely to go quietly into the night to fade away, or to move into forgotten exile somewhere; that is not his style, and his combative psychology would not permit that" ("The Last Communist," World Monitor, March 1991).

One possibility suggested by analysts is civil war within Castro's army, which many feel has already begun its initial stages. Castro, who is in his 70s, has been the target of attempted assassinations over the years, which he has blamed on the United States. However, it is likely that it will be the people of Cuba and not an outside force who will depose Castro.

A brighter scenario is the fact that Castro has allowed greater religious freedom in the past few years even while his twilight legacy has left Cuba with nothing more than the empty promises of Marxism replete with a culture empty of moral values.

The Church has been growing in Cuba and some say that the believers number at a million. This strong evangelical revival is poised to break onto the political scene. The effect that Cuban Christians will have on government may play as great a great role in the downfall of communism as did the Christians in Eastern Europe last year.

What is the force of change that is behind the downfall of tyranny? Without intervention from the United States, many tyrannical world governments are being reformed or are being dramatically crushed by an unseen force.

What does God's word have to say about it? The prophet Daniel foretold of this very hour when he saw the final collapse of tyrannical governments which are opposed to the rule of Christ (Daniel 2). God Himself is crushing these governments into powder. He is opening the doors, pulling down all the walls and removing the curtain to allow for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the whole world.

Champions for Christ in Central America

By Jay Rogers

Reported by Franco Gennaro

12/92

In the spring of 1991, Franco Gennaro was allowed to hold an evangelistic meeting on the still-communistic campus of the University of Nicaragua. While banners and paintings of Sandino and the Sandinista cause still lined the hallways just outside the university auditorium, Gennaro preached the gospel of Jesus Christ. The director of activities for the university said he would allow the meeting to go unhindered because he felt it would be helpful for the students to hear different viewpoints.

"Our rally was the first religious meeting ever allowed to take place on that campus," says Gennaro enthusiastically. "Not only did many students and professors attend the rally out of curiosity, but many expressed an interest in knowing more about Jesus, and we were given an open invitation to return."

Gennaro's organization, Campeones Para Cristo (Champions for Christ), is a ministry that is making an impact on the young people of Central America. With a primary emphasis on the youth of Central America, Gennaro and his Champions focus on the high school and university campuses.

As a ministry of service in both Latin America and the United States, Champions for Christ is dedicated to providing biblical solutions to the problems that face the youth and families of the world today. The ministry conducts major outreaches using mime, drama, testimonies, music and multi-media seminars in public places such as schools, universities, barrios and rural areas. But the work doesn't end with evangelism - Champions for Christ also trains young believers to do the work of ministry and have an impact on their own generation.

The strategic importance of reaching the campuses of Central America is crucial, stresses Champions for Christ's young director: "These are the same areas where the communists and drug lords are actively attempting to recruit and influence youth. These same students will be the future Noriegas, Fidel Castros and Daniel Ortegas."

Because of the nature of political systems in Central America, most of this type of subversive activity is allowed to go on unhindered due to the autonomy of most campuses. Nevertheless, the hunger for the gospel among the students is evident. Yet according to Gennaro, few missionaries will even set foot on the campuses of Central America.

"One of the weaknesses of the American missionary movement over the past 100 years is that we have failed to reach the future leaders of the Latin American countries - the youth!" Gennaro states. "Most missionary organizations either reach out to the very poor or the Indians in the jungles of Central America. Without minimizing the importance of this, the fact remains that 95% of those who will be the leaders of society - the movers and the shakers and the policy makers - are presently studying on the high school and university campuses of Central America."

Statistics show that 60% of Central America is under 25 years of age. Gennaro's Champions for Christ organization is dedicated to seeing a turnaround of among this strategic harvest field - one that has been virtually untouched in missionary work. Although their financial resources have been limited, Champions for Christ is seeing tremendous results:

* At the University of Panama, school officials welcomed the evangelists and allowed them full access to facilities in the central area of the campus. A multi-media seminar exposing the satanic influences behind much of today's Rock-n-Roll music was shown to a packed auditorium of Latin American students.

* In Honduras, many students were saved as a response to open-air preaching in the center of the campus. Champions for Christ evangelists challenged the students to "become a part of the real revolution - the revolution of love through the power of Jesus Christ."

* In one of the largest high schools in Costa Rica, school administrators called a mandatory assembly of more than 1800 students. About 350 students gave their name, address and phone number to the evangelists indicating that that they wanted to become a part of campus Bible studies.

In addition, Venezuela, Jamaica and Mexico have been the sights of outreaches by Champions for Christ. Other windows of opportunity continue to open on many high school campuses. Says Gennaro, "Usually, the principal of the high school will close down the entire school and have a mandatory assembly for the entire student body. The response has been overwhelming as hundreds of students will respond to the message of salvation."

With so many doors opening to go into the schools, universities and rural areas with multi-media programs, films and creative ministry, Champions for Christ is finding it impossible to keep up with all the requests. This vast unreached mission field is strategic in this hour. Gennaro's plan to compensate for the lack of American missionaries among the youth of Central America is to train nationals to do the work and to instruct local churches to cooperate in ongoing evangelism and discipleship programs.

Capeones para Cristo is in need of financial support to bring more nationals on staff, to purchase equipment and supplies (slide and movie projectors, P.A. equipment, evangelistic tracts) and to conduct training seminars.

Would you prayerfully consider investing in this strategic harvest field? Your support will go a long way in helping reach the youth of Latin America for the Lord Jesus Christ.

CHURCH AND STATE IN LATIN AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONS

By Pedro Moreno

LATIN AMERICA IS LIVING IN AN AGE OF profound transformations. Both spiritually and socially. In fact, it has been said that the recent spiritual revival that is taking place in the continent, due to the Protestant expansion, but also within Catholic circles, may well be one of the last hopes for the economic and social advancement of Latin America. Others doubt that the rise of evangelicalism will result in greater economic and social development in the region.¹ However, all admit that an enormous transference in religious affiliation is taking place as Latin Americans seek to have their spiritual needs satisfied.

According to recent statistics, in a region once considered a Catholic stronghold, protestants are growing at a rate of 400 per hour, which leads demographers to predict that Latin America will be evangelical before the end of the twenty-first century. ² Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo from Nicaragua, addressing the Vatican College of Cardinals in 1991 pointed out that "protestants in Latin America have grown surprisingly, from 4 million in 1967 to 30 million in 1985." On his part, Cardinal Ernesto C. Ahumada from Mexico stated that in the last 30 years "defections from the Catholic church) to other religious groups have tripled in the Dominican Republic, have increased by 500% in El Salvador and Costa Rica, and have grown by 700% in Guatemala."³ No wonder an evangelical president was recently elected in this latter country. In general, it is estimated that 20% of all Latin Americans are Protestant.

One could ask, what the reason, the causes, the motives for this spiritual transformation that has gone beyond the religious realm to spill into economics, politics, law, and other related areas. Some would say it is something to worry about. Others may look with expectation and hope at what has been termed by FORBES magazine a situation "quite literally revolutionary - more so than Fidel Castro or Che Guevara could ever be." Referring to the specific Brazilian case, FORBES goes on to say that as a result of evangelical Protestantism having replaced Roman Catholicism as the country's most widely practiced faith, "the old Brazilian order, based upon a rigid hierarchy and social immobility, has broken down. A new social atmosphere, one more compatible with capitalism and democracy is emerging." FORBES continues: "Upwardly striving urban poor are encouraged by religious teachings and support groups that preach the power of individuals to change their lives through faith. This contrasts sharply with the old attitude of resignation to one's fate and a glorification of poverty."⁴

The Separation Debate

One of the reasons that contributed to the above-mentioned protestant expansion is the "official" or "established" character of the Roman Catholic church in countries of Latin America. Countries that have had the Catholic church as the official one, not only recognized it as such, but "sustained" it with government subsidies to pay for the salaries of the hierarchy, salaries for teachers of Catholic religion (in the public schools), and subsidies for church schools, refurbishing of temples, etc. This situation still applies to countries such as Argentina, Costa Rica and Bolivia. While some supporters of the official church thought that a government-backed religion would be stronger and more lasting than the others, history and reality are demonstrating the contrary.

Michael W. McConnell and Richard A. Posner in a recent study and in response to the question, "Does it help or hinder religion ... (to favor) some denominations at the expense of others?" answer that "it is not entirely true, as it might appear to be, that subsidizing religion must help (a specific) religion and taxing it must hurt it." These writers quote Enlightenment thinker David Hume (himself hostile to religion) who supported the establishment of an official church with the purpose of dampening religious fervor. "He thought that clergymen on government payrolls, like other civil servants, would lose their zeal."⁵ This is exactly what has happened to the Catholic church in Latin America.

Catholic author Richard Rodriguez, puts it well: "My beloved Catholic Church has become an activist in the city, doing social work in plain clothes. Meanwhile Catholicism has deferred its rich prayer life - the rosaries, devotions, and novenas - to another age."⁶ In other words, the Catholic church became so involved with the state, and the social and political problems of Latin America that it lost its primary goal, the ministry of satisfying the spiritual needs of the people. This spiritual ministry has not been taken by the evangelical church, which is also starting to go beyond that into the social, economic, and political realm, hopefully without forgetting that its main task, as a church, is the spiritual one.

Position of Simon Bolivar

Simon Bolivar, one of the greatest thinkers and liberators that Latin America has had, commenting upon church and state relations and why he had not included any reference to religion in his 1826 project for a Bolivian Constitution said: "The state cannot rule the conscience of the subjects, neither give an award or a punishment, because God is the only (higher) power." He further stated: "Religion is the law of conscience. Any law upon it nullifies it, because as it imposes the need for this duty, takes away the merit of faith which is the basis of religion.... The sacred precepts and dogmas are useful, beautiful, and of metaphysic evidence, we all know how to profess them, but this duty is moral, not political." And Bolivar concluded: "Being all this (religion) of divine jurisdiction, at first sight it seems to me sacrilegious and profane to mix our ordinances with the commandments of the Lord. To prescribe religion, thus, does not belong to the legislators."⁷

On his part José Artigas, liberator of Uruguay, addressing the 1813 Constitutional Convention and openly favoring religious liberty for all stated: "we shall promote civil and religious liberty to its maximum imaginable extension."⁸ A similar position was taken by Francisco de Miranda in Venezuela, Francisco Morazan in Central America, Bernardo O'Higgins in Chile, Bernadino Rivadavia, Moreno, and Belgrano in Argentina, Vicente Rocafuerte in Mexico, and others.

Vicente Rocafuerte, an Ecuador-born patriot and one of the "ideologists" for the national independence of the Latin American countries, himself a Catholic, recognized that in the United States the relationship between church and state had been remarkably solved by separating these two institutions. In 1831, in an age hostile to liberty of conscience and worship, Rocafuerte wrote his book "Essay on Religious Tolerance" in which he stated that "a dominant religion is oppressive. That is why the early Christians were also persecuted." For him the separation of church and state was "the genius of the century."⁹

Recent Developments Concerning Church and State

One of the Latin American countries that most recently has separated the church from the State is Paraguay.

In a surprising but understandable move, the Paraguayan Catholic Bishops Conference joined a group of 14 protestant churches in asking for the separation of church and state in that country. The new Paraguayan constitution guarantees religious freedom and the separation of church and state. It also eliminates the requirement to profess the Catholic religion for the President of the republic.

In June of 1991, with the participation of two evangelicals, and with the support of indigenous peoples and others, Colombia's Constitutional Convention took away the official status of the Catholic church and declared that "all religious confessions and churches are equally free before the law" (art. 19 of the new Constitution) in spite of the Catholic church. The Colombian Congress is not discussing a religious liberty law which, according to its framers (evangelical lawyers) would further guarantee and detail the equality of all churches and their rights to freedom of worship.

On its part, the Lower Chamber of the Mexican Congress has just approved a "Law on Religious Associations and Public Worship" that attempts, at least partially, to restore religious liberties in that country. In its 6th article the law establishes that "religious associations are equal before the law in rights and obligations." This means that there are not special privileges for the Catholic Church.

Evangelicals in Chile are pressing the Congress to grant evangelical churches the legal status of entity of public law. Currently the only church in the country that has such a status is the Catholic church. This new status would relieve the evangelical churches from having to register with the government, give some tax benefits to them, and especially improve their current legal situation which now places the evangelical churches at the same level of sports clubs, cultural associations, and the like.

Argentina, where the Catholic church is still the "official" one, and where the President must be Catholic, has now started a process of debate concerning this topic. President Carlos Menem has manifested his desire to eliminate the "religious test" for the President, and believes the Catholic hierarchy will not oppose this measure. There is also strong support for the separation of church and state.¹⁰ Currently, the Argentinean Congress is discussing a law on religious liberty which, due to its controversial and unclear provisions, is not expected to pass anytime soon.

Concerning Bolivia, the struggle for the separation of church and state continues, this time with the support from not only evangelical circles but even from some sectors of the Catholic church. Some political parties have also expressed their desire to see a constitutional amendment to provide for church and state separation. At this moment, article 3 of the Constitution establishes that "the State recognizes and sustains the Roman, Apostolic, Catholic church. It guarantees the freedom of worship."

Conclusion

Latin America has had one of the most extended experiences with the establishment of and "official" church. For the most part the results have been negative. Negative for the Catholic church, which not only has seen an increasing decline of the number of its faithful, but also has suffered the impact of the abuses, mistakes, and shortcomings of the supposedly "Catholic" central governments. Negative for the country, because it did not allow the development of an environment of true pluralism in the religious realm, affecting even the political realm.

With the new constitutional reforms that most Latin American countries have undergone and are still undergoing, and the consolidation of the separation of church and state in most of them, there is hope that the religious climate will improve, thus providing a better environment not only for the evangelical churches that have long suffered discrimination, but even for the revitalization of the Catholic church. As the wisdom of history and biblical principals have shown, it is better that the state perform its specific civil responsibilities, which the church dedicates itself to the satisfaction of the spiritual needs of the people.

Last but not least, we should never forget that the separation of church and state does not mean separating God or the Bible from public life. Christianity is relevant to all areas of life, and can impregnate them with biblical principles. But that work should be carried out by individuals and never by uniting the church and the state at an institutional level.

Guerilla Members Abandon Violent Front

Reported by Bruce Olson
10/92

BUCARAMANGA, Columbia (FR) - A majority of the guerilla members of the "Arm Forces for National Liberation" (UC-CLN), abandoned the violent front in May. At least 60 percent of these former communist terrorists had become Christians during the nine-month captivity of Bruce Olson (Charisma, "Held Hostage," Nov/Dec. 1989). The walk-out was staged in unity among the Christian members of the guerilla front.

According to Olson, "This renders the 'Armando Cacua' Front - recognized as one of Colombia's most violent terrorist groups - inoperative."

Revolutionary discipline for abandoning the cause is death by firing squad. UC-ELN's pledge is: "Not One Step Backwards, Liberation or Death." However, in an unprecedented action, the governing assembly of the "Armando Cacua" Front released the Christian members from the guerilla oath labelling them "peacemakers."

Colombian Pastor Refuses to Back Down Against Threats from Drug Dealers

MENDELLIN, Colombia (EP) - Dr. Miguel Mosquera, a full time lawyer, pastor and president of Colombian Christian Alliance, has been an outspoken opponent of drugs and refuses to back down from threats by drug cartels. When the callers make threats, he answers, "You cannot kill me unless God allows it."

In the midst of a "war" between drug cartels and the Colombian government, Mosquera has confirmed his intentions to fight drugs in Colombia. Scores of people in the legal profession, including legal secretaries, court clerks, and reporters attend meetings conducted by Mosquera several days a week in downtown law offices in Mendellin.

During the meetings they study the Bible and pray over the noon hour. Then they return to work, operating the judicial system which functions in the shadow of Colombia's most powerful drug cartel, which openly admits responsibility for the assassinations of judges and the destructions of courthouses.

Mosquera's work and influence as a lawyer and pastor has earned him the hostility of drug dealers, particularly after the conversion of one dealer with whom Mosquera had contact. Telephone threats followed, but Mosquera asserts that "this is the time to go to work."

Cuba's Church

HAVANA, Cuba (EP) - The evangelical church in Cuba is alive but is "waiting for a revival," according to Rodrigo Zapata, an expert on the Latin American church and a missionary with Herald of Christ Jesus' Blessings (HCJB) World Radio. Zapata visited the communist-controlled country June 24-July 4.

"The Cuban church is in a period of transition," he said. "It's not dead; it's alive. But it's waiting for a revival. Some believers are fearful of the future." Zapata preached in churches and led Bible studies for more than 60 Cuban pastors representing about 30,000 believers in the country, about 0.3 percent of the population.

There is no organized persecution of the evangelical church by the Cuban government, but resistance can come in more subtle forms, especially for those outspoken about their faith. For example, it is difficult for an active Christian to secure and to hold a job, according to Zapata, who said it is "not impossible, but difficult. The Christian has to be quiet so he won't be betrayed by someone else who wants to obtain his job."

In spite of the pressure, there are young, Christian professionals who are spearheading future growth of the evangelical church in Cuba, according to Zapata. "The new generation of Christians is a generation of university students and professionals, doctors and scientists, cultured people who are very well prepared and who have a greater impact on society."

A number of Christian radio stations broadcast into Cuba: Family Radio from Florida, Trans World Radio from Bonaire, and HCJB can be heard clearly throughout the island nation. When he asked the 500-member congregation of First Baptist Church in Santiago which of them listened to HCJB, said Zapata, nearly everyone raised their hands. He also reported hearing of a church in the mountains founded by people when they came to faith through the radio programs of HCJB ten years ago. "Today it's a strong church and has a pastor," said Zapata.

Even though religious freedoms in Cuba are restricted, Zapata claims that the evangelical church has a favored position because of the country's leader, Fidel Castro. Christians who fought with Castro during the 1953 revolution left an impression of the communist leader who "respects their prayers, their reading of the Word and their Christian virtues," said Zapata, who added, "They are national heroes."

But most of the atheist officials in the communist regime don't hold this view. "In my opinion, if Castro were to be replaced, the evangelical church would suffer more persecution," Zapata claimed.

Evangelical Churches Gain Stature in Cuba

5/88

EDINBURG, TX (CA) - The moral leadership of Cuban Christians is gaining them respect in the eyes of state officials, according to a U.S. missionary leader who visited Cuban churches in January.

"The state is gradually recognizing the positive moral strength of the evangelical church and is showing a new openness to the churches' request for standing before governmental agencies," says Gordon Johnson, president of Rio Grande Bible Institute and Language School in Edinburg, Texas.

In addition, Cuban believers also have come to be known as honest and productive workers. A state co-operative farm director told a Cuban pastor, "I would rather have 15 pastors work for me than 300 non-believers who would fight, rob, and not do much work."

Johnson, who has made 24 trips to Latin America, says that a change in attitude toward evangelical churches was noted in 1985 when a Brazilian Catholic priest, Frei Betto, interviewed Fidel Castro. "For the first time, Castro spoke of religion not necessarily as the 'opiate of the people,' but as a possible positive force in building a socialistic state. This acceptance of 'religion' has lent a certain credence to evangelicals," says Johnson.

In Fidel y la Religión (Fidel and Religion), the book containing the transcript of those interviews published in December, 1985, Castro takes the position that the state does not need to be blatantly anti-church. In fact, he said that the state could benefit from the church as protecting certain areas of morality. Castro thought if Lenin were alive today, he would agree with this position.

California Doctor Makes History in Cuba

PASEDNA, California (FR) - Dr. Jack Folmar and his wife, Barbara, recently paid a historic visit to Cuba through a program called ASSIST, whereby Americans can adopt churches in communist countries.

The California physician and his wife attend Calvary Chapel of Costa Mesa, California, and visited a church in Havana, allotted as part of a new program started by British journalist Dan Wooding called ASSIST (Aid to Special Saints in Strategic Times). Wooding started ASSIST one year ago as a way Americans can respond to glasnost, and do more to help churches in restricted countries. He plans to extend the program to every communist country in the world.

"On my first trip to Cuba, eight years previously, I had discovered that the evangelical population of the island was 100,000, but now out of a total population of ten-and-a-half million, it has jumped to 500,000," said Wooding.

Dr. Folmar described the church he visited. "It is a church with a tremendous emphasis on Bible teaching, and has a program that seems to mirror that of Calvary Chapel of Costa Mesa," he said. "This stucco-framed church, located on a busy thoroughfare in Havana, has worship services two or three nights a week, a missions program, and in-depth Bible teaching during the week and on Sundays."

The couple attended a Friday night evangelistic service at their sister church during which two Cuban soldiers, in uniform, committed their lives to Christ. "That was the highlight of the trip," stated Dr. Folmar later.

After participating in the ASSIST training program in Mexico City, the Folmars took a Pastoral Library of teaching materials into Cuba.

"We were told to expect a miracle and that all of our books would get safely into the country," said Dr. Folmar. "So I just stuffed all my pocket-sized books into my tweed coat. I looked 15 pounds heavier and very out of place in the tropics. We prayed a lot and they didn't open anything at Havana Airport."

Barbara Folmar confessed to being bowled over by the Christians she met during those seven life changing days in Cuba. "We went to several meetings, both in churches and homes. It was so exciting to be accepted and to see their joyful spirit. They had so little, yet they were thankful for everything, especially for us coming. I think I was even more thankful for them. I had never met Christians like that before."

Dr. Folmar decided to make the trip to Cuba after hearing Dan Wooding speak at the Calvary Chapel missions fellowship about the sister church program for Cuba. "I was so overjoyed to discover how the Cuban church is flourishing and thriving," he said. "I'll never forget the joy on the faces of the believers we met when they discovered that they were not forgotten."

ASSIST is soon to move its headquarters from Costa Mesa to Pasadena and will be located on the campus of the U.S. Center for World Missions.

For further information on the ASSIST sister church program, write to: ASSIST, P.O. Box 1979, Costa Mesa, CA 92628. Phone: (714) 642-9496.

Evangelism in Colombia

BOGOTA, Colombia (EP) - In the midst of a violent "war" that drug cartels have declared on the government of Colombia, evangelist Luis Palau had record attendance at his evangelistic meetings in the capital city of Bogota, which he described as "grim, tense, and nervous."

Palau arrived in Bogota just a few hours after the funeral of assassinated Colombian presidential candidate Luis Carlos Galan August 20. Galan was killed by hit men of drug cartels who have declared "total and absolute war" on the Colombian government in response to the government's efforts to halt the manufacture and distribution of cocaine and other drugs.

At a press conference, Colombian journalists asked Palau if he expected the recent violence to result in low attendance at the meetings, which were planned a year ago. "In times of national crisis even hardened people will realize that the only answer must be in God," Palau said.

Record numbers turned out to attend the evangelistic meetings August 22-27; two of the meetings set new attendance records, according to a crusade official. The administrator for the coliseum where the meetings were held said he had never seen so many people there before. Thousands of people had to be turned away from the closing meeting Sunday, Palau officials reported.

Public events in Bogota scheduled at the same time as the Palau meetings, including a parade, were cancelled as a result of the recent violence there. Palau officials were unwilling to cancel the meetings at the city's request, however, and so the police provided extra security for all the public meetings. Palau was guarded by members of the Colombian Department for Administrative Security (DAS), the Colombian equivalent of the U.S. Secret Service.

Security at the coliseum was stepped up as well. Everyone entering the coliseum was frisked and their bags checked. The added security measures did not prevent a bomb scare however. At one meeting the makings of a fire bomb were found in the coliseum, stated Palau officials. There was no violence during any of the meetings, however, and many members of the police force who were there responded to Palau's invitation to receive Christ.

For security reasons, two former Colombian presidents were unable to attend a luncheon meeting that had been scheduled with Palau. Palau did speak to both former presidents by phone, however. The widow of assassinated presidential candidate Luis Carlos Galan was unable to attend the Saturday evening meeting with her three sons; her security advisor suggested that it was too dangerous.

Christian organizations in Bogota also report that they are carrying on as usual. David Peacock of the Christian Literature Crusade Bookshop in the city said that Christian work there is continuing its "daily functions as normal," as are other workers with Christian organizations such as Wycliffe Bible Translators, Campus Crusade for Christ, and TEAM.

Peacock said that the recent Palau crusade was "a wonderful time" and "a highlight for the city." He asked that Christians around the world pray for the safety of foreign workers and also pray that the situation will not worsen.

Friends of Latin America

For the past five years, Rep. Louis (Woody) Jenkins and his wife Diane have been the inspiration and founding partners of Friends of the Americas, a public charity organization providing assistance to children in Latin America suffering from poverty, natural disasters and war.

A major thrust of this organization has been the Christmas Box Project, an intricate system of delivering boxes to needy children in Latin America. Individuals and families work to put together a box for a child of a particular sex or age providing clothing, school supplies, personal hygiene items and toys. The box must also contain a letter and a photo of the person or family preparing the box.

Today in Latin America, thousands of small children are homeless refugees - without food, clothing or medical care. Others are orphans or victims of natural disasters. Many are sick from malaria, parasites, tuberculosis or severe malnutrition. Most of these children have never had a new piece of clothing or a single toy.

The goals of the Christmas Box Project are to provide the American people with a meaningful way to experience "the gift of giving," and to demonstrate the love of the American people by delivering Christmas gifts to the neediest children in those countries.

Tom McKee, a foreign service officer in Costa Rica, participated in the Christmas Box distribution last year and said, "It's not often in this business that you get an emotional lift like we got from distributing the Christmas boxes."

One of the recipients of a Christmas box, Lita, a survivor of the earthquake in Mexico City said, "These little boxes came to us full of love, happiness and kisses to cheer us in this time of suffering. The letters spoke to us from the heart, telling us to be strong, to be tranquil, that Jesus loves us, and that our friends in America love us. It has given us heart. May God bless you. We will never forget you."

We hope that through participating in this project, you and the child who receives the box may become great friends. If you want instructions for packing a Christmas box, you can obtain this information by writing: Friends of the Americas; 912 Foster Drive; Baton Rouge, Louisiana 70806, USA; PHONE: (504) 926-5707

Guatemalans Elect Evangelical President

Serrano pledges commitment to "God and the people."

2/91

GUATEMALA CITY (NNI) - Latin America's first freely-elected Protestant evangelical President has won Guatemala's January 6 presidential election. Final voter tallies indicated that Jorge Serrano Elias, the former President of the Council of State in the 1982-83 administration of Army General Efraim Rios Montt, won with 68 percent of the vote.

Speaking to supporters soon after the polls closed, Serrano said, "We have won the election with the support of the people and God. I have no commitment to any political power base; my only commitment is to God, to whom I've committed myself to govern the best I can, and to the sovereign will of the Guatemalan people who elected me."

Serrano also affirmed that his priorities as President will lie in upholding human rights, bringing a peaceful resolution to the on-going guerilla conflict, and economic development.

Serrano's running mate and Vice-President-elect, Gustavo Espina, also an evangelical, said he believed the new administration would enjoy continued support from the Protestant community, emphasizing that its support is needed "now more than ever."

Newspaper publisher Jorge Carpio Nicolle, who trailed Serrano in the election with 32 percent of the vote, conceded that the evangelical vote as well as the endorsement of several political parties had been crucial to Serrano's victory.

Less than six months ago, Serrano trailed in a field of 12 candidates. According to press reports, Serrano said he had entered the presidential race in case his mentor General Rios Montt was disqualified. Rios Montt, a fervent and outspoken Christian, was favored to win the elections in the first round but was disqualified under a law barring him from holding a nationally-elected office.

Evangelical Christians now make between 30 to 40 percent of the Guatemalan population, following the tremendous Christian revival of the past two decades. Serrano's victory is as much an indication of the sovereign will of the people as it is of the sovereignty of God.

Virgilio Zapata, former president of the Evangelical Fellowship of Latin America said that he believed Serrano was elected "because of his professionalism and honesty in dealing with the issues and problems facing Guatemala today."

Honduran student testimony

TEGUCIGALPA, HONDURAS (FR) - Jose Young had always heard that the United States was a Christian nation. This was what led him to come to America from his native Honduras to study engineering at Southwest State University in southern Minnesota.

But after becoming very disillusioned, Jose abandoned the Christian beliefs that he held and began to seek new friends. He was dismayed with the problems of racism and became bitter with white Americans. "There were so many bad racist incidents, that I began to devise a plan to return home and get my revenge by turning my country into a socialist society," he related.

Jose became indoctrinated in the tenets of revolution by reading the works of Fidel Castro, Karl Marx, Che Guevara, and Malcolm X. "These were the models that I wanted to imitate," he said. Young began to believe that Honduras needed a Marxist revolution similar to the Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua.

However, a few days before he was due to return to Honduras, he was invited to a church service. At that meeting, Jose Young saw the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ and became a Christian. After receiving his bachelor's degree, he returned to Honduras to assist the Maranatha Campus Ministry in Tegucigalpa.

Jose's goals are very different now; he is no longer advocating violent revolution. "I want to be a part of the reconstruction of Honduras - a reconstruction based on Christian principles. God is going to use me in the restoration and reformation of our society. I want to train leaders to be mighty men of God. We are going to experience a national revival."

Noriega Linked to Drugs and the Occult

3/90

PANAMA CITY, Panama (EP) - Deposed Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega, who faces drug charges after a U.S. invasion toppled his military rule, was raised a Catholic, but converted to Buddhism in the mid-1970s. U.S. troops searching his residence found large quantities of cocaine and pornography. Soldiers storming a Noriega guest house narrowly missed capturing four Brazilian voodoo witches who performed rituals for Noriega's protection. The "witch house" contained 50 pounds of cocaine, a bucket of blood, and various voodoo artifacts.

Hope for Revival Growing in Panama

PANAMA CITY, Panama (EP) - With ousted Panamanian leader Manuel Noriega in U.S. custody and U.S. troops beginning to withdraw, a spirit of new beginnings is emerging in Panama.

"It's just so different now," said Southern Baptist missionary James Gilbert, who lives in Panama City. "We feel a security we did not have before. More people are going to work, cleaning up, and getting ready to build again. There's a different spirit among the people."

Now that the fighting is over, Panamanian Christians, missionaries, and relief organizations in the U.S. are providing hunger relief. Because church members take food directly to families, the project provides personal contact with people in need. "More than just giving them a bag of food, volunteers can hear them and they can share with them," explained Gilbert.

In addition to relief efforts, missionaries have found opportunities to meet spiritual needs. On New Year's Day, Gilbert and a Panamanian deacon visited a group of U.S. soldiers at a camp in Panama City. Later, Gilbert shared the gospel with a U.S. soldier who had experienced a close call during the invasion. The soldier's parachute snagged on a tree, and he was left hanging. "He finally cut himself down, but he had a real soul-searching experience," said Gilbert. "He was wide open to listen to the gospel."

Gilbert urges for prayer for "spiritual awakening" in Panama. There's a vacuum in our people," he concluded. "We need to fill that something that's positive. You can't rebuild a nation just by building buildings."

Inter-American Congress of Christian Parliamentarians to meet in '92

By Jay Rogers

12/90

Can you imagine a conference of Christian congressmen, senators and parliamentarians from all the nations of the western hemisphere, coming together on a regular basis, to pray and discuss issues from a biblical perspective?

This is exactly what Pedro Moreno, President of the Rutherford Institute in Bolivia, has in mind. The brainchild of some young South American visionaries, the First Inter-American Congress of Christian Parliamentarians will most likely be held sometime in 1992 in the Dominican Republic.

The goal of this conference is to bring together senior government officials from both South and North American nations to discuss a whole agenda of hemispheric problems - and to propose hemispheric solutions to these problems from a uniquely Christian platform.

Pedro Moreno has an emphatic interest in seeing political change in Bolivia and a unique testimony to tell as well. As an international student studying government at Tufts University, Pedro was a leftist. Through the study of Marxism, Pedro believed that a violent, leftist revolution was the only answer to his country's problems. That is, until someone shared the Gospel of Jesus Christ with him.

"I was invited to a dinner for international students," Pedro recollects. "I saw some love and care and some happy families. I realized that they had something that I did not have. Then one night after talking with a minister from a church in Boston, I told him that I had been looking for the Truth my whole life. That night we prayed at a subway station and from then on I realized that Jesus was real."

Now Pedro has another vision. Still bent on revolutionary reform, Pedro believes that the radical message of the Gospel - not socialism - is the force that is destined to conquer the earth. This sense of destiny is the impetus that is fueling the vision for the Inter-American Congress.

"I now realize that it is not a question of changing the structures, but changing the men. Men can only be changed through Jesus," says Pedro and he hopes that this can translate into social change.

"We have three objectives: one is to glorify God with all the nations getting together with Christ as the center; second, to train all the new Christian Parliamentarians that have been elected, because most of them, even though they are Christians, do not have a Christian worldview - a Christian perspective of politics, economics, education, etc. The third purpose is to encourage all Christians to participate more actively in government, to vote, be elected and be heard."

The Congress will commemorate the 500th anniversary of the arrival of the Gospel in the western hemisphere. The leaders of many nations will be trained in biblical principles of law, politics, economics, education, science and technology.

The leaders will discuss the problems their nations share and propose answers from a biblical perspective. Their goal will be to encourage more Christians to get involved in politics, business, the arts, science and all areas of life.

Pedro is sponsoring the planning of the congress in cooperation with four evangelical Christian groups this coming March, in La Paz, Bolivia. The groundswell of Christian activity in Bolivia is similar to what has been happening in other Latin American countries, such as Peru, where Alberto Fujimori was elected President earlier this year because of strong evangelical support.

In addition to Fujimori, 15 Christian congressmen were recently elected in Peru. An Evangelical Political Action group has recently been formed in Brazil and there was a strong evangelical showing in the recent election in Guatemala. There is also a growing movement in Bolivia to promote more active Christian participation in the political process.

As these ideas begin to permeate other countries in Latin America, Pedro and his contingent of lawyers, congressmen, and other political allies are busy planning to consolidate a recognizable force and help the Christian communities of all the nations of the West gain momentum.

Some of the Christian ideas that make up their agenda will include:

- * Implementing Christian approaches to politics, economics, education, scientific investigation and technological innovation.
- * Solving the problems of drug trafficking and terrorism.
- * Understanding the integrated potential of the nations of the West, in light of the unlimited power of God, when the hearts of the people are turned toward Him.
- * Analyzing ways in which religious liberty can be expanded and established so that the propagation of the Gospel can occur without hindrance.
- * Establishing an effective strategy to defend human life, effected through a strong rejection of abortion, infanticide, euthanasia and killing of the "undesirable."
- * Discovering a Christian response to the needs and problems of ethnic minorities.

* Working toward the redefinition, in light of Scripture, of such concepts as "Third World," "Underdeveloped Countries," "Industrialized Societies," "Non-Aligned Countries," and "Rich/Poor or North/South Countries."

"I know that the Christian ideas that we support will be ultimate winners," says Pedro, "because God is the ultimate winner!"

The inclusion of an emphasis on prayer at the Congress will make the outcome of these ideas even more powerful. Consider the power of prayer and its potential to affect the destiny of Latin America. Think of the effect that a regular meeting of Christian statesmen coming together to pray on a consistent basis could have on world events!

The impact of the Congress of Christian Parliamentarians will continue to be felt, since it has been conceived as an ongoing event. If all goes as planned, it could be one of the most significant events of the decade.

Pedro Moreno is the President of the Rutherford Institute in Bolivia and the representative for all of South America. He is presently organizing chapters in all the Latin American countries.

Latin America On Fire

By José Yelincic G.
8/92

Latin America is turning evangelical. The continent which has been predominantly Catholic for nearly 500 years since the arrival of Spanish and Portuguese "conquistadors," is now being shaken by a widespread wave of change in the religious field. Thousands of people are leaving the Catholic church, which means leaving a tradition and a culture held for centuries, to join evangelical Protestant churches, and especially Pentecostal ones.

The Catholic hierarchy is concerned. Some authors and researchers say that in Brazil, supposedly the largest Catholic nation in the world, over a half million Brazillians are leaving the Catholic church for evangelical churches each year. Others say that "the number of evangelicals has tripled regionwide in the past 25 years and in some countries has even sextupled."¹

Although statistics may vary, the fact is that a wind of revival is sweeping Latin America, to such extent that scholars and sociologists are seriously thinking of a true new Reformation (like the one that took place in Europe in the 1500s) taking place in Latin America. Spectators of this evangelical movement ponder the reasons for the mass exodus from traditional religion. There are many causes: people seeking spiritual responses that no longer come from a secularized church; an attraction to more participatory and less ritualistic forms of worship; the personal approach to the Scriptures held to by evangelical churches; the Catholic church's internal crisis; and the desire for participation in a close community of the newly converted.

This situation seems to open a new window of hope for Latin American countries, due to the positive economic, political, and social impact of evangelical conversion; although it is also producing tensions that have resulted, in extreme cases, in death for some evangelicals.

In several countries, the principal fortress, and ultimately the source for the institutionalized intolerance lies on the "official church" status that Catholicism enjoys. Catholics usually refer the emerging Christian churches as "sects," and charge them with destroying the national spiritual unity, the family, and popular traditions.

Here is an overview of some of the countries that are experiencing spiritual revival, but also religious intolerance.

Bolivia

Situated in the heartland of South America this country is witnessing a very dynamic movement of Protestant and evangelical churches. But it has had a high price to pay in the past. Eight Baptist missionaries were stoned to death by a mob in Mercamaya, a small town near Oruro, in 1949. Today threats and violent actions against Protestants are common in rural zones. In the last few months, major articles against evangelicals have appeared weekly in the national newspapers. The arguments used to attack the evangelicals vary from accusations of "being instruments of foreign imperialism" to "being harmful for the national culture."

Last year a formal petition for religious freedom sponsored by 24,000 signatures from all over the country was sent to the Bolivian congress.

Argentina

There is now increasing interest in a constitutional reform among Argentinian Protestants. Written petitions are being sent to the President and parliamentarians urging them to convene a constitutional assembly for 1993.

As of now, the Argentinian Constitution establishes that the state supports the Roman Catholic religion. Moreover, it is constitutionally stated that a citizen must be Roman Catholic to be President of the nation. A dangerous legal project known as the Jimenez Montilla Bill, which has already been approved by the Senate will inflict jail terms of six months to two years on persons guilty of "crimes against religious sentiment," "abuse of faith or religious beliefs," and the "illegal exercise of worship." This law will severely restrict freedom of worship.²

Mexico

Although the evangelical church is growing quickly in this nation, Mexico is by far the Latin American country with the most cases of violent persecution. Although there has been no official church since the times of Benito Juarez (1855) the Catholic church has widely influenced the religious behavior and culture of society. The result is a long tradition of intolerance, violent threats, stoning of chapels, beatings and arrests of pastors.

Recently, four evangelicals - two of them pastors - were finally released after being held in jail since November 1991, accused of stealing the crown of the Virgin and other cult artifacts from a Catholic church in Nuevo Acambay. There was no evidence connecting them to the theft.

Another recent case concerns the hundreds of Chamula Protestant Indians who had suffered a violent attack and eviction by tribal leaders. The attackers wanted the evangelical Chamulas off their land because they refused to participate in Catholic festivals.³

Paraguay

Government establishment of religion will be finally be abolished in June, if the Constitutional Assembly approves a project for the new constitution. Surprisingly, even the Catholic church has officially recognized that "it has become clear that it is best for society not to impose a confessionality upon the state."

Colombia

Since June 1991, the Colombian Constitution has provided for freedom of religion. This historic step was widely supported not only by Protestant Christians, but also by followers of indigenous religions.

Latin America is rapidly changing, faster than anyone would believe. In the midst of uncertainties and contradictions the flames of revival are rising, burning out an old fashioned worldview. This revival involves primarily religion, but reaches culture, social order, economics and politics. The degree to which a reformation can be accomplished depends now upon the extent that religious freedom reformers are willing to fight for and sustain.

Latin American Evangelicals: Impact and Future in Latin American Culture

By Pedro C. Moreno

3/93

There is substantial evidence that evangelicals in Latin America have impact on society, both on a spiritual and moral level, and more recently, on a social and economic level. This impact is acknowledged more and more not only by the populace, but at a governmental level.

Latin American evangelicals are credited with providing a sense of community to the masses of urban migrants (the many abandoning rural areas for the cities). They are credited with preaching a message that concentrates on the power of God not only to comfort spiritually but also help people materially: Many former prostitutes, drunkards, adulterers and others testify to their deep change after conversion. People have found a sense of purpose in their new beliefs. They are able to develop abilities in the church that are very helpful to their every day work, thus helping them rise economically. In general their presence is well accepted, and evangelicalism has now become a legitimate alternative in terms of religious belief and lifestyle.

However, as in any human endeavor, the presence and practices of Latin American evangelicals are not perfect. Reformation of society by evangelical Christians, if it is going to have full economic and social impact, needs a proper analysis and critique. The fundamental question is whether evangelicals will be able to bring their "micro-reformation" (personal empowerment and economic advancement) to bring "macro-reformation" (transformation of economic and social structures) in Latin American countries. The problems and questions to be analyzed are not exclusive to Latin American evangelicals, though some of the problems arise from the particularities of Latin American culture.

Debate on Social and Economic Impact

Timothy Goodman has questioned the correlation between cultural change (due to the rise of evangelicalism in Latin America) and economic development. He suggests that if there ever is economic development in Latin America, it will not be because of the evangelicals, but in spite of them.¹ Though he is right in many of his assertions, I do not agree with his implied view that this is an irreversible tendency. In fact, the greatest contribution of Goodman's article is precisely his willingness to submit "a vigorous dissent," as John Neuhaus puts it.² Thus, this may trigger a much needed and long overdue discussion that may help address and correct these problems.

There are three interconnected problems that need urgent consideration and discussion. First, the pentecostal/charismatic church message that stresses the division between the religious and the secular. Second, the apparent conflict between emotion and reason. Third, the question of ecclesiastical hierarchy as a "dominant class" in relation to the rest of church members.

Religious vs. Secular

The gap between the "religious" and "secular" is purely a pietistic notion, stemming more from Platonic and Eastern mystical influences in medieval Christianity than biblical doctrine. This influence has a long history that has been sufficiently analyzed elsewhere.³ One of the pernicious effects of the extremist pietistic view is exemplified by what I call a "religious paranoia." By this I mean the fact that church members concentrate and place high importance solely on "religious" matters at the expense of every other activity and aspect of life.

Many evangelicals believe they are doing "spiritual things" only when they are reading their Bible, attending church or praying. Everything else such as studying, working, sleeping, eating, is non-spiritual if not "secular" or "worldly." For example, church members believe they are listening to "spiritual" or "Christian" music only when they listen to music that has specific references to the Bible, to Jesus or to some type of religious theme. Other music, if it refers to the family, love, children, country, nature or even classical music, is thought to be "secular" or "non-Christian."

Another example is the idea of the tithe and why it should be given to the church. Many evangelicals believe that if they give 10 percent to the church, then this is the very least they can give to God. But do they believe that what we give to our children, education, food, vacation, housing or any other legitimate expense or good cause is not being given to God as well?

This pattern of thought has caused an "ecclesiastical atrophy" (a failure of Christian growth beyond church activities). This has resulted in evangelicals despising their studies, professions or work in order to exalt church activities over family life, dedication to work and devotion to study and scholarship.

Conflict of Emotion and Reason

It is understandable why there is much fear when someone speaks in the church about reason, intellectualism, doctrines, ideologies, etc. The excesses of rationalism and its heavy reliance on human intellectual insight with disregard to Scripture may have partially caused this reluctance to talk about these subjects. However, the extreme reliance on emotionalism and feelings in the pentecostal/charismatic churches nowadays is no answer to this problem. This position is best exemplified by the reading of Romans 12:2 as "be transformed by the removing of your mind," when it in fact says renewing.

Goodman describes this reliance on emotionalism as a substitute for rationalism. He is right when he mentions the strong emphasis on faith-healing, prophecy and the blaming of demons and evil spirits for illness - and I would add for most problems the Spirit-filled Christian encounters. This latter aspect is so widespread that many pentecostals see demons everywhere. That is, they attribute any failure, character flaw, sin or problem to a specific demon from which one needs "deliverance." In this context, personal responsibility for our actions takes second place.

Concerning faith-healing and prayer, many pentecostals believe that the miraculous realm is the rule for the successful Christian life and that the "natural" is just secondary. This insistence in being healed, prospered and made a success by the miraculous could lead them to very disappointing results. Reliance on the current use of preventative medicine, good health habits, hard work and excellence in studies is secondary and only occurs after the miraculous has not taken place - something like trying to do by "faith" what has not been done by obedience.

Together with rationalism, pentecostals and charismatics have also abandoned the study of systematic theology, church history (if there is no future, then why worry about the past?) and have placed the Bible in a secondary role. It is recurrent to hear such phrases as: "It does not matter if you know the Bible. The important thing is to be filled with the Holy Spirit." Extra-biblical "revelations" are readily accepted, both the ones that originate in our region and ones that originate in the United States.

There is the knee-jerk rejection of the "secular" or "natural" in favor of a purist "spiritual" or "religious" position. One of the negative developments of this type of thinking is exemplified by the recent decision by a substantial number of charismatic/pentecostal leaders in Bolivia to not celebrate Christmas. They argue that since some of the pagan festivals used to be celebrated around December, it is better to avoid this celebration all together. This reactionary thinking has brought unnecessary division to families; has deprived many people of the historical dimension of Christ; has emphasized the divinity of Christ over His humanity, as the Monophysite heretics and the Paulicians did at the end of the seventh and beginning of the eighth centuries. Stripping Christ and Christianity of His humanity, historicity and rationality deprives the faith of many people of much power, as well as robbing them of their intellectual and rational faculties.

Domination by Ecclesiastical Hierarchies

Pentecostal/charismatic churches in Latin America as well as in the United States and other places have concentrated only on the message of salvation of souls. This message is coupled with the belief that Jesus Christ will come back in a few years, or even a few months or a few days, or that the Rapture will happen sometime soon. Even though the intent of this teaching is good, it has unfortunately caused these churches to adopt a short term perspective on life. Since the time is short, we should therefore concentrate on evangelism and the saving of souls. Why bother participating in politics or studying economics or engineering? Why dedicate ourselves to such "mundane" roles as law, psychology, or even worse, philosophy?

The persistent message from the pulpit stresses the importance of being "called" by God to the "full-time ministry." That means that everybody should be an evangelist, a pastor, teacher, prophet or apostle if he or she wants to have a "call" in his or her life. The ministers of God are those in the "five-fold ministry." What does this make everyone else: the lawyers, carpenters, housewives, doctors, politicians, scientists and so on? The implication is that these latter ones are "second-class citizens" in the kingdom of God and that if they want to "redeem" their professional skills or trades they must use them "as a tool" for evangelism. In other words, your studies, profession or trade are only good if they allow you to "preach the gospel" in your school, your work place or your neighborhood - or enter closed lands as a "tent maker." Law, engineering, carpentry, in this analysis, are not valuable to God in themselves.

I have had pastors come to my office and after learning about our activities on behalf of religious freedom and human life which include the production of a TV and a radio program, a monthly journal and the provision of legal assistance in cases related to religious liberty and human life, tell me that these programs were very good and that they hoped one day "God would use me in His work." So I wonder, whose work am I doing now? After all, there are only two masters we can serve: God or Satan.

The negative implication of all this is that, although pastors and preachers have good intentions, much zeal for God and a passion for evangelism, they are helping breed a generation of frustrated and mediocre students and professionals. The ecclesiastical hierarchy is unconsciously acting as a dominant class and is crippling the people of God from realizing the full abilities and the breadth of their ministry.

In an effort to correct this imbalance, some Christian lawyers, journalists and a few pastors have started insisting on the importance of taking the concepts of "call" and "ministry" in their broader, biblical meaning: "A minister is any Christian who is acting in obedience to God." Concerning the "call," we know that God does not have "higher calls" and "secondary calls." God is not a discriminator of persons. Thus we need to rescue the concept of the universal priesthood of all believers.

When Dr. Jorge Serrano, a pentecostal/charismatic, became president of Guatemala some well known Latin American evangelists said that they would not "lower themselves" to become president of a republic. Since Serrano's election, at least one of them has asked for forgiveness for making this statement. What is Serrano's conviction concerning Christians and politics? He believes that God called him to be the president. In his calling, he is a minister to the people of Guatemala. According to sources close to the president, his conviction sustained him in his belief at one point when all the polls and public opinion put him last in electoral preference.

Any Christian can have a call in his or her life to be a teacher, an evangelist, an electrician, a full-time parent or any other legitimate activity. Everything we do, we do for the Lord whether it is praying, sleeping, eating, vacationing, reading the Bible, reading a newspaper, etc. This calling to ministry is exercised 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

Recourse for the Future

The insistence in presenting as opposites the religious and the secular, emotion and reason; and the establishment of a religious hierarchy which dominates ecclesiastical affairs has put the evangelical church, particularly charismatics and pentecostals, in a very difficult position. The lack of study of church history and past events, could result in an ill-prepared generation of evangelicals that will have great problems facing the future.

In this context, there is a need to balance the preaching of the imminent return of Christ, or the Rapture, with an understanding that Christ might not return any time soon. Two thousand years have already elapsed since His first coming and evangelicals need to be prepared for the long haul.

Goodman's questioning of the real contribution of evangelicalism to economic and social development is understandable. There is no automatic correlation between evangelical growth and economic and social advancement. Africa is 50% Christian according to some statistics, but 80% or more of its territory is under dictatorial rule and extreme poverty. If the evangelical church is going to change Latin America, then it will need Christian character more than just charisma.

Reason needs to be accepted and encouraged within the limits of revelation. The pulpit should be used as a place of encouragement and motivation for all church members, regardless of economic status, political views, profession or any other criteria. Though proper encouragement should be given to members serving in an ecclesiastical ministry (pastors, evangelists, etc.), the same kind of reassurance, motivation and encouragement should be given to all members as they exercise their daily professions or trades. This should be especially true for students who are seeking to confirm their academic vocation.

The problem with the evangelical church in Latin America is not irreversible. There is no malice or evil intentions on the part of the pastors and leaders that have put forth these ideas, nor is there reluctance to change this trend beyond natural inertia. The optimistic note which gives us hope for change is the experience concerning Latin evangelicals and politics. Until recently Latin American evangelicals considered politics as something "belonging to the devil," something "evil and dirty," with which Christians should have nothing to do. However, in only a few years after much teaching on biblical principles of government, most have accepted the importance of participation.

The new, broader perspective is gaining wider support among church members, with the leaders sometimes just following. It is my hope that a new and fresh dialogue will be opened in which church leaders will come to understand that every aspect of life can be put in the service of our Lord. Christians can give a testimony of diligence, excellence, responsibility, integrity and service in everything they do. After all, the church is composed by all believers and is present wherever believers choose to carry on their activities as they minister to God and all people.

America's Christian History: A Latin American Perspective

By José L. González

8/92

FIVE HUNDRED YEARS AGO GOD sent to America a man bearing a great treasure in a very fragile vessel: his name was Cristoforo, "The Christ bearer." Over one hundred years later, God sent to the northern shores of the Americas another people. These two different plantings of the Christian faith have borne very different fruit. It is time to know them, by their fruit.

The one brought the Christianity of the day - an unreformed, medieval faith represented by the Cross, the emblem of the Catholic Kings, planted at the point of the Spanish sword, bathed for eight hundred years in the blood of the Infidels. Conquistador, adventurer and priest worked side by side, seeking glory, riches and converts, each for the respective king: Cæsar, Mammon or God. By the sovereign Providence of God they conquered empires, dethroning principalities and subjugating people who often welcomed them to their land and to their daughters.

The others brought the Bible, by which each man governed himself according to the dictates of God. They were the fruit of a revival which had not yet begun when Columbus sailed, and which for historical reasons would not take hold in Spain. The Reformation, fueled by the printing of thousands of Bibles, bore fruit among the English Puritans, who wanted to "purify" their church. When they failed, they became "Separatists," wishing to separate themselves from a church entangled with the crown. It was these, who wanted to establish for posterity a Christian commonwealth, who made up the Pilgrims that landed at Plymouth in 1620.

Who can argue with the past designs of Providence? And who can know what He has reserved for the future? All we are called to do is discern the signs of the present time. So we weep for the virgin daughter of the Reformation in America, weighed down by the abundance of her own blessings. And we swell with joy in anticipation of the coming of age of her sisters to the South, to the glorious morn of their betrothal to the Son.

A curtain of iron has been torn in Europe, but a spiritual curtain of mutual disdain, pride and resentment still separates the two American sisters - fruit of these different plantings. This stronghold is the same which kept England and Spain bickering for centuries. Now it keeps their American offspring divided, not just against each other but also against their African and Indian brothers. Not one can cast the first stone.

The Gospel does go forth, preached to every creature, its inexorable march binding together what the devil has kept divided, until of every kindred and every tribe, from every tongue and every nation there joins around a throne, the chorus of the elect: all God's children, free at last, to love Him freely and in freedom, love one another!

José L. González is the founder of Semilla, an organization dedicated to educating Latin Americans in Biblical principles of government - self- and civil government.

Defending Liberty in Bolivia

By Dave Miller
2/91

LA PAZ, Bolivia (FR) - "As a Christian and as a lawyer, I believe that one of the greatest contributions I can make to the evangelization of our people is to work for an environment of broad religious liberty, where the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ can be preached, without interference, for the benefit of the whole country."

So states Dr. Pedro C. Moreno, 29, an attorney in La Paz, Bolivia. To fulfill his goal, Moreno has been working since September of 1990 to organize the first chapter of the Rutherford Institute on South American soil.

Founded in 1982, the Rutherford Institute is a non-profit organization dedicated to defense of religious liberty. It provides legal services, without charge, to persons suffering discrimination or persecution for their religious beliefs. Priorities include preserving free, public speech on religious issues, protecting the constitutional rights of churches and religious organizations and supporting the sanctity of all human life. The Institute named Dr. Moreno its South American representative last year, hoping eventually to expand into every country in the region.

The La Paz lawyer will have his work cut out for him in Bolivia, a country with a history of religious intolerance. Until 1906, for example, "proselytism" was a criminal offense. As recently as 1949, six Baptist evangelists, one a Canadian missionary, were beaten to death by an anti-Protestant mob in Mercamaya, a small town near Oruro. Sporadic cases of religious persecution - beatings, vandalism, and job discrimination - continue to the present.

Official discrimination against non-catholic "sects" continues as well. Though President Jaime Paz Zamora has privately assured evangelical church leaders that he welcomes their presence in the country, members of his administration are proposing rigid controls on the activities of Protestant churches. The regulations would require non-catholic entities to register each member's name and address with the government. The Under-secretary for Religious Affairs would review the doctrinal beliefs of Protestant denominations before granting them authorization to hold public meetings or plant new congregations.

Moreno points out that the proposed restrictions not only seriously hamper Christians from fulfilling the Great Commission, but are patently unconstitutional. A graduate of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University and a former advisor in the Bolivian Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he is keenly aware of the importance of religious freedom in democratic society.

In an address entitled "Religious Liberty, the Foundation of all other Freedoms," that Moreno delivered at Bolivia's first Presidential Prayer Breakfast in January of 1990, he proposed a constitutional amendment which would stop government interference in religion. In that speech, he quoted his nation's founder, Simon Bolivar, who firmly believed in this constitutional principle. "The state cannot govern the conscience of its subjects," wrote Bolivar, "nor grant reward or punishment, because God is its only Authority."

Bolivar's ideals coincide with the legal philosophy of the Rutherford Institute, which traces its judicial tradition to Samuel Rutherford, a 17th century Scottish scholar. Rutherford is remembered for his resistance to the divine right of kings, a prevailing social doctrine in his day. In his pivotal book, Lex Rex, Rutherford argued that all men - monarchs included - are subject to the law, regardless of their station in society. Rutherford's ideal became a foundation stone for the development of democracy in Europe and the New World.

American constitutional attorney John W. Whitehead, concerned that political and social forces around the world are threatening the basic human rights of religious liberty and freedom of conscience, founded the Rutherford Institute eight years ago. The organization now has affiliates in 30 states in the U.S. and 8 foreign countries, notably in Latin America and Eastern Europe. Dr. Moreno left his position as General Secretary of the Social Emergency Fund to establish Rutherford's South American branch.

To date he has recruited 18 lawyers interested in working to defend religious liberty in Bolivia, where discrimination continues against non-catholics. Reports have surfaced of protestant teachers fired from public schools because of their religious beliefs. In some cases, students have been forced to accept baptism, contrary to their convictions, in order to continue their studies. One of the Institute's major emphases is to educate persons to exercise their constitutional rights, in hopes of ending such illegal abuses.

"In this manner, we can accomplish an effective work in favor of religious liberty both here and throughout South America," says Moreno who has made contact with attorneys from Argentina to Colombia who have expressed a desire to cooperate in Institute activities.

Anyone wishing to obtain more information about the Rutherford Institute's services may do so by writing: Dr. Pedro Moreno San Juan, The Rutherford Institute, Casilla 12754, La Paz, Bolivia.

Local Leaders Say Major Revival Is Occurring in Cuba

4/89

HAVANA, Cuba (EP) - Dan Wooding, a Christian journalist and founder of the California-based ASSIST (Aid to Special Saints in Strategic Times) recently returned from Cuba where he met with pastors and arranged for some 50 Cuban churches to become part of a "twinning" project with U.S. Churches.

"Pastors traveled from different parts of the island to find out more and then signed up to be adopted," said Wooding, who returned to the U.S. early in March. "They said this was an answer to their prayers."

Under the church twin program, a U.S. church would "adopt" a Cuban church and help provide for the needs of its members. Correspondence between Cuban believers and U.S. believers could be a means of ministering spiritually to the church, as well as providing clothing, Christian literature, and for other physical needs. Wooding said he hopes eventually that U.S. adoptive churches will "want to visit [the Cuban church], ... and learn from them."

Of a population of roughly 10 million, about 500,000 Cubans are evangelical believers, said Wooding. The Communist island nation is experiencing a major revival at this time, he reported. "Several Christian leaders said that this is the greatest revival that Cuba has ever known."

Mexico Partially Restores Religious Freedom

10/92

The Lower Chamber of the Mexican Congress recently approved a "Law on Religious Associations and Public Worship" that attempts, at least partially, to restore religious liberties in that country.

The new law recognizes a church's right to own private property (Art. 16); for its ministers to wear clerical clothing in public; have its legal status recognized by the government (Art. 7); and have a separate legal existence from the state (Art. 1). It also guarantees the individual the right "not to be compelled to contribute with money or goods to support an association, church or any religious group," nor be compelled to "participate or contribute in the same way in rites, ceremonies, festivals, services or acts of religious cults" (Art. 2(d)). The sixth article of the law establishes that "religious associations are equal before the law in rights and obligations."

This translates into no special privileges for the Catholic Church or a state-established religion. However, this law still expresses the religious intolerance such as that which took place when the state promoted the predominance of the Catholic Church in the past century. On the negative side, the new law bans religious institutions from owning TV and radio stations or newspapers, allowing only the use of them under certain conditions and licenses (Art. 16, second paragraph). Likewise, public religious worship must have consent of the state (Art. 22).

The new law hinders liberty of association, movement, speech and religious freedom that the Mexican Constitution recognizes. For instance, the new law considers any religious association that has not been registered with the government to be a "punishable infringement." Clearly such a provision, besides being impracticable, is unconstitutional. The state attributions under the new law go as far as to make it the "arbiter" in conflicts between religious groups!

Despite the above mentioned insufficiencies, the new regime of religious freedom in Mexico is clearly superior to the one in effect until now. The new law amends several articles of the 1917 Mexican Constitution, particularly the Article 130. In its original form the Constitution's Article 130 established the "intervention" of federal powers in "worship matters and external discipline." Likewise, it did not recognize the legal status of any religious association; granted the state legislatures the right to establish the "top number" of ministers of certain religious groups; forbade the ministers of these groups from "criticizing" the government; and severely restrained the private property of churches.

Congressman Amador Rodriguez Lozano, president of the Human Rights Committee of the Lower Chamber, commented on the difficulty of dealing and approving a law of this type and defined the issue of church and state relations as "untouchable."

Rodriguez describes it as a question of "two territories - God's and Caesar's - on which the same and free people journeys." Rodriguez adds that "the Mexican state has learned the importance of recognizing and placing in its strictly spiritual dimension, the role of belief and attitudes of the people's profound religious faith."

"The state knows perfectly," he says, "that the concept of faith is valid in the people, not only in the religious aspect, but in the issues regarding the institutional trust in civil life."

President Carlos Salinas de Gortari affirmed this by expressing his "respect and support" for all religious groups in that country.

Mañuel Gomez Granados, director of the Mexican Institute of Christian Social Doctrine, which is connected to the Catholic Church, comments that the modifications to Article 130 "will facilitate the development of a new evangelization in the country only if the (Catholic) Church assumes its responsibility; because if it does not, it is irrelevant that the law changes." The Catholic Church will continue to be "fossilized in some aspects, anchored in the past, without moral strength to transform the people."¹

Referring to evangelization, Gomez Granados adds: "If we are honest people, we will say that the evangelization in our country has been a weak, deficient one, a superficial polish, when evangelization must change the innermost parts of the human being, giving him a lifestyle of total confidence in God, of austerity, or work."²

Currently, religious plurality in Mexico is expressed by the existence of around 175 different religious groups. The Protestants are, after the Catholics, the second largest group, with 17 million adherents.

"Within the modernization of religious life as a social process," writes G. de Jesus Huchim Hoyoc, exists a "wide and open religious market which means that every church accepts the challenges of competition, productivity and efficacy. Each denomination will have to demonstrate or reaffirm its competitiveness in proselytism. This is particularly applicable in the case of the Catholic Church."

Huchim Koyoc continues, "The state has no business protecting the inefficiency of any religious association in keeping or increasing the number of its members (or quota in the religious market). The dynamics of each church, its capability to maintain or increase its participation in such a market, must depend fundamentally on its own effort, and not on some form of state protectionism"³

This way, Mexico advances toward the consolidation of a regime which will allow an authentic and full religious plurality, will strengthen its democratic process and will preserve the civil and political liberties so dear to the Mexican people.

Mexico City Student Testimony

by Joy Hucklebridge and Leilani Corpus
6/89

MEXICO CITY, Mexico (FR) - "What was there to live for?" thought Aixa, a young university student at the University of Mexico. Her brother had just been diagnosed with brain cancer, her parents never stopped fighting, and now they were talking of divorce. Studying accounting seemed to take forever because of the Mexican system. And she wondered who would guarantee her a good job - even professionals were earning a shabby living these days.

Aixa pondered on this and went on to a greater dilemma: there was no one who seemed to care - not even God, if He did exist. She had never felt His assurance; since she was a child she was taught to revere the statues of saints in the Catholic church. Instead of having any security and faith, however, she shuddered with fear and despair.

Then Aixa made up her mind. She decided to give God until the end of the school day to prove His love - or she was going to end her life. It was not a new idea to her. She had planned many times how she would commit suicide: a sure, lethal overdose of tranquilizers. "God," she prayed desperately, "If You do live and You do care, You have to show me today! I can't go on anymore."

As she slowly shuffled out of her last class, Aixa mentally said goodbye to everything. The always present, contemptible Mexico City smog stung her teary eyes relentlessly as she trudged along, realizing that God had not answered her prayer. The gray smoke hung in the air and stung her throat as she tried to swallow the lump growing there. She then decided to allow herself one more little pleasure before she ended everything when she returned home to her empty house. She bought herself some chocolate, savored every bite, and then lit a cigarette.

In the distance she could see a crowd of people gathered around a young man who was speaking, almost shouting in urgent tones. "Probably another communist decrying the bourgeois," she thought to herself. Putting off her fatal plan for just a little while longer, she approached the group to hear what the speaker was saying. He did not look like a communist, but was in fact a well-dressed American who spoke with the aid of an interpreter.

"God put that yearning in your heart to know Him," he said. "He gave His son to die for your sins - and now He lives and wants to live in you!" The young evangelist, Nick Pappis, looked right at her. He pointed to her and cried, "You know how you have wanted to know if God is real! Today He is inviting you to know Him!"

Today Aixa de Gallego is the wife of a pastor in Mexico City. She became a Christian during an outreach in July, 1981, when a team of 15 students from the U.S., Haiti, and Colombia came to the city to start Maranatha Campus Ministries' first Mexican base. Those who became Christians with Aixa are now missionaries in the Mexican cities of Monterrey, Saltillo, Guadalajara, Oaxaca, and in other Latin American countries.

Members of the Maranatha Christian Church in Mexico City continue to see students come to Christ in similar ways. Veronica Ireta Leon, a folk dance teacher with a degree in Spanish literature, said she had been searching in many books for fulfillment. "I found many inspirational themes advocating the meaning of life in friendship, drugs, alcohol, and hedonism. But nothing produced a positive, lasting change until a friend told me about Jesus. It was something more powerful than I had ever heard before and I began to be transformed on the inside."

A chemistry student, Dionisio Bautista, said his friends in college were "a bunch of bad-mouthed, heavy drinkers, and I was one of them." He became a Christian after hearing students preach on his campus.

Another student, Ventura Farfan, who was studying physics, said he dropped out of school because he couldn't find the answer to life in his studies. "I had many questions which I could not answer," he said. "Because of this I began to question the existence of God and was determined to find my answers through other means such as physics. I was at the point in my life where I didn't have a reason to live and dropped out of the university."

Some friends dropped by Ventura's house one day and talked to him about God. They then loaned him a Bible, which he began to read out of curiosity. Later a friend invited him to a seminar exposing rock music, and he became a Christian.

Besides starting a church, the believers in the Mexico City Maranatha Church have also founded a medical clinic and primary school offering a Christian education - which had not been available in the city until that time. Students in the church are also active in politics and have staged marches against abortion, as well as demonstrations "proclaiming the Lordship of Jesus Christ," according to Robert Hucklebridge, founder of the Maranatha Church in Mexico City. Today the church is pastored by Aixa's husband, Ricardo Gallego.

In Oaxaca, students marched in protest of a witches' convention and received favorable press coverage. The head warlock issued a statement saying that the next convention would not be held in Oaxaca because of the resistance they encountered.

Besides confronting communism and occult activity, church members have also experienced God's supernatural protection during earthquakes. During the 1985 quake which devastated the city, not one member of the church was harmed or affected by damaged property. "The church building was left unscathed," said Hucklebridge. "The building across the street was condemned because it was uninhabitable (after the quake)."

One member of the church arrived at work 15 minutes late to see his office building fall in front of his eyes. It would have been his grave had he arrived on time.

Mexico is usually in the headlines because of its unstable government, its drug rings, and most recently the cult slayings in Matamoros. But Robert Hucklebridge says he wants to see Mexico make the news because of the impact that Christianity is having upon its culture. He also challenges American Christians to pray about their part in helping this troubled land: "The gospel is aimed to all the uttermost places of the world, but let's not forget our next door neighbor."

Christian Churches Growing in Mexico

MEXICO CITY, Mexico (FR) - Despite claims by the government that Protestants are only 3.7 percent of the population, an investigative report by a prominent Mexico City newspaper recently revealed that the actual number of Protestants in the state of Mexico has multiplied six times between 1950 and 1980.

In the federal district where Mexico City is located, the Protestant population doubled in the same 30 year span, according to the report. The article was an expose' of Protestant sects conducted by El Universal, which featured four full-page installments on the trend over a four-day period in mid-April.

The state of Tabasco in the southern region of the country has the greatest "penetration of evangelical religions," with more than 280,000 believers out of a population of 1,250,000 - approximately 23 percent. The report also claimed that the state of Chiapas has a Protestant population between 11.5 and 30 percent, with at least seven communities claiming a Protestant majority.

The city of Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, Texas, as well as other border cities like Tijuana and Ciudad Juarez, each have between 13 to 15 percent Protestant populations.

Elizabeth Isais, a special correspondent with Open Doors News Service, stated that the El Universal report was a landmark in revealing the extent of church growth in Mexico - which up until now has been assumed to be small.

Tribal Members Visit Earth Summit

By Bruce Olson
10/92

BUCARAMANGA, Colombia (FR) - Representatives from Colombia's Motilone tribe, Fidel Waysersera and Roberto Dácsarara, recently returned from the celebrated Río de Janeiro Earth Summit, radiating smiles of accomplishments at their arrival in Bucaramanga's airport.

Waysersera and Dácsarara are the first indigenous university graduates from Colombia's northeastern jungle tribes. Both are proud descendants of the Barí (Motilone) family. The two Motilone representatives spent fifteen days in Río, meeting other representatives from all continents of the planet earth, savoring languages, racial features and people they never knew existed.

This experience was a tremendous confirmation of the missionary call of God on their lives: "to go forth to every part of the world, and proclaim the Good News to the whole creation."

They first met with Brazilian jungle tribal peoples of numerically small populations brought to gigantic Río - a sophisticated metropolis with more than five million people. Waysersera and Dácsarara encountered tribal counterparts adorned with parrot feathers, their bodies decorated in bright natural vegetable paints in red and blue hues. All were dancing, expressing choreographic treasures from their cultures. Newspaper photographers, delighted at the spectacle, asked Dácsarara, "Where are your feathers?"

Dressed in simple suit and tie, he responded: "I have come to discuss and champion indigenous land rights as contemplated by Western law. And I have come to declare solidarity with the protection of the environment, the concern of this Earth Summit. I left my feathers and loin cloth hanging in the rafters of our palm thatched community house. When I return to Phatuitribara (Colombia), I'll enjoy dancing with the wind blowing through my hair. But now that I have come to the city, I dress as everyone else. We have come to look for solutions to problems."

The Brazilian tribal people understood what Dácsarara was saying. Later, they reappeared in Western slacks and shirt. They became intent to learn from the Motilones how they might protect their habitats from the overpowering land settlers and maintain their communities' health by simple application of basic concepts in preventive medicine. The Motilone tribe has become a model of progress in these areas.

When the Motilone delegates were to leave Brazil, their counterparts, representing tribes from all over South America insisted on a second meeting. Several Brazilian Indians were to visit the Motilone territory in August. A missionary effort is being born from within the Motilone church to reach beyond the borders of Colombia. At present, the Motilone tribe compose 30 missionary teams among non-evangelized tribes of northeast Colombia.

The newspapers of Bucaramanga recently applauded the tribe's dedication to the bringing of practical applications of science for tribal improvement. Yet the Motilone missionaries have not introduced solutions for problems that do not exist - an all too common problem in the legacy of foreign missions.

Church and State in the New Paraguayan Constitution

By Pedro Moreno

2/93

THE NEW CONSTITUTION OF PARAGUAY, recently ratified, replaces the 1967 document which contained some provisions outdated by modern events.

The new constitution states: "It is recognized: freedom of religion, worship and ideology without any limitations except those established in the constitution and law. No confession will have official status. No person shall be harassed, inquired of or compelled to profess his beliefs or doctrines."

The prior constitution required the president of the republic "to profess the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion." Likewise, the former constitution stated: "The official religion is the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion."

Surprisingly, the Catholic Church of Paraguay joined an important number of Protestant churches and representatives of the main political parties, Liberal and Colorado, to ask for the separation of church and state and the elimination of the requirement of the president to profess Catholicism. Commenting on this move, Jesuit priest Jose Valpuesta, representative to the Coordination of Churches (a group composed of Catholic and Protestant churches), said: "As time has passed, it has become clear that it is better that society does not impose one religion upon the state."

The Catholic Bishops Conference of Paraguay, in a pronouncement entitled "One Constitution for our Nation" signed by 14 bishops, on church-state relations stated: "The II Vatican Council pointed out with clarity the church-state relations based on autonomy and mutual respect of both parties.... both the state and the church will better fulfill their roles if they maintain their independence and seek a good cooperation between them."

Referring to the notion of an official church, the document of the Bishops Conference of Paraguay states: "If at other times this nation completely identified itself with the Catholic religion, it was logical to talk about an official religion. Now pluralism better characterizes the civil society and it does not seem justified to have one church joined to the state, that, for this reason reflects something imposed by force upon the people. The church does not want to confuse the people nor confuse itself with the state."

Finally, the Catholic Bishops of Paraguay declared: "The church, therefore, does not require anything except a just treatment according to its condition. And affirms with II Vatican Council that humankind has the right to religious freedom ... which is based in the very dignity of the human person. All men should be respected in this matter. The liberty of conscience and worship must be mentioned in the law."

The dignity of the person so requires." In this way, the Catholic church of Paraguay gave its unconditional support to establish a broad regime of religious liberty in that country.

Of course, agreement on the relationship between church and state in Paraguay has not always existed. In fact, these relations have had an agitated and stormy history. After the foundation of the Republic and during the 19th century, the Catholic church and the Paraguayan people suffered under the dictatorship of Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia and the López regime.

These totalitarian rulers could not conceive of the existence of a government of the church with independent authority from civil government. The Catholic church was compelled to bow to the will of the dictators and was indirectly responsible for this situation. In the past, the Jesuits had taught total submission to the clerical will. The indigenous peoples had not been educated on their rights and responsibilities, displaying simply a "passive obedience." Thus the Catholic church unwittingly allowed a system of oppression to arise.

To better accomplish his purposes, Rodríguez de Francia confiscated ecclesiastical property, prohibited the ceremonials, required the priests to be submitted to him and finally made himself the head of the church in the fashion of Henry VIII of England. In 1844, López approved a new constitution for Paraguay which allowed him to maintain the supreme authority of the country in his hands. This constitution also contained provisions on the right of the state to control the ecclesiastical patronage. The president controlled the churches, the clergy, appointed bishops and members of the ecclesiastical decrees, papal bulls, etc. In spite of protests from the Vatican, which were ignored by the dictator López, he was able to have the bishops proclaim from the pulpit that he was a ruler appointed by God and "the Lord's anointed." Any dissent in relation to the legitimacy of his acts was not only treason but heresy.

After the "tragedy of Paraguay" in which the republic was defeated by Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay, a new constitution was ratified in 1870 which established the Catholic church as the official religion of the state. However, a mere tolerance for other religions was assured through denying the congress any authority over the free exercise of religion and the guarantee to the inhabitants for the exercise of their religion.

The constitution of 1940 extended the same provisions. The government continued sustaining the salaries of the clergy and of teachers of seminaries, although the amounts were not significant. This was the state of affairs until the constitution of 1967 which has recently been changed.

Apparently, the above mentioned historical process convinced the Catholic hierarchy in Paraguay to work toward its total independence from the state by securing a constitutional provision separating the church from the state.

Nicaraguan Christian School Government

POMPANO BEACH, FL (FR) - Christian schools have experienced unprecedented growth under the Sandinista government in Nicaragua - despite the record of human rights abuses and religious persecution in this communist nation. Sources say that the number of Christian schools has actually increased since the 1979 revolution.

"Teachers face prices that go up as much as 300 percent once or twice a month, while their wages may go up only 100 percent" said Jeff Donnan, president of Caribbean Christian Ministries (CCM). CCM is closely involved in the development of the Christian school movement in Nicaragua. "Teachers aren't able to live under these circumstances, so many teach twice a day and have a job at night to make ends meet."

Salaries and fees are government controlled, and any cost differences are expected to be met by the churches. CCM is working together with Nicaraguan evangelical churches in developing a strategy to promote "Christian cooperatives" which will promote the self-sufficiency of Christian ministries, thus allowing them to cope with the skyrocketing inflation and lack of funds. Christian schools will hopefully be one of the major beneficiaries of such a strategy.

Recently the Nicaraguan-based Christian Ministries of Central America (CMCA), which works closely with CCM, held the first conference in Nicaragua on Christian Principles in Education in the capital city of Managua. Around 34 Christian schools were represented, which is estimated to be about 20 percent of the Christian schools in Nicaragua. The conference was attended by almost 100 leaders and teachers, and was covered by the local newspaper, El Nuevo Diario, along with the government television station.

The effort to promote "self-sufficiency" among the Christian schools and youth was noted by El Nuevo Diario. "For many years evangelical churches as well as Central American countries have depended on the United States. For this reason our program is made with the purpose of preparing our youth technically to promote independence by means of self-sufficiency," Rev. Ernan Savery, director of CMCA, told El Nuevo Diario. The conference covered topics such as the philosophy of Christian education; biblical principles of education; and the Christian perspective of school discipline.

The Nicaraguan Constitution ensures religious freedom, thus Bible teaching is permitted. Bibles are also readily available; however, Christian schools lack fundamental reading materials, paper, and equipment such as typewriters and mimeograph machines. To meet these needs, CCM is asking organizations or individuals to donate used typewriters (manual or electric) and mimeograph machines.

CMCA, with help from CCM, is assisting in establishing church-run "cooperatives" which will produce income. This income will not only provide jobs for people, but funding for such ministries as Christian schools. "These ministries will be aimed at serving their communities in Christ's name," said Donnan "We want to avoid creating a dependency on the U.S."

Along with the growth of Christian schools has been an increase in the number of churches and ministers. "Revival is taking place all over the country; evangelism is rampant and churches are starting everywhere," said one observer. "God is also leading many men into the ministry. Men who otherwise could be gainfully employed, are giving up good jobs to be pastors at substantially lower incomes. Nevertheless, some pastors have fled the country so there are many churches without pastors."

"An estimated 50 churches a year have started and many are starting their own schools. The Assemblies of God has opened up over 12 schools, and one church with the Central American Mission group has a school of over 3,000 students (one shift in the morning, another in the afternoon.)"

Donnan added, "Despite all the problems facing Nicaragua, God is at work in the evangelical churches which represent about 25 to 30 percent of the people. Their witness of service and works will validate their witness in words." If you are interested in more information about CCM, please write: U.S. Regional Office, 1113 S. State of the Sandanista Regime in Nicaragua

Despite continual warfare between the Sandinista regime and the Nicaraguan freedom fighters, an anonymous source from inside the Central American nation says life is not as bleak as some claim.

Civil war is usually accompanied by starvation, malnutrition, and abuse, but the capital city of Managua and the outlying areas are considerably stable. There is still private ownership, but a constant fear of government confiscation is a threat to anyone who may disregard a Sandinista decree.

Sixty percent of production must be sold to the government at officially set prices. The purchase of raw materials is also sanctioned by the government, so unregulated private enterprise is minimal on any scale.

All prices are set by the government, including prices of food served in restaurants. Businesses with unlicensed goods are forcibly closed down unless they are part of the "official" blackmarket economy which requires sufficient volume to bribe officials.

Churches are free to meet and to evangelize. However, buildings or any social help (orphanages, self-help, schools, etc.) are systematically monitored by the government. Despite the regulation, there are a surprising number of concessions made to individuals who provide legitimate social services, especially those which the government is not providing.

The Sandinista government, under the leadership of Daniel Ortega, is in considerable debt due to its war with the resistance. Consequently, the government is not able to keep up with its goals of providing education to the public. This has been a particularly promising opportunity for Christian schools to step in and serve.

There are an estimated 40 schools in the Managua area and another 30 to 40 in the outlying areas. An additional 100 or more schools have either started or will be started soon.

"(Christian) schools are popping up all over the place," our source related, "but most of the schools have little idea what they are doing." The source requested that Christians in the U.S. pray and support the Christian school movement in Nicaragua.

Breaking the Power of the Narcotics Trade

When Panamanian military strongman Manuel Noriega was indicted in February by U.S. officials on charges of drug trafficking, money laundering, and racketeering, we found ourselves once again facing the ugly realities of the illegal narcotics trade in America. It seems that no matter how loud and how often we "Just Say No" to drugs, the problem does not go away.

It is indeed a complicated, multi-faceted dilemma. We are dealing with a domestic crisis of horrific proportions: Americans currently consume 60 percent of the world's illegal narcotics. The drug war is an international concern that has entangled many national leaders besides Panama's infamous dictator. Consider this list of leaders from neighboring countries who have been caught in the web of Latin American drug smuggling:

- * Haiti's Jean-Paul Claude, a senior military leader, is suspected of aiding the flow of Colombian cocaine into the U.S.
- * A major dealer in Colombia's giant cocaine cartel, Juan Ramon Matta, has relocated to Honduras and has become friends with senior officers and politicians in Tegucigalpa. Matta is wanted in the U.S. for the murder of a federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) officer.
- * Prime Minister Lynden Pindling of the Bahamas received payment of $400,000 to allow marijuana shipments to pass safely through the Bahamas en route to the U.S. Two Bahamian cabinet ministers are also linked to drug trafficking.
- * Military commander Atienne Boerenveen of Suriname was convicted in 1986 of conspiring to sell safe passage of cocaine.
- * Drug Enforcement agents in the U.S. say that the Colombian government is so infiltrated by informants that it is virtually impossible to bring charges against the drug lords. U.S. officials have run up against similar problems among Mexico's Federal Judicial Police.

It could never be said that the U.S. government has not made a forceful and expensive attempt at stopping the influx of cocaine and other illegal narcotics. In the last few years, we have spent upwards of $1.5 billion dollars annually to launch an all-out attack on the menace - but we have been met with minimal success. Millions of dollars have been poured into increased police enforcement, a 30 percent increase in customs agents on our borders, a high-tech surveillance system along the Rio Grande, expensive drug testing programs, costly drug treatment centers for the chemically dependent, and the "Just Say No" educational campaign.

But with all the money spent, we have little to show for it. Dr. Charles Schuster, director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, stated in a recent report, "Clearly, the nation's high school students and other young adults still show a higher level of involvement with illicit drugs greater than can be found in any other industrialized nation in the world."

One would think that $1.5 billion a year would go a long way to stop the flow of drugs into the U.S. But sooner or later we are going to have to face the fact that the war on drugs is not just a matter of stricter laws and more advanced detection equipment. Until we recognize the spiritual side of this battle, millions more lives will be destroyed and the Latin American drug lords will continue to rule over us.

Rebuilding the Walls

Despite increased law enforcement in our cities and the tighter controls in our airports and seaports, there is an obvious leak somewhere. The amount of cocaine and marijuana smuggled into this country staggers the imagination - the DEA says the astronomical figure is "impossible to calculate." But how are the drugs getting in? Where is the breakdown?

The Bible has much to say about a nation's "walls" and "gates." Walls in Scripture represent much more than physical protection; they symbolize the protection of God that He gives to a nation when the people honor Him and obey His moral requirements. A nation that is walking in covenantal obedience to the God of the Bible will always prosper and be protected from its enemies.

On the other hand, a nation that dishonors God, neglects His covenant, and rejects morality will begin to experience what life is like without the protective walls of His favor and blessing. And without that divine safeguard, no amount of human effort will be able to stop the enemy's influence or advancement.

Psalms 127 reminds us that our national walls are kept safe and secure by God alone, and not simply by a defense budget or other natural means. It states, "Unless the Lord builds the house, they labor in vain who build it; unless the Lord guards the city, the watchman keeps awake in vain" (verse 1).

Our billion dollar anti-drug budget is nothing but an experiment in futility if we fail to address the root problem of our national sin. In Deuteronomy 28, we read of the awful curses that come upon a nation that has broken covenant with God. Among those curses we find several which explain how God will send enemies to rule over the disobedient nation:

* "The Lord will cause you to be defeated before your enemies; you shall go out one way against them, but you shall flee seven ways before them ..." (verse 25).

* "Your sons and your daughters will be given to another people" (verse 32).

* "A people whom you do not know shall eat up the produce of your ground and all your labors" (verse 33).

* "[Your enemies] shall beseige you in all your towns until your high and fortified walls in which you trusted come down throughout your land" (verse 52).

Is this not what has begun to happen in our nation through the power of illegal narcotics? America seems to be fighting a losing battle against this scourge from the south. Our teen-agers, and even grade school age children, are being seduced by the lure of cocaine. Our inner cities are literally under seige by the "crack" dealers. The minds of millions of our citizens have already been permanently damaged by this unseen force which enters our ports and crosses our borders every day.

If we want to devise an effective strategy to stop the narcotics trade, then our first move must be to recognize this assault for what it really is: a curse from God for our national sins. No other plan of action will be successful unless we make repentance the first item on our public policy agenda. We must then call upon God to deliver us from the control of our enemies.

When the leaders of the American colonies faced certain defeat by British forces during the Revolutionary War, our generals and statesmen did not hesitate to call upon Almighty God to defend the nation - nor did they refrain from calling upon the general population to do likewise. Throughout our early history, American presidents called the nation to prayer and fasting for deliverance from evil, safety in war, and strength of national character.

Yet today, calling upon the name of the Lord has become a "sensitive issue" that has spawned lawsuits and a growing controversy on the place of religion in politics. Secularists today reject the need for a wall of divine protection around our nation; instead, they worship the "wall of separation" that they have erected between church and state. We cannot have both: we will either return as a nation to God, and see a rebuilding of the walls of His covenant protection around us, or we will forever shut ourselves away from His mercy with this "wall of separation."

Conquer or Be Conquered

When God led His people Israel into the Promised Land of Canaan, He commanded them to utterly subdue the Canaanites and bring the entire region under their domain. When they failed to do this, God allowed the enemies whom they spared to rise up against them and defeat them. He was making a very serious point: we will be conquered by the very enemy that we do not defeat.

The scourge of illegal narcotics passing through our borders should serve as a reminder to the Church in this nation that we must take seriously our responsibility for our southern neighbors. We must be faithful to bring the claims of the gospel to bear upon the nations closest to us lest God allow us to be conquered by the evil influences originating from that region.

One-third of the cocaine which arrives in the U.S. flows through Mexico. The Mexican government is rife with corruption, bribery, and deceit on every level. Why? Because missionary activity still has not brought the claims of Christ to bear upon the government and the institutions of that nation. It is a reproach to the Church in America that our closest neighbor is still enslaved by poverty while we enjoy the benefits of a biblical economy. When will we take the principles of economic liberty to these people?

What about Panama, the outpost of General Noreiga? Panama is a nation that has been totally opened to American influence for many years because of the Canal Zone; but where are the Christians who can assist Panamanian leaders in building a Christian republic that will truly respect the rights of every individual citizen, and deliver the people from countless military dictatorships? Where is the Christian influence in Colombia - where fear of the powerful drug cartel now rules the churches, the courts, and the legislative assembly?

The wickedness that is breeding in Latin America does not have to overtake us. We can conquer if we will make the right choices. God can deliver America and the world from the power of the drug lords. As we join together to repent of our national sins, and to pray for deliverance from the judgment of illegal drugs that has come upon us, may the Church be fervent and obedient as we labor to establish Christ's government in this hemisphere.

THE REFORMATION OF LATIN AMERICA

Pedro C. Moreno San Juan
9/92

WE LIVE IN AN AGE OF PROFOUND transformations in Latin America - both spiritually and socially. It has been said that the recent spiritual revival that is taking place in the continent - mainly due to the Protestant expansion, but also within Catholic circles - may well be one of the last hopes for the economic and social advancement of Latin America.

According to recent statistics, in a region once considered a Catholic stronghold, Protestants are growing at a rate of 400 per hour, which leads demographers to predict that Latin America will be evangelical before the end of the 21st century. Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo from Nicaragua, addressing the Vatican College of Cardinals in 1991 pointed out that "Protestants in Latin America have grown surprisingly, from 4 million in 1967 to 30 million in 1985."

Cardinal Ernesto C. Ahumada from Mexico stated that in the last 30 years "defections (from the Catholic church) to other religious groups have tripled in the Dominican Republic, have increased by 500% in El Salvador and Costa Rica, and have grown by 700% in Guatemala." No wonder an evangelical president was recently elected in this country. It is estimated that 20% of all Latin Americans are now Protestant.

One could ask, what are the reasons, the causes, the motives for this spiritual transformation that has gone beyond the religious realm into economics, politics, law, and other areas? Some would say it is something to worry about. Others may look with expectation and hope at what has been termed by FORBES magazine a situation "quite literally revolutionary - more so that Fidel Castro or Che Guevara could ever be." Referring to the specific Brazilian case, FORBES goes on to say that as a result of evangelical Protestantism having replaced Roman Catholicism as the country's most widely practiced faith.

"The old Brazilian order, based upon a rigid hierarchy and social immobility, has broken down. A new social atmosphere, one more compatible with capitalism and democracy is emerging. Upwardly striving urban poor are encouraged by religious teachings and support groups that preach the power of individuals to change their lives through faith. This contrasts sharply with the old attitude of resignation to one's fate and a glorification of poverty."

Before we go further into the economic and social implications of this spiritual revival, allow me to situate this transformation, or one could say, Reformation, into its proper context. Much of the modern spiritual condition of Latin America resembles the spiritual condition of pre-war Germany, aptly described by Lutheran minister Dietrich Bonhoeffer. In his work, The Cost of Discipleship, Bonhoeffer - who resisted the Nazi atrocities and was martyred at a concentration camp - referred to the grace of God, said that this grace is costly because it took the life of Jesus Christ.

Pure Grace vs. Cheap Grace

"It is the only pure grace, which really forgives sins and gives freedom to the sinner. We (WWII era German Lutherans) justified the world, and condemned as heretics those who tried to follow Christ. The result was that a nation became Christian and Lutheran, but at the cost of true discipleship.... But do we also realize that this cheap grace has turned back upon us like a boomerang? The price we are having to pay today in the shape of the collapse of the organized Church is only the inevitable consequence of our policy of making grace available to all at too low a cost. We gave away the word and sacraments wholesale, we baptized, confirmed, and absolved a whole nation unasked and without condition. Our humanitarian sentiment made us give that which was holy to the scornful and unbelieving. We poured forth unending streams of grace. But the call to follow Jesus in the narrow way was hardly ever heard. Where were those truths which impelled the early Church to institute the catechumenate, which enabled a strict watch to be kept over the frontier between the Church and the world, and afforded adequate protection for costly grace? What had happened to all those warnings of Luther's against preaching the gospel in such a manner as to make men rest secure in their ungodly living? Was there ever a more disastrous instance of the Christianizing of the world than this? What are those three thousand Saxons put to death by Charlemagne compared with the millions of spiritual corpses in our country today? ... Cheap grace has turned out to be utterly merciless to our Evangelical Church."

Much of this description clearly reflects the general situation of spiritual life in Latin America with the Catholic Church as the established one. Moreover, it even applies to the current situation in the U.S. and some European countries where the Protestant church, as the established or traditional one has lost its vision and the true meaning of the gospel.

But what is now making the difference in Latin America? As Mexican author Richard Rodriguez, himself a Roman Catholic, puts it: "Evangelicals (in Latin America) are the most Protestant of Protestants. Evangelical conversion hinges upon the direct experience of Christ - accepting Jesus Christ as one's personal Savior. Evangelicals are fundamentalists. They read Scripture literally; they say yes when they mean yes, and no when they mean no."

This reminds us of the Reformers' principle of Sola Scriptura, the Bible and the Bible - only, which emphasized the paramount importance of the Bible over any other source of guidance in all areas of life. In describing "the problem of Catholicism" as Rodriguez terms it, he mentions that it is "all-embracing, so all-embracing that it defines an entire nation, a whole hemisphere.

"But when religion becomes so all-embracing. It is easily taken for granted. What does it mean that Brazil claims to be the largest Catholic country in the world if nobody goes to Mass in Brazil? The act of conversion does not define Catholicism. Catholicism is a way of life that need never come to a head; it never stands or falls on one decision.... According to evangelical faith, suddenness is holy. Change is a religious imperative. You can - you must - be born-again. Conversion defines faith.... I have sat in the back rows of evangelical churches, astonished by what I have seen: kids with tattoos, tough kids, kids to testify to having been on the streets as recently as last week, kids who spent their childhood on drugs, in gangs, in trouble; kids now in suits and ties, singing hymns to Christ. They are not converted to holy milksops. They are aggressive men who discovered spiritual empowerment.

"The genius of Protestantism seems to be that it is masculine," says this Catholic author. Evangelicalism demands that you must "become your own man, take responsibility for your own life."

The Call to a New Life

Of course, this is not new. Jesus Christ himself, emphasized the importance of an internal transformation through a new spiritual birth, as opposed to an external lifestyle, or what some would call a "cultural Christianity." In Matthew 16:24-26, He said: "If anyone wishes to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whoever wishes to save his life shall lose it; but whoever loses his life for My sake shall find it. For what will a man be profited, if he gains the whole world, and forfeits his soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?."

The call to a new life in Christ seems not to be exclusively coming from the evangelicals (mainly Pentecostals and Baptists), but even from the Catholic church itself. Pope John Paul II, in a recent Vatican meeting of Charismatic Catholics, that gathered 6,000 priests, 100 bishops, and three cardinals, warned: "The Gospel is not the truths that Jesus proclaimed, but a person: Jesus Christ."

Ironically, in an age in which it is not fashionable to talk about sin, repentance, and modification of habits and lifestyles, it is precisely the call to repent and be transformed by the power of God which is hitting hardest the hearts and minds of men and women that have become tired of relativistic morality, religious syncretism, and humanistic attitudes and thoughts, that for all their good intentions, cannot and will not change their lives or their social and economic environment.

Lest we are deceived, we should also not forget that in order to drastically change our private lives, the life of our family, and the life of our society, spiritual salvation is not enough. The Bible clearly tells us that we should "not be conformed to this world", but should "be transformed by the renewing of (our) mind" (Romans 12:2). That means that going beyond the spiritual change we experience as we surrender to Christ, we should strive to develop such qualities as self control, respect for others, integrity, good work habits, and a sense of purpose in life, and thus improve our social and economic condition.

Not without reason The Washington Post recently stated that the poor need not only opportunities for work, but the instilling of moral values as the "restoration of the moral environment in which (they) live." The Post concluded: "(the poor) in New York, like in many other cities, needs a man on horseback. It needs John Wesley."

Finally, let us remember that all these changes, this peaceful revolution, or this new reformation of Latin America, can continue only if we remember that the force that drives it is not the class struggle, or the forces of history, or simply destiny or coincidence, but it is the power of God, expressed through his undeserved mercy and love that He, sovereignly has chosen to pour on these people and at this time of history. Jesus is the same yesterday, today, and forever, and we, as our final destiny and purpose in life, are to be conformed to His image and character. Not the other way around. As one theologian explains:

"The tension between God's holy righteousness and his compassionate mercy cannot be legitimately resolved by remolding His character into an image of pure benevolence as the Church did in the nineteenth century. There is only one way that this contradiction can be removed, through the cross of Christ which revealed the severity of God's anger against sin and the depth of his compassion in paying its penalty through the vicarious sacrifice of His Son. In systems which resolve this tension (between His righteousness and His compassion) by softening the character of God, Christ and His work become an addendum, and spiritual darkness becomes complete because the true God has been abandoned for the worship of a magnified image of human tolerance."

May we receive the blessings of Christ's sacrifice, and enjoy a new life that is not for the benefit of the self only, but that will abundantly be poured out on our families, and into our society.

A Tufts University Graduate Shares Christian Principles with Bolivian Government

What Lies Ahead in the Reformation of Latin America?

By Pedro Moreno

Since last December, I have been leading a study group on the Christian Principles for the Reformation of Nations (economics, law, politics, education, etc.) Many government officials, engineers, lawyers, pastors, and professors have been attending it. As a result, the National Association of Evangelicals invited me to give the message on "Religious Liberty and the Separation of Church and State" at the First Presidential Prayer Breakfast held in Bolivia.

The Breakfast took place on January 31. The President attended along with the Vice President, 15 Ministers, more than 60 Senators and Congressmen, a former President, the Governor of La Paz, the Rector of the largest University in Bolivia (who is a communist), several Vice-Ministers, the heads of the Armed Forces, private entrepreneurs, many local and national authorities, as well as 500 Christian pastors and leaders from all around the country.

It was wonderful to see them all together and, most importantly, to know that they heard the whole Gospel of Jesus Christ! The message I gave on religious freedom and the separation of church and state was also well received and a number of ministers and congressmen came afterwards to congratulate me.

Definitely, it was an historical event for Bolivia and most likely for all of Latin America. It was the first time in the history of Bolivia that a President (all of them have been Catholics) shared a prayer meeting with the Evangelicals, therefore recognizing the existence of the Evangelical Church. Usually, the Evangelical Church in Bolivia is derogatorily called "sects" or "cults." And there is always the false accusation that they respond to the "dictates of yanqui imperialism."

Of course, we refuted these arguments as ill-founded and false. During the Vice President's speech, which I moderated, we informed them of how the U.S. government is not even allowing prayer in the public schools, and the fight of the Christian Church in the United States to restore these rights.

The President of Bolivia, going beyond our expectations, strongly supported freedom of religion and even created a controversy by supporting our measures. The President quoted from the Bible and demonstrated that he had a deep knowledge of scripture and a clear biblical worldview on many aspects of government and public life in general.

After the breakfast, we had six workshops with six different Ministries of the country (Education, Health, etc.) in which we expressed our views on different aspects of interest to the nation. We are now following up on an invitation from the Minister of Education to members of the "Principle Approach to Education" (Rosalie Slater, Paul Jehle, etc.) to come and give some seminars in the public schools on this outstanding educational method based on the Bible.

The main challenge now is to follow up on this, and make sure we do not lose the ground we won. There is a strong reaction from groups that are antagonistic to the Evangelical movement. They are also asking for laws to regulate and control the "sects." This would mean having to obtain licenses to exist, to preach, to organize conferences, and also having to submit reports on finances, assets, source of funding, and even doctrinal statements!

And the worst thing is that there are some people in government who are very interested in seeing this happen. We still have a tough battle ahead and we are asking citizens of the United States to pray for our nation's liberty.

We have just proposed a constitutional amendment on the separation of church and state to Congress which would limit the government's interference in our churches.

The most important project, that we believe the Lord wants us to accomplish, is the Conference of Christian Parliamentarians of the Continent, to be held in 1992, possibly in the Dominican Republic, commemorating the 500 years of the arrival of the Gospel to America. This is an enormous project that has originated in Bolivia.

Although this conference is just starting, it has attracted the expectancy of parliamentarians of Brazil, Peru, Argentina, and other countries, as well as strong interest from people like James Dobson from "Focus on the Family," Herb Titus from Regent University, Chuck Colson from Prison Fellowship, John Whitehead from the Rutherford Institute and others.

Its purpose would be twofold: to train all these newly elected parliamentarians in the biblical principles of law, economics, politics, foreign affairs, education, etc., and to encourage the Christian population to participate more actively in business, politics, education, and all areas of life, improving our social and political lives through the principles of our Lord and His testimony.

Pedro Moreno is a former member of Maranatha Christian Church in Boston, Massachusetts. Pedro received Christ through the International Student program and is now reforming his country through biblical principles. Pedro studied at The Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, Tufts University and Harvard University. He now works as the Secretary General for the Bolivian Social Emergency Fund.

Growing Revival in Peru Leads to Change in Government

The Evangelical Church in Peru, which accounts for only 5% of the population, recently organized a strong push to successfully elect Alberto Fujimori, a dark horse candidate for President.

The explosion of evangelical churches in Peru (a term which, in Latin America, denotes active Protestants, Pentecostals, and Charismatic Catholics) is credited with fueling Fujimori's successful bid. While novelist Mario Vargas Llosa made appeals to intellectuals and relied heavily on his television campaign, Fujimori made use of an army of evangelical volunteers who quietly went from house to house among the villages and towns of the Peruvian hills.

Amidst a worsening economy, the mood of the electorate began to change as the people of Peru found in Fujimori the honesty and simplicity they were looking for in a candidate. Fujimori was able to finish a close second to Vargas Llosa in a first round balloting in April and then gained the momentum to win in the runoff election.

When Fujimori founded his maverick Cambio 90 (Change 90) political party last year, he was able, as a reform-minded and moderate Catholic, to enlist the aid of many evangelicals. Technical workers, who were disgusted with Vargas Llosa's urbane deflationary economic policies, also joined the party in a well planned thrust to enlist the discipline and organization of the evangelical churches.

As a result of Cambio 90's successful strategy, four senators, 13 deputies, and the second vice president, all identified as evangelicals, were swept into office. About one-third of Cambio 90's congressional candidates are evangelicals. With only 5% of Peru's population of 20 million, the quick advance of the evangelical presence in politics is seen by some as a "miracle from God."

It is suspected by some that the number of evangelical Christians in Peru may actually be larger than 5%. It is reported by Christian and Missionary Alliance sources that church builders in Lima, Peru have trouble keeping up with the explosive growth. In addition to this phenomenon, growing numbers of professionals and upper class technocrats, a group that is rarely affected by missionary presence, are showing up in these churches.

This change in the Peruvian government is characteristic of an evangelical movement that is beginning to gain momentum in all of Latin America. For a good overview of the move of God in Latin America, the editors of The Forerunner recommend David Martin's book, Tongues of Fire, The Explosion of Protestantism in Latin America.

Revival Surges in Argentina

Imagine a revival so big that the number of charismatics and Pentecostals in a country triple in five years, with the result that it is a problem for churches to find buildings large enough to meet in.

Imagine thousands of people attending open-air meetings every night of the week in large cities. Meetings where miracle healings are commonplace in every service; where one of the best-known evangelists is a businessman who has been a Christian only 10 years.

Sound incredible? This describes Argentina, a nation of 30 million people in South America that until now has been slow to accept the gospel message.

"Argentina is in the throes of an absolute sovereign revival unheard of in the history of that country," says J. Philip Hogan, executive director of the Division of Foreign Missions of the Assemblies of God, who has visited Argentina many times. "I know of churches where they have taken the seats out so they can pack more people in."

Here's what's happening in Argentina: Once considered a prosperous country (Buenos Aires, the capital, had a modern subway system 50 years ago), the nation has been beset by economic and political woes for many years.

The nation is Roman Catholic (the constitution requires the country's president to be Roman Catholic), but only a small percentage of the population is active in the church. Many Roman Catholics in the nation are involved in superstition and extreme Marian devotion.

In 1982, Argentina suffered a national embarrassment by losing the Falkland Island War (they call it the Malvinos Way) to Great Britain. Because Roman Catholic officials predicted victory for Argentina, and because many terrorists were trained in Catholic schools, many Argentines became disillusioned with the Catholic Church and have been more open to the gospel message in evangelical and Pentecostal churches.

At the same time, two things happened in the church:

* Evangelical Christians, who despite their common opposition to Roman Catholicism had a history of bickering among themselves, became unified and the dissension is largely ended.

"One of the blessings we have in Argentina is that many barriers are breaking down," says Carlos G. Kennedy from Buenos Aires, who is with the Plymouth Brethren. "We're not interested in arguing doctrine. We're interested in changed lives, holiness, commitment and serving the Lord."

* Miracle healings and deliverance from demons have become very common in churches, and it has been the miracles and the power that have drawn the unconverted.

It was this interest in the healing ministry that led well-known evangelists Charles and Frances Hunter to hold crusades in Argentina. On their first visit last July (winter in Argentina), more than 30,000 attended a meeting in Buenos Aires and 17,000 attended meetings in Rosario. More recently, more than 15,000 gathered in a large plaza in an affluent part of Buenos Aires this January to hear Charles and Frances minister on "How to Heal the Sick."

In that service, after Charles Hunter ministered the baptism of the Holy Spirit to approximately one-third of those in attendance, miracles began happening spontaneously throughout the crowd, even before the Hunters had planned to move into the miracle part of the service. Trained workers began ministering to people who were healed.

Last December, John and Anne Gimenez, co-pastors of Rock Church in Virginia Beach, Virginia, visited Argentina and were impressed with the ministry of Hector Gimenez (no relation). Gimenez has a unique ministry in Buenos Aires where he is referred to by some as the "Nicky Cruz of Argentina."

No accurate surveys have been taken of the number of new Christians. Yet several church leaders interviewed in Argentina said the total number of evangelicals is near three million - about one-tenth of the population. This is about three times the number of evangelicals when the revival broke out early in this decade. Of this number about 60 percent are Pentecostal or charismatic.

Even with the outstanding miracles, the growth of the churches and the obvious signs of revival, not everyone in Argentina believes a full revival is underway. Says Carlos Kennedy from Buenos Aires, "We believe we are only on the verge of a revival," adding that the best is yet to come.

The Christian Revolution in Latin America

12/92

FIVE HUNDRED YEARS HAVE ELAPSED since the arrival of the Spaniards to America. That event has continued to have profound implications concerning the culture, race, mentality and religion on Latin America.

Recently, the Roman Catholic church held public discussions in Santo Domingo asking for forgiveness of America's indigenous peoples, its self-criticism leading the way for a desire for a new protagonism. But these discussions were marred by the Catholic Church's constant reference to the "problem of sects" in Latin America.

Though the Catholic Church nobly recognizes its share of responsibility for the "shadows" that accompanied the arrival of the Spaniards five hundred years ago, it fails to take a real stance on the explosive growth of evangelical Christians in Latin America. In spite of being able to submit to self-criticism in recognizing its many internal problems (lack of Christian testimony, lack of priests, formalism in church participation, etc.) the evaluation of growth of the non-Catholic churches is unreasoned and non-objective.

The easy answer is that "the sects" (a perjorative and dehumanizing label many Catholics insist on using to describe evangelicals) are financed by groups in the United States. Those who support this position, like the ostrich, hide their head in the ground and fail to see the reality of change that surrounds them.

On the other hand, with abundant documentation, a number of Catholics have recognized the genuine and native character of the evangelical churches and the powerful social impact of their message.

But what is it that makes Latin Americans flock to the evangelical churches? First, it is two fundamental messages: the person of Jesus Christ and the Bible. Second, the evangelicals build an empirical theology, based not so much on theological reflections, but on experience and daily reality. Their detractors do not hesitate to label them "fundamentalists" and even "fanatics."

How is the evangelical message presented? It states that the common person, though poor, sick, full of problems and lacking a reason to live, can find a solution. Which one? "Jesus Christ!" answers the evangelical with energy and conviction.

Phrases such as: "Jesus is alive" - "He has power" - "God will take you out of your problems" - "God can heal you" - "You can find meaning for your life if you surrender to Christ" are recurrent and common in the preaching of the evangélicos.

Thus, while the Roman Catholic Church in Latin America is seeking ecclesiastical reform, the evangelicals have concentrated their message in two elements (Christ and the Bible) and have discovered that it is exactly what the people want and need to hear. Of course, the message does not exhaust itself with the preaching, but innumerable testimonies show that it is really helping the people to reorder their priorities, giving them an optimistic outlook in life, helping them solve their family problems (i.e., by saving and investing money that otherwise would be spent in alcohol and "fiestas") and encouraging them to seek a better education for their children and more productivity at work.

Not without reason, the evangelical message constantly emphasizes that "everything you do, you do it for God." Moreover, can anyone imagine the impact on the poor when they hear that "you have access to the unlimited power of God through prayer, and control over your circumstances," rather than the other way around?

Some say that evangelical Christians are exclusive and think they possess the only truth. However, exclusivity is not in Christianity but in Christ himself. He said: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life; no one comes to the Father, but through Me" (John 14:6).

Religion, whatever it may be (Judaism, Islam, Christianity) by its nature is exclusive. If religion accepts that the others are also true, it loses raison d'être and ceases to be true.

Truth, by an ontological requisite inherent to itself, has to be the only one. There cannot be many "truths." That is why, when some sectors of the Roman Catholic Church and even the evangelical churches attempt to combine themselves with theologies substantially different from the Christian doctrine, such as "Andean Theology" (pantheist) or rescue some Marxist elements through "Liberation Theology," they end up diluting their message, discouraging evangelism and questioning their own identity. Religious syncretism ultimately is not beneficial for any of the theological currents, which in the process of combining themselves, being contradictory in principle, lose their identity and their purpose.

A story is told about a boy who was brought before Alexander the Great to be tried for robbery. Alexander the Great solemnly asked, "Boy, what is your name? The boy timidly replied, "Alexander, sir." Raising his voice, Alexander the Great sentenced, "Boy, you either change your conduct, or you change your name."

Christianity does not admit middle grounds, syncretisms or doubts with respect to its identity, mission and purpose.

Finally, and going beyond this ontological and doctrinal analysis, we cannot overlook the fact that a religious society cannot be intolerant toward different religious, ethnic, cultural and linguistic expressions. The exclusive character of religious doctrine that we touched upon earlier takes place in the realm of idea, but should not reflect as an attitude of rejection toward people of different ideas.

In fact, we can have unity while respecting our diversity. We cannot impose diversity by force any more than we can impose uniformity by force. A society presupposes the existence of mature, reasonable and free citizens, and they will be the ones who will choose whatever fits them best regarding their religion, culture and life in general. We can be united and work toward a better country, a better standard of living, a better future for our children, without necessarily having to think and act in the same manner.

Rutherford Institute resists persecution of Christians in Mexico

CHIAPAS, Mexico (EP) - A complaint filed Oct. 29 by the Rutherford Institute of Latin America asked the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights to intervene on behalf of the Chamula Indians, who face persecution by local and regional authorities in the Mexican state of Chiapas because of their evangelical Christian beliefs.

"It is shocking that at this point in history and in a country like Mexico this type of violence and persistent persecution would take place on the basis of religious beliefs," said Pedro Moreno, director of the Rutherford Institute of Latin America.

Since August, 78 families and 394 individuals from 17 communities have been expelled by local authorities. Those expelled have been forced to become refugees in neighboring states.

Since that time, the district attorney in San Cristobal De Las Casas has received 48 complaints reporting illegal imprisonment, thefts, rapes and murder attempts against the Chamula Indians. Only 18 of these 48 complaints are currently being handled.

According to Moreno, acts of persecution against the Chamula Indians has been ongoing for 15 years. The Chamula Indians appealed to authorities, ranging from local officials to the Mexican government, for help.

"The suffering of the Chamula Indians has gone on far too long and we believe it can be stopped, especially since solutions have been found in other regions of Mexico," said Moreno.

The Progress of the Gospel on Venezuela's University Campuses

by Scott and Marisela Luper
11/89

Over the past few months, we have seen notable progress of the gospel in the Venezuelan universities. In Caracas, we have focused our efforts on the Universidad Simón Bolívar and the Universidad Central de Venezuela, which we believe to be the two key universities in the region.

On the Universidad Central campus, where there are approximately 60,000 students, events have occurred which have drawn the students' attention to God and His Word. During July, we helped an evangelistic Christian theater group named Teen Mania present their well known drama "Toymaker and Son" on the campus. The team performed in many of the different schools on the university.

While presenting "Toymaker and Son" at the School of Economics, where there is a strong communist influence, some of the leftist students tried to sabotage the show. The communists kicked and pushed the members of the team and tried to destroy and steal the sound system. This created a stir between the communists and the spectators who wanted to see the event.

Teen Mania opted to leave without finishing their drama to avoid trouble, but the on-lookers remained and their arguments with the communists lasted all day. Many protests were made by the spectators regarding the violation of freedom of expression. Because of this confrontation, the Dean of the School of Economics, who is also a communist, organized a forum entitled "The Presence of Maranatha on the University Campus and Its Implications."

Many people attended this forum and it has served to promote the gospel more than we could possibly have hoped. Many students began to show a great interest in the activities of Maranatha and this has served as an open door to share Jesus with them. Other Christian groups, hearing of our problems with the communists, have decided to join with us and we are now all meeting, praying and working together to build God's Kingdom on the Universidad Central campus.

Universidad Simón Bolívar has approximately 8,000 students and is considered to be the best university in the country. Over the past few months, the number of members attending our home groups has increased as has the number of attending visitors. There have always been strongholds of pride and intellectualism on this particular campus, but recently there has been a change in the spiritual environment and an unusual openness to the gospel.

About two months ago, we distributed a newsletter which gave the Christian perspective on some current events. This gave students the chance to see that Christians are in touch with the issues that confront our generation and that the Bible has real answers to today's problems. Many students became aware of our presence on this campus through this publication.

But the progress of the gospel on Venezuelan universities has not been limited to Caracas. During the month of August, a meeting entitled "The First Encounter of Venezuelan Christian University Students" took place in the small coastal city of Puerto La Cruz. For the first time in the history of Venezuela, Christian students from all over the country and from all denominations met together.

More than 500 students attended this conference and the central theme was the unity of the Body of Christ. There were seminars on themes such as "The Christian in Politics" and "How to Evangelize the Universities." The atmosphere was one of cooperation and the presence of the Holy Spirit was over all of the meetings. Students were challenged to take their universities for the glory of God, and to work together as one with brothers and sisters of all parts of the Body of Christ.

The Venezuelan edition of The Forerunner, "El Precursor," has been printed. Five hundred of the 5,000 copies issued were distributed to the Christians in the Puerto La Cruz meeting and the rest are being distributed on the university campuses. The first issue consists of four pages and is specifically targeted for university students.

We intend to publish this newspaper every month, to distribute it on all major university campuses, and to send it to all secular and Christian leaders in the nation. We believe that this paper will play a major role in the coming move of the Holy Spirit.

Testimonies from Caracas, Venezuela

Humberto Arreaza

I constantly used to ask myself questions like: "What is life for?," "What is life's meaning?," "How can one really find happiness?" and "What is my purpose in the world?" I never found anyone who could give me convincing answers to these questions and this frustrated me terribly.

But today, glory to God!, I live in Christ. I not only have the answers, but I also have a new life full of love and mercy. The Lord showed me that my role in this world is to be a warrior for His Gospel, that happiness is found in knowing Him, and that the goal of life is to live in His promises and in righteousness by the power of the Father, for the glory of His Son Jesus.

Vilma Romero

When I was young, my parents separated and this affected me deeply; I became very depressed and introverted as a result. At 12 years old, I began to drink compulsively and by 14 I was consuming cocaine. I lived a totally disordered life and frequently spent nights in the streets getting high with friends. At 18, I had a terribly frightening experience with marijuana from which I had difficulty recovering.

I had heard the Gospel by this age and experienced a temporary reform as a result of its message, but I did not totally surrender my life to Jesus Christ and shortly thereafter returned to drugs - this time with the added torment of conviction of sin.

I decided to move to Caracas where I met a Christian girl living in the same residence who preached to me. I repented with all of my heart and made a decision to follow Jesus Christ. As a result of being totally committed to Jesus, I'm now living a life full of victory by His grace.

Omar Navarro

I was a rock & roll fanatic, and therefore attended a Maranatha Rock Seminar at my university. I went with the intention of criticizing the Christians, but that day God broke my hardness of heart, so much so that I could not even speak after seeing this presentation.

Three weeks after this, I attended a Maranatha church meeting and it was here that the Lord showed me the price that I would have to pay to follow Him. I repented with all my heart and asked God to please forgive me. After this experience, a great zeal for God began to fill me.

Now I know that the Lord has mercy on His creatures and that we can fully trust Him.

Franklin Mendez

My life consisted of parties, girlfriends, alcohol and cigarettes. When I heard about Jesus Christ, I thought that belief in Him was something for older people, thinking it would be better to live out my youth without restraints. I was unsatisfied with my life, however, and felt that it was monotonous and empty.

When I received Jesus as my Lord and Savior, I experienced a 180 degree turnabout in my relationship with God and found real life! Now I know that being a Christian isn't having a "religion," but letting Christ truly change your life. This is the decision that every person needs to make.

Now I feel full of love, and free of all vices and wickedness, thanks to Jesus Christ who died for us on the cross.

Columbus & Cortez, Conquerors for Christ

A BOOK REVIEW

By Jay Rogers

John Eidsmoe, New Leaf Press,
304 pages, Paperback.
8/92

Did Christopher Columbus exploit the people of America - or did he evangelize them? Did Hernando Cortez subjugate the people of Mexico - or did he liberate them?

These are two of the questions posed by John Eidsmoe, a U.S. Reserve Air Force Lt. Colonel, who serves as a law professor at Faulkner University. Columbus & Cortez, Conquerors for Christ counters what Eidsmoe terms "the assault on Western culture" by media elites and liberal scholars on American university campuses. Eidsmoe surmises that this attack on culture is in actuality an attack on values - the biblical values upon which our nation was founded.

Dealing with a subject far broader than the 500th anniversary of Columbus' first voyage to America, Eidsmoe captures a glimpse of the greater Providential forces which shaped our nation. He includes two sections to give the reader a historical understanding of the forces which shaped the Age of Exploration.

"Explorers Before Columbus: For Odin or Christ?" traces the Christian influence in America to the Viking explorers who had become Christianized in the tenth century by Norway's King Olaf. Christianity was brought to Greenland and later to "Vinland" (Newfoundland or New England) by none other than Leif Erickson, who was converted by the preaching of Olaf. Sixteen churches were established in Greenland by Leif Erickson, and while the influence of his Christianity on Vinland is mere conjecture, the Greenland colonies flourished until the 1500s and were the first Christian colonies in North America.

"The Crescent or the Cross?" deals with the Moslem conquest of North Africa and Spain in the eighth century. The Moslems advance northward to France was finally driven back to Spain by Charles Martel at the Battle of Tours. The Crusades - a futile attempt by Christian Europe to overcome Islam by force - were fought during the five centuries of world domination by Islam. Making no excuses for the travesty of the Crusades, Eidsmoe includes this section of the book as a valuable background to understanding the European mindset of 1492. Isabella and Ferdinand spent much of their reign driving the last Moslems out of Spain. They hoped that Columbus' voyages to the Indies would bring enough gold to finance a Last Crusade to the Holy Land and drive the Moslems out of Jerusalem.

If the Spanish monarch's motives in financing Columbus' voyages were less than exemplary, the misconception that Columbus himself sailed for selfish reasons is refuted by Eidsmoe. The reader is given an insightful glimpse into the personality, temperament and character of Columbus as Eidsmoe makes extensive use of Columbus' journals and the writings of those who knew him. The popular practice of Columbus bashing of our day is rebutted by the words of Columbus himself.

Many books have been written on Columbus in this quincentenary year. Most of these volumes paint a secular gloss over Columbus' true motivations. Yet the information contained in Columbus & Cortez was readily available to all Americans a century ago when numerous volumes were published around the time of the Columbian Exposition of 1892. Sadly, the historical revisionists of the 20th century have sought to obscure the Christian character of a great man to fit their own political agenda. If there is to be a reversal of this trend, the rarer volumes, such as Eidsmoe's, need to be studied and critiqued by Christians. We must make the real Columbus known in 1992.

The Mandate: A project for China

I have been very grateful to our Lord beyond my ability to express for what He has done through you with The Forerunner. And now we have the Russian and Chinese versions! Only when we are in "our Life Hereafter" will we as parts of the "cloud of witnesses" come to know what an enormous uplifting effect those great periodicals (Predvestnik and The Mandate) have had and will be having on our world.

Champions for Christ in the Amazon

I am writing this note from the Amazons of Peru. My family and I are here for a two month span. I am holding a school of evangelism for 60 Christian leaders, as well as going into the schools and university campuses. The group here who invited us to come have a real vision to reach the Indian tribes throughout the jungles, as well as start Bible studies in the many villages which grow cocaine for U.S. consumption - The best way to curb the drug problem (U.S.) is to get the growers saved and under the Lordship of Jesus! I'm teaching new strategies for evangelism in the '90s. All are multi-media evangelistic tools that attract huge crowds of non- believers in Latin America. I'm teaching them also how to preach Lordship, lay foundations, of true repentance, etc. It's exciting! Thanks for the wonderful article you ran on Campeones para Cristo (Champions for Christ). Could you send us all the back issues of The Forerunner to help us as missionaries? We'd love to keep up on what's happening. The cutting-edge articles will also help us to help others.

Freedom for former USSR permanent?

Some time ago, two ministries I have respect for both warned about the freedom in the C.I.S. being not permanent. A number of pastors in the C.I.S. told that the Holy Spirt had impressed upon them that the freedom of religion would not go on indefinitely. There was a vision of a wheel which rolled in one direction and the more it rolled the more freedoms the Russian people experienced. But by and by the wheel began to slow down. Eventually the wheel came to a stop. After hesitating a bit, the wheel began to roll back in the direction from whence it came, and as it rolled back, the freedoms the people had enjoyed began to be taken away one after another. I don't know whether this will occur soon or not, but this is from respectable men with good ministries.

Bruce Klingbeil
Atlanta, Georgia

Editor's response: Our strategy for reaching nations in the former USSR and now communist China is to act urgently not knowing how long the opportunity of openness may exist. However, we are not driven by prophecies, visions and dreams predicting the failure of the progress of liberty in the world. This is not consistent with what Jesus Christ himself prophesied: "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations; and then the end shall come" (Matthew 24: 14). It is possible that freedoms in the former USSR may be short lived, but we are driven by a gospel of victory not of defeat.

The goal of The Forerunner in the 1990s will be to establish a network of media resources around the world that may enable Christian nationals in foreign countries to publish reformation newspapers similar in vision to The Forerunner using cutting-edge computer technologies. Here are the most recent developments:

Predvestnik:
The Voice of a New Generation

KIEV, Ukraine (FR) - Roman Medvid, staff editor, informs us that the seventh issue of Predvestnik has been produced. There are now ten major distribution centers throughout cities in Ukraine, the Russian and Kazakhstan. Recent issues of Predvestnik have been carried into Moldavia and the Baltic States.

The two most recent issues contained a series of articles on church history. Roman Medvid compiled history series featuring figures and events such as the Nicean Council, Saint Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation, Jonathan Edwards, Charles Finney and Dietrich Bonhoeffer. Sergei Zavgorodny is writing a series concerning the great changes in the political structure of the former USSR and how this will affect Christians and young churches. Predvestnik is being distributed freely in the public schools of Kiev and other cities as well as on university campuses and through churches.

Predvestnik's newest staff member Sergei Zavgorodny has a vision for reaching Muslims with a special edition of Predvestnik. There are millions of Russian speaking Muslims throughout the former USSR. Some of the largest Muslim groups are the Tatars and the Turkish peoples throughout central Asia. Sergei believes that now is the time to reach Muslims with a newspaper specifically geared to these people groups.

Our goals for 1993 and 1994 are to publish Predvestnik on a bimonthly schedule; increase circulation; and continue to expand distribution throughout the former Soviet Union. We plan to use Kiev as a base to print the Muslim newspaper and a Reformation newspaper to reach mainland China!

The Forerunner:
Preparing The New South African

BRAAMFONTEIN, South Africa (FR) - Dawson Lewis, missionary to South Africa, has had a burning vision to establish the South African Forerunner for several years. Dawson's church is involved in ministry on the university campuses and in establishing a Christian school in South Africa. Three other churches, part of His People Christian Ministries, are networked with them in the vision to reach the university campuses and to establish a publication. Nicky Becker, managing editor of The Forerunner: Preparing the New South African, began working as a part of this ministry last year and has produced three issues.

Says Nicky: "The Forerunner was birthed in October last year out of Maranatha Christian Church of South Africa which has now merged with His People Ministries. The magazine has been modeled on The Forerunner USA newspaper. It is, however, in its very beginning stages. I need to establish exactly what equipment we need. Also, we need advice in raising finances, personnel requirements, marketing methods, etc. We have a mailing list which includes business people, pastors, people involved in the political arena, etc. The magazines are distributed on three campuses in Johannesburg and one in Cape Town. We would very much like to link up with you for the purpose of training."

The Mandate:
Liberating China

DURHAM, North Carolina (FR) - The 1990s promise to be a significant time of change for China. That's why The Mandate is being produced: to give the tens of thousands of Chinese students here in the United States a blueprint for the reformation of their culture and society.

In early 1994, The Mandate will emerge with an all Chinese language version. Our goal is to sow the seed of Christian ideas on the university campuses where there are many Chinese international students. Many of these young people have come to America seeking answers to the problems that their country faces. Unfortunately, the American university classroom is a very hostile place for the Christian message - we intend to counter that with a relevant presentation of Christian ideas so that the entire Chinese international student community studying in the United States can be prepared for revival!

Our desire is to greatly increase campus distribution through interested individuals and churches. We must reach the thousands of Chinese students here in the U.S. with the gospel of Jesus Christ. If we enter this battle of ideas with the message of the gospel, thousands of Chinese internationals will respond to the call of God on their lives. Many of them will return to their nation to assume places of power and effect lasting change according to biblical principles.

This first edition appeared this fall in English in order to raise the financial support that is needed to accomplish this great task that lies before us. The Chinese publication will be ready in early 1994 and we want to have the finances available to make a large impact on the Chinese international population with the very first issue. At the moment, we are not only putting together the Chinese version, but also looking into ways that The Mandate can be distributed in China.

Reaching The Nations With The Printed Word

The world of the 1990s is achanging at a rapid pace. The gospel of Jesus Christ is destined to penetrate every stronghold of darkness from the communist bloc to the nations of Islam. The goal of The Forerunner International is to reach young people who will be used of God in liberating the nations.

We will do this by training the young editors of the emerging network of Forerunner newspapers. We will help them to publish the message of Revival and Reformation so that they can be used of God to effectively transform their nation. Our goal is to establish a network of media resources, information sharing and news gathering services so that young people the world over can catch a vision of the progress of the gospel worldwide.

At this time we are in great need of finances to move forward. Contributions will be used for equipping and training staff of established publications, personal support for our staff and establishing new publications. Your contributions are tax-deductible and most appreciated.

Your financial contributions will help to put hundreds of thousands of copies of The Forerunner into the hands of the world's future leaders. With your help we can liberate the nations!

The Hijacking of American Literature: Part 1: Introduction

by Ruth Nourse

Writers of history select and document occurrences which they see as significant. Most of us who studied history or literature in the public school never stopped to ask, "Is this the whole story? ... Are these really the people, the decisions, and events that have had the greatest influence on Americans?" We simply studied history and literature as it was taught.

In this column, the reader will notice the names of many literary critics, philosophers, and writers who consciously determined the direction of American education, as well as American values, generations before we were born. Some of those most influential in setting this course were not Americans at all, but Europeans who had nothing in common with our founding fathers. Unfortunately, ordinary Americans know little, and are probably concerned less, about the kind of people that have altered our course.

Twenty five years ago I awoke with a start to the significance of what literary critics were saying - and a whole new world opened up before me as I saw how our nation has been shaped by writers and educators. These people have been tampering with our future, but they are not strangers; their names are well known to us from literature, history, and political science courses. And part of the story has been omitted from our textbooks.

Most of us assume that the good purpose of our founding fathers, the U.S. Constitution, and the promises of elected officials will guarantee our continued freedom. Because we respect differing religious and political views, we suppose that our own views will be respected in the same way. Governed by this view, our founders allowed a small segment of their countrymen a century ago to change the direction of education and thereby the course of American tradition and history. Dazzled by teachers and books which offered a "superior view" of man and the world, 19th century activists imported ideas from abroad and used public money and public schools to spread them among us.

Regarded at first by their contemporaries as radical and eccentric, these promoters of a new age held to their unorthodox ideas with determination until they finally worked their way into positions of influence and power. Their purpose was nothing less than revolution. Their method was a form of warfare I have called "the war of the poets."

The right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" has been enjoyed in our times with little reference to what principles or conditions may underlie all "rights." The upheavals of the 1960s seem to have awakened a new national concern. Some of us have undertaken to examine personal and national roots, and have found the study of history profitable for the light it casts on today's trends and events. Why did America remain for nearly 400 years a land of promise to pilgrims and hardy immigrants? And why now are we producing hordes of our own homeless, hungry, despairing or violent people? We can gain the answers to these questions by consulting history.

The "Longfellow War"

Before my quest for historical answers began, I made most of the usual assumptions about history and entertained the usual prejudices. "Who needs to bother with the dates of wars, elections, panics and depressions?" I thought. Then, suddenly, I grasped an important thread in this tapestry, and it began to unravel. That thread of history was found in a biography of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the poet. It was my first introduction into an episode in history called "The Longfellow War."

I had read several biographies of Longfellow and knew something of his poetry. Granted, his view of life was through a window of optimism and faith. He shared with his readers many reasons for hope. Longfellow was once loved as no other American poet. He was an all-around great man - husband, father, teacher, neighbor. Schoolchildren across the nation celebrated his birthday.

James Russell Lowell, U.S. ambassador to England, said this at the unveiling of Longfellow's bust in the Poets' Corner at Westminster Abbey: "Never was a private character more answerable to public performance than that of Longfellow. Never have I known a more beautiful character." But in spite of world renown during his lifetime, Longfellow is by no means considered a loved friend in our generation. Is it because he lived so long ago that he is no longer honored?

Biographies and works of Edgar Allan Poe are still in great demand by students assigned to American literature. Walt Whitman, who was Longfellow's younger contemporary, is not neglected. But why is Longfellow now all but forgotten in the public school? I asked myself, "If Longfellow is no longer great, who has taken his place and what is American literature now?" Since the research for this book began in 1961, I have spent many hours looking at American authors of the 19th and early 20th century. This led to excursions into history as well, and to the headwaters of political and social movements with which we are all familiar. There has indeed been a revolution - a "bloodless coup" affecting all of American education.

What I discovered, particularly from reading Herbert Gorman's biography of Longfellow - A Victorian American - is that a certain band of intellectual elite deliberately came against Longfellow's Christian worldview. "It is possible," said Gorman, "that the world sees in [Longfellow] a personification of those gentle virtues of living that are so agreeable to contemplate and so dull to put in practice." Margaret Fuller, another outspoken literary critic, called Longfellow a "clever magpie" who should not be allowed to teach others to write.

From our earliest beginnings, the Christian faith has been woven into the warp and woof of national life, and, to a great extent, is needed to explain America. How has it come about, in a nation boasting individual freedom, that the faith of our fathers still burning brightly in the hearts of many of her citizens, young and old, must now be excluded from the mainstream of knowledge?

Next month, we will examine in detail just how Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's Christian ideas were carefully and deliberately edited from our textbooks and concealed from our children.

The Hijacking of American Education: Part 2 - War of the Poets: Longfellow vs. Poe

by Ruth Nourse

From our nation's beginnings, the Christian faith has been interwoven with American philosophy. Over a century ago, however, an intellectual elite arose with the purpose of deleting Christian ideals from American education. In this column we will examine in detail just how Christian thought has been concealed from students of American literature. This "war of the poets" can be documented by contrasting the lives of two men: Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and Edgar Allan Poe.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was a man who pursued happiness in the traditional American way. He was born in Portland, Maine, in 1807, and became the best known, best loved American poet at home and abroad. His father was a Harvard graduate and attorney who would later be elected to the Massachusetts legislature and then to congress. The piety and patriotism of his mother, Zilpah, did honor to six Mayflower pilgrims named among her ancestors. Puritan and pilgrim faith merged in the shaping of the poet's character and world view.

Longfellow attended private schools where, in addition to the usual studies, he received instruction in French and lessons on the flute. By age fourteen he was ready to enter Bowdoin College. By the time he finished fourth in his college class of 38, Henry had received some recognition as a poet, having written 17 poems, most of them published, by the time he was 19. Years later, he selected five of these for publication in his complete works.¹

After graduation in the spring of 1825, a grant had been received to establish a new professorship in modern languages at Bowdoin, and the school's administrators were reminded of their gifted graduate. Young Longfellow was invited to take the position, which would be held open for him while he, at his own expense, traveled to Europe for three years' study of European literature and language. In 1826 he sailed to Europe with his parent's blessing, although his mother had misgivings that her son might come under the sinister influences of a European university. These fears were unfounded. Her son found no thrill in anything of value in the ideas of the German philosophers admired by Ralph Waldo Emerson.²

Longfellow's poetry is strengthened by threads of truth from the King James Bible. Frequent notations and commentaries on Sunday sermons are sprinkled through all the years of his letters and journals. They reflect his lifelong pursuit of reality in the practice of the Christian faith and his reflections on the myriad of religious philosophies found in Europe.

Longfellow became professor of modern languages at Bowdoin with the added duties of librarian. In his inaugural address, given at age 22, the new professor set forth his view about the purpose of literature: "It is this religious feeling, this changing of the finite for the infinite - this grasping after the invisible things of another and a higher world - which marks the spirit of modern literature."

Longfellow continued as professor of modern languages at Bowdoin for five years and then at Harvard for twenty. He later became world renowned for short novels, such as Hyperion, and classic works of poetry, Hiawatha, Tales of a Wayside Inn, and The Courtship of Miles Standish. Any reader familiar with the King James Bible, or who has been exposed to Chaucer or Shakespeare, will find Longfellow's poems delightfully "modern." Although time has changed our language and manner of speech, man's nature remains basically the same. Joy, sorrow, happiness, triumph, loneliness, failure, strength, weakness, family, love, death - the human heart responds to these in every century. Longfellow's work is timeless in this sense. His readers acknowledged and appreciated their poet's dedication to truth and purity.

Enter the Biased Editors

Longfellow was freely enjoyed by American school children for the next 50 years. But the decision had already been made by those in charge of what school children were expected to read. This poet's work would be replaced by literature with sympathy for neither the faith nor sentiment of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. His passing signalled a "new age" in America. Critics made their opinions clear while the poet lived and while his works were everywhere applauded. They declared, although few at the time were listening, that America's literature must be filled more with passion and less with sentiment.

Hostile criticism came primarily from literary reviews by Edgar Allen Poe. Poe's articles appeared in the several magazines he wrote for or edited between 1835 and 1845. Longfellow's attitude toward Poe was kindly even when he stooped to actual defamation of character and slander. Calling Longfellow an imitator, Poe accused him of plagiarism and likened him to a pickpocket.³

Poe was quoted as saying, "I love fame: I dote on it: I idolize it."⁴ And in another place, "My whole nature utterly revolts at the idea that there is any Being in the universe superior to myself!"⁵ One biographer believed egoism became the basis for Poe's criticism of fellow writers: "He seemed to regard the fame of contemporary authors as a personal rebuke and insult to himself, wondering at the presumption and ignorance of a rushing world that could admire anything but the central sun of American Literature."

Edgar Allan Poe was born in Boston in 1809. His father studied law but later chose an acting career. His mother, an actress, soon after died of tuberculosis and left him in the care of a Richmond tobacco merchant. The bright and attractive little boy recited poetry and danced, possibly for the stage. He was enrolled in a good school in England, doing well as a student, but his writings reveal unhappiness and a sardonic view of discipline. Poe entered Jefferson University in 1826, where he combined as much pleasure as possible with the requirements for a liberal education. He was a good student but he and his friends drank with such abandon that the sheriff was called to bring order to the campus. Most biographers tell us that he accumulated more than $2000 in gambling debts.⁶

Poe went to Boston in 1827, with the purpose of publishing a book of poems. From 1835 through 1845, Poe was the editor of at least five publications in four cities. He demonstrated an unusual ability to attract readership and usually became editor-in-chief in a short time. Soon after this Poe married his cousin, Virginia, and moved to Richmond. One may guess the circumstances that prompted the following letter from his employer: "You have fine talents, Edgar, - and you ought to have them respected as well as yourself. Learn to respect yourself, and you will very soon find that you are respected. Separate yourself from the bottle, and bottle companions, forever! No man is safe who drinks before breakfast! No man can do so, and attend to business properly ..." - (Signed) T.W. White.⁷

The poet's mental and emotional state was displayed in several drunken sallies to New York. One who knew him wrote: "He walked the streets, in madness or melancholy, with lips moving in indistinct curses, or with eyes upturned in passionate prayers, (never for himself, for he professed that he felt already damned), but for the happiness of those who were at the moment the object of his idolatry."⁸ More short stories and poems issued from his pen, but by this time opium had been added to an already deadly abuse of alcohol.

After Virginia's death in 1847, Poe continued on an even more erratic course. An abnormal need for emotional support drove him to pursue both married and single women with whom he had become enamored over the years. After parting with one of these women, Poe disappeared for five days and was picked up by a doctor at a tavern in Baltimore. The poet's death followed after many hours of horror. According to one account, he lingered between a dream and a screaming nightmare until he was unable to speak above a whisper. Just before he died, witnesses said, "He moved his head, gently whispering, 'Lord help my soul.'"⁹ When he asked if there was hope, a Bible was brought to his deathbed. No other book spoke of matters that concerned him then. However, the textbook record has not been adjusted to reflect Poe's change of heart.

Those who select great literature to be studied by American students feel no responsibility to present literary role models who have been successful in life, as well as in letters. While making a point of eliminating Poe's more repulsive works, textbook editors fail to mention that he repented in the end.

Next month we continue to investigate the exclusion of Longfellow's poetry from American Literature classes. Two more detractors to Longfellow's popularity will be examined: Sarah Margaret Fuller and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 3 - Sarah Margaret Fuller

by Ruth Nourse

We have discussed in the last two installments of this series that a certain elite group of educators, writers, and literary critics set out in the mid- to late 1800s to discredit the poet Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. This scheme was carried out because some felt it necessary to bury America's Christian heritage, and place our nation on a new philosophical course. It was obvious to these individuals that a literary hero like Longfellow - who was so outspokenly Christian - would have to lose his place of prominence in American letters. We will focus our attention this month on the work of critic Sarah Margaret Fuller.

Sarah Margaret Fuller was born on May 23, 1810, in Cambridgeport, Massachusetts. Her father Timothy, an attorney who was elected to the Massachusetts legislature and later to the U.S. Congress, was bitterly disappointed, having set his heart on a son. He determined to educate his daughter as though she were a boy. The little girl was expected to be ready for recitation when her father came home from work in the evening, and he demanded perfection.

After lessons were learned, Margaret was encouraged to use her father's library, which included books by literary artists such as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and others that few in America knew existed. These were works not widely read in America before the 1880s, but from which Timothy Fuller's precocious little girl began to build her world view.

The burden of studying so diligently with her exacting father probably contributed to a lifetime of emotional problems for Margaret. She was a lonely child; her life revolved around her father, his books, and church attendance. Her father eventually began to see his mistake in hindering Margaret from making friends her own age. He decided to send her to a boarding school in Groton 40 miles away. Classroom and dormitory life was not easy for Margaret or for those who shared it with her. Schoolmates soon found the Fuller girl always insisted on her own way and was unwilling to follow the leadership of others.

After she left the school, Margaret exchanged letters for five years with an understanding teacher and told of her self-imposed program of self-improvement. Thus Margaret Fuller planned to develop discipline and social graces so that she could, one day, distinguish herself through her superior intellect. She was an exceedingly serious young woman, who at 16 could discuss Byron and Rousseau or the philosophy of John Locke. When her father entertained President John Quincy Adams at a ball in 1826, this young lady, gowned in pink silk, served as hostess. Timothy Fuller saw something queenly in this awkward young woman. History would vindicate this perception.

An Aversion to Christianity

A spiritual turning point in Margaret's life is described in her journal: "It was Thanksgiving Day and I was obliged to go to church, or exceedingly displease my father. I almost always suffered much in church from a feeling of disunion with the hearers and dissent from the preacher: but today more than ever before, the services jarred upon me from their grateful and joyful tone."¹

On the way home she had a mystical experience: "For myself, I believe in Christ because I can do without him: because the truth he announces I can see elsewhere imitated: because it is overshadowed in the very nature of my being. But I do not wish to do without him. He is consistently aiding and answering me. Only I will not lay any undue and exclusive emphasis on him. When he comes to me I will receive him: when I feel inclined to go by myself, I will."²

Margaret's faith in the doctrine of self-culture was strengthened and defined by Goethe, whose writings she discovered in 1832. This German poet and dramatist, who took both subjects and style from Greek myths, became Margaret's idol. She found in Goethe's writings a world for women beyond the world she knew - the "oppressive, narrow world" of Christian home and family. She defended Goethe's immorality and unspirituality, saying she would not let her knowledge of his private life "interfere with her judgment of his works." Goethe showed her that life was not ruled by laws so unchangeable as those of the Puritans.

In 1839, Margaret rented a house in Jamaica Plains outside of Boston. Money had to be earned in some way. Taking stock of assets, she identified conversation as her best asset. Already a herald of the joys of German literature, Margaret would find in her conversations a more ample platform from which to introduce Goethe to America.³

For her first class, she enlisted 25 members at $25 each. There were to be 13 "conversations" on Greek Mythology followed by another course of 13 on the Fine Arts. During the next five years, Margaret scheduled regular "conversations" on such subjects as ethics, demonology, creeds, poetry, ideals, and philosophical questions. She called on women to have the courage to thus improve themselves, even though they would be called "crude and tasteless" for attending her meetings.

Replacing Christ with Goethe

Fuller crusaded against what she called the "cult of true womanhood," i.e., piety, purity, submissiveness, passivity, and domestic virtues. Her classes were seen as a part of the transcendentalist mania that swept New England in the 1830s and '40s. It was the time of "Newness," and new ideas were being put forward on almost every subject. In a short while, transcendentalists such as Ralph Waldo Emerson wished to join her conversations.

After the transcendentalists found their literary offerings unwelcome in many periodicals, they began, in 1840, to plan a quarterly journal of their own, The Dial. Margaret was to be the editor of the new journal, with Emerson the co-editor. With its announced purpose "To promote the constant evolution of the truth, not the petrification of opinion," The Dial was a welcome forum in which to make new ideas heard.⁴ Margaret made no effort to edit out the more radical flights from the world of orthodoxy. Everyone was allowed to express what was on his mind.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's evaluation of the journal may be seen in a letter to his father: "Have you seen The Dial? The organ of the Transcendentalists? I am sure it would amuse you: its beauty, its wisdom and folly, make a strange mixture." Longfellow's view of Goethe differed greatly from Sarah Margaret Fuller's; he denounced the writer as sensual and immoral. Most Americans saw him as anti-Christian.⁵

Work on The Dial brought Margaret into closer association with Emerson than she had previously managed to achieve, but Goethe continued to be her most admired influence. In Goethe, Margaret found an affinity with a universal spirit more compelling to her, more liberating, than she found in Christ. Through Goethe's writings she came to believe that as the principle of sin is destroyed, the personality attains absolute freedom, and thus finds its "true self."

She believed that through this freedom we become gods, able to give life which we have in this way received. She later wrote: "I constantly think of Goethe ... He is the light of the age ... High priest of truth, and best lover of man."⁶ Having thus deified Goethe, Margaret could accept no superior source of truth.

Margaret Fuller then went on to New York in 1844 to work as literary editor on Horace Greely's New York Tribune. From this platform she launched her attacks on the poetical works of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. After the Cambridge poet had commenced his rise to fame, she wrote: "We must confess a coolness towards Mr. Longfellow, in consequence of the exaggerated praises that have been bestowed upon him. When we see a person of moderate powers receive honors which should be reserved for the highest, we feel somewhat like assailing him and taking from him the crown which should be reserved for grander brows."

Centered as she was on self-perfection, Margaret disdained all those who aspired to nothing better than home and family - people whose values were reflected in Longfellow's poetry. "She wondered why God suffered 'these grub-like lives, undignified even by passion - these lifelong quenchings of the spark-divine.'"

In 1846, Margaret sailed for Europe and became romantically involved with a young Italian revolutionary. They were later forced to flee with their young son to Florence, where she mailed announcements of her marriage, and the birth of her child, to friends in America. On May 17, 1850, she and her family perished in a violent storm off Fire Island on July 19. Margaret Fuller's editors, including Emerson, removed her papers and all journal material unacceptable to Americans of the 19th century to protect her reputation and their own.

We have no way to know what transpired in Margaret's thoughts as a ship was torn apart beneath her. Perhaps she, like Edgar Allen Poe, changed her mind about a lot of things. Her story is now told here because her leadership in shaping America's new age did not end with the tragedy off Fire Island. America's public schools and libraries are monuments to her triumph in the overturning of the Christian social order in Longfellow's America.

Next month Ralph Waldo Emerson's role in the shaping of American philosophy will be examined.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 4 - Ralph Waldo Emerson

by Ruth Nourse

In this continuing series, we have examined how the Christian influence in American letters was subtly edited from the modern educational curriculum. This month, we will highlight the life and work of Ralph Waldo Emerson - who is celebrated today as a central figure in our literary history.

Ralph Waldo Emerson has emerged in our time as a prominent figure on the 19th century horizon. In high school and college textbooks today he is presented as the virtual patron saint of American literature. It is interesting to note that he has not always been viewed in this favorable light. In fact, Mr. Emerson was treated as an oddity in his day, and his popularity paled in the light of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow - the Christian poet who had captured the American audience with his themes of love, family, and moral courage.

Emerson's fame has waxed in recent years while Longfellow's has waned. We must ask: Is the path which he marked out for America a more propitious one than Longfellow's?

Ralph Waldo Emerson was born in Boston on May 25, 1803. He was the third son of the pastor of "old brick," Boston's First Church. His father, William Emerson was actively involved in the life of the Boston community and later became chaplain of the Massachusetts state senate. Ralph's father died when he was only eight years old, and his already unhappy home life became more painful. Emerson complained all his life about being unable to feel close to people - and his journals were filled with self-criticism, introspection, and conjecture about the looks and actions of those around him.

At age 14 he entered Harvard College and graduated in 1821 as class poet. In the years that followed, young Emerson began a period of questioning about the established tenets of Christianity. He wrote in his journal: "Who is he that shall control me? Why may not I act and speak and write and think with entire freedom? What am I to the Universe, or, the Universe, what is it to me? Who hath forged the chains of wrong and right, of opinion and custom? And must I wear them?"¹

During this questioning period he returned to Harvard to study for the ministry. Through reading Samson Reed's Growth of the Mind, a new doorway opened to Emerson. He would no longer be shackled to the narrow view of the Church or Scripture: he now believed that one may receive truth directly from Nature through human intuition. He began to consider all the common arguments against Christianity, and with these in hand, the young divinity student began to point out all the "erroneous passages" of Scripture to parishioners.

Unaware of Emerson's struggle, the pulpit committee asked him to fill the pulpit at the First Church while the pastor was away. At this same time his numerous health problems became worse. His new wife, Ellen, died only months after their marriage. By 1832 he had clearly made a spiritual turning point: he announced to church leaders that he was unwilling to serve the bread and wine of communion because he felt it unreasonable to believe Jesus meant all generations of his followers were to observe the ordinance. This step could be called symbolic of Emerson's entire rejection of the authority of scripture and the church.

Injecting the Spirit of Anti-Christ into New England

The decision became a watershed in his relationship with Christian truth. Up to this point he seemed to acknowledge the ameliorative influence of the Christian church in the world. As he descended from this point, he testified most often to the emptiness of Christian forms. He began to look to other sources for light and reality.

The leadership at Boston's First Church was unable to accept a pastor who would not serve communion and regretfully called for his resignation. Emerson made it clear that the resignation applied only to his position with the church, not the Christian ministry. He would continue to be a minister, but would insist upon his own definition of what that entailed. Freedom would be the essence of his faith and "its object simply to make men good and wise."²

Ill health required Emerson to travel abroad, and while in Europe he consulted with philosophers and writers such as Samuel Coleridge. It was in Europe that Emerson discovered the message that would become his hallmark. Afterwards he wrote: "You can never come to any peace or power until you put your whole reliance in the moral constitution of man and not at all in historical Christianity."³ The faith he would preach from now on had a simple tenet: "A man who lives in deepest harmony with the impulses of his own moral being is, as a consequence, truly good."⁴

This then - in Emerson's mind - was the gospel destined to set America free from empty traditions and Puritanical chains. He established himself as a lecturer around Concord and Boston and was welcomed to pulpits by minister friends everywhere. He would eventually travel the continent spreading his message of reform.

Emerson had gathered around himself a group of like-minded thinkers who came to be known as the Transcendentalists. He published his first book, Nature, anonymously in 1836, and it came to be called the Transcendentalist New Testament. Christianity was called their Old Testament. From it, they developed the notion that spiritual knowledge could be directly received by reason through human intuition.

On this premise, Emerson - now known as "the Concord philosopher" - proposed to build a superior system of thought. One member of the circle called Transcendentalism "a Pentecost of the new gospel," described Emerson as "that new-born bard of the Holy Ghost."⁵ It was most definitely a strange gospel. Swedenborgianism, socialism, Oriental religions, German idealism, Hindu sacred writings, phrenology, French eclecticism, even Maya, became the grist from which the Transcendentalists could grind their "Newness" in all shades. Although Emerson clung to shreds of Christian teaching that forbade dabbling in the occult, there were seers and seeresses who held seances where moving tables and knockings in the darkness sent shivers down transcendental spines.

A "National Joke" Is Now Considered American's Greatest Philosopher

Ralph Waldo Emerson was taken seriously by relatively few in his own time. His fame has grown until his enigmatic doctrines are now quoted like scripture in textbooks that make him a dominant historical figure. He was never more famous than today. Van Wyck Brooks, writing in 1936, gave this estimate of the attitudes of Emerson's contemporaries: "Emerson was travelling, on his lecture-tours, further and further westward. He was still an impossible puzzle in the popular mind, even a national joke, a byword of the country paragraphers."⁶

Modern textbooks take pains to define and describe the transcendentalist movement as the movement which emancipated the New England mind "from the shackles of a narrow orthodoxy." Emerson's part in the movement, along with lucid exposition of his sometimes obscure doctrines, is presented favorably in contrast to "the otherworldly philosophy of the Puritans."

Obviously we have here a continuation of the war on Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and the Christian worldview which he represented. Slowly over time, educators and philosophers have removed Longfellow from his place of prominence in American literature, and replaced him with a man who showed forthright contempt for Christianity and who espoused the "new religion" of humanism which has now become the guiding force behind public education in this country.

Next month we will examine Ralph Waldo Emerson's greatest triumph - the capitulation of Harvard University to the philosophies of the New Age.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 5 - Flapjack Turning at Harvard

by Ruth Nourse

When Harvard University was founded in 1636, the school was expressly chartered to train pastors and teachers of the Christian faith. From the earliest days of the colonies and until well after the Civil War, American education was preeminently Christian. Beginning in the early 1800s, there was a growing influence of Unitarian interpretations of biblical truth on education that was foreign to all that had gone before in America. VERITAS (Truth) was and is Harvard's motto. In 1869, the University administration reversed the motto's meaning and in the revolution that followed the school became an enemy of the Church that founded it.

In the late 1850s, young Charles William Eliot, as a member of the Harvard faculty, demonstrated remarkable administrative talent. Innovations he suggested brought a wide range of improvement in school life. After the Civil War, Eliot found some changes afoot at Harvard. In 1866, the alumni had already elected Ralph Waldo Emerson; the response now was to add Eliot to Harvard's board of overseers. After Eliot's election to the board, the liberal majority voted to elect a new president. The nomination of Eliot brought firm opposition from conservatives; but liberals, including Emerson, held out for him on succeeding ballots until he was confirmed.

Few Bostonians seemed aware of the prospect of change encapsulated in Eliot's inauguration at Harvard in 1869. Others knew what Eliot stood for and heralded the revolution with exultation. Van Wyck Brooks, a leading literary critic, gives this view of innovations at Harvard: "Charles William Eliot had turned Harvard over like a flapjack."

Full significance of the "flapjack turning" at Harvard is best understood in the light of the early history of the oldest school of higher learning in America. In 1636, just six years after Boston was founded, a college was authorized by the General Court of Massachusetts. While the project was in the planning stage there arrived from England a young graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, John Harvard, a Congregational minister, along with his bride of 10 months. The young minister's story is not often a part of contemporary histories of Harvard University. His simple dedication to the cause of Christ seems somehow out of sync these days with the great University that bears his name.

For one hundred years the Congregational Church controlled the school. Small though its beginnings may seem, the little college had no rival in America for 60 years. As the pride and joy of the colonies, Harvard College fulfilled the purpose for which it was founded. Changes did not happen overnight and there were legitimate reasons for them. What is remarkable is that in the midst of justifiable reform, the school was removed from control of the Congregational Church and placed at the disposal of forces hostile to the Christian faith.

Emerson's Influence At Harvard

Ralph Waldo Emerson had muttered into his journal for 30 years or more about new laws, new religion, a new race, and other things equally enigmatic. Emerson's defection from the Christian faith provided a hinge upon which to turn an entire nation. Preaching and lecturing as occasion arose and pocketbook demanded, he spoke in terms that could only be called spiritual:

"If there be one lesson more than another which should pierce (the scholar's) ear, it is, The world is nothing, the man is all: in yourself is the law of all nature ... in yourself slumbers the whole of Reason: it is for you to know all; it is for you to dare all. A nation of men for the first time exist, because each believes himself inspired by the Divine Soul which also inspires all men."

The Concord philosopher was invited by students to address the senior class of the Divinity school. Emerson told students that Christ had come to teach that God was incarnate in man - all men. He suggested that what man has been unable to find in the Church may be found in the soul: "In the soul let redemption be sought." The Boston Daily Advertiser carried an article deploring Emerson's address because it rejected the revelation upon which Christianity is based and demonstrated the work of evil forces seeking to draw men from the Church. Emerson's philosophy clearly struck at the roots of Christianity, denying both experience and tradition. The Divinity School Address resulted in his banishment from Harvard for almost 30 years.

In 1854, when a student opened his dormitory room for Emerson's lecture on "Poetry," an investigation was made to discover why the philosopher was on campus. Clearly Harvard administrators, after 14 years, still remembered the Divinity School address. A change of climate became evident at Commencement 1866, when Harvard awarded Emerson the LL.D. degree and the alumni elected him to the board of overseers. Harvard was ready to enter the new era.

At the time of Eliot's inauguration, erosion of the old faith had been making way for change at Harvard for more than a generation. Until 1865, Harvard University had administrative ties with the State of Massachusetts. When these ties were cut, selection of the board of overseers fell into the hands of the school's alumni. Some perceived the time had come for Emerson's "American Scholar." With president and governing board ready to work together, a new system was inaugurated at Harvard that required a new kind of educator and a new curriculum.

William Charles Eliot was not a radical. His response to religious formalism reveals perception and sensitivity rather than irreverence and skepticism. He noted that religious teaching and activity seemed to be associated with articles or buildings and felt such religious trappings led to idolatry. Eliot saw in the Church so much show and ritualism that was unrelated to real human problems, and so much pure dogmatism, that he seemed to conclude that there was no basis of truth in Christianity. His was a total rejection of the power of the Church. Christendom, as he saw it, was responsible for oppressing Jews, exploiting the masses, and limiting individual freedom. He envisioned and wrote about a "Religion of the Future"- for he admitted man's need for spirituality, while rejecting the absolute authority of the Bible.

Under Eliot's administration, campus and dormitory regulations were relaxed. The university would no longer take responsibility for moral training. Eliot shared Emerson's faith in the ability of human beings to instinctively know what is good for them. They thought the doctrine of man's inborn bent to evil had been disproved. They believed human nature to be basically good. Young people could achieve more, they believed, if set free to follow their stars. But the new methods and rules were not nearly as significant as the new courses of study and the new faculty brought on to teach them.

Eliot's next step was to appoint new faculty. Eliot's appointees included Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., John Fiske and Charles S. Pierce, but perhaps most notable was Chauncey Wright. Wright was considered by Cambridge colleagues to be a master of the power of analytic intellect and is quoted as saying: "Behind the bare phenomenal facts there is nothing." Wright advanced the theory of evolution and received Charles Darwin's special commendation.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appears to have read Wright's articles and made the centerpieces in The Divine Tragedy and Helen of Tyre Wright was almost certainly the poet's model for Simon Magus the Seer. The inquiring and perceptive reader may wish to consider whether or not the poet had identified the source of Harvard's new education.

In The Christus, published in 1871, Emerson's philosophy is alluded to in Simon Magus' words: "He who knows himself knows all things in himself." Simon Magus' incantation in the same poem strangely echoes the title of Wright's article, "The Uses and Origin of the Arrangement of Leaves." ("I take this orange bough with its five leaves, each equidistant on the upright stem...") In Helen of Tyre, Longfellow seems to have sounded a warning against deception of a spiritually impoverished culture by a Simon Magus in academic garb. Furthermore, a link between Helen of Tyre and Wright's article, "Evolution of Self-Consciousness," is found in Longfellow's notes.

Yet strangely, three volumes of Longfellow's journals, letters and reminiscences edited and published by his brother, Samuel, include nothing to reveal the poet's awareness of the great changes afoot at Harvard. This is indeed a puzzle because Longfellow was active until a few days before he died in 1882. It is to be wondered if the new courses and professors at Harvard may have received more attention than the poet's published papers would lead us to believe. Samuel Longfellow was a Unitarian minister, and may conceivably have believed that suppression of his brother's orthodoxy was the better part of loyalty. The Longfellow papers may some day prove a gold mine for modern research on this dimly lighted era of American history.

Was Longfellow really silent except for a few cryptic lines? Perhaps the mystery of his silence will one day be unravelled.

Next month, the profound implications of Harvard's "flapjack turning" will be shown.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 6 - The Prophets of the Enlightenment

by Ruth Nourse

When America was new, her most promising candidates for pulpit and classrooms were sent to Europe to complete their education. Ralph Waldo Emerson's appeal at Harvard College for a distinctly American scholar would seem to deplore this custom. His complaint that we had listened "too long to the courtly muses of Europe" was quoted and hailed as the wisdom of the hour in certain circles. Yet the real effect of the "reformation" was to make it unnecessary for American scholars to study abroad to attain the new learning. Higher education on this side of the Atlantic was Europeanized, albeit not after the "courtly" tradition.

America's roots grew deep in Europe. Longfellow gathered from there the work of poets who shared his love for God, family, home and the Bible. His anthology, Poets and Poetry of Europe, has never been surpassed as a compilation of traditional European literature, linking Americans with their roots in the Old Country.

While a whole nation of readers were buying more of Longfellow's books than any other, except the Bible, what dominant faculty of his could have prompted dissent from his "enlightened" critics? Considering their attitude toward traditional Christianity, it is not hard to guess.

For more than 200 years the historicity of the Judeo-Christian foundation of civilization was not a question for scholarly debate in America. The Bible in courtroom and classroom was the standard by which truth was measured.

American life was unashamedly Christian, but world-changing philosophies were in store. German and French universities had been revolutionized by the Enlightenment. Americans who studied there were offered a whole new way of viewing the world. Importation of "scientific thought" into major universities began the long battle to restructure the nation's thought and social order. For some, "truth" was related to this purpose rather than to reality.

The history of Europe was well-known to educated Americans in the 19th century. Christian missionaries in the first century had followed Roman roads and trade routes throughout the empire to tell the story of Jesus, the Nazarene, who, though crucified, was alive. Christian teachers devised alphabets for unwritten languages and taught barbarian people to read and write. They had furnished books from which learning could be had.

The trappings of Roman civilization worked no profound change in Anglo-Saxon, Frank, Viking, Scott nor Pict. But long before the Enlightenment something gentled Europe's marauding tribes. The fact that entire tribes, with their kings, received the Christian message and were baptized en masse, cannot be irrelevant. Failure to take account of the Christian history of western civilization seems to be at the root of modern man's confusion.

The record indicates that Rome's civilizing influence would have been swept away if it had not been for the Christian Church. When citizens of the Empire fled before barbarian hordes, to seek safety in Rome, they left fortified government buildings, good roads and decaying manor houses as Rome's only legacy north of the Alps. Christian teaching provided cohesive purpose for the fusion of civilized and barbarian Europeans into nations.

The civilizing influence of Christianity on northern Europe preceded Charlemagne's campaigns against the Saxon warrior-king, Widukind. Charlemagne, king of the Franks ordered the destruction of Widukind's wooden god Irminsul. Methods used by Charlemagne to bring Christianity to all citizens of his vast realm still arouse controversy, but to side against Charlemagne is to opt for pagan chants and charms, warriors cudgels and mud daubed huts, instead of homes, cathedrals and market places in Paris and Berlin. Leaders like Charlemagne made history by melding unwieldy, warring tribes into nations.

In the 19th century, come-lately American prophets of the Enlightenment, such as Emerson and Eliot, found no significance in the fact that Greece and Rome did almost nothing to tame warlike Europeans. Like these, we moderns tend to forget who taught Westerners to reverence the learning that can be had from books. We have no such direct inheritance from Greece and Rome; nor did our forebears go to Rome for inspiration before they knew of that city as the place where the apostles Peter and Paul preached and died.

When scientific inquiry burst into life across Europe, during the 15th and 16th centuries, the men who responded were products of Christian education. In spite of this obvious fact, philosophers of the Enlightenment by-passed Jerusalem and Galilee to return to pre-Christian morality, learning and myths.

Voltaire, Hegel and Rousseau might be cited as products and preachers of the Enlightenment. The man, however, who contributed the most to our vein of thought was the French philosopher, Claude Adrien Helvétius - an associate of Denis Diderot and the Encyclopedists in the ferment of the French Revolution.

Helvétius was the product of the social and moral decline of 18th century France. At the college of Louis le Grand, young Helvétius made friends with Voltaire and the Encyclopedists. In Paris he frequented salons where radicals discussed social issues that would soon throw France into bloody revolution.¹

Helvétius' first book, De l'esprit, was published in 1758. Both civil and religious authorities were angered when the book appeared. They pronounced it "atheistic, sacrilegious, immoral and subversive!"² Nor was De l'esprit applauded by the Encyclopedists, who had urged him to publish outside France.

Their efforts to find a moral code more palatable to the Church became futile when De l'esprit brought their entire movement into conflict with authorities. Helvétius, who held that sexual enjoyment was the greatest of all human pleasures, made self-love the basis of ethics. After his book was published, he was seen as principle spokesman for an "organized philosophic movement that proposed to supplant the Church."³

The philosophy of Helvétius contains the essence of humanism. He defined the object of life as earthly happiness, rather than salvation, and advocated legislation, certainly not preaching, as the means by which happiness for the greatest number would be achieved. He said, "Great virtues are made possible by great passions."⁴ Christianity was in this way construed to be a deterrent to virtue.

Helvétius believed man is entirely a product of his environment,⁵ and will develop according to the cultural pressures to which he is subject. He thought education accounted for all differences between individuals and must be utilized to realize "the ideal of general intelligence, virtue, and happiness." Even though he admitted there was no way to prove this, he said society must act as though it were true.⁶

Denying all absolutes of justice, good and evil, Helvétius held that self-love is the main spring of human action. In his system, the only pleasure that is immoral is one that conflicts with the pleasure of the greatest number.⁷ The final test of any action, then, is its utilitarian value - its use to the public. The ideal government, he believed, would bring the greatest happiness to the greatest number, and universal education would make children useful to such a society.⁸

He advocated legislation of punishments and rewards to force men to contribute to public welfare. Under such a system, he felt only madmen could prevent themselves from being good citizens. Individual preferences and rights are lost to Helvétius in the all-consuming importance of public interest. He believed "only the union, the identification, of private and public interests," and suggested that "fine women" be offered as prizes for publicly beneficial acts. He found Christianity to be at cross-purposes with his entire scheme.⁹

Ralph Waldo Emerson and critics who caviled American literature and education as too heavily dependent on Europe would have been hard put to pursue their own philosophical goals without reference to some European prophet of progress. There is no purpose here to suggest solidarity among the philosophers. Eliot's new appointees at Harvard University were not troubled by incongruities between idealism and rationalism. The common denominator between thinkers who were to dominate American learning seemed to be rejection of biblical truth.

America in the 1980s, to a startling degree, is a product of European "wisdom" tapped by Eliot, Emerson, William James, and men of like mind, who thought to improve America's education and literature as a means of erecting for her a new social order. The index of any textbook of philosophical, political, or social interest gives evidence that Helvétius, Emerson and James have gained stature, even in our own time.

If we can believe the statistics on homelessness, drug abuse, crime, and suicide; obviously the liberal ideas of the Enlightenment have not brought "the greatest happiness to the greatest number." In spite of protests and pressures, government has been unable to squeeze out happiness for even a small number. More "freedom" has not led American scholars to greater accomplishment. Instead, the so-called "reformation" of American learning seemed merely to accomplish rejection of biblical truth.

To the prophets of the Enlightenment, government seemed to dispense less happiness when its taxes were lower and its intrusions fewer. It seems apparent that neither sophistication gained in the classroom nor increased government spending imparted ability to cope with human relationships, irresponsibilities or addictions. When the sum of individual freedoms threatens civic order it takes little imagination to foresee that our choice must lie between chaos and police-state-control, unless self-control has by that time been rediscovered.

Philosophers who engineered the grand scheme of human progress, it should be noted, individually demonstrated no special abilities other than those useful in creating books and social unrest. Having rejected the biblical view of life, they contrived a view more to their liking without benefit of wide experience or wise counsel. For them, the truth of an idea was determined by its usefulness rather than its relationship to reality.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 7 - Darwin's Theory of Evolution: A Recipe for Ideological Warfare

by Ruth Nourse

Segments of this series have traced the subtle infiltration of anti-Christian philosophies into the mainstream of American education. During Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's lifetime, his universal fame as a writer was not dimmed in the least by his outspoken espousal of Christian values. Before his death a handful of vocal critics, at odds with Longfellow and the lifestyle he represented, determined to change the way Americans thought and what they liked to read.

Our last installment zeroed in on the educational advocacy of the philosophers of the Enlightenment. Their contempt for the Bible and the civilizing influences of Christianity shaped the minds of teachers trained in Europe. This month's focus is on Charles Darwin and William Dean Howell's, representatives of a horde of writers who have fully eclipsed those like the poet Longfellow.

Writers find motivation in a number of ways. Some, like the poet Longfellow use skill with a pen to enrich the lives of others. Because readers liked what he wrote, Longfellow became the first American poet to earn fame and fortune in this way. God is present in Longfellow's poetry as Creator and Upholder of all things; Jesus as Savior and Friend of mankind.

Freedom of expression has opened the broad field of American education to writers of every kind for every reason. Some writers are remembered because they gave the world great books. It is to be doubted that all fame for writing has been gained in this way. Some writers may never have surfaced or survived had their work not been promoted and popularized by others, and sustained at tax payer expense, through public libraries and public education.

Honest people tend to judge fellow citizens by standards held for themselves. The concept of "instrumentalism,"¹ for example, wholly escapes the honest mind. When an intellectually honest person encounters vital Truth, he must decide what to do about it. When an instrumentalist discovers any idea that might be labelled "truth," his responsibility is to decide what to do with it. For some among us, truth is what one wants it to be.

Social designers in pursuit of Utopia without God, introduced a brand new concept of truth. The theory of evolution became the truest idea of all by Charles Lyell and Herbert Spencer under the patronage of their freind and mentor, John Stuart Mill.² Evolution seemed to set man free to pursue Utopian dreams, and Darwin's theory became foundational "truth" to a whole new breed of American writers. The forward to a 1964 edition of Origin of Species demonstrates the importance of the theory of evolution:

"The publication of the Origin of Species ushered in a new era in our thinking about the nature of man. The intellectual revolution it caused and the impact it had on man's concept of himself and the world were greater than those caused by the works of Copernicus, Newton, and the greatest physicists of more recent times. Quite rightly, the Origin has been referred to as 'the book that shook the world.'"

Charles Darwin's grandfather, Erasmus Darwin, gained fame as a naturalist by writing Evolution, New and Old. Charles grew up in the tradition of the Anglican Church. Although his mother died when he was only eight, he was surrounded by family and friends who accepted without question the Christian view of life.

Charles' father wanted him to be a doctor, but the boy's interest was all out of doors. The subject that attracted him most at Cambridge University was natural science, especially when field trips were involved. The young naturalist was well acquainted with his grandfather's theory of evolution; and at Cambridge he learned of Lamarck's views on the same subject. In later life, he did not remember that these ideas made any particular impression on him, but added: "Nevertheless it is probable that the hearing rather early in life such views maintained and praised may have favored my upholding them in a different form in my Origin of Species."³

During his last year at Cambridge, Darwin had gained an interest in excursions abroad. In 1831, at age 22, he signed on as a naturalist aboard HMS Beagle sailed with a commission to collect and classify the flora and fauna of British territories in the southern hemisphere.

Although Darwin carried on his work with creditable energy and consistency, it seems he was not nearly so awed by its significance as he was by other developments observed in the southern hemisphere during the expedition. He wrote from the Beagle:

"From seeing the present state, it is impossible not to look forward with high expectation to the future progress of nearly an entire hemisphere. The march of improvement, consequent on the introduction of Christianity throughout the South Sea, probably stands by itself in the records of history."⁴

Upon his return to England in 1836, Darwin prepared the manuscript for the first edition of his Journal. In it he outlined observations, among other things, of the apparent relationship between fossils and living sloths in South America and curious differences in beaks of finches on the several Galapagos Islands and the mainland. It was pointed out to him that tortoises from the different islands differed so much that natives, upon seeing one, could identify the island from which it came.

The second edition, in describing dead and living sloths, adds: "This wonderful relationship in the same continent between the dead and the living will, I do not doubt, hereafter throw more light on the appearance of organic beings on our earth, and their disappearance from it, than any other class of facts."⁵

Twenty-two years after the voyage of the Beagle, Darwin seemed reluctant to go to press with an "evolutionist" point of view. He was still carrying on research, corresponding with farmers, and expanding his notebooks. He seemed to have no inner motivation to write a book, but explained: "Early in 1856, Lyell advised me to write out my views pretty fully. and I began to do so...."⁶

After "thirteen months and ten hard days of labor" Origin of Species was published in 1859. This is the book that "shook the world."

Darwin did not write as a man burning with the enthusiasm of new discovery, rather he "shuddered" to think he might have been pursuing an illusion.⁷ The mystery unravels in the light of the utilitarian doctrine that every action must be directed toward a definite purpose.⁸ Darwinism was incubated, hatched and propagated by utilitarians who designed to assault the Judeo-Christian foundations of western civilization.

One cannot read about the development or the propagation of the theory of evolution without being impressed with the total "utility" of the notion. In the barest outline of the theory and in Darwin's work to support it, one seldom gets far from argument with biblical creationism. Early proponents of evolution seem super-sensitive to the implications of their point of view as related to all aspects of Christian tradition. According to utilitarian and instrumentalist definition, the idea would seem "true enough."

Truth in fiction

A relationship between Darwin's work and that of the writer and editor, William Dean Howell's may seem inappropriate. Yet they have an important aspect in common: Both suggested that "truth" was open for review. As a novelist, Howell's caused his readers to contemplate the unthinkable and savor the socially unacceptable.

While truth in fiction seems an anomaly, the novel was first used as a means of conveying "great ideas in an attractively romantic form." The earliest novels were based on Christian themes from the miracle plays of the middle ages. Milton's Paradise Lost and Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress use a fictional plot to present Christian truth. A similar technique was used by Daniel Defoe to bring Christian witness in Robinson Crusoe. Later during the 19th century, the novel was used more and more to popularize atheism and immorality.

Howells, who was a leading member of the new cultural elite, moved with his wife and children to Cambridge in 1866, three years before Eliot's "turned the flapjack" at Harvard. As editor of the Atlantic Monthly and Harper's Weekly, his influence spanned the decades from 1880 to 1920. Yearly novels written under contract for Harper's dealt with such themes as marriage on the rocks (in an era when divorce was almost unheard of), spiritualism, communal living, and crime in society "that in itself is the primary felon." Because Howells became a prime mover in America's social revolution and its new literature, his story must be told.

The Black Heart's Truth, by John W. Crowley (1985), unfolds William Howell's early life. Chapter titles identify another unhappy, misaligned young American: "A Very Morbid Childhood," "The Blackness of Insanity," and "Complicated Purposes." Crowley writes: "I saw in Howells one of the best minds of his generation destroyed by madness, starving, hysterical, naked ... Most of Howell's childhood recollections had a hellish cast."⁹

Howells' impressions of childhood were not gained from a home like Longfellow's. He wrote: "If heaven lies about us in our infancy ... hell borders hard upon boyhood ... and the air of its long summer days which men look back on so fondly is foul as with exhalations from the Pit."¹⁰

Howells skimmed the surface of life in such a way as to avoid eruptions from the depths of his deeply troubled psyche. He was more apt to be shallow than despondent. The first series of his articles to be widely circulated told about his life as consul in Venice and left no doubt that he was the traditional man of letters. The Atlantic was a prestigious journal and when he became its editor, Cambridge friends accepted him as "heir apparent" to literary leadership. They were not surprised when he was offered Lowell's chair as professor of literature and modern languages at Harvard.

Howells recalled in Literary Friends and Acquaintances that he moved to Cambridge in the summertime: "In those days, the men whose names had given splendor to Cambridge were still living there." James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., Richard Dana, Charles Norton, Nathaniel Greene, Howells, and occasionally others, enjoyed convivial sessions that always ended around Longfellow's well-laid table.

Howell's memoirs include a charming description of Longfellow as the gracious host, thoughtful of the happiness and comfort of his guests, speaking little himself, but guiding the conversation skillfully to include everyone. Indeed, the young man from Ohio added his unqualified approbation to the testimony of others: "He would not judge evil or think evil ... I never saw a fault in him."

It seems somehow incongruent that this author and literary critic, who was to do much to change the face of American literature, spent the happiest times of his life in company with Longfellow in old Cambridge.¹¹ Perhaps Howells never dreamed millions of Americans shared Longfellow's faith in the work of Providence among men. Having been brought up to believe that the government was somehow responsible for the happiness of its citizens, he must have imagined that he could help to bring about a Utopia where such happiness as Longfellow's could be generally known among the masses.

When he could have stepped into Lowell's place at Harvard under Eliot's administration, Howells chose instead the role of editor, novelist and literary critic. By 1890, he was recognized as "dean of American letters." He became America's first great literary critic; but unlike Poe, he only had praise for Longfellow.

Reformers in Boston in the 1880s were no longer viewed as wild-eyed radicals. They had learned to mingle with the right people and apply for the right jobs. Harvard professors, William James, Howells, Oliver W. Holmes, Jr., Charles S. Peirce and others talked about the new America and the new ideas leading thereto. They noted that educated Americans were losing interest in public life and purposed to rally the younger generation to awareness of the issues. Darwinism, progressivism, world peace, and even dietary reform became their causes.

Harvard professor, William James, urged adherents to the new thought to be emancipated from "chauvinistic patriotism" and to be "bound by no party allegiance." He called on new era activists to use their vote to tip the scales in "favor of rationality and righteousness." Addressing the Harvard Graduate School in 1902 on the critical function of the educated class in public affairs, James suggested they were responsible to offer "small but incessant criticisms." On another such occasion, he counselled his hearers to "manipulate catch words."¹²

Whatever forwards the liberal cause, in the mind of a true pragmatist or instrumentalist, is righteousness. For them, words become "truth" as they accomplish the purpose of the speaker. "Truth" is in this way disassociated from its historical roots and becomes related to purpose rather than to reality. Evolution in this way became both a theory of origins and a new orientation to life - life with no absolutes and no ultimates.

Hijacking of American Education: Part 8 - History as Truth

by Ruth Nourse

If it is possible in a courtroom to judge a defendant guilty or innocent, or in a laboratory to discover the relationship between physical properties and phenomena, it must be possible to know the truth about history.

The word "history," according to Webster, is related to the Greek historia, "a learning by inquiry." The word "skeptic" also comes from the Greek skeptesthai, meaning to examine or consider. A true skeptic is a "considerer" who will not pass judgment before the evidence has been thoughtfully examined.

In a world of sunshine and rain and natural beauty beyond measure, who is so cynical as to refuse to examine available evidence of the work of a Creator God in the history of man? For the open minded scholar the possibility of God's presence in history is not unthinkable.

Page Smith points out in his book, History and Historians, that the Jews discovered history. For them chronology was transcended by the relation of a people with their God. The meaning, purpose and direction of history was found in God's will and their Messianic expectation.

According to the Old Testament view, man is able to effect his own destiny in partnership with God. The New Testament demonstrates and affirms the validity of this view. According to the gospels, Messianic hopes of the Hebrew Scriptures were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; the Abrahamic covenant, according to Paul's writings, was made universal through faith in Him.

Eusebius, the first important Christian historian, saw history as the unfolding of God's purpose in the world. The verifiable experience of millions alive today supports this view - a view held since ancient times and, until our century, as the prevalent view of western historians.

Those who have seen God's plan unfold in their own lives, find no reason to doubt Columbus' claim that expeditions to undiscovered lands were undertaken as a divine mission. Samuel Eliot writes of Columbus: "His frequent communion with forces unseen was a vital element in his achievement."

Intelligent purpose gives meaning to history and links believers of all generations in the on-going expansion of God's kingdom on earth. Understanding this, we can readily accept what early colonists wrote of divine purpose in the settlement of America. In America, a new, and specifically Christian, start was made.

Generations of English and European peoples were motivated in pursuit of sound government by a Bible based concept of justice. Before the settlement of New England, however, achievement along this line had been both remarkable and disappointing. Success and failure had been their mixed experience. The tyranny of the institutional church had proved as hard to bear as tyranny of kings.

Jamestown, the first colony in the new world, was almost exclusively profit motivated. Thoughtful consideration finds in the Jamestown experience inadequate impetus to explain the settlement of the continent much less the nation that grew here from such small beginnings. That first colony's inability to cope with famine, sickness, hostile Indians, and chronic infighting among promoters and colonial leaders held no lamp of hope to bring throngs of would-be settlers willing to take the attendant risks.

Schemes to enlist Jamestown emigrants included suppression of facts about what colonists actually suffered in Virginia. Disillusionment provided no emotional stimulus for survival, and the colony struggled for years on the brink of disaster. The Jamestown episode fails to explain the resilience and success of colonial America.

The experience of the Mayflower Pilgrims, who landed at Plymouth in 1620, more adequately accounts for the survival and productivity of early American colonies and for the continual flow of immigrants to these shores. Doubters need only read the first line of the Mayflower Compact to confirm the faith of the Pilgrims.

It was a broad faith demonstrated by 102 hardy souls who knelt with William Bradford to ask journeying mercies before their little ship set sail and, again - as they viewed their new homeland - to thank God for delivering them from the "vast and furious ocean." Prayer was not their only demonstration of faith. Hardships that broke the spirit of the colonists at Jamestown drew the Pilgrims closer together and caused them to pray more fervently.

Why must we doubt the testimony of the colonists themselves, who believed that God prepared the way before them and sustained them in the new land? Can the sequence of events that accompanied their coming be explained in a better way? Could such a series of enabling circumstances be expected to burst by chance into the stream of history?

Hostile Indians had been removed from Plymouth by a mysterious plague four years before the Mayflower landed. Apart from this "preparation" for their coming, the sea-wary strangers would have landed among unfriendly Native Americans. Nearly half the Pilgrims died the first winter, yet the faith of the survivors was not diminished.

The turning point at Plymouth came when Samoset, an amiable Algonquin chieftain, brought Squanto to the colony. Stolen away from those very forests by English traders before the plague, Squanto gained a knowledge of the English language and lifestyle by the time he found a way back to his childhood home. Finding none of his own people alive, he spent six months with the Algonquins, seeming not to know which way to turn.

Squanto found new purpose in life as he taught the English settlers how to plant crops, harvest fish and otherwise survive in a perilous environment. Without this native guidance, Plymouth might well have suffered losses like those at Jamestown, where the mortality rate the second year was nine out of ten. The Mayflower Pilgrims recognized God's providence in all this; but the story is seldom told as originally written in William Bradford's account Of Plimouth Plantation.

Providential reward of faith was claimed in the same way by Puritans who arrived on New England shores ten years later. In 1630, John Winthrop was sent as governor with colonists to reinforce the Massachusetts Bay Colony's languishing settlement at Salem. Shocked by the appearance of gaunt and ragged survivors who met him at the shore, Winthrop may have considered returning to England had he not remembered the clear purpose with which his band of Puritans had set sail.

They were people of faith, and their purpose would be achieved in spite of distressing circumstances. The governor outlined his plan for overcoming adversity in a bold and noble sermon entitled "A Model of Christian Charity."

"For this end we must knit together in this work as one man ... We must hold a familiar commerce together in all meekness, gentleness, patience, and liberality. We must delight in each other, make one another's condition our own, rejoice together, mourn together, labor and suffer together, always having before our eyes our Commission and Community in this work, as members of the same body. So shall we keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace ...

"We shall find that the God of Israel is among us, when ten of us shall be able to resist a thousand of our enemies, when He shall make us a praise and glory, that men of succeeding plantations shall say, 'The Lord make it like that of New England.' For we must consider that we shall be as a City upon a Hill ..."

Pilgrim and Puritan colonists, in the characteristic manner of Christian believers, held to the Hebraic view of history. Experience of other early settlers in America, their compacts, the founding documents of the several Colonies, and of the United States, demonstrate that the character and the faith of her first leaders was like that of the Pilgrims and Puritans.

Such was the faith perpetuated by America's early literature and the textbooks of her schools. The first book printed by Harvard Press was The Whole Booke of Psalmes "Faithfully translated into English metre." That the faith of the early colonists reigned well into the 19th century is a fact born out by the universal popularity of Longfellow's writings and McGuffey's readers.

It seems evident that devotion and sincerity diminished in proportion to an increase of hypocrisy in life and formalism in worship. Departure from living faith contributed to the instability of the times. Society seemed to depend on enforcement, rather than demonstration, of Christian virtue. Objectivity was forgotten in a subjective purpose to throw off uncomfortable restraints.

Once freedom to do good had been enough, now freedom was granted to do almost anything one wished to attempt. With several generations of results to observe, we may consider more objectively what have been the consequences of rejecting the Bible as the measure of truth. Note that the emphasis here is on the Bible as the basis for faith. Confusion over religious dogma, tradition, ritual has divided Christians for centuries and has undoubtedly discouraged many honest inquirers.

Wisdom in our day is to distinguish between truth and religious verbage in the present as well as in history. Differences over dogma, tradition, and the conduct of people who wear Christian labels confuse the real issue, which is: The Bible either tells the truth about the origin and nature of man, and actual events of history, or it does not. Those who say they have experienced God's intervention in their lives, just as people did in Bible times, are either telling the truth or they are not.

Probably no other human experience has ever been so commonly reported, and at the same time so flippantly discounted. True historians, according to the etymology of the word, will learn by inquiry what has actually happened, rather than distort the record to accomplish some preconceived purpose.

Megatrends authors predict spiritual awakening for the 1990s

By Jay Rogers
9/90

John Naisbitt and Patricia Aburdene, authors of Megatrends 2000 (the follow-up to the 1982 bestseller, Megatrends), have included a chapter in their new book entitled "Religious Revival of the Third Millenium," which describes the "unmistakable signs of a worldwide multi-denominational religious revival."

According to Naisbitt and Aburdene, "The bond we share today with the people of past millenial eras is the sense of living in a time of enormous change. The last time the United States experienced such a deeply religious period was during the nineteenth century, when the country's economy changed from agriculture to industry ... When people are buffeted about by change, the need for spiritual belief intensifies."

The "God is dead" philosophy of the past is being quickly replaced. "With the millenium in sight, the powerful countertrend of the religious revival is repudiating blind faith in science and technology."

Along with a recent upsurge of millenarianism in the Church (the belief in a literal millenium in which Christ rules the earth), huge increases have been experienced in church membership, especially among Evangelical and Charismatic denominations. With the explosive growth continuing, many baby boomers are leaving the staid, conservative "mainline" churches of their upbringing.

Naisbitt and Aburdene conclude that a religious revival will continue as we approach the year 2000. A "global phenomenon" is taking place that will replace modernism and a reliance on science; "the ideal of progress has given way to the return of faith."

Editor's note: Megatrends 2000 gives a highly perceptive view of the future which will probably prove to be exceptionally accurate. We do not, however, endorse the "new age" worldview offered by the authors.

Why do we need the printed word?

By Jay Rogers

In the early days of America, newspapers often printed sermons preached from the pulpits of the local churches in the colonies. The pastors and Christian leaders of that day knew that it was important to be continually getting the printed word out to the people. The Christian world view was so prevalent at that time that almost everyone thought according to godly principles.

You can see this in the writings of the Founding Fathers. A Christian view of every area of life was held to - you can see it in the art and literature of the day, as well as in the form of government they devised. The truth of God was diffused into every area of life.

The literature that was going out at that time was teaching the American people on a day-to-day basis the biblical principles of what God had to say about society. This created a sentiment in our society that produced the Revolutionary War and our form of democratic government.

Now it is sad to say that unlike centuries ago, most Christians put little or no emphasis on the printed word. We don't see a need for it. Most of our literature evangelism is limited to a few tracts telling people how to get saved or saying the four spiritual laws. We are limited to a salvation only message. Now it's very important to get people saved before we can really change our society from the inside out, but the salvation-only message is not what The Forerunner is all about.

The purpose of The Forerunner is to saturate the market place of ideas - the university campuses - with a Christian world view that applies to every area of life. When this Christian world view is spoken on a consistent basis - not only will many be saved - but we can expect the hearts and minds of the students to be affected and changed on a larger scale.

The Influence of the Printed Word

In the 1700s, the Great Awakening came to an end because of the influx of rationalistic thinking from Europe in the form of literature. Revival waned because books containing the philosophy of the Enlightenment were disbursed on the college campuses by the ton. Books containing rationalistic principles were given out to the students for a few pennies. If they wouldn't buy them they would be given to them for free.

The effect on U.S. colleges was disastrous. Students looking for an excuse to rebel against Christianity embraced Rationalism. Bible colleges became centers of skepticism. Students formed societies calling themselves by the names of the French philosophers of the Enlightenment. One group forced the resignation of a Bible college president. Another group attempted to blow up a campus building. This sounds like the 1960s, but it was the late 1700s!

The Second Great Awakening

Certain Christians had the courage to fight this trend and the Second Great Awakening broke out in the early 1800s. It should come as no surprise to you at this point to know that the leader of the Second Great Awakening, Peter Cartwright, believed that the distribution of Christian literature was the force that seeded this awakening.

Peter Cartwright was a Methodist circuit rider who would travel on horseback in Kentucky and the other western states of America and preach. This is what Peter Cartwright said:

"For more than 50 years, I have always believed that it is part and parcel of a Christian's sacred duty to circulate religious literature. The press is destined to minister salvation's grace to the perishing millions of the earth."

20th Century America

The difference between this time period and 20th century America, is that Christians have done little to sow seed in the form of the printed word. To make matters worse, while the Church has been sleeping, tares have sprung up in abundance.

Daniel Webster, the 19th century American statesman, saw a disturbing trend. Listen to this quote and ask yourself if this is what has become of America:

"If religious books are not widely circulated among the masses in this country, I do not know what is going to become of us as a nation. If truth be not diffused, then error will be. If God and His Word are not known and received, the devil and his works will gain the ascendancy. If the evangelical volume does not reach every hamlet, the pages of a corrupt and licentious literature will. If the power of the gospel is not felt throughout the length and breadth of this land, anarchy and misrule, degradation and misery, corruption and darkness will reign without mitigation or end."

Daniel Webster saw it coming. The disturbing trend was that Christians weren't getting the printed word out to the people. Daniel Webster feared that the devil would soon come in and sow the seeds of corruption in America.

So what is the most effective way to turn the tide of evil in the late 20th century?

Literature containing the Truth of God's Word needs to be disbursed among the students. When God's truth is presented in any form, it will always gain ascendancy over the godless philosophies of the world because it is the Truth of God. The main result of getting literature out is to change the students' thinking. If we don't confront the students thinking through the printed word then godless philosophies will definitely win out.

What is a practical plan to start saturating your campus with Forerunners?

The only obstacle is raising the money. But as the numbers of Forerunners increase, the price per newspaper goes down. At 15 cents a copy, 1000 Forerunners are $150. And consider that doing this is like having 10 full time evangelists out on campus every month. Then realize that there are a couple of practical ways to raise the money to do this:

- * Raise money from churches and Christian groups in your area.

- * People in your church may be willing to support monthly campaigns to saturate the campuses. (If 6 people gave $25 a month this would equal 1000 Forerunners).

If every Christian in America understood the importance of getting the printed word out to the people, we would see the same effect that has happened throughout history. And our nation would be changed for all time and eternity.

"And the one on whom the seed was sown on the good soil, this is the man who hears the word and understands it; and indeed bears fruit, and brings forth, some a hundredfold, some sixty, and some thirty."

The New Millennium - By Pat Robertson

Book review by Gavin Quill
12/90

Pat Robertson's latest work is a literary Trojan horse. Its misleading apocalyptic title is certain to attract many of those who may be predisposed to reject its message. The New Millennium is not for everyone - but it is great literature which forces the reader to think beyond the fluff of the oft-repeated but seldom analyzed ear-tickling theories of the day. The problem is getting that literature into the hands of those of us whose minds are already made up.

Our habit is to pick up only those books with compelling or intriguing titles, or those which sound like they will be safely within the range of our comfortable philosophical predilections. The New Millennium is certainly a dramatic title on par with The Late Great Planet Earth, The Terminal Generation, or Countdown to Armageddon, but Robertson's choice of modest, historically rooted prognostication over sweeping, fancy-driven speculation, will certainly not satisfy the eschatological sweet-tooths of those of us hooked on A Thief In The Night or Prodigal Planet.

So be forewarned, if you've already bought your rapture robe, you probably won't want to buy this book. Or, if the fact that Satan is Alive and Well on Planet Earth means to you that it's too dangerous to actively confront the prevailing social evils of our nation, then you probably won't want to subject yourself to Robertson's ravings about a Sovereign God who orchestrates world events and equips His Church universal to transform adversity into opportunity.

And if you feel that political action is unspiritual, that to choose Harvard University over Dallas Seminary is something less than spiritual, or that being neither "of" nor "in" the world is spiritual, then this book is not for you. No wait! I take that back.

The New Millennium is truly an intellectual tour de force, blending together a potpourri of essential truths from a wide assortment of academic disciplines. Its 300+ pages provide a good dose of basic world history and elementary economics backed up with a plethora of facts and figures. The book assumes that a clear understanding of both where we have come from and how we got here are essential prerequisites for those who desire to step out boldly to fulfill God's will in this generation.

Robertson likes to get a good running start down a track of empirical evidence before leaping into the realm of the theoretical, the speculative, or the predictive. Accordingly, he offers us at least a skin deep historical summary of the major spiritual, philosophical, cultural and governmental trends which have affected mankind, especially in recent centuries.

Looking forward, we are presented with ten "megatrends" which will dominate the 1990s, labeled "The Decade of Opportunity," and set the stage for the centuries to come unless Jesus returns. These ten can be boiled down into three categories:

1. The collapse of world communism and the fall of secular humanism in the West, consummating trends which have already begun.
2. A surge of interest in the supernatural, both through Spirit-revived Christianity and satanically empowered Hindu/New Age movements, both of which have already begun to manifest.
3. A long term shift of economic, military and cultural dominance from Western Civilization to the Orient, slowest to come and probably hardest for us to envision.

Robertson believes that the collapse of communism "presents the Christian Church with an opportunity as great as it experienced at the fall of the Roman Empire." A strategic void is being created that could leave as many as 1.5 to 2 billion people spiritually naked. Pascal's "God-shaped vacuum" is being revealed not just in the bosom of men, but in the hearts of whole nations.

The Gospel of salvation exists in these countries, kept alive by faithful underground churches that have been purged and prepared by the fires of persecution. These nations want to know how Christianity applies not just to their individual lives, but the whole of their society.

They are looking to their American brethren for answers, but as Robertson points out, "We have been woefully lacking in that kind of teaching ourselves. There are very few Christians in America who have an intelligent concept of citizenship or of the way that God would have us relate to the body politic."

Eastern Europe is temporarily a blank slate, with no heritage of Biblical constitutional government from which to draw. We are the nation with the deepest wells of public policy, yet we have spent the past thirty years plugging up our own life springs.

The challenge is for Christians to proudly resurrect the biblical principles of civil government championed by our Founding Fathers, and then to carry them to those fertile lands where they will not be despised, as they are in their birthplace today, but rather cherished and zealously applied. If this can be achieved, then Robertson envisions a revived Eastern Europe as a possible springboard for a last chance assault of Christianity upon a cynical and completely irreligious Western Europe.

Not only will communism collapse, but so also will its philosophical bedfellow, secular humanism, the unofficial religion of the United States and Western Europe is enjoying its final years of predominance. Popular because it promised us mastery over our own destinies, if we exiled God to museum shelves and mythology courses, death looms near humanism because it has failed to deliver on its promise.

By rejecting man's spiritual nature, it failed to meet his spiritual needs, and thus brought chaos instead of progress, confusion instead of enlightenment. Three hundred years of warfare between rationalism and faith are almost over. Faith will soon win, but what kind of faith?

Robertson predicts that "there is going to be a sudden and overwhelming rise of religious beliefs in this country. We are going to witness a spiritual awakening of religious belief in this country. We are going to witness a spiritual awakening of inconceivable proportions."

However, he does not believe that humanists will automatically turn to faith in Christ, because "it would mean a loss of pride and prestige. They can't go with traditional Christianity which they rejected, so they will choose to embrace the secular religion of self-actualization, self-realization, and other New Age type religious concepts born out of Hinduism.

This new religion seems to be "tailor made for a secular elite looking for a philosophy." Therefore, the great battle of the 1990s "will not be between belief and unbelief, but between one form of evil and another. It will be faith in God versus faith in the devil."

The next decade will see a shocking outpouring of demonic power against biblical Christians. "We can expect to witness satanic miracles, signs, wonders and manifestations in the not-too-distant future." This, of course, is standard fare for the "Apocalypse Now" and "I'll Fly Away" school of theology. However, Robertson challenges prevailing defeatist orthodoxy by declaring that at the same time "the power of God will be alive in the Church and we will also see some incredible signs and wonders through the power of the Holy Spirit.

In this atmosphere, "the intellectual theology of doubters and equivocators will die of self-inflicted wounds ... the mainline will move to the sideline," and compromising churches will be left defenseless because "God will not submit His Spirit to churches that are dead."

Finally, Robertson presents an intriguing analysis of historical cycles of civilization which he believes have recently begun a slow but steady shift from the West to the Orient. "the East is rising because the people there have embraced hard work, a disciplined life, individual initiative, family values, and in most cases, strong religious faith."

Meanwhile, the West is declining for lack of these same qualities. If we do not change radically and quickly, "America will soon reach a point from which it cannot recover until after the massive judgment of God is visited upon it."

"However, even if traditional Western civilization based on Christianity should be diminished, Christianity itself will not be." Rather, it will explode through new cultures in exciting new ways. Robertson's conclusion points to the future while refuting a myth from the past: "Christianity is not a Western religion. Christianity will flourish worldwide in the new Millennium."

The New Millennium challenges our global pessimism and local paralysis with global optimism and local realism concerning God's prospects for victory over Satan within history. The line is clearly drawn, but do we fear to cross it? Any takers?

BU President John Silber Takes Aim at America

A Book Review By Gavin Quill

Straight Shooting by John Silber, Harper Perennial: Division of Harper-Collins Publishers. Paperback: $10.95

John Silber's national bestseller Straight Shooting proves that not all philosophers have forgotten how to speak in layman's terms about the real challenges confronting our nation in the 1990s. In fact, if he didn't tell you he was a philosopher, you might have thought he was an ordinary academic like you, struggling to discover effective solutions to the myriad problems facing society today. If you're worried that Dean Silber might shoot straight over your head with a lofty treatise intended to instruct doctoral candidates in the ethereal ways of abstract philosophy, you can relax.

Silber speaks in a practical, relevant, and no-holds-barred manner to most of the key problems plaguing 20th century America. While many of his shots only hit the edge of the target, he offers sobering diagnoses and often radical prescriptions well worth considering. Even where he misses completely, his arguments are compelling and are not easily dismissed. Though often wide of the mark, his solutions reveal substantially correct principles which only lack proper application. And with so many of our academic and public policy marksmen shooting with ideological blindfolds on, even Silber's most errant efforts seem relatively accurate by comparison.

Crime, drugs, alienation, promiscuity and poverty at home, coupled with a declining ability to effectively compete abroad; these are the well-known symptoms of the deterioration of our society. As President of Boston University, Silber not surprisingly believes that education is the primary cure for what ails us.

Loud cries of opposition are soon heard, however, when the content of Dr. Silber's proposed curriculum is detailed. In addition to the 3 R's, it seems our maverick metaphysician believes that such antiquated concepts such as morality, integrity, humility, character and self-discipline are desperately needed in our classrooms from nursery to post-doc. The immoral, the untrustworthy, the arrogant, the weak-willed and the libertine are all outraged.

Silber posits that "on many moral and social issues we can observe laws of natural sequence as predictable and as certain as any to be found in the natural sciences." In other words, we are all bound by the reality of moral cause and effect, just as we are bound by gravity. What a man sows, he will also reap. Obey and be blessed; or assert your "autonomy" and deal with the predictable consequences. Effective education must clearly illustrate "the essential role of virtue in the attainment of happiness," as well as the stark truth that "the degenerate society consumed in pleasure-seeking will not survive." The wages of sin is death.

Education, of course, is not wholly or even principally the jurisdiction of the public schools, but at least equally the responsibility of families and churches. Unfortunately, many parents have abandoned their educational duties. Schools have attempted to fill in for delinquent parents, but this can have dangerous repercussions if leftist pedagogues are allowed to reprogram children with their vision of the new socialist/humanist morality so prevalent among the educational 'elite' who write textbooks and run teacher's colleges.

Silber declares: "It is essential that (schools) not undermine the serious moral teaching that takes place in sound families. Along with the rejection of false values, it is the task of the school system to support the principles we learn from sound families, and from religion ..." Dr. Silber is obviously not trying to get himself nominated as man of the year by the ACLU.

Silber's support of traditional moral values and his numerous recognitions of religion's vital role in the betterment of our lives, place him on the radical fringe of society's educational, political, and media elites. However, given the placement of these elites on the distant leftward fringes of the social/moral/political spectrum of our nation, this probably means that John Silber is safely situated somewhere in the center, next to Joe and Jane average-American. That's a long way from Jesse Jackson, Mike Dukakis, Mario Cuomo and most of the rest of Silber's compatriots at the top of the Democratic Party, but it is not too far away from the average voter, whether Democratic, Independent, or Republican.

Straight Shooting has taken aim at a lot of cherished preconceptions concerning the priorities that a free people must pursue if they wish to maintain their freedom. This is a watershed book full of specific, practical solutions to the most daunting social ills confronting our nation. It will challenge any individual who dares to pick it up, and any institution that is willing to consider creative new applications of timeless principles and proven policies.

I would suspect that both major political parties will be carefully scrutinizing John Silber's platform for national renewal, and that sizeable portions of his thinking will be incorporated into their party platforms for the 1992 presidential elections. If so, the political process and the nation as a whole stand to benefit handsomely. Nice shot, John!

South African Forerunner Premieres

By Jay Rogers
9/93

BRAAMFONTEIN, South Africa (FR) - A glossy, 16-page magazine, The Forerunner: Preparing The New South African, has premiered in South Africa with three issues thus far in 1993. The staff, made up of South Africans and American missionaries, plans to produce a quarterly publication. The magazine has been conceived as an outreach to youth, university students, political leaders and businessmen.

Many of the articles which have appeared in The Forerunner: Preparing The New South African have been reprinted from The Forerunner USA. Other articles have included prophetic and evangelistic articles written with a South African campus audience in mind. Recent articles have included: "The Framework for a Free, Just and Prosperous New South Africa"; "Love, Lust or Romance?"; "Racial Reconciliation"; "Economics: Weighing the Cost"; and "The Massacre of Innocence: Abortion."

This new ministry was originally envisioned by American missionary Dawson Lewis who first went to South Africa in 1990 as a full-time administrator for Maranatha Church of South Africa. Maranatha Church recently merged with a smaller campus outreach on the University of Johannesburg, His People Christian Ministries, which has established churches in four major cities in South Africa.

His People Christian Ministries has a plan for the political and economic restructuring of South Africa according to biblical principles. The Johannesburg church recently sponsored the Symposium for the Biblical Reconstruction of South Africa. His People includes high school and university campus ministry in their strategy to reach the new generation of South African leadership with the gospel.

Although The Forerunner USA was not integrally involved in the birthing of the South African magazine, managing editor, Nicky Becker, has made an appeal for equipping and training in the future. She wrote in a recent fax: "We would very much like to link up with you. In the first place, it is difficult to find international information as South Africa is still very isolated. We also have a great need for training from someone as experienced as yourself."

The Forerunner: Preparing The New South African will be an effective tool to plant the seed of biblical reformation in the hearts and minds of the next generation of South African leadership.

For more information on how you can help with the training and equipping of young people who are producing international versions of The Forerunner, turn to the back page.

The Story of Liberty

By Charles Carleton Coffin

415 pages - High Quality Paperback

The Story of Liberty explains the "why" of America. It is the story of 500 years of progress from the signing of the Magna Carta to the signing of the Mayflower Compact upon the Pilgrims' arrival at Plymouth.

This powerful classic provides the missing link in understanding America's Christian history. It helps the Declaration of Independence make sense. It helps the Constitution make sense. It helps the story of America to make sense. First printed shortly after America's 100th birthday, in 1876, The Story of Liberty lays the ground work for children to understand the price paid for Liberty, to understand its value and why our founding fathers did all they could to protect it.

The Story of Liberty is educational; it brings ideas and principles to children in a simple, life-like manner. But adults can also benefit from it - many can hardly put it down once they start reading. It is both enjoyable and powerful. It shows what makes America different: the hand of God laying the foundation of our nation.

Publisher Rose Weiner's children begged her to keep reading it. Her daughter Stephanie cried when Rose read the story of John Huss being burned at the stake. "Why did liberty cost so much?" she asked. Rose's son, John David, wondered if he could do what Huss had done.

For the first time they understood what liberty cost and what it was worth.

We are free today because of what these men and women did. Children today need Godly heroes. They need men and women of valor to imitate. This is what the Story of Liberty is about.

"No Reply" - By Leo Tolstoy

It happened with me as it happens with everyone who contracts a fatal internal disease. At first there were the insignificant symptoms of the ailment, which the patient ignores; then these symptoms recur more and more frequently, until they merge into one continuous duration of suffering. The suffering increases, and before he can turn around the patient discovers what he already knew: the thing he had taken for a mere disposition is in fact the most important thing on earth to him, is in fact death.

This is exactly what happened to me. I realized that this was not an incidental ailment but something very serious, and that if the same questions should continue to recur, I would have to answer them. And I tried to answer them. The questions seemed to be such foolish, simple, childish questions. But as soon as I laid my hands on them and tried to resolve them, I was immediately convinced, first of all, that they were not childish and foolish questions but the most vital and profound questions in life, and, secondly, that no matter how much I pondered them there was no way I could resolve them.

Before I could be occupied with my Samara estate, with the education of my son, or with the writing of books, I had to know why I was doing these things. As long as I do not know the reason why, I cannot do anything. In the middle of my concern with the household, which at the time kept me quite busy, a question would come into my head: "Very well, you have 16,000 acres in the Samara province, as well as 300 horses; what then?" And I was completely taken aback and did not know what else to think.

As soon as I started to think about the education of my children, I would ask myself, "Why?" Or I would reflect on how the people might attain prosperity, and I would suddenly ask myself, "What concern is it of mine?" or in the middle of thinking about the fame that my works were bringing me I would say to myself, "Very well, you will be more famous than Gogol, Pushkin, Shakespeare, Moliere, more famous than all the writers in the world - so what?"

And I could find absolutely no reply.

Twenty-six lead soldiers

WHAT FAMOUS AMERICAN MADE THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT?

"Give me 26 lead soldiers and I will conquer the world."

- A) Andrew Jackson
- B) George C. Patton
- C) Douglas MacArthur
- D) Benjamin Franklin

The Answer: Benjamin Franklin!

Franklin knew that a printing press loaded with the 26 letters of the alphabet had more power than loaded guns when it came to revolution. So did Karl Marx. The world hasn't yet recovered from the changes he began with only ink and paper.

The printed word is a powerful medium; a God-given invention designed to fuel a different type of revolution. Centuries after Gutenberg invented the moveable type to produce the Bible, the printing press is still one of the most strategic, front-line weapons ever created for dispersing truth in a deep and enduring way. Christian literature still helps to fuel revolution all over the world.

Today we are on the brink of a new revolution: one that will involve cutting-edge technologies such as the personal computer, fiber-optics networks, digitalized sound and video, satellite transmissions and even holographic images.

In the days of America's First Great Awakening to the time of the American Revolution to today, the written word has remained all important. It is the foundation for every form of transmitted knowledge. The literature that is about to emerge will not be persuasive words of wisdom, but words that demonstrate the power of the Holy Spirit - God's writing fire!

We will soon witness the emergence of the world's greatest and most influential literature - literature that will captivate the heart of the common people and confront them with the reality of Jesus Christ. The ungodly philosophies of men like Marx, Darwin and Nietzsche will be driven off the face of the earth.

The Bible declares that Christian ideology will ultimately rule the whole world ... but this conquest will not be forced on people as in the manner of political systems. This ideology will come by being expounded in written words. As it was said in the time of Israel's King David, it will be said of our generation:

"The Lord gave the word: great was the company of those that published it."

The War of the Words

By Jay Rogers

How many people today are aware of the extent to which the printed word affects the destiny of a nation?

There was a group of writers in London around the turn of the century called the Fabian socialists. These were men such as George Bernard Shaw, H.G. Wells and Sidney Webb. Now the Fabians rejected the Word of God as the basis for society. They figured that Christianity had had almost 2000 years to perfect society and that it hadn't fared that well. So the Fabians decided that man could be perfected through changing his environment. They thought if they eliminated the working class, tore down the hills of affluence and filled in the valleys of poverty, that all of England's social ills would be cured.

These writers didn't talk about sin and the need for repentance - that was too theological. They talked about the hidden potential for good in man, the idea of material progress and the evolution of society toward a new world order. They heralded the dawning of the 20th century as a new era of advancement in human progress. But they forgot to consider man's incredible potential for evil as well, as they promoted Marxist doctrine in England in the hope of doing something good for their society.

In 1883, a group of 16 men met in a parlour and had discussions "groping for some kind of secular faith to replace the old God-given certainties." The Fabians plan was to create a socialist state in England by promoting Marxist and Darwinist doctrines in the form of literature. Much of the curriculum in our American universities today is based on the teachings of these sixteen men and women.

George Bernard Shaw was a playwright whose most famous work is Pygmalion, which was a financial disaster at the time, but later appeared after he died as the musical, My Fair Lady, and did remarkably well. The premise of My Fair Lady, if you remember, was that the working class could be perfected through education and the proper environment. This was a noble sentiment, but Shaw relied heavily on Marxist teachings to accomplish these goals. Before his death, Shaw asked that his ashes be sprinkled on his home "to make the soil of England more fertile for socialism."

Aldous Huxley, although not an original member of the Fabians, was a novelist whose books dealt with the merging of scientific advancement and mysticism as a way to perfect the human race. His most famous novel, Brave New World, which you may have read in high school, explores this theme. Later in life, Huxley became convinced that mind altering drugs, especially hallucinogens, were the answer to perfecting human intelligence. He died in the early sixties of a heart attack while experimenting with mescaline. Huxley's essay, "The Doors of Perception," was the inspiration for the drug subculture of the latter part of the 1960s.

H.G. Wells, the world's most famous science fiction writer, was a militant advocate of socialism, evolutionism and rationalism. His science fiction novels were cleverly implanted with socialist principles which were a subtle means of advancing Marxist politics. Wells understood that you have to advance subversive ideas subtly before making a bold declaration. This strategy worked as he later wrote socialist pamphlets for mass distribution.

If you look at England today you will see a socialist state bankrupt both financially and morally. The point here is that it was the literature of the Fabian socialists that was the seed that produced this present bankrupt society.

The thing to remember about the Fabians was that they began as a group of only 16 people. Yet they changed the destiny of their nation. The national membership of the Fabian society has never been very great (at its peak in 1946 it had only about 8,400 members), but the importance of the society has always been much greater than its size might suggest.

In the 1980s, nearly half the members of the Labour Party members in the House of Commons in the English Parliament were Fabians, and the Labour Party has held great influence in England since WWII. The most integral part of their influence has been carefully researched pamphlets promoting socialism which are distributed to the English people.

American literature as a socialist weapon

Now America is only a generation behind England in the downfall of our society. We are headed in the same direction as England. If you look at America at the turn of the century, just a few years after the Fabian socialists began writing in England, another group of American writers arose with the same evil purpose of throwing off the yoke of Christianity from the American public and promoting socialism through literature.

In September of 1905, another gathering of literary types took place in a New York City restaurant. The leader of this group was Upton Sinclair, the author of the successful novel, The Jungle, which promoted socialism. These writers included Jack London, whose novels, The Call of the Wild and White Fang, contain simple Marxist and Darwinist principles; Charles and Mary Beard whose reinterpretation of American history according to Marxist economic principles has become the blueprint for American history textbooks in our public schools; and also Charlotte Perkins Gilman, who was the forerunner of the modern feminist movement.

Together they formed the Intercollegiate Socialist Society. Their stated purpose was clear: "For the purpose of promoting an intelligent interest in socialism among college men and women, graduate and undergraduate, through the formation of study clubs in the colleges and universities, and the encouraging of all legitimate endeavors to awaken an interest in socialism among the educated men and women of the country."

Today America has become a product of these writers' thinking. Our colleges and universities are filled with Marxist professors, feminists and evolutionists, who promote godless philosophies and mock at biblical Christianity. As a result our society stands at the brink of a socialist state with a bankrupt economy with the largest national debt in the history of any nation.

The point to be stressed here again is that these people were writers and their philosophy was promoted through the mass distribution of literature.

The wheat and the tares:

Matthew 13:24-26

"He presented another parable to them, saying, 'The kingdom of heaven may be compared to a man who sowed good seed in his field. But while men were sleeping, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went away. But when the wheat sprang up and bore grain then the tares became evident also.'"

This is a similar situation to what is going on in America today. University professors have been sowing the seeds of godless philosophies among the students. To make matters worse, the tares have sprung up in abundance and few are even aware of it - like the sleeping men in the parable. We have become so saturated with Marxism, evolutionism, feminism, Freudianism, and every other -ism, that we often don't even recognize these philosophies when they appear

University students are thinking according to spurious principles today. They are as much a product of socialistic thinking - even more so in many cases - as most of American society. They believe in socialism, not because they want to, but because Marxists have taught us through the public schools that church and state should remain separate even in terms of reasoning and thinking. Even worse - few students read anything on their own except shallow books and magazines written for a semi-literate audience.

Turning the Tide in the Late 20th century

It is very important that when you have want to have Christian principles affect people that it be in the form of the printed word. Most students on college campuses today are influenced more by the media than they are by what they have read in books. Nevertheless, we need to realize that the primary source of all knowledge is in the printed word. Before we can be effective in changing our society we need to study exactly how biblical principles can be applied to every aspect of our society. These principles then need to be outlined in an accessible medium.

Literature and whatever contains the truth of God desperately needs to be dispersed among today's students. We can expect Gospel principles to take root in people's hearts and minds more quickly than Marxism, humanism, or any other vain philosophy. When God's truth is presented in any form, it will always gain ascendancy over the godless philosophies of this world because it is the truth of God.

The purpose of The Forerunner is to saturate the market place of ideas - the university campuses - with a Christian world view that applies to every area of life. When this Christian world view is spoken on a consistent basis, we can expect the hearts and minds of the students to be affected and changed on a larger scale.

Belief in Astrology on Decline

7/88

PRINCETON, NJ (EP) - America's belief in astrology has declined significantly, despite First Lady Nancy Reagan's involvement in the occult practice, according to a Gallup Poll taken in mid-May.

The poll, conducted for the Princeton Religion Research Center following revelations that Nancy Reagan consulted astrologers for scheduling advice, showed that the number of Americans who believe in astrology has dropped to 12 percent. In 1978, that figure was 29 percent. The group in the survey that was most likely to believe in astrology was teens (52 percent).

Surprisingly, the survey indicated that religious or educational backgrounds play little role in determining whether one believes in astrology. College educated individuals were only slightly less likely to believe in astrology than their less-educated counterparts (10 percent to 14 percent).

Bill Bennet says Bible should be taught in schools

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - Knowledge of the Bible needs to be stressed in schools, Education Secretary William Bennett said November 30, while addressing a conference of the American Enterprise Institute, which sponsored a day long panel "The Spirit of the Constitution: National Union, Democracy, Commerce, Religion and Liberty and Equality."

Bennett said knowing the Bible and Shakespeare was more important then knowing the U.S. Constitution, though he criticized schools for failing to focus on any of the three.

"It's more important to teach morality that is under the Constitution," explained Bennet, when comparing the importance of the Bible with that of the U.S. Constitution. "I would rather have this generation of 17-year-olds know it's wrong to lie, cheat or judge [others by their skin color than to] know details of the Constitution."

Bennett concluded, "If I had to choose between 17-year-olds reading the Bible and the Constitution, I suppose I'd opt for the Bible and Shakespeare over the Constitution. Too much of the time schools teach neither."

Supreme Court Minority Favors Review of Church-State Relations

The United States Supreme Court may be on the verge of reviewing exactly what the Bill of Rights means by forbidding government "establishment of religion."

Justice Anthony Kennedy, the newest Supreme Court Appointee, wrote in a conservative dissent to a recent ruling that the Constitution provides for church-state separation in only two instances. First, the "government may not coerce anyone to support or participate in any religion or its exercise." Second, the court should outlaw any "direct benefits" that tend to create a state religion.

Ever since 1947, when Justice Hugo Black wrote the majority opinion for the Everson case, the phrase "wall of separation between church and state" has become progressively ingrained into the consciousness of the American people. In late twentieth century America, the vast majority of persons have come to assume that church and state should be separated.

Since January 1982, however, the "separation" issue has again become a matter of debate as a result of a federal judge's ruling in McLean vs. the Arkansas Board of Education, which banned the teaching of creation science in public schools.

The conservative dissent in the court's controversial County of Allegheny vs. A.C.L.U. case marked the emergence of a minority led by Justices Anthony Kennedy, Antonin Scalia, Byron White, and Chief Justice William Rhenquist. Kennedy claims that the 5-4 majority ruling in the Allegheny case, written by Harry Blackmun, and a whole series of Supreme Court decisions, "reflect an unjustified hostility toward religion, a hostility inconsistent with our history and our precedents."

Kennedy's position has worried some liberal activists. Lee Boothby, counsel to Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said that if Kennedy's position prevails "we would be litigating hundreds of cases we thought we had settled."

One more vote in favor of freeing restrictions against religion, perhaps from Sandra Day O'Connor or a new Bush appointment to the court, could in effect undo 40 years of laws. Rulings on everything from school prayer to public aid for church agencies could be changed.

What Will The Clarence Thomas Appointment Mean?

9/91

U.S. Circuit Judge Clarence Thomas has been nominated to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall. Thomas was born in segregated poverty in Georgia in 1948. He was raised by his maternal grandparents. Clarence's story is one of hard work, honesty, dedication, and the will to achieve anything no matter what the circumstances.

Jet magazine epitomized Thomas' story: "The hope that he now offers all those who struggle to make something of themselves is his impressive story of the hope that enabled him to rise from poverty to the Supreme Court."

Judge Thomas described his background in 1987: "God was central. School, discipline, hard work, and knowing right from wrong were of the highest priority." Thomas now attends a charismatic Episcopal church. From his humble beginnings, his story has been one of a triumph of faith over adversity.

"The reason I became a lawyer," said Thomas, "was to make sure that minorities, individuals who did not have access to this society, gained access. Now I may differ as to how best to do that, but the objective has always been to include those who have been excluded."

Thomas' nomination comes at a time when the Supreme Court appointments have been highly politicized. Our nation has been polarized into two groups:

1. Those who believe that the United States Constitution is law; and should be interpreted according to its original intent.
2. Those who believe that the Constitution is subject to any interpretation and would use it to further their political objectives.

Thomas clearly falls into the first category; his past references to the "natural law" and his commitment to judicial restraint attests to this fact. There is a campaign brewing which seeks to discredit every Court nominee who adheres to the idea of "Original Intent." But there is something larger at stake here: Who controls the courts? Who controls the United States Constitution? The two political parties of the U.S. are becoming increasingly polarized on this issue.

We are now facing the increasing politicization of our culture which includes our educational institutions and our courts. There are only two sides to this issue. Either the Constitution is fixed and applicable only when the principles laid down by those who ratified the Constitution are adhered to; or, it is a malleable document which can be interpreted by justices to fit the desires of special interest groups.

There is a struggle between these two groups on Constitutional law. It is being waged in the law schools where our future judges are being trained. Many law schools are becoming politicized. Today in the major law schools, the political view of judging - the one which carries the favor of party politics - is clearly ahead. The notion that the Constitution is law has been discredited.

But the political attitudes of university faculty at these law schools and those of the American public have never been further apart. This led William Buckley to write: "I would rather be governed by the first 200 names in the Boston phone book, than by the Harvard faculty." The professors of these law schools are urging courts on toward greater liberalization in interpreting the Constitution without regard to its historical meaning.

As a consequence, the Supreme Court has approved reverse racial discrimination under a statute which clearly forbids it; they have managed to find a Constitutional "right to abortion" without clearly explaining how they found this idea; they have come within one vote of finding a Constitutional right of homosexual conduct. For a time the Supreme Court even abolished the death penalty, although the Constitution explicitly assumes that the death penalty is available to a legislature should they care to use it.

The point to be made here is that the Constitution does not require that anyone be politically opposed to any of these rulings, but that these are political questions - and should be for the people and their political representatives to ponder and decide - and not for judges.

The underlying issue here has to do with individual liberty. When the courts depart from Constitutional statutes to create new rights, they subtract from individual liberty and never add to it. Among our Constitutional freedoms is the right to govern ourselves democratically (ie; only through individual vote and elected representatives) - unless the Constitution contradicts public opinion.

If a situation arises in which the Constitution is out of sync with public opinion, then the American people may amend the Constitution or even do away with it. However, this is a decision for the American people themselves and not for appointed Supreme Court Justices.

This is the underlying nature of the battle over the Supreme Court. Unfortunately, the public campaign has been masked by a blitz of negative advertising against Judge Thomas on radio, television, newspapers, and phone banks. This campaign has consisted chiefly of falsehoods and misconstrued actions and statements by Thomas.

Those who would politicize the Supreme Court (university law professors and liberal Democrats) have made the claim that constructionists - such as Judge Thomas - are "outside the mainstream" of American politics. To the contrary, it is those who seek to define the American mainstream who would politicize the Supreme Court. These same people stand even more to lose if the Supreme Court were politicized to the right - rather than toward their leftist goals.

Clarence Thomas represents a man who has every reason to support minority rights and many other liberal causes. Yet Thomas understands that the role of a Judge is to interpret the law (namely, the U.S. Constitution) and defend the rights outlined therein. But a Judge's role is never to legislate; this belongs to the people and their democratically elected representatives.

Unfair Criticism

One of the unfortunate outcomes of appointing a conservative African-American to the Supreme Court has been the numerous undeserved slurs which have lambasted Judge Thomas. His otherwise exemplary character has been besmirched by ignorance and unqualified criticism.

Patricia Ireland, Executive Vice President of the National Organization of Women, fearing that Thomas' nomination would overturn the 1973 ruling on Roe vs. Wade, exclaimed: "We're going to Bork him!" - referring to the defeat of Judge Robert Bork in 1987.

Virginia Governor Douglas Wilder, in an equally reprehensible attack, questioned Thomas' qualifications by saying: "The question is: How much allegiance is there to the Pope?" Although he once attended a Catholic elementary school, Thomas is an Episcopalian.

Editor's Note: As of the printing of this article, we believed that Judge Thomas would receive a positive recommendation by the Senate Judiciary committee, and later the required confirmation vote by the Senate. However, we understood that it was possible (knowing the highly politicized nature of recent Court appointments) that Thomas would be rejected.

We would then look to a battle of ideas which would be extended into the 1992 elections. This would be an unfortunate development for the Democratic Party: if Democratic Senators oppose Thomas, they would run the risk of seeming anti-Black and would lose popular support. The Bush administration would nevertheless appoint a strict constructionist to the Court bench before the 1992 election - whether the Judge be Black, Hispanic, Asian, White, male or female. The confirmation hearings will be a triumph for the Constitutional rights of all people according to a strict interpretation of the U.S. Constitution.

What is the significance of the "New Covenant"

An analysis of Bill Clinton's acceptance speech

By Jay Rogers

"The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water: he turns it wherever he pleases" (Proverbs 21:1).

Watching the Democratic convention last month, I was surprised to find myself impressed by the quality of the speeches of Clinton, Gore, Tsongas and many others who spoke commendably about important moral issues that face our nation. With only a few dissenting liberal tones from those such as Mario Cuomo and Ted Kennedy, the Party had taken a shift toward the median. Suddenly, the Democratic party seemed to have "found itself" in a more moderate vein nostalgic of Jack Kennedy's era.

I listened carefully to Clinton's speech. His poise at the podium reminded me of the anointing of a Christian evangelist. Quoting scripture, he spoke of the need for a "New Covenant" and having a vision for greatness. I began to worry. Could this be the same man who said that he would appoint pro-choice judges to the Supreme Court, who went to a San Francisco fund raiser held by homosexuals and bought into their morals-neutral agenda?

Of course, I understood that Clinton was hopelessly misapplying and mutilating scripture; I didn't buy it for a minute. Unlike Clinton, President Bush stands up for righteousness, rather than treating homosexuality and abortion as a "lifestyle choice." But Clinton had something within in his speech; there was a certain ring of truth to his words. I found it much too simple to pass off his words with disdain as so many other people have done. Then I remembered that God often uses leaders, especially the American President, to prophesy. We can discern a prophetic voice in speeches of Presidents such as Reagan, Kennedy, Roosevelt and Lincoln.

The use of a nation's leader as a prophetic instrument, even if he not converted, has biblical precedence. Caiaphas, the high priest during Jesus' time, presided over the Sanhedrin: a political-ecclesiastical system which Jesus called a "den of thieves." Yet Caiaphas, the same person who delivered Jesus over to Pontius Pilate, prophesied that it would be "expedient that one man should die for the people" (John 18:14). Other political leaders who were called "servants" of God and prophesied - although evil men - include Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, and Cyrus.

So we should not be surprised if God uses our leaders to prophesy today. It seems strange; but perhaps the reason for this arrangement is so that God can reach a whole nation of people using a voice of established authority. And we need to remember that God is the Supreme Ruler who raises up all earthly rulers. We need to train our ears to hear, to discern God's voice even when it comes through an imperfect vessel.

The Democratic Party is mirroring the spiritual state of the American Church and is reflecting the sins of our nation. Like the moderate Democrats, we are pro-life by conviction; yet pro-choice by default. Like the Democratic nominee, many of our most well-known leaders have been adulterers; but refuse to confess their sin because "it's flat none of your business." And like the Democrats, we manipulate God and His Word to fit our own agenda.

These three idolatries are what God is most angry about today: abortion, sexual immorality, and manipulation of God's eternal law to fit what is right in our own eyes. These sins are true of the Church and of our nation as a whole. We need to repent in accordance with 2 Chronicles 7:14 and ask God to forgive the sins of the church and our nation. This revelation was coupled with my fear that many undiscerning Christians, especially those from the South, may buy the snake-oil the Democratic Party is selling on November 10.

Clinton's appeal is reminiscent of that of Jimmy Carter, a Southern Baptist who taught Sunday school while President, and won the hearts of many evangelical Christians on his road to the White House. Although many of his accomplishments were commendable, Carter promoted abortion rights and pro-homosexual legislation. Once in office, Carter applied the same anti-Christian agenda that the Democrats are touting today.

Disenchanted evangelical voters withdrew their support from Carter in 1980, throwing their full support behind President Reagan and what has been termed the "Religious Right." Although many of the leaders of the "New Right" did not openly profess Christianity, the political agenda of these men and women lined up more closely with scriptural mandates. During the 1980s, great progress was made toward pro-life legislation and conservative born-again Christians became one of the most significant voting blocs in modern times.

My initial fear was that the Clinton/Gore association with the Southern Baptists could win the White House for the Democrats at a crucial time in America's history. This concern has subsided - I am of the opinion that we will see a dramatic shift in the polls back toward Bush/Quayle after the Republican convention. This will continue to swell as the issues that each side stands for are laid out before the public eye.

Without a spiritual awakening, there can be no lasting political solution to America's problems. While God's laws should be the basis for our civil government, we cannot expect legislation to change the heart of America. Above all we must learn to pray consistently for our leaders - no matter who is in power. Bill Clinton spoke prophetically - we need a "New Covenant" between God and our nation, not really new; but the same covenant that was secured 2000 years ago when Jesus died in our place to take the punishment for our sin. Today we need a fresh application of the blood of Jesus to forgive the sins of the church and our nation.

Cocaine use falls

Cocaine use fell by 20 percent in 1987 among high school seniors, and other illicit drugs including marijuana continued a seven year decline among the same age group, according to a U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) annual report.

HHS Secretary Otis Bowen said that while many drugs have been on the decline, cocaine use had remained fairly stable for many years. This was the first significant sign of a downturn in its use.

Bowen continued by stating that there is a growing awareness among young people concerning drug abuse. "It is a shame that so many talented young people had to die before this message sank home" he said, citing college basketball player Len Bias and football player Don Rogers as examples of such casualties.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said President Ronald Reagan and his wife were pleased with the positive results of the report. Professionals in the anti-drug field have long understood the correlation between the use of a particular drug and its perceived health risk. This sharp decline confirms the growing grassroots understanding of the risk of hard drugs.

Lloyd Johnstone, director of the survey done annually by the University of Michigan Institute for Social Research, said the relationship between the use of cocaine and the perceived threat showed that people make a more rational decision than is often believed about whether to use a particular drug. "Young people are not dumb" said Johnstone, who used PCP as another example of a drug that has declined in use by 75 percent after gaining a reputation as a "bad drug."

While gratified with the results of the survey, Johnstone said, "We have only come part of the way down from a very high mountain."

The 1987 survey included some 17,000 high school students in 130 schools; 10.3 percent admitted using cocaine at least once during the preceding 12 months as compared with 12.7 percent the previous year. In real terms this means that 20 percent fewer students tried cocaine in 1987 than in 1986.

The Michigan survey is a confidential survey used in high schools and is regarded as a sound measure of high school drug abuse. In its 13 year history the survey has recorded the rise and decline of drug use.

Communist Party opts out of 1988 presidential race

The Communist Party of the U.S.A. (CPUSA), which has participated in every presidential election since 1968, has announced that it will not field a candidate in the 1988 race because "a very undemocratic electoral system" is "closed to minority party candidates." That announcement was made by veteran communist leader Gus Hall, who has led the floundering party since the late 1950s.

The CPUSA has been losing influence and followers since its days of popularity in the '30s, when it received more than 100,000 votes out of the nearly 40 million cast. In 1984, when Hall ran with vice-presidential running mate Angela Davis, the party only received 35,561 votes out of 92.7 million.

According to Stephen Schwartz of The Institute for Contemporary Studies, the CPUSA claimed 10,000 members in the 1960s. Today, in Schwartz's estimation, the figure is down to 5,000 or 6,000. An enrollment form for interested potential members is still printed in The People's Daily World, the party organ, but very little active recruitment is done. Lately, according to Schwartz, membership has become hereditary, mainly focusing on the children of older members.

Rather than trying to become a mass movement, the party has focused its efforts on influencing the peace movement and the Democratic Party - although a spokesman for the Hoover Institution says that "no Democrat would want to be seen, dead or alive, with Gus Hall." The official CPUSA platform currently stresses consolidation of the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua and the blocking of President Reagan's Strategic Defense Initiative.

Since the party is not fielding a candidate in '88, party leaders have selected Rev. Jesse Jackson as their favored choice. Michael Myerson, a leader in the U.S. peace movement and CPUSA National Council member, recently pronounced, "Jesse Jackson is the most advanced candidate on the peace issues, and for this reason, he should be supported." Spokesmen for the Jackson campaign declined to comment on the statement.

Political analysts in Washington say that the CPUSA has always been completely controlled by Moscow, and that the decision to stay out of the 1988 race was initiated by the Kremlin. Schwartz added that it is most likely a part of the Soviets' overall modernization campaign, in which leaders are attempting to improve the image of communism around the world.

Can We Make a Deal for Peace?

By Lee Grady

During the Vietnam War, American students protested by wearing love beads and peace signs, or by celebrating the coming of the Age of Aquarius by burning their draft cards. Today, the approach is much more sophisticated. In the progressive '80's, a growing number of students are enrolling in a popular new study program concentrating on world peace. What was once taking place rather noisily on campus lawns has now quietly moved into the classroom.

Newsweek on Campus (October 1987) reports that world peace is now vying for a legitimate place of its own in the college curriculum. Today, more than 100 schools are offering majors or minors in peace-related subjects. Students at Boston College can take an undergraduate concentration in peace, while University of Hawaii students can major in International Peacemaking. At Wayne State University, the peace curriculum offers electives in "The Philosophy of Peace" and "Race Relations in the Urban Society," while other campuses actually conduct live video dialogues about peace with students in Moscow as a part of the classroom experience.

According to Robert Holt, a psychology professor who pioneered the addition of a peace studies minor at New York University (NYU) two years ago, courses in peace have been growing rapidly since 1980. Many of the courses focus on the 20th century history of the West, with emphasis on U.S./Soviet relations. At the University of California/Berkeley this year, students could take advantage of a special peace studies course on resolving the conflict between North and South Korea.

But critics of the new trend warn that most of the peace curricula in current university programs are biased toward left-leaning, anti-nuclear propaganda. Herbert London, a dean at NYU, actually attacked the new minor in 1985 by saying: "In the 1920s, people who taught such nonsense at least had the courage to define their position as pacifism. Their views didn't masquerade as a new scholarly discipline."¹

Definition, Please

There's nothing wrong with studying about peace or the peacemaking process. We live in a society that is desperately in need of some concrete, workable ways to bring about peace. But before I ever enrolled in a university-level program of study in international peacemaking, I think I would do some preliminary research into the professors in the department and the courses that they teach. My first question would be simple: "How do you define peace?"

One of the greatest problems we face in the 20th century is a distorted definition of peace. To the modern humanist, peace is the state of cease-fire between warring nations. It is the act of disarmament on a national scale, even when opposing nations adhere to diametrically opposite values. It is, in essence, the erroneous notion that nations can live in harmony and still be governed by different value systems. It is the idea that we can all live happily ever after in a pluralistic society - giving every man the right to do whatever he wants or believe whatever he wants, as long as he doesn't hurt anyone else.

Is that your definition of peace? If it is, then you are by definition a humanist. You believe that almighty Man can initiate a second Eden by hammering out summit agreements, peace accords, and arms negotiations - with the help of the United Nations and other international police forces. The Beatles used to sing a song that expresses succinctly the philosophy of the humanist in regards to international relations: "We can work it out." A similar song was popular among the builders of the Tower of Babel until their work was divinely interrupted.

My dictionary defines peace in this way: "Freedom from civil disturbance or war; harmony in personal relations; mutual concord; freedom from fears, agitating passions, and moral conflict." Notice the part about moral conflict. Morality is a part of the definition. Morality does not, however, enter into the modern classroom discussion of international peacemaking, nor is it on the agenda at most U.S./Soviet summits.

True peace, therefore, is a state in which there is no conflict of values or morals. It is not just a cease-fire between opposing forces. It is not unilateral disarmament. It cannot be brought about by give-and-take compromises over the summit table. True peace must require surrender on the part of all opposing parties. Only then will there be an absence of moral conflict.

Humanists do not like this definition. It infers that one party is morally superior to another, and this is not a popular opinion among those who think all values are relative. Humanists believe in the doctrine of moral equivalence, for example, when addressing the conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States. They believe that these two countries represent two large superpowers which have basically identical value systems. They equate the invasion of Grenada with the invasion of Afghanistan. And they assume that if the leadership of our two nations would just meet together over lunch, and promise to eliminate all of our deadly weapons, our problems would be solved.

To the humanist, peace is really pacifism. My dictionary accurately defines pacifism as "opposition to war or to the use of military force for any purpose; an attitude of mind opposing all war and advocating settlement of international disputes entirely by arbitration." I agree with Dean London of New York University: people majoring in the current "peace studies" programs in U.S. colleges should be called pacifism majors. No professor in any of these universities is offering any way to achieve peace according to the true definition.

The definition of peace was rewritten in this country when progressive educators like John Dewey tried to eliminate the idea of the fallen nature of man from the national psyche. Dewey did not like the idea that man cannot be trusted because he is inherently evil, nor did he appreciate the Christian doctrine that man needs salvation from his sin problem. And so, like all humanists, he decided to ignore that fact, and to strike it from the nation's textbooks. It did not seem such a dangerous idea in the 19th century classroom; today, when it comes into play during arms reduction talks, it is deadly.

The Myth of "Value-Free" Peace

We hear a lot of discussion today about a "value-free" society. It has become a popular catch-phrase, particularly among members of the educational community. Their goal is "the value-free classroom" - which was the original goal of John Dewey & Co. Value-free proponents believe that there is a place on earth that can be neutral in regards to ethics and morals.

But there is a major problem with value-free anything. There is no place on this planet that is free from moral requirements. This world operates by laws ... not some vague, generalized natural laws, but the specific moral requirements of a benevolent Creator. This world and its inhabitants are totally subject to His authority, and are judged by His standards. You cannot avoid God or His moral requirements by declaring something "value-free" anymore than you can nullify the law of gravity by saying hocus-pocus. Humanists have been trying to pull off this magic trick for centuries ... to no avail.

To try to live in a value-free society is to live in total unreality. It is suicidal. It is also just plain stupid. Anti-God rock musician John Lennon used to sing about his humanist utopia by singing "Imagine there's no heaven / It's easy if you try / No hell below us / Above us only sky / Imagine all the people living for today." Lennon lived in a psychedelic dream world, along with a large percentage of his cohorts in the '60s. And while he was shooting up mind-bending drugs and writing songs about free sex and yellow submarines, the world was racing toward the harsh realities of international conflict. Reality interrupted the music.

Some people woke up from that dream world. Many of the staffers and policy makers in our State Department did not. They are still trying to achieve a value-free peace in their value-free world. They are still trying to "imagine" peace. Christian economist Gary North, in his groundbreaking new book Healer of the Nations (Dominion Press, $8.95), says this: "Modern men have systematically neglected the chief connection and chief division among men and nations: religion. Religion, not politics or economics, is the crucial issue in international relations." 2

To deny these religious differences - which are clear-cut moral differences - is to live in a dream world. Western leaders actually believe that they can achieve a workable plan for peace without addressing these fundamental differences. If such a policy is pursued for too long, we will wake up one day to the cold, harsh reality of the gulag. If not the gulag, the terror of Islamic Jihad. Communists are working to achieve world peace: peace through worldwide submission to Marxism. The leaders of Islam are working for world peace, too: peace through international allegiance to Allah. What kind of peace are we working for?

We are in a battle for ownership of the world. Western leaders don't want to admit this. They do not want to appear hostile. But it doesn't matter whether you believe it or not. It is a reality. The atheists, the communists, the humanists, and adherents of Islam, and the Christians are all vying for the title of world leader. This is why peace cannot be gained through compromises at the bargaining table. Peace must be waged. To deny that we are in an ideological war is to capitulate to the enemy. As long as rival religious ideas remain, men will always be at war. It is silly (i.e., dumb, empty-headed) to discuss peace apart from this context.

Will a Summit Save Us?

Pagan cultures throughout history have always been characterized by the worship of centralized political power. Christian author Gary DeMar calls this phenomenon "the pyramid society." It is a society in which the people spend the majority of their time working to transform the civil sphere of government to the near exclusion of themselves, their families, churches, schools, businesses, and local civil governments. It is a preoccupation with power, coupled with the idea that political power has the power to save us. 3

(This is why ancient cultures were preoccupied with building towers, pyramids, ziggurats, and other symbols of top-down control. Everyone looked up to the central power for salvation. They worshipped the omnipotent State.)

In modern America, we see this preoccupation with centralized power exhibited by the over-emphasis placed on Washington, D.C., and the leaders who are working in an ever-growing federal bureaucracy. And in the field of international relations, it is evidenced in a preoccupation with summits and peace talks between leaders. We believe that if President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev would dine together on the top of the pyramid, they could somehow arrive at a magical formula for peace as they look down below at the conflicts of nations.

Gary North, in Healer of the Nations, powerfully refutes this notion by reminding us of the history of U.S. foreign policy. When the Department of State was created in 1789 by President Washington, the staff consisted of six persons. In 1870, slightly less than 100 years later, the entire personnel consisted of only 53 persons - in spite of the great expansion of our borders and growth in population. By 1909 it grew to 202 persons, and rapid expansion ensued after the two World Wars. By 1980, the figure had climbed to 23,497. This included over 3,500 Foreign Service Officers, the elite corps of specialists who staff our embassies and consulates. 4

How, you may ask, could the U.S. function as a world power with such a tiny Department of State for so many years of its history? Who was conducting the summits? Who was monitoring the arms agreements? Who was drawing up the treaties and doing all the research? Who was hammering out the peace plans?

Answer: No one. The United States had made one treaty with France in the 1700s, which was abrogated in 1778. We made absolutely no entangling alliances with any nations during the 19th century.⁵ Dexter Perkins, a specialist in U.S. foreign policy, writes in his History of the Monroe Doctrine that "nothing is more characteristic of American diplomacy than its general aversion to contractual agreements."⁶ On the contrary, nothing could be more characteristic of our present foreign policy than our infatuation over contractual agreements, as well as summits, treaties, alliances, pacts, and deals between world powers. We also have a recent fixation over meddling in disagreements between other nations.

Gary North writes: "This centralization came at the expense of private activities and responsibilities. In the field of international relations, no one before this era had perceived a need for the United States government to send official representatives to every nation or to seek alliances, agreements, and arrangements with every nation. People assumed that private interests would be the basis of the vast bulk of international relations. But in the 20th century, men have lost faith in the power and importance of government-unregulated activities. Nowhere has skepticism regarding private activities been more deeply held than in the area of international relations. In the place of international relations in the broadest sense, we have seen the creation of a vast network of intergovernmental relations."⁷

This is the heart of the problem in foreign policy, according to Dr. North. "Voters in the West have passively turned over the conduct of foreign policy to professional diplomats."⁸ Now, you may ask: If professional diplomats aren't supposed to be conducting foreign policy, then who is? That brings us to Dr. North's most important theme in his book.

The Christian World Order

The Christian view of world peace is simple and forthright: world peace will envelope the globe as more individuals, families, institutions, and nations submit to the gospel of Jesus Christ and embrace Christianity. This process began when Christ defeated Satan at the cross and rose from the dead victorious. The Roman Empire surrendered to Christianity three centuries later - thus ending one of the most tyrannical communist states that ever controlled a human population.

The influence of the gospel went on to civilize Europe and many of its colonies. Christianity spawned political liberty in England and America, and the process continued to bring political liberation throughout the world in the subsequent century. The process continues today. More and more nations are being leavened by the power of the Word of God and the work of the Holy Spirit in the church.

Dr. North makes an obvious conclusion about this onward progress of the gospel: "If the gospel proves successful, and the Great Commission is steadily fulfilled, and a majority of people convert to Christ in nation after nation, and then they seek to do God's will in every area of life, won't we see the creation of a worldwide Christian order that will steadily replace the worldwide disorder of Satan's divided kingdom?"⁹

Obviously the answer is yes. This is a central theme throughout the Bible. Global peace through the worldwide reign of Christ is the hope of orthodox Christianity. God fully intends to establish His government - the government of His Majesty Jesus Christ - on earth as it is in heaven. His government will ultimately triumph in every nation as men surrender on His terms. Hatred, strife, and all other other roots of human hostility will progressively be banished from this planet, and the result will be peace.

Practically, foreign policy in this Christian world order will be conducted by missionaries and members of the Christian business and trade community who know how to represent the cause of Christ abroad. Their business as ambassadors of Christ is not to work out terms of compromise; it is to persuade men and governments to surrender to the government of Christ.

The prophet Isaiah spoke of a progressive, worldwide surrender to the gospel when he wrote: "The law will go forth from Zion ... and He [God] will judge between the nations, and will render decisions for many peoples; and they will hammer their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation will not lift up sword against nation, and never again will they learn war" (Isaiah 2:4).

It is important to note that the act of transforming swords into plowshares takes place after the people of the earth voluntarily confess, "Come and let us go unto the mountain of the Lord, that He may teach us His ways" (v. 3). God is waiting for knees to bow in submission before He resolves international conflict. That is His condition for peace.

North summarizes this idea: "There can never be peace in history outside of Christ. There can be temporary cease-fire agreements, but never a lasting peace. What Christians must understand is that peace is attained through the preaching of the gospel and the discipling of the nations. There is no other way. God will not permit peace on any other terms."¹⁰

Humanists scoff at this idea. Humanists have always tried to downplay or ignore the power of Christ. But God has always opposed their attempts to build their "value-free" Tower of Babel. When He confused and scattered the original builders of that monument, He promised that pagan man would never again be successful in his attempts to build a godless civilization. Satellite technology and media propaganda will not make it any easier in the 20th century. The building permit for Babel has been revoked.

Meanwhile, the deed for ownership of the earth has been issued to those in covenant with Christ. As this redeemed community grows, and as they disseminate this world-transforming message internationally, more and more nations will enter into allegiance to the government of Christ - and thereby enjoy all the benefits of a true, lasting, worldwide peace.

Democratic Candidates

On Election Day, 1988, when we cast our ballot in the presidential race, we will be setting the agenda for our nation for the next four years. Which way will America turn? Whose agenda will we follow?

Will we continue on a course toward traditional values pioneered by the Reagan administration? Public opinion polls indicate that mainstream America is experiencing a moral and spiritual rebirth. Today 95 percent of all Americans believe in God and 85 percent pray regularly, according to recent Gallup and USA Today polls.

In another poll conducted by Better Homes & Gardens, it was found that those who grew up in the radical '60s are today more religious than the national average. Morality has been a major concern in the public mind, especially since the demise of Gary Hart, Joseph Biden, and two popular television evangelists.

But there are those in the U.S. who have a different agenda. In fact, there is an entire political party which is promoting a policy platform that appears to be totally contrary to this trend toward traditional values.

"The Party of The People"?

The Democratic Party will help "settle the score" between conservatives and liberals, according to the Communist Party-USA's Main Report of its 24th National Congress in August 1987. Gus Hall, the eminent Communist leader and founder of CPUSA, who usually runs as the Party's candidate for president, has decided to sit out on the 1988 election so CPUSA can give overwhelming support to the Democratic Party and Rev. Jesse Jackson.¹

The Communist Party's strategy to influence the 1988 elections is to infiltrate the ranks of the Democratic Party and to give it support. "It is obvious to all realistically minded people that, in practical terms, defeating the Republican presidential candidate in 1988 means electing someone on the Democratic ticket," said Hall.²

"...(A)s the forces of political independence continue to grow, most will struggle through the medium of the Democratic Party in both the presidential and congressional elections ..." CPUSA's endorsement of Jackson and sanction of the Democratic Party hasn't yet garnered any negative reactions from Democratic Party officials. But it does concern mainstream America. A party which has received such endorsement from outspoken communists should be obviously suspect.

"The broadly liberal to progressive direction of most of the Democratic candidates on many issues reflects the massive pressure from below, from the grassroots and the rank and file around the country," continues the CPUSA report. The American communists see the Democratic party as a "...(V)ehicle through which the all-people's front, the forces of political independence, could wage an all-out campaign against Reaganites on all levels of the election."

CPUSA's embrace and unbridled support of the Democratic Party sends a warning to America of the direction of its policies and philosophy. We should also look at the platforms of the individual candidates who are vying for the Democratic nomination and analyze where they each want to take America in the next four years:

* Gov. Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts made a slip of the tongue on "Meet the Press" when he said he would not assert American power towards Soviet client states established in this hemisphere, unless these client states introduced "offensive weapons."

One of his gubernatorial achievements for the Massachusetts economy was a 10 percent tax increase, which was the largest in the state's history. Business investments plummeted to a rate nearly 50 percent below the national average, and that same year the state's personal income growth fell to 47th in the U.S.

What would be the impact of Dukakis's economic and foreign policies on the nation in 1992? The 1992 presidential contenders may be lambasting him for his friendliness towards what may be the United Soviet Socialist Republic of Central and South America. Although the Soviets may be building up its weaponry over our borders, Dukakis's halt on building and testing nuclear weapons and low priority of defense may accelerate the growing threat to America's national security.

Dukakis pushed through the State House a Gay Rights bill which homosexuals have been vigorously promoting for 14 years. He also vetoed legislation which would have prohibited state officials from placing foster children with homosexuals or bisexual parents, despite passage by both houses, because it was not consistent with his policies governing treatment of foster children.

As one of the party's leading contenders, Dukakis's song of tax increases, homosexual rights and naivete regarding foreign policy is abrasive in the ears of Americans looking for moral leadership.

* Senator Albert Gore has been a mystery to his Tennessee constituency. According to Newsweek, December 21, 1987, "In Tennessee, Gore has most people convinced that he's a moderate, despite a consistently liberal voting record."

His notoriety and emergence into the national picture was fueled by his wife's campaign against obscenity in rock lyrics. Since the 1985 Senate Commerce Committee hearing on this issue, Gore has continually denied the intent of the hearing - calling it a mistake.

In October 1987, he and his wife, Tipper, met with recording industry executives in Los Angeles to explain their position. After the meeting they attended a party at a rock club in New York to counter the "anti-rock" crusader image. "He wants to appear like a righteous crusader of family values. On the other hand, he's trying to appear very moderate and progressive," Record Producer Danny Goldberg told Newsweek. "I really don't know who Gore is."

Who is Gore? A career politician, he has frustrated both conservatives and his liberal colleagues with his compromising on the issues. An example is his position on a tax increase. He told the Washington Times, June, 17, 1987, "I am not proposing new taxes." But drawing a distinction between his position and that of the president (Reagan) he hastened to add: "If(economic growth) does not suffice, I'm not ruling out new revenue."

If Gore's style of public policymaking continues along the lines of his current habit of compromising to please whatever is in the wind, what would we expect of him while in office? Gore's presidency could be a travesty of mistrust.

* Sen. Paul Simon of Illinois has carried the liberal banner for the last three years in the Senate and 10 years in Congress. His latest achievement is co-sponsorship of the Cranston Civil Rights Amendment Act of 1987, which would amend the 1964 Civil Rights Act to grant homosexuals and lesbians the same federal protections given to race. In time this would mean preferential hiring and quotas for homosexuals.

He also believes that AIDS education should begin at kindergarten, "with progressively more complex and explicit information disseminated to students as they progress through school," according to the Los Angeles Times, November 2, 1987. Does mainstream America really want our children taught about homosexuality in kindergarten?

Simon's budgetary priorities would be a jobs program and more social programs. He has supported every bill regarding increasing taxes, and opposes a constitutional amendment respecting tax limitations.

* Rev. Jesse Jackson told the Dallas Times Herald on April 30, 1984, that he advocates a "national economic planning mechanism," which he says "would be non-coercive but would use government incentives, subsidies, and tax laws to direct business investment and trade policies." He said in Political Affairs, a journal of the CPUSA, that capitalism is bad, and despite his heady plans to subsidize the domestic petroleum industry during his presidency, he doesn't have any specifics on implementing his plan.

Jackson has also caused some controversy over his friendship with Cuban leader Fidel Castro and PLO terrorist Yasir Arafat. He praised Castro as "the most honest, courageous politician I met," and Arafat as a "true hero." His foreign policy platform is questionable as to who's interests he is advocating. He considers himself a "Third World person," who grew up in an "occupied zone" (Greenville, South Carolina). He told Playboy in June 1984 that he thought it was a mistake that the U.S. didn't open up trade with Cuba.

If Castro and Arafat are an indication of who would be influencing the direction of U.S. international relations under Jackson's presidency, does America want its president to be rubbing elbows with dictators and terrorists? Does America want the likes of Castro and Arafat implementing their agenda of international terror through the White House with the assistance of U.S. taxes?

The Democratic Party platform is obviously out of touch with mainstream American values. In 1992, if the agendas of these leaders are implemented, we could be encircled by Communist regimes due to the infiltration of Marxism in our decision-making process. Will our children be taught by homosexuals and be given sex education and contraceptives without parental knowledge? Will the 1992 presidential lineup be facing the possibility of a Soviet invasion from Central America?

We are going to answer these questions with our vote on Election Day. The next president may be a form of God's judgment upon our nation if the American people reject the need for moral leadership. He will either be a curse or a blessing upon us. Let's pray that, rather than getting the president that we deserve, God will be merciful and grant us a leader who will honor God and take a courageous stand for truth and morality.

Gallup Book - The People's Religion: American Faith in the 90s

George Gallup, America's most highly respected pollster, has recently coauthored a book with Jim Castelli, The People's Religion: American Faith in the 90s, published this month by Macmillan. Excerpts from an interview in Christianity Today reveal some interesting trends which will significantly affect our nation in the coming decade.

"Over the last 54 years of scientific polling, religion in America has been remarkably stable, both in terms of beliefs and practices. It is interesting that as the level of education has increased in this country, religious beliefs did not decline. Karl Marx's prediction that more education would produce a weaker attachment to religion simply has not come about.

"The central problem today is that people are not solidly grounded in their faith, and therefore vulnerable to hedonism, materialism, and new spiritual movements which glorify self. We have in our country a geographic literacy problem. We have a scientific literacy problem. But more seriously, I feel, we have a faith literacy problem. That has to be faced," said Gallup.

"On the plus side, religion has profoundly affected our society in terms of volunteerism. We did a big study for the independent sector and found that churches give more money than foundations or businesses do. The church is the biggest supporter of the volunteer effort, in terms of manpower and money, but also in terms of energizing society.

"In the 1990s, alcohol and drug abuse has to be very high on the list of priorities for the church because it affects the family and it affects everything. And it's a crisis situation. The sex-related issues are going to be among the most important issues facing all churches in the foreseeable future. Abortion, AIDS, premarital sex, homosexuality, all those things are going to be at the vortex of the problems confronting all churches.

"Also, you could hardly find a more basic problem in our society than youth unemployment, which is very high among minority groups and in the major cities. That problem leads to low self-esteem, which contributes to alcohol and drug abuse, which leads to crime and lawlessness. Until as a society we meet the joblessness problem head-on, we're just storing up a lot of problems for ourselves in the '90s and beyond.

"But these are the kinds of things that don't have to be left up to chance. I tend to be optimistic because I think there are a lot of obvious things that churches can and will do to make a profound difference in society in the years ahead. There is nothing mysterious about it. Also, as Christians, we often forget to pray for things. But God is accessible, and will help us in our efforts, whatever they are. "

Gallup Poll on TV

VIRGINIA BEACH, VA (CBN) - Parents who watch television with their children are becoming increasingly uncomfortable with what they are seeing on their screens. And with a similarly growing frequency, many are either switching channels or turning off the set altogether.

These findings, which were described as a "clear warning" to producers and sponsors alike, are contained in a new survey just released by the Gallup Poll. Included in the study were 424 parents of children under 18 who watch television with their youngsters.

The results come at a time when "trash TV" is becoming a household term and citizens' decency groups and individuals are taking their complaints to the legislative halls as well as to the doorsteps of the sponsors of some of the programs considered most offensive.

A total of 58 percent of those parents polled said they either were frequently or occasionally uncomfortable with something in a TV program they watched with their children. Only 17 percent said they never were uncomfortable with the shows they saw, while only 25 percent said they seldom were bothered by the programming.

The leading cause of discomfort, according to the poll, is the programmers' preoccupation with sex, either by sexual suggestion or a more flagrant and overt focus on sex. In this category, 46 percent said they were disturbed by it.

Next in the line of offenses was violence, with 37 percent of the parents objecting to it.

Foul language, swearing or cursing comprised the third category, with 17 percent of the parents saying they were uncomfortable with it.

The discomfort factor was fairly uniform across the nation, ranging from the lowest amount of concern, 52 percent in the West, to 65 percent in the South. In the East, the figure was 54 percent, and in the Midwest, 58 percent.

Parents with children between the ages of 6 and 12 had the greatest amount of concern about current programming. Sixty-six percent of those in the age group were occasionally or frequently disturbed by what they saw, just barely trailed by 62 percent of those with kids 13 to 17, and 57 percent with children in the under-five age bracket.

What are these parents doing about their growing uneasiness with television? According to the poll, 70 percent of those watching TV with their children are either zapping channels in search of something less offensive or they are flipping off the set altogether.

Forty-six percent of those polled said they turn to a different channel when they become uncomfortable with what they and their youngsters are watching. Twenty-four percent said they turn off the TV. Another 11 percent said they discuss with their children what should have been said on the show, and five percent said they refuse to allow the kids to watch the program in the future.

"I just feel that it should be a clear message to those who put programs together, those who sponsor the programs and the television networks and stations," George Gallup Jr., president of The Gallup Organization, Inc., said of the results. He said much of the present programming shows "a breakdown in standards and a pandering to baser emotions."

"We all share the same horror at some of the things seen on television," he added.

The negative reaction showed no indication of being limited geographically, Gallup pointed out. Only a 13 percent difference was noted between the South, which often is considered to be the home of more conservative views, and the West, sometimes thought of as less conservative.

Nor was there much of a difference between mothers and fathers in the number concerned about what they watched with their children. Sixty-one percent of the mothers expressed dissatisfaction. For fathers, it was only six percentage points less, at 55 percent.

Gallup said his figures indicate a sharply growing number of parents who have had objections to television in the last 12 months. More than half of those parents who watch TV programs with their children (55 percent) said the programming is more offensive this year than just a year ago. Only 30 percent said the programming was less offensive. "Clearly, it's a growing trend," he said.

The findings are based on telephone interviews with 424 parents of children under 18, out of a total sample of 1008 adults, 18 and older. The survey was conducted nationwide by The Gallup Organization between November 14 and December 4, 1988, for The CBN Family Channel, the nation's oldest basic cable network. For results based on the subsample of parents, the pollster said one could say with 95 percent confidence that the error attributable to sampling error and other random effects could be five percentage points in either direction.

Gambling and the State Lotteries

by Glenn Dunehew
5/89

Lately many states are turning to pari-mutuel gambling and the lottery system to raise revenue as an alternative to raising taxes. Is it ethical for the government to support gambling? Have lotteries produced the desired results in the states that have them? Is it wrong to gamble? Let's look for a moment at what the Bible has to say on this issue.

Is Gambling Wrong?

The word "gamble" means, "to play for money; to squander by gaming." The basis for gambling is greed and the desire to gain something without working for it. This is the motivation behind all gambling activities - from horse racing to betting on fights or athletic events to state lotteries.

The Bible has much to say about greed. Consider these verses:

"Incline my heart to Thy testimonies, and not to dishonest gain" (Psalm 119:36).

"And Jesus said to them, 'Beware, and be on your guard against every form of greed; for not even when one has an abundance does life consist of his possessions'" (Luke 12:15).

"No one can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will hold to one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon (riches)" (Matthew 6:24).

"The desire of the sluggard puts him to death, for his hands refuse to work; all day long he is craving, while the righteous gives and does not hold back" (Proverbs 21:25,26).

God has ordained that men should acquire wealth through diligent labor and creativity. An honest reward for honest labor is a pillar of stability in all cultures. Financial prosperity, therefore, becomes a reward from God for obedience, godliness, and patience. The person who has labored faithfully will then have the character to handle wealth properly.

But man has always tried to short-circuit this plan by attempting to sidestep the laws of God and make money his own way. This is why so many people are looking for their "lucky day" when they hit the big jackpot or win the lottery. It is this attitude of greed which feeds all forms of gambling.

Gambling is also addictive. Dr. Robert Custer, a psychiatrist, says: "Gambling, like alcohol is a narcotic."¹ This is evident by the more than 10 million compulsive gamblers in our nation.²

Is all this gambling going on simply because of the desire for a few dollars or thrills? Those who have traced the statistics surrounding the more than $17 billion spent every year in gambling conclude that organized crime is always at work behind the scenes of this industry.³

What about the state lottery?

A lottery, by definition, is gambling. It is playing for money or squandering by gaming. People take a chance with their own money by trying to pick the right numbers or the right card. They must "ante up" before playing, and not every person wins. Not even half the people who play win in a lottery. Why, then, do people find lotteries so thrilling?

You might hear a few responses like this: "Well, I play because I get a chance to win money and I am helping my education system when I play." Or, "A lottery is better than raising taxes." But the Bible makes some strong statements about the way money is acquired and spent:

"You shall not bring the hire of a harlot, or the wages of a dog, into the house of the Lord Thy God for any votive offering; for both of these are an abomination to the Lord your God" (Deuteronomy 23:18).

This scripture tells us that there are some forms of money which are actually tainted because of the sinful purpose for which the money was used. In the above scripture, we see that money gained by prostitution is considered an abomination to God. In the New Testament, we are warned about people who are motivated by a desire for "filthy lucre" or "sordid gain" (see Titus 1:11). In other words, there is "good money" and "bad money" in God's eyes. God will bring His curse on an individual, a family, a business, a church, or an institution which operates on sordid income - such as money derived from gambling, extortion, illegal business operations, prostitution, pornography, or the sale of illegal drugs.

What then will happen to the economy of a state or a nation if it begins to gain its support from sordid gain? We are told that civil authority is an agent of God in Romans 13:1-5. Does God want civil government receiving funds from gambling establishments, or promoting the practice of gambling in any form? No - and He will not bless a national economy which allows this kind of money to be acquired. He will allow poverty and all other kinds of economic judgments to come until the problem is corrected.

States have sold out to the idea that the end justifies the means. A University of Michigan study indicates that the poor spend a greater portion of their income on gambling than other classes.⁴ The stated idea behind lotteries is usually "to help the poorer counties with increased revenues and improve their communities." However, governments are actually tempting people to squander what little money they do have. Plus, the addiction to gambling can cause further deterioration of the family unit in the community.

I was in a convenience store the other day and a gentlemen bought two $1 lottery tickets. He won $20 with one of the tickets. His next response to the clerk was, "Now I guess I will have to play again until I spend the $20 I won." His net gain will be 0, but the effect will be the desire to continue to play.

Some people spend $20 to $100 a week in the hopes of winning maybe $20, and then they start all over again. Their overall chance of winning the grand prize in the most famous Illinois "Super Lotto" is one in seven million. (The chance of being hit by lightning is one in 1.9 million.⁵ So your chances of being hit by lightning are better than winning the "Super Lotto.")

Many of the states that have started the lottery system have not realized the desired result. New Jersey and Nevada had to raise taxes despite their increased "revenue."⁶ What about the increased revenue for these states? In Kentucky, 50 percent of the revenue is earmarked for prizes, and about 20 percent for administration fees. That leaves around 30 percent for the education system. So in reality most of the money is being dispersed from those that buy tickets to the "lucky" few who win. Remember that the majority of people buying these tickets are the poor. Sounds noble in theory - but in reality it does not work.

Why Is Gambling So Offensive to God?

The Bible tells us that God is a good God who desires to bless those who serve Him; He rewards those who walk in obedience to His precepts. Part of this blessing is financial. In Deuteronomy 8:18 we are told that it is God "Who gives the power to make wealth."

But those who turn to gambling to acquire wealth are rejecting God's provision and His hand of blessing. And, although it is usually done in ignorance, gamblers are actually serving another god: the god of fortune and luck. In many ancient cultures people worshipped the god of Fortune - they placed their lives in the hands of an impersonal force who arbitrarily controlled their destiny. People do the same today under the guise of "luck." If they experience a good year financially, success in their business, or romantic fulfillment, then they offer thanks to fate, luck, or some other superstitious force to which they attribute the events of their lives.

But God does not want us to serve the gods of fortune and chance. He does not want us to be controlled by superstition and pagan ideas of fate. His command is clear:

"You shall have no other gods before Me" (Exodus 20:3).

Those who serve the Lord are not taking a chance with their fate or wagering their future on uncertain odds. Those who choose to serve fortune, however, are betting with their very lives and their eternal salvation. For those who are tempted to do this, the words of Jesus Himself are clear: "What does it profit a man if he gains the whole world but loses his soul?" (Matthew 16:26).

Are You Ready To Be a Hero?

by Jay L. Thompson

In the height of World War I, a Southern backwoodsman named Alvin York was drafted into the Army. His upbringing and hunting experience had developed his marksmanship to the point of rivaling Jessie James. However, this was a man of convictions. Due to his religious beliefs, he filed an exemption as a conscientious objector. But after much counsel and prayer, he decided to help, "Make the world safe for democracy."

After his training he crossed the ocean to the Western Front in France where he nearly single-handedly defeated, disarmed, and captured a whole squadron of German soldiers. His courageous action helped to win the strategic battle of the Argonne Forest.

Years later, before the U.S. was forced by the attack of Pearl Harbor to enter WWII, Ret. Sergeant Alvin York commented, "...the thing they forget is that liberty and freedom and democracy are so very precious that you do not fight to win them once and stop. Liberty and freedom and democracy are prizes awarded only to those people who fight to win them and then keep fighting eternally to hold them!" We would greatly benefit from understanding this statement.

What is a hero? Noah Webster's definition is, "A man (or woman) of distinguished valor, intrepidity or enterprise in (the face of) danger." According to the American Heritage dictionary, a hero is, "anyone noted for feats of courage or nobility of purpose, especially one who has risked or sacrificed his life."

Do we have heroes today? Yes, but many of the most popular heroes are not all that heroic. Rock musicians and macho movie stars are high on the hero lists. Not that I'm down on all the movies and musicians. There are some good ones, but Boy George and Michael Jackson? Come on! It seems the greatest danger these type of "heroes" face is to be trampled by their fans. Nothing heroic about that.

Many times it seems the true hero catches the blame for others' irresponsible actions rather than getting the credit they deserve. Our Vietnam veterans are a prime example. There were no ticker tape parades when they returned.

Recently we were shown another example of this paradox. A patriotic Lt. colonel and decorated veteran of Vietnam was sent through the congressional ringer for the insidious crime of aiding and abetting our friends, the freedom fighters in Nicaragua. From watching the hearings on TV you would think the inquisition committee was selected by the KGB.

Though none of us know all the details about Colonel Oliver North, it would be safe to assume that anyone with seven rows of medals on his chest, including a Purple Heart, a Gold star, and two crosses of Gallantry, can't be all bad.

The question posed by the title of this article assumes that we are in need of heroes today. Everyone wants to be a hero but few are willing to pay the price for the role. Many a hero has undoubtedly lived and died without a single headline telling the story. Are you ready to pay the price of heroism even if the credit is given to someone else? It is not the celebrated hero image that we need today, but rather the self-sacrificing compassion and courage that a true hero is made of.

The battles rage on many fronts; drugs, moral degradation, disease, and communism. Only those with a fearless character devoid of selfishness will be able to last in the war we are fighting now. Others will either sit it out or become a casualty. Do you have the moral fiber to take the heat? We could all use some additional development in such virtues as courage, perseverance, and loyalty. This is the substance of true heroes. The time is now to prepare. Unsung heroes are always in shorter supply than demand for them. As a result there are many unfilled gaps. Will you be like Alvin York and fill one of them? The question is, "Are you ready to be a hero?"

Humanist Loses Battle

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - The Supreme Court recently rejected a university professor's appeal to offer a "non-theistic" invocation during the opening sessions of Congress. Paul Kurtz, professor of philosophy at New York State University in Buffalo and drafter of A Secular Humanist Declaration (1980), filed an appeal in the Federal District Court.

The lower Court of Appeals ruled that Kurtz lacked standing to challenge Congress for not inviting him as a guest "chaplain." He claimed that Congress violated the First Amendment guarantee of free speech and the principle of church-state separation, and that it was discriminatory to deny him the opportunity to share his humanistic beliefs.

The Secular Humanist Declaration is a sequel to the Humanist Manifesto I (1933) and Humanist Manifesto II (1973). According to the document, "Secular humanists ... reject the idea that God intervened miraculously in history or revealed himself to a chosen few, or that he can save or redeem sinners ... We reject the divinity of Jesus."

Churches Respond with Compassion to Hurricane Victims

CHARLESTON, S.C. (FR) - In the aftermath of Hurricane Hugo, church groups from all over the Southeast have volunteered their services to provide relief to the disaster-stricken coastal area of South Carolina.

"Without the churches I don't know what we would have done," said the Governor's deputy chief of staff, Bob McAlister, as he praised the Christian community for their "incredible outpouring of sacrificial assistance."

After devastating the Caribbean Islands, Hurricane Hugo's 135 mile an hour winds ripped into South Carolina's coast on September 22 destroying millions of dollars of property and leaving many of the state's poor, rural area residents homeless. Half of South Carolina has been declared a disaster area and while most of the attention has been focused on Charleston, hit hardest were residents in several poor counties.

It has been mainly volunteers from Christian churches and organizations who have led the emergency relief efforts. The result has been the spontaneous creation of a people-to-people network in which state agencies and churches have worked together to supply people in need.

"We're not looking at whether we're crossing the church-state barrier," said one church spokesman, "we'll worry about that later if someone fusses. Right now we're just trying to help some people."

Relief materials, supplies and workers have come from many diverse backgrounds and have knit together to help thousands of residents rebuild their lives. A sampling of churches and Christian groups involved in the relief effort include: Columbia's Trenholm Road United Methodist Church; The South Carolina Southern Baptist Convention; Columbia Bible College and Seminary; Church of the Nazarene and World Relief; and the Salvation Army.

Bob McAlister said that it has been the Southern Baptists, in particular, who have been magnificent in their efforts with a "ready-to-go" disaster plan, set in motion before Hugo's winds hit the coast. McAlister said now that the media attention has died down, the most needed and critical work is yet to be done.

"The churches will need to mount a monumental effort to provide long-term spiritual and material care for thousands of families who need to put their lives back together from scratch," McAlister said. "The government can help in many ways but it cannot provide one critical element - personal love. That's the ingredient the churches are going to have to provide."

In God We Trust on our currency

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - "In God We Trust." This affirmation of faith was put on U.S. currency at the urging of a Christian preacher, and may come off of U.S. currency at the urging of atheists, according to the National Legal Foundation, a group organized by religious broadcaster Pat Robertson.

In a full-page ad run in USA Today, the National Legal Foundation claimed Madalyn Murray O'Hair is preparing to renew her attempts to have the slogan stricken from U.S. currency. No lawsuit has been filed yet, but National Legal Foundation Executive Director Robert Skolrood explains, "We called, and she said she was going after it again. She said she was devoting the rest of her life to getting 'In God We Trust' off U.S. currency."

In 1978 O'Hair sued the federal government to have the phrase removed from currency. She lost that lawsuit in a federal district court, and her appeals of that decision were turned down.

Skolrood said the ad in USA Today was intended to give Christians warning to unite in their support for the motto. "Maybe all this publicity will make her sit back and think," he speculated. "Maybe we can scare her out of [filing a lawsuit]."

John Murray, president of American Atheists, said "In God We Trust" is a hot issue for the group. "We do want to refile," he said. "We have an all new Supreme Court. They are more conservative, but you never know. If we can't get [a hearing], then we can wait another ten years and try again."

Murray told Baptist Press his organization's goals include removing "under God" from the pledge of allegiance, removing "In God We Trust" from currency, and changing the national motto from "In God We Trust" to "E Pluribus Unum." He said, "We're going to keep at it until [laws] are changed, until those public arenas are secular. We want a nation with a government that is completely neutral about religion."

L.A. Prays for Peace

Church members prayed at Sunday services on May 3, just a few days after riots erupted in the wake of the Rodney King verdict.

Days later on May 7, Christians all over the nation gathered for a national day of prayer. The racial tensions were the focus as hundreds of thousands of believers publicly repented for the sins of our nation.

The purpose of National Day of Prayer is for believers of all denominations to come together to repent of the sins of our nation and ask God to heal our land. The violence that erupted a week earlier in Los Angeles brought out unprecedented numbers of people. In many cities, people met at city hall to pray at noon.

Largest Drug Shipment in U.S. History Found by Fed Agents

Supposedly the largest cocaine seizure in U.S. history took place in late April in Tampa, Florida. Thousands of Brazilian cedar boards that had been hollowed out and stuffed with Colombian cocaine were x-rayed and split apart by federal agents, according to the Associated Press.

Federal agents were tipped off from an anonymous letter from Cali, Colombia, about a freighter, Amazon Sky, which would dock in Florida with 4,000 kilograms of cocaine. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agents believe the cocaine was imported by the "Cali Cartel," a world-class competitor of the "Medellin Cartel," the violent Colombian gang believed to be responsible for up to 80 percent of U.S. cocaine imports.

Lee Atwater Makes a Change:

"I've found Jesus Christ - It's that simple. He's made a difference."

2/91

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - GOP chairman, Lee Atwater, the man behind the hard-ball political tactics of George Bush's 1988 presidential campaign, announced recently that he has "found Jesus Christ."

"It's that simple," said Atwater shortly after being treated for an inoperable brain tumor. "He's made a difference, and I'm glad I've found Him while there's still time." Now the man who turned the release of rapist Willie Horton and the Pledge of Allegiance into national issues in an unrelenting attack on Michael Dukakis during the 1988 presidential campaign wants the world to know about his change toward compassion.

After having destroyed the political reputation of the Democratic candidate, Atwater testified: "I don't hate anyone anymore. For the first time in my life I don't hate somebody. I have nothing but good feelings toward people."

In the most dramatic, spiritual conversion since that of President Richard Nixon's hatchet man, Chuck Colson, Lee Atwater has promised to make peace with those he has mistreated. He now admits that having made disparaging remarks about Columbia attorney Tom Turnispeed's clinical treatment for depression was one of the "low points" of his career.

Atwater's circumstances have made his dramatic turnabout understandable. Yet he has indicated that his is a genuine and lasting change. After having made remarkable progress in his treatment for brain cancer, which came shortly after his conversion, Atwater announced that he will stand for re-election to his party post.

Major Networks Losing Control of Audiences

The "Big Three" major networks, ABC, NBC and CBS, which have shaped American television for the last two decades, are apparently losing their monopolistic control over the public. Viewers instead are turning to VCR's, cable, and an "upstart fourth network," Christian Broadcasting Network (CBN), which has enjoyed a steady increase in viewership.

The Big Three have suffered "audience erosion" with 70 percent of the combined share audience watching, compared to 92 percent in 1978. "We are still the Goliath of broadcasting, but we will be slain by all the little Davids, if we don't pay attention to them," said Howard Stringer, president of the CBS Broadcast group.

CBN was considered the "upstart fourth network," by Time Magazine in its recent article, "The Big Boys' Blues" (October 17, 1988). Spokesman Darlene Smyda said, "We've definitely had an increase in viewers. As of October 11th, we had 42 million households." CBN's "Family Channel" viewership has steadily increased since 1981, and grew by two million since last May. Smyda said the audience is not necessarily a religious audience, but simply those who like family programming.

Despite attempts to develop new sitcom material to appeal to newer and narrow audiences such as yuppies and single mothers, and to scale down production costs, the decline among the three networks shows no signs of leveling off. Over 3,500 employees have been laid off in the last two years at all Big Three networks. They are also expanding their revenue base by investing in production of documentaries and home videos.

Although networks are diversifying their profits, decline of influence seems cast in concrete. Eugene Secunda, professor of marketing at Baruch College in New York City, told Time, "You're dealing with inevitable decline. It's like those folks who kidded themselves that the Roman Empire was going to go on forever. It was an illusion."

Analysts project that the influence of the major networks will be dispersed among eight or 10 networks, thus fragmenting competition. Some observers say bad TV programming isn't the reason for the drop in viewership; instead it is new technologies such as home satellite dishes and fiber-optic cable. Also, the average viewer today isn't sampling every TV show, which is much different from the viewer of the late 1970s who watched everything. Today's viewers have cable TV, home video and other independent stations from which to select from.

Medical Professionals say prayer helps

SAN FRANCISCO, CA (EP) - Prayer for recovery may help the healing process, according to a study published in the Journal of the American Medical Association. A scientific study found that hospitalized heart patients had fewer complications when others prayed for their recovery.

The 1982-83 study was conducted by Dr. Randolph Byrd at San Francisco General Medical Center's coronary care unit. Byrd's study randomly assigned half of 393 patients to a control group and half to an experimental group. Members of the experimental group were prayed for by groups of three to seven born-again Christians, while members of the control group were not on the prayer lists.

Patients were not told which group they were in, and had no contact with the praying Christians. Byrd himself did not know which patients were in which group until after he evaluated their progress.

The study found that while the two groups were equally sick when they entered the hospital, patients in the experimental group had fewer complications during their stay, and were less likely to need antibiotics, diuretics, or the insertion of tubes for feeding or breathing.

Past studies have examined the efficacy of prayer by people who know the patient; this is the first controlled study in which strangers prayed for strangers.

Byrd noted that family and friends were probably praying for most of the patients in the study, blurring the distinction between the two groups. He wrote that this "may have resulted in smaller differences between the two groups."

A Meeting with President Bush

By John D. Beckett
8/92

On April 21, 1992, fifteen evangelical leaders met with President Bush at the White House. I was privileged to be among them, representing Intercessors for America.

While I have had this opportunity several times before, during the Reagan and Bush administrations, I would be remiss to not express gratitude to the Lord for the fact that this can happen at all, that we have in our highest public office men who desire to communicate with the Christian community.

The President asked that our time would be an open forum, and in his opening remarks placed on the table some of the issues he thought most deserved discussion - pornography, Israel, education and abortion.

The lead off participant opted for "none of the above," and while sincerely thanking the President for his strong and uncompromising stand on the abortion issue, said the issue of homosexuality needed clarification within the context of Mr. Bush's emphasis on strong family values, especially since, "signals have been sent that are conflicting."

Homosexuality

The President said he would continue to discuss family values in a broad sense, that he would hold to good standard in his administration, and that he would continue to practice what he's preaching. "But," he said, "I believe I've said before, and I'm perfectly prepared to say it again, that the codification of this [homosexual] lifestyle is not needed." He added that while we must obviously enforce laws that are against discrimination, "I don't want to accept laws that ask society to make that lifestyle acceptable to the American people, and I'll adhere to that decision."

The possibility exists, another participant noted, that there may be a specific opportunity to implement this view, citing the "Domestic Partnership Ordinance" recently passed by the District of Columbia, and that there would likely be a congressional resolution, which would then come to the President for signature. The President responded emphatically that if the D.C. ordinance condones males marrying males, "Put me down as opposed."

The discussion shifted to AIDS, a disease which the President affirmed is largely behavioral, "coming from a lifestyle of homosexuality or from shooting drugs," and that innocent people are then victimized. He said his Easter weekend had been marred by a homosexual group who engaged in open male kissing in the town square of Kennebunkport, Maine, whose message was, "George, change your behavior."

Said the President: "I bring it up because it is being used against me as being insensitive and lacking compassion on AIDS. I'm not. I'm deeply concerned about the victims of AIDS, innocent or even otherwise."

Israel

A participant asked for further discussion on Israel, saying that there is a perception that when we take a stand against Israel, such as in refusing loan guarantees, we are applying constraints on Israel that we don't apply to other nations.

The President disagreed. "I think our relationship and record with Israel has been superb." Except for the loan guarantee question, he didn't think Israel had an argument with us. "We, and every preceding administration, have always been opposed to the settlements."

Mr. Bush asserted his view that the best hope for Israel is a successful conclusion of the peace talks. "We got these parties to the peace table. Nobody has ever been able to do that in history." He further noted the strong contribution we have made regarding the exit of Soviet and Ethiopian Jews, and our stand against an anti-Zionism resolution in the UN last year.

"Our commitment to Israel's security has not changed, and the special relationship between Israel and the U.S. has not changed," he said.

The Past Four Years

Another from our group commended the President for the significant accomplishments of the past four years, with the threat of nuclear war turned back, the elimination of the cold war, the leadership demonstrated during the difficult period just over a year ago in the Middle East.

These accomplishments are all but obscured by the economy now, the President responded. "I have to bear the burden of a sorry record in terms of growth and new jobs, but we're going through it. But ... our kids don't climb under desks, as they used to, rehearsing a nuclear attack. And that's something major, something significant."

Prayer

I was able to ask the President how he wanted us to pray for him, given his unique position and the intensity of pressures that he faces. Without hesitation, Mr. Bush said, "what I pray for is strength to do the job, to do what's right, and to be fair in the process. And then the family."

We concluded by responding to his request and praying together. Mr. Bush was genuinely grateful for this prayer. In fact, following the meeting he commented to me how much he appreciated being asked how we should pray for him.

Once again, I see how relevant is Paul's instruction to Timothy: "I exhort first of all that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men, for kings and all who are in authority ..." 1 Timothy 2:1,2.

National Council of Churches

NEW YORK CITY, NY (FR) - The National Council of Churches (NCC), known by many as the most liberal religious organization in the U.S., is reported to be in serious financial straits because of declining membership in the mainline churches which support its work.

"Much of their income is based on the membership of the churches they represent," said Dr. Tim LaHaye of the American Coalition for Traditional Values. "These liberal, main-line churches have been losing members during the past few years, due to the extreme liberalism expressed from their pulpits."

The NCC typically condones abortion, feminism, massive government regulation, and homosexuality. "It is no accident," continued Dr. LaHaye, "that at a time when conservative churches are bulging at their seams, liberal churches are dying."

The National and International Religion Report (Nov. 20, 1988) released statistics to show that the NCC has been consistently cutting its staff during recent years. In 1968, 187 people were employed in its New York office. In 1988, that figure had dropped to 83; at a recent board meeting, an announcement was made that the staff would be cut again to 61 in 1989.

LaHaye believes that one of the main reasons for the NCC's problems has been its support for radical causes - including many communist regimes throughout the world. "This has disillusioned many of the laity who have taken steps to withhold funds from the NCC," he added.

NCC Treasurer Joyce Sohl, of the United Methodist Church, acknowledged the Council's financial difficulties, emphasizing that "the crisis did not just start in 1988. It started several years ago. It has affected various parts of the Council at different times."

National Day of Prayer

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - For the first time in U.S. history, a bill enacting a permanent national day of prayer passed both houses. The Senate bill, S. 1378, was introduced by South Carolina Senator Strom Thurmond, while the House version was introduced by Ohio democrat Tony Hall.

The measure amends a 1952 law which required the president to proclaim a day of his choosing each year. President Reagan signed the bill into law in the Oval Office on May 5th and read a prayer translated from Russian. The prayer was found on a young soldier, Alexander Zatzepa, who was killed in action in 1944.

Rep. Hall said at a "Praise and Celebration Banquet" held in conjunction with the event that he was surprised that the measure went through so fast. Usually a commemorative measure needs 218 signatures, but the requirement was waived. "Now it's settled on the calenders of Americans," said Tim Bobbit, spokesman for the National Day of Prayer Task Force.

In addition to passage of the measure, 33 governors and over 150 mayors issued proclamations in their respective states and cities to commemorate the day of prayer. "We've definitely seen more participation compared to last year," said Susan Sorensen, spokeswoman for the National Prayer Committee.

In Chicago, city coordinator Sue Peterson organized 6,000 people to pray every hour. Olympic Gold Medalist John Naber was the keynote speaker at a prayer breakfast in Pasadena, California. There were 100 mayoral proclamations in Maine and 20 in Louisiana.

The measure was the result of an unusual bi-partisan effort. Four congressmen co-sponsored the measure: Rep. Carlos Moorhead (R-CA), Rep. Robert Garcia (D-NY), Rep. Frank Wolf (R-VA), and Rep. Tony Hall(D-OH). Senate co-sponsors were: Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-SC), Bill Armstrong (R-CO), Sen. Howard Heflin (D-AL), and Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-FL).

The National Prayer Committee was started in 1982 to coordinate and implement the commemorated day of prayer. Sorensen said there has been a steady increase in the number of governors and mayors participating. "The only hindrance is the state not knowing about it. However, a lot of other groups hold observances that we are not even aware of." The first day of prayer was declared by the Continental Congress in 1775. In Reagan's 1987 proclamation, he stated, "On our National Day of Prayer, then, we join together as people of many faiths to petition God to show us His mercy and His love, to heal our weariness and uphold our hope, that we might live ever mindful of His justice and thankful for His blessing."

Reagan further urged "...the citizens of this great nation to gather together on that day in homes and places of worship to pray, each after his or her own manner, for unity of hearts of all mankind."

Poll: 1960's Generation More Religious than National Average

3/88

Gainesville, FL (FR)-Youths during the 60's anti-establishment period are today more religious than the national average, according to a poll conducted by Better Homes and Gardens. It was the magazine's first poll on religion which garnered 80,000 responses - triple the usual response rate.

The respondents had a median annual income of $38,333 and 77 percent were college educated. The median age was 40-years-old and most were in their 20's during the 1960s. More than 80 percent are married with children, and 50 percent said spirituality is gaining influence in U.S. family life.

Eighty-seven percent said they are as religious, or more so, than their parents, and 62 percent said that they have intensified personal spiritual activities. They also attend religious services more often than the general population; 75 percent attend at least once a week and half more often than that.

Teen-agers are also more religiously inclined than their parents with 52 percent that attend services weekly, compared to 40 percent of adults, according to polls conducted by the Gallup organization.

Robertson and the Reagan Gap

by Garry Wills

Review of Time article

4/88

An editorial columnist for Time magazine said presidential candidate Pat Robertson is striking a chord in the hearts of the American people - and that political analysts are making a serious mistake if they ignore Robertson's message about the need for a return to traditional values. The articulate defense of the Robertson presidential bid ("Robertson and the Reagan Gap," February 22, 1988) was unprecedented for a secular news journal like Time.

Garry Wills, a professor of American Culture and Public Policy at Northwestern University, said in his political analysis in Time, "A moral alarm clock is going off in America, and not many politicians hear it. Pat Robertson does, and so do more of his fellow citizens than we less godly folk have been willing to admit."

Dr. Wills has written six books on American presidents, including his most recent Reagan's America. Wills proposed in his editorial that much of what Pat Robertson has been saying about prayer in schools, abortion, collectivism, the Supreme Court, creationism, drugs, and homosexuality have all been a part of Ronald Reagan's message at one time or another ... "Only Robertson means it."

In the 1984 elections, President Ronald Reagan's support was primarily among the youth, and his message on the need for morality in the nation catapulted him into office. "Reagan did have an uncanny ability to address the spiritual discomfort of his followers, their sense that America was ceasing to be what it had always been in its own citizens' eyes: a moral nation.

"Reagan renewed the sense of an America shaped historically by spiritual hungers," said Dr. Wills. Belief in America and belief in God complemented each other in Reagan's message. However, these beliefs which were the foundation of our nation's institutions have been kicked out from under them, and today Americans see their children "growing up in an atmosphere abuzz with libidinous solicitings, sitting transfixed before Technicolor celebrations of greed and lust and violence, lured through many conduits toward experiment with drugs or rebellion.

"The signs of moral revolt have been there for some time," said Wills, adding that Robertson is picking up these warning signs and addressing them in his campaign message. These signals include the undermining of parental authority by teachers who are "morally adrift as they continue to try to control student bodies bordering on thuggery," pornography on cable television, divorce, open "living arrangements" by the unmarried, and acceptance of the homosexual lifestyle.

Even the Democrats have tried to attract this quiet yet growing movement toward morality, added Wills.

An example is Jesse Jackson's political program to curb teen pregnancy."America has until very recently been a moralist and a moralizing country," stated the professor.

"The most glaring evidence of a moral hunger in today's electorate has been, as Robertson points out, the Reagan popularity," continued Wills. Although Reagan accomplished little on social issues, his annual addresses to religious broadcasters and pro-life organizations went beyond Pentacostals or Evangelicals. "Most Americans nodded along with Reagan's regular mentions of prayer, his claim that he survived assassination by a special providence of God, his assertion that all the answers to life's problems can be found in the Bible."

Today the Republican Party is suffering from a "Reagan Gap," he said. "Robertson offers Reaganism without the actor's human face. Those advocating writing off Robertson as a viable candidate," Wills warned, "need to tread with caution."

One of the common arguments against Robertson is "that he cannot go beyond his base of Pentacostals and Evangelicals." Although this may be true, Wills affirmed that Robertson's base is a large one. According to a Time poll in January of this year, one-third of Americans called themselves born-again. Fifty-seven percent agree with the statement, "We are a religious nation and religious values should serve as a guide to what our political leaders do in office."

Robertson opponents also say that his voters are mainly first-timers who may be one-timers."Robertson may be bringing in new voters, but they are people who have been specifically mobilized by a sense of mission, by the feeling that they must 'take back' this country for God," Wills said. The lack of political sophistication or financial clout hasn't stopped the movement from growing.

Robertson opponents also claim that his supporters have low income and less education, and are traditionally less active and influential in party politics. However, Wills pointed out that Robertson "got the youngest vote in Iowa, just as President Reagan carried the young in 1984." Fifty-four percent of evangelicals are under 50 years of age, and these figures are in line with Robertson's present support base.

Others dispute that the "kook factor will do Robertson in," said Wills. However, he referred to a University of Chicago National Opinion Research council which reported that 29 percent of Americans have had visions of some sort, and 67 percent have experienced the supernatural."Obviously, there are a lot of people out there who believe the Spirit of God is touching them," he said.

"What makes Robertson a threat is not the medium but, precisely, the message," Wills said. "Thus Robertson's foes must be careful about overkill. Calling him an Ayatullah points to a truth not intended - that religion is a powerful national force, not only in exotic places but also in their own familiar country."

Wills ended his editorial by stating that "Americans need to become more attuned to their country's desires before concluding that today's moral crisis is easily handled with secular expertise."

Dr. Ruth Westheimer

NEW YORK CITY (FR) - Dr. Ruth Westheimer, the popular sexologist, made some very startling remarks at a recent New York City Council committee meeting about the need to teach morality in public schools. Her statements were shocking to those who know her as an outspoken proponent of casual, premarital sex.

Speaking at the New York City Council's Education Committee, Westheimer said: "I believe we have to teach morality in public schools. A value-free sex education curriculum is not possible." Her comments were made during a hearing on AIDS education in the city's schools.

"I realize that you can't force a student to choose when to have sex, but we must be able to teach what Catholicism and Judaism teach: ... that premarital sex is not permitted. If a student is committed to that belief, then they should stick to it." Westheimer also insisted that educators need to frame the values of their teaching in the historical context of our cultural heritage. Dr. Westheimer's remarks were reprinted in a New York City newspaper, and in The American Spirit, a publication of the American Constitutional Committee of New York.

School Prayer Bill to be Introduced

9/89

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - Rep. William Dannemeyer (R-Calif.) has announced plans to introduce a constitutional amendment permitting "voluntary prayer" and teaching of "the Judeo-Christian ethic" in public schools.

In a press conference called to announce the planned amendment, Dannemeyer decried the "disturbing judicial trend" that "has effectively kicked God out of public schools."

He suggested that the lack of religious influence in public schools was responsible for "intellectually deprived youths, materialistic attitudes, child abuse, teenage pregnancies, and abortions."

The Rev. Robert L. Maddox, executive director of Americans United for separation of Church and State, spoke against the proposed constitutional amendment as "an open-ended invitation to politicians to legislate in sensitive matters of religious belief."

Pollster Says Silber May Win in Massachusetts

BOSTON, MA (FR) - Boston University president John Silber narrowly succeeded in winning the needed 15 delegates at the Massachusetts state Democratic convention last month to place his name on the primary ballot as a candidate for Governor. "Now," said a campaign worker, "It is time to get his stance on the issues out there for the people to decide."

Silber could likely win the primary and would be a shoe-in for Governor in the general election in substantively Democratic Massachusetts. Silber's stern morality and his tirades against the financially disastrous administration of Michael Dukakis have made him a formidable opponent.

According to pollster Gerry Chervinsky: "If he gets going on substance, Silber is going to win."

"The issues of the election are clear," says Silber. "Massachusetts voters want answers. They want to know what gubernatorial candidates will do about problems in education, the economy, the budget, crime, the environment."

High on Silber's list of proposed reforms includes the entire educational system of Massachusetts. "Grassroots direction of education places responsibility where it belongs - within individual communities rather than with bureaucrats on Beacon Hill."

Even Silber's critics concede that Boston University's standard of excellence has increased dramatically during his nineteen year tenure. The university has improved both academically and financially. Now he promises to bring his success as an educator to the state level.

Silber's penchant for controversy and colorful language has made him a national figure. Columnist George Will called him "the most interesting candidate in America this year." He effectively lambasted a heavily stacked Democratic state convention last month by comparing the 15 percent threshold to the "exclusionary tactics" used by Southern white supremacists to keep blacks out of politics.

The candidacy of a Democratic candidate who is decidedly conservative on issues of morality and national policy and yet favors strong social programs to benefit the poor, minorities and the public school system is an enigma in liberal Massachusetts. Yet his belief that the current fiscal crisis can be solved and his role as an outsider to Massachusetts politics has earned him favor in the eyes of citizens of the Bay State.

What will the Souter appointment mean?

By Jay Rogers
9/90

Late in July President George Bush nominated David Souter for the position of the next Supreme Court Justice.

As soon as the nomination was announced, both pro-life and pro-abortion groups were scrambling to find a way to flush out Souter's unknown stance on the abortion issue. Souter, a conservative who holds a strict constructionist method of interpreting the Constitution, has the rapt attention of groups that focus on abortion.

One day after the nomination, Kate Michelman of the National Abortion Rights Action League, met with a group of pro-abortion advocates to discuss her concern over Souter nomination. Judie Brown, president of the American Life League is also urging pro-life Senators to question Souter on his stance.

Yet, since Souter is a constructionist, his view on abortion may not matter. Constructionism applies the "original intent" of the Constitution to judicial matters. Souter's approach is that of judicial restraint and adherence to the text of the Constitution. Souter fits President Bush's description of a justice "who will be on there not to legislate from the bench, but to faithfully interpret the Constitution."

In the 1989 Webster decision, four judges (Rehnquist, White, Kennedy and Scalia) wanted to overturn Roe vs. Wade. These justices are known to dispute the Constitutional basis for nationally recognized abortion rights. With the addition of Souter, the court may gain a majority of justices that view a women's "fundamental right" to choose abortion as a fabrication of the 1972 Court.

With a constructionist majority, the Supreme Court would likely reverse the Roe vs. Wade decision. Many of the past decisions of the Court involved interpretations derived from "rights" found nowhere in the Constitution.

National Right to Life Committee spokesman Douglas Johnson said, "A judicial constructionist would continue the trend toward the abandonment of a tragic constitutional error. As a result, legislators should be free to adopt stronger legal protections for unborn babies." Johnson later added, "We continue to believe that Roe vs. Wade cannot survive."

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to commence confirmation hearings on Souter's nomination on September 13.

The Great Escaping Scoop - or - How to Evade the Story of the Century

News Service 2000 Commentary

by David Aikman

1/88

When an obscure peanut farmer from Plains, Georgia, offered himself as a candidate for the democratic nomination for the presidency in 1976, the only surprising part of his Renaissance-style resume (farmer, businessman, nuclear engineer, naval officer, etc.) was the listing of the profession "Christian" along with all the others.

What did he mean, inquired the bemused but curious Washington press corps that had been unleashed upon this particular candidate? Southern Baptist, okay, but Christian? Was this some new church denomination?

When Carter obligingly explained that he was a "born-again" Christian - the quotation marks are still obligatory in the nation's major newspapers - the curiosity turned to bafflement. What strange beast was that? A snake-handler, perhaps, or something to do with Billy Graham? In capital cities around the world American foreign correspondents confessed to their Japanese friends that they, too, couldn't understand what a "born-again Christian" was.

Jimmy Carter, as everyone now knows, survived this first bout with the provinciality of the nation's major newspaper reporters. In fact, he enjoyed the last laugh by winning a decisive majority among the nation's evangelical voters in the 1976 general election, even though his margin of victory nationally was a razor-thin two percent.

But there was little for most of us to smirk about. At a time when, according to the pollster George Gallup, some 40 million Americans described themselves as "born again," the term was obviously as unfamiliar to most American news reporters as the Tibetan Book of the Dead.

In a vague effort to push the concept of a large, grass-roots American evangelical community out of sight and mind, therefore, much of the media resorted to the safe old standby term for people of religious conviction: they were "fundamentalists." The word, with its unmistakable odor of uncouthness and fanaticism, had the useful effect of consigning evangelicals to the category of the unreportable: what they believed somehow shouldn't be taken seriously; and anyway, they were all rather tedious.

America's "fundamentalists," however, wouldn't conveniently go away. Having supported Jimmy Carter, they then demonstrated an annoying unpredictability in 1980 by deserting him in droves to vote for his Republican opponent, Ronald Reagan. And they kept growing. A 1985 Gallup testing of evangelical Christians found that the 40 million, in less than a decade, had grown to some 90 million. Other studies confirmed the findings: 94 percent of Americans believed in a personal God, 40 percent or more attended church weekly, and by every other criterion, America was a far more religious country in the 1980's than it had been for decades.

All of these developments were barely noticed by the American media. Even such tell-tale signs as a consistent growth in American missionaries being sent overseas, failed to alert the vast majority of the nation's reporters to the unique phenomenon taking place in their midst, namely, one of the most dramatic nationwide increases in evangelical Christian belief for nearly a century.

Overseas, of course, the rapid growth of Christian churches in the Third World escaped notice altogether on the part of the stars of investigative journalism. It was not until the overthrow of the Shah of Iran in 1979, the U.S. hostage crisis, and the Ayatollah Khomeini's export of his radical Islamic views that consciousness began to dawn. Something, obviously, was afoot within Islam. Of course, it must be fundamentalism!

The failure to observe at all, not to mention to analyze and explain, the rise of evangelical Christianity in the U.S. over a period of two decades must constitute one of the great modern blind spots of the American journalistic mind. It is a failure sadly paralleled by the inability of Western reporters during the same period to grasp the scope of the Khomeinist Islamic revival, or the dangerous reverberations of a renascent Islam, even among Muslim communities around the world not belonging to the minority Shi'ite sect of Islam dominant in Iran.

Finally, there is a third media failure in the category of modern faiths, that of not explaining how the 20th century's great secular religion, Marxism, has continued to attract Third World adherents when its economic tenets have been universally demonstrated to be false.

This singular media blindness has had all sorts of unpleasant consequences, and not just among American evangelicals who have had to endure the many prejudices - born of ignorance - that swoop around the public marketplace. Americans as a whole, have been short-changed by those whose job is to report the news and analyze events around the world. They have been kept in the dark about one of the great stories of the century, the emergence of a growing, perhaps mortal competition among the world's great religions for the ultimate loyalties of mankind.

Why has the U.S. press failed so conspicuously to do justice to this phenomenon? An ordinary explanation would be ignorance. But the fact is that the ignorance is at least partly wilful. Survey after survey of the U.S. media has confirmed one overwhelming fact: U.S. reporters tend to be overwhelmingly secular in their worldview, they tend not to respect religious faith in general, and they for the most part espouse a system of values that is inherently hostile to the traditional Western values handed down in the Bible.

In a well-known survey of 216 leading U.S. journalists conducted in 1981 by sociologists S. Robert Lichter and Stanley Rothman, 54 percent of the respondents thought adultery was not wrong, 75 percent considered homosexuality an acceptable life-style, 86 percent seldom or never went to church or synagogue, and 90 percent thought that abortion was an inherent right of women.

If those figures are frightening for Christians, they are likely to be even more strikingly skewed away from traditional values today than 6 years ago. Of course, the recent string of scandals and internecine squabbles within the evangelical community has not made the task of reporting sympathetically about it any easier. In fact, U.S. news organizations have at times displayed open hostility towards any Christian organization with a high profile and explicit evangelical positions, tarring much of Christendom with the opprobrium earned by only a small part of it.

In so doing, some journalists have departed from one of the first principles of their professional code of ethics: keeping personal likes and dislikes out of the business of reporting. They have, though, departed from a more important principle as well: being curious about life, and open-minded enough to ask a lot of questions. In theory, that's what journalists are supposed to do all along.

Is there a Christian solution to this? Yes, there is. But if it is simple, it is not easy. For years, Christians have been content to drift along with the changing fashions of trendy whims of the general populace. They have been confident that there isn't too much difference between Christian and non-Christian standards and behavior in private life and society.

That confidence is utterly misplaced in today's climate. If God's people are not to be completely swamped by the evolution of much of modern culture into barbarism and neo-paganism, then they must fashion the instruments of their own cultural expression, including their news media, for themselves. Otherwise, they will be unable to accomplish the very first thing, to discern the signs of the times. This refashioning includes, in a manner of speaking, re-inventing journalism, and applying to it the biblical standards evangelical Christians demand of their own and other Christians' private lives.

Little by little, in such outstanding locations as CBN University's journalism program, or in the Communications program of Youth With a Mission, this is being done. But until journalism as a whole has been significantly redeemed from its present sunken worldliness, one of the great stories of the millennium - how more people than ever before are finding Christ - is going to be lost to the world at large.

What we learned from Ted Bundy

- by Leilani Corpus

3/89

STARKE, FL (FR) - He was once an assistant director of the Seattle Crime Prevention advisory committee and even wrote a pamphlet instructing women on rape prevention. A one-time Boy Scout with a promising career in Washington state politics, Ted Bundy appeared to be an example of a good, upstanding citizen. But behind the congenial facade lurked a force which landed him in an electric chair in January of this year.

In the last few hours prior to his widely-publicized execution for the murder of as many as 50 young women and girls from Utah, Washington, Idaho, Colorado and Florida, the serial killer asked Christian psychologist James Dobson to visit him at the Florida State Prison. Bundy had corresponded with Dr. Dobson - a former member of President Reagan's Commission on Pornography - for two years prior to their meeting. While anxious reporters waited outside, Bundy told Dobson about the influence of pornography on his behavior.

Bundy said he began casually reading soft-core pornography when he was 12 or 13 years old. His friends found pornographic books in the garbage cans in his neighborhood: "(F)rom time to time we would come across pornographic books of a harder nature ... a more graphic, explicit nature than we would encounter at the local grocery store," he told Dobson in the taped interview. "But slowly throughout the years reading pornography began to become a deadly habit.

"My experience with pornography ... is once you become addicted to it, (and I look at this as a kind of addiction like other kinds of addiction), I would keep looking for more potent, more explicit, more graphic kinds of material. Like an addiction, you keep craving something that is harder, something which gives you a greater sense of excitement. Until you reach a point where the pornography only goes so far, you reach that jumping off point where you begin to wonder if maybe actually doing it would give you that which is beyond just reading or looking at it."

Within a few years, those latent desires fueled by pornography were expressed through his first murder. Although Bundy said he did not blame pornography, he explained that pornographic materials shaped and molded his behavior. He also warned the nation that "the most damaging kinds of pornography ... are those that involve violence and sexual violence. Because the wedding of those two forces, as I know only too well, brings out the hatred that is just, just too terrible to describe."

Bundy said that pornography "snatched me out of my home 20, 30 years ago ... and pornography can reach out and snatch a kid out of any house today." His religious training and morality initially restrained him from acting out his fantasies, but he confessed that finally, "I couldn't hold back anymore."

Alcohol supposedly broke the restraints for him to commit his first murder. "What alcohol did in conjunction with exposure to pornography is (sic) alcohol reduced my inhibitions at the same time the fantasy life that was fueled by pornography eroded them further."

While committing the murders, Bundy said he felt as if he was possessed by "something ... awful and alien. There is just absolutely no way to describe first the brutal urge to do that kind of thing, and then what happens is once it has been more or less satisfied and recedes, you might say, or spent, that energy level recedes and basically I become myself again."

"But basically I was a normal person. I wasn't some guy hanging out at bars or a bum. I wasn't a pervert in the sense that people look at somebody and say, 'I know there is something wrong with him, you can just tell.' I was essentially a normal person," Bundy told Dobson. "The basic humanity and the basic spirit that God gave me was intact, but unfortunately became overwhelmed at times."

Ted Bundy acknowledged that he deserved the death penalty, even though there were anti-death penalty demonstrators outside his prison cell up until the moment of his execution. "I deserve the most extreme punishment society has," he said. "But I don't want to die, I kid you not."

Dobson said that Bundy wept several times during the interview: "He expressed great regret, remorse for what he had done, for the families that were hurting." He spent his last night in prayer with a minister from Gainesville, Florida.

Bundy's last words of confession and warning about pornography are an echo of statistics, research, and reports conducted within the last decade about the link between pornography and sexually violent crime. Unfortunately, many of the warnings in those reports still have not been heeded, and pornography has been taken for granted or considered a necessary evil.

According to a study conducted by a group of psychologists, Neil Malamuth of UCLA, Gene Abel of Columbia University, and William Marshall of Kingston Penitentiary, various forms of pornography can elicit fantasies which may lead to crime. Out of a test group of 18 rapists studied who used 'consenting pornography' to instigate a sexual offence, seven of them said that it provided a cue to elicit fantasies of forced sex.

A study released by the University of New Hampshire has proven that the states which have the highest readership of pornographic magazines such as Playboy and Penthouse also have the highest rape rates. The Michigan State Police department found that pornography is used or imitated in 41 percent of the sex crimes they have investigated.

The Free Congress Research and Education Foundation discovered that half of all rapists studied used soft core pornography to arouse themselves prior to seeking out a victim. Although researchers and media analysts may ballyhoo the impact of soft core pornography - claiming protection under the free speech provision of the Constitution - mounting evidence seems to be favoring a national crackdown on porn as a necessary means to stop crime.
