In recent years, as more of this type of research has been published, significant gains have been made against pornographers as major retailers have removed porn from their shelves. Ted Bundy's confessions to Dr. James Dobson - a leader of the largest segment of pro-family forces in the U.S. - promises to fuel the nationwide efforts being made on the state and local levels to eliminate the pornography problem.

Father Mike Is Reaching Youth with Evangelism Teams

Minneapolis, MN - All of the participants of Youth Explosion enjoyed Father Mike Kollar, the challenging speaker and director of National Evangelization Teams (NET) from Minneapolis. We thought you'd like to know more about his ministry.

Father Mike began his work in youth evangelism one year after his ordination into the priesthood in 1969. He was first assigned to oversee the ministry of the St. Paul Catholic Youth Center -- and he has since guided it to become one of the most successful youth ministries in the nation.

In 1981, Father Mike launched the first NET team. Young people in the team travelled to a diocese where they served four to six weeks at a time conducting retreats for the youth in local churches. So far, in each of the 46 dioceses where NET has served, all of the churches have asked them to return the following year!

While statistics reveal that church attendance among Catholic youth is declining, many are turning back to God through the ministry of National Evangelization Teams. Father Mike and his staff believe that we are going to see an entirely new generation of faith-filled Catholics emerge in the coming years!

If you would like to have a NET team come to your area, contact:

New Generation Teams

Washington, D.C. - Vibrant and exciting are two words that aptly describe the youth ministry of Evangel Temple in Washington, D.C. -- under the leadership of Youth Pastor James Holcomb. Since all of the young people at Evangel Temple believe that God is raising up a new generation to take His gospel to the world, they have called their youth group the New Generation Ministry.

Each Friday night, all the young people at Evangel bring their friends from school or work to attend an exciting evening of praise and worship with their band, "Beyond Praise." At each service, the youth drama ministry, "Living Parables," takes an active part in the worship experience. The young people act out principles from God's Word in order to reinforce the message that God is speaking to the church.

According to James Holcomb, New Generation is called to bring revival to the youth of the Washington, D.C. area. He also feels that the young people need to experience the presence of God, and that's why there is so much emphasis on worship at Evangel Temple.

New Generation also encourages its youth to be a part of its Fine Arts Ministry, missionary teams, and church athletic teams.

Maranatha Ministries

Gainesville, FL - Bob Weiner and Rice Broocks are taking the gospel to one of the most challenging places on earth -- the college campus! They also invite you to plan to be a part of this exciting outreach when you are ready for college.

Bob Weiner founded Maranatha Campus Ministries in 1972. Since that year, young people in Maranatha have been trained for leadership and are now starting churches all over the world. Currently, Maranatha has over 45 churches in the U.S. and over 20 overseas.

Rice Broocks, who is the director of the campus outreach for Maranatha, met Jesus in the late 1970s at Mississippi State University. Today, he speaks to youth groups and college students all over the world. He is also the director of Champions for Christ -- Maranatha's outreach to college and pro athletes. Rice is also heading up an exciting new ministry called the Society for Creation Science.

Every year, hundreds of university students find Christ because of the bold stand that Maranatha students are taking. These kids are radical!

The students in Maranatha pass out a newspaper called The Forerunner which is published by the ministry. The paper is challenging university students to face the claims of Christianity head-on!

Maranatha is also hosting a World Leadership Conference in late December of this year in Ft. Worth, Texas. Speakers including Rosey Grier, Rich Wilkerson, and Larry Tomczak will be addressing the crowd.

If you would like to be a part of a Maranatha team when you go to college, just contact their office. Be sure to mention if you would like a free copy of The Forerunner, too:

Environmentalism: The Newest Religion

- by Patrick J. Buchanan

"Environmentalism is now well on its way to becoming the third great wave of the redemptive struggle in Western history, the first being Christianity, the second modern socialism ... the dream of a perfect physical environment has all the revolutionary potential that lay both in the Christian vision of mankind redeemed by Christ and in the Socialist, chiefly Marxian, prophecy of mankind free from social injustice."

If one would seek evidence for this insight of Prof. Robert Nisbet (Prejudices, 1982) - that environmentalism has become an ideological and religious movement - look around.

As Communist parties have atrophied in Europe, Green parties have sprouted. In Sweden, animal rights legislation now guarantees that cattle are given grazing rights, that pigs have separate feeders and bedding (no more unseemly communal slopping at the trough), that chickens are let out of their cages and given the run of the yard.

In New York, 2,000 militants marched up Fifth Avenue on "Fur Free Friday" recently to protest the raising and killing of minks, foxes and sables for women's coats; sympathy demonstrations were held in 50 states. Hunters of duck and deer are finding themselves accompanied into the fields by animal lovers with bull horns to frighten off the prey.

The new movement of social protest also has its own Carrie Nations and H. Rap Browns, who torch furrier shops in California, and plant pipe bombs outside Connecticut companies that use dogs in medical research.

When men cease believing in God, C.S. Lewis wrote, they do not then believe in nothing, they believe in anything. Just as the ideal of a Marxist Utopia, where man would no longer exploit man, captured the hearts and commanded the devotion of 19th century men who had ceased to believe in Paradise, so the environmental movement has, in the late 20th century, taken on the trappings of a new religion.

"A person is not religious solely when he worships a divinity," wrote Gustave Le Bon in The Crowd, "but when he puts all the resources of his mind, the complete submission of his will, and the whole-souled ardor of his fanaticism at the service of a cause or an individual who becomes the goal and guide of his thoughts and actions."

As today's environmental movement is, in part, the legacy of progressive Republicans Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot, where did we jump the track?

Prof. Nisbet contends there was always a divide between the "conservationists" of Theodore Roosevelt's time, dedicated capitalists who wanted to conserve the forest for man's use, for recreation and lumber, and the "preservationists," who wanted to protect the forest from man's spoliation. But modern preservationists have gone beyond their forebears.

With the '60s as point of departure, and Rachel Carson's Silent Spring as sacred text, environmentalism "without losing its eliteness of temper," writes Nisbet, became "a mass Socialist movement of, not fools, but sun worshippers, macrobiotics, forest druids, and nature freaks generally committed by course, if not yet fully shared intent, to the destruction of capitalism."

Capitalism, then is the unacknowledged enemy of the new environmentalism. Yet, because the "destruction of capitalism" is not seen as the militants' goal, the movement has enlisted fellow travelers by the millions, from Americans concerned about nuclear power and the ozone, to Humane Society supporters appalled by TV footage of the clubbing of baby seals on the Canadian ice.

Needed is a divorce, a parting of the ways between traditional conservationists - those who believe that animals, as God's creatures over whom He gave man dominion, ought to be treated as such, that historic battlefields like Bull Run, hollowed by the blood of patriots, ought not to be turned into shopping malls, that people who put medical waste in sewers and pollute ocean beaches ought to be horse-whipped - and zealots whose beliefs are rooted not in Judeo-Christian concepts, but, as Nisbet notes, in the "man-abasing, nature-worshipping, pantheistic monism of the East."

Like all heresies, environmental extremism, with its hostility to technology and progress, is not something new under the sun. In the time of St. Francis, his more radical followers, elevating his rule to the level of Gospel revelation applicable to all, wound up before the Inquisitor of Toulouse, en route to the heretics' pyre.

Needed to answer this new ideology is a little common sense. Is it not better for 246 million turkeys to be born, live and be slaughtered each year to feed Americans, than to have the militant vegetarians take over, and have no turkeys hatched at all? Is it wrong that of the 100 million cats and dogs in the U.S.A., one million each year are used in the kind of medical research that gave us cures for rabies and polio? Why is it worse for a duck or deer to die from a hunter's bullet, than of starvation, cold or old age? It is nature - not men subduing it - that is red in tooth and claw.

Not only farmers and furriers, medical researchers and hunters, but all of us have a stake in a conservationist ethic that keeps the "man-abasing" nature-worshippers in the political wilderness, while seeing to it that environmental outrages like Boston Harbor are tended to.

THE NEW AGE: Hope for World Peace?

By Paul McGuire

I remember going to the Bodhi Tree Bookstore which is the famous New Age bookstore on Melrose Avenue popularized in Shirley Maclaine's television movie "Out On A Limb." I rented a video that dealt with the "Higher Consciousness Movement." The topic was world peace.

The video featured people like Baba Ram Dass, who was formerly Dr. Richard Alpert - Timothy Leary's assistant at Harvard; Barbara Marx Hubbard; Ken Keyes, Jr., who is the author of The Handbook to Higher Consciousness and The Hundredth Monkey; and Daniel Ellsberg, the peace activist whom former President Richard Nixon investigated during Watergate.

As I listened to these people talk, I couldn't help but hear their sincerity and passion for world peace - a passion that we all share. Yet, as they talked about developing a planetary consciousness and an end to nuclear weapons, I noted a fervency that religion engenders. I didn't particularly have a problem with that; I could appreciate their zeal for creating a world of understanding and harmony. But, the more I listened to them, the more it dawned upon me that these people had turned the corner somewhere in their thinking. They were attempting to build a kind of heaven on earth - without God.

Something haunted me in their words, and I believe it was the fact that they were attempting to build peace without the Prince of Peace and create love without the true source of love, which is the personal, living God of the universe. The peace activists talked of a planetary consciousness. They spoke of becoming one with the universe. This sounds legitimate until you stop to think that these efforts at building one world and global peace without God are somehow quite empty and shallow.

This was difficult to comprehend because these people were so kind and compassionate. On the human level they displayed a remarkable integrity.

Beloved do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are from God; because many false prophets have gone out into the world. By this you know the Spirit of God: every spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is from God; and every spirit that does not confess Jesus is not from God; and that is the spirit of the anti-Christ, of which you have heard that it is coming, and now it is already in the world. (1 John 4:1-3, NAS)

It is a difficult thing to grasp this concept. But, if we take what the Bible says seriously, then we must come to understand that there is a conflict between God and Satan happening right here on earth. If there is salvation in no one else besides Christ, then a real problem emerges when we discuss the teachings of the various gurus, human potential and higher consciousness movements, Eastern religions, meditation, planetary consciousness, and so on. In fact, things like Scientology, Est, Lifespring, and the whole gamut of pseudo-spiritual empowerment programs take on a new perspective.

It is not that these programs and religions cannot offer limited benefits and assist in the release of human potential. It is a real mistake to paint such things in either black or white. In addition, I have seen people who have emerged from these human potential movements with a real release of creativity and power in their lives. The danger is that ultimately the leaders of these groups become substitute Messiahs. Their teaching begins to depart from the Bible often producing bondage and slavery to incorrect doctrines. Finally, these movements can take on a real spirit of the Antichrist in that they are offering a kind of personal and planetary salvation apart from Jesus Christ.

Most of these groups offer some limited degree of good. But then they become counterfeit Gospels that lead people astray. Also, when these principles of "higher consciousness" or "enlightenment" teach that it is possible to build a kind of paradise on earth without Christ, they become dangerous and reminiscent of the serpent who promised Eve in the Garden that "they would be as gods."

Confessions of an Ex-Radical

There was a time when I shared the general consensus of our time and dreamed of what Beatle John Lennon wrote about in his song "Imagine There's No Heaven." His dream of a global unity appealed to me. I grew up in what could be termed a secular humanistic, but loving home. I was matured on the Sunday New York Times, art, culture, and political discussion.

For me, biblical Christianity was not even a viable option. I thought that all Christians were ignorant and superstitious. I believed this religion was blood stained, anti-sex, anti-joy, and anti-love. I thought psychologist Eric Fromm was right when he called Christianity a primitive religion, which invented for its own needs the concept of God the Father.

To me, Christianity was the Bible Belt and men wearing dark, three piece suits screaming hallelujah and dunking people in the river. When the sixties counterculture revolution took off, I joined in. At the age of fifteen I joined radical activist Abbie Hoffman in demonstrating and marching on Washington, D.C. In addition, I read Marcuse, Allen Ginsberg, Alan Watts, William Burroughs, Norman Mailer, and became thoroughly radical.

I spent my free time in high school hanging out in New York's East Village and joining YIPPIE and the Youth International Party. I experienced the counterculture revolution on New York's lower east side. I can remember going to see the Jefferson Airplane and Grateful Dead and Bill Graham's Fillmore East and listening to Timothy Leary on St. Mark's Place.

The 1960s and 70s created a literal explosion of thought and action. It was a time of deep soul searching, sexual experimentation, and spiritual searching. What fueled the sixties was a deep, spiritual hunger reflected in the poetry of men like Gregory Corso and best-selling novelist of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest Ken Kesey. The middle class church consisting of neatly dressed men and women sitting in pews looking like participants in Tricia Nixon's wedding were not match for the raw spiritual hunger and pure rebellion of the period.

I too surveyed American middle class Christianity with its churchianity, its boredom, and lack of legitimate miracles. I ran to the gurus like Baba Ram Dass and Stephen Gaskin, founder of the Farm. It wasn't until fleeing a middle class Christian religious retreat on the back roads of Missouri (hitchhiking) that I had a miraculous encounter with the Person of Jesus Christ. It changed my life forever, and I realized that Jesus Christ was God and not some plastic statue plopped on a dashboard of a Chevrolet.

Until then, I was militantly opposed to Christianity and wanted to see a global revolution of consciousness that would usher in a new world order. It was only after accepting Jesus Christ, and understanding that Christianity was Truth and not a religion, that I began to understand that there was indeed a great cosmic battle occurring on planet Earth. A battle between good and evil or God and the devil and that political, spiritual, and even economic ideologies were direct expressions of this battle.

Once I entered into a personal relationship with the personal, living God of the universe, I understood that history was not just a random collection of events. There was a definite plot with many sub-plots. I understood that the major plot concerned man as a fallen creature. Jesus Christ came to redeem mankind. He shed His blood for the forgiveness of sins. Until that point I did not even believe in the concept of sin. To me, sin was some archaic concept. It was a relic from an ancient belief system. After accepting Jesus Christ, I felt and experienced an acute awareness of my sinfulness as well as the release of the spiritual, psychological, and soulish manifestations and bondages that this sin creates in the human personality.

Who is God?

Christians, Jews, Muslims, Mormons, Hindus, Buddhists, and other mystics believe in a concept of God. The big question is, "Who is God?" If he exists, "What is He like?" and "What is God's character?" It is somewhat strange to me that as a culture we do not publicly ask ourselves this question. There are no television specials on God's existence. I think our cultural silence about God demonstrates our collective fear of Him. Sex is no longer the great taboo in our culture, God is. You can talk about any sexual act on television in pornographic detail. However, if you talk about God in any serious manner, you will be kicked off most television shows. If God did not exist, then why would people spend so much energy trying to push Him out of existence?

The reason militant atheists and groups like the ACLU (American Civil Liberties Union) are trying to eradicate manger scenes and any references to God and religion in our culture is because they are reacting to God's existence in the first place. The ACLU and other groups that hate Christianity know deep within themselves that God does exist. God exists and God has a character and definition. God is called the personal, living God of the universe because, like the men and women He created in His image, God has a distinct character and personality. If we were to describe God's personality, we would use the words love, righteousness, creative, and holy.

Unlike the Eastern mystical or New Age view, God is not "perfect nothingness," "consciousness," "non-personal energy," nor is God the collective product of our imaginations. God is not non-personal as the mystics, Hindus, and New Age people believe. God revealed the essence of His personality to the human race when He sent His Son, Jesus Christ, to planet Earth. Here we see God's character revealed.

The King of the universe temporarily discarded His royal stature to walk and talk to men in the form of a man - Jesus Christ. God showed us what He was like in Jesus Christ who was loving, humble, compassionate. He raised the dead and cast out demons. Jesus Christ obediently went to the cross and died for the sins of all mankind. Jesus Christ was resurrected from the dead and broke the power of sin and death over the entire human race.

The personal, living God of the universe came to us as the Son of God - Jesus Christ - the Savior of mankind. Thus, we can see that the real God is a God of absolute love and that He loves each one of us on a personal level. The infinite God of the universe knows you personally and wants to embrace you with His arms. God wants to free you and remove your frustrations, bitterness, and disappointments. When we talk about Jesus Christ as Savior, this is what we mean. We are not talking about Jesus Christ as the Savior in religious terms. True biblical Christianity is about an intimate one- on-one relationship with Jesus Christ. Believers in Jesus Christ are those people who share a common friend in Jesus Christ. They are people who know God and walk with God on a personal level.

Who is God? All that we can know about God is wrapped up in the person of Jesus Christ. Personally, I think it is tremendously liberating to know that each of us is not alone in the universe or in this world. There is no problem too great for God. The incredible news is that we are not in this world alone. It is not "us against the world." If we understand what is real, we can know that once we accept Jesus Christ into our lives by faith, we can walk with the personal living God of the universe through all our problems and share all our joys and victories with Him.

Narcissism

by Michael Wade

According to Greek mythology, Narcissus would have lived a long life had he never come to know himself. But, after he had angered the gods, Narcissus saw his reflection for the first time in a pool of water. As he bent to drink he instantly fell in love with himself. Each time he clasped at the image it disappeared. As he sat for days at the pool, dying, he cried in despair, unable to embrace his own love.

The myth has relevance today in that our society has for some time now come to know itself. It has devoured fruit from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Atheism, agnosticism and a contempt of moral absolutes has left man with only himself to worship, a futile religion indeed.

But man, being the spiritual being he is, has not been left pining after himself. Secular humanism is said to have buried the notion of God. The New Age movement today is resurrecting him. God has now been made in the image of man. Narcissus never had it so good.

World history makes it very clear that mankind always worships God or gods, and falls into atheism only as a transition to occultism or when externally forced to, (e.g. communism).¹ Man is a creature who must have hope and faith in the future. A belief in some form of Eastern mysticism is, to quote C.S. Lewis, "the attitude which the human mind naturally falls into when left to itself."²

No matter how enthusiastic secular humanists such as Carl Sagan or Norman Lear may be about agnosticism, their continued evangelistic efforts are just money into a dead horse. Secular humanism is bottoming out. As Mircea Eliade has said, secular man "killed a God in whom he could not believe but whose absence he could not bear."³

Secular humanism of the '60s '70s and '80s has been such a transition period, and the '90s are quickly shaping up as the decade where we all will choose between Christ and the New Age movement.

In the U.S. the line is being drawn and men and women are faced with the same decision Elijah offered his countrymen: "If Baal is God, then serve him. But if the Lord is God, serve Him."

Just what is "New Age?" What makes it a religion? Why is it dangerous?

It is important to realize that the majority of those involved have very little idea of what the movement is all about.⁴ In fact this may be the only thing the New Age movement has in common with Christianity: many of those who profess to be a part of it are out on the fringe. They are usually involved for very superficial and selfish reasons:

* It removes the notion of guilt.

* It provides one with pleasant emotional experiences.

The angel of light doesn't present himself as a masochist. The experiences New Age evangelists speak of are very real and very appealing, especially to those who want to have their sin and enjoy it too. When it comes to fellowshiping with these spirits, New Agers can choose their poison: drugs, self-hypnosis, internal visualization, biofeedback or even sex.⁵ It's commonly referred to as a change in consciousness. What being born again is to Christianity, consciousness changing revolution is to the New Age.

At the heart of the New Age movement is monism. All is one. There is no difference between you, me, God or this newspaper. (It never claims to be an intellectual philosophy).

Monism radically opposes a biblical account of God separating light from darkness, earth from heaven, and clouds from the water. Genesis pictures God continuing to create many different things, all of them different, ending with man, whom He created in His image. We don't live in a mystical soup of homogeneous reality. "Even God Himself is not an undifferentiated unity, but a tri-unity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit - the Trinity."⁶

But once one is convinced that he and everything else are really one, it is a short step to pantheism, where everything is God and, of course, we are all perfect. Like I said, no one claims this to be at all intellectual.

But how could it be otherwise? If everything is God, it must be perfect. There is no light or darkness, no perfect or imperfect, and above all else, no good or evil. Yes, and that reflection in the pool is really very beautiful!

So here we are at one of the seductive claims of the New Age. We're not only perfect; we are, in fact, gods. "Whether it comes from Eastern religions such as Hinduism - 'Atman is Brahman' (the individual self is really the universal Self) - or from classical occultism - 'as above, so below,' (God and humanity are one) - or from the new self-actualizing psychologies - all knowledge, power and truth are within and waiting to be unlocked - the New Age raises the placard of pantheism high: you are god!"⁷

Such a belief begs an obvious question. If all men are gods, why are we so rotten? The Bible explains this very reasonably when it says we have all fallen away from God's goodness and wholeness. New Agers dismiss it as simple ignorance. (Talk about the pot calling the kettle black!)

You see, we just need to get in tune with our real selves. We must change our consciousness, which will lead to an awareness of oneness and spiritual power.⁸

By whatever name this change in consciousness is called, and there are many, it is said to be necessary for the rescue of Western civilization and the world.

That's an odd thought. Where was Eastern mysticism when Western civilization began? What has it done for nations such as India? It is a simple fact of history that any nation embracing it has also been impoverished, destroyed or both.

The New Age (it's really just the same old Baal worship) can be looked at as a threat. But it is really just an opportunity for evangelism that the world has never known. The '90s will be a decade of incredible manifestations of God's power by God's people. Just as the Apostle Paul faced a pantheistic people in Athens who worshipped a litany of gods, so we too will introduce them to the One they call "the unknown god."

If you are flirting with New Age ideas it might interest you to know that the image of Narcissus could be a very beautiful one indeed. It doesn't take drugs or Eastern mysticism or parapsychology. It just takes coming clean with God.

The Bible admits that the sin you justify with New Age ideas is "pleasurable for a season" (Hebrews 11:25). But the Bible also says that "in the end it brings forth death" (Romans 6:23). That death isn't speaking of eternal damnation (although that's a part of it). It is speaking of a life lived outside of God's presence, and away from His precepts. He may be "unknown" to you, but He is accessible if you will believe He is, and that He is gracious towards those that seek Him. You can't trust me with your life and you can't trust a New Age guru. God is the only one you can give your life to, and you can only do it by totally committing your whole life to Him.

Why waste your time flirting with something that may be right? If New Agers are right, Christians will be reincarnated and have another shot at it, right? If Christians are right, New Agers will stand before the Great White Throne of Eternal Judgment. That's not the time to discover the tragedy of Narcissus.

"If you are in a coma and on a ventilator and your relatives are not readily available, the odds are that you will be an organ donor."

- Paul A. Byrne and Paul M. Quay
"On Understanding Brain Death"

"With great advances in life-support technology and organ transplantation, the dead today do indeed have much 'protein' to offer us - in the form of their organs and body parts. We are the neo-cannibals."

- Nobel Prize winner Carleton Gajdusek

It's happening. Quietly. Slowly. Tragically. Human sacrifice is now becoming acceptable in America. The hapless, the hopeless, and the helpless are falling prey to the strong and powerful. It has taken decades for pro-abortion and pro-euthanasia forces to win victories based on such ridiculous logic. But, as C.S. Lewis said, New Age philosophy is "the attitude which the human mind naturally falls into when left to itself."

Recently the news media documented the passing of Adolf Hitler's 100th birthday. Much commotion was made about school children not knowing much about the Nazi tyrant, and about the awkwardness with which the German news media dealt with the centennial. One poll found that 46 percent of West Germans believe the Third Reich had some positive influences.¹ Another documented that some of the youth in Germany feel Hitler couldn't be all bad because "he arranged for merciful deaths for handicapped people."²

In America, teachers and journalists are trying to make sure we never forget who Hitler was. It's too bad they don't remember themselves. Today Adolf Hitler and his followers are painted as "right-wing extremists." (He emphatically stated he was a socialist, and named his party the National Socialist Party).³

But we need to find out how the evangelists of euthanasia today mimic the SS. What does Shirley McLaine have in common with Adolf Hitler? Consider the following news item, not reported by a right-to-life or church group, but straight off the pages of the Chicago Tribune, and later picked up by daily newspapers all over the country.

Four nursing aides, dubbed "The Angels of Death," admitted to killing 48 elderly patients "out of pity," beginning in 1983. As the deaths went undetected, they murdered more, "singling out patients who angered them or caused them the most work." The aides killed many of their victims by pouring water down their noses.⁴

The New Age movement of today, the fascism of Nazi Germany, Darwin's theory of evolution - and virtually every pagan society since Cain slew Abel - all have one thing in common: they deliberately seek the shedding of innocent blood. In Hitler's day the idea was to create "the perfect race," by subjectively ordering the world's genes. New Age doctrine runs a parallel path today.

Each month the topics of euthanasia, doctor-assisted suicide, and the killing of people for their organs make the news more frequently. Each month our nation's conscience is dulled. And each month human sacrifice becomes more acceptable.

In the same month of Hitler's centennial and the emergence of the "Angels of Death," Newsweek reported the story of an elderly lady sentenced to death. Her crime? Being dependant on medical technology. Carrie Coons, an 86-year-old New York resident, was hearty and independent until she suffered a stroke last October. She deteriorated into what her doctors labeled a "persistent, vegetative state." Her chances of recovery were determined to be "nil." A judge decided her condition to be "irreversible." An order was signed. Her feeding tube was scheduled to be removed. Coons would have died had she not embarrassed her doctors by coming out of her coma just before the order was to take effect.⁵

The educators and journalists of today fail to remember that Adolf Hitler euthanized over 270,000 hospital patients because they were "useless eaters."⁶ Whether it be Hitler's fascism or today's New Age movement, the goal is the same: eliminate the unfit and unproductive. Create a perfect race. It's survival of the fittest.

Nazis in the Scrub Room?

But we really need to go deeper than just comparing today's yuppies with yesterday's Nazis. Materialistic yuppieism is just the surface of New Age hedonism. This is not to say that all New Agers are Nazis. The majority of New Agers push their agenda with motives that are paved with good intentions.

But there is a dark side to the lifestyles of the hip and outrageous. There are spiritual forces at work not recognized by most of us. The whole New Age movement gets its name from the idea that mankind is about to usher in a "new age" of history. Mankind is supposedly about to make an evolutionary "quantum leap" from homo sapien to homo noeticus. This "new race" will come about because people have learned to "get in touch with their real selves," or experience "consciousness revolution."

New Age prophets will tell you that the answer to the world's problems is not found in looking to God, but in the prospects of the further evolution of man. Sure, they would say, man has made mistakes, but consciousness revolution will allow us to take a leap into a new, improved version of depravity! Those people who "get in touch with their higher selves" will surpass homo sapiens in evolutionary status. ("Holier than thou" takes on a whole new meaning!)

Homo noeticus will be a race of people who make this quantum leap. This change is said to be a "spiritual evolution" first, and later a biological one.⁷ In theory it will greatly increase man's capabilities to confront and overcome the problems of survival, hence bringing mankind into a new age.

Should God allow New Age doctrine to run its course, the blame for Mother Earth's problems would be laid at the feet of those who have not made this leap into New Age doctrine. A "cleansing action" will be required to remove the "unbelieving" from society so that this new race will be able to manifest its new nature and overcome its medical, environmental, economic and social problems.

Adolf Hitler's ties to the occult are well documented.⁸ That they were what drove him to seek the extermination of the Jews and the establishment of his own world order is obvious to any student of such texts. But tyranny, greed, hatred, arrogance, and paganism are not limited to the 20th century. The Aztecs, the ancient cultures of Palestine, and the barbarians of pre-Christian Europe are only a few examples of societies which regularly practiced human sacrifice.

Just what is it? How could anyone really say that such an advanced society as ours would practice something so barbaric? Paul de Parrie and Mary Pride, in Unholy Sacrifices of the New Age, offer the following definition of human sacrifice: "The murder, torture, and/or cannibalism of an innocent person justified as beneficial for himself, for another person or for society."⁹

Remember this definition. It will come in handy when we look more deeply at the impact of the New Age on medical ethics next month. Occultism, reincarnation, psychology, and most of all, the loss of moral absolutes and the doctrine of "living for yourself," influence the values we place on human life today. Sadly, many people in the American medical profession, whom we once held in such high regard, are now the white-robed high priests of the New Age.

New Age Psychology

- by Michael Wade

With the retreat of Christianity from society in the first half of this century, America became more and more pagan.

Many people today, unfortunately, are choosing a deceptive form of hedonism known as the New Age Movement, and they often justify the choice with a new theology.

According to Martin Gross, we live in "the most anxious, emotionally insecure and analyzed population in the history of man." We are "the citizens of the contemporary Psychological Society." A society "in which, as never before, man is preoccupied with self."¹

At the turn of the century theology was the queen of the sciences. But when relativism took hold of our educational institutions in the 1920s, psychology became the New Theology. Man placed self at the center of human concern.

The Apostle Paul opened the first chapter of Romans with a concise explanation of all this: "Professing to be wise, they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the incorruptible God for an image in the form of corruptible man ... Therefore God gave them over in the lusts of their hearts to impurity, that their bodies might be dishonored among them. For they exchanged the truth of God for a lie, and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever." (Romans 1:22-25).

In crowning his new queen, man has declared the answers of life to reside within himself. Over the decades, the prophets of psychology have instructed us to "look within ourselves," and an introverted, empty, bankrupt society has resulted. To paraphrase the prophet Habakkuk, the fig tree is not blossoming, there is no fruit on our nation's vines, the yield of the olive tree has failed, the fields have produced no food, the flocks have been cut off from the fold, and there are no cattle in the stalls.

There is a spiritual famine in the land, because man does not have the answers within him as the false prophets have claimed. Throughout the land they are calling out for help. They need a new way of living and are starving for spiritual nourishment. The New Consciousness, as it is called - New Age doctrine in sheep's clothing - is answering that cry. It offers a new way of living, thinking and being. It makes the same claim of finding the answers within, but now reaches to the mystical for its power source. Psychology was a queen. Now she's a goddess.

Are We Being "Psyched Out?"

Beginning with Freud, psychology evolved over the last 100 years and gradually gained acceptance as a legitimate science. It is not within the scope of this article to chronicle every increase within the movement. But suffice it to say that Freud, Maslow, Skinner, et. al., have brought the area of study a long way. Today psychology has reached the brink of hard-core idolatry. It is called transpersonal psychology.

Transpersonal psychology is an entirely new school of psychology struggling, just as Freud did, to emerge as the dominant path to understanding human behavior. It legitimizes New Age mysticism to our intellectual culture. It isn't on everyone's lips yet, but it will be. The first issue of the Journal of Transpersonal Psychology listed its characteristics as unitive consciousness, peak experiences, mystical experience, self-actualization, oneness, cosmic awareness, and transcendental phenomena.²

This new trend in psychology includes a number of spiritual ideas, most of them pantheistic (all is God, all is one), and "encourages Eastern forms of meditation, yoga, and various methods of consciousness expansion. In its synthesis of the humanistic position with spiritual disciplines, the movement offers both the credibility of Western thought and the exotic allurement of the East. Although it incorporates the ideas of Western sages, it also embraces the occult."³

Because the self becomes the center of human concern, all perceptions of reality change under transpersonal psychology. Self-actualization to the mystic becomes an end in itself. Any effects it may have on others become completely irrelevant since there are no absolutes.

One observer explained it this way: "Because personal experience equals reality, one changes reality by focusing on the self."⁴ (The Bible tells us to change ourselves by focusing on reality). According to Douglas Groothuis, "Reality itself is lost when the universe is reduced to a 'multiverse' of independently existing bubbles of subjective meaning. Believing in impossible things doesn't ipso facto make them possible."⁵

This introverted, ambivalent, endless preoccupation with the self reduces all events, people and things to the subservient. Rather than giving out of oneself to be blessed, as the Bible instructs, New Age psychology focuses on man's problems as the only thing that matters, and creates an endless cycle of pain and emptiness: "Because I am mine own authority, I will find mine own fulfillment. But in my vanity, I am empty. Because I am empty I must find mine own fulfillment."

The havoc this has wrought on our culture has been devastating. Abortion is the most popularly cited carnage, but it's really just one piece of a disgusting meat pie. An aborted fetus is nothing more than a foretaste of the things to come should our culture continue its present course. Killing people because they are too old, killing people because they are too young, and even the killing of fetuses and adults for their organs are all practiced today - legally.⁶

Natural man, when separated from a higher power to whom he is accountable, quickly becomes Almighty Man. "The old-time secular humanism said 'There is no Deity. Long live humanity.' The new transpersonal or cosmic humanist says, 'There is no Deity but Humanity.'"⁷

Which brings us to the question man has wrestled with since God created him: Who is really in charge?

Consider the following quotes, and ask yourself which is the more credible:

"God is dead"
- Nietzsche

"Nietzsche is dead"
- God

Tracing the Sources of the NEW AGE

By Paul McGuire

The first thing we must understand about the New Age Movement is that it is not new. It is a compilation of old myths, of ancient Bhuddism, all dusted off and translated into high-tech Western scientific terms. What has been coined the New Age Movement by the mass media is really the combining and blending of various spiritual movements that are centuries old.

The origin of Hinduism dates back as early as 2000 to 1000 B.C. Hinduism has no historical founder, but its tradition teaches that its spiritual laws and truths were revealed to spiritual men called rishis, who lived along the banks of the Ganges and Indus rivers in northern India. According to Hinduism, Brahman is the supreme, absolute, eternal, infinite, neuter Spirit Being. Brahman is also perfect and unchangeable. Hinduism teaches that only that which is permanent is real. Because all things change except Brahman, only Brahman is real. Hundreds of lesser gods can be worshiped by the Hindu because all gods are seen as different aspects of the one Brahman.

According to Hinduism, every living thing has a spirit or soul, called an atman, which comes from Brahman. The final destination of the human atman is union with Brahman, but this cannot be achieved in just one lifetime. Therefore, each individual atman, or soul, must pass from body to body, lifetime after lifetime, guided by the law of karma. This is called reincarnation, or the transmigration of the soul. The law of karma determines what type of life will be lived in each reincarnation. According to this law, your current life is the product of your deeds in past lives. Your next reincarnation will depend on your deeds during this life. It is this tenet which is the basis for many things taught by people like Shirley MacLaine, Ruth Montgomery, and various other gurus and spiritual teachers.

This belief in reincarnation has been given a fresh infusion of credibility by scientists like Raymond A. Moody Jr., M.D., author of Life after Life, which investigates NDEs (or Near Death Experiences) and OBEs (or Out of Body Experiences). Although not directly embracing reincarnation, his accounts of NDEs when one encounters a "Being of Light" paved the way for a New Age theology which openly accepts reincarnation.

Moody reports that after meeting several "beings of light," the NDE-er usually meets a supreme Being of Light, whom people with a Christian background often call God or Jesus but whom those of other religious traditions call Buddha or Allah. Still others apparently say that this supreme being of light is none of these personages, but nevertheless is someone very awesome. One wonders who this other being is. The Bible speaks about a Lucifer ("the shining one") who is a powerful spiritual being in rebellion against God. Could this "being of light" in reality be Lucifer?

According to Martha Knobloch, a Christian expert on the subject of reincarnation, powers of darkness can come as "beings of light" and create the hallucinations involved in NDEs and OBEs. In addition,

Knobloch believes that demons can actually cause people to remember "past lives" that they never lived.

BUDDHISM

The religion of Bhuddism was founded in India by Siddhartha Gautama (later called "the Buddha" or "enlightened one"), who lived between 560 and 480 B.C., as a protest against certain Hindu doctrines. Siddhartha Gautama was raised in an affluent family and did not even know that poverty existed until he left the pleasant confines of his father's palace. Siddhartha was so disturbed by the poverty and despair that existed that he decided to go on a spiritual journey to find answers. Shaving his head and donning a robe, Siddhartha Gautama traveled and consulted with gurus and spiritual teachers.

Finally, Siddhartha Gautama began to meditate, became "enlightened," and developed what became known as the Noble Eight-fold path that would lead to nirvana or "perfect insight," a quality of mind. These eight techniques consisted of: (1) right belief, (2) right aspiration, (3) right speech, (4) right action, (5) right occupation, (6) right effort, (7) right thought, (8) right meditation.

In a nutshell, the Bhudda's Noble Eight-fold Path is a program of self-effort that is designed to earn you peace. Like every other New Age teaching and mystical practice, the road to Paradise is paved by your own personal spiritual performance. In other words, you earn your way to heaven through your works. This is the antithesis of God's method of salvation described in the Bible as based on faith in Jesus Christ. Ephesians 2:8-9 says, "For by grace you have been saved through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not as a result of works, that no one should boast."

FROM THE PAST TO THE PRESENT

Coupled with these ancient belief systems (Hinduism and Bhuddism) are the more recent ideas of women like Madame Blavatsky who founded the Theosophical Society and wrote Isis Unveiled in the late nineteenth century. Blavatsky's Theosophical Movement emphasized the Hindu and Bhuddist teachings of reincarnation and taught there are mahatmas ("great souls" or exalted beings) who have come to earth to teach us the way to enlightenment.

The ideas of the Theosophical Society blended with Mary Baker Eddy's Christian Science teachings and with dozens of other hybrid religious movements in the early twentieth century. However, the most immediate spiritual predecessor of the contemporary New Age Movement was the Hippie movement of the 1960s and the earlier Beatnik movement of the 1950s. Both of these cultural and social phenomena came about as reactions to the materialism of the post-World War II years.

Poets, writers, philosophers, and intellectuals (such as Alan Watts, Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, William Burroughs, and Gregory Corso) called for a new brand of American consciousness and popularized the use of marijuana and Eastern meditation in our culture. By the 1960s, the ideas of men like Timothy Leary were increasingly acceptable to larger segments of society, and the appeal of pop music groups, such as the Grateful Dead, the Jefferson Starship, the Doors, and the Beatles, ushered the psychedelic-mystical revolution into the living rooms of millions of ordinary middle-class teenagers. When John Lennon, Paul McCartney, Ringo Starr, and George Harrison began to follow the guru Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, the founder of Transcendental Meditation (TM), millions of Americans joined them.

Many of the spiritual movements now popular in the New Age movement had their twentieth-century revivals in the 1960s and early 1970s. In fact, many social analysts believe that the New Age movement is nothing more than an attempt to rediscover the interests of the 1960s and the idealism of the Hippie movement.

But the current New Age Movement has made some interesting departures from its earlier predecessors that reflect the maturity of its followers. There has been a deemphasis in the use of drugs in favor of health foods, meditation, channeling, crystals, and astral projection. Channeling and astral projection have replaced the powerful psychedelic experience of the 1960s, although there are signs of a possible resurgence of LSD through the work of modern shamanists like Terrence McKenna and the popularity of the Albert Hoffman Institute in Los Angeles, which seeks to protect the use of LSD experimentation. (Albert Hoffman was the Swiss chemist who accidentally discovered the chemical LSD.)

NEW AGE PRACTICES AND TERMS

To understand more clearly what the New Age Movement is we must understand some of the terms associated with it and the practices employed by it. We will see that some of them are distortions of Christian truth and of what should be part of a legitimate Christian lifestyle.

Channeling. The practice of channeling is not new. It is what the Old Testament termed mediumship, consulting with spirits, and spiritism. Channeling or mediumship is when an individual willfully yields to a spirit by going into a trancelike state. Channeling has been around for centuries and is mentioned in the Old Testament. King Saul consulted mediums and channelers when he was looking for supernatural answers. Instead of looking to God, he turned to the occult.

First Samuel 28:7 says: "Then Saul said to his servants, 'Seek for me a woman who is a medium, that I may go to her and inquire of her.' And his servants said to him, 'Behold, there is a woman who is a medium at Endor.'" We knew that Saul knew that it was wrong to consult mediums, for he had to visit the medium in disguise, having previously cut off all mediums and spiritists from the land. Because Saul was not in a right relationship with God at this time, he sought counsel from the channelers of his day.

Today there are several famous channelers: J.Z. Knight channels an entity or spirit called Ramtha, Jach Pusel mediums Lazaris, and there are thousands of lesser known channelers or mediums who give private consultations. Some even have their own television shows. In some cases, these channelers are fakes and charlatans, and in other cases they are actually letting spirits talk through them. The Bible is very specific about forbidding the practice of channeling, consulting spirits, or using mediums. Leviticus 19:31 states: "Do not turn to mediums or spiritists; do not seek them out to be defiled by them. I am the Lord your

Shirley MacLaine, Kevin Ryerson, Jane Roberts, J.Z. Knight, Jach Pursel, and the thousands of others who are practicing and encouraging channeling may appear to be very compassionate and intelligent people. But the practices of channeling, consulting spirits, and mediumship are strongly condemned by God in the Bible.

Astrology. This New Age practice goes way back in ancient history. Although many of our country's newspapers regularly carry a horoscope column, it too is a practice specifically condemned by the Bible. Many people consider the consulting of horoscopes as harmless fun. But this is not the position that the Bible takes concerning astrology.

The prophet Isaiah warns against the practice of astrology in Isaiah 47:13-14: "You are wearied with your many counsel; let now the astrologers, those who prophesy by the stars, those who predict by the new moons, stand up and save you from what will come upon you. Behold, they have become like stubble, fire burns them; they cannot deliver themselves from the power of the flame...." The prophet Isaiah warns the nation that they should seek God and not the stars or else destruction will come upon them.

Linda Goodman is one of the most famous astrologers of our era, selling over 60 million copies of her first two books on astrology, Sun Signs and Love Signs. Both of these books have been translated into over fifteen languages, and she has received bids of millions of dollars from publishing companies seeking the rights to her new books. Goodman is not a fatalistic astrologer who believes "it's all in the stars." Two themes emerge in her writing: (1) time does not really exist; and (2) when you learn to become a mover instead of a pawn, you rise above your horoscope.

However, in an interview with Whole Life Times magazine Goodman responds to the question: "What do you think is going to happen in this New Age? You speak in one of your books about this being a time of preparation for the appearance of a Messiah." Goodman answers: "I also point out in the 'Lexigram' chapter of Star Signs that the Second Coming is not going to be a barefooted man floating down in a white robe. The Second Coming is in each heart, when each man and each woman realizes that 'I too am a Messiah.' And then I did a Lexigram on the word Messiah. I am he. She is me. He is her. I am she. He is me."

Crystals. If anything hallmarks the New Age Movement it is the use of crystals. I recently visited the Bhodi Tree Bookstore on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles. This is the most famous New Age bookstore in the world, recently popularized by Shirley MacLaine in her television movie and book Out on a Limb. Inside the bookstore there was a large assortment of crystals for sale, as well as numerous books and magazines on the subject. Crystals are supposed to generate cosmic energy and facilitate higher consciousness and divine healing. Crystals have been used for everything from relieving depression to warding off evil spirits. They are in a sense a New Age cure-all.

Recently, a "Crystal Congress" was held in Los Angeles and noted speakers from around the world - like scientist and author Marc Vogel, Uma Silbey (jewelry designer and author), and Katrina Raphael (healing professional and author) - came to lecture on the healing arts and metaphysical applications of crystals, mineralogy, and geology.

The Bible does not specifically mention crystals. However, it is interesting to note that in Ezekiel 28:12-15 a reference to Satan appears. It reads: "Every precious stone was your covering." Could Satan use these objects of beauty to hide behind? There is nothing wrong with owning them to enjoy their beauty. However, if a crystal has been used in conjunction with or as an instrument of mystical or occult practices, I strongly suggest that you get rid of it.

New Age Medicine and Holistic Health. New Age thinking has infiltrated the medical establishment and has begun to permeate the thinking of medical doctors. In this area it is difficult to discern between what are legitimate new forms of medicine based on Eastern medical techniques and new scientific discoveries, and what is clearly New Age or occult. Terms like homeopathy, herbs, chakras, acupuncture, deep tissue bodywork massage, rolfing, polarity energy balance, clinical ecology, environmental stress, Reichen Therapy, Tibetan Reiki Therapy, Kirlian photography, electro-acupuncture, mineral balancing, chelation therapy, colon hydrotherapy, amino therapy, aromatherapy, integrated metabolic programs, bio-energetics, flower essences, and reflexology are just a few of the current trends in the medical arts.

Many things about holistic health and New Age medicine are not only very beneficial and good for you but are also biblical. For instance, the Bible has many things to say about the relationship between attitude and health. "A tranquil heart is life to the body, but passion is rottenness to the bones" (Proverbs 16:24). "Pleasant words are a honeycomb, sweet to the soul and healing to the bones" (Proverbs 16:24). "A joyful heart is good medicine, but a broken spirit dries up the bones" (Proverbs 17:22). It is clear that the relationship between attitude and health is a biblical concept.

There are aspects of holistic health and New Age medicine that are not compatible with Scripture, however, we should affirm an emphasis on nutrition. It is not New Age to eat foods free of chemical pollutants and dangerous pesticides. We should reduce our cholesterol intake by cutting down on red meats and fats, and eat more grains, fruits, and vegetables. This is not a subversive call to vegetarianism; it is scientific nutrition. Avoiding what is unhealthy does not mean that we are adopting the Hindu belief in vegetarianism and are afraid of eating our reincarnated ancestor.

Scripture says: "Do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit who is in you, whom you have from God, and that you are not your own? For you have been bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body" (1 Corinthians 6:19-20).

Meditation. This ancient Hindu and Buddhist practice involves emptying the conscious mind in order to become passive and to awaken the God-consciousness within you through the use of a mantra. By concentrating and chanting a mantra word, your mind supposedly becomes attuned to what mystics call your higher self or cosmic consciousness.

Meditation is an integral part of most New Age practices, but there is a radical difference between prayer and New Age meditation. Prayer is communication with God through Jesus Christ. It may involve verbal prayer or "praying in the Spirit," but this communication is always directed toward the person of God. New Age meditation, on the other hand, is an emptying process where one focuses on a mantra which is usually a chant designed to contact a Hindu deity or demon. Eastern meditation involves the "dropping of your guard" and the relinquishing of the control of your rational mind, thus opening you to the realm of the demonic. For you are not focusing on God, and therefore other spirits can communicate with you.

There is a long tradition of sound Christian meditation, not to be confused with Eastern forms of meditation. It is certainly proper to meditate on the Word of God or to think in a concentrated manner about what God is doing in your life. "I have more insight than all my teachers, for thy testimonies are my meditation," says the writer of Psalm 119:99. Meditation on the Bible involves focused thinking about what God has said. It is completely different from opening your mind to the "cosmic consciousness."

Visualization. First of all, visualization to some degree is a normal function and creative tool of the mind. Every person before beginning any project or goal employs some kind of visualization in order to achieve it. Many athletes use a technique of visualization when they mentally picture themselves winning or performing a specific task successfully. Studies show that good automobile drivers who have low accident records often visualize or fantasize how they would get out of a particular accident situation while they drive. When they are faced with a potential accident, they have already rehearsed in their minds what action they are going to take to avoid it.

A certain degree of visualization is necessary to perform activities in life successfully. This kind of visualization is, however, different from the shamanistic Hinduism of someone like Shakti Gawain, guru and author of Creative Visualization, who employs the technique of visualization in the mystical or occult sense. In this type of visualization, your mind or mind power becomes the god or source of all power. You begin to believe that you can control everything in your life through visualizing it. The result is that you begin to play God and attempt to control everything through visualization. God gets crowded out of the picture entirely. Visualization then violates the commandment, "You shall have no other gods before Me" (Exodus 20:3).

The Bible as on good spiritual guide among many. New Age members all make the mistake of viewing the Bible as just another "spiritual guidebook" among many other equally valid ones. However, the Bible is the only Word of God. The Apostle Paul says, "All scripture is inspired by God and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for training in righteousness" (2 Timothy 3:16).

Hebrews 4:12 says, "For the word of God is living and active and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing as far as the division of soul and spirit, of both joints and marrow, and able to judge the thoughts and intentions of the heart."

My spiritual pilgrimage began at a very young age when the questions, "Who am I? What is my purpose in life?" and "What am I doing here?" haunted me and burned in my mind night and day. While other children were content to play, I was driven to ask questions about the meaning of life. Raised in New York City, I came from a liberal, educated family. Both my parents were teachers, and neither believed in God.

As a young boy, I thought science could give me the answers to my questions about life. Reading every book I could get my hands on about science and the lives of the great scientists, I often devoured ten books a week. I read about men like Albert Einstein, Nicola Tesla, Thomas Edison, Enrico Fermi, Louis Pasteur, and John Oppenheimer. Building a huge laboratory in my bedroom, I undertook amateur experiments on cryogenics and nuclear physics. Soon, however, I realized that these brilliant men did not have the answers I was looking for. Thus, at an early age I discovered the bankruptcy of scientific materialism.

After exhausting science as a means of finding the meaning of life, I next investigated the occult and Eastern religions. Biblical Christianity was not even an option for me. I had never once met a Bible-believing Christian and the churches in my neighborhood were steeped in liberal theology or dead orthodoxy.

People involved in the New Age Movement hold the very same beliefs, for their goal is to create a one-world government and unify the planet under a spiritual system of higher consciousness. Like many New Agers, I viewed Christians with all their talk of Jesus Christ being the "only way" as an anachronism and a threat to the spiritual/political revolution coming to the planet.

But everything I had searched for in Eastern mysticism, human relationships, and the New Age Movement, I now find in Jesus Christ. This was not just another higher state of consciousness, an "upper story leap" without rational content, or a mystical trip. Nothing about this was artificial or mystical. One could easily misconstrue my involvement in the New Age Movement and my faith Jesus Christ as the path of someone hopping from experience to experience lacking rational and verifiable content. Let me assure you that when I began my spiritual journey I did so as a scientist and a skeptic.

The contrast between mystical experiences and my encounter with Jesus Christ was as different as night and day. All of the New Age and Eastern mystical experiences I was involved in had an illusory quality no matter how real they seemed at the time. Jesus Christ was not just another "experience." My newfound relationship with Him conveyed a reality so strong that I knew I had found God.

A Thirst for Truth

-by Paul McGuire

My spiritual pilgrimage began at a very young age when the questions, "Who am I? What is my purpose in life?" and "What am I doing here?" haunted me and burned in my mind night and day. While other children were content to play, I was driven to ask questions about the meaning of life. Raised in New York City, I came from a liberal, educated family. Both my parents were teachers, and neither believed in God.

As a young boy, I thought science could give me the answers to my questions about life. Reading every book I could get my hands on about science and the lives of the great scientists, I often devoured ten books a week. I read about men like Albert Einstein, Nicola Tesla, Thomas Edison, Enrico Fermi, Louis Pasteur, and John Oppenheimer. Building a huge laboratory in my bedroom, I undertook amateur experiments on cryogenics and nuclear physics. Soon, however, I realized that these brilliant men did not have the answers I was looking for. Thus, at an early age I discovered the bankruptcy of scientific materialism.

After exhausting science as a means of finding the meaning of life, I next investigated the occult and Eastern religions. Biblical Christianity was not even an option for me. I had never once met a Bible-believing Christian or seen an evangelist on television, and the churches in my neighborhood were steeped in liberal theology or dead orthodoxy.

The only religion we had at home was secular humanism - the belief that there is no God and man is the center of the universe. As a result, I was raised to believe that there was no absolute right or wrong. Around the dinner table, my parents taught me that human evil was due to ignorance and that the concept of a personal God was an archaic belief any educated person should transcend. In addition, they told me that Christians were intellectually pathetic people who were "anti-love," "anti-joy," and "anti-sex." Instead of promoting anything good, Christians were responsible for the crusades and the Inquisition.

One Thanksgiving evening my grandmother asked my father to pray. Instead, he launched into a thunderous tirade about how there was no reason to thank God - everything we had came from man's hard work.

In the atheistic environment of my home, the spiritual void within me grew deeper, and I plunged headlong into the New Age philosophy and radical politics. Soon after I reached puberty, my parents divorced, ripping my world apart. My spiritual pilgrimage merged with a growing hatred of all authority and society. I was ripe to be seduced by the counterculture and the psychedelic philosophy of the '60s which has now become the New Age Movement.

Although my mother held a secular humanist worldview, she was always full of loving concern and discipline. She spent thousands of hours reading me books and taking me to museums and libraries. Genuinely concerned about her rebellious son, my mother sent me to a psychotherapist whom she hoped would solve my problems.

I told my therapist that I wanted to know why I was alive, who I was, and what purpose there was for my life. He could not help me and only provided a listening board. In the vain hope of finding answers, I began reading Sigmund Freud, Carl Rogers, and Carl Jung. But all the leading psychological theorists seemed to contradict each other, and I was left more confused than ever.

Then the "hippie" movement with its drugs and "free love" exploded across the nation. I remember the first time I saw Timothy Leary. Wearing a white outfit and grinning like the "Cheshire Cat" from Alice In Wonderland, he said on national television "Tune in, turn on, and drop out." This psychedelic prophet of LSD was in distinct contrast to the people involved in organized religion. Then the Beatles recorded "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band," and the psychedelic invasion of drugs, Eastern religion, and promiscuous sex spread.

At the age of fifteen, I was wearing long hair and boots and demonstrating with Abbie Hoffman in New York City. I organized demonstrations and was even made an honorary member of the Black Panther Party for protesting outside a prison against the arrest of Panther leaders.

Simultaneously, I deepened my activities in Eastern mysticism and was introduced to drugs by an "honor student" in my high school. I read a book by Aldous Huxley titled Heaven and Hell and the Doors of Perception, which describes Huxley's experimentation with hashish and mescaline as a means to enter a higher state of consciousness. This fellow student, whose father was a doctor, "turned me on" to hashish and mescaline as part of a serious scientific experiment. Together, we passed through the "doors of perception" and entered a higher realm of consciousness.

Fueled by drugs like LSD and mescaline, it was the psychedelic '60s that ushered in the current New Age Movement. Powerful mind altering drugs like LSD blasted people into the spiritual realm and forced them to acknowledge the presence of a spiritual reality. This opened the door to the occult and the myriad practices of Eastern mysticism that gave birth to the New Age Movement.

In my own life, the use of powerful psychedelic drugs like LSD intensified my plunge into the New Age philosophy and Eastern Mysticism. Thus began an electric pilgrimage into Hinduism, Buddhism, the teachings of Don Juan, yoga, mental telepathy, altered states of consciousness, hypnotherapy, astral projection, reincarnation, the occult, devil's weed, spirit guides, and a smorgasbord of mystical experiences. I was greatly influenced by men like Baba Ram Dass, Ken Kesey, Timothy Leary, and Stephen Gaskin.

In fact, my major at the University of Missouri was called "Altered States of Consciousness," a brand-new accredited field within the Department of Psychology. We studied different means of entering higher states of consciousness and engaged in exercises based on Eastern mystical teaching and experiences by men like Carlos Castaneda. It was during this time of intense New Age activity that I developed spiritual powers and "cosmic consciousness."

My professor at the University of Missouri was a practicing mystic and taught a number of courses on mental illness. He believed, as did popular psychologists like R.D. Laing, that mental illness or madness could be a means of entering higher consciousness. In this theory, insane people are considered spiritual pilgrims caught between two realities.

My professor invited gurus to teach and perform supernatural feats of levitation. Once while my professor was lecturing, I heard a distinct voice within me shout, "Surrender to the dark forces within!" At this point in my life I noticed a growing intensity in the manifestation of strong paranormal experiences. Yet at the same time, I had a growing feeling that things were getting out of control. The more bizarre things became, however, the more I believed I was moving toward "enlightenment." I became convinced that everything happening was due to my excess "karma" burning off.

As is often the case with people involved in drugs and the occult, I experienced mixed feelings of great elation and depression. I became a kind of mystical "wildman," hiking into the woods while on psychedelic drugs and communing with what I thought was God. But I was like a comet crashing into the atmosphere, burning more brightly as I moved through the heavens and consuming myself in flames. One evening I broke into my psychology professor's office and wrote him an anonymous note warning him of the dangers of "the journey."

Invasion Of The Jesus Movement

In the early '70s, a strange thing happen at the University of Missouri: The Jesus Movement spread from the West Coast and entered the campus town of Columbia, Missouri. I remember seeing an article on the Jesus Movement in a national magazine. Reading about these Christians, who I thought were going to regress mankind into a new Dark Age with their "primitive blood-stained religion," made me furious. I hated them because I thought they would stop the "revolution" and the establishment of the new world order based on higher consciousness.

People involved in the New Age Movement hold the very same beliefs, for their goal is to create a one-world government and unify the planet under a spiritual system of higher consciousness. Like many New Agers, I viewed Christians with all their talk of Jesus Christ being the "only way" as an anachronism and a threat to the spiritual/political revolution coming to the planet.

About this time, however, I finally came face to face with genuine Christians who moved in the supernatural flow of the Holy Spirit and had the glory of God shining on their countenances. I encountered Spirit-filled Christians everywhere and thought it was my duty to defend the faith of Eastern mysticism and the religion of "higher consciousness." Attacking and debating believers in philosophy classes whenever they spoke out about their faith, I delighted in trying to humiliate them and prove them wrong through intellectual arguments.

In addition, I increased my "outrageous" behavior in front of Christians in an attempt to mock and ridicule them. Since I studied film, I made X-rated animation movies with Barbie dolls in an attempt to sneer at Judeo-Christian morality.

Despite my bitter hatred, a couple of true Christians began to zero in on me and share the love of Jesus Christ. Beneath all my bravado was a hurting, frightened individual reaching out for answers. At first, my mind completely rejected everything they were saying. But they continued to love me with a pure, deep, spiritual agape love. Even though I thought what they were saying was complete idiocy, I felt myself being wooed and convicted by the Holy Spirit as they talked.

For the first time in my life, I sensed God's love for me. All my intellectual arguments were reduced to nothing as I encountered something far more real than anything I had experienced before. This was not some "trip" or mystical high. The purity and love that I felt had to be God.

Empowered by the Holy Spirit, these supernatural Christians opened up their lives to me. They cared about me as a person and loved me. They invited me to their prayer meetings and had me over for dinner. Through their personal ministry to me, I felt the arms of the living God embrace me and hug me like my father never had. As the Lord touched me deep within my heart, the hurt and bruised child locked inside me emerged and responded to His love.

Although I wasn't yet ready to surrender, the Holy Spirit continued to work in my life. I had all kinds of intellectual questions, so my Christian friends gave me a book by Dr. Francis Schaeffer called Escape From Reason. It changed my life. I was shocked to discover that a person could be both intelligent and a Christian. Talking about God, film, art, and philosophy in brilliant and articulate terms, Dr. Schaeffer explained contemporary culture in a way I had never understood.

Still I fought with the Holy Spirit, and the forces of darkness did not want to let me go. As these Christians prayed for me, the Holy Spirit continued to convict me. Sometimes I found myself walking alone by the highway, and, even though I was "stoned," I would begin sobbing and weeping as Almighty God touched me.

The Hand Of Providence

One afternoon a guy named Tim invited me to a retreat in a wooded area about an hour away from the campus. I had mysteriously met Tim in the hallway of a dormitory, where he sat reading the Bible that he carried with him everywhere. He was in the hallway to meet someone else, but providentially he met me and invited me to this Christian retreat. Tim's eyes shone with sincerity and the love of God, so I accepted his invitation.

Dressed in boots, blue jeans, and long hair, I arrived at the retreat center. A brief look at the place quickly convinced me that these people didn't have what I was looking for. They were the kind of Christians I had seen before - religious but lacking the depth and dimension of people who have had a personal encounter with Jesus Christ.

While at the retreat center, I noted vague references to the Bible, but primarily we played games like "spin the bottle." I was totally disgusted, for these people reinforced my worst preconceptions about Christianity. After spending the night I told Tim during breakfast that I was going to hitchhike back to the university. Tim walked me to the highway and said, "Paul, God will take care of your ride home." Wondering if he was some kind of religious nut but hoping to humor him, I said, "Yeah, yeah sure." Then I stuck out my thumb and tried to hitch a ride.

The first person to pick me up was a Pentecostal preacher. He and his wife talked to me about Jesus the entire ride. Stunned, I chalked it up as coincidence; after all, this was the Bible Belt. After they let me out, I stuck out my thumb and was picked up by a Bible salesman with a station wagon filled with Bibles! As we whizzed down the highway, he opened a giant Bible and began reading. With no hands on the wheel, he asked me if I wanted to receive Jesus into my life. I managed to gulp a "yes," and he pulled off the road.

As we rolled to a stop, the thought raced through my mind, "What have I got myself into? Is this guy some kind of religious psychopath or axe murderer?" Growing up in New York City had taught me to suspect everybody's motives and not to trust strangers.

The next thing I knew this Bible salesman was leading me in a prayer. With head bowed and hands clasped, I heard myself saying, "Jesus Christ, I ask you to forgive me of my sins. I invite you to come into my life and make me born again. In Jesus' name. Amen." I couldn't believe I had said this prayer. I wasn't even sure what sin was, although it seemed to me like an archaic concept. But I prayed in faith and meant it.

Hours later, I forgot the incident had even occurred and "partied" the night away with friends. The next day I woke up hung over and decided to visit a Christian girl named Laura. She and her boyfriend, Burgess, had spent a lot of time ministering and witnessing to me about Jesus.

As Laura and I talked, we were walking next to some giant Roman columns in the university quadrangle. I told her about my highway experience, and another girl sitting on the lawn overheard our conversation. It turned out that she was a minister's daughter wrestling with the question of whether or not Christianity was really true. Looking at me pointblank, she said, "Do you believe that Jesus Christ was the Son of God?"

All of a sudden the words, "Yes, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God!" leapt from deep within me. I was shocked. I had never said anything like that before. As I spoke, I had the most powerful spiritual experience of my life. It seemed that the sky had cracked open, and the presence of God overwhelmed me. A giant veil was lifted from my eyes as I realized God truly did exist.

I understand that I risk losing credibility by relating this experience exactly as it happened. True miracles can be cheapened by relating them in either a glib or a sensational manner. Many Christians carelessly utter the word "miracle" with such arrogance that it loses all its value. In addition, I understand that many people have had quiet but profound experiences with Jesus Christ that have just as much validity as mine.

But for me to minimize or reduce what happened to more logical terms just to make it more plausible would be inaccurate. I felt as if every dream I had ever had within the depths of my soul came true in an instant. Literally caught up in the Holy Spirit, I felt I was floating for weeks. Although I was higher than I had ever been in my entire life, I knew that the experience was genuine and pure.

Everything I had searched for in Eastern mysticism, human relationships, and the New Age Movement, I now found in Jesus Christ. This was not just another higher state of consciousness, an "upper story leap" without rational content, or a mystical trip. Nothing about this was artificial or mystical.

One could easily misconstrue my involvement in the New Age Movement and my encounter with Jesus Christ as the path of someone hopping from experience to experience lacking rational and verifiable content. Let me assure you that when I began my spiritual journey I did so as a scientist and a skeptic.

The contrast between mystical experiences and my encounter with Jesus Christ was as different as night and day. All of the New Age and Eastern mystical experiences I was involved in had an illusory quality no matter how real they seemed at the time. Jesus Christ was not just another "experience." My newfound relationship with Him conveyed a reality so strong that I knew I had found God.

What Is The New Age

By Clayton Reed

Eastern Religions, such as Hinduism, Bhuddism, Taoism and Transcendentalism, now appear in the Western world under the generic label of "New Age."

"When I woke up the next morning, I found myself wondering whether my daughter was some other reincarnated adult who might be living in the body of a person I thought of as my daughter?"

- Shirley MacLaine¹

"New Age" - What is it? - A new science? - A revival of ancient mystery religions? Is it spiritual reality, or merely mystical fantasy? And is it just a passing fad in America, or a force and movement to be reckoned with?

When we speak of the New Age movement, we are not talking about one organization by any means. The New Age movement is a network of many different people, teachers, authors and meditators who do not all know each other but are linked by several shared things:

- * Common beliefs (based on mysticism and monism, i.e. "All is God").
- * Common vision (that the new "Age of Aquarius" is upon us: an age of peace and enlightenment).
- * Common concepts (which will shortly be described).

On the pop culture level, New Age has become quite visible in recent years, especially since its "chief evangelist," Shirley MacLaine, aired her prime time TV specials in 1986-87. Her several books, describing her spiritual pilgrimage from a bored churchgoer as a girl to a New Age enthusiast (as well as her many sexual and adulterous affairs along the way), have sold over 5 million copies.

"You mean I was astrally projecting just then?" I asked. "Sure," he said, "I was doing that this morning right here while you were off walking. I take trips all over the place. I save on fuel costs," he grinned.

- Conversation between Shirley MacLaine and her mentor David²

Through her influence and others, we have all received a quick education through objects, such as "crystals" which are purported to be "energy devices," and "channeling" which is the supposed practice of learning truth and ethics from spiritual entities speaking through otherwise normal human beings.

New Age bookstores now dot the landscape, and New Age book sections appear in most normal bookstores as well. New Age magazines and literature turn up everywhere from grocery stores to health clubs to doctor's offices. Ads for "Spiritual," "Wholeness," and "Awareness" or "Enlightenment" gatherings are commonly seen in newspapers or posted all over.

But is New Age really all that new? Actually, all its core beliefs (as we will see in a moment) are taken from not so new sources: the ancient religion of Hinduism from India; other occult or pagan (non-Christian) religions and traditions common to other ancient cultures (e.g. ancient Egypt, the Mayan civilization and the black magic and witchcraft of the European Middle Ages); and thirdly, since New Age is a Western and American phenomenon, there is the strong flavor of our good old scientific and practical bent mixed in.

Some Central Concepts of New Age

Let's look now at some of these core concepts, shared by all New Age believers. First, "God" is considered to be everything, to be in everything; everything and everyone are in fact God themselves. This is just the Hindu concept of pantheism - there is no Being "out there" to love and relate to, as taught in Christianity, but rather an impersonal "force" (as in Star Wars: "Use the Force, Luke!")

Every man is a god, having already attained their divine nature, if only they would become aware of it. But this means that, as gods, we all create our own realities and moralities and beliefs; there is no absolute truth anywhere to be known, because you are absolute truth. Plus, there is no use in praying to God for guidance in New Age, since no one is there; instead, there is a meditation upon your own divine Self.

Morality becomes a highly subjective thing to be determined by each person according to what his inner Self desires. This belief is from Hinduism. The highest god in Hinduism, Brahman, is "beyond good and evil," and does not require any absolute morality of his followers. Here is an enlightening exchange between a man investigating the world of New Age, and does not require absolute morality of his followers.

Here is a telling exchange between a man investigating the world of New Age, and the channeled entity "Ramtha" (supposedly a 35,000 year old warrior-king who conquered Atlantis):

MAN: My main concern is what my path of service is in my life.

RAMTHA: To you.

MAN: To myself and my fellow man.

RAMTHA: Don't worry about your fellow man. If you become happy, however they look upon you doesn't make any difference. The fact that you are happy and in service to Self is quite enough.³

One might wonder what would happen, were this true, if my Self tells me to harm you, while your Self tells you that this would not be a good idea! Who is right? We would quickly find ourselves faced with an issue that the Bible has taught all along - that there are absolute moral standards which God put in place to keep us out of trouble, and to which He is holding every man accountable, no matter what the man's "Self" desires to do!

"So," I said, "what you're saying is that reincarnation is like show business. You just keep doing it until you get it right."

"Yeah," he replied, "... something like that. You know."

- Conversation between Shirley MacLaine and David⁴

Reincarnation, or the notion that human souls are locked into an endless cycle of life and death in the world, comes directly from Bhuddism and is universally accepted within the New Age. Within those religions, reincarnation has always been seen as a horrible thing, a bondage or punishment that one should try to escape by meditating into the state of nirvana (nothingness).

But the New Age definition is more positive, that it is an upward spiritual evolution of everyone's divine soul over many life times. Ultimately perhaps, you could become an Ascended Master entity yourself, able to channel through other humans!

Here again, there is a direct contradiction with Biblical truth. The Bible clearly states that "it is appointed for men to die once, and after this comes judgment" (Hebrews 9:27). The judgment of God allows those who know Him and love Him to live with Him forever in joy (that is, Heaven), and allows all those who rejected His love and disobeyed His laws to live forever apart from Him (that is, in the torment of Hell).

As we are already seeing, either the Bible and the God of the Bible are right and true, or the New Age and Hindu teachings are true. With such glaring differences, they cannot both be true, even though New Age teachers often pay homage to the Bible and claim their teachings agree with it.

What is Channeling?

"You are God. You know you are Divine ... and, most importantly, (you must) act accordingly."

- channeled entity "John"

"Just do what feels right ... They (channeled entities) have told me to just trust my feelings."

- channel medium Kevin Ryerson⁵

And what about channeling? It is actually a very old phenomenon in the world of religions, known as spiritism: communicating with spirits via human mediums. But the million dollar question is: "Who do you hear when you hear a channeled voice?" Is it assuredly good, or deceptively evil?

Most New Agers who embrace channeling and read channeled books (by "Seth," "Lazarus" and Edgar Cayce) have assumed that just because something is spiritual and real, it is therefore good and true. But that is a mighty big and weak assumption, considering that the Bible has taught for thousands of years that evil spirits, called the Devil or demons, do exist and will attempt to influence, deceive and harm humans if allowed to do so.

"David," I said, "umm - did Mayan (a spiritual being/friend/teacher) say exactly where she was from?"

"Sure. The Pleiades (a constellation of stars)."

- a conversation between Shirley MacLaine and David6

In Deuteronomy chapter 18, God specifically calls witchcraft, spiritism and sorcery abominations in His sight, horrible things. Why is this? Is it because He is scared of the competition of mediums and channeled beings (which the Bible identifies as simply lying demons), and the New Age movement?

No, the God of the Bible hates such practices because He loves human beings, and does not want people falling into the trap of "alternative spiritualities" that will bring about confusion, sin, destruction and finally Hell.

Finally, one might wonder why New Age spirituality has become so popular and has spread so rapidly in the West. It has come on like a storm in recent years for probably three basic reasons:

- 1) New Age offers a spiritual basis for life, filling the void created in our hearts and culture by materialism and humanism.
- 2) While Christianity also offers the above, it is perceived as being contrary to modern science, while New Age purports to be on the leading edge science in physics and psychology.
- 3) New Age often tolerates rather than challenges such unbiblical behaviors as sex outside of marriage, adultery (e.g. Shirley MacLaine's own sexual escapades), homosexuality, and the recreational use of drugs.

New Age offers a way of being "spiritual" to all those who are unwilling to repent or stop such lifestyles, as the God of the Bible commands for our own good.

Resolving Questions About the New Age

WHO WILL RULE THE FUTURE?

Current events in the Middle East have caused the whole world to pause and consider. In the minds of many people the question emerges: "What kind of a future can I expect to live in?"

On one hand we see scientists and prognosticators warning of future environmental and political dangers. Yet at the same time, President Bush optimistically refers to a "new world order" of international interdependence and economic cooperation.

New Age globalists, such as Ken Carey, author of the Starseed Transmissions, talk of a mystical spirituality which will bring about a planetary consciousness. We face a new millennium with both the possibility of unprecedented achievement or apocalypse.

When we look to Biblical prophets for the answers, we see both the promise of an era of peace when the nations shall "beat their swords into plowshares," and a more frightening scenario of "wars and rumors of wars."

Yet the Bible never teaches passivity or fatalism. Although the Personal Living God of the Universe is omniscient and knows what the future will bring, it is not a fatalistic future. God has allowed mankind to determine its future on an individual and global level. We are never to look at our lives or history fatalistically.

This is an important concept to grasp especially in times of global uncertainty. Each of us must understand that to a large extent we will determine the quality of the future we live in by the choices we make now. In order to make intelligent choices we must understand the principles that make life work and how our present worldview will determine our outcome.

In our world today there are three primary worldviews:

- * First, there is the Judeo-Christian worldview which teaches that mankind was created by the Personal Living God of the Universe, that we are here for a purpose and that we are accountable for our actions before this God who was revealed to us through His eternally begotten Son Jesus Christ.

- * Second, there is the New Age or Eastern mystical worldview which propagates the notion that we are all gods.

- * Finally, there is the secular humanistic worldview which believes that mankind came through the random mixture of chemicals through the process of evolution. There is no purpose for man in this worldview beyond what we make of it and there is no God.

Each of us has an inner belief system which closely identifies with one of these worldviews and the actions and decisions we make stem from this inner belief system, although we may not be aware of it. The key issue is making sure that our worldview or personal philosophy is based on truth or fact. It can be either advantageous or dangerous to live life out of a worldview which is untrue.

Christopher Columbus, for example, believed that the world was round and acted upon that belief by sailing beyond a certain point. He opened up entire continents, minerals and other treasures to Europe because of a correct worldview, while others had supposed that the world was flat.

The Collapse of the Marxist Worldview

A classic example of false worldview would be the notion of Marxist communism held by many professors on college campuses. These people falsely believe - or once believed - that Marxist theory could solve mankind's social problems. Yet in the face of the glaring evidence coming out of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union after the fall of the Berlin Wall and the collapse of communism only a fool would believe that Marxism works.

For evidence against this worldview, we need only listen to the anguish of the people speaking out from under the oppression of Marxist governments like Russia, China and Cuba.

Communism falsely taught that all suffering is due to class struggle and that there is no God. This has produced the greatest tyranny the world has ever known with hundreds of millions of people being slaughtered - not to mention a billion people whose dreams and hopes have been crushed under these governments. History teaches us that ideas have consequences in the real world and wrong ideas can produce devastating results.

The Humanistic Worldview

Today in our own culture many people adhere to the by-product of Marxist communism - humanism. This worldview is equally false, being based on many of the same untruths concerning man and the material universe as communism. Humanism teaches us that there is no God; man is the center of the universe and that we are here as part of a random chemical accident.

Even on the basis of advanced mathematics and physics, the statistical probability of the human race being here by accident is so remote that large numbers of scientists have already refuted both Darwinian evolution and humanism as workable theories.

In fact, a new system of physics has already emerged which is based on the premise of there being a guiding force of intelligence to the universe. This new science even acknowledges the existence of some kind of God or higher consciousness.

Yet, as in the case of college professors still adhering to Marxism despite the glaring evidence of the real world, there are still many in the academic community who teach evolution and humanism in the face of a growing body of scientific evidence that these theories simply cannot be true.

Tragically, false ideas about life and man have powerful consequences and we are seeing the results of what humanism has done to our society over the last fifty years. Millions of young people have been indoctrinated in an educational system which has taught people that we are evolved animals and that there is no reason for life.

The result of this falsehood has produced social chaos and moral anarchy. 25 million babies have been aborted; our inner cities are being destroyed by gangs and ultra-violence; drugs and alcohol have robbed us of our moral strength; pornography creates all kinds of sexual abuse.

The destruction of our culture is a consequence of the false ideas we have embraced about life and the meaning of existence. History shows us that ideas always produce real world consequences. The false ideas of the Nazi's "master race" produced the climate which allowed Adolph Hitler to come to power.

In our culture, humanism has taught people to live for the present moment with no moral or spiritual accountability. The direct result is moral and social chaos which can be felt at every level of our culture.

There may be some who would say that blaming all of our social ills on humanism is overly simplistic; they would charge this idea with a "witch hunt mentality" or being like a McCarthy-like "communist conspiracy" trial. Yet even the most casual observer of history would agree that a people's belief system has everything to do with the external results of the culture.

An Alternative Worldview: Judeo-Christianity

When our culture embraced a Judeo-Christian worldview which believed that each one of us were created by God for a purpose and that there is a day of judgment for every person - when as a nation we believed in the concept of right and wrong, sexual morality, sin and the forgiveness of sins through the Savior Jesus Christ, we prospered in every area.

Our grandparents can still remember a time when you did not have to lock your doors at night in the cities and women could walk alone at night without fear. It wasn't too long ago when men and women were married for life and perverse sexual lifestyles were scorned at.

What happened in America to produce an AIDS epidemic, child molestation, violence, drugs, a crisis in education, millions of homeless people, a plethora of cults, divorce and other social ills? Did these things just randomly spring up one day or are they the result of the way America now thinks and its collective worldview?

The root issue of all these problems is a false belief system about life. America made a wrong turn in its philosophy about life and we are now paying the results. From the moment we began to reject our Judeo-Christian worldview there has been a steady increase in the amount of our social problems. In fact, a graph plotting social problems along with the change in worldview on a chart would clearly show that our social problems are a direct result of our humanistic beliefs.

Why did we reject our Judeo-Christian heritage for the humanistic philosophies? Simply, we began to listen to the wrong voices. Russia and Germany were seduced by political activists who promised them a utopian society if they embraced Marxism or Nazism. When as a culture they allowed themselves to be debased by false worldviews and they lost their freedom and totalitarianism resulted with bloodshed and chaos.

Who will rule?

Right now our nation is at a crossroads. Social theorists and political activists propose a rejection of Judeo-Christian beliefs and promise a New Age of peace, harmony and universal spirituality. These people have crept in quietly into our educational system and have wrested control of the mass media.

They are propagating a belief that "nationalism" and patriotism" are bad; that we need to reject Christianity and Judaism which teach us that there is a Personal Living God of the Universe Who has a specific moral code which says, for example, that abortion, the occult and homosexuality are wrong.

But didn't the Nazi's promise a "Thousand Year Reich?" Didn't the Marxists promise a "worker's paradise?" On and on people have been fooled in history and have embraced false worldviews based on lies. The result time and again has been bloodshed and tyranny.

Remember - ideas have real world consequences and it is important to clearly understand your worldview and the consequences that it will produce for yourself and your culture.

The Journey Toward Truth

As someone who has personally made the journey from being a humanist who embraced New Age and Eastern mystical beliefs to finally accepting Jesus Christ into my life and recognizing that Christianity is truth and not a religion, I finally realized that truth is not the result of a popularity poll and that it is only the Judeo-Christian worldview which has stood the test of history.

I encourage you to never blindly follow the crowd when it comes to deciding for yourself what life is all about. Don't take the opinions of your teachers, the media or anyone at face value. Do your intellectual homework and think for yourself!

To really understand life, you have to stand apart from your culture and look at your world from afar.

You cannot buy into this contemporary American mindset of corrupted notions about life and history. If you have your worldview formed by MTV, Hollywood and Rolling Stone magazine then you have become the intellectual equivalent of a cream puff.

Think for yourself and dare to be different. Stand before the Living God and talk to Jesus - the Lord of the universe - the God of all history. Come face to face with your Creator and have your mind truly expanded.

AALARM Student Group at Harvard Addresses Intolerance of Religion

Harvard's first motto was: "For Christ and the Church"

CAMBRIDGE, MA (FR) - A newly formed student group, Alliance Against Learning in the Absence of Religion and Morality, or AALARM, is causing a sensation at Harvard University.

Adam Webb and Ken DeGiorgio, Harvard roommates who founded the group, say they represent "faith, family, country and community" - traditional values which are taught by Christianity and which most Americans support. AALARM drew the ire of homosexual and lesbian student groups last fall when the group became highly vocal in relating their views on the campus.

Webb said that the Harvard community is having difficulty accepting a new group which represents religion and conservatism instead of the pervasive secularism and lock-step liberalism which dominates the school. DeGiorgio said that Harvard is simply trying to stifle an organization because it teaches religion and traditional values.

"We feel stifled. There's just utter disdain for everything we believe in," Webb said. "But what we're really all about is presenting alternative viewpoints. All these people are so open-minded, but they're not willing to accept that most of America has faith, religion and traditional values."

"Most Americans think homosexuality is immoral and wrong," Webb said. AALARM is opposed to the way homosexuality "is not only condoned but encouraged" at Harvard. Webb said his group opposed the ideas discussed at a weekend conference in October, including the integration of gay issues into the curriculum and the recruitment of gay and lesbian professors.

AALARM also opposes abortion and began a pro-life campaign last November. DeGiorgio formed a committee which soon held a demonstration outside of the Cambridge Kinko's copier service protesting the company's refusal to photocopy AALARM's pro-life message. After notifying the national headquarters of Kinko's in California, the national management agreed to discuss reparations.

Webb said his group also intends to fight against "negativism about religion" taught at Harvard. Ironically, Harvard was founded for the purpose of training Christian ministers and teachers. For over 200 years, Harvard's official motto was "Christo et Ecclesia" - For Christ and the Church - indicating the college's strong Christian foundation. The tablet found on the right-hand wall of the Johnson Gate leading into Harvard Yard attests, for all to see, the intent and purpose of Harvard's beginnings:

"After God had carried us safe to New England and we had built our houses, provided necessities for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship and settled the civil government, one of the next things we longed for and looked after, was to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity, dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches when our present ministers shall lie in the dust."

"New England's first fruits," which is the tablet's signature, was to propagate the Christian religion for "Christ and the Church." But things have changed since then, and a group of 47 students has sprung up in AALARM to address the issue of intolerance. "There's a refusal to admit faith in any discussion on this campus," Webb said.

Groups similar to AALARM have been forming on many campuses, occasionally attracting attention to themselves as a center of controversy. A growing voice of criticism complains that a liberal majority is trying to squash an alternative voice on the campuses.

Last semester, I co-founded AALARM (Association Against Learning in the Absence of Religion and Morality) at Harvard with Mike Warren on the University of Tennessee campus after being inspired by the guys at Harvard. We had some great victories this year. On November 28, 1991 our paper finally hit the campus after a whole semester of trying to figure out how to do it ourselves. I am very proud of the UTK Spectator!

CAMBRIDGE, MA (FR) - Adam Webb and Ken DeGiorgio, co-founders of AALARM (Association Against Learning in the Absence of Religion and Morality) at Harvard University have sparked interest in their group among students throughout America. A national resurgence of students dedicated to reclaiming traditional American and Christian values is behind this network.

"This is really a grassroots network," says DeGiorgio, "We have no national headquarters or anything like that. It's very democratic."

Spurred on by stories of AALARM's controversial outspokenness on issues ranging from abortion, homosexual politics, and politically correct thinking, other students at Columbia, Yale, Stanford, UMass/Amherst, and the University of Tennessee have also formed AALARM chapters. "Some are really active, others are just getting started," said DeGiorgio. The AALARM chapter at Harvard was begun in the Spring of 1990, and has since been the subject of several nationally circulated news articles.

University students may obtain more information in forming an AALARM chapter by writing:

America's International Visitors: Reaching the World at our Doorstep

How would you like to be used of God to change an entire nation?

Armenia was the first nation in the world to become what we would call a "Christian nation." By the year 300 A.D., virtually everyone within the borders of that country had come to the saving knowledge of Jesus Christ. How did it happen? It was all the result of one man - a foreign student - who went to study in Cappadocia, a province of Asia Minor. He lived there with a Christian family, gave his life to Christ, was taught, and went back to Armenia with a burning desire to preach the gospel there!

One student went to a foreign country ... And he brought his whole nation to Christ!

America: A Modern Day Jerusalem

God has a strategic plan for everything He does. When He poured out His Spirit on the first disciples in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, He had a missionary purpose in mind. Acts 2:5 tells us who was observing when the miraculous event occurred:

"Now there were Jews living in Jerusalem, devout men, from every nation under heaven."

Few Americans realize it ... But today in the United States, there are over 7 million non-immigrant, non-tourist foreigners and 400,000 international students attending our colleges and universities. This is at least a 2000% increase in just 25 years!

If we believe that God is sovereign and that He works in the affairs of nations, we have to realize that He brought these foreign visitors to America for a reason.

We need to understand that the missionary vision is straight from the heart of God! We can see this throughout the Bible as early as the book of Genesis. God first gave this commission to Abraham:

"Go forth from your country, and from your relatives, and from your father's house, to the land which I will show you. And I will make you a great nation; and I will bless you, and make your name great; so that you shall be a blessing. And I will bless those who bless you and the one who curses you I will curse. And in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed" (Genesis 12:1-3).

God's ultimate purpose in sending Abraham to Canaan was to reach the nations! In that day Canaan was the crossroads of three continents. Caravans from the farthest corners of the inhabited earth traveled there. The land was chosen by God for Israel to dwell in because he wanted His people to carry out a missionary task!

When the land of Israel finally began to take dominion over the land of Caanan, God gave them specific instructions on how to handle foreign visitors:

* Deuteronomy 31:12: "Assemble the alien who is in your town, in order that they may hear and learn and fear the Lord your God, and be careful to observe all the words of the law."

* Leviticus 19:34: "The stranger who resides with you ... you must treat him as yourself."

International Visitors

God's missionary desire to reach the whole world could not be fully accomplished by His "missionary nation" - Israel. That call and responsibility was handed down to the Church!

It is amazing to see how often international visitors appear in the New Testament! Did you know that Paul himself - one of the greatest apostles that ever lived - was an international student? He came from Tarsus to study in Jerusalem, and you know the rest of the story.

In Acts chapter 8, we find Philip the evangelist preaching to an Ethiopian visitor, who was quite influential in the royal court of his country. Philip led him to the Lord, and the new believer went back to transform his own nation.

Imagine the possibilities! Because Philip was simply obedient to relate the gospel to the Ethiopian eunuch, all of Africa was introduced to the message of Jesus. The same can happen today when you become a friend to an international student and lead him to Christ! Your obedience to the Spirit of God can affect the destiny of a whole nation or even an entire continent!

When we do not obey God's commands, however, there can often be tragic results.

* Yosuke Matsuoka attended the University of Oregon. Isoruku Yamamoto studied at Harvard. Both experienced incredible racial prejudice. After returning to Japan they became the foreign Minister of Japan and the Commander in Chief of the Combined Fleet respectively. They played key roles in leading their nation to attack Pearl Harbor.

* Ho Chi Minh also studied at Harvard and was subjected to extreme racial prejudice. He later studied Marxism and due to his influence all of Southeast Asia came under communist dominion.

* Mengistu Haile Mariam, the communist leader of Ethiopia, went to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas for military training and was said to have been embittered by the racial discrimination he received while in America. The lack of cooperation the government of Ethiopia exhibited with the nations of the West during the great famine, was a direct result of this embitterment.

These men came to America for an education - and rather than reaching out to them and loving them, we sent them back as enemies. Their stories should teach us a lesson about the importance of reaching out to international students!

Right now, one fourth to one half of the future leaders of the world are on American campuses. The greatest potential for world evangelism lies in the international students studying in America. God had truly brought the whole world to our doorstep. This is God's most effective strategy for world evangelism.

There are many nations of the world which either prohibit or restrict missionary activity. In American universities, however, there are many Muslim, Chinese, and Southeast Asian students, whose governments are sponsoring their academic endeavors.

These students are already familiar with the people, language and customs of their own country. These international students are the future leaders of their societies, often comprising the top five percent of their nation - often, most people in these nations have never even heard of Jesus Christ. If these students become Christians while studying here in America and are trained in God's Word, they can go back and begin a spiritual awakening in their own nation - from within!

The foreign students on your campus are often lonely and are used to living around people in their own nation who show them great respect. Now, living in America, they are treated like another face in the crowd. Most international students come to this country with a real desire to have an American friend. They are looking for people who have genuine love and concern for them.

The question you should be asking is: "Where are the Christians?" We can no longer afford to sit back in complacency while 400,000 future leaders of the nations remain unreached with the gospel. We literally have the whole world sitting on our doorstep. In the Great Commission, our Lord Jesus Christ told us to "Go into all the world and preach the gospel" and "make disciples of all nations."

How will you respond?

An Effective Strategy to Reach Internationals

1. Print 2000 invitations to a Thanksgiving Dinner sponsored by your local church.
2. Distribute these invitations to the international students on your local campus. (Most campuses have student groups for international students through which you may be able to distribute these invitations).
3. Invite 2000 international students to a Thanksgiving dinner. (A dinner for 20 to 50 people should be planned.)

4. At this dinner, give a presentation of the gospel in a creative way. This might include an explanation of "the meaning of Thanksgiving."
5. Make a friend of an international student. Your love and friendship may one day help to change the world.

Boston U. President Offers Reform for American Education

By Jay Rogers

Boston University president, John Silber, in a recently published book, Straight Shooting (Harper & Row), gives a detailed criticism of the American educational system and offers an ideology of reform from the viewpoint of his many years of experience.

President Silber was the subject of controversy last year when he advanced a measure which enforced curfews on students living in dormitories and disallowed overnight guests, after a student complained about her roommate's sexual conduct and that she had disregarded her requests to discontinue this behavior.

In Straight Shooting, Silber is no less controversial, as he proposes some radical methods of reform. Silber scathingly portrays America's public education system as being substandard: "The standards today are derisory by standards that were operative in ordinary little country schools a hundred years ago."

Silber believes that high school teachers should score an "A" on a college level exam in their subject area as a prerequisite to certification, claiming that the current system is an "unintentional conspiracy to defraud the American public because they are certifying the ineducable to be educators."

Silber's emphasis on moral education is derived from a varied background. After seeing his family struggle to survive during the Depression, Silber studied for the ministry, investigated the legal profession, received a doctorate in philosophy from Yale, and taught at the University of Texas in Austin.

After being appointed as B.U. president in 1971, Silber has implemented numerous reforms, which have elevated Boston University's stature to one of the most highly respected schools in the nation.

In Straight Shooting, Silber remarks that when college students cringe at the thought of entering the "real world" upon graduation, it is a further indictment against a substandard system. According to Silber, "That is an expression of escapism ... It suggests that they were avoiding the real world all the time they were in school."

Silber's intelligence and his controversial, yet well-thought-out views are earning him a place in American history. The result of the Chelsea "experiment" will be an indicator of the effectiveness of Silber's moral education. If the plan is a success, Silber may one day be viewed as a reformer of education in the late 20th century.

Boston's Colleges and Universities: An International Center

Oiver Wendell Holmes once called the city of Boston: "The thinking center of the continent, and therefore of the planet." Boston's title "the hub of the universe" has been applied many times. When you look at the area's colleges and universities, it is easy to see why.

The legacy of education in America began in Boston in 1636 with the founding of Harvard College, the nation's first institution of higher learning. Today there are more than 50 colleges and universities in the area. Being the largest urban center in New England, Greater Boston claims more than half the region's 117 colleges. Intellectual pursuits permeate the city. About 200,000 students return to the hub each September; the undergraduate culture makes up about one-quarter of the population.

Harvard and Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) - both located on the Charles River in Cambridge - are world class institutions. Many other prestigious schools also inhabit the area, including such well known music schools as Berklee College of Music and the New England Conservatory of Music. In addition, the city boasts an impressive array of art, medical, law, and business schools. Nowhere else in America is there such a mixture.

Vast libraries, including Harvard's Widener Library - the largest in the world, and abundant bookstores hold the promise of locating virtually any book; cultural events and visiting speakers fill the calendar; art galleries, theaters and music recitals are open to the public daily. A recent Boston Globe survey asked students at six universities if they considered New England to be the "academic center of America." Seventy percent of American students and 79 percent of international students said "yes."

Many of New England's colleges grew out of the powerful Christian influence of the first three centuries. Harvard was sponsored by the Congregational Church; Boston College was founded by the Jesuits; Amherst, Brown, Dartmouth, Mount Holyoke, Wellesley, Williams and Yale were all founded as Christian institutions for the purpose of training ministers, missionaries and teachers.

International Population Growing Rapidly

The schools of New England draw students and faculty from all corners of the globe. It is an international community in every sense of the word. Boston has the highest concentration of international students of any city in America. Currently there are at least 20,000 internationals studying in Massachusetts and close to 40,000 internationals attending school in New England.

Many foreign students come to Boston because it has a large international community. In Boston, they can travel anywhere in the city within minutes on a subway trolley and experience the many events and places of interest the city has to offer.

Boston, with its cosmopolitan flavor, is arguably the most "Old World" and European city in the United States. Yet at the same time it offers the richest New World heritage, the ideas of freedom and democracy being germinated right in the heart of the city during its first two centuries. The influx of immigrants in the last century brought it most of its European culture. Currently there is an influx of Asian and Hispanic influence. The international student population only adds to this potpourri. The brightest minds of many nations are being nurtured right here.

One of the main reasons for growth is that area schools are trying to make up for the large number of students who have not been born. The entire U.S. is on a downward demographic trend in the college-age-population. The Northeast has been the hardest hit; the college-age-population in Massachusetts has dropped 30 percent in the last seven years. In order to keep admission standards high, colleges are forced to make up these numbers with students from overseas.

The region has traditionally attracted its international student population from Western Europe, but now the Asian population is on the upswing. Ten percent of Boston University's freshman class are internationals, with the largest contingent coming from Asia.

With the shortage of American college age students, the region will remain a growth area for internationals at least for the next five years.

Former Buddhist Student Leader Becomes Christian

Editor's Note: Samuel Autman, a journalism student at the University of Missouri in Columbia, was once a student chapter leader in a growing sect of Buddhism known as Nichiren Shoshu American. Nichiren, which emphasizes world peace, boasts a membership of 17 million world-wide with half a million in America.

I'm Samuel Autman, a 22-year-old native of St. Louis. I want to share how the true and living God delivered me from Buddhism.

I had searched high and low for the "perfect teaching," until finally I discovered a group of Buddhists who seemed happy. This sect believed that by chanting a specific phrase everyday, humans can experience true happiness. I attended one of their meetings and discovered that they were average people who chanted this single phrase rhythmically. The leaders told me to not believe in the chanting, only to try it and see what kind of results I got. I was instructed to make a list of things and chant to see if it worked. This was the measure they used to test the validity of any teaching.

Amazingly, I started receiving an incredible amount of material gain. I began to chant everyday and waited excitedly to see what kind of results I would get. I chanted for two years before I became a Buddhist. I joined the group in 1985 and got an altar, prayer beads, incense, and candles. I also received a 'gohonzon,' a scroll written in Sanskrit, which was my object of worship. The leaders told me that my gohonzon was a "driver's license" to my own destiny, and that the power was in writing the chant on it.

Immediately after transferring to the University of Missouri I started a Nichiren Shoshu American chapter. I cultivated a membership of 20 students by going out on campus and encouraging people to chant so they could become happy.

Ultimately these chanters hope to attain world peace through individual happiness. I had gained a car, money, and jobs, supposedly from chanting. But I had no peace. I seemed confident, happy, and on top of things. But I would wake up at night screaming for help, and no one ever knew.

Meanwhile, I kept running into born-again Christians. When I spent my summer in Birmingham, Alabama, I met a Christian college student who said that she was praying for me. I hated her. When I returned to school, I met another Christian, Jim. He and I had two classes together so we decided to work on a project. I had no idea he was a Christian.

One night I called Jim and he answered, "Maranatha Christian Church, this is Jim." My first response was to hang up. This must be a mistake - Jim is a nice guy. How could he be involved in that! I figured I'd study with him anyway just for laughs. He couldn't do anything to me ... all he could do was pray. What good would that do?

We completed our projects at the Maranatha house and I was impressed by the gentleness of the Christian young people there. Jim began to witness to me about holy living and walking with Jesus. Something happened inside of me. Jim spoke with such conviction and sincerity, and he never made me uncomfortable with harsh words. He later told me that he had been praying for me, and I became painfully aware that I was worshipping a false god.

I skipped an international Nichiren conference to attend a Maranatha church service that Sunday. I was impressed by the college students praising God! I felt convicted by the Holy Spirit and confessed Jesus as my Lord. Immediately after the service, I burned my altar, the false god, and about $200 worth of Buddhist literature.

When the Buddhist leaders heard that I had become a born-again Christian instead of going to the conference, they were furious. I had been taught that the gohonzon was the epitome of life and if I burned it, my life would be gone. Within that same month, the regional directors drove to the campus to visit me and to encourage me to continue my chanting. However, I've continued to walk with God.

I wrote a letter to all of the leaders telling them about my conversion and the deception of Buddhism. I'm now writing a tract in hopes that other students won't fall into the deception that I once was in. I am free to serve the true and living God. He that the Son sets free is free indeed!

GAINESVILLE, FL (FR) - Campus officials across the nation are discovering that there is a "moral vacuum" in the classroom and are attempting to rectify the problem by developing new ethics and moral values codes. Student behavior problems such as alcohol and drug use, cheating, and sexual promiscuity are now being viewed as by-products of value-less instruction and a de-emphasis on morals in the university curriculum.

In an effort to counter these student behavior problems, the Florida Board of Regents recently asked its nine state universities to develop an ethics and moral values code for faculty, administration, and students. While drafting the code, the task force agreed that the university system is not adequately educating students in moral and ethical values.

Dealing with values across the nation is a hot new issue which was popularized in the late 1980s by former U.S. Secretary of Education, William Bennett. The Florida Regents report states: "The concern for values and ethics should be expressed in classes, seminars, laboratories and, in fact, all aspects of university life." Task Force Chairman Sam Hill related that scholars have become specialists in increasingly narrow areas within their disciplines and do not consider themselves qualified to teach ethics.

Instead, many professors come out of Ph.D. programs which stress only quantifiable results. Therefore, professors are apt to deliver value-free instruction rather than "creating an environment in which a student can be perceptive of ethical standards," said Alan Merten, dean of the University of Florida (UF) College of Business Administration.

Art Sandeen, vice president for student affairs at UF, said the faculty are important influences for students. "The cliché that values are 'caught and not taught' may have some relevance here," he said. "I think students learn values of honesty and integrity by being around faculty members who are exhibiting those traits, whether it's in a research laboratory or a classroom or an office."

Business schools are now grappling with the idea of educating students in ethical values, especially with the current emphasis on financial gain which has characterized the 1980s. "What we're seeing now is a realization that there are things which should be taught in a university that are not necessarily quantifiable and need some value judgments," Merten said.

Some business professors work with religion and philosophy professors to introduce ethical issues into their classes. A finance professor thought that too many students failed to develop their own ethical standards and values, therefore they automatically accepted the ethical standards which prevailed at their first job. To force students to confront their convictions, or lack thereof, he routinely asks students to write a description of their values system.

"It's a simple thing," said Merten, "but at least it confronts them on the question of what their values are." Alfred Ring, professor emeritus of real estate, said too few professors teach what it means to be honorable and to have integrity. Instead, professors simply supply students with data, hoping they will use the information correctly. "If you ask the average student why he majors in a specific field, the chances are the student will say 'to make money,'" Ring said.

The student body president at UF, Scooter Willis, suggested that a class on morals and ethics be added to class requirements for freshmen. However, campus officials believe that it would be too cumbersome to implement and are considering offering an optional course.

The effectiveness of ethics codes in addressing student behavior problems are yet to be seen. But in diagnosing the heart of the problem - a lack of emphasis on values in curriculum - faculty and administrators may be headed in the right direction.

The Campus: Center of Stress

By David L. McKenna

College campuses are microcosms of our culture. At first thought, we might breath a sigh of relief because American colleges and universities seem quite compared to the 1960s; students are going about the serious business of getting an education. What appears on the surface, however, may not be as innocent as it seems, and what is rumbling just beneath the surface may be the prelude to eruption. In the 1990s our campuses will reveal a culture in conflict.

If there is a prevailing moral consensus on the college campus today, it appears to be a commitment to self-interest. Students alone are not to be blamed. They are the heirs of a "Me generation" that began almost two decades ago. After the turbulent years of campus violence had exhausted themselves in the mid-1970s, college students turned inwardly toward one of two responses. They either became part of the born-again movement, which offered a spiritual solution for their disillusionment, or they retreated into a protective shell of radical self-interest. Christopher Lasch, an intellectual historian, perceived the latter trend in 1978 when he wrote The Culture of Narcissism. Lasch accurately portrayed radical self-interest as a person's preoccupation with the "Radical Now" in time, the "Radical Self" in motivation and "Radical Happiness" in achievement.

While a limited number of people read Lasch's more scholarly analysis of the trend, Robert Ringer's popular Looking Out for Number One set a record for longevity on the New York Times best-seller index. Ringer did not disguise his credo for self-interest: Negotiate all relationships on a scale that tips to your own self-interest. Psychologists dignified the blatant self-interest of Ringer by developing equity theory, which also assumes that all human transactions are negotiated on the balance of self-interest. Pressed to its logical conclusion, equity theory leaves no room for genuine altruism. In every case there is a trade-off of values so that even a martyr will not die unless some equitable self-interest is served.

Such radical self-interest proved to be a short, dead-end street. By the 1980s the end was in view. Daniel Yankelovich, in his book New Rules: Living in a World Turned Upside Down, interpreted the results of his research survey to mean a shift toward an "ethic of commitment" by the members of the Me generation. According to Yankelovich, as the Me generation aged into their thirties, they wanted to retain their self-interest and gain the values of wamd human relationships.

With just a slight shift toward an interest in others, human transactions in marriage or career took on the character of a "giving/getting contract." Whether a prenuptial agreement, an employment contract or a community commitment, all relationships were negotiated on adversarial and legalistic terms to assure that neither party gives more than one gets. In the early 1980s Yankelovich saw revisions being made in the giving/getting contract as people also tried to incorporate their yearnings for human commitment into their experiment in self-fulfillment. In other words, the Me generation wanted to be the We generation without giving up too much self-interest.

Robert Bellah does not buy into the alleged transition from the "Me" to the "We" generation. Habits of the Heart, written in 1985, may well be the most significant book of the decade. Based on interviews of young adults across the nation, Bellah concludes that our American character is being shaped by radical individualism at the expense of the "moral community" or the "common good." Two kinds of self-interest are identified: utilitarian individualism and expressive individualism. In essence, utilitarian individualism means doing what we want to do for our own profit, and expressive individualism means being what we want to be for our own pleasure.

Bellah sees these forces personified in three professional roles that we now extol as models for our culture and especially our students: the entrepreneur, who exploits resources in ventures of self-interest; the manager, who manipulates resources to serve the system at the expense of people; and the therapist, who makes us feel good about doing what we want to do for our own profit and being what we want to be for our own pleasure.

These models are not limited to secular leaders. Not long ago I received a brochure for recruiting a new president for a prominent Christian organization. Under the qualifications for the position, priority was given to a person who could inspire others with a creative vision; make tough decisions on programs and people to reduce a deficit; and raise morale with warm, participatory leadership. As I read the brochure I exclaimed: "There it is! Even in a Christian organization we want an entrepreneur, a manager and a therapist all rolled into one."

If religious prophets had said what Robert Bellah has written, they would have been ignored or crucified. Bellah's credibility as a leading scholar puts the ring of authority in his book, especially among professors and students on the college campus. The question is whether anyone has heeded his prophetic warning.

By the time we entered the 1990s, every major institution reeled under the impact of self-interest. In the home, the traditional nuclear family of two parents and children represented only 11 percent of the households in the nation. In business, the greed of junk bonds, program trading, unfriendly take-overs and the savings and loan fiasco became a national disgrace. In government, ethics committees worked long and hard on multiple cases without either bark or bite; and in the church, a succession of infightings and sex scandals shook public confidence.

Radical self-interest also contaminated the college campuses, but in a less dramatic fashion. Perhaps the most alarming signal came from the American Council of Education (ACE) surveys of the college aspirations of incoming freshmen. In 1968, when the ACE surveys began, 70 percent of the entering freshmen aspired to the goal of developing a philosophy of life as the outcome of their college career. Less than 40 percent envisioned college as an opportunity to become well-off financially. Twenty-two years later the statistics were reversed for the entering class of 1990. Seventy percent aspired to become well-off financially, and less than 40 percent were primarily interested in developing a philosophy of life.

Careerism, another indicator of the aspiration to become well-off financially, leads students in their choices of fields of study in the 1990s. Ever since the mid-1970s, students have traded majors in liberal arts for professional degrees in fields such as business, computer science and communications. The trend still holds in the 1990s, although there is some evidence of a small renaissance in some fields of liberal arts. By and large, students still opt for "cash cows" in their college careers.

Of course, the trend away from the liberal arts and toward professional studies is not new. More disturbing is the underlying attitude of students. Frank Newman conducted the study "Higher Education and American Resurgence for the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching" in 1985. His findings indicated both our colleges and our culture. In his summary Newman noted that students were:

- * choosing narrow, technical fields rather than liberal arts;
- * thinking in narrow, technical terms rather than asking philosophical questions;
- * electing safe courses at a time when we needed leaders who were willing to take a risk;
- * becoming more parochial just when the position of the United States hung in the balance.

How does Newman account for his findings? He states: "By every measure that we have been able to find, today's graduates are less interested in and less prepared to exercise their civic responsibilities."

Not just world affairs, but community affairs suffered from self-interest. Newman found that students were no more ready to assume leadership in the local community than they were on the world scene.

The most scathing indictment of the intellectual, cultural and moral climate of the campus, however, came from the philosopher Alan Bloom in his widely read volume The Closing of the American Mind. Although he is an agnostic Jew and avowed humanist, Bloom identifies the problem on campus as the loss of absolute truth as the ground for intellectual inquiry, moral integrity and cultural vitality. His opening sentence reveals the rationale for his book: "There is one thing a professor can be absolutely certain of; almost every student entering the university believes, or says he believes, that truth is relative."

Once it is accepted that truth is relative, Bloom says, anything goes on the campus. Quite in contrast with the fear that their minds will be closed to truth, he characterizes the contemporary college student as a person who is "open to indifference" - accepting anything and indifferent to everything. In the absence of absolute truth, he argues, there are no standards for scholarly pursuit, cultural excellence, community values or personal integrity. Regrettably, Bloom's diagnosis is better than his prescription. Finding truth in the absolutes of Platonic idealism, he calls for a renaissance of community on campus in pursuit of those ideals.

College campuses are also the moral testing grounds for the larger culture. While frequently accused of being morally lax, the college campus actually reflects, often in advance, the changing morals of the society. At the opening of the 1990s, for example, colleges were debating condom dispensers, drug testing and date rape. At the same time students reversed earlier trends toward free sex, pot parties and alcohol bashes. Moral trends on campus are always unpredictable. The moral temperature of the campus climate cannot be easily forecasted. A recent resurgence of racism is another example. Except for the suspicion that racial prejudice continues as an undertow in the larger culture, we would not expect it to break out first on the campus. Despite its unpredictable nature, we cannot call the college campus of the 1990s the "bottom of a bird cage" or a "moral pigsty." More appropriately, the college campus in the 1990s is a simmering stew of self-interest.

Evangelical Christian students are not exempt from the subtle influence of self-interest. James Davison Hunter, in his book Evangelicalism: The Coming Generation, reports on the attitudes and values of students on Christian college and seminary campuses. The results may be gratifying or disturbing, depending on your priorities. Evangelical Christian students, for example, are distinctly different from their counterparts in public universities in matters of morals, such as premarital sex, homosexuality and cheating on income taxes, but merge with the general population of students in work values and goals of self-realization. Similar shifts in attitudes toward family, politics and world affairs lead Hunter to conclude:

"The caricature of evangelicalism as the last bastion of the traditional values of discipline and hard work for their own sake, self-sacrifice and moral asceticism, are largely inaccurate. Far from being untouched by the cultural trends of the post-World War II decades, the coming generation of evangelicals, in their own distinct ways have come to participate in them."

Past and present generations of evangelical Christians show another contrast. In matters of theology - such as biblical inerrancy, creationism and the particularity of salvation only in Jesus Christ - evangelical students are definitely more liberal than their parents and grandparents.

Although the value of Hunter's specific findings may be disputed by the questions he asked, his perception of the coming generation of evangelical Christians is well-taken. Likening the young evangelical of today to Christian in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Hunter foresees this picture of the future:

"Though still headed toward the Celestial city, he (or she) is now traveling with less conviction, less confidence about his path, and is perhaps more vulnerable to the worldly attractions encountered by Bunyan's pilgrim."

If so, evangelical Christian students on college campuses join the culture in need of a Great Awakening. Hunter's call for a "new paradigm" for evangelical Christianity echoes the need for prophetic voices in the 1990s as the next phase of a Great Awakening. As a microcosm of a culture in which radical self-interest is shaping our character, hollowing our institutions, desacralizing our morals and twisting our values, only a Great Awakening can reverse the trends. It began on the campus in the 1790s and 1890s. Can it begin there again?

C. Robert Pace, professor of higher education at UCLA, believes it can. At the conclusion of his book Education and Evangelism, written for the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education, this social psychologist writes:

"Together with some awakening of spirit, and with a respect for experience and meaning that comes from both heaven and earth, our society may ensure the diversity of its education, the plurality of its culture and the Christian part of its heritage".

A secular prophet has spoken. If he foresees our hope in "some awakening of spirit ... that comes from both heaven and earth," why can't we?

CULTURAL DIVERSITY?

By Linda Chavez

A Letter from Linda Chavez, former director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights under President Reagan and later joined the senior staff of the White House, to the editor of "The Chronicle of Higher Education," 7/18/90.

"Cultural Diversity" has become the shibboleth of the 90's on college campuses. Few critics are willing to challenge the values of diversity and pluralism lest they be branded reactionary, or worse, racist. The promoters of cultural diversity tell us that theirs is an ideology of inclusion. But the policies of cultural diversity as they are practiced on campus today have very little to do with inclusion or diversity.

My own experience with the promoters of this new ideology suggests that their real aim is to keep out certain ideas and certain people, to foreclose debate, to substitute their own catechism for the free inquiry usually associated with a university.

In May of this year, I was scheduled to be the commencement speaker at the University of Northern Colorado. The topic of my address to graduating seniors was to have been the movement toward democracy occurring in Eastern Europe and elsewhere and what special challenges this posed to those of us living in the United States, the world's oldest Democracy. However, when word spread of my invitation to speak, a group of Hispanic students and community activists launched a protest.

They objected to my views on affirmative action and bilingual education - I am critical of both. They also objected to my past association with the Reagan Administration (I was director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights under President Reagan and later joined the senior staff of the White House). And they objected to my past affiliation with U.S. English, a public policy group that promotes laws to make English the official language of the United States.

At first, the university president, Robert Dickeson, held firm, stating the university's commitment to honor its invitation. I offered to come to campus a day early and meet with the protesters - under any conditions they might choose - to discuss my views on affirmative action, bilingual education, or any other topic, even though these subjects had nothing to do with the speech I intended to give. Mr. Dickeson declined my offer but reiterated his commitment to have me speak.

Less than 10 days later, Mr. Dickeson rescinded the university's invitation. He apparently changed his mind after a marathon listening session in the student lounge, where he heard from 95 of the university's 9500 students. In revoking the invitation, he issued an extraordinary statement, which said in part:

"The intent of the university in inviting Linda Chavez to be the commencement speaker was to be sensitive to cultural diversity, and the committee making the decision intended to communicate the importance of cultural pluralism. It is clear that the decision was both uniformed and gave the appearance of being grossly insensitive."

In trying to explain how my selection as a commencement speaker was inconsistent with the university's commitment to cultural diversity and pluralism, Mr. Dickeson later wrote in an opinion piece for The Rocky Mountain News: "[T]he people who had selected Chavez honestly thought they were picking a positive role model for Hispanic women leaders, and that she would be received as such. They were obviously wrong."

Cultural pluralists claim to want diversity, but the diversity they seek is certainly not in opinions different from their own. In the ideology of cultural pluralism, one's world view is determined by race, ethnicity, gender, and class. To be black or Hispanic or female or working class is to think a certain way. In the cultural pluralists' model, no one is really capable of escaping his or her cultural determinants.

In this view, getting beyond one's own cultural reference point requires exposure to people who exemplify the thinking of other groups. Since blacks, Hispanics, and women differ so profoundly from white men, the ideology assumes, the products of black, Hispanic, and female thought must be added to the curriculum; universities must comprise sufficient numbers of such persons as students and faculty members; and such people must be presented as "role models" on ceremonial occasions.

The problem with the cultural pluralists' model, of course, is that not all blacks, Hispanics, or women think alike. Neither do white males, for that matter. How could they? None of these groups is homogeneous. Among Hispanics, for example, are people who were born in the United States and speak barely a word of Spanish, as well as others born thousands of miles away who speak not a word of English. What does a Peruvian immigrant from Cusco have in common with a third-generation Mexican-American born in Chicago? Do we really expect these two to share a common world view because we define both as Hispanic?

Much as the cultural pluralists might regret it, right-mindedness is not passed along in the DNA. Not every black person embraces affirmative action, nor every Hispanic bilingual education. So the cultural pluralists think they must define which blacks, Hispanics, and women are acceptable role models - who among them may be heard, and under what circumstances. Thus the decision to bar me as a commencement speaker.

The trend is not only to limit which outsiders such as myself may speak in the university but, more important, to limit what those within academy may say and do. Several universities recently have adopted policies restricting what they see as racially or sexually offensive speech - Emory University, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of Michigan, the University of Wisconsin, and Stanford University, to name a few.

At Stanford, a student apologist for the new "anti-harassment" restrictions on that campus said: "What we are proposing is not completely in line with the First Amendment. But I'm not sure it should be. We at Stanford are trying to set a different standard from what society at large is trying to accomplish." Roger Kimball, in describing such restriction in his book Tenured Radicals (Harper and Row, 1990), asks: "But what does it mean that the university, traditionally a bastion of free speech and a place where controversial ideas may freely circulate, has begun to encroach even on these ideas in the name of a certain vision of political rectitude?"

Cultural pluralists may favor an environment where professors feel constrained from introducing "any sort of thing that might hurt a group," as one of them admonished his colleagues at a Harvard seminar on racial insensitivity last year. But what kind of teaching can take place in such an environment? At a speech I gave recently at Grinnell College, a young black woman informed me that she was tired of reading about slavery in American history courses because it gave her white classmates the "wrong impression" about blacks and their contribution to this nation.

In the name of cultural diversity, should we revise our history books to remove painful lessons? And how will these new culturally sensitive institutions deal with the growing numbers of blacks, Hispanics, and women who break ranks with the orthodoxies of their groups? Recently, Shelby Steele, associate professor of English at San Jose State University, wrote in the New York Times Magazine of his disillusionment with preferential employment and admission policies, which he feels stigmatize blacks.

Other black intellectuals have criticized at least some forms of racial preference; among them are Thomas Sowell, Glenn Loury, Walter Williams, Julius Lester, Randall Kennedy, and Stephen Carter. Will these men be driven from the academy for their heretical views? Or ostracized within it? The cultural pluralists have embarked on a dangerous course. Inevitably, however, the tide will begin to turn as more and more people resist their bullying tactics. In the meantime, those claiming to want diversity and pluralism will have done great damage to the liberal traditions of the university. Let's hope that academic freedom can survive the assault.

The following article was submitted by Jeff Dwiggins, editor of the Spectator, a publication at the University of Tennessee at Knoxville. The Spectator is representative of a "new breed" of newspapers that are springing up on college campuses all over America. What is said in this piece could also be applied to The Forerunner and this new group of campus newspapers.

What kind of a newspaper is this anyway?

We are the new campus newspaper, founded to offer an alternative, conservative viewpoint and to reverse the erosion of traditional values in our society and on this campus. However, we must also make clear that we are more than just a conservative, traditional values defending newspaper.

Words like "conservatism" and "traditional values" can often have very different meanings. For example, conservative values in this nation are linked to opposition to communism. But, ironically, those in the Soviet Union today who are in favor of maintaining the communist system in that country are also referred to as "conservatives" by the American media. Another example is that abortion, infanticide, and euthanasia are traditional values as far as paganism is concerned.

George Grant points out in his book Third Time Around: A History of the Pro-life Movement, practically everywhere Christians have begun to introduce the Christian religion and help the sick, lame, and socially outcast they have had to struggle to uproot these particular traditional pagan values. In this respect, Christians are the progressives. Every person, no matter what his or her political persuasion, is a conservative in respect to some values that he or she wants to conserve and a progressive in respect to other values.

Let me be clear then, whether you want to see us as conservative or progressive, this is a Christian newspaper. The purpose of the paper is to promote Jesus Christ and the Word of God (the Bible). We believe that this includes defending such issues and values such as pro-life, free enterprise, sexual abstinence outside of marriage, Biblical ("literal") creation, decentralized government, homosexuality as sin, the Bible as inerrant and the Word of God, salvation by grace through faith in Christ alone, and the eternal damnation of sinners.

The Bible says that all things were created by Christ and for His glory (Col. 1:16), and it commands us that we are to be "destroying speculations and every lofty thing raised up against the knowledge of God, and we are taking captive every thought to the obedience of Christ" (2 Cor. 10:5). Therefore this paper will demonstrate the Lordship of Jesus Christ over every discipline taught at this university. Jesus Christ is the LOGOS (John 1:1) that is behind every "- ology" from archeology to zoology. In fact, this is why the university, a Christian invention, is not called a multiversity, despite the fact that many different disciplines are taught here: when the university came into being, all areas of thought and life were believed to have their unifying factor in Jesus Christ, the Creator of all things.

The attachment of the name conservatism to what are basically Christian values is not without reason. A major thesis that this newspaper will be defending is that what makes Western Civilization and the United States unique is that both are historically rooted in a Christian worldview. Most of what is valued in society today (and all of what should be valued) finds its foundations in Christianity. This includes the university system, science, free market economics, universal literacy, hospitals, the sanctity of human life, and decentralized (or republican) government.

The association of the name "right-wing" to what are Christian values is not without cause. The terms "right wing" and "left-wing" as way to describe two ends of the political spectrum originated among Enlightenment thinkers at the time of the French Revolution. They took the term from the Bible, the Gospel of Matthew chapter 25, in which Jesus, at His Second Coming, separates the saved ("sheep") from the unsaved ("goats"), putting the saved to His right side and the unsaved to His left, and then grants the sheep the kingdom of heaven and casts the goats into the eternal fire. The Enlightenment revolutionaries pridefully associated themselves with the goats on the left. I think that their assessment was correct.

In another respect, the idea of progressivism is properly attached only to Christianity. Although the idea seems to have been taken over and secularized by the Darwinists, Christianity is the source of the idea. Before Christianity, the world only knew of cyclic time. As Stanley Jaki points out in his groundbreaking book, Science and Creation, the Hindus, Chinese, Incas, Mayans, Greeks, and Egyptians, and everyone else it seems, believed that progress was possible for a while but that eventually the cycle of destruction would take over, and these cycles of construction and destruction have existed from eternity past and will continue for eternity future.

With the advent of Christianity, and especially St. Augustine's The City of God, the world at large was introduced to the concept of linear time: the idea that time had a beginning and is progressing toward a definite end: "the summing up of all things in Christ, things in heaven and things upon earth" (Ephesians 1:10).

So whichever way you choose to look at this paper - as conservative or progressive - just remember this: our one end and aim is to glorify Jesus Christ, for He is worthy, the only hope for healing (salvation) in this hurting, confused world.

TEMPE, AZ (FR) - A proposal to place condom machines in a campus dormitory complex at Arizona State University is becoming a controversial moral issue due to the actions of 15 students who have opposed the measure. Although the availability of condoms is supposed to curtail the problems of unwanted pregnancies and the spread of AIDS, opponents argue that more sexual promiscuity will result.

Sheila Barker, a 21-year-old fine arts student and member of the Maranatha Christian Church in Tempe, said she decided to lead the opposition on moral grounds. She told the Arizona Republic, a daily newspaper, "I believe the condom machines would promote premarital sex and immorality. It's like putting a band-aid on a festering wound."

Despite a petition of 200 signatures opposing the condom vendors, the Resident Hall Association (RHA) approved placement of the machines. But those involved in the opposition movement complained that they did not get a fair hearing. "When we filed our petition, the RHA officials refused to sign it," said Sheila Anderson, a junior business major. "It was definitely a problem of misrepresentation." RHA officials had previously told Barker and Anderson that only 100 signatures were needed to validate the petition.

Anderson says 200 is a substantial amount of signatures for a campus of 25,000 students. "They said 200 signatures wasn't enough and they wouldn't even look at the petition," she added. The proposal must now be reviewed by the university administration for authorization; however, an administration official was reported as saying that chances of approval of the condom machines was very slim. John Fees, student government president, agreed with the assessment.

Two male dorm residents were behind the push for condom vending machines. "The thing we're concerned about is having condoms available," said Scott Andrews, president of the Center Complex Hall Council. "If a student can't go out to a drugstore (to get condoms), he could jeopardize his situation."

No state universities in Arizona have condom machines. Barker said the next step for the group is to lobby the administration, which is currently at a standstill on the issue.

Creationist article stirs response

In response to the article "Does Creation Science Have the Answers?" - Why can't the two theories live together in harmony? It is always said that one of God's days can be any length of time. Thus, after God put the raw materials in space, why could not his law of physics rule, the "Big Bang" providing the light.

As for the evolution and individual days of specific creatures and plants etc., why could it not be that each of the first six days was a major point in the evolutionary trail? The two match up very well, with plant life, then animal life, etc. Then, why cannot present time be the day of rest in which no more significant advances have evolved?

With this level of thought no one is wrong. Why can't these Creation scientists accept that they evolved from a lesser animal? Compared to God, all creatures are nearly equal enough to allow one to think humans are a step above apes on an evolutionary track.

P.S. I filled out a questionnaire to receive a free issue a few months ago. Thanks anyways, but I strongly disagree with most of the articles and find many of them to be mere opinions. The ones that are supported are backed up by more opinion or facts that I find highly questionable as to their reliability. It seems as though, if the study sounds like it supports the opinion, it is used.

David G. Venters
University of Florida

Editor's note: The question "Evolved From a Lesser Animal?" is the focus of an article this month on page 20. We have been careful to include sources from both the creationist and evolutionist point of view. We encourage readers to look these up in the reference room of your local university library. By reading the actual source documents and comparing the "evidence" in favor of evolution to the story told in most science textbooks, we maintain that most people would be surprised just how biased our nation's school curriculum is toward evolution.

Radio listener responds

I heard about your newspaper on "The Christian Forum" - WEZE Boston (Feb. 24, 1991) and I'd like to receive it - I am a Christian Catholic and am presently seeking God's will and vision for my own life - so it was great hearing the broadcast and how the paper began.

"Public Day of Repentance" at University of Virginia

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA. (FR) - Students at the University of Virginia had a "Public Day of Repentance" late September marked by weeping and smashing of rock music albums. The closing event of a week long series of Rock 'n Roll seminars, students testified about Jesus Christ and repented of the sin of the university and the nation.

About 400 students crowded the amphitheatre to hear Pastor Mark Beliles and evangelist Ken Dew, both of Maranatha Campus Ministries, share about the Gospel. Students who wanted to debate current issues, such as the local screening of "The Last Temptation of Christ," or who had questions concerning religion, were encouraged to attend.

Despite some heckling by spectators, fraternity and sorority members and athletes testified of their relationship with Jesus Christ. Charles Wilbur, a senior in Finance and former drug user, said, "Jesus is the ultimate high." He shared that he used to take acid and LSD. "I used to smoke so much marijuana ... but Jesus set me free from all those drugs."

The campus paper, The Cavalier Daily, announced the Public Day of Repentance as a "party" to bring albums "that you don't mind smashing." The Cavalier Christian Fellowship, an outreach of the Maranatha Center, promoted the event with orange posters inviting "all students who wish to show their intention to get right with God ..."

Al Dodd told the University Journal that the main purpose of the event was to encourage repentance among the students on the Charlottesville campus. Dodd, associate pastor of the Maranatha Campus Ministry, added that immorality and drunkenness were their main concerns. Beliles said he wanted to appeal to students who have "rejected organized religion."

Records were purchased from the local Salvation Army store for 10 cents each and distributed to the crowd. Students were cued by Dew to smash the records. He told the University Journal that the main reason for opening the event with the destruction of records was that "a lot of rock and roll is degrading to the human dignity. A lot of rock-'n-roll is diametrically opposed to the Word of God."

Beliles shared about the Christian history of the university and then led students in a prayer of repentance. "People started crying. There was a sense of cleansing, forgiveness and God's mercy," he said. "We felt that it was the beginning of a mighty revival."

Beliles who has researched the history of the University of Virginia for many years, said that the school has an extensive Christian background. Fraternities were started in 1852 as Christian organizations where "brothers and sisters in Christ could establish close supportive relationships and social activities to combat atheism and non-Christian trends." Fraternity members were originally defined as "First of all, believers in their creator. They must be loyal students of their college, so long as their college itself is loyal to their Creator."

In 1858, prayer was increased seven-fold and church membership doubled. Two years later, a student, David Culbreth, said "We were great churchgoers. We went to church Sunday morning and night and some attended Bible classes taught by professors Sunday morning and afternoon. No student of that period can fail to recall the seriousness of the great majority of the student body."

Over half of all students were in Christian student organizations and 25 percent were in a Bible class which led to a school of Divinity two years later. About 72 percent worshipped in churches - which was higher than anywhere in Virginia in 1907.

During 1948 the university suspended classes because so many students wanted to attend the university preacher's series. The first university president, Edwin Alderman, said the university's purpose was to "distill an atmosphere of Christian living and to furnish spiritual power to the flow of life."

The University of Virginia is also America's first non-denominational Christian university. It's official motto, inscribed on one of the main campus halls is, "You shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free."

There's a Different Kind of Army on Today's Campuses!

By Michael Miranda

Education Major, University of South Florida, Tampa

A war is waging on the horizon of America's future ... a spiritual war between the army of God and His opponents. I firmly believe that God has called every Christian, as one of His enlisted servants, into active duty. He has not told us to simply wait around in religious passivity while the ungodly forces in our nation exercise their authority!

This is what motivated me to get involved in the student government at the University of South Florida. I have been a student senator for two years and have had the opportunity to serve on various boards and committees that have a direct impact on student life. By next year, I believe God will open the door for me to run for the office of Student Body President.

God is raising up His army of men and women on today's campuses who will uphold His standards, and exercise them in every area of their lives. We're not a violent army - but an army of God's love! As Jesus said in Matthew 5:16, we are going to let the light of Jesus Christ shine out of our lives "in such a way that men may see our good works, and glorify the Father who is in heaven."

The Christian Roots of the Fraternity System

Is it true that many of American's fraternities and sororities were originally founded on the Bible and Christian principles?

- * According to Baird's Manual of American College Fraternities (1879), fraternity members were to be examples of Christian virtue to their other classmates. Fraternity undergraduates were described in this way: "First of all, believers in their Creator; they may not be agnostics, pagans, or atheists; and they must be loyal students of their college, so long as their college is itself loyal to the Creator."
- * John Robson's The College Fraternity and Its Modern Role (1966) states that the fraternity was originally established as "a foe of atheism." to assure a level of moral and spiritual excellence on university campuses.
- * The Delta Upsilon Quarterly states this in regards to its original founding principles: "Fraternalism is not for the few. It is a way of life that embraces religion, teaches morals, and inspires dedication. With all of these it transpires values which are humanly high and thoroughly on the altar of God ... A fraternity is fidelity in one's heart."
- * Baird's Manual goes further to say the biblical principles which serve as the foundation for the fraternity system "follow the principles, traditions, and ideals on which American was established by her founding fathers under God ... It is an entity of freedom."

Gallup Poll of American students

According to a recent book published by pollster George Gallup Jr., 100 Questions and Answers, the religious beliefs and practices of American students are in a state of resurgent stability.

Results of a new study, in which 539 students at 100 colleges were surveyed, indicate a surprising trend. Although college students are generally viewed as having abandoned the faith of past generations, this poll reveals that worship and Bible study continue to be important to the youth of America. Gallup writes: "Basic religious beliefs, and even religious practice differ relatively little from the levels recorded 50 years ago."

The findings indicate that among college students 80 percent consider religion important in their lives, and 55 percent attended worship services once or more during the month preceding the survey; 72 percent had attended worship services in the past six months. About half said that they read the Bible at least occasionally. Only 2.3 percent called themselves atheists.

In 100 Questions and Answers, Gallup comments on the trends revealed in the recent study: "In 50 years the nation's social order has undergone rapid and profound transformations with little effect on measures of personal faith."

Harvard's Christian Heritage

By Jay Rogers

The "flapjack turning" at Harvard is a metaphor for an emerging philosophy of humanism. In the 1600s, Harvard was dedicated to the glory of God, but by the latter half of the 20th century Harvard had become the citadel of humanism in the modern world. As Ruth Nourse correctly points out, this change did not happen overnight but was a slow transformation imperceptible to all but the most astute observers. This revolution, however, is completely visible in the changing of Harvard's seals throughout the past centuries.

In Christi Gloriam (Glory in Christ) appeared on the college seal of 1650. Later, a coat of arms appeared containing three books and the Latin motto Christo et Ecclesiae (Christ and the Church) inscribed around the border.

On an archway, above a gate leading into the Harvard Yard, curious visitors may view this seal inscribed in stone. This earlier version of the coat of arms, however, contains one difference. If you look closely at the books in the coat of arms, you will see that the top two books are turned facing upward, while the bottom book is overturned. The upward facing books symbolize the truth that is discernible through our five senses; the overturned book symbolizes that which can only be known through the illumination of the Holy Spirit.

By the mid 1800s, the Harvard seal had fallen out of use. When Charles Eliot attained the presidency of Harvard, he wished to reinstate the coat of arms as Harvard's official school seal.¹ This time, however, he made two changes. First, he added the Latin word VERITAS (Truth). Second, he turned all the books facing upwards, denoting the emerging philosophy of humanism.

The idea that all truth is attainable through human efforts is consistent with Ralph Waldo Emerson's teaching on the supremacy of man. As the Concord philosopher once said: "In yourself slumbers the whole of Reason: it is for you to know all."

Leadership, Management and the Five Essentials to Success

By Rick Joyner

Leadership is the most powerful force entrusted to man.

With it an obscure soldier from Corsica took a bankrupt and war devastated France and defeated the most powerful nations on earth, dominating Europe during his time.

With it a humble lawyer from India, without firing a shot, without holding a political office or military position, broke the strength and will of the greatest empire in the world and gave birth to a nation.

With it a pious country gentleman took the hungry and ragtag Army of Northern Virginia during the Civil War and caused the world to stop and marvel as he won victory after victory against impossible odds.

With this gift a humble carpenter from the most despised town in the most humiliated nation on earth took a dozen of the least likely candidates for leadership - and with them unleashed the most powerful moral force this world has ever seen. This improbable band of ordinary men and women impacted the world for their leader to the degree that the very word "history" came to mean "His-story."

Regardless of one's religious beliefs, the accomplishments of Jesus and his little band are some of the most extraordinary examples of leadership ever produced. Two of this Carpenter's followers, Paul and Silas, after suffering numerous stonings, beatings, continuous persecution and without arms or bands of followers, caused the highest officials of the most powerful empire on earth to cringe with fear when they limped into a city exclaiming: "Those who have turned the whole world upside down have now come here to us!"

When finally captured, Paul penned a few letters from his prison cell - hardly a significant literary accomplishment, but no other words have ever been articulated that have impacted the world as those brief letters, now immortalized as canon scripture.

Leadership is an awesome force to be entrusted to men, but because it is, we would do well to understand it. We will either use leadership or be used by it. This issue is fundamental to an understanding of the world and how one fits into it. It affects everyone's life every day regardless of whether or not they like it or understand it. To understand it can release the ability to live beyond the ordinary and mundane in order to make a difference on this earth.

Leadership combines several characteristics to make one both perceptive and effective in accomplishing his goals. "A leader is one who can see the consequences of his actions further than his peers," stated James McKeever, the celebrated economic forecaster. The effective leader will not only have the vision to perceive the future, he will have the wisdom and determination to affect it.

Differences Between Leadership and Management

To properly understand leadership we must first distinguish it from management. Confusing management with leadership has caused many an enterprise to seize defeat from the jaws of victory. This confusion is the cause of much of the failure and recent decline in American economic strength. The very qualities that make one a good leader will often make him a poor manager. The very qualities that make one a good manager can hinder him in becoming an effective leader. That is why having good leadership qualities does not guarantee that one will be a successful leader.

To be a successful leader one must know how to choose good managers who can be effective with delegated responsibilities. Not recognizing this need for dependence upon those with different talents has caused some of the most brilliant leaders to briefly excite their world only to fizzle like a burned-out firecracker, having no foundation for a lasting success.

Managers must be detail-orientated to be successful; leaders must be concept orientated, able to see the big picture. Good leaders usually dislike details; good managers may have a hard time seeing beyond them. Of course there are exceptions to this. There are effective managers with leadership ability, and leaders with good management ability. But the more undistracted devotion we can give to our strongest talents the more effective we will be.

Being too involved with the details makes it hard to see the big picture. It is just as hard to keep a good handle on the details and try to see the big picture at the same time. The most effective leadership comes from a partnership of those who lead and those who manage, a partnership that allows each to concentrate on his own role.

The advancement system in a typical hierarchy, which is the structure of almost every human enterprise, makes it hard for one with good leadership qualities to rise to a position of leadership. The lower echelons of a hierarchy usually reward management skills more than leadership. A leader will rarely be good enough at the managerial skills required for advancement within the system - unless he devotes himself to the quality that will be most needed when he does come to his place of leadership - discipline.

The detail-oriented management skills usually so foreign to his nature must be understood by the leader if he is to effectively work with those whose work will be essential to his success as a leader. The typical hierarchy will be most difficult for even a great leader to advance in, but those who do advance will be those best prepared for their task.

Even if it is tedious and boring, the potential leader should see hierarchy as his cocoon. It is the great struggle required by the butterfly to get out of its cocoon that strengthens it so it can use those great wings. It will likewise be the potential leader's struggle to get to the top of the hierarchy which prepares him for the great responsibility of leadership.

Almost every great enterprise was founded by a leader, not a manager. But almost every enterprise that lives past its founder is then taken over by a manager. There are two basic reasons for this:

- 1) There are so few leaders who can make it through the gauntlet of the hierarchy.
- 2) Most leaders are poor managers and fail to understand the need for a partnership with managers.

Therefore the enterprise will be in desperate need of a manager at the top for a while. When the manager first takes over, profitability and efficiency will usually increase for a period of time, but progress under the manager type will be invariably slow, jeopardizing future success. Advancement requires seeing beyond the present limits of our time, a realm where the true leader abides, but where the manager has difficulty.

A manager looks at what is; a leader is always looking at what can be. It takes both qualities to get the full picture; either one without the other is ultimately doomed to mediocrity or failure. If the managers understood leadership, and the leaders understood management, there would almost certainly be far less decline in enterprise, and both leadership and management would be more effective.

The leader's job is to give the managers direction, vision and inspiration. Regardless of how good the leader is, he will be ineffective without good managers. His degree of success or failure will be determined by the quality of managers he can recruit. Discerning the quality and ability of his people and using them properly is just as important in accomplishing goals as having the vision and other resources required for the enterprise.

General Robert E. Lee was one of the great military leaders of all time. General "Stonewall" Jackson was one of the great military managers of all time. As a team they may have been as close to being invincible as any two generals ever came. It was a simple coalition; Lee would determine what needed to be done, Jackson would determine how to do it.

Either of these celebrated generals without the other would probably have never risen to the heights of accomplishment that they were able to attain as a team. Lee could not have been as great a leader without Jackson to take the burden of management. With Jackson, Lee could concentrate on that at which he was best - seeing the overall picture. Without Lee, Jackson's abilities to implement strategies may have gone unnoticed or under used.

These two made each other great and gave the other the opportunity to realize his full potential. Such teams are rare, but they would probably be more common if we just had the insight to see and give opportunity to the qualities and potential of our co-workers.

Lee was also a very good military manager, and Jackson was certainly an outstanding leader. These abilities are not always mutually exclusive, but most leaders who have achieved success did so with the support of talented managers who enabled them to concentrate on the big picture.

Although exceptions to this are rare, two of the most notable ones in history remarkably lived during the same period, and actually confronted each other in one of the most significant military battles of all time: Napoleon and Wellington who faced each other at The Battle of Waterloo.

The Power of Combining Leadership with Management

Napoleon was a colossus, the type of leader who has only emerged every thousand years or so in human history. He was not only a great military genius, he was also a great political genius. It was this combination that enabled him to dominate the age in which he lived and set the course of history for two centuries. Some of his military innovations would provide a foundation for modern military strategy; some of his political innovations have done the same in the areas of government and law.

Napoleon's genius for military strategy was actually born of his understanding of military management. Likewise, his genius for political leadership was born of his genius for political management. Napoleon is a study of how this rare combination of great leadership and great management in one person can carry on to the very limits of human potential. The few leaders who have been so gifted have dominated almost every historic period.

Napoleon's innovative military strategies were based on the maneuverability of his forces. This maneuverability was based upon his management strategies, which streamlined the method of supplying the troops. This opened strategic possibilities for Napoleon that the opposing forces did not even have the option of considering.

Except for Wellington, it could be argued that Napoleon had no peer in history on the field of battle. But Wellington was not only his peer, he was both a better military leader and manager than Napoleon. Possibly the only man in history who could stop Napoleon on the battlefield was the one who did stop him.

The odds against two men as remarkable as Napoleon and Wellington living during the same period, much less actually confronting one another in battle, would defy computation. The battle itself met or surpassed any expectations of the genius in management and power of leadership that these two would focus upon each other.

Wellington was a British officer who began his military career in India. He gained some notoriety by winning battles and subduing forts with intelligence and innovation. Through a remarkable set of circumstances he was transferred and given command of The Peninsula Campaign in Portugal and Spain.

While the depressed allies expected little out of this campaign, Wellington surprised the world by liberating Portugal and Spain while besting some of Napoleon's top generals and troops. Wellington's victories, combined with Napoleon's debacle in Russia, sent Napoleon into exile. With the armies disbanded Wellington returned to Britain.

Early the next year Napoleon returned to France, quickly gathered his loyal troops and marched on Brussels. Napoleon had nothing but contempt for his adversary; he seemed almost bored with the looming battle and was looking forward to dining in Brussels that evening. Besides scorn for Wellington's ability, Napoleon knew he had significant advantages in troops and guns. He even slept late, almost casually arrayed his troops and did not begin the battle until after eleven o'clock.

"Pride comes before the fall," is certainly a proverb that explains the downfall of many of history's great leaders. Napoleon at Waterloo gives one of history's most resounding punctuations to that truth. Previous successes can be the seed of your ultimate destruction if they produce arrogance.

Wellington's calm in the storm of battle had already become legendary. Wellington acknowledged that his peace in the midst of such conflict was supernatural. At Waterloo supernatural leadership and supernatural management would both be required of him. Yet he felt no elation in the victory. In keeping with his notorious understatements concerning his own accomplishments, he simply claimed to have done what anyone else would have done in his place.

This tendency was never given or perceived as a false modesty; Wellington was a remarkably humble man. If he ever succumbed to overstatement it was in relation to his shortcomings, not his accomplishments. The truly great do not have to blow their own trumpets - others will do it for them.

In contrast, Napoleon was undone by his arrogance. Wellington was confident but never arrogant. There is a difference which every truly great leader has understood. Effective confidence is founded in a humility that enables one to have a right perspectives of his circumstances. Wellington's belief in his appointed destiny gave him the ability to keep peace of mind under the greatest of pressures.

It is possible that no other man in history ever faced such pressure within a single day, with so much at stake, and performed so brilliantly. Even the smallest mistake or slightest hesitance in reacting to any single one of the crises could have meant doom, for his army and possibility the entire continent of Europe.

Crisis: The Test of Leadership

The real test of leadership always comes in crisis, and there will be crisis for everyone in leadership. Almost every businessman will sooner or later have to make decisions that can mean life or death to his business. Often, the more successful the businessman the more frequent such decisions will have to be made. The greater potential for success a decision has the greater potential for failure it will likewise carry - and there will be failures. If we were going to swing for the fences we are going to strike out more.

Every coach will have to call plays that mean victory or defeat. The more successful the coach the more such calls he will have to make, and the higher the stakes. It may not be too difficult to make the proper decision or call the right play when there is little on the line; the difference between the great ones and the rest is the ability to do it in the crisis when there is more at risk.

I once built a successful business in a short period of time. To build it as rapidly as I did I had to make dozens of decisions that could have meant life or death to the enterprise. I seemed to have the ability to make the right decisions, and they paid great dividends. I then made just one bad decision and that single mistake ultimately led to the bankruptcy of the entire business. It was a painful, humiliating failure, but I consider it one of the most valuable experiences I've ever had. I learned more from that one defeat than from all of my victories combined.

The one who stands at the plate with the potential for being the hero can also be the goat. Few remember the home runs I hit in my business; almost everyone remembers the strikeout, but I am back in the game now and I'm much better at it. Just as Wellington turned the biggest reversal of the day into his chance for victory; we must maintain the same resolve. If you will keep your patience and peace of mind in the midst of crisis you will usually see an opportunity to use the situation to your advantage.

The 1980s saw the amazing rise of the megaministries. It was no surprise that such ministers which grew so fast would stay in a perpetual state of crisis, tottering between oblivion and extraordinary advancement. After overcoming a multitude of life and death struggles, some of these ministries began to unravel because of just one mistake by their leaders. These all highlighted the fact that one moment of weakness and poor judgment is able to undo many years of labor built upon and good judgment and effective leadership in crisis.

With success comes power, and power inevitably brings a subtle corruption of our judgment, a seeming invincibility that is often the fatal delusion. One of the most important ingredients in Wellington's character was his ability to have confidence while not thinking more highly of himself than he should.

In his letters penned from prison, the apostle Paul gave a most appropriate warning to those in leadership, "When you think you stand, take heed lest you fall."

Fulfilling the Goals of Leadership

By Rick Joyner

The outstanding leaders of history give witness to the fact that even the highest standards of understanding and discipline will still lead to ultimate failure if they are not built upon a strong character. Effective leaders have accomplished their own goals; great leaders have changed history, and though they may have passed from this earth long ago their leadership still shapes the world. The following are the characteristics of leadership:

Having a Vision

This is the fundamental qualification for leadership. By definition, you are not a leader unless someone is following you. Only a fool will follow those who do not know where they are going.

Not only must a leader have goals but the goals must be specific. The more clearly defined they are the easier it will be for others to follow. Having a goal that is too general may be worse than not having one at all. General goals are seldom attained and lead only to frustration. Those who "want to get rich," or "go into business for themselves one day," seldom do, and if they do, rarely succeed.

Your goals should be noble. Not only should you be specific in your direction, but you need to be just as specific about why you are going there. Seeking higher purposes will result in personal inspiration as well as the inspiration of others. Great leaders have the ability to make other leaders followers. The quality of those who follow you will directly reflect the quality of your accomplishment. To make other leaders followers requires a greater depth of character, commitment and vision.

Martin Luther King, Jr. was a great leader. He shared his dream with such conviction that it became the dream of millions of others. During his meetings with other civil rights leaders he would sit patiently and intently listening to everything which was said. He was genuinely concerned with what others believed and considered it important. This in turn made them more inclined to listen to him.

Because he was always so intently listening he would invariably be asked to share his thoughts. His words would then come with such profound understanding, clarity of purpose and confidence in the direction he was going, there was little left to be said when he finished. Great leaders are usually more inclined to listen than to speak. Therefore, when they do speak it is with greater substance.

Great leaders have seldom taken the mantle of leadership for its own sake. True leadership is born out of vision and purpose that is established firmly on the bedrock of conviction and discipline. Leadership is a means and not the end in itself.

The Ability to Form a Plan

This is the characteristic which separates the achievers from the dreamers. An ancient proverb declares, "He who fails to plan, plans to fail." Even if we have the most noble and appropriate goals, our chances of accomplishing them are remote without proper planning. Planning is both an art and a discipline. Even the greatest artist has to develop his skills; so must the leader develop his ability to assimilate and organize facts concerning the realities being dealt with. Then the facts have to produce insights that will lead to advantage and success.

The best place to start making a plan is to state the goals or objectives. Then state the first step and succeeding ones to the conclusion. Important steps to include in the plan may be priorities, actions required, timing, personnel, other required resources, ways to measure progress toward the goal, etc.

After you have finished your plan you may want to play the deadly enemy game. If you were the enemy of your plan what would you do to stop it? This will help you to see potential weaknesses or serious problems which are not apparent.

The Will to Implement the Plan

"Knowledge is power" according to the proverb. This is true when it is possessed by a wise and decisive leader. Wisdom is the Ability to apply knowledge correctly. Courage is the Will to apply it. Without wisdom and courage, increased knowledge will only inflict us with "the paralysis of analysis."

Planning and preparation must lead to action. It is quite unlikely that one will ever feel, or be, totally prepared and confident when the action begins. If we wait for complete confidence we will never accomplish anything. Often circumstances come upon us suddenly which require action when we feel totally unprepared. It always seems in these situations that once we begin to take action when we feel totally unprepared.

It always seems in these situations that once we begin to take action to the best of our ability, confidence and wisdom then come. A leader must be action orientated and not just a whiz at theory and planning. The ability to plan is essential for true success, but it must be united with action.

A leader, like the captain of a ship, needs to know where he is going and how to get there before he leaves port. We must also be able to plan while on the journey after the storms, mechanical failures and other surprises require a modification of the plan. It is important to be able to stay on course, but it is just as important to be able to get back on the course, or plot a new one, once a forced change has come.

Keeping Priorities in Order

Many have their leadership abilities sapped by majoring on minors. A popular saying in business today is "count the pennies and the dollars will take care of themselves." This is probably true because if we are the C.E.O. and we are taking our time to count the pennies, we won't have any dollars to worry about! Get someone else to count the pennies! The leader must major on the majors.

If we do not take control of our own time, that which represents 10% of our enterprise will demand 90% of our attention. In many cases this is the cause of burnout. If we are in leadership we must learn to delegate the details and give our attention to leading and planning. This is hard for leaders because by nature they are doers and are inclined to become involved - but it must be done if we are to fulfill our potential.

Learning to prioritize your duties can actually multiply your productivity. A simple classification system can be helpful. Keep a current list of your Things To Do. If under your classification system "1" is your highest priority, do not work on the "2's" until the "1's" are finished, and so forth down the line. A few more pennies may fall through the cracks, but you'll be amazed at how many more dollars come in!

Steadfastness

This is the ability to stay on course until the goal is accomplished. To achieve this, the goal will have to have more power in your life than the multitude of external pressures which will try to knock you off course. The ability to do this will depend a great deal upon how well you have prepared for the journey to accomplishment, with its conflicts and its storms.

As an aircraft pilot, several times I have been caught in storms so rough I could not read my charts. I would have been in serious trouble had I not taken the time to prepare for the flight. During those storms I was thankful I had not taken any shortcuts in my training, and that I was conscientious enough to study my flight path before I took off.

In most of these incidents my pulse hardly even quickened because I was prepared and knew what to do. A lack of preparedness can result in panic which is potentially deadlier than the emergency. Every enterprise will have emergencies. Our preparation during these times of relative calm will have much to do with our performance during the crisis.

Peace of mind is one of the most valuable assets of a leader. Worry clouds our judgment and saps more energy than much physical exertion; stress is the worst enemy of clear thinking and planning. Besides preparation for the course, there are other factors which will help us keep our peace of mind.

One cannot have peace of mind without having a sound mind. The primary basis for having a sound mind is understanding the reason for our life. It has for a time been fashionable among the "intelligentsia" to believe that there was no Creator. However, this mentality is rapidly changing.

Obviously there is a great deal of dispute over Who the Creator is, as well as what His intentions are with men, but that too was obviously a part of His plan. This is not an excuse for the honest man, but a reason for increased resolve in his seeking. It seems that our Creator intended to only be found by those who esteemed and loved truth more than mere human approval. The greatest peace one can know in this life is to know the One who gave this life.

The Ability to Motivate People

Accomplishment will inevitably require sacrifice and commitment from those you lead, and people must have a reason to make sacrifices and commit themselves. The ability to motivate people lies in the understanding of what motivates them, and of what detracts from their motivation.

There are two basic kinds of motivation: positive and negative. Both work, and work well, depending on the circumstances and the people. There are basically two kinds of leaders: those who sacrifice the people for themselves, and those who sacrifice themselves for the people.

Napoleon captured the devotion of his troops by identifying with the common man. Calling himself "the little corporal" he considered the time he spent meeting personally with his troops an important part of his battle plans. Few have continued to be effective leaders after they lost touch with the men in the trenches, on the assembly line, or in the pew. Any leader that loses touch with or ceases to care for his people, can probably be replaced by a good computer.

There are many forces at work which discourage the pursuit of leadership. Anyone who takes initiative become the target of a destructive criticism from lesser souls; such as criticism designed to pull everyone else down to their level. Much of the media has become the embodiment of the "crab spirit" in humanity. Crabs can be kept in containers from which they could easily escape, but if one starts to rise above his fellows to get out they will pull him back down.

With just a little cooperation they could all escape but the nature of crabs keeps them all in bondage. In the name of journalism or information the media has been used to release some of the worst characteristics in men. The result has been a vacuum of leadership that has historically provided an opportunity for a most undesirable type of leader to step into the void.

Integrity

Integrity is more than just being honest, it is doing what is right. It is the freedom from corrupting influence or practice. It is practising what you preach. It is doing what your conscience tells you to do even if it leaves you as a committee of one. It is the courage to stand for your convictions. It is always reaching for higher moral standards than may be customary in "the group." The true leader is always reaching for higher standards. It is also the courage and honesty to admit mistakes and failures, and to accept the blame for them.

Even the greatest leaders make mistakes. The better the leader you are, the more costly and visible your mistakes will be. Recovering from the mistakes is an important test of true leadership ability. Complete recovery will not take place without accepting such mistakes and taking responsibility for them. The greatest leaders learn to turn their failures into opportunities for achievement and victory. In many cases, failures will turn into the best opportunities for victory.

A great leader must possess the confidence and security to accept the truth about himself and the consequences of his actions. The greatest leaders are those who can best deal with failure - because all will fail at one time or another. Those who boast that they have never failed have never really played the game. But failure truly can be a great opportunity for future success, if we learn the lessons it teaches instead of just making excuses. As the saying goes: "He who is good at making excuses is seldom good at anything else." The greatest victories are those which will overcome previous defeats.

Those who follow you or work for you deserve to know the facts. People usually see far more than the average leader gives them credit for. When we are not straightforward about problems and mistakes it will ultimately result in a deterioration of morale and commitment as they will think that we are either not honest, or unable to see reality. Motivation and loyalty that has depth and staying power is founded upon truth, not hype.

Courage

Courage is the quality of mind and heart that makes one resist the temptation to stop or retreat in the face of opposition, danger, or hardship. This implies the summoning of all of one's powers to reach the goal. Courage is the firmness of spirit and moral backbone which, while appreciating and properly measuring the risks involved, makes one press on until success is accomplished.

Courage is essential to leadership but it must be tempered with vision and strategy, always keeping our ultimate goal in the forefront so that we are not defeated by our secondary successes. George Washington is a study in how to balance courage with the keeping of our vision on the ultimate goal. Many times ambitious men rose up to seek his position as Commander-in Chief of the Continental Army.

Often he was tempted to defend himself and attack the integrity of those lesser men. He resisted that temptation knowing that such pettiness could undo the unity of the thirteen states, which would result in their defeat by the British. It took more courage for Washington to stay above the political infighting than it did to get into it.

Loyalty

Loyalty is faithfulness to principles, to the plan and to the people. A social chameleon who changes to conform to each new environment or group is void of the basic characteristics that makes a true leader. True leaders are not so easily changed but instead have the strength of character to change their environments, or the mindset of the crowd.

If we are to expect others to be loyal to us then we must set the example. Loyalty will not stoop to gossip or to belittle others in leadership, or those who may be subordinate. The true leader does not rise by making others look smaller. Great leaders set their standards by the highest standards, not by what others may or may not be doing.

Initiative

Obviously a leader has to be one who seeks and accepts responsibility. Half the victory is often found in just starting the battle. The ones who take initiative will usually be able to keep it, giving them a substantial advantage. It has been said that there are basically three kinds of people in the world: those who watch what is happening, those who talk about making things happen and those who do it.

The sad thing is that most of those in the first two categories have done everything required to be a "doer" except one thing - initiative. Many of the greatest athletes never play in a real game because they never took the first step of trying out for the team. If those who spend their lives dreaming about being great musicians would spend as much time practising as they do dreaming others would be dreaming about being them!

Few of those who are always talking about doing great things ever do anything at all, much less anything great. Every journey begins with just one step; if you do not know how to take it you are not going to go anywhere.

Endurance

This is the ability to stay with the task all the way to the completion. This is a serious problem with those who have strong leadership ability because leaders find it much more stimulating to start a task than to finish it. As a result they often have numerous unfinished projects lying dormant while they pick up the pursuit of the next interesting venture.

The ability to finish the job is every bit as important as being able to get all of the resources and energy going to start it. This takes discipline. The failure to complete jobs is usually a telltale sign that we are running on emotional energy rather than true, focused vision.

This is the reason why some of the world's best salesmen remain poor; they can get an eskimo excited about buying snow but somehow never get his signature on the bottom line. These salesmen get a sense of accomplishment out of persuading their prospects to believe them - not in getting their business. We have not succeeded until the job is completed!

Is A New Wave of Faith Rolling In?

Tom Wolfe, Megatrends authors John Naisbitt and Patricia Aburdene, and Harvard Professor Peter Gomes are just a few of the experts predicting a trend toward faith and religion on the university campuses of America. This new tack, which students have been taking, shows no signs of letting up. Indeed, the degree of religious fervor shown by young people in the 1990s may make the light of the "Jesus Movement" of the early 1970s look dim, say social commentators.

At a speaking engagement at the University of Florida on March 27th, New-Journalist-turned-social-commentator, Tom Wolfe said he was "taking notes" and indicated that a university campus might be the setting of a future novel. "Somebody should write a book about the University of Florida," said the author of Bonfire of the Vanities and The Right Stuff.

Religious movements in the United States and university life are two subjects that Wolfe would like to tackle in a future novel. "We're certainly going to see, for the next ten years anyway, a lot of racial politics in a way and to an extent we haven't seen before," Wolfe added on a side note.

John Naisbitt and Patricia Aburdene, authors of the best selling Megatrends 2000, have included a chapter in their book entitled "Religious Revival of the Third Millennium," which describes the "unmistakable signs of a worldwide multi-denom-inational religious revival." Naisbitt and Aburdene claim that the revival will intensify as we approach the year 2000.

A post-modern global phenomenon is now taking place, say the acclaimed authors. "Chinese and Soviet young people are fascinated by Christianity and enjoy attending church to the dismay of their Communist-schooled elders." The university campuses are being included in this movement. If not the focal point, United States' campuses will be caught up in a worldwide intensification of the Christian faith.

Theologian Harvey Cox, who has taught as many as 1000 students in his course, "Jesus and the Moral Life" (one of the biggest classes at Harvard University), describes a growing trend which he says was "unforeseen by forecasters 25 years ago, who predicted that religion would wither away because of modernity."

According to a recent issue of The Harvard Independent, "The prominence of religion in Harvard's classrooms and lecture halls has grown over the past two decades ... Just 20 years ago, however there was no religion concentration at Harvard ... Now students flock to courses such as 'Jesus' and 'The Bible.'"

Peter Gomes, professor of Christian morals, says, "The reason that those courses are so popular is that students are literally hungering and thirsting for righteousness. They are prepared to ask naïve questions, such as, 'What is good?' (and) 'What is evil?' The closest things you'll get to answers are in those courses."

On the West Coast, pastor Chuck Smith founder of Calvary Chapel, the focal point of the early 1970s "Jesus Movement," claims that there is an even greater hunger among young people than at any point during the early 1970s. According to Smith, this spiritual awakening is "not over yet!"

Where is all of this newfound faith leading us? It is probable that we are on the upward side of a trend that will result in the "Third Great Awakening." In the 1700s, America, Germany and England experienced an awakening of the Christian faith that transformed society. In the 1800s, the Second Great Awakening swept through America and Europe bringing an end to slavery and a renewed definition of human rights.

Now, as we approach the end of the 20th century, a new awakening is just emerging. This revival will bring the eradication of communism and dictatorship as a form of government throughout the world. Christianity will replace Islam and Eastern religions as the world's predominant faith. We will begin to see the "Great Commission" which Jesus Christ spoke of fulfilled, in which all the nations of the world will be transformed by the gospel message .

Political Correctness and the Coming Culture War

By Andrew Sandlin

Almost everybody has heard about political correctness. It is the policy on numerous American campuses to stifle discussion deemed to threaten the sensitivity of "under-represented" groups: homosexuals, blacks, women, the handicapped, etc. The supposed liberal tenet of free speech must now yield if under its protection comments are made that might offend the easily offended "minorities."

If, as Dinesh D'Souza asserts, the university in a democracy is a microcosm of the society surrounding it (a fairly tenable, common-sense assumption), we may be fairly certain that the current controversy raging over "political correct-ness" in the university is one of the early signs and harbingers of a monumental ideological and religious conflict potentially disrupting the present social order. Initially considered, this claim may seem exaggerated, but further thought should demonstrate its factuality.

The "PC" fracas has demonstrated that the rationalism which stands behind Western liberalism in the tradition of Enlightenment cannot survive indefinitely. The great irony is that while Western liberalism has always been the avowed enemy of conservatism, the former is discovering that its basic tenets of "free inquiry" and "objective appraisal" are not hardy enough to withstand the onslaught of vigorous leftist and radical views impatient with the inability of Western liberalism to make good on the cherished goals of liberal ideology: absolute autonomy and equality.

The forces of rationalism and the advocates of "PC" only appear to be arrayed against each other. They are both actually arrayed against biblical Christianity. Western liberalism embraces the primacy of reason; advocates of "political correctness" embrace the primacy of "equality." Neither embraces the primacy of the God who revealed himself in Holy Scripture.

The disciples of "political correctness" argue against Western liberals that the professed neutrality of modern university liberalism is just a covert scheme to obscure presuppositions designed to maintain the status quo. Where they are wrong is in pinpointing that status quo. They say it is chauvinism, sexism, racism and Westernism. On that, I believe they are egregiously wrong.

The hidden presupposition the classical liberals are endeavoring to protect is the same that the salesmen of "political correctness" are trying to protect: the autonomy of man.

The Myth of Neutrality

Under the guise of free inquiry and objectivity, classical liberals idolatrously enthrone the human mind, just as "PCers" do under the guise of egalitarianism. The controversy demonstrates the futility of the pipe dream of Enlightenment liberalism: that where reason is employed, truth prevails. It does not account for the fact that (a) reason is never objective and that (b) reason can never answer the ultimate questions of life since it has no absolute standard by which to judge. Reason, for example, is no bulwark against tyranny, for according to some presuppositions, tyranny can be perfectly reasonable. Rationalism serves the purpose of depraved mankind in its rebellion against the Creator God.

The disciples of "political correctness" know that the supposed neutrality and objectivity of Western intellectuals is a farce, but they do not recognize that their own politically correct views are equally farcical. "PC" is breaking the back of the old utopian liberal intellectual faith in reason. Devotees of "political correctness" will not concede for one minute that neutral, objective reason should reign in the university because they recognize that the position of "objective" liberalism springs from subjective presuppositions. Of course, disciples of "political correctness" are mistaken in their insistence that radical feminism, Afro-centrism, and homosexuality should be exempted from criticism. All who embrace the truth as revealed by God in His Word will fervently oppose each of these deviations - as well as the others supported by the "politically correct."

The point is that the controversy surrounding "political correctness" should force "neutral" liberal educators to concede that some ideology will govern the university (and every other sphere of society, for that matter). If men do not worship God, they will worship themselves and other created things (Rom. 1) and eventually Satan (Rev. 13). The "PC" controversy is a perfect example. The children of the intellectual liberals rebelling against their "reasonable" heritage (worship of the mind of man) now defy God by demanding that professors avoid any criticism, implied or expressed, of homosexuality (an abomination in God's eyes according to Romans 1).

Because the course of idolatry is degradation (Rom. 1), if universities permit "political correctness" to dominate, they will become not only increasingly depraved but also increasingly mediocre and incompetent. When "PC" educators employ race rather than merit as a chief standard of enrollment policy, the result will be less knowledgeable and less equipped individuals to perform important functions as citizens of our society. When administrators block intelligent Asians in favor of incompetent blacks and whites, they are sealing the mediocrity of a country.

When they refuse to require courses in Western literature because it is dominated by white males, and require instead courses in Asian and African literature (most of which is abysmally inferior to that of Western culture) they slit their own throat - or, I should say, the throat of their students who must one day assist in sustaining a society whose glorious benefits derive directly from the ideas of white males, the validity of whose ideas has nothing to do with race.

If the old liberalism were to win this debate and reassert itself in American universities, the results would be only slightly more favorable; however, the classic liberal utopia of a "neutral creed" is doomed because its "neutrality" cannot forever withstand the onslaught of commitments like those of the "politically correct." In the long run, pretended neutrality is no match for fervent ideology. The Weimer

Republic's pitiful collapse before the militant, though misguided and tyrannical force of National Socialism, is a striking example.

A Strategy for the Culture War

Epistemologically conscious Christians on campus should seize the initiative by demonstrating the bankruptcy of the old Enlightenment classical liberalism and the perversion of the "politically correct" corp. They must, further, press the claims of the authority of Christ in all spheres of life, including the life of the university. Nor will the commitment to historic Christianity jeopardize the free flow of ideas as the classical liberals charge and as the ideal of "political correctness" obviously does.

Rather, if the university is not to become a "multiversity," it must embrace the epistemology of the Christian faith which, if properly practiced and understood, guarantees the free flow of ideas, precisely because as the only viable foundation of intellectual life, it can afford to confront the challenges posed by secularism, Marxism, materialism and all other ideological perversions. As long as the validity of the Christian faith is presupposed, all alternatives will be found wanting.

The battle on campus is merely the most visible dimension of the larger conflict in Western culture. The (rapidly diminishing) classical liberals wrongfully claiming neutrality, as well as the overt covenant-breakers of "political correctness" rightfully denying neutrality, are arrayed against the (rapidly diminishing) Christian pietists wrongfully claiming neutrality, as well as the overt covenant-keepers rightfully denying neutrality. The classical liberals, one will note, are analogous to the Christian pietists - both erroneously believe they can remain neutral in this conflict. The classical liberals are really on the side of the overt covenant-breakers, for Scripture claims all the unconverted suppress the truth (Rom. 1:18).

The Christian pietists are really on the side of the overt covenant-keepers, but they just have not become consistent with their presuppositions yet. The overt covenant-keepers and the overt covenant-breakers are actively locked into a life-and death struggle to the finish (literally so, at the doors of abortions clinics). These are two fundamentally irreconcilable, mutually exclusive presuppositions. They cannot simultaneously succeed, nor can they long simultaneously co-exist.

God created this conflict (Gen. 3:15): the seed of the serpent (Satan and his disciples) war against the seed of the woman (Christ and His disciples). God instituted this hostility. Christians must not retreat from or smooth over the differences. This conflict (Mt. 16:18), will be escalated not impeded. On campus, at the shop or office, at the polling booth, in every venture this conflict between God and Satan will escalate.

China, North Korea, Cuba, Cambridge

CAMBRIDGE, MA - The bourgeois press is at it again, continuing systematically to oppress workers all around the world. Their latest crime, supporting Russian President Boris Yeltsin, was the subject of a recent lecture sponsored by the Harvard/Radcliffe Friends of the Sparticus Youth Club. Len Meyers, member of the Worker's Vanguard editorial board, exhorted his followers for 90 minutes to "defeat the Yeltsin-Bush counter-revolution" in the USSR.

Of course, the idea that Bush and Yeltsin have secretly been collaborating to bring "capitalist oppression" to the Soviet Union is rather implausible on its face, given the Bush Administration's unswerving loyalty to Gorbachev and its treatment of Yeltsin as a boorish inconvenience. Nonetheless, Meyers stressed the urgency of upholding Leninist principles against the Yeltsin-Bush onslaught.

Lenin's Russia was "the freest society on the face of the earth," he noted. Ignoring the inconvenient fact that within three years this "free society" bred a secret police force 16 times as large as the czars, Meyers focused on Lenin's democratically-elected workers councils. These representatives were superior to those in the West, he insisted, because elected officials could be recalled immediately if the workers were dissatisfied. Not surprisingly, Meyers failed to add that within a matter of months, the right to recall officials was severely curtailed after disgruntled workers began to remove Bolsheviks.

But the two dozen starry-eyed revolutionaries in attendance swallowed Meyer's lecture whole. They gave generously when a collection plate was passed around to support International Communist League activity in the USSR. The People's Republic of Cambridge never ceases to amaze.

I was never the religious type. In fact, I had a real party hardy attitude most of my life. I went to church with my parents - but I never heard anything about living the true Christian life. In high school I did what most students do: I got drunk on weekends and hung out with my friends. I went to church only because my parents forced me and because cute girls were there. During most of my high school days I wasn't too bad because I wanted to get into a good college - which would help me in my overall goal of becoming a millionaire. However, by the time I was a senior I started experimenting with marijuana.

I started college in August of 1985 with the attitude that these were the years of experimentation. I immediately became involved in the drug culture at the University of Florida. I usually tried any drug that came my way. I would smoke pot when I awoke in the morning, and I stayed stoned all day. Needless to say, I missed about 50 percent of my classes. This lifestyle went on for about two years when I finally realized that my grades were not conducive to my lifelong goal. I still smoked pot everyday, but in "moderation" while studying and going to most of my classes.

I began to read self-help books the summer after my sophomore year, in accordance with my goal of becoming a millionaire. Meanwhile, an old roommate, Eric, moved back in with me. Eric had become a born-again Christian, which meant "a nut for Jesus" to me. I was very skeptical about this conversion, but intrigued by the fact that he had quit partying. He had such a peace and joy all the time and it made me curious.

I began to put Eric to the test. I questioned him on the relevancy of the Bible, Jesus Christ, and his relationship with God, as well as stupid questions like, "Did Adam have a navel?" What I found was that my friend was sincere and caring, always using the Bible to back up his statements, and never pretending to know something he didn't.

Now to me the Bible was an old historical document of the Jews and early Christians. What I didn't understand was why Eric was living as if it was relevant. As I continually questioned him, he would give me passages of scripture to read and always tell me, "Rob, all you have to do is invite Jesus into your heart and you will understand." At this point in my life I was an agnostic, I wasn't denying that there was a God, but I wanted proof. On May 20, 1987, I actually did invite Jesus Christ into my heart. However, I based my commitment on the need for proof.

The proof wasn't too far in coming. I had said this prayer at 1 p.m. Wednesday, May 20, 1987. At 2 p.m. I started my new job as a solicitor for an environmental group. They picked out a neighborhood for me to solicit memberships, and around 4 p.m. that day I came across a woman who was standing in her yard watching her daughter play. As I questioned her about buying a membership, she told me to come back when her husband returned.

After finishing my rounds through the neighborhood, I came back to their home. She invited me into the living room where her husband sat playing a guitar. They asked me to give a sales presentation, and then offered to make a deal with me. He said he would buy a membership if I would come to his church. I said, "Sure, what church is it?" He replied, "Maranatha Christian Church." I freaked out because Eric was a member of the same church!

Then it hit me. Jesus Christ was God and He cared enough to show me that He was real. What else could I do when the Creator of the Universe showed me His reality? I had to fulfill my promise to follow Him the rest of my life. However, I've also realized that God doesn't and didn't have to follow through with my request. It was by grace that He drew me to Himself.

God's Target for Revival - The Schools of the Northeast

By Jay Rogers

The academic institutions of the Northeast, including Harvard, Princeton, Yale, and several others, are "lynchpins" in the American university system. Philosophies which are born and bred in the classrooms of these schools are later transferred to every other university in America - and often the world.

A brief survey of American history will show that the colleges and universities in the northeastern corridor of the United States have always been used of God to unlock the heart of the nation.

The spiritual darkness that presently characterizes the northeastern colleges and universities of our nation reflects the spiritual condition of the rest of our society. This should come as no surprise to those who are aware of America's Christian history. For good or for evil, for the past 370 years, the Northeast has been the spiritual focal point of America.

The politics and ethics of the United States were birthed in the Northeastern cities of Boston and Philadelphia. The spiritual climate of the United States has also been deeply affected by this area. The most significant event of 1700s barring the revolution was the Great Awakening - which began among young people in Northampton, Massachusetts. The World Missions Movement was begun at Williams College in Williamstown, Massachusetts as the result of a prayer meeting held by three students.

In the early 1800s, the Northeast was a center for sporadic spiritual revivals on many of the college campuses. The spiritual, moral, social and political foundations of the United States had their beginnings in the Northeast.

Since the beginning of the 1800s, however, the Northeast has become a breeding ground for anti-Christian ideas. Humanism, in the form of Transcendentalism and Universalism, had its roots in Massachusetts. Social philosophers, such as Emerson and Thoreau, contributed to the destruction of the Christian foundations of America. These ideas found a haven in the colleges of the Northeast. In the 20th century, Marxism, humanism, existentialism, socialism, radical feminism, New Age philosophy and immorality of all types have also found refuge in the many colleges and universities of the Northeast.

Despite this growing tide of wickedness, a gleaming ray of hope appears. God has a destiny for the college campuses!

* Harvard University - Reverend John Harvard gave half his property and his entire library to start this world renowned institution. Harvard's original motto was: "For Christ and the Church." The goal of a Harvard education was to establish Christian principles in the minds of students according to the Word of God. In addition to ministers, Harvard also produced some of the greatest statesmen of the 1700s, such as, John Hancock, John Adams, and Samuel Adams.

* Yale University - Yale was patterned after the design of Harvard. The founders of Yale were authorized to create an institution where "youth may be instructed in the Arts and Sciences who through the blessing of Almighty God may be fit for employment both in the Church and Civil State." Three Yale graduates were: the inventor Eli Whitney, the educator and author Noah Webster, and the patriot Nathan Hale who just before being hanged by the British said, "I regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

* Boston University - "Learning, Virtue, and Piety" is the motto of one of the finest of the many learning institutions in Boston. Today, Boston University is perhaps the most strategic school in the United States since it has more international students than any other University. Many of these internationals are being trained to move into positions of leadership in their native lands. A revival among international students at Boston University would impact the entire world.

* Amherst College - Amherst was founded and was maintained for many years with the aim of educating young men to serve God. The school's Latin motto, "Terras Irradiant," is an allusion to Isaiah 6:3: "The whole earth is full of His glory." In the early years of the school frequent and powerful revivals often resulted in the salvation of many young men. Graduates of Amherst College have included the radical social reformer Henry Ward Beecher (brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe), and Daniel W. Poor, the pioneer missionary to Ceylon.

* Smith College - Founded in Northampton, Massachusetts, Smith College has always been considered to be one of the finest women's colleges in the world. Smith is located in an geographical area that has traditionally been associated with powerful outpourings of the Holy Spirit. The First Great Awakening began in the 1730s in a Northampton Congregational church pastored by Jonathan Edwards. The western part of Massachusetts was also the site of many revivals in the Second Great Awakening.

* Mount Holyoke College - Mary Lyon founded Mount Holyoke seminary for women in South Hadley, Massachusetts. This institution was among the first of its kind and was a product of the social reforms of the Second Great Awakening. Mary Lyon sought to promote to the rights of women and personally trained more than fifty women who later became foreign missionaries.

* Wellesley College - One of the most beautiful of the American colleges founded in the 1800s, Wellesley was patterned after the system of education at Mount Holyoke. Wellesley College's charter declared its foundation to be "distinctly and positively Christian in its influence, discipline and instruction." From its beginning, Wellesley has enrolled many international students.

* Brown University - First chartered as Rhode Island College, Baptist followers of Roger Williams founded the school "to train ministers and educate youth properly in the Christian faith." The rapid increase of Baptists in New England in the 1700s led to the need for a better educated leadership. Rhode Island College was the first of many educational projects begun in the American colonies as a result of the First Great Awakening.

* Dartmouth University - Yale graduate Eleazar Wheelock first founded Dartmouth as Moor's Indian Charity School in Columbia, Connecticut, but it was later moved to Hanover, New Hampshire. In the beginning, it was a reflection of the early settler's zeal to share the Christian faith with the Indians and to educate young Native Americans in the spirit of Jesus and the Bible. The school's motto, "A Voice of One Crying in the Wilderness", describes the prophetic calling which is firmly ingrained in Dartmouth's foundation.

* Columbia University - This college was first founded by a royal charter in the vestry room of the Trinity Church schoolhouse in New York City. First known as King's College, this school was a center of non-denominational learning. The first advertisement of the college disclaims any intention of imposing "on the scholars the peculiar Tenants of any particular Sect of Christians; but to inculcate upon their tender minds, the great Principles of Christianity and Morality, in which true Christians of each Denomination are generally agreed." Some early Columbia graduates include Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and Governor Morris.

* Princeton University - Reverend Jonathan Dickson, Princeton's first president, once said, "Cursed be all learning that is contrary to the cross of Christ." Established during the First Great Awakening, the college was a direct result of spiritual revival and a recommitment of the early colonies to further a degree of excellence in education. Later, under President Jonathan Edwards, the school took on a missionary zeal to minister to the American Indians. Early Princeton graduates included James Madison, Aaron Burr and six members of the first United States Congress.

* Cornell University - A private university and member of the Ivy League, Cornell was originally founded as New York State's land grant college under the Morrill Act. In the early 1800s, the central portion of New York State was referred to as the "burnt-over district" due to the many revivals that occurred in this area. Charles G. Finney based his ministry in New York State during the early years of the Second Great Awakening.

* University of Pennsylvania - Originally founded by Quakers under the Morrill Act, the University of Pennsylvania is primarily a residential campus located in the heart of central Philadelphia. Known as the "City of Brotherly Love," Philadelphia is one of the cradles of liberty and was greatly affected by George Whitefield's ministry during the First Great Awakening in the early 1700s. The University of Pennsylvania stands today as a key to unlocking awakening in our nation. The university has "recognized that the future of the city and its own future are one and the same."

The schools of the Northeast are the hub on which the entire academic system of the nation turns. God himself is concerned with these schools; He had a hand in bringing them into being. He always honors His covenants with men and virtually every college in this area was founded with the purpose of bringing greater glory to God.

See You At The Pole! - Florida

Florida County school board supports student prayer gathering

JACKSONVILLE, Florida - The Duvall County school board of Jacksonville, Florida has officially sanctioned "See You At The Pole" as an student sponsored event.

In a memorandum to all Middle and High School principals, liaison for legal affairs Vicki Reynolds stated that "the event can proceed without violating any Constitutional provisions if certain guidelines: (1) The event must be totally student-initiated and student-led. (2) No school faculty or staff should participate or lead the activities. (3) The event should not disrupt the routine of the school day.

Reynolds further noted that the "persons promoting this event have been most cooperative, and the activities should occur with minimal problems."

Says promoter David Burton, "We are very excited about this and we believe that it is going to help nationally in the event." Burton notes that every major Christian revival that has occurred in the United States has begun with a youth emphasis. It was the "Jesus Revolution" of the 1960s and the Asbury College campus revival of the early 1970s that caused some of the greatest years of evangelism in modern American history.

"With the problem of drugs, sexual activity, and crimes in general, it is time that our students 'sound the alarm' as Joel stated in chapter two 3000 years ago," says Burton.

"The alarm is not to be sounded to wage war, but to come against the war that is already going on among our students. Statistics prove that morals, habits, and actions of students are declining and it is time for Christian young people and Christian school leaders to stand up for the rights which we have to proclaim the gospel and pray for God to send a revival across this nation."

Students participating in this event across America are encouraged to send in their reports and include photos of the event to: See You at the Pole, 1230 Hendricks Avenue, Jacksonville, Florida 32207, or call 1-800-226-8584, ext. 260

Should Christians Drink?

Campus Bible Study
- by Glenn Duneheew

I spend lots of my time doing Bible studies with students at the University of Kentucky in Lexington, and I get all kinds of questions asked about moral issues. But probably one of the most common questions I hear is this: "Can a Christian drink alcohol?"

My first response to this question is always, "Why do people drink, anyway?" The answer is usually 1) "To be social," 2) "Because it makes me feel good," or 3) "Why not?" Let's look at each of these reasons for a minute.

* "To be social." Do I really have to drink alcohol to be social with people? Can't I be just as social with a soft drink in my hand? Does it really make any difference what I have in my hand when I talk with people? Lots of people congregate around alcohol, but personally I would rather congregate around a game or an event. Will my friends reject me if I refuse to drink with them? Or will they think that I am pushing my beliefs on them if I don't drink?

If your friends reject you because you don't drink, then they are really not your friends. A true friend would not insist that you do something harmful, or something that you just don't want to do. And why is your decision not to drink classified as "pushing your beliefs" on someone else? In actuality, they are pushing their beliefs upon you by using peer pressure.

* "Drinking makes me feel good." We have to understand, first of all, that alcohol is a drug. It is a narcotic which depresses the central nervous system and produces the "buzz" that so many people like. At first, this stimulus can make you feel more free in your actions and words. It seems to make your inhibitions leave. This is why people do things after drinking alcohol that they would normally never do. Everything seems to become rosy.

However, when a person comes down off of the effects of alcohol, his problems are still the same, if not worse, because he has not dealt with them.

As a person drinks more, alcohol begins to affect him in greater ways. This is why many people get extremely depressed or become isolated. So much for the goal of being "social." And if the drinking continues, the "good feeling" also leaves. Anybody that has experienced a hangover after a late-night drinking spree knows that there is nothing to feel good about the next morning!

* "Ok then, why not? I like the taste." If taste is an issue, then why not drink non-alcoholic beer or wine? But then this provokes another response from many people that I talk to: "So why even drink at all? If we look in the Bible for an answer, a good place to start is the book of Proverbs. The author of that book says that it is wrong to drink by bringing out the consequences of drinking. Here are three different passages which relate to alcohol:

"Wine is a mocker, strong drink a brawler, and whoever is intoxicated by it is not wise" (Proverbs 20:1).

"He who loves pleasure will become a poor man: he who loves wine and oil will not become rich" (Proverbs 21:17).

"Do not be with heavy drinkers of wine ... for the heavy drinker will come to poverty" (Proverbs 23:20-1).

The author of Proverbs says that if you want to be wise, you should stay away from alcohol. Most students arrive on campus hoping to improve their place in life and to become a success in their future career. Yet these scriptures indicate that if you are fond of alcohol, your chances of becoming wealthy are slim. Sure there are wealthy people who drink, but have you ever wondered how much better off they would be if they did not drink?

Think about all the money that is spent on alcohol each year. In some university towns, more than $250,000 will be spent each weekend by college students on alcoholic beverages. And that number increases, of course, on football weekends when all the alumni arrive to celebrate.

What about the New Testament? What does it have to say about drinking? After all, didn't Jesus turn the water into wine? Here are just a few scriptures which should help us reach a conclusion:

"For he (John the Baptist) will be great in the sight of the Lord, and he will drink no wine or liquor: and he will be filled with the Holy Spirit, while yet in his mother's womb" (Luke 1:15).

"It is good not to eat meat or to drink wine, or to do anything by which your brother stumbles" (Romans 14:21).

"Let us behave properly as in the day, not in carousing and drunkenness, not in sexual promiscuity and sensuality, not in strife and jealousy" (Romans 13:13).

The New Testament has a lot more to say about alcohol than just "don't get drunk." Luke tells us that John the Baptist did not drink because he had a vow not to defile himself. This shows that the Lord views alcohol as a defilement - and infers that the person drinking it cannot be under the power of the Holy Spirit.

These scriptures also tell us that our drinking can cause others to stumble. Suppose, for example, that you are a Christian and someone you know sees you drinking. Let's say you never get drunk because you know when to stop; but the other person does not have the same amount of self-control that you do ... and they end up getting drunk. You have therefore encouraged their drunkenness!

On the subject of alcohol, the Bible tells us to "act like it is day." People tend to drink more at night or in dark places because deep inside they know it is wrong. And there is often a progression from drinking to carousing, which later leads to sexual promiscuity. Habakkuk 2:15 says, "Woe to you who make your neighbors drink, who mix in your venom even to make them drunk, so as to look on their nakedness!" Many young men drink at parties so they can encourage their date to get drunk and loose.

"Just Drinking?"

Where does "just drinking" stop and drunkenness begin? Let's look at a good illustration for this:

In the drawing, we see that God is way up at the top. The devil is like a dog who is tied up in someone's front yard. He has limited power, as seen by the path he has worn on the grass. Some people see how close they can get to sin without stepping into the path of the dog. But suppose the dog is pretty smart. He lunges only part of the way out, and the next time not as far. This lures us into believing that we can get closer and still not get caught. But then he attacks - and we are his target!

People are always telling us what is a sin and what is not a sin. But the question should always be: Is this action bringing me closer to God or further away from Him? What is my motive in wanting to do this? Is it to please myself or to give glory to God? These are the real issues we need to address when talking about alcohol.

Toward "Spiritually Correct" Thinking

In this new decade of the 1990s, there is a group of individuals who are emerging on the university campuses of America. Some have called them the "neo-modernists." They are totally different than any of the generations which have preceded them.

If you were born in a year later than 1972 - if you are a child born to a set of "baby boomer" parents - if you have important questions about the future of world you live in - if you are concerned with defining the terms that will describe your world - if you are sincerely concerned with your environment - if you see the need to make some changes ...

If you can say that you fulfill one or more of the above criteria, you qualify to be a part of a generation that will dramatically affect the shape of the world in which we live. This generation is characterized more by ideas and worldview than age, gender, race and class.

You may be one of these people. You may be a student who has recently entered college. You are liberal, but do not label yourself as such, because you are not really open to any and all opinion. Your goal is to be politically correct, to be culturally correct and to be relevant to the problems that your society faces.

In your desire to appear "politically correct" it will be important, however, not to miss any of the ideas that are beginning to come from outside of your subculture. You may be surprised that in the world outside the campus, there is a huge, new groundswell of patriotism, of faith in God, in love for family and for traditional values.

In the battle for ideas that is raging on your campus, you may find that it is important to stay in touch with what the rest of the country is thinking and feeling - to stay in touch with the "real world" - the non-liberal establishment which speaks a different language and has a whole different vocabulary of terms and idioms.

To keep in touch with the new move toward faith and patriotism, you may want to check out a few of the terms listed below. Chances are, they are either foreign to you, or you hold different definitions than the ones held by a growing number of people. If you really want to be open to new ideas, you might want to assimilate these words. You're going to be hearing them a lot in the 1990s.

THE CHURCH

This is not a building or a non-profit organization. The "Church" is a difficult concept to understand, especially since there has been such a misrepresentation of the Church during the last few years in America.

You might have the idea that the Church is a group of Christians who meet on Sundays or sit around singing "kum-bay-yah" or some other irrelevant song. Or you might picture an evangelistic meeting featuring a "fire and brimstone" preacher. You might think that the Church is made up of politically irrelevant neanderthals who have nothing important to offer.

However, it is important to understand the whole picture here. What we are really talking about when we mention the "Church" is a group of people as diverse as the human race. The Church is an organic, living organism made up of people who share an experience of having caught a glimpse of the eternal God. They are not so much characterized by doctrine as they are by the love they have for Jesus Christ and for each other.

There is a purer expression of the Church emerging today. The message of this new Church is firing the imaginations of many young people the world over. These young people are realizing for the first time that they are a part of a supernaturally dynamic institution, alive with the Spirit of God. This new Church is a worldwide movement that is destined to influence the hearts and minds of the entire human race.

This new Church is the hottest thing going; it is not a last, desperate alternative. This Church is full of truly alive people united by a life-changing zeal and excitement. They are a masterpiece painted by God - a picture of faith and victory - a trophy won by God because of His great love for them and His exciting plan for their lives.

VISION

Vision is not what you can see with your own two natural eyes, but what God enables you to see when He allows you to see through His eyes.

You may have seen the bumpersticker that says: "Think Globally - Act Locally." This is exactly how God operates. The first thing God wants you to see is Himself. This is really possible to do, although many miss the opportunity because they have concluded that it is impossible to know God personally, if He indeed exists.

The experience of catching a glimpse of God and seeing what He did for you through His Son, Jesus, will change your mind forever. After this experience you will never be the same - God will show you what He sees and give you a "vision" - a new way of looking at life in this world.

In a generation raised on MTV, comic books and VCRs, there are going to be those who will make a break from the distractions and irrelevance of natural sights in order to see the world through the eyes of God.

What will they see?

Their eyes will be opened to glorious sights beyond their imaginations. They are going to see, firsthand, how and where God is walking in the earth and what He is doing. Then they will get a supernatural ability to explain it to others in such a way that will make others want to focus and learn.

It will be as if a thousand Martin Luther Kings and a thousand Abraham Lincolns have suddenly appeared in one generation. They will captivate the hearts and minds of the human race, not so much by what they say, but through the pictures that they paint through their words. They will view from the mountain tops those things which others have only have glimpsed from the foothills.

The world is going to notice that there is something totally unique about this generation - something that sets them apart from all the men and women who have come before them. Having a vision from God will make all the difference.

CHAMPIONS

Just about everyone has a desire to be a winner. In cities such as Boston and Los Angeles, nothing can match the devotion of the basketball fans of the Celtics or the Lakers. In Cincinnati and Chicago, nothing matches the fanaticism of the baseball fans of the Reds, the Cubs or the White Sox. These teams are popular because in the minds of their fans they are champions.

The devotion of some sports enthusiasts cannot be quenched even when their team finishes last. They get a sense of satisfaction from identifying with heroes who are capable of performing great feats of athletic skill and sharing in their moments of triumph and defeat.

But there is a new breed of champions who are coming on the scene. They are not sports figures, but they will shake the world through great exploits done for the specific purpose of pointing people toward God. The main work of this generation will be to get the hearts and minds of the human race onto the issues that are really important.

On the university campuses of America, there are many who are spending much time becoming politically correct, while neglecting some of the most important issues that they face as human beings. Questions such as: "How did I get here?" - "Why am I here?" - and "Where am I going from here?" used to be the main questions that college students pondered. Today, it seems that it is more important to know what we are against - than to explain who we are.

Instead of learning all about what they are against, champions spend their time thinking about what they can do to change the world. Instead of learning how to conform to ideas that have already been decided, they are taking some risks with new ideas. Remember, some of the greatest winners of history were nonconformists to the established mode of thinking of their day. Their ideas were not initially accepted. But that is what made them great!

This is the mark of a champion. They exercise their minds and their bodies beyond those who hold to the status quo. Champions dare to develop their muscles, even though it might cause them pain, and even though they may have to struggle in their attempt to become great.

PROPHETIC

You are going to be hearing a lot about the "prophetic" and about "prophets" in the 1990s. When the word "prophet" is mentioned, you may have in your mind a picture of an old man with a long white beard and a robe, pointing a crooked finger and spelling out certain disaster or some dark fate that is about to fall on some unfortunate soul.

There is a negative image in the minds of many people when the word "prophet" or "visionary" is mentioned. This very issue, in fact, is now being hashed out by a small group of people within the Church, but the ideas that are being produced in this discussion are about to explode onto the scene and affect the whole world.

It has always been this way. Slavery, for instance, a curse which is as old as the human race, was dealt a death blow by the 19th century Church in England and America. Men and women such as William Wilberforce, William Lloyd Garrison and Harriet Beecher Stowe had the courage to stand against this social evil and speak "prophetically" against the subjugation of the African slaves.

Once it was firmly established through debate within the Church that slavery needed to be eradicated, some swift events took place and human beings were liberated from bondage. But not all Christians of that time were enlightened enough to understand that slavery was inherently evil and needed to be done away with immediately.

The same is true of the Church today. There are some very unenlightened people who claim to be Christians. But there are some who truly have a relationship with God and are able to hear His voice. "Hearing God's voice" doesn't mean hearing audible words necessarily, but there have always been men and women who have listened to a still, small voice in their hearts and went against the flow when everyone around them was moving in the wrong direction.

One such woman was Anne Hutchinson, who lived in 17th century Boston. While most of the political leaders of her day dictated the "correct" mode of teaching, belief and behavior to the people, Anne Hutchinson listened to her conscience and to what she felt God had spoken to her heart. From Anne Hutchinson came the concepts of tolerance, religious freedom and freedom of speech - ideas that have not yet stopped permeating the world.

A true prophet will always ask God for insight into the relevant issues of the day. They will have answers and relevant words to say about the problems of drug and alcohol abuse, sexually transmitted diseases, materialism, false religion, crime and poverty. They will know the truth and speak the truth. With great authority they will blow away the errors of thinking that are holding many people in bondage.

They will speak with zeal and boldness against error, while at the same time demonstrating that they truly care about the people whose ideas they are opposing.

DESTINY

Destiny is one of the most powerful ideas that you could ever fathom. It is something that needs to be caught rather than taught. Having a sense of destiny is so counter-cultural to our materialistic, cause and effect-minded society, that to believe this way is to cut across the grain of seemingly rational thinking.

What does it mean to have a destiny?

Simply put - to have a destiny means that God has a plan to fulfill with your life. It is as if God had a blueprint and the days of your life are like bricks that are being built into a beautiful building.

Many people have believed the soap opera The Days of Our Lives which tells us that time is "like sands in the hour glass" gradually running down, meaninglessly wasting away. But the Bible teaches us that the days of our lives are ordained by God. Each one of them has wonderful surprises with great things in store if we would walk closely with God.

What will the future bring?

The coming years will be characterized by a growing Church with a vision from God. True champions will speak prophetic truths so alive with power that they will change the destiny of the human race. If you want to be correct in all of your thinking, then you will get an understanding of these ideas.

These are important ideas. These five little words will affect every area of human experience in this decade. There will be a universal discussion taking place among the nations. In order to take part in this discussion, you will need to have the correct understanding of the issues at hand - or be deemed irrelevant and incorrect, not just in campus issues, but in relating to ideas that are sweeping the entire earth.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA (FR) - Students at the University of Virginia celebrated the 100th anniversary of the construction of the school's chapel by staging an impressive march on campus. Over 80 people carrying flags and banners walked through the U.Va. grounds to draw attention to the Christian tenets of the university's founding.

"Jesus, Jesus, Jesus," the group shouted enthusiastically as they marched. Led by children carrying a banner which read, "Jesus is Lord of U.Va.," the group walked around the stadium to the Rotunda, then down the Lawn and into the amphitheater for a rally. The march was organized by Pastor Mark Beliles of the Maranatha Christian Church in Charlottesville.

Pastor Beliles said the march and rally also were held to remind the university of its Christian heritage and mission. "This university was founded as a secular institution, but not as a non-religious university as many tend to assume. U.Va. was never started as a non-religious institution," he told the university newspaper The Daily Progress.

Beliles compiled a 22-page pamphlet documenting "Religious Freedom and Jefferson's University: In Recognition of the Centennial of the University Chapel (1889-1989)." The biblical phrases carved into the university's buildings are evidence of the school's Christian heritage, he noted. For example, on the portico of Cabell Hall, facing the Rotunda, is inscribed, "You shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free," a reference from John 8:32. On the gateway to the university is inscribed a passage from Proverbs: "Through wisdom a house is built, and by understanding it is established; by knowledge the rooms are filled with all precious and pleasant riches."

The University of Virginia campus was once again confronted with the gospel in early May during the "Tour de Trump" bicycle race which took place in Charlottesville. Of the more than 100 cyclists who lined up for the inaugural race, winner Alexis Grewal is an outspoken Christian who told his fans that he was racing "to glorify God."

Five years ago, Alexis Grewal had been at the top of the cycling world when he won the gold medal for bicycle road racing at the Los Angeles Olympic Games. Before the Olympics, Grewal said he had been racing simply to satisfy his own ego. "I was on such an ego trip that I thought I was my own sufficiency," he said. After he won a gold medal, he realized that cycling offered no real fulfillment. "There was a void in my life and I could never fill it up. I could never be satisfied - I could never find joy. I decided to look elsewhere."

Grewal turned to spiritualism and many religious philosophies in his search. He explored Buddhism, Taoism, Rajneeshism, Shamanism and Zen, but he could never find the truth. He says he now understands the reason why people turn to New Age philosophies and occult religions. "There is power in those philosophies - but the power controls them; they don't control the power. But I never found anything that didn't contradict itself. All those other religious systems were just works."

Grewal's desire to know the truth led him to read the Bible and to eventually become a Christian. Although he is still a new believer, he doesn't hesitate to tell people about his conversion. During the special NBC newscast from Charlottesville's Tour De Trump, he freely told millions of viewers about his faith in Jesus Christ. After his cycling career, he said he would like to travel and share the gospel.

Students are taking the lead in reforming the nations

It's Happening All Over the World! University students are taking the lead in reforming the nations

Bolivia

News of a revival of Christianity among students in Bolivia was the most encouraging report circulated at a meeting of the World Assembly of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students (IFES) held July 27-Aug. 4 at Wheaton College.

Christian students at the University of San Simon in Cochabamba, conducted a campus-wide outreach in May and June of this year. During the two months, the student group grew from 40 to 700. The campaign was preceded by a full year of prayer.

Notably, San Simon was the campus where the Marxist revolutionary leader Che Guevarra came to recruit students as guerillas. According to IFES leader Jorge Atiencia, "This university was very crucial in shaping the minds of guerilla leaders." Evidently, the spiritual and political climate of this university has taken a radical shift toward Christian principles.

Peru

Increased spiritual openness is evident throughout Peru, reported Ian Darke, a British IFES worker stationed in Lima. There are 29 Christian groups on Peruvian campuses, with memberships ranging from 20 to 200. Because of the "climate of violence" that has pervaded Peru for the last decade, students risk their lives by identifying themselves as believers, said Darke.

The Shining Path guerilla movement, Sendero Luminoso, reputed to be the most violent Maoist movement in the world, has a strong presence on most campuses in Peru. Members of this Maoist group have been known to interrupt outreach activities. Two Christian students were killed by guerillas at Huancato University in the 1980s, but this year Christian students preached in the open-air on the main university campuses with no interference.

Peruvians seem to be rejecting the idea of the "violent revolution" and many students are embracing Christianity instead.

Nigeria

A Christian movement in Nigeria is one of the largest campus movements in the world. The IFES group in Nigeria is larger than InterVarsity USA; it has grown to more than 30,000 students on 280 campuses.

This explosive growth has come face to face with a militant Muslim movement, says student leader Femi Adeleye. But harassments and even death threats from Muslim radicals have not deterred the Christian faith of Nigerian students.

The Christians of Nigeria are emerging as one of the great missionary movements in the world. Every year, hundreds of missionaries are being released from this African nation throughout the world. Even in countries such as the USA and the Soviet Union, this third world nation is in the forefront of producing Christian leaders, especially among student groups.

Czechoslovakia

Shortly after Czechoslovakia's Velvet Revolution of 1990, The Logos Center was founded in Bratislava with the purpose of helping the country's spiritual and intellectual recovery. Czechoslovakian students are being trained in biblical principles to effectively reform and transform their society. At the heart of The Logos Center are the universal values at the root of every free democratic society: faith in God and in the truth of the Bible; justice founded on truth and respect for human dignity; and initiative and responsibility in a free market and in limited, representative government.

The Logos Center is the brainchild of American and Czechoslovakian Christians with the aim of promoting these values in Eastern European students through an educational resource and study center. Responding to a need expressed by Czechoslovakian president Vaclav Havel in a joint session of the U.S. Congress in the Spring of 1990, The Logos Center provides English education to in classes taught from the center itself in downtown Bratislava.

A short term teaching program, in cooperation with the Apostolic Union of Slovakia, places qualified American instructors in individual churches to provide English instruction both for church members and for the local community.

A 500 volume library containing books and other types of publications, such as newsletters, magazines and journals, is another part of The Logos Center's work. Works on economics, education, government, history, philosophy and theology all emphasize the Judeo-Christian perspective, a perspective which was rigidly suppressed under former Communist regimes. The Logos Center has also published its first newspaper, available in both English and Slovak. This publication is available on the commercial market in Czechoslovakia and offers news and news analysis from a Christian outlook.

For more information on The Logos Center and teaching opportunities in Eastern Europe, contact: The Logos Center, 5740 Albright Drive, Virginia Beach, VA, 23464.

Revival in the Wake of Tiananmen Square

In the perspective of history, what happened in Tiananmen Square, when over 1000 pro-democracy students were slain in the streets by government soldiers, will probably be seen not as the end of a decade of reform and increasing freedom, but as the beginning of an age of upheaval.

It was also the time when China's intellectuals began to consider Christianity in a search for truth and meaning. In defeat, students and intellectuals have learned much - including the true nature of their atheistic government. The storming of Beijing on June 4, 1989, enraged and alienated a generation of China's brightest and best, not just in the capital, but across the country.

Ever since 1989, the authorities have sought to control the students and intellectuals through various means, but they have failed to address one of the fundamental problems magnified by the pro-democracy movement - the lack of a sound ideology.

The Role of Intellectuals in 20th Century China

Looking at China's 20th century history, Chinese intellectuals have played a major role in shaping the nation's destiny. This was true in the overthrow of the Ch'ing Dynasty in 1911. The student riots of May 4, 1919 were an important watershed in the development of student nationalism in China. This nationalism grew through the 1920s and 1930s.

Prior to the Maoist revolution of 1949, students saw themselves as the voice of public opinion. Many were involved in human rights movements and espoused patriotism and democratic ideals. Such concepts did not just suddenly explode onto the scene in Tiananmen Square in 1989, but have been a part of a long development.

The events of June 4, 1989 have served as another turning point in Chinese history, but they have also acted as a catalyst in turning thousands of Chinese students to Christ. In many respects, the spiritual awakening within the Chinese intellectual community has no historical parallel in Chinese history.

The strand emerged, initially, in Beijing and subsequently spread to many other cities throughout China. Many of those who have embraced Christianity since June 4, 1989 are graduate students, university professors and scientists. A number are academics within the Chinese Academy of Science or the Chinese Academy of Social Science.

This phenomenon has not gone unnoticed by Chinese authorities. Newspaper reports have mentioned there are now more Chinese students/intellectuals becoming Christians than those joining the Chinese Communist Party. In Beijing and other cities, over one-quarter of the government approved Protestant Three-Self Patriotic Movement congregations are composed of university students.

"Night and day we are busy with students and professors wanting to believe in Christ," said one house church leader in Beijing. "We've never seen this sort of turning to the Lord before by Chinese intellectuals."

Spiritual Awakening in the 1990s

Several factors have contributed to the unprecedented numbers of students and intellectuals embracing Christianity since June 1989. One is the worldwide "crisis of faith" in Marxism. Chinese authorities have linked the recent spread of Christianity in Eastern Europe with the demise of communism there.

Another reason for the intellectual revival in China in the 1990s is the perceived inept management of social, economic and political reforms by Chinese authorities. While searching for political reform and democracy, students and intellectuals came into an even more vigorous search for Truth. Truth, as an absolute, is not found in other Chinese philosophies, eg. Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism or Marxism.

Overseas, the response to Christianity since June 1989 has been remarkable. Several key student leaders in the pro-democracy movement who escaped to the West have since become Christians, while many others are attending Bible study groups.

The turning to Christ by Chinese intellectuals in China and their subsequent integration into the Chinese church is essentially a Chinese phenomenon - and it is continuing.

Recently, a young Chinese university professor, who converted to Christianity in the wake of the Tiananmen Square incident, shared the gospel with his 20 students. Over half the class committed their lives to Christ that day. In another city, a young professor of music was asked to train his students to sing Christmas carols in various hotels. He asked the students if they understood what they were singing. He later shared the gospel with them and over 20 of his students (from a class of 40) became Christians.

The Chinese Church, however, is still ill-equipped to accommodate and teach these young believers. There are a number of reasons for this: a lack of theologically trained pastors, the low academic standards of pastors who have been trained in seminaries, the inability of these pastors to answer the questions of intellectuals, the sheer numbers of new believers, and the lack of materials for training the new Christians.

A New Generation

There are a number of significant factors which point the way to the emergence of the Christian student work in the future.

Since June 4, 1989, Bible study groups have begun on many Chinese campuses, now joined by undergraduates, graduates, professors and researchers. Also, since the mid-1980s there has been a marked growth of Chinese teachers and professors who have become Christians. Throughout a number of Chinese cities, professors are now supporting and encouraging Christian student groups.

Further, in at least 12 Chinese cities new Christian fellowship groups have been established in the past year. In each case these are Chinese-led with little or no involvement by foreign Christians. Some of these university fellowships number at over 100 students.

Lastly, in several cities there are house churches working exclusively with university students. However, there does not seem to be any structural organization or network at either the provincial or national level.

There remains a tremendous openness to the gospel among China's intellectual community. Lack of resources, however, will make the challenge of training the intellectual community a critical issue for the Church. The need for Christian literature and apologetic resources written by Chinese Christian intellectuals in simplified Chinese script is critical.

Christians outside of China must now consider creative ways in which to establish a partnership with Chinese Christian intellectuals in order to facilitate their effectiveness in evangelizing and training this new generation of Christian students who are part of the legacy of June 4, 1989.

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - Former U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren Burger told 300 religious leaders with the Religious Alliance Against Pornography (RAAP) gathered in Washington March 1-2 that "Nothing could be clearer from the Court than that obscenity is not protected speech." Representatives of major Protestant, Catholic and Jewish groups attended the conference, which was chaired by Dr. Jerry Kirk, president of the National Coalition Against Pornography (N-CAP).

RAAP is an effort to mobilize churches and church leaders to renounce hard-core pornography, encourage the passage of child protection legislation, and participate in a national campaign to promote awareness of the harmful effects of pornography. Those attending the conference heard a wide variety of religious leaders address the need for a stepped-up war against pornography.

Joseph Cardinal Bernardine, vice chairman of RAAP, told members of the Washington press corps that "we are against censorship, but we are also against obscenity which is not protected by the First Amendment."

Clinical psychologist Dr. Victor Cline outlined the steps taken by hundreds of men he treated following their conviction for sex-related crimes. Cline said that viewing pornographic material leads to sex-related addiction followed by departure from the values an individual has previously held. The appetite for pornography grows, and the addict finds himself desiring more and more violent and bizarre material until they finally act out some of the fantasies they have become obsessed with through their exposure to obscene material. "The more intelligent the man is, the more vulnerable he is to acting out his fantasies," explained Cline.

William Weld, assistant attorney general, outlined current activities being undertaken by the U.S. Justice Department's Obscenity Enforcement Unit. That unit is completing the training of 5,000 individuals who will enforce obscenity laws and prosecute offenders. The unit provides support for District U.S. Attorneys and local law enforcement units who need expert legal advice, including supplying experienced trial attorneys. The unit is also involved in long-range planning toward the goal of dismantling the obscenity industry.

Other activities of the Obscenity Enforcement Unit which were outlined by Weld include litigation. In 1987 there were 79 indictments of purveyors of obscenity - many under anti-racketeering statutes, which allow the proceeds of the lucrative porn industry to be seized. Over 40 U.S. attorneys are now prosecuting and investigating obscenity cases. Indictments of child pornographers have risen dramatically, from three in 1983 to 244 in 1987.

The Justice Department is also pushing for legislation that would expand the provisions of racketeering laws to cover high-tech dissemination of obscenity and the selling of children for pornography.

U.S. News and World Report

Ranks America's Leading Grad Schools 4/90

According to a recent U.S. News and World Report feature, "America's Best Graduate and Professional Schools," (March 19, 1990), professional education in the United States is booming. Enrollment among women and minorities is up from ten years ago and the United States remains the undisputed world leader graduate schooling.

The rationale given for ranking educational institutions, according to U.S. News, was to devise criteria based on "real information" in an attempt to assess the quality of professional schools. Seeing that there is little information available on the comparative merits of graduate education, the report attempts to give a accurate and current overview of the leading graduate colleges.

According to U.S News, "The sad truth is that it is easier to learn about the relative merits of compact disk players than it is to compare and contrast America's professional schools."

Assessing the much sought after professions of business, law, engineering and medicine, U.S. News formulated a ranking system based on the criteria of reputation, student selectivity, placement success, resources, faculty and graduation rates. Special departments of the graduate schools were ranked according to a survey of deans and heads of academic affairs programs.

Business - Among the 25 top business schools were Stanford, Harvard, UPenn, MIT, Dartmouth, Duke and Columbia. Ethics has become an increasing concern as business schools try to educate students to survive in a field in which "the golden rule may be replacing greed." An increased emphasis on relevance and objectives characterizes business schools as the programs adjust to meet the demands of a fast changing world.

Law - Yale ranked as the leading law school by a wide margin, followed by the University of Chicago and Stanford. Also included were Columbia, Harvard, UPenn, Cornell and Boston College. Enrollment has increased dramatically in the last 25 years and the emphasis on gaining practical knowledge and experience is also increasing. Leaders of the American Bar Association have called upon law schools for an "infusion of ethical and professional issues." This concern is echoed in professional and academic circles as reform in the legal profession and the training of competent lawyers is seen as a drastic need.

Medicine - Harvard Medical School was chosen as "not only the country's oldest and most innovative but also the best." A new curriculum, Harvard New Pathway, implemented five years ago, has turned the responsibility of learning over to the students. Harvard Medical students become involved in patient care long before their internships. By cultivating attitudes and skills that will result in life long learning, Harvard hopes to produce compassionate doctors that have more involvement with their patients. Other schools chosen were Johns Hopkins, Duke, Yale, Cornell, Columbia, and UPenn.

Engineering - The Massachusetts Institute of Technology led the ranks of the best engineering schools in America. "The very name conjures up images of high-tech brilliance and cutting edge science," said U.S. News. A significant trend among graduate engineering schools is that nearly half the doctorates awarded last year in U.S. universities went to international students. MIT was followed closely by Stanford and, not surprisingly, other Ivy League schools such as Cornell, Princeton, Harvard and Columbia also figured in prominently.

Financing a graduate education has become an increasing concern among America's students; some tuitions have doubled or even tripled in the last ten years. The cost of graduate degrees and the prospect of getting deeply into debt has caused some students to wonder if schooling in the nation's most prestigious institutions is worthwhile.

Yet most experts claim that the payoff for education at even the most expensive schools is well worth the investment. Lawyers, for instance, can regain more than $100,000 in debt and lost wages within five years of passing their bar exams.

Some students have resorted to working full or part time jobs, while attending graduate school on a part time basis. Night school is an alternative to many students who prefer to save money while working. Many businesses and firms pay partial tuition to employees moonlighting as students.

Despite skyrocketing costs and a highly competitive field of applicants it remains certain that graduate education will continue to be a much sought after avenue of life. The reputations of academic institutions are often crucial to the professional success of graduates competing for positions in elite law firms, renowned hospitals, businesses and engineering corporations. The future promises to hold a variety of educational opportunities for students seeking to expand their horizons.

What Is A Real Man?

Answering Misconceptions about Male-ness

By Tom Sirotnak

9/92

WHAT IS A REAL MAN? I frequently pose this question to campus audiences as I travel around the country. The standard responses fall into three categories:

1. Physical - Who's the "Biggest" or "Toughest."
2. Drinking - Measured by who can chug down a six-pack of beer the fastest.
3. Sexual - Who can "score" the most.

Others add that a real man is someone who does whatever he wants to do, or, a guy who has mastered financial independence. Answers such as these remind me of the proverbial couch potato who has overdosed on too many Rambo movies. None of the above qualities even remotely resembles the image of a true man.

The real standard of manhood is someone who will stand for the truth at all costs.*

I learned the truth of this by first doing the opposite. Striving to find acceptance through the world's ways, I sought to fulfill the image of the rough, tough macho man.

A chubby, slow, uncoordinated youngster growing up, all I wanted was other kid's approval. Though often jeered for my slow-footed ways, size worked to my advantage when I started putting my efforts into sports, particularly football. But my red-letter day during elementary school came when I took on the toughest kid in our class.

On the playground, I made this bully mad and he came running full speed in my direction. I didn't stand up to him; he scared me to death.

When he swung at me, I ducked. His momentum sent him flying over me and as I stood up in the same motion, I caught him with my shoulder. The impact tossed him several feet in the air and he landed flat on his back. Getting up, he shuffled home crying.

Suddenly, I was the new school hero. Though my success was a fluke, I thought, "Hey, look at the acceptance I got through fighting this guy."

Thus began a violent lifestyle, as I avidly pursued building up my body to become ultra-tough. I thought a man meant someone so physically intimidating that no one would mess with him.

Years later, when I arrived at the University of Southern California, I boasted a 20-inch neck, 20-inch arms and a 54-inch chest. Onlookers gaped when I bench pressed 470 pounds.

I used my physique to land a job as a bouncer in a bar, where I frequently got into brawls. When I got really mean, I rubbed men's faces up against stucco walls or chain link fences.

I amazed people with my physical stunts. Three times I wrestled bears standing as tall as 7 feet, 4 inches, weighing 650 pounds. When I got drunk, I would knock over wooden stop signs by running into them head first.

I thought I was the ultimate man. One of the few "walk-ons" ever to play defensive tackle for USC, I eventually became team captain. I belonged to a great fraternity and was on my way to earning a marketing degree from one of the nation's top business schools. Well-liked by my peers, they constantly invited me to parties. Once I won the beer-chugging contest by downing a 16-ounce can in 1.9 seconds.

But I felt empty inside. I did these things to win friends and gain attention. The truth? I felt very unfulfilled. My life was a cover-up for the deep insecurities, fear and failures that haunted me. I wanted to be a man, but I didn't know how. Despite all my great exploits and campus status, inside I was bankrupt. There was a vacuum inside, one that only God could fill.

As time passed, the void grew wider through a steady diet of lust, pornography and immoral relationships. I didn't realize the nature of this sin strips a man of purpose and responsibility. This made me feel even more emasculated.

Ironically, while I was partying away my college years, I called myself a Christian and even belonged to a campus ministry. Finally, when USC made it to the Fiesta Bowl my Senior year in 1982, things began to change.

Upset over the hypocrisy and inconsistencies that plagued me, I wandered the streets of Phoenix and wound up in a Christian gathering. The speaker was former LA Ram and Hall of Fame member Rosey Grier. Seeing through my counterfeit faith, he challenged me to get the sin out of my life.

Rosey preached the next week at USC and introduced me to my current pastor, Phil Bonasso, and Rice Brooks, an evangelist who also spoke that night. Phil and Rice team-preached to me until I saw that I had never understood what it means to be a disciple of Jesus Christ.

I saw that Jesus was not 100% in control over every area of my life. From studies to athletics, work, social life and family, He must be "Lord of all or not at all." That's when I repented and God's power changed me. The void in my life vanished. For the very first time, I felt like a whole person, a man.

So many people equate being a Christian with a weakling, a wimp. One night while I was preaching on a campus, a student yelled, "Jesus is a crutch!"

I replied, "You're right. What's yours? Alcohol? Women? Fame? We are all trusting in something. But will it support your lifestyle or lead you straight to hell? If Christianity is a crutch, then give me two. I desperately need Jesus to guide my life. Without Him, it was headed straight down the tubes. Where is your life headed?"

* I use the words "manhood" - "a true man" - and "maturity" as equivalent. A mature man will exhibit the character of Jesus Christ residing in him. The same truth is applicable to all people - male or female - a mature individual will stand for truth at all costs "until we ... become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (Ephesians 4:13).

"On Campus" Editions are Coming!

8/91

When The Forerunner began in 1981, God directed a few individuals to start a publication which would reach the young people of this generation with the message of the gospel.

The method was calculated: to boldly penetrate the minds and hearts of students with biblical truth by invading the most strategic strongholds of atheistic humanism - the university campuses of America.

The Forerunner was a lonely voice in a vast wilderness of student apathy and pessimism during those first few months, but the news of a growing conservative movement began to flourish by late 1982. By 1983, thirty-five conservative newspapers had been started on major secular campuses. The number more than doubled in an another year. Even at the U.C. Berkeley campus, which has long carried the reputation of being the most liberal of academic institutions in the U.S., students were following that trend: One survey proved that twice as many Berkeley students considered themselves conservative as did those in 1971.

All during this time The Forerunner was addressing issues which were at the center of campus debate. We presented biblical alternatives to Marxism, feminism and welfare statism. We challenged the student audience to re-evaluate the propaganda and liberal bias that they are continuously subjected to in the classroom. We even staged a forum between a creationist and an evolutionist and printed their arguments. We were determined to bring American students face to face with the realities of the Word of God as it applies to modern life and controversial social issues.

This newspaper has gone out like seed on what was originally dry and rocky soil. But over the past ten years God has obviously been watering and plowing the ground to make it fertile for a spiritual harvest. Even the secular news media today is reporting on the increased interest on campus. Religion courses in the major universities are filling up at record rates. The spiritual climate is obviously changing: the stolid pessimism of the past is being replaced by a reawakening to traditional values, to patriotism, and to morality.

But we cannot stop here! The war of ideas on the American campus is far from being over. Even though the communist world has been shaken during the past two years, American academia has been vigorously propping up the same liberal, socialistic values as they did in the past. Only this time it is under the guise of subtle new terms such as "Politically Correct Thinking" and "Global Environmentalism." The devil's advocates - obviously provoked by the new surge of traditional values and spiritual feeling spawned among the students of the 1990s, are even more vehement.

That is why it is imperative that we drive full-force into this battle for the campuses of America with renewed vigor and hard-hitting ammunition. In the coming months of September, October and November, our primary focus will be to reach the college campuses of America. The Forerunner's campus editions will be invading the university setting this Fall. The next three issues are being especially designed to appeal to today's collegiate audience. Although they will contain the same type of material as we have always presented, our "Special Campus Editions" will have a sharp, evangelistic edge aimed right at the heart of today's student.

The Forerunner was conceived with the vision of being the prophetic voice on the campuses of America which would spark the seeds of destiny hidden in the hearts of the young people in America. The plan is to disburse hundreds of thousands of copies of The Forerunner among the students. When Truth is presented in any form, it will always gain ascendancy over the godless philosophies of the world simply because it is the Truth of God.

Many prophecies have been given over The Forerunner saying that the seed that was sown through this newspaper would be harvested in a great spiritual awakening that would occur on the university campuses of America.

Every month we have articles combatting the theory of evolution, exposing godless philosophies in education and reporting the progress of the gospel in the world. Within this framework are dorm Bible studies directed at college students, powerful salvation testimonies, and evangelistic articles. Every month there are articles on abortion because there is no biblical perspective on abortion being given on our campuses.

This is the vision of The Forerunner: to be a prophetic voice to the students. The printed word is a powerful weapon to destroy the godless philosophies of the kingdoms of this world. We seek God as to what He would have us print and every month we present God's viewpoint on the issues.

God is looking for just a few people to catch a vision for breaking new ground and reaching thousands of people through the printed word.

Subscription Information

Starting this Fall, you can be a part of this vision. You may subscribe to The Forerunner for only $15 a year, you can help us to get Truth in the form of the printed word into the hands of America's students. Your subscription allows us to defray the costs and print thousands of newspapers at a lower cost.

You can be a part of this plan by subscribing today, or, if you want to be a campus distributor, fill out the form to the right and you will receive Forerunners on your campus for a monthly cost of $30.00 per 100 newspapers.

The dial-a-porn industry has been severely crippled by a recent decision by the American Telephone & Telegraph Company to consign dial-a-porn companies obscure phone numbers, and to eliminate profit by changing the rate structure.

AT&T's move came after March 15 when it received federal approval to stop giving dial-a-porn services a share of the proceeds from the calls. Prior to the new rate structure, AT&T paid each company two to five cents for every call beyond 2,000 daily, which could earn as much as $5,000 every day.

However, the per-call payment has been eliminated for a special class of customers - those who AT&T officials say do not match its corporate advertising philosophy. Dial-a-porn companies now have two options: either continue to provide the service without compensation or surrender their national lines to AT&T.

Additionally, the companies may face a penalty of $500 per day if they do not receive at least 2,000 calls. Those with multiple lines will have to pay multiple penalties.

Although AT&T officials claim that the decision was based purely on marketing strategy, and not on moral grounds, anti-pornography organizations across the U.S. view it as a significant victory. Telephone porn has become a particularly negative influence on children in the U.S. in recent years, and porn call numbers are reportedly widely circulated among children in elementary and high schools.

BEDFORD, VA (FR) - A convenience store owner in this small Virginia town near Roanoke burned a pornographic video after hearing of convicted serial killer Ted Bundy's confession about how pornography fueled his rape and murder habit.

"I don't want to send them back. I want to burn them," said Kenneth Patterson about the videocassettes he had for rent in his store. "I just want to pour a can of gasoline on them. I don't want anyone to see them." Killer Ted Bundy was interviewed by Christian psychologist Dr. James Dobson only hours prior to his execution in January of this year. Bundy told Dobson that pornography was at the root of his problem, and challenged Americans to deal with pornography as a deterrent to crime.

"(Ted Bundy) said there are people like him who watch these movies and a part of their brain snaps," said Patterson, a father of two. "You think of your kids, other people's kids. We just discontinued renting them and any kind of pornography completely. I don't need it. Society doesn't need it. We're going to stick with the family type."

Patterson had been renting the pornographic videos for the past five years, but said he did not care if he lost customers. "I don't want any part of this type of garbage. Those kids are more important than money. I might lose some business but I think I'll gain in the long run. Money is not the question," he stated.

Telephone executives at AT&T began "promotion compensation" services - otherwise known as "900 numbers" - several years ago as a marketing ploy to allow companies to run pre-recorded messages for customers. Stock market reports, sports information, and even recorded prayers were typical services provided. But since 1983, 900 numbers have been dominated by pornographic recordings ... and "dial-a-porn" has proliferated into a multi-million dollar industry with an average of 100,000 to 200,000 calls per month.

Dial-a-porn's popularity was heightened by the circulation of its phone numbers on high school and junior high campuses across the nation through High Society and Penthouse magazines. Students would get the phone numbers, but usually didn't know there was a fee attached for hearing the messages. One parent complained about a phone bill as high as $5,000.

But it wasn't just the high phone bills that pivoted this service into national focus causing lawmakers to enact a ban which goes into effect July 1. Researchers have documented the addictive potential of dial-a-porn. Dr. Victor Cline, a psychology professor at the University of Utah, recently published a report demonstrating that dial-a-porn is a harmful force in our society.

Dr. Cline was commissioned by the U.S. Justice Department in January of 1985 to study the effects of dial-a-porn on children. "With every one of the children we studied, we found an addiction effect in making these calls." He wrote, "In every case, without exception, the children (girls as well as boys) became hooked on this 'sex by phone' and kept going back for more and still more.

"The children did not stop making the calls until they were discovered. In several cases more than 300 calls were made by a particular child. Disclosure usually occurred when the parents received an enormous phone bill. In nearly all cases there were some problems and tensions generated in the parent-child and family relationships because of their making dial-a-porn calls."

Cases have also been filed across the nation because of the damaging effects of dial-a-porn on families. A Michigan father's ten-year-old daughter was raped by a 12-year-old boy and 15-year-old boy after they listened to several messages. "This phone call has damaged our lives," he wrote Sen. Jesse Helms. In another recently reported case, a four-year-old was raped by a 12-year-old in Hayward, California, after he listened to two and a half hours of dial-a-porn.

Community Protest

The nationwide ban culminated after months of grassroots protest and furor within communities across America. Cases such as the Michigan rape case, and parental complaints of high phone bills due to the ignorance of their children, were fuel for the fire.

The American Family Association (AFA) was one of the key organizations to spearhead protests against dial-a-porn services. Alan Wildmon of AFA said, "I cut my card in half in January (of this year), and wrote them (AT&T) a letter saying if they didn't get out of dial-a-porn then we would begin sending 500,000 letters a month to their clients telling them about AT&T's support of dial-a-porn."

On January 14, AT&T filed for a change of tariff with the FCC which would allow it to cut the service. Since then, the FCC has also fined two operators in California $600,000. "It's time we took steps. The ultimate in sleaze deserves the ultimate ... penalty," FCC Commissioner James H. Quello said. "They need to know we mean business."

The order was the result of an investigation triggered by complaints alleging that unimpeded access to the messages resulted in the molestation of one 10-year-old girl and so disturbed one teen that he had to enter weekly psychiatric therapy.

The companies, Audio Enterprises, Inc., and Intercambio, Inc., were each fined $600,000 for violation of the statute banning the interstate transmission of obscene material and failure to restrict such transmissions from minors and non-consenting adults.

Both have 30 days to respond, but haven't to date, according to Gregory Vodt, FCC Chief of Enforcement Division. Vodt said in the last two years there have been "well over 1,000 complaints" and 40 related to access of children to the numbers.

Congressional Action

Additionally, the multi-million dollar industry was dealt a harsh blow by Congress with passage of a bill on April 19 which enacted a nationwide ban. The U.S. House passed the bill with a vote of 395-1 and the Senate followed suit the next day by approving the measure with a voice vote.

The bill was an amendment to the "Educational Improvement Act," a multi-billion dollar measure which extended federal power in education. It was added as an amendment after democrats rejected a leadership proposal that would have restricted dial-a-porn calls to adults who subscribed to the service through their local phone companies. Critics of that plan said it would amount to government legitimization of dial-a-porn, and would not keep children from gaining access to the telephone filth by calling from a subscribers' phone. The Senate approved the measure quickly.

As of July 1, 1988, dial-a-porn will be outlawed. Vodt said he didn't know if FCC would be involved in implementing the new law because it was "too soon to answer. We're aware that the law passed and certainly supported the bill which affects banning obscenity on interstate communications."

Vodt said prior to the new law, there were three defenses used to support dial-a-porn: if it was paid by credit card pre-payment; received through access codes; or through "message scrambling." "In 'message scrambling' the receiver has to have a 'descrambler' to decipher the message. Under the new law, those defenses are thrown out of the window," he added.

The ACLU has threatened to file a suit to test the constitutionality of the new law. "No court has ever upheld a complete ban on non-obscene, so-called 'indecent' speech," said Barry Lynn, legislative counsel for ACLU. Proponents of the measure assert that it is supported by legal precedent and that there is no legal obstacle to its enactment.

Four years of the "free exercise" of the "freedom of speech" by dial-a-pornographers has cost the ruined lives of a 10-year-old girl and a Michigan family. Pornographic magazines, such as Penthouse and High Society were partly responsible for the propagation of dial-a-porn's phone numbers. If audio-pornography can cause so much devastating ruin, how much more can visual pornograhy? The new ban will surely be tested by ACLU's string of cases, which is a clue to the interests of the organization. But while the new ban is being tested in court, the challenge is now before the American people to assess the damaging impact that visual pornography is having on our families and children.

In the September issue of The Forerunner (Vol. X, No. VI), we examined the relationship between pornography and violent crime in an article entitled "Mass Murder and Pornography - Are They Related?"

Since the publication of the September issue, we have received a number of responses challenging the claim that pornography and violent crime are related. These responses implored us to use real, honest and acceptable facts in defending this position. As a follow up to the many questions generated by this article, we have decided to give a more complete overview of the research that has been done in this area.

The Effects of Pornography

Defenders of pornography argue that it is not harmful, and thus should not be regulated or banned. Citing the 1970 Presidential Commission on Obscenity and Pornography, they conclude that there is no relationship between exposure to erotic material and subsequent behavior. But two subsequent decades of research based on the increased production of more explicit and violent forms of pornography has shown the profound effects pornography can have on human behavior.

Psychologist Edward Donnerstein (University of Wisconsin) found that brief exposure to violent forms of pornography can lead to anti-social attitudes and behavior. Male viewers tend to be more aggressive towards women, less responsive to pain and suffering of rape victims, and more willing to accept various myths about rape.¹

Dr. Dolf Zimmerman and Dr. Jennings Bryant showed that continued exposure to pornography had serious adverse effects on beliefs about sexuality in general and on attitudes toward women in particular. They also found that pornography desensitizes people to rape as a criminal offense.²

These researchers also found that massive exposure to pornography encourages a desire for increasingly deviant materials which involve violence, like sadomasochism and rape.³

Feminist author Diana Russell notes in her book Rape and Marriage the correlation between deviant behavior (including abuse) and pornography. She also found that pornography leads men and women to experience conflict, suffering, and sexual dissatisfaction.⁴

Researcher Victor Cline (University of Utah) has documented in his research how men become addicted to pornographic materials, begin to desire more explicit or deviant material, and end up acting out what they have seen.⁵

According to Charles Keating of Citizens for Decency Through Law, research reveals that 77 percent of child molesters of boys and 87 percent of child molesters of girls admitted imitating the sexual behavior they had seen modeled in pornography.

Sociologists Murray Straus and Larry Baron (University of New Hampshire) found that rape rates are highest in states which have high sales of sex magazines and lax enforcement of pornography laws.⁶

Michigan state police detective Darrell Pope found that of the 38,000 sexual assault cases in Michigan (1956-1979), in 41 percent of the cases pornographic material was viewed just prior to or during the crime. This agrees with research done by psychotherapist David Scott who found that "half the rapists studied used pornography to arouse themselves immediately prior to seeking out a victim."

The Final Report of the 1986 Attorney General's Commission on Pornography lists a full chapter of testimony (197-223) from victims whose assailants had previously viewed pornographic materials. The adverse effects range from physical harm (rape, torture, murder, sexually transmitted disease) to psychological harm (suicidal thoughts, fear, shame, nightmares).

The Facts on Pornography

A day-care director, now serving three years for three counts of first-degree sexual assault, confessed the he had "started picking up pornographic materials occasionally, going to bookstores ... no one knew, not even my wife ... now I do recognize fully the shocking facts about pornography and how it will draw you into its clutches away from God into sinful fantasies ..."

Multiplied incidents like the above graphically illustrate how the $8 billion-per-year porn industry has carved inroads into American life:

- * Nearly 900 theaters show X-rated films and more than 15,000 "adult" bookstores and video stores offer pornographic material, outnumbering McDonald's restaurants in the U.S. by a margin of at least three to one.

- * Each year, nearly 100 full-length pornographic films provide estimated annual box office sales of $50 million.

- * Approximately 70% of the pornographic magazines sold eventually end up in the hands of minors.

- * About 1.2 million children are annually exploited through child pornography and prostitution.⁷

God's Purpose in Sex

The tragedy of sex apart from God's ideal standard was no more forcefully presented than by this young lady who testified in Chicago before the 1986 Commission on Pornography:

"I am a former Playboy Bunny ... I never questioned the morality of becoming a Playboy Bunny because the magazine was accepted at home. [During my time with Playboy] I experienced everything from date-rape to physical abuse to group sex and finally to fantasizing homosexuality as I read Playboy magazine.

"I was extremely suicidal and sought psychiatric help for the eight years I lived in a sexually promiscuous fashion. There was no help for me until I changed my lifestyle to be a follower of Jesus Christ and obeyed the biblical truths including no premarital sex."

The agony of this young lady - and others like her - could have been avoided through an understanding of and obedience to God's purposes in sex.

Pornography attacks the dignity of men and women created in the image of God.⁸ It also distorts God's gift of sex which should be shared only within the bounds of marriage.⁹ And it frequently promotes sexual perversion (rape, incest, sodomy, bondage, torture, pedophilia) which is condemned by God.

From a biblical perspective, sexual intercourse is exclusively reserved for marriage for the following purposes:

- * First, it establishes the "one-flesh" union.¹⁰

- * Second, it provides for sexual intimacy within the marriage bond. The use of the word "know" indicates a profound meaning of sexual intercourse.¹¹

- * Third, sexual intercourse is for the mutual pleasure of husband and wife.¹²

- * Fourth, sexual intercourse is for procreation.¹³

The Bible also warns against the misuse of sex. Premarital and extramarital sex is condemned.¹⁴ Even thoughts of sexual immorality (often fed by pornographic material) are condemned.¹⁵ Various forms of sexual perversion are also condemned in the Bible.¹⁶

Contrary to popular opinion, the Christian lifestyle of purity and abstaining from premarital and extramarital sex is not repressive or legalistic. People who have adopted this standard of purity can testify to the liberating power that it has had in their lives. Sexual purity not only is a defense against sexually transmitted diseases such as AIDS, but it also can help to bring about stable and happy marriage and family relationships.

In hoping to live our lives according to biblical standards and obtain the happy benefits of this lifestyle, we must do two things. First, we must keep pure by fleeing immorality and thinking on those things which are pure.¹⁷ Second, we must work to remove this sexual perversion of pornography from society.

FCC Rules Indecent Programming O.K. After Midnight

WASHINGTON D.C. (FR) - The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) ruled in November that radio and TV stations can broadcast indecent programming between midnight and 6 a.m. without facing government sanctions. The commission said that at other times indecent programming can not be broadcast because of the "risk that children may be in the audience."

This ruling nullifies a federal law (Section 1465 of Federal Laws, Chapter 71 - Title 18), which says, "Whoever utters any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years or both," said Donald Wildmon, president of the National Federation for Decency. "The FCC usurped the power of Congress and the President and said that it would allow indecent programming between the hours of 12 midnight and 6 am."

"The FCC in effect voided the law, acting on their own, without the law being changed through the proper channels of government," he added.

"The FCC has sent a message to broadcasters: 'You are free to do as you please between the hours of 12 midnight and 6 am.'"

Indecent material would include such publications as Hustler, Penthouse, Playboy, Swank, and similar "softcore" pornographic magazines and material currently being shown on the Playboy Channel and by Holiday Inns on their pornographic satellite channel. The commission's ruling was a clarification of an earlier decision dealing with "material that depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities or organs."

The ruling does not affect obscenity, which continues to be banned from broadcast at all times. However, difficulties in defining obscenity have rendered the nation's obscenity laws all but useless.

Paul J. McGeady, general counsel of Morality in Media, complained that the FCC's ruling will "push the pig into the parlors of millions of American homes after midnight," and argued that the FCC was wrong to allow indecent programming because broadcasting legislation passed by Congress "prohibits obscene and indecent broadcasting, and it has no window - it applies 24 hours a day."

Peggy Charren, of Action for Children's Television, said the new ruling still misses the point, and argued, "The problem with censorship is that one person's dirty word is another person's satire." Charren said laws against obscenity are sufficient to protect the airwaves. According to a CBS survey, more than one million children under twelve were still up after midnight.

TUPELO, MS (AFA) - The American Family Association (AFA) has announced that a growing number of Holiday Inns are now discontinuing their in-room pornographic movie service, although the corporate headquarters still refuses to make an across-the-board policy to stop the films.

Recent motels advising AFA that they have pulled the porn movies include Holiday Inns in Warner-Robins, Georgia; Yakima, Washington; Palo Verde Plaza in Tucson, Arizona; and Culpeper, Virginia. In addition, AFA is getting calls regularly from local Holiday Inn managers wanting to know how to get out of their contract to show the movies.

The General Manager of one motel wrote: "It gives us great pleasure to announce that an agreement has been reached with COMSAT Video effective March 1, 1988, that discontinues the broadcasting of the movies in question. Please let me assure you that our company, John Q. Hammons, Inc., is committed to providing quality entertainment to our guests. As we have stated previously, the respect of the people of -- is of paramount importance to us as well as Mr. Hammons. It is our intent to be an integral part of this city and state for many years to come, and we hope that we will be able to serve you in the future."

Another General Manager wrote: "We are pleased to inform you that this Holiday Inn, as of March 15, 1988, does not carry or show in-room porn movies and we wish to be placed on your list of those Holiday Inns not carrying the movies."

AFA has been encouraging churches and Christian organizations to boycott Holiday Inns until a policy change is made concerning the pornography. Rev. Charles Horton, pastor of First United Methodist Church in Cheyenne, Oklahoma, recently wrote: "When the Elk City, Oklahoma Holiday Inn made an effort to host the District Convention of the Republican Party in our area, a United Methodist layman, David Tosney, of Roger Mills County, encouraged the convention to be held at an Oklahoma State Lodge instead.

"Quite concerned about the corrosive effects of pornography, Mr. Tosney told the group that Holiday Inn is the largest distributor of in-room pornography in the nation. The convention was held at the lodge!"

Dick Norton, Executive Director of the Metro Chicago Youth for Christ, recently wrote: "I wish to add my name to the list of those who have joined the protest against the Holiday Inn in-room porn movies. You may be interested to know that we recently rescheduled a 700-person banquet from the Holiday Inn in our area to another hotel because of your campaign."

Far East Broadcasting Company wrote: "We have decided to pull all our banquets from Holiday Inns across the country which are carrying the 'R-rated films intended for adults after 10:00 p.m.' as described by Mr. Brannon of Holiday Inns." This action will cost Holiday Inns $50,000 to $60,000 per year.

Local churches are asked to encourage their members to participate in the boycott and to write or call Holiday Inns to complain about the in-room porn movies, especially since Holiday Inns has stated publicly that very few Christians have complained.

The address is: Chrm. Michael Rose, Holiday Corporation, 1023 Cherry Road, Memphis, TN 38117. The phone number is 1-800-465-4329.

Holiday Inns Stop Showing Pornography

TUPELO, MS (FR) - Thirty-eight Holiday Inns have decided to stop airing pornographic movies on their satellite television channel due to grassroots protests, according to the American Family Association (AFA). "Local Holiday Inns are beginning to feel the effects of the boycott," said Rev. Donald Wildmon, executive director of the AFA and veteran organizer of the growing anti-porn movement in the U.S.

Twenty noted Christian leaders have also signed a statement saying that Holiday Inn does indeed show in-room porn movies. The response from the 20 Christian leaders came after Bob Brannon, vice president of Corporate Communications for the hotel chain, wrote several concerned potential customers and said, "No Holiday Inn shows pornographic movies."

The Christian leaders issued a statement which stated: "Having viewed excerpts from several movies shown in Holiday Inns, we found, among other degrading scenes, total female nudity, female bondage with sadistic torture, lesbian and heterosexual orgies, female masturbation, oral sex, and explicit forcible rape. The fact is that Holiday Inns do show pornographic movies."

Boycotts by Christian and civic organizations and churches have sent a clear message to the Memphis, Tennessee-based corporation. Holiday Inns lost $40,000 in revenue when the International Bible Institute in Plymouth, Florida, told the local Holiday Inn in Orlando that they would not use the facility because of the movies.

The president of Daytona Archers, Patrick Gill, hosted the 1988 Junior Olympic National Championships for the National Archery Association of the U.S. He wrote Holiday Inns saying that he would not use the company to host about 200 guests, including the approximately 100 youth expected to participate in the event.

AFA has also been circulating a resolution through many major Christian organizations which states clearly the objectives and terms of the boycott. About 1,000 Christian leaders, including the heads of approximately 50 denominations, have ratified it. The resolution calls upon the "management of Holiday Inns to show corporate concern for members of our society, especially women and children, by removing these movies and returning Holiday Inns to its historic image of a family-oriented company."

Kansas City Campaign

KANSAS CITY, MO (NCAP) - Three out of four residents of Kansas City were aware of the S.T.O.P! campaign conducted there by the National Coalition Against Pornography(NCAP), and roughly the same number opposed sale of hardcore pornography in their community.

Two Gallup polls taken before and after the month-long pornography awareness campaign show significant shifts in public perception of pornography and it's harms to society.

The survey "shows that the move against obscenity has strong citizen support that is growing," said Chris Cooper, executive director of the Coalition Against Pornography in Kansas City.

Seventy-one percent oppose sale of hardcore pornography in their state; 79 percent oppose its sale in their neighborhood. Only 17 percent considered pornography a safe outlet for persons with sexual problems, and 74 percent believe pornography leads some to commit sex crimes.

"The consistency shown in the first and second poll reveals strong citizen consensus on this issue," Cooper said. An overwhelming majority of Kansas City residents support prosecution of hardcore pornography distributors and producers. Support for such action ranged from 61 to 77 percent depending on the severity of the material, whether it showed explicit sexual intercourse, hardcore sex or sexual violence.

"Just as we hoped, the campaign reached thousands of people with the message that child pornography and violent, degrading obscenity are harmful and illegal," Cooper said.

Results for several of the survey questions showed significant change in public perception and attitudes, probably reflecting the impact of the S.T.O.P! campaign. Eighty-one percent of those surveyed considered pornography a somewhat or very important problem for Kansas City before and after the S.T.O.P.! campaign - but the number considering it "very important" increased from 48 percent to 59 percent.

And there were shifts in the numbers of people willing to allow hardcore pornography to be sold in Kansas City, their state, and neighborhood. The number of people who consider sexually violent pornography as "entertainment" dropped 10 percentage points, from 55 percent to 45 percent.

"Our work now is to continue raising public awareness, ensure enforcement of obscenity and child protection laws and ultimately eliminate all illegal obscenity from Kansas City," Cooper explained.

The plans of the organization include a court-watch program to monitor pending obscenity-related cases; city-wide education seminars; distribution of films, brochures, and information packets.

The S.T.O.P! (Standing Together Opposing Pornography) campaign used advertising, a television special, rallies, and other motivational and educational devices to make the citizens of Kansas City aware of the pornography problem, and to mobilize them to demand enforcement of laws against illegal obscenity.

Mass Murder and Pornography on the University of Florida Campus

Are the Two Related?

By Jay Rogers

9/90

GAINESVILLE, Florida (FR) - On any given day, in the numerous bookstores that surround the University of Florida, pornographic magazines may be purchased which range from the milder so-called "soft-core" to the more extreme forms depicting violent and sado-masochistic acts.

Recent acts of extreme violence surrounding the campus, which have involved at least 5 victims of murder within a 48 hour period, should cause people to wonder if the violence and pornography are related.

The first three of the five victims were young women in their teens. Police on August 28, identified the first two victims as college freshmen 17 and 18 years old. The third victim was a Santa Fe Community College student, age 18.

In three of the cases, gruesome mutilations occurred. Police have confirmed that several of the victims were found nude and covered with blood. According to Gainesville Chief of Police Wayland Clifton, every one of the victims is believed to be connected to one or two suspects.

An atmosphere of fear is prevalent among students walking along University Avenue in Gainesville. At every corner beefed-up security is responding at the request of the city and county. Police cars line every street around the campus.

University of Florida President John Lombardi called the murders "random and horrific" and said that the university's first day of school was filled with sudden horror.

Campus Leaders Describe "A Spirit of Fear"

In a locally televised news conference, University President John Lombardi said that a "spirit of fear" has paralyzed the students and the community of Gainesville. Many students, afraid to sleep at night, have left the area. Local pawn shops have reportedly sold massive numbers of guns to students desiring to protect themselves. Tear gas or "mace" is readily available around campus.

Several pastors of local area churches called public prayer meetings in response to the wave of horror that has swept Gainesville. David Wead, of North Central Baptist Church, held a campus prayer vigil which was covered by the Cable News Network.

Father John Gillespie, of St. Augustine's Church held a prayer vigil attended by almost 100 students. Father Gillespie wanted to sooth the feelings of fear and anger among the students, yet feared that the large number of guns and knives that has been proliferated on campus may cause additional problems.

"Obviously, the primary concern is to take the steps that people feel are necessary to protect themselves," said Gillespie. "However, widespread in our society is the problem of violence, and a lot of it is traceable to the edginess with which people use weapons. I am afraid of what might happen months down the road with thousands more guns in our community now loaded. We are that more vulnerable to each other."

Link to Pornography?

In recent cases involving serial homicide, an obsessive addiction to pornography has been associated with the aberrant personality of the killers. It is shocking, therefore, that pornographic magazines, movies and books are widely available in the area surrounding the campus.

Allen Wildmon, public relations director of the American Family Association, gave several examples of studies relating serial homicide to an addiction to pornography, including studies at the University of Utah, the University of Houston and the Surgeon General's report on pornography.

Dr. Victor Kline of the University of Utah described several stages observed in the addiction process. Kline noted that pornography can be proven to be psychologically addictive with the subject craving harder and harder forms in order to gratify the obsession.

- * The first stage usually involves the "soft-core" magazines such as Playboy and Penthouse.

- * A second stage involves the addiction becoming more severe with the subject craving harder and more "bizarre" material.

- * Third, a stage of addiction to "weird" porn evolves in which the addict views pictures of children, sexual acts involving animals and violent sex.

- * A fourth stage of acting out the fantasies, including the extreme forms violent behavior, is the final result of the addiction.

A study conducted by Dolf Zillman the University of Indiana and Jennings Bryant of the University of Houston in 1984, found evidence that shows that exposure to non-violent porn can lead to an interest in violent pornography.

In the President's Report on Pornography (1988), Attorney General Edwin Meese concluded that there is a causal relationship between hard core pornography and serial homicide. The personal testimonies of the convicted murderers Gary Bishop and Ted Bundy have also confirmed this association.

Utah State Prison inmate Gary Bishop, convicted of five known deaths of young boys, ages 5-13, gave this testimony: "I am a homosexual pedophile convicted of murder. Pornography was a determining factor in my downfall ... For me, pornography was like lighting a fuse on a stick of dynamite. I became stimulated and had to gratify my urges or explode."

In an interview with the nationally syndicated radio program, Focus on the Family, convicted serial killer Ted Bundy told Dr. James Dobson a similar story: "This is the message I want to get across - that as a young boy ... certainly I encountered in the local grocery store, in the local drug store, the porn that people call 'soft core.'"

As he grew older, Ted Bundy said his obsession drove him to mutilate and murder young women for sexual gratification. "In the beginning it fuels this kind of thought process. Then, at a certain time, it is instrumental, I would say crystalizing, making it into something that is almost like a separate entity inside, a building up of this destructive energy. You keep craving harder porn."

With all of the evidence that suggests that the homicidal thoughts of the most notorious serial killers of our day were fueled by pornography, it is baffling why porn is still widely available in our nation. At the University of Florida, where magazine racks in the larger bookstores abound with pornography, a sadistic psychopath has terrorized the campus and the surrounding community.

Already news sources have compared the killer to Ted Bundy. A local newspaper with the headline "Lust Killer" emblazoned on the front page was available a few days after the murders. Only time will tell whether or not the murderer was motivated by the same sickness that plagued the minds of Bishop and Bundy, however, the availability of pornography in our society is an indictment against us.

How long will local communities refuse to raise a standard against an addiction that has been well proven to cause mental instability and violent tendencies?

Playboy Clubs Close Down

CHICAGO, IL (FR) - The last Playboy Club in the U.S. closed its doors on July 31st of this year, marking the end of a chapter in America's moral history. Judging from the dramatic decrease in sales of Playboy in recent years, it appears that publisher Hugh Hefner's company is in trouble.

During the heyday of Playboy magazine in the 1970s, 22 Playboy Clubs flourished around the country, offering dining and "male entertainment" for its clientele. But changes in the business world and in standards of morality began to take their toll on the establishments before 1980. Hefner turned over the leadership of Playboy Enterprises to his daughter Christie, who tried to revive the Playboy Club division by starting five new franchises in the Midwest in the early 1980s.

Hugh Hefner presided over the closing of three of the company-operated clubs in 1986, and the Des Moines and Omaha establishments were shut down in May of this year. The last of the clubs, located in the Hilton Inn in Lansing, Michigan, once employed 45 "bunnies." According to Time magazine (July 25, 1988), the scanty outfits and cottontails donned by the last remaining 12 bunnies were packed away for good after their last day of work in July.

But the closing of the last of the clubs is being downplayed by Playboy executives, who say that they are emphasizing other aspects of their multi-faceted business. Corporate Communications Administrator Terry Thomcison, speaking from Playboy's corporate offices in Chicago, did admit that total sales of the magazine have dropped considerably since their peak year of 1972. In that year, total monthly sales hit 6.8 million copies; that number today has been cut to 3.7 million.

Thomcison also stated that the decision by the Southland Corporation to pull pornography from the shelves of its 7-Eleven convenience stores did have negative repercussions on Playboy. "Newsstand sales plummeted in 1986," she related, adding that a lawsuit was filed by Playboy Enterprises against the federal government because of former Attorney General Ed Meese's involvement in encouraging the Southland decision. Playboy won the case, but their attempt to win damage claims is still tied up in a tough court battle.

Thomcison emphasized that Playboy Enterprises is now focusing more attention on its video department, citing that America has now become a more "broadcast-oriented" society. This is the major reason given to explain the decrease in sales of the magazine since 1972.

Playboy's profits are falling

CHICAGO, IL (FR) - Playboy Enterprises, apparently bending to pressure from anti-pornography activists, is taking another obvious step to change its corporate image. After several years of declining magazine sales, and the 1988 closing of all of its Playboy Clubs, the company's video department is now reporting huge losses in cable subscribers.

When the "Playboy Channel" began several years ago - offering a mixture of pornographic movies and documentaries - the format was touted as the future of Playboy. But sources record that the video format has been a money loser from the beginning. The number of cable subscribers has dropped more than 30 percent to about 400,000 from a peak of 743,000 in 1984.

This has prompted corporate president Christie Hefner to take a second look at the Playboy image itself and how it should be portrayed to the public. Plans are now underway to change the television programming from edited X-rated films to more mainstream R-rated films, and to rename the channel because of viewer and operator opposition to the Playboy image.

The new channel, according to Hefner, will still carry some of the Playboy Video Centerfold and sex-oriented talk shows, but it will be called "Night Life" and will be co-sponsored by another company. "If we can make it happen, it has the most significant profit upside in the next three years of anything we're working on right now," said Hefner.

Playboy publicity spokesperson Terry Tomcison, speaking from her office in Chicago, confirmed that the company is seeking to appeal to a "broader audience." She also added that co-sponsors for the new format have not been found at this point, and that the company has "nothing new to announce" about its plans until the new format is fully funded.

Cable operators around the U.S. apparently plan to continue avoiding the Playboy Channel. Lynn Skinner, customer service director for Cox Cable in Oklahoma City, reports that her company dropped the channel in 1985. "We look at what the viewer wants," said Skinner, "and we had too many religious people calling in to complain about it." Skinner also related that, after the channel was dropped, no one ever called in to say that they wanted the Playboy Channel reinstated in the programming selection.

Rich Gilman, director of studio operations for Heritage Cablevision in Des Moines, Iowa, said that his 1985 decision to drop Playboy was strictly a "business decision. We can only offer four pay channels, and the ones we offer reach a higher subscriber level than Playboy did." Gilman stated that subscribers to the Playboy Channel tended to subscribe for a few months and then drop the service, whereas subscribers to other services like H.B.O. and Cinemax are usually long-term customers.

When asked whether Heritage Cablevision might reconsider its decision if Playboy changes its format, Gilman said, "We have no interest in carrying another pay service. It was not a good business decision."

Community protest against pornography is growing

When the 7-Eleven convenience store chain removed Playboy and Penthouse from its shelves in 1986, a national grassroots movement to eradicate pornography received a boost of encouragement. Since this key victory, North Carolina - the state dubbed "Smut Capitol of the U.S." by federal attorneys and agents - has removed almost all pornography businesses due to enactment of the toughest anti-porn laws in the U.S. Several major corporations have also stopped distributing it in the U. S. since the 7-Eleven decision.

The Southland Corporation, which owns the 7-Eleven chain, said the decision to remove pornography from its shelves was based on consumer surveys and the 1986 U.S. Attorney General's Commission report which demonstrated a correlation between pornography and organized crime.

There has been a growing number of community leaders who have focused their anti-porn efforts on the Holiday Inn hotel chain - now said to be the nation's largest distributor of satellite pornography. Individuals, churches, and businesses have begun to boycott Holiday Inns for showing in-house pornographic movies. David F. Schultz Associates, Ltd., of Barington, Illinois, Medi-bill Inc. of Walnut Creek, California, and others have set company policy mandating a boycott of Holiday Inns, and many churches have cancelled functions and reservations.

Robert Brannon, vice president of corporate communications for Holiday Inns, denied that the company was airing pornographic movies. This angered a group of 18 Christian leaders, who said that they had reviewed excerpts of films which had scenes of female nudity, female bondage and torture, orgies, explicit rape, and other graphic sexual situations. The group sent Brannon a response to refute his statement.

While Holiday Inn has stood its ground against community pressure, over 26 of its hotels have decided to stop showing pornographic movies because of customer complaints. The Miller family stayed a weekend during Thanksgiving at the Holiday Inn in Hutchinson, Kansas, and complained about the movies. A few months later, they called to cancel reservations their in-laws made, but the manager told them that the movies had been cancelled because of a customer complaint.

Recently, the state of North Carolina passed a package of legislation which sets national precedent in its effectiveness in eradicating pornography. After the bill was passed, 19 pornography shops closed in one day, representing at least $10 million worth of annual business.

A citizen's group called "Concerned Charlotteans," organized by Joseph Chambers, was very instrumental in lobbying for enactment of the law. "Somewhere between 500 and 700 adult book stores were doing business across the state," he said. "Not only were they selling violence and degrading pornography, but were operating homosexual brothels. The description of the acts transpiring in those establishments is too degrading to describe."

The most pivotal victory in North Carolina was achieved on July 17, 1987. Reuben Sturman of Cleveland, Ohio - known around the U.S. as the "King of Smut" - still had 19 stores in a holdout operation doing business from Gastonia to Fayetteville. "Two of the lieutenants of this enterprise were facing a possible 123 years prison sentence," Chambers related. "Under a plea bargain agreement, they closed all 19 operations by 5 p.m. that very day. Apparently, Reuben Sturman had been closed out of one entire state at one sweep."

The newly enacted statute defines pornography according to the Miller vs. California Supreme Court decision; institutes a three part test to determine whether the material is obscene; and has a provision for confiscation of profits, said Chambers.

Concerned Charlotteans has also won 15 straight victories in the local court system against smut peddlers, including the removal of pornography from the "Starvin' Marvin" convenience store chain. "I have received many ugly letters and telephone calls, and two death threats," said Chambers, "but the victory of July 17, 1987, was more than adequate compensation."

This new anti-pornography trend is growing, according to Don Wildmon, president of American Family Association, "Four years ago, getting people - even Christian people - involved in the fight for decency was like pulling out teeth. Now, however there is a growing number of people and organizations addressing this issue," Wildmon explained. "Hardly a day goes by without someone writing us and telling us of a victory over pornography. And if there is not a report of a victory, there is a report of a battle starting in their community."

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - President Ronald Reagan recently introduced a package of anti-pornography legislation to Congress called the "Child Protection and Obscenity Enforcement Act of 1987." The bill's two-fold purpose is to update the federal law to take into account new technologies and ways of doing business employed by the pornography industry, and to remove loopholes and weaknesses in the law, which have given criminals in this area the upper hand far too long.

The package was developed in response to the Attorney General's 1986 Commission on Pornography. In the last several years, distributors of obscenity and child pornography have expanded into new areas," said Reagan. "They are employing new technologies and reaching new audiences."

"This is how any business grows and develops, except that this business is illegal," he said. "This administration is putting the purveyors of illegal obscenity and child pornography on notice: your industry's days are numbered."

The bill would have the following effects: it prohibits distribution of obscenity through computers, cable TV, and phone lines (dial-a-porn), prohibits the selling of children by parents or guardians for the production of child pornography, requires producers of pornography to keep accurate and complete records of the ages and names of persons in films with the burden of proof for legal age of actors and actresses placed on the movie producers.

In May 1984, the national commission to study the scope and nature of pornography to the U.S. was formed. After 14 months of research, the Attorney General's Commission released its final report in July 1986 that contained recommendations for changes in Federal Law. Attorney General Edwin Meese III announced a seven-point initiative to address the obscenity and child pornography problem.

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - Former U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren Burger told 300 religious leaders with the Religious Alliance Against Pornography (RAAP) gathered in Washington March 1-2 that "Nothing could be clearer from the Court than that obscenity is not protected speech." Representatives of major Protestant, Catholic and Jewish groups attended the conference, which was chaired by Dr. Jerry Kirk, president of the National Coalition Against Pornography (N-CAP).

RAAP is an effort to mobilize churches and church leaders to renounce hard-core pornography, encourage the passage of child protection legislation, and participate in a national campaign to promote awareness of the harmful effects of pornography. Those attending the conference heard a wide variety of religious leaders address the need for a stepped-up war against pornography.

Joseph Cardinal Bernardine, vice chairman of RAAP, told members of the Washington press corps that "we are against censorship, but we are also against obscenity which is not protected by the First Amendment."

Clinical psychologist Dr. Victor Cline outlined the steps taken by hundreds of men he treated following their conviction for sex-related crimes. Cline said that viewing pornographic material leads to sex-related addiction followed by departure from the values an individual has previously held. The appetite for pornography grows, and the addict finds himself desiring more and more violent and bizarre material until they finally act out some of the fantasies they have become obsessed with through their exposure to obscene material. "The more intelligent the man is, the more vulnerable he is to acting out his fantasies," explained Cline.

William Weld, assistant attorney general, outlined current activities being undertaken by the U.S. Justice Department's Obscenity Enforcement Unit. That unit is completing the training of 5,000 individuals who will enforce obscenity laws and prosecute offenders. The unit provides support for District U.S. Attorneys and local law enforcement units who need expert legal advice, including supplying experienced trial attorneys. The unit is also involved in long-range planning toward the goal of dismantling the obscenity industry.

Other activities of the Obscenity Enforcement Unit which were outlined by Weld include litigation. In 1987 there were 79 indictments of purveyors of obscenity - many under anti-racketeering statutes, which allow the proceeds of the lucrative porn industry to be seized. Over 40 U.S. attorneys are now prosecuting and investigating obscenity cases. Indictments of child pornographers have risen dramatically, from three in 1983 to 244 in 1987.

The Justice Department is also pushing for legislation that would expand the provisions of racketeering laws to cover high-tech dissemination of obscenity and the selling of children for pornography.

TUPELO, MS (EP) - Philip Morris/General Foods and RJR Nabisco are the top advertising sponsors of pornographic magazines, according to a study done by the American Family Association (AFA).

AFA studied companies supporting Playboy and Penthouse with advertising, and found that Philip Morris/General Foods placed 115 pages of advertising with those magazines in the year ending August of 1987. RJR Nabisco bought 92 pages during the same time period.

"At $50,000 per page, Philip Morris/General Foods supplied these publications with $5.75 million in one year, while RJR Nabisco spent $4.6 million in advertising money to support the publications," said the Rev. Don Wildmon, the United Methodist minister who serves as executive director of AFA. "It is ironic that these two companies, which depend so heavily on the family for their income, would spend more than $10 million supporting two of the most anti-family publications in America."

Wildmon noted that both publications are known for their advocacy of liberal drug policies; Playboy magazine has spent thousands of dollars in an effort to legalize drug use.

"It is incredible that with every purchase of Maxwell House coffees and Ritz crackers by family members, money is being provided to promote the anti-family porno and drug philosophies of these magazines."

The bulk of advertising support for porn magazines comes from liquor and tobacco companies, according to AFA. Nearly all automobile makers have stopped advertising in pornographic magazines, with only Honda and Toyota appearing in the most recent AFA survey. Both Playboy and Penthouse have suffered serious circulation losses in the past three years - due in part to successful efforts to persuade convenience store chains not to stock the magazines - and have suffered losses in advertising revenue as a result.

"Without the advertising support of Philip Morris/General Foods and RJR Nabisco, these publications would be in very serious financial trouble," Wildmon concluded.

Advertisers Drop Trash TV

TUPELO, MS (FR) - Major television networks and advertisers are feeling the pressure of citizens upset over "trash T.V.," according to the leader of the largest grassroots activist network aimed at decency on the airwaves. ABC recently cancelled two programs, "Crimes of Passion II" and "Scandals II," while NBC cancelled a made-for-television movie, "The Prize Pulitzer" - because the programs exploited sex and violence in a graphic and brutal way. "It was the first time in the history of television that programs were cancelled because advertisers said 'no!'" said Rev. Don Wildmon, director of CLEAR-TV (Christian Leaders for Responsible Television).

"The advertisers said no because they were aware that CLEAR-TV was monitoring TV shows during the 'sweeps' period. The group of ministers and churches is also planning to announce "a one-year boycott of one or more of the leading sponsors of sex, violence, profanity and anti-Christian stereotyping," said Rev. Wildmon. The Chrysler Corporation and Sears, Roebuck & Co., pulled spots from NBC's "Nightingales" series after the American Nurses Association mounted a massive letter-writing campaign against advertisers. The Mennen Company also pulled its commercials from the prime-time show "Thirtysomething."

NBC Entertainment President Brandon Tartikoff told Advertising Age that he was beefing up the network's broadcast standards operation in response to this trend. "I do think there is a shift in audience taste, and we'd be foolish not to listen to that feedback," he said.

He explained, "Anytime you experiment or try to push the boundaries of what's acceptable, you're going to find sometimes you push too far. We're not in the business of pushing boundaries. It would be a frivolous enterprise to be pushing the boundaries back when the audience is saying, 'I can't watch this with my family because it's on at 9 p.m. and my 11-year-old is still up.'"

According to Advertising Age, the networks may end up paying for their mistakes, while advertisers may rebel against the lenient network programming standards by withholding ad support from certain shows. Some clients are up in arms because of offensive programming.

"There's going to be some reluctance to commit to any shows that look potentially offensive in any way, and in those shows, the units may go at any price," said Michael Drexler, executive vice-president of Bozell, Jacobs, Kenyon & Eckhardt in New York.

"The networks have gone too far," added Paul Isaacson, executive vice-president of Young & Rubicam in New York. "They lost support, but now NBC ... the leading network in this, has recognized client attitudes. They recognize they stepped over the line and will step back. This could temper the issue and mean it is hotter right now than it will be."

Isaacson continued, "The networks also had to do something because the entire industry is colored by the 'trash TV' syndrome. It gives TV a bad name, and people are conditioned to be unreceptive."

NBC's Tartikoff responded by saying that "problem shows" are going to be the first to feel the squeeze. Advertisers and agencies have stepped up efforts to screen shows. Coca-Cola and McDonald's, among other companies, have asked their agencies to screen the shows more diligently, according to Advertising Age.

"The next three years will be the moment of truth for the Big 3 TV networks," a Procter & Gamble executive told Advertising Age. "We've told networks that no one wants them to succeed more than us - there's a definite need for a viable national medium. But the quality of programming is holding us back. Believe me, it's not an issue that's unique to P&G."

He also said that Procter & Gamble has found it increasingly difficult to make family-oriented programming buys on network TV. The Ralston Purina Company stopped advertising its Eveready batteries on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," and General Mills pulled its ads because of questionable content in certain skits on the comedy show.

Although some industry executives expect the furor over program content to die down, CLEAR-TV's Wildmon is planning to announce a boycott either this month or July. He told Advertising Age that the networks have passed the line. "They've been pushing it and pushing it, and now there is more disgust than I've ever seen. The response rate to our mailings is 35 percent to 40 percent higher than two years ago. It all boils down to programming."

"There's been a proliferation of programming coupled with the sort of frantic reaching for more bizarre spectacular or dramatic material to attract viewers," said Jerry Welsh, president of Welsh Marketing Associates. "It's been an assault on good taste. There's a limit and then the backlash, which can be considerable."

The Battle for the Family

11/88

The greatest war ever waged in this country is currently under way against the American family and is increasing in intensity. So far, more families have been destroyed as a result of this war than all of the military conflicts in which this nation has been engaged. All indications are that the casualty rate will increase over the balance of this century. This is a strange war because the number one "battleground" giving rise to the greatest number of casualties is largely uncontested territory.

No-fault divorce is the number one destroyer of families. No-fault divorce statutes are present in all fifty states and none is currently being seriously contested within the court system. Tragically, the Church in America is virtually silent concerning this issue. None of the major denominations has targeted this matter with a view to pressuring legislators to remedy it.

Last year in the state of Texas, several Legislative committees investigated the impact of gambling on the family. Yet, there was not one legislative committee in the entire United States which did an investigation of the impact of no-fault divorce on the family. Such an investigation would reveal, among many other things, the cost to the taxpayers in the proliferation of courts and their support personnel to handle these divorces and related matters such as child support and custody issues. A return to the fault-based divorce laws would eliminate perhaps four-fifths of these courts and their personnel.

Economically, divorce is a disaster for the family. One of the spouses, if not both, usually end up facing extremely difficult financial problems. The cost of dealing with the physical and emotional problems arising out of divorce are astronomical. Adults and children involved in a divorce have a greater than 90 percent probability that they will experience medical problems requiring medication or treatment attributable to the stresses of the divorce.

Job performance and educational development are also significantly affected. Recently, a teacher of remedial reading for elementary school students asked her students how many of them had experienced a divorce of their parents. Every hand went up in a class of twenty-six. None of these students has a learning disability necessitating remedial reading help.

Chief Justice Brown, writing for the Supreme Court of Texas, in Grisby vs. Reib, declared that: "The contract of marriage is the most important of all human transactions. It is the very basis of the whole fabric of civilized society." These words were written in 1913 and are as true today as they were then. We have seen the consequences of not honoring the wisdom of these words.

In 1948, the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Texas wrote in Sheffield vs. Sheffield one of the most prophetic messages on the importance of protecting marriage. Chief Justice Hemphill noted that the happiness of married life "depends upon its indissolubility" and that government is charged with responsibility that no marriage is dissolved by "mutual consent" or for "light or trivial causes."

He stated that "the prospect of easy separation foment the most frivolous quarrels and disgusts into deadly animosity." This is precisely what has happened in the United States. Judge Hemphill made the concluding observation that when husbands and wives know they cannot end their relationship by mutual consent or for light and frivolous reasons, "they become good husbands and wives; for necessity is a powerful master in teaching the duties it imposes."

The absurdity of a "no-fault" approach to settling marital disputes is clearly demonstrated by considering the results if such reasoning were to be translated to other contractual (covenantal) relationships. What if the civil government, ordained by God to enforce voluntary contracts, simply ceased to do so? What if all questions concerning business contracts were to be resolved on the basis of "no-fault transactions," in which no party could be held responsible for its actions?

It is precisely this question of responsibility which is at issue here. God holds all people accountable for their behavior before Him (II Corinthians 5:10); the civil government, as the administrator of God's justice in the public arena, must also view its citizenry as responsible for their actions. If a divorce is to be granted, it must be because the behavior of one (or both) of the spouses is in such clear violation of God's standard as to warrant the dissolution of the marriage; not because they "want out," "found somebody else," or have "irreconcilable differences."

Will God's people speak out and take action or will we allow this injustice to continue unchecked? The Bible states clearly in II Chronicles 7:14 that the destiny of our nation and of the families that compose it rests upon the shoulders of believers, not the unbelievers. If we are to see the healing of our families we must give attention to such life-threatening disorders as this. Like it or not, we will be accountable before God in this matter.

Divorce Rates Higher for Live-in Couples

MADISON, WI (EP) - Though living together in a "trial marriage" before officially tying the knot is widely believed to increase marital stability, recent studies show that Americans who live together before marriage separate and divorce much more frequently than traditional couples.

A study by two University of Wisconsin researchers found that within a decade of their wedding, 38 percent of those who had lived together had split up, significantly more than the 27 percent of those who got married before living together.

In analyzing data from a 1987-89 federal survey, researchers Larry Bumpass and James Sweet also found the number of people who live together before marriage continues to climb, particularly for the people who marry more than once.

Bumpass said the findings don't say that people who have lived together before marriage have less happy marriages than traditional couples. He suggests, however, that "at the same level of unhappiness they're more unwilling to accept divorce as a solution."

DETROIT, MI (EP) - The owner of Domino's Pizza, a giant 500-store franchise operation, recently donated $50,000 to Operation Rescue, the pro-life direct action group which stages massive sit-in protests at abortion clinics, often closing them for hours at a time. Domino's Farms, the parent company of the pizza chain, also donated $10,000 to the group.

Domino's Pizza owner Tom Monaghan, who also owns the Detroit Tigers, has been speaking out against abortion in recent years. Domino's Pizza spokesperson Kerry McNulty said of the gift to Operation Rescue, "I don't know why he chose that particular group," but speculated it was "out of personal conviction."

The National Organization of Women (NOW) is trying to mount a feminist boycott of Domino's Pizza. "One day we were buying it, and the next day we were mad at them," explained NOW press liaison Colleen Dermody. "This is serious. Feminists live on Domino's Pizza." The boycott was also promoted in a recent issue of Ms. magazine.

An early April broadcast of a Minneapolis talk radio program offered a look at how the boycott is being received. A caller urged participation in the boycott, and said he would take his one-pizza-a-week business elsewhere. A few minutes later the father of five teenagers called to say that while he didn't prefer pizzas from Domino's he would now be taking them his nine-pizza-a-week business to show support for the gift to Operation Rescue, and to make up for people like the first caller.

Vice President Quayle and the Murphy Brown Speech

What he actually said:

8/92

Posted as "the world's greatest fool" by late night comedians for his misspelling of "potatoe" and his remarks about the Murphy Brown sitcom, the Vice President has suffered in the polls as a result of media backlash. But just how laughable was the real thing? Here is an excerpt from the infamous "Murphy Brown speech" so that you can judge for yourself:

Right now the failure of our families is hurting America deeply. When families fall, society falls. The anarchy and lack of structure in our inner cities are testament to how quickly civilization falls apart when the family foundation cracks. Children need love and discipline. A welfare check is not a husband. The state is not a father. It is from parents that children come to understand values and themselves as men and women, mothers and fathers.

And for those concerned about children growing up in poverty, we should know this: marriage is probably the best anti-poverty program of them all. Among families headed by married couples today, there is a poverty rate of 5.7 percent. But 33.4 percent of families are headed by a single mother are in poverty today.

Nature abhors a vacuum. Where there are no mature, responsible men around to teach boys how to become good men, gangs serve in their place. In fact, gangs have become a surrogate family for much of a generation of inner-city boys. I recently visited with some former gang members in Albuquerque, New Mexico. In a private meeting they told me why they had joined gangs. These teenage boys said that gangs gave them a sense of security. They made them feel wanted, and useful. They got support from their friends. And, they said, "It was like having a family." "Like family" - unfortunately, that says it all.

The system perpetuates itself as these young men father children whom they have no intention of caring for, by women whose welfare checks support them. Teenage girls, mired in the same hopelessness, lack sufficient motive to say no to this trap.

Answers to our problems won't be easy. We can start by dismantling a welfare system that encourages dependency and subsidizes broken families. We can attach conditions - such as school attendance, or work - to welfare. We can limit the time a recipient gets benefits. We can stop penalizing marriage for welfare mothers. We can enforce child support payment.

Ultimately, however, marriage is a moral issue that requires cultural consensus, and the use of social sanctions. Bearing babies irresponsibly is, simply, wrong. Failure to support children one has fathered is wrong. We must be unequivocal about this.

It doesn't help matters when prime time TV has Murphy Brown - a character who supposedly epitomizes today's intelligent, highly paid, professional woman - mocking the importance of a father, by bearing a child alone, and calling it just another "lifestyle choice."

I know it is not fashionable to talk about moral values, but we need to do it. Even though our cultural leaders in Hollywood, network TV, the national newspapers routinely jeer at them, I think that most of us in this room know that some things are good, and other things are wrong. Now it's time to make the discussion public.

It's time to talk again about family, hard work, integrity and personal responsibility. We cannot be embarrassed out of our belief that two parents, married to each other, are better in most cases for children than one. That honest work is better than hand-outs - or crime. That we are our brother's keepers. That it's worth making an effort, even when rewards aren't immediate.

So I think the time has come to renew our public commitment to our Judeo-Christian values - in our churches and synagogues, our civic organizations and our schools. We are, as our children recite each morning, "one nation under God." That's a useful framework for acknowledging a duty and an authority higher than our own pleasures and personal ambitions.

REMARKS BY WILLIAM BENNETT

FORMER SECRETARY OF EDUCATION AT THE REPUBLICAN PARTY CONVENTION'S NOMINATION OF DAN QUAYLE FOR U.S. VICE PRESIDENT ON AUGUST 19, 1992

HOUSTON, Texas - Thank you. Let me start by departing from my text. As a trained philosopher and as a sometimes objective commentator for the news media, I'd like to say I think this is a whole lot more interesting than New York.

This is a diverse party in many ways - intellectually. And we can be very proud of that fact. That other party has nothing on us. It's late Summer in Houston at the Astrodome. We're in the process now of getting our team on the field. And we are in this week determining the nature of the game we're about to play.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am proud to stand before you tonight to renominate Dan Quayle as Vice President of the United States. Dan Quayle - I know Dan Quayle. Dan Quayle is a friend of mine and he's a friend of yours and he's a great public servant. I'm particularly pleased to have the honor today because of Dan Quayle's success in sparking a much needed debate about our most important social issues, the values by which we live and the values we convey to our children.

Remember, nothing - nothing more powerfully determines the shape of a child's life than his values, his internal process, his beliefs, his sense of right and wrong. It is the child's values, more than his race, his class, his sex, his ethnicity, his neighborhood, his genes, his background. It is the values that a child is taught that will more determine that child's fate.

And, consistent with our theme tonight, I remind you of what you already know. It is given to families preeminently to provide those values. Now having been buried beneath the Reagan and Bush landslides of the last three presidential elections, the Democratic Party is now eager to wrap itself in the banner of traditional values. But to be a champion of traditional values requires more than rhetoric.

The American people will judge the two parties not only by what they say but by what they do, by what they stand for, and by what they will fight for. So let the Democratic Party invoke the mantra of a new covenant. Our grand old party will continue to hold to our sacred old covenant and the ideals which they embody. America does not need false prophets bearing new covenants. What we need are men and women of character who adhere to old principles.

Family values represent a great dividing line between the parties. This line, be sure to remember, involves very specific matters of policy. For example, we believe that families should be able to send their children to schools that they choose. Not all teachers are parents but all parents are teachers - children's first teachers, children's all but indispensable teachers. And those parents should be able to send their children to schools that affirm the most deeply held convictions of parents.

Second, we believe that our nation's public schools should not be doing things like handing out condoms to our children. Educators should not be allowed to usurp the authority from parents in this and other sensitive areas. Remember, the child is not a ward given to the state for its nurture. The child is a gift of God, given in trust to his parents. And our schools should treat our young people as gifts of God, not as subjects of social experimentation or as young animals in heat.

On our side of the cultural divide line we believe that our government should not subsidize pornography and obscenity. We do not believe that filth is a cultural achievement worthy of public support. Our culture has become increasingly coarse. It has begun to fray our social fabric. Our children have suffered from this. There are, after all, some things that children simply should not see.

It's bad enough that so much of what passes for art and entertainment these days is the rampant promiscuity and the casual cruelty of the movies and television in much of our popular culture. But to ask us to pay for it is to add insult to injury. We will not be intimidated by putative cultural guardians into accepting either the insult or the injury.

We believe, as well, that more of our children should have the opportunity to be raised with fathers in their lives. Young boys and girls who do not grow up with fathers are far more likely to drop out of school, to become promiscuous, to go on welfare, to use drugs, and to commit crime.

In saying this we do not disparage the good, noble and sometimes great effort of single or divorced mothers. I know of what I speak. My mother was divorced and raised my brother and me. Later in my life a stepmother intervened with love and affection and care.

As Barbara Bush said earlier, it is this idea of the family that we embrace; mothers and fathers, stepmothers and stepfathers, adoptive mothers and fathers, foster parents, grandparents, uncles, aunts, brothers and sisters.

So in talking about the family we will not disparage the noble efforts of good women. But in noting the decline of the American family we will say something to the men of America. And to the men of America we say this, man to man. Fatherhood involves a lot more than getting a woman pregnant. Real men, real fatherhood means love and commitment and sacrifice and a willingness to share responsibility and not walking away from one's children.

Let me, as well, very briefly address the tumultuous issue of alternative lifestyles. Heaven knows there are lots of them. This is a free country. Within very broad limits people may live as they wish. And yet, we believe that some ways of living are better than others. Better because they bring more meaning to our lives, to the lives of others, and to our fragile fallible human condition. Marriage and parenthood should be held up because between marriage between husband and wife and in fatherhood and motherhood come blessings that cannot be won in any other way.

We believe these things and we believe them strongly because we believe the family to be our most important institution. We believe our families to be the first, the best and the original department of health, education and welfare. In our time, efforts must be made to preserve and strengthen the family. Heroic efforts, if necessary. And we, this party, will make those efforts.

Let me be clear about one thing. When we talk about traditional family values we are not using code words. We are not seeking a political wedge issue and we are not speaking to demean or to belittle others. Rather, we're seeking to honor and to affirm what is best in us, what Lincoln has called the better angels of our nation.

But there are differences between our two political parties and the differences are real and the differences have consequences. So we Republicans will continue candidly to address the issue of values. We will be civil but we will not yield. We will not be discouraged from discussing right and wrong without embarrassment. We will not be discouraged from defining religion as the anchor of morality, and we will never stop affirming that all real education is the architecture of the soul.

This understanding of what we hold dear, of what we believe, has far too few defenders in our public life. One of the reasons that's the case is that those who candidly speak out on behalf of these matters become the object of assault and caricature by their critics from the adversary culture.

Judging from the Democratic Convention it may now have become politically correct to say you are in favor of the values of family and personal morality. But what is not so politically correct is to be precise about what you mean. What is not politically correct is to stand up against the critics. What is not politically correct is to say that there are some things that we stand for and there are some things that we will not stand for.

Ladies and gentlemen, it may not come as a great shock to you, but let me say it anyway. I am very proud to tell you that Dan Quayle is not politically correct.

Dan Quayle has stood for family values. Dan Quayle has stood up against his critics. He has been principled. He has been courageous. And in response, he has been belittled. But he has not been silenced. In Dan Quayle we have had a case study in courage under fire. Through it all this good and decent man has demonstrated his grace, his resolve, his resilience. He has earned our respect and we will stand by our man.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am pleased and honored to place in nomination for the Vice Presidency of the United States our friend Dan Quayle.

Rescue Mission at Cherry Hill Abortion Clinic

BINGHAMTON, NY (FR) - Over 200 people were arrested in November of 1987 in the nation's largest "rescue mission" for unborn children, conducted at the Cherry Hill Women's Center in Cherry Hill, New Jersey. The protestors, who flew in from 19 different states at their own expense, came to the clinic to be trained in the civil disobedience tactic of barring pregnant women from abortion facilities in order to save the lives of unborn babies. The protest was organized by Operation Rescue, a pro-life group based in Binghamton, New York.

The 350 protesters were obviously very successful in their efforts, since the Cherry Hill Center did not perform any abortions on Saturday, November 28, the day of the protest. Three other clinics in nearby Philadelphia also closed for the day because the operators knew that the protesters were in the area.

"Operation Rescue" had a secret rally at an undisclosed location on the night prior to the sit-in. Protesters said they did not know where the event would take place until their 5 a.m. meeting in Philadelphia. After the rally, Operation Rescue's assistant director Gary Leber said the 'rescuers' drove across the river to the Cherry Hill facility.

Police began arresting people after 10 a.m., when they were threatened with a lawsuit by an attorney representing the clinic. "It was very peaceful," however, said Leber, "and police told(the director) that they would have to start arresting people because of the threatened lawsuit." To prolong the event, the protesters were advised to allow the police to drag them away. The police assured Leber that they would not use force or handcuffs, and they left 40 men behind because they did not want to drag them.

The county jail was overflowing with people, since the police spent almost six hours arresting protesters. About 350 people were sitting in front of the clinic, singing and praying, before the arrests began. One of the policemen took a busload of people to a nearby 7-Eleven store to purchase snacks for the cooperative rescue participants.

Hearings in the case are scheduled for January and February of this year, and those charged with trespassing will face a maximum fine of $500 or six months in jail. So far, protesters have vowed that they will not pay fines.

Leber said that the Cherry Hill protest was the first in a series of national rescues that his organization is planning. "We prefer to use the term 'rescue'" Leber said, "instead of 'sit-in' because we view it as biblical obedience over civil disobedience. We aren't here to break a law but to obey God."

The Cherry Hill clinic has an average of 35 abortions a day, but there was no particular reason why it was singled out as the first target of the national rescue effort. "Our rule of thumb in selecting a clinic is to go where the lives of unborn children are threatened." He also said that Operation Rescue wants to encourage more than letter writing or marching. "If mothers see that Christians are willing to risk arrest for their child," he said, "they begin to see the value of their baby's life."

NEW YORK, NY (FR) - Over 1,500 pro-life protesters from 22 different states travelled to New York City in early May of this year, successfully closing down three major medical centers during the day of the highly publicized "rescue." About 1,300 of the protesters were arrested, including Catholic Bishop Austin Vaughn, 15 Catholic priests, four nuns, two rabbis, and Mark Bavaro, an All-Pro tight end for the New York Giants.

"This demonstrated the range of interfaith solidarity for unborn children," said spokeswoman Julie Loesch.

The first center closed down was the Herbert Schwartz Clinic, the largest in Manhattan, where abortions are performed up to the second trimester. Queen Women's Medical Office was closed down for one day along with the Women's Choice Gynecology Service on Long Island.

Between 300 to 400 children are aborted everyday in New York, according to the Alan Guttmacher Institute, a research arm of Planned Parenthood. Loesch said there were other clinics in the area that might have closed down due to the sit-in at the major centers; however, it was hard to determine how many since there have been conflicting reports. "Most clinics would rather close down then draw controversy to themselves," she said.

Besides closed clinics, one woman decided not to have an abortion and sought aid from Operation Rescue. Loesch said they were pleased with the saved life, but they also want to have an impact on the political process.

"No matter who is elected (in the upcoming presidential race)," Loesch continued, "we're concerned about what they plan on doing to support poor women. It's not fair that poor women don't have any other options offered to them by the federal government besides abortion."

A New York radio station ran a 24-hour alert for pro-abortion groups on the rescue. However, only 60 pro-abortion demonstrators showed up to counter the rescue effort, according to sources. Pro-abortion leaders also called for a mass rally, but the same 50 to 60 people showed up. They waited 30 minutes for a larger crowd, which didn't materialize.

Before the rescue, pro-abortion advocates also tried to ban the pro-lifers from coming within 15 feet of any medical center. The requested temporary restraining order was denied. Operation Rescue is currently challenging an injunction filed by abortion activists earlier during that week which penalized the organization $25,000 for sitting on the steps of a clinic. The fine would be earmarked for pro-abortion groups such as the National Organization for Women and Planned Parenthood.

One of the "rescuers" travelled from St. Louis for the week-long series of sit-ins. Tim Drestie, an auto mechanic, says he has been arrested between 35 to 40 times since he first became involved in the pro-life movement three years ago. "Initially, I saw the movie 'Silent Scream,' and it just tore up my heart. It changed my life and I started picketing a clinic."

Since then, Drestie has participated in about 30 "rescues." "After picketing, I became whole-heartedly involved in rescues. I've participated in rescue missions involving just two people."

Operation Rescue projected 800 people participating, Loesch related, "and we are exultant over the response." Randall Terry, executive director of the Operation Rescue, told the Washington Times, "The reason the pro-life movement has not been successful is because it has not created the social tension and upheaval necessary to produce political change."

Responding to the "extremist" label, he pointed out, "The people sitting here today are moms, and dads, grandmas and grandpas, rabbis and priests. This is middle America."

Other rescues are planned in conjunction with the Republican National Convention in New Orleans and the Democratic National Convention in Atlanta.

PHILADELPHIA, PA (FR) - Three abortion clinics were closed down in this Pennsylvania metropolis on July 5th and 6th by 700 Operation Rescue protesters. The demonstrators targeted two major clinics during the two-day sit-in, which caused other medical centers and abortion clinics in the area to also close. At the first facility, Women's Suburban Clinic in Payoli, 591 protestors were arrested.

The second clinic, Northeast Women's Center, was closed after 253 protesters were arrested. Auxiliary Bishop Austin Vaughn, considered one of the most influential Catholics in New York City, was also arrested. "We have had more single arrests in the history of the U.S. for the abortion issue during this rescue," said Lowell Patterson, communications director for Operation Rescue. The clinics perform 30 to 40 abortions a day.

Patterson said the Philadelphia rescue was more successful then the rescues held in New Jersey and New York this past year. "Over 50 clergy came to be trained in how to conduct a rescue in their city," he said. This is part of Operation Rescue's two-fold objective, which is to first, "stir the nation against abortion," and secondly "to train others to implement rescues in their hometowns," Patterson added.

Randall Terry, 26, began Operation Rescue in 1986. Since then, Operation Rescue activists have been successful in closing down major clinics in cities such as Cherry Hill, New Jersey; Philadelphia, and New York City. His pro-life activism began four years ago when he started Project Life, The Crisis Pregnancy Center and House of Life in Binghamtown, New York.

Recently we interviewed Terry in Atlanta, currently the national hotspot of this movement. After his appearance on Dr. James Dobson's radio show, "Insight for Living," and CBN's "The 700 Club," he was arrested in Atlanta. A $10,000 bond was placed on him for "aiding and abetting the commission of a crime." A prominent family in Atlanta used their property as collateral to pay the $10,000 bail.

Rev. Jerry Falwell, who said he planned to get arrested in an abortion protest in the future, gave $10,000 to Operation Rescue in Atlanta. Operation Rescue has been protesting abortion in Atlanta since the opening of the Democratic National Convention on July 19th. "We plan on staying in Atlanta for maybe months," Terry said. "We're expecting over 300 people next week." An area office has been set up in the meantime to monitor the progress of the demonstration.

The Forerunner: What is the philosophy behind Operation Rescue?

Terry: The foundation of Operation Rescue is a call to people and the Church to repent. The Church has sinned before God by allowing children to be ripped apart and mothers to be exploited. We have sat idly by and have done virtually nothing.

The Forerunner: Why are those being arrested in Atlanta withholding their names? Why are they identifying themselves as "Baby John Doe" or "Baby Jane Doe?"

Terry: We are withholding our names because the unborn children we represent have no names and no voice. We are identifying with them. We are making a statement to the system by identifying with their suffering. We want their plight to be known to the American people.

The Forerunner: Were there any rescues held prior to the conception of Operation Rescue in 1986?

Terry: There were no large rescues before that. I realized that we were losing the war. The pro-life movement is losing. Unless the Church repents and rises up to do rescues, which is the fruit of repentance, we will never win.

The Forerunner: What motivated you to start Operation Rescue?

Terry: In the spring and summer of 1986, during prayer and introspection, I began looking at American history and realized that we were losing the war. I began to get a sense of what God wanted to do.

The Forerunner: How long have you been involved in pro-life activism?

Terry: About four and a half years. The Lord got a hold of my heart and showed me that I had a responsibility to do something to protect the mothers and children from the holocaust. I wasn't influenced by any books or films. But at a prayer meeting God spoke to me, and all I knew was that I was supposed to do something.

The Forerunner: How many members does OR have?

Terry: We don't have members. But we do have tens of thousands of people in sympathy with us. Within the last 14 days the most prominent voices in evangelical Christianity have stepped forward in support of us. Dr. James Dobson, Dr. James Kennedy, Dr. Jerry Falwell and "The 700 Club" have stepped forward in support.

The Forerunner: How do all the arrests affect your family?

Terry: I look at it as a time of sacrifice. I have enemies and lawsuits and I try to keep my family out of it. I would rather not say anymore.

The Forerunner: How do you justify violating the law in your fight against abortion?

Terry: Easily. When God's law and man's law conflict, Scripture clearly teaches that man is not to obey that law. Some examples are when the three Hebrew children were thrown into the fire, when the apostles were jailed for preaching the Gospel, and when the stone was rolled away from the Lord's tomb. That was in defiance of a man-made law. God never gave the government a blank check to do what it wants to do. It is a heresy to teach Christians to obey a law which runs counter to His law.

Who Are Operation Rescue's Activists?

Operation Rescue's activists certainly can't be stereotyped. They are not former '60s protestors who burned dorm buildings and American flags in the student center. But they will take a bus at their own expense to another city across the nation to get arrested. John Ryan, 33, has been arrested for his pro-life stand nearly 400 times while a student. "I quit counting at 350," he said during the recent rescue effort in Tallahassee.

A former social worker, Ryan says he spent most of his collegiate career in jail. "I was working full-time, going to school full-time, and in jail half of the time. Although I've been in jail a lot, it's amazing how God takes care of you." In the morning, he would go to class and then catch a bus to a local abortion clinic in St. Louis, Missouri, to participate in a rescue and to counsel women entering the clinics. "I thought of the injustice of it all," he said. "I didn't encounter any pro-life sympathy at the time, and the university had little to do with my involvement."

His first arrest was in St. Louis eight years ago. Although he spent most of his college years in jail, Ryan managed to graduate with a masters degree in Social Work within five years. The total time he has served in jail adds up to one year. "Some days I got arrested twice," he said. "The judge was pro-life, so he would let us off with a city ordinance violation charge which was the lowest penalty. The City was never in a hurry to hear our case, either."

How did his time in jail affect his lifestyle? "I felt like I lived in two worlds," he explained. "I would come home from jail, and it would be business as usual. Ordinary things strike you as bizarre when you know there are children dying out there and someone is more concerned about how they look."

He says his hardest times were when he didn't pray about his activist activities, or when he did things simply out of habit. "As an activist, I have to constantly keep in mind that this is a spiritual battle. If it's just a political force, it will go the way of every other movement and become ineffective."

After being booked several times, Ryan said the police began to fill out the forms before he got to the jail. "After filling out the forms, I would just return to the clinic," he added. Ryan has been on a sabbatical for the past year.

Sharon Henning, a housewife from St. Louis, Missouri, has been arrested over 20 times. She fasted for five weeks before making the decision to join in the rescues. "I saw the film 'Assignment Life,' and something gripped me. I felt that God had called me to do something, but I didn't know what." Henning got involved in Lutherans for Life and started picketing.

However, picketing didn't seem enough when a rescue was underway at a local clinic. "While those in jail were fasting, I began fasting," she said. People that were normally unconcerned about abortion, she said, had begun to ask questions during her fast. After five weeks, her husband told her he would rather that she go to the abortion clinics and protest than to continue the fast.

Those involved in Operation Rescue are from all walks of life ... including teenagers. With several teens in jail in Atlanta and Tallahassee, 16-year-old activist Willie Hinton is starting the youth arm of Operation Rescue. The group was born the first night of the Democratic National Convention when a group of teenagers protested abortion at the Atlanta Surgi-Center.

Hinton began getting involved in pro-life efforts last January. He worked on former presidential candidate Pat Robertson's campaign as the assistant financial director, and is working on several local political campaigns as well. When asked whether he would get himself arrested during the Atlanta rescue, he replied, "If my father lets me."

Operation Rescue & Civil Rights Movement of the 1960s

ATLANTA (FR) - During the Civil Rights Movement in the 1960s, America was confronted with the ugly realities of racism each night on evening news broadcasts. We watched as non-violent protestors in southern cities were rounded up by police and locked in jail for their demonstrations against segregation. We listened as Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., champion of the peaceful revolt against bigotry in America, pierced our consciences with his moving appeals for love and justice.

Now, more than 25 years later - with racial segregation policies behind us - a new civil rights movement has begun in the South. Its focal point during the months of July and August has been the city of Atlanta, where a growing number of non-violent protestors have been held in jail since the Democratic National Convention began. Ironically, some of the first demonstrators arrested were held in the same jail where Martin Luther King once spent the night during his struggle.

But the Civil Rights Movement of the 1980s is different in many ways from its 1960s counterpart. This time, peaceful demonstrators are protesting the legalized practice of abortion in this country, and they are risking their lives to defend the right to life for the unborn. And, unlike the 1960s demonstrations, television networks are not broadcasting daily updates on the progress of the jailed protestors. The story is being noticeably ignored by the media.

Pro-life activists in the 1980s, dissatisfied with the lack of results from the traditional lobbying tactics of letter-writing, petition gathering, and picketing, are now getting arrested in droves by conducting non-violent "rescues" in front of abortion clinics which are very similar to the sit-ins conducted in the 1960s to stop racial segregation.

From all parts of the nation, ranging from ages 8 to 80, these activists are not typical "radicals," but simply representatives of grassroots America. "They're just 'Joe Citizen' types who pay their bills and have jobs," said Florida pro-life activist Jerry Ford.

Operation Rescue, the organization behind the recent Atlanta event, is a coalition of pro-life pastors and Christian ministries which are being mobilized to stage massive sit-ins at abortion clinics around the U.S. - and their primary goal is to save the lives of unborn babies. Based in Binghamton, New York, Operation Rescue is under the direction of Randall Terry.

Since Operation Rescue's efforts began in Atlanta on July 19, 711 total arrests were made while four clinics were closed down. Several of the demonstrators have been released on personal recognizance, but over 300 have chosen to remain in jail - and more are expected to join them in the coming weeks. While the demonstrations took place outside of clinics including Mid-Town Hospital, Atlanta Surgi-Center, Feminist Women's Health Center, and the Atlanta Women's Medical Center, police carried the clinic's clients over the heads of the protestors.

Despite efforts to continue their services, clinic staff at the Feminist Women's Health Center said that the city's abortion business has decreased 20 percent since the protesters converged upon Atlanta. Editors at the Atlanta Constitution said in an editorial that the demonstrators should be just turned loose. "...releasing the demonstrators is preferable to bogging down the court system and jamming the jails." Juli Loesch, spokeswoman for the group, said, "The purpose of this unfriendly editorial is to urge the release of the pro-life prisoners so as to prevent the development - day by day - of a rapidly growing movement centered around Atlanta."

Protest leaders promise that more would soon join them in an attempt to overwhelm the judicial system. Those arrested are identifying themselves as "Baby John Doe" or "Baby Jane Doe," and have been charged with criminal trespassing and giving false names. The bond for each offense is $500. Their first arraignment was cancelled and State Court Judge Nick G. Lambros was expected to sign a court order that will bar arraignment until they give their names, indefinitely prolonging their stay in jail.

Corrections officials say they have more than enough room to accomodate the jailed offenders. Neal Horton, press secretary for Mayor Andrew Young, said the cost of housing the prisoners is $42 per person per day for the city. Currently, the cost has surpassed $170,000. They are being held at the the Fulton County Jail as well as the Pre-Trial Detention Center.

Protest leaders in Atlanta said an agreement was made with the police department to free the demonstrators. However, leading pro-abortion activist Marge Pitts-Haines forced authorities to renege on the agreement. "If we can overrun the judicial and court system of Atlanta, then they will be forced to let us go," said Baby Doe #84, currently still held at the Fulton County Jail.

Despite the reneged agreement, and the possibility that some of the protestors will lose their jobs while in jail, #84 said prayer meetings are being held three times a day, and that seven people have become Christians since the pro-lifers arrived. "Each day is filled with hours of prayer, praise and worship, and the ministry of the Word by the ministers amongst us. This is the most life-changing retreat I've ever experienced."

One of the prisoners, the president of a trucking company in New Jersey, said he may return to a bankrupt business. He and his wife celebrated their 22nd wedding anniversary in jail with a lighted match on top of a scoop of their mashed potatoes. "I'm planning on staying until the end," he said emphatically.

Baby Doe #97, who is a self-employed carpenter, was arrested at the Atlanta Surgi-Center and has been in jail for three weeks. "I lose $100 a day from not working," he said, "but my church is paying for the rent this month and buying groceries for my wife." The 130 incarcerated say they are planning on staying until they are released without bail.

Loesch, said, "Everyone is feeling jubilant, and we are in a better situation to see everyone released." Terry was arrested and released twice since the Atlanta Rescue began. After his appearance on "The 700 Club" and Dr. James Dobson's popular radio show, "Insight for Living," Terry was arrested upon his return to Atlanta for "aiding and abetting others in commission of crime," said Loesch.

A prominent family in Atlanta used their home as collateral to pay the $10,000 bond in order to release Terry. Rev. Jerry Falwell, head of the Liberty Federation, presented a check to Operation Rescue for $10,000 and told reporters that he expected to get arrested in the future after wrapping up his national campaign against the movie "The Last Temptation of Christ." Falwell said he would be joined by other prominent Christian leaders.

"We were a marginal movement," said Loesch. "Now, with the support of prominent Christian leaders who are advocating risking arrest, we're in the mainstream of pro-life activism. The abortion establishment is frantic."

Over 300 pro-life activists, not officially related to the Operation Rescue organization, marched in Tallahassee, Florida, on August 5, to protest legalized abortion and the imprisonment of pro-life champion Joan Andrews. Bearing signs with slogans and pictures of aborted babies, they had come from as far as Washington and Oregon at their own expense. Some were teachers, executives, housewives and clergymen. Presbyterians, Catholics, feminists and other concerned citizens all found a common cause in the Tallahassee event.

For some, this was their first time to protest against abortion; for others, they would be getting arrested for the 21st time the next morning. "We're not eccentric, or extremist, but we're here to see Joan Andrews free," said Dr. William Marra, professor of philosophy from Fordham University. Marra is also a presidential candidate on the newly formed Right to Life political party ticket in New York.

While the protestors chanted, sang, and prayed in the capitol's rotunda, a group of the pro-life leaders met with Gov. Bob Martinez's staff to negotiate a clemency hearing for Joan Andrews. Although Gov. Martinez was in town, he was not available to meet with the pro-life delegation. Several protestors were disgruntled that the pro-life governor had no time to address the rally.

After several hours of closed door meetings, Brian Ballard, the governor's director of operations, told the protestors that although Martinez was opposed to abortion, he couldn't grant a clemency hearing due to the opposition in his cabinet. Four more cabinet votes were needed before a hearing could be conducted. They voted against the hearing because they believed Andrews refusal to cooperate and her history of more than 100 arrests didn't merit giving a hearing.

"While Gov. Martinez will not decide on the merits of this case prior to a clemency hearing, he will continue to support the holding of such a hearing," said Ballard. Assistant Attorney General Andrea Hilliard said an investigation would also need to be conducted prior to the hearing. "This is the first case of its kind that I know of," she said.

Ballard said he also viewed, "Houston Proud," a 4 1/2 minute film featuring live footage of an actual abortion. "I found it very graphic and compelling. I'm going to set up a time for the governor to view it. I believe in the rights of the unborn. However, I think the facts have been misrepresented about Joan Andrews."

Andrews, 40, is serving five years in the Broward Correctional Facility in South Florida for entering a Pensacola abortion clinic in 1986 and trying to unplug a fetal suction machine. She has been disciplined 16 times for not following prison rules and has said that she wouldn't stop protesting against abortion after release. Since then, pro-life leaders have been up in arms over the strip searches and perceived brutal treatment of Andrews by prison guards.

While Ballard drafted a statement, protestors kneeled in the marble halls in front of the governor's office and said a short prayer. Susan Brindle, Andrews' sister, told protestors, "Don't nurse any grievance against the governor or the cabinet members. We need to write and lobby the remaining four cabinet members."

Don Treshman, head of 'Texas Rescuers' and organizer of the Tallahassee gathering, vowed to return with 10,000 next time if Martinez didn't take any action. "We're asking him to fight a battle that we can't fight," he said. "This is the tip of the iceberg." Brindle added, "The governor of Delaware went on TV to say we should release Joan. We're tiptoeing around on this case."

Congressman Robert Dornan (R-CA) encouraged the group to support the governor and presented a letter signed by 17 congressman asking for the release of Joan Andrews. "This situation stinks," he said to a cheering crowd. In the letter, the congressmen wrote that they believed that the sentence was "a form of cruel and unusual punishment, prohibited by Amendment VIII of the constitution."

A Mississippi pastor challenged the news media in front of the capitol to conduct an investigative report on clinical abortions. "The bottom line is that these are babies," said Rev. Jack Keane while showing the actual aborted fetuses in preserved in wax casing to the media in front of the Civic Center before the march up the hill to the capitol. "Do we have enough humanity to save these children? Abortionists don't show photographs," he added.

A funeral service was later held for 800 aborted fetuses at the Faith Presbyterian Church in Tallahassee. The fetuses were contained in six white coffins with a rose lying on top of each. "There is no question about why we are here: abortion is murder. If you 'personally support' abortion, it's like 'personally supporting' gassing," said Rev. Robert Evans. The fetuses preserved in jars and were discovered on a loading dock in Chicago.

The burial at Roselawn Children's Cemetery was considered the "first act of kindness," said Monica Migliorino, director of Citizens for Life in Milwaukee, during the graveside eulogy. Congressman Dornan pointed to the fetuses while protestors wept and said, "I stood here thinking, 'could that have been the first lady president? Could that have been a great concert pianist? ... This is a whole village of people we are burying today.'"

Migliorino said the fetuses were found in February of this year after an anonymous phone call from a lab in Chicago. They were marked "for disposal," added Tim Murphy, who was with Migliorino when the fetuses were discovered. "I saw crates shipped from eight cities and nine different centers. The boxes were being shipped by U.P.S.," explained Migliorino.

"They were coming from major centers in the Northeast, such as Indiana, New Jersey, Delaware, and Wisconsin. On February 20, we discovered dozens of boxes open, and filled with bodies of aborted children ready to be incinerated." The fetuses were in plastic bags with the name of the mother and the doctor written on a label outside.

Migliorino said she doesn't care if confiscation of the fetuses illegal, and would love a court trial on it. "It's been spooky because no one has asked any questions," she added. Over 5,000 were found the first time, and she visits the dock weekly with Murphy and Miller. The fetuses for the burial were found during one week's visit.

The next morning after the funeral service, protestors marched from the Ramada Inn East to the North Florida Women's Health Center. Police were waiting with two buses and stretchers to carry the demonstrators, who were instructed by rescue leaders to resist arrest.

Police carried 122 protestors to the bus for arrest in four hours while six women held a counter demonstration across the street. There were 67 males, 57 females and four juveniles arrested. "We've got them from two and a half years old to 80 years old," said Dick Simpson, spokesman for the Sheriff's department. The juveniles were remanded to the Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services.

Treshman said that an agreement to release protestors that afternoon had been worked out with the police department. However, Simpson said that he didn't know about the agreement. The protestors were bused to the North Florida Fairgrounds, which was used as a makeshift courthouse to conduct the hearing. Charged with 3rd degree misdemeanor for trespassing, and bonded for $100, many refused to be released until the whole group was released. Two were put in jail downtown for resisting arrest.

Bail was reduced to $50, and 42 were released the following Sunday. The remaining 80 were moved to Leon County Jail and were released over the course of the next four days. Bail was set again at $100, but charges were dropped. Treshman said the group planned to go up to Atlanta to participate in the sit-ins.

"This is the first time that arrests were made on such a massive scale," said Simpson. He said it cost the city $15,000 a day for housing and food for the group and added, "I've pretty much drained my budget."

Housed at the fairgrounds, doctors were also on staff for the elderly with heart problems. The only complaint was the Florida heat, which can easily reach 100 (degree mark) on a summer day.

The Florida heat is not the only thing that has been intensifying during these rescue missions in the South. The ideological battle over abortion is also heating up - and causing the American people to make a clear choice on what is emerging as the key moral issue of the decade.

Atlanta: Operation Rescue

By Leilani Corpus
11/88

ATLANTA GA (FR) - Atlanta became the center of the nation's media attention in early October as television viewers watched pro-life rescuers being kicked, punched, hit and dragged to arrest for protesting abortion at the city's major abortion clinics in early October. During the turbulent week, city officials were shocked at the brutal police treatment of the hundreds of pro-life activists that poured into Atlanta between Oct. 2nd and 8th as part of an effort called Operation Rescue (OR).

An extreme example of police brutality was the case of one of the "rescuers," Pastor Doyle Clark, who almost died while imprisoned. He was brutally treated, and hospitalized for a short term. Clark passed out when a policeman, who was doing a classic "civil rights" compliance hold, jabbed his thumbs into his ears instead of the pressure points on his neck.

A United Brethren pastor, Clark had traveled from Indiana to take part in the rescue mission. He was one of the activists who were thrown into a bus while protesting three major clinics: Hillcrest, Feminist Women's Health Center, and The Atlanta Surgi-Center.

Observers have compared the rescue effort to that of the late author Corrie Ten Boom who was renowned for her effort to rescue the Jews during the holocaust of World War II. "Corrie Ten Boom went beyond the law of the day when she rescued the Jews and we are here to rescue the unborn." said a participant. Rescue participants base their involvement on a scripture: "Rescue those who are unjustly sentenced to death" (Proverbs 24:11).

To discourage the massive protests, police donned riot gear, carried billy clubs, and erected a steel barricade to prevent demonstrators from the entrances of the clinics. Police were instructed by Maj. K.E. Burnette in heavy-handed tactics such as twisting arms and the use of pressure points. Several police officers, though, strayed beyond the official boundaries of "compliance holds," and were kicking, punching, and hitting rescuers with their billy clubs. One priest had his clerical clothes torn off and his collar stuffed in his mouth.

Despite the brutality, some policemen were visibly moved and were reluctant to force the crawling rescuers to stand up. One policeman cried, and asked another for assurance that a pregnant woman they were dragging away from the clinic would not be harmed.

The city of Atlanta did not respond favorably to the brutality, however; Maj. Burnette was given a stinging indictment from The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. The day before the first rescue, Burnette had informed reporters that he intended to inflict severe pain because the rescuers had a "warped theology." When asked to define "warped theology," he refused to comment. However, Burnette explained, "I will use any physical incentive necessary that will bring these people to their knees. They will not tell me what to do."

Later that week, Burnette changed his tactics due to phone calls and a formal complaint from the ACLU filed with Mayor Andrew Young's office. Rescuers, reporters, and observers contend that police officers were extremely brutal in their treatment.

OR Spokesman Juli Loesch said she didn't know anything about the ACLU complaint. "They haven't contacted us about their activities." She added that she saw Atlanta-area ACLU Director Gene Guerrero escorting women into a clinic. "If they assisted us legally, it would definitely be a conflict of interests," she stated.

Randall Terry, founder and director of OR, called for the removal of Maj. Burnette after the Atlanta Journal-Constitution editorial. Terry was arrested on Monday, October 3rd, on charges of conspiracy, and had a $75,000 bail posted. Ironically, Terry's cellmate, a cocaine dealer with charges of deadly assault, had a bail posted at $54,000. An Atlanta couple paid the bond on Terry's bail.

Terry had been arrested outside a Catholic church by two plainclothes policemen while training rescuers on the evening before the event began. At the onset of the training session, a priest told the audience that if anyone had any intention of arresting Terry, he should take care of it outside since they were meeting in a "house of God." Terry was then escorted outside by the two officers.

Rescuers were trained to take the "most non-aggressive posture you can take while attempting to occupy the door," said Loesch. "They were trained and instructed to walk and not run. There was no shouting, chanting, or picket signs." When they were within 15 feet of the policemen, they were instructed to stay on their knees and crawl. "They were as aggressive as a throw rug," she said. "This was to display the humility that Christ had before His accusers."

Besides protesting at the three abortion facilities, the rescuers also went to MidTown Hospital. "As a policy we don't protest at hospitals," said Loesch. "But MidTown's services are solely geared towards giving third trimester abortions."

Arrested and charged with failure to disburse, unlawful assembly, and failure to give their names, (some had given their names, however,) bail was set at $2,000 for most rescuers. When the bond had been paid, and the paperwork had been processed, Loesch said, jail authorities continued to delay their release.

The rescuers weren't the only ones harassed by police. Several major news stations said they were also threatened with arrest if their cameramen filmed rescuers being arrested. Al J. Briganti of CBS News said he and his crew were told by police, "You can shoot in this direction (toward the clinic) and we won't arrest you. Shoot in the other direction (where rescuers would be arrested) and we will arrest you." While following OR leader Randall Terry, Briganti said they were stopped by police and the news van's license number was taken. "It was clear we were the only people stopped," said Briganti. "The only people they were interested in stopping were the television cameramen."

Former 1960's civil rights demonstrators who are now city and state officials agree that the police action was unnecessary. A black City Councilman, Hosea Williams, who marched with the late Martin Luther King, Jr. in the civil rights movement, told the Atlanta Journal-Constitution: "I think what is happening in Atlanta right now is just terribly anti-American. It hurts me so bad that we who were the leaders of the movement in the 50's, 60's and 70's, are now the political leaders, and we are doing the same things to demonstrators that George Wallace and Bull Connor and those did to us."

Williams also blasted the department and the city for their unwillingness to tolerate peaceful dissent. "When I saw the police twisting arms and bending fingers and using pressure points, well that's the way Adolf Hitler got started," he said. "I was very hurt and surprised at the way the anti-abortion demonstrators were mistreated."

The police department is currently being investigated by a city council committee in response to complaints filed by the demonstrators - particularly the case of one rescuer who was kicked by an officer. Councilman Dozier Smith said, "I think it was a sad day for the city of Atlanta when a police major is (seen) on television kicking a person."

Although abortion clinic staff attempted to continue operating with volunteer escorts leading clients through the crowds, sources say the clinics were actually closed the entire week and experienced a dramatic decline in business. By the same token, several local pro-life pregnancy centers said that they experienced a significant increase in their case loads - from 50 percent to 100 percent.

The Atlanta police brouhaha may escalate into a federal "civil rights" lawsuit filed by Operation Rescue as more stories such as the case of Father Norman Weslin, who was put in solitary confinement for saying mass, are revealed. As the indignation of state and city officials, and media spokesmen are aroused, the rescuer's cause - abortion - may become the most pivotal issue of the presidential election and the next decade.

PITTSBURGH, PA (FR) - After spending the past 31 months in a Florida high-security prison, including 26 months in solitary confinement, pro-life activist Joan Andrews was released on the condition that she refrain from other pro-life protests. However, she told reporters outside the courtroom that she would continue her pro-life activism.

"It's all in God's hands. The babies have to be rescued," she said. "I would never withdraw myself from doing rescues." County Judge Raymond Novak's sentence of three years' probation was received enthusiastically with cheers from about 100 supporters outside the downtown courtroom.

Andrews' five-year prison sentence was commuted recently and she was transferred to Pittsburgh for a hearing. She was tried for criminal trespass and defiant trespass charges from a May 10, 1985, break-in at a Pittsburgh abortion clinic.

Judge Novak commented "I suspect that we will meet each other again." He urged Andrews to accept her attorney's plan for involvement in pro-life activism to keep her out of jail. She has been convicted 67 times for rescue-related actions and arrested more than 150 times.

"I recommended that she take over the leadership of the right-to-life movement," her other defense attorney John Broderick said. "Like any leader, the general doesn't go to the trenches." However, her sister, Susan Brindle of Elketon, Maryland, said, "She's a faithful soldier, but she's not comfortable as a leader."

In September 1986, she was sentenced to five years for conviction of burglary, resisting arrest, and three counts of criminal mischief from an incident at a Pensacola abortion clinic six months later. An executive order signed by Florida Gov. Bob Martinez commuted Andrews' Florida sentence at the time of her sentencing in Pittsburgh.

Notes From The Underground

By Eric Holmberg

"Chicago has slain its thousands and Atlanta its tens of thousands." Whether we are speaking figuratively about the per capita ratios of murdered children or the number of people jailed at their respective Democratic conventions, the bough has broken for the cradle of Southern hospitality.

- Baby John Doe, #8849161

Written while in the Key Road Jail

Atlanta, Georgia

* Joe is a 57-year-old grandfather, recently retired from the Navy. Like me and over 400 others, he is in an Atlanta jail for placing his body between a killer and his intended victim. Though he is smiling, Joe looks freshly mugged. There is blood on the right side of his face, a black-eye, contusions everywhere. Bruises, deep and violet with yellow halos, have spread across the inside of both his upper arms.

It is hard to tell, he says, which wounds he got from being slung around by the arresting officers, or from when one of the "Red Dogs" (an elite "special forces" unit) stood on his chest. But Joe insists he feels fine; God is good, and anyway, "what an honor that He would allow me to identify with the Cross to this extent." I'm smiling now, too.

* I don't get a chance to smile with Doyle, a pastor from Indiana. He has been in the hospital since the day we were all arrested, slipping in and out of consciousness. He received a concussion when a policeman tested the relative density of his head with a steel fire extinguisher. Doyle's jaw was injured as well, the result of a supposedly harmless "come-along" hold.

* Plump and avuncular, Police Major Burnett is the officer in charge of dealing with Operation Rescue. Joe and Doyle's arrests, as well as the violence used against them, was the major's idea.

At a press conference the month before, Burnett had testified that he too was a follower of Jesus Christ, though he echoed all our thoughts when he wondered aloud if his Jesus was the same one we were following. "My Jesus," he said, "never tried to physically intervene in order to save someone's life." (So there was a difference; his Jesus had never been crucified!) "My Jesus is a God of love and my job is to demonstrate that love," he concluded with a wave of his hand.

A month later, Joe, Doyle, and many others found out the hard way that the world's love means "never having to say you're sorry".

* Dan Little, a pastor from Binghamton, New York, is no stranger to intervention on behalf of justice and life. Ten years ago he broke into a house in order to drag out a burning couch. Instead of a breaking and entering charge, the police told him he did a good job. A few years later, he tackled an armed man who had just robbed a gas station. Instead of an assault charge, again the police told him he did a good job. The other day, however, he attempted non-violently to shut down a facility where dozens of children were scheduled to die. This time he was dragged by his neck and thrown into jail. They didn't tell him he had done a good job.

* Hosea Williams isn't in jail with us, but says he is thinking about giving it a shot. An Atlanta city councilman, he, along with Andrew Young, was a leader in the Civil Rights Movement and is familiar with non-violent direct action. He can't believe that a man like Mayor Young, who was once on the receiving end of establishment bullying, would now be responsible for dragging praying grandmothers through the streets of Atlanta. He doesn't buy the Mayor's feeble excuses either.

"I think what is happening in Atlanta right now is just terribly anti-American," Mr. Williams told the press. "It hurts me so bad that we who were the leaders of the movement in the '50s, '60s, and '70s, are now the political leaders, and we are doing the same things to demonstrators that George Wallace and Bull Connor and others did to us."

* Father Norman is a missionary from Rome who spends a lot of his time with Mother Theresa on the mean streets of Calcutta. His clerical shirt is hanging from his body like David Banner's on the Incredible Hulk; scabs run up and down his arms. For five policemen, it was like trying to pull hell up by the roots, dragging this Scotsman away from his appointed post as a defender of the pre-born.

His is the first homily shared in what were to become twice a day meetings for the Unlawful Assembly of God Church at the Key Road Jail. Father Norman's message is simple and direct, affirming the qualities of compassion, truth and identification with the poor and weak. He calls us men as everywhere the sounds of crying can be heard.

As we weep, worship, and listen to the words of Scripture, we realize that though we are in jail, we have never been more free. Our prayers, infused with a new power that seems to ionize the very air around us, erupts like a volcano, punching a hole through the ceiling of our prison and the dense blanket of oppression caused by the bloody slaughter of Atlanta's pre-born.

Another Man, one who had also committed Himself into the hands of sinners, is suddenly walking among us.

Eric Holmberg, director of Reel to Real Ministries - a Christian media company based in Gainesville, Florida - was a recent participant in Operation Rescue's pro-life demonstration in Atlanta, Georgia. Holmberg recorded some of his thoughts while spending several days in the Key Road Jail with other rescuers.

Humble Hero in Atlanta's Rescue

Atlanta, GA (FR) - When asked about his experiences in an Atlanta jail after being arrested during a pro-life rescue there, Pastor Doyle Clark was reluctant to talk. "I'm not supposed to be telling this story," he said. "Some parts are very painful." But, because he knew his testimony would serve the cause of the unborn, Clark shared his story with several reporters after his release in mid-October.

A reluctant hero, 48-year-old Clark went to the Operation Rescue in Atlanta only to observe. He stood in the back line of the crowd to watch the proceedings of the protest. He had received a brochure about Operation Rescue's activities in the mail, and he was stirred about the pro-life cause.

Clark couldn't risk arrest, which was a part of Operation Rescue's strategy, because members of his church were split over his involvement. But when a friend called him about taking a bus to Atlanta just to observe, he decided to go.

"I'm not a hero," said Clark. "I was standing in the back and they arrested those in the front. Suddenly, I was in the front." Protestors were crawling under the steel barricade to get to the clinic's sidewalk, and Clark attempted to follow the crawling crowd when a burly white policeman grabbed his neck. "They were trying to put pressure on certain areas of my neck to make me stand up. I went limp and was so limp that I guess I made the officer angry."

The policeman missed Clark's pressure point and, instead, jabbed his thumbs into his ears and clutched his jawbone. "He was trying to force me to get up, and his thumbs kept bearing in and I passed out." While being dragged to the bus unconscious, his head went smashing into a fire extinguisher. "My back and legs hit all the steel steps. I came to, but felt disoriented, and the officers threw me down the aisle until my head hit the round steel posts. I felt like a freight train had come to stop."

After throwing him, the officers walked off the bus, and other rescuers laid him on a seat. When the busload of arrested rescuers arrived at the Pre-Trial Detention Center, guards noticed that Clark's ears were bleeding; he was taken by ambulance to Grady Memorial Hospital's prison ward. "I didn't check in, and if anyone called, they wouldn't have known where I was," he added.

Clark was then laid on a flat board, his hands were taped, and his feet were strapped, padlocked, and chained. He was then wheeled out. "I was shoved against a wall for five hours with no offers of food or water except at the very end. I demanded to be released. They took X-rays and said nothing was wrong. They took all the apparatus off, wheeled me out, and the doctor said, 'Get down off the cart and show me you can walk.' "

Clark took five steps and couldn't continue. He was then lowered into the police van and he inched his way into it with his hands. The bumpy ride, he said, exacerbated the excruciating pain. When they arrived at the Pre-Trial Detention Center, prison officials ordered him to walk: "It took a long time. I walked about 20 feet in 20 minutes. I turned around when I got to my cell and the guards were gone. I knew I would be in full pain in my lower back. I fell down and cried out for help."

Clark had a concussion and passed out. "When I came to, a nurse and her helper put a respirator on me to force air down. I was conscious, and could see and hear, but I couldn't talk and felt a sensation go through my whole body. The nurse said I had turned blue all over. She shouted that I was having a cardiac arrest and cut off my shirt. Then she did CPR to get my heart going."

Clark admitted that he knew he was dying and felt his spirit leave his body. "I was so happy because I knew I was going to be with the Lord. But she didn't let me go. She kept saying, 'Come on, you're a man of God. You've got to live. You've got to live.' "

After he regained consciousness, he was returned to Grady Memorial Hospital. Strapped and padlocked on the stretcher, again he was wheeled against a wall for two hours with no offer of food or water. "I finally appealed to a doctor to let me call my wife. He wheeled me to a desk and dialed the number for me." His wife, Janet, then contacted Operation Rescue headquarters in Atlanta.

"They didn't know where I was until I called," Clark continued. "I felt like the prison authorities wanted me to die. It was very unusual." Rev. Denny Laub was then assigned by Operation Rescue to monitor Clark's case. For two hours after the phone call, Clark said he underwent tortuous X-rays; nurses twisted his painful back, and an orderly pulled his fingers until all his knuckles had cracked. "I was an orderly for two years while I was in college," said Clark, "and I knew for a fact that those were not X-rays those nurses were taking."

At 2:30 a.m. Clark demanded legal counsel. He was wheeled back to the entrance, and the hospital administrator, lawyer and doctor asked him to sign a statement which released them from any liability. "I shook them up because I refused to sign it and began to negotiate with them."

He was returned to solitary confinement in the Atlanta Pre-Trial Detention Center. "I saw rescuers in other cells and it was really hot. They had jammed in 18 to 20 people in one cell designed for seven to eight prisoners. There was no proper ventilation. I received notes slipped to me which were really encouraging. I was ordered to bond out immediately since I was sick."

Several prison officials and attorneys visited to ask him to sign a statement. "They asked me, 'Why will your people risk their lives or get maimed for live or be paralyzed for a publicity stunt?' " Clark said he answered while weeping. "First of all, we are not protesting, but we are trying to stop the killing of babies. My body belongs to Jesus. If I live, that's great. If I die, all the better. But we are not here just for excitement ... 15 years ago I was in a position to make a difference, and I deliberately and consciously avoided getting involved. I'm guilty for not getting involved. I'm in repentance. I don't blame the policemen. But I have a choice to either obey God or man." The prison officials and attorneys all began weeping and quickly walked out.

During his imprisonment, he was constantly moved from cell to cell. He said it was Palvolvian technique to get the protestors to "break." Despite the trauma, he said many inmates became Christians through the witness of other protestors. "I was released five days later," he concluded. "It was a spiritual experience that I will always treasure.

BINGHAMTON, NY (FR) - Three years ago when Randall Terry and his wife, Cindy, were spending 40 hours a week picketing and counseling women against abortion outside of clinics, they didn't foresee their pro-life activism growing into a movement which would affect cities and leaders across the nation.

In fact, activism was the farthest thing from their minds, especially since they had plans to be missionaries in Mexico after their graduation from Elim Bible Institute in Lima, New York. But as Randall began to study the historic legacy that Christians have had in social activism, he sensed that God was calling him to another mission field - the abortion clinics of the United States.

During lunch hours and days off, the Terrys consistently picketed in front of local clinics. Their efforts to dissuade women from aborting their children seemed futile, however, because the few that responded later decided to follow through with their abortions. One woman, a clinic staffer, told Terry that she would keep her baby. Later, however - after being influenced by abortion clinic rhetoric, she chose to abort. "It seemed the work that God had called us to was filled with constant hopelessness and despair," Terry said.

The first breakthrough came four months later, when members of the Pierce Creek Church, where the Terrys were attending, began picketing with them. Within two weeks, five women decided to keep their babies as a result of the demonstrations. In 1984, the Terrys founded Project Life and the Crisis Pregnancy Center. Six days a week the center was opened to offer women free pregnancy tests, confidential counseling, baby clothing, and other assistance. Three years later they started The House of Life, a haven for unwed mothers.

As a result of their successes, Terry began speaking to concerned citizens' groups, showing films, appearing on television, doing radio interviews, and educating people on lobbying techniques. In the midst of all this activity, Randall Terry began to sense that his efforts were not enough - and that Americans were really losing the war against abortion. "In the spring and summer of 1986, during prayer and introspection," he said, "I began looking at American history and realized that we were losing the war. I then began to get a sense of what God wanted to do."

Terry realized that if abortion was murder, then he needed to act like it. "If my little girl was about to be murdered, I certainly would not write a letter to the editor! I would dive in with both hands and feet and do whatever was necessary to save her life," he said. "We were all clamoring about abortion being murder, but we had not even tried to blockade abortion mills. As these ideas took shape in my mind and the truths of God's word grabbed my heart, the foundation for Operation Rescue was laid."

At that point, Terry staged the first rescue mission, conducted with only seven people in January of 1986, at a clinic in Binghamton, New York. The rescuers locked themselves in one of the inner rooms of the abortion mill right after it opened. Police arrived and asked them to leave, but the rescuers felt that they needed to obey God's higher law, and they continued to block the clinic. They spent several days in jail as a result.

"Sometimes I've felt good about being in jail, and other times I've experienced feelings of intense anger and frustration," said Terry. "I'm forced to stay behind bars with criminals all around me. I've felt a terrible sense of injustice. I was in jail for trying to save babies from death and mothers from exploitation, while the killers (wrongly called doctors) were on the outside free!"

Randall Terry - in the manner of a true reformer - has admirably endured insults and misunderstandings throughout the history of Operation Rescue. There have been times when he and his wife have had to stand alone in their struggle - although they have always had the support of their friends at the Pierce Creek Church.

Today, the seven original rescuers have grown into a national grassroots movement with the official name of Operation Rescue (OR). Although it does not claim membership, thousands of sympathizers are being trained in the tactics of paralyzing the business operations of abortion clinics. Planned Parenthood officials and pro-abortion leaders admit that the movement is a threat to their business.

Fifteen years after the Supreme Court's Roe vs. Wade decision, which has left in its wake 25 million aborted children, hundreds of people are being arrested for attempting to rescue unborn children. Terry has mobilized a growing army of Americans who are tired of plodding politicians who have given promises to stop abortion. Thanks to Randall Terry, the abortion issue is now being taken to the streets.

Another Civil Rights Movement

Many observers say that 29-year-old Terry is spearheading another civil rights movement in the 1980s. Atlanta, the cradle of the original civil rights movement against racial discrimination, was the scene of unprecedented police brutality against pro-life rescuers in early October of this year. Stunned city officials, some of whom were former civil rights demonstrators, launched an investigation of the police department because of the treatment of the demonstrators.

City councilman Hosea Williams said, "I think what is happening in Atlanta right now is just terribly anti-American. It hurts me so bad that we who were the leaders of the movement in the '50s, '60s and '70s, are now the political leaders, and we are doing the same things to demonstrators that George Wallace and Bull Connors did to us."

Earl Shinhoster, southeastern regional director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, told the Atlanta Journal and Constitution that OR's methods are similar to those used in the civil rights movement. "As a tactic and strategy," he said, "I see a great many similarities between the abortion protestors and the tactics of the '60s. I think they tore a page straight out of the book of the '60s."

Ironically, Atlanta's Mayor Andrew Young, also a former civil rights activist and ordained minister, has refused to meet with OR's leaders and has been silent on his position. During the October rescue, Operation Rescue circulated flyers throughout Atlanta about Mayor Young's stand on abortion. One city official even urged Young to join the ranks of OR because of his civil rights record.

Like all true reformers, Randall Terry's efforts have stirred opposition. Because of the impact that the Atlanta rescue had on the rest of the nation, pro-abortion leaders took notice and began counter-demonstrations. Molly Yard, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW), alerted her supporters about Terry's work.

To this date, over 100 clinics have been successfully closed by the rescue efforts, and 400 children have been saved this year. Recently a young black woman from Atlanta, who was scheduled to have an abortion, turned away from the clinic after seeing the rescuers. She testified later on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" about her child being saved, and thanked OR for its work.

The Forging of a Network of Activists

Besides saving children, Operation Rescue is also making its mark on correctional institutions across the nation and forging a network among Christian activists. Many inmates have converted to Christianity as a result of the singing, praying, and Bible-reading that takes place in jails during a rescue campaign. Pastors who have spent time in jail always return to their churches with a new zeal for changing society.

In an Atlanta jail in October, a priest associated with Mother Theresa's work in Calcutta, a leader of a Christian rock band, and several rabbis and nuns shared "war stories." A jailer who heard the conversations said the prison had become a "school of revolution," because individuals swapped stories of former arrests and rescues in other cities.

Documentation of bad prison conditions have also been compiled during rescues, which may lead to improvement. After a rescue mission in Tallahassee, Florida, reporters received stories about women being denied medical treatment, no air-conditioning, denial of telephone privileges, and other forms of abuse inflicted on prisoners. According to reports filed with OR, Atlanta inmates were rudely awakened several times during the night and moved, and were also threatened by officers.

Reformation of prison conditions may be a side affect of OR's cause to save the unborn. Massive crowds in jails have forced city and state officials to evaluate the conditions and to eventually either upgrade facilities in preparation for a rescue or succumb to criticism from those jailed.

Operation Rescue's Future

It has not been an easy road for Randall Terry: "I look at it as a time of sacrifice," he said. "I have enemies and lawsuits, and I try to keep my family out of it." But the rewards are fulfilling: testimonies of babies who have been saved from death - like the one in Atlanta - provide the greatest encouragement.

Terry's movement has grown beyond manageable proportions into a national phenomenon which has touched the nerve of the nation in mobilizing masses willing to risk arrest for their cause. There is no sign of waning on the horizon, either. Many Americans believe that Operation Rescue may very well be the key to reversing the Roe vs. Wade decision on abortion.

An outstanding model of modern-day heroism, Randall Terry has motivated and inspired business and church leaders, athletes, and grassroots America to lay down their lives for defenseless children. The staff of The Forerunner salutes Terry and his family as true reformers who have been willing to sacrifice and to defend the truth of God when it has not been popular to do so.

Dawn Stover

Portland, Oregon

3/89

Dawn Stover is a homemaker who gained a reputation among local abortionists in Portland, Oregon. For four to five years she spent her afternoons on the sidewalk in front of Dr. Peter Bors' clinic, counseling women against abortion. One day, Dr. Bors showed Mrs. Stover that he had enough: he took a baseball bat and beat her below her knees while she was participating in a non-violent rescue in front of his clinic.

"She got a bruise the size of a baseball," said Judy Hager, another participant at the rescue, "and she had to be brought into emergency for treatment." Stover was unavailable for comment because she was in jail. She decided not to press charges when interrogated by the police. Instead, she told them, "If I don't sue him or press charges or retaliate, he may come to the Lord Jesus that much sooner."

"Dawn is a very loving person," Hager said. "We love these abortionists, and we beg them to change their clinics into prenatal care centers." Eighty people were arrested at the Portland rescue, which took place on February 7, 1989; 50 of those arrested were first-timers. Prior to arrests, police told the participants that they weren't going to arrest anyone, but that they were going to "hurt them."

Stover has been involved in Operation Rescue - a grassroots pro-life organization which encourages non-violent sit-ins at abortion clinics - since its inception in 1987. She is one of 18,000 rescuers who have been arrested so far in a movement which is growing every week in both participation levels and results. So far, many clinics across the nation have been temporarily shut down, and 209 babies have been spared. Despite brutal police treatment, angry reactions from agitated clinic owners, and million dollar lawsuits, Operation Rescue is attracting a larger national following, and forcing pro-abortionists to file lawsuits due to loss of business.

Victory in Manhattan's Lower East Side

The largest rescue to date took place in New York City in January, where seven children were saved by over 1,000 rescuers. Participants traveled from over 40 states to protest in front of clinics in Manhattan's Lower East Side. OR leaders say the New York City rescue was "the single greatest victory-to-date for the Rescue movement."

On the first day of the massive two-day event, 275 were arrested. The majority would not give police their real names, but instead chose to name themselves "Baby Jane Doe" and "Baby John Doe" with the U.S. Supreme Court building as their address. On the second day, 815 people were arrested. Several groups surprised police officials by locking themselves together with kryptonite locks, considered the most difficult to break, at a clinic on Broadway. A special police squad spent five hours removing the rescuers and the locks from the building.

Although the rescue was considered a major success, Randall Terry, OR's founder, is now battling a court decision by a federal judge which requires him to pay $50,000 to the National Organization of Women - to be used by abortion clinics. Said Terry in response: "A federal judge ordered me and Operation Rescue to pay $50,000 to baby-killers, and those who support baby-killers. This is beyond outrageous. It would be like asking civil rights leaders to pay money to the K.K.K.!"

Tough Legal Actions Against Rescuers

Pro-abortion activists, in their efforts to stop Operation Rescue, have been attempting to use the "Racketeering Influence and Corrupt Organization" (RICO) statute recently enacted by Congress to convict organized crime figures. The statute was used to convict rescuers in Pittsburgh who protested in front of an office building which housed an abortion clinic. The landowner filed a RICO suit with the Third Circuit Court of Appeals against OR and won. "This is a great threat to our civil liberties and is being applied contrary to its intent," said William Bonner, counsel for OR and president of the Rutherford Institute.

The Northeast Women's Center vs. McNomanigle case was the first time RICO was successfully used against the rescue movement. However, OR is planning to challenge the ruling at the Supreme Court level. "This means that the ruling can be used against any social protest group. It will not stop the Operation Rescue movement, though," added Bonner.

Rescuers in Oregon are also battling a RICO lawsuit asking for $7 million damages each from Dawn Stover, Judy Hager, and one other rescue participant. The Downtown Women's Clinic in Portland, which has 4,000 to 5,000 patients annually - with 80 percent of their business in abortions - filed the lawsuit. "The abortionist said that the rescuers are damaging her business and that we're keeping women from their appointments," said Hager.

A RICO lawsuit is also being fought in Chicago. If the Pittsburgh ruling is affirmed at the Supreme Court level, civil rights protests would become open territory for similar lawsuits. Bonner said the statute doesn't concern freedom of speech, but violation of another's rights during exercise of the freedom of speech.

Brutality in the Name of Pro-Choice

Beside fighting courtroom battles, pro -abortion activists and clinic owners are demonstrating their anger in other ways. In Wichita, Kansas, a late-term abortionist, Dr. George Tiller, ran over a women's leg with his car during a rescue in front of his clinic. He also hit a policeman's motorcycle and ran into another car. His assistant then threw water on the rescuers. Dr. Tiller was charged with a felony for criminal assault.

At a Pennsylvania rescue, at least 30 women were stripped naked and forced to walk into Allegheny County Prison in front of male inmates. After being arrested on March 11, 1989, at the Allegheny Reproductive Health Center, they were dragged up five flights of stairs. "The guards grabbed the women by their bras and dragged them up the stairs until their bras broke and their shirts were pulled off," said Barbara Page, spokeswoman for Operation Rescue in Pittsburgh.

Attorney Debbie Lesko is representing the women, and Page said that she hoped that only 30 had gone through the brutal treatment. "Initially they didn't want to say anything because they agreed in jail not to draw attention from the babies saved," she explained, "but we had to do something." Lesko is gathering testimonies and developing the case. "We don't know what kind of lawsuit we're going to file," said Page, "and the district attorney asked the women to file individual complaints instead of a lawsuit."

According to the county warden, the women went through two strip searches. However, rescue participants are saying it was more. Their clothes were returned after the searches, but several women had to go into emergency for medical treatment. The women were arrested on March 11, and released March 13, in the morning. One woman with asthma problems was denied medical treatment by the prison warden. The medics were ordered not to give treatment until the woman had given her name; they violated the order when she went into cardiac arrest. A spokesman for the Pennsylvania Prison Society said the stripping and denial of medical treatment is commonplace at Allegheny County Prison.

Surprisingly the Pittsburgh media has not touched the issue of police brutality. "I distributed press releases to 750 media outlets, and I haven't gotten one call," Page explained. "I thought they would get into this kind of story, but they aren't doing anything." Page was served a notice from Allegheny prison officials asking her to retract her statement about prison conditions. "They said if I didn't retract that I was going to sue for libel and slander," she said. "So much for free speech."

In late February, Pittsburgh police also assaulted a man and six people. The six people were taken into emergency for treatment. "The police were dropping people with little remorse. They didn't seem concerned about people, they were dragging them by the feet and dropping them," said Page, a witness. Her husband, Chuck was assaulted by police. "They grabbed my ear to pull me up and got a piece of flesh and I slipped back," he explained. "I put my knees up because I'm so tall, and the officer stepped on my face. I wear glasses and my glasses went flying. I got billy clubbed on my right knee. He stood on my chest and knocked the wind out of me."

Page was then handcuffed and dragged down the bannister of six flights of stairs. "I charged the officer with assault, but during our hearing he said I pushed him. In the officer's written report, he said I kicked him. My chest was sore for three days." Not all policemen have been brutal, however. Some have even refused to arrest the rescuers and others have walked off the job. Chet Gallagher, an officer on duty at a rescue site in Las Vegas, Nevada, actually turned in his badge and joined the rescuers.

"I have the sworn responsibility to protect human life," explained Gallagher. "It alone is the highest call and most important duty of every commissioned peace officer. The protecting of human life is the priority that must be considered over less significant property and personal rights of others. Therefore I exercised my discretion as a commissioned law enforcement officer, choosing not to arrest these rescuers but standing with them in their attempt to prevent certain death to unborn children."

Joe Daniels, another police officer in Jackson, Mississippi, also quit two days after arresting rescuers. "I came to the realization that what is lawful is not necessarily good and righteous," he said. A 10-year police veteran, Daniels turned in his letter of resignation after arresting a woman and a couple with a small child. On the way to the police station, he said the people he'd arrested told him he was allowing abortions to be committed because he had removed them. They began praying aloud for him. As they prayed for him, he realized that he had compromised his Christian beliefs.

"I argued with myself that I've always taken pleasure in arresting the bad guys. I prided myself in my ability to bring the scales of justice to balance," he said. "But in this case, I have confused the good guys with the bad guys. And I have made a grievous error," he told the Jackson Clarion-Ledger. Daniels and his family have since moved to another town.

Abortion was the major issue in the last presidential election. Now it is haunting law enforcement officials, attorneys, and abortionists, and will soon be returning to the Supreme Court for another review. With crowds of people lying, sitting, and chanting in front of abortion clinics all over the U.S., and record numbers of rescues scheduled for 1989, it appears that America is on a collision course with Roe Vs. Wade and the havoc it has produced since 1973. If you would like more information about Operation Rescue, write:

First All-Black Rescue in Michigan

LANSING, MI (FR) - Sending another clear signal that Americans are rejecting the Roe Vs. Wade decision, a group of blacks in Lansing, Michigan, conducted the first all-black pro-life rescue in February of this year. Ten blacks were arrested for sitting in the packed waiting room of Womancare Clinic while chained together with kryptonite locks. Each of the rescue participants were charged with unlawful assembly and ordered to pay a $50 fine.

The rescue was organized by a former police officer, Greg Keath. Another organizer, Rev. Van Gayton of Mt. Zion Christian Assembly, New York, said the Lansing rescue was the start of an ongoing recruitment effort to get blacks involved in the pro-life movement. "According to the Department of Health and Human Services, 43 percent of the babies aborted are black," said Rev. Gayton. "We want to motivate blacks across the nation to get involved, since the majority of blacks are pro-life." Gayton was arrested in Atlanta for participating in a major rescue, and has been involved with the movement since last September.

Gayton explained that the abortion issue was a civil rights issue because of the similarity between the woman's right to her own body and the plantation owner's right to do what he wanted to do with his slave - a question in the Dred Scott slavery decision. During the rescue, which took place on February 25, Keath told reporters, "We as black women and men are here today to refute and to reject the recent stance of Jesse Jackson, Andrew Young, etc. regarding rescue demonstrations not being morally connected to the civil rights movement of the '60s and that our protests are trying to deny Americans their constitutional rights to freedom of choice.

"We state that there is a definite connection between the two, for just as Dred Scott declared our ancestors non-persons, and therefore devoid of rights under the law, so Roe vs. Wade has declared our children non-persons and stripped them of their constitutional rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

"One of our main goals is to expose Planned Parenthood because (it's founder) Margaret Sanger was a eugenist who believed that minority races should be eliminated. She had a negro project and had ministers and prominent blacks involved so she could penetrate the black community," he said. "Most of the major clinics today are in inner cities."

The Lansing rescue is likely to generate interest among black pro-life groups throughout the nation. Operation Rescue, the umbrella organization spearheading the national rescue movement, conducts non-violent sit-ins similar to those conducted by blacks during the civil rights demonstrations of the 1960s.

AUCKLAND, New Zealand (FR) - Abortion clinic rescues have been taking place in New Zealand for more than a year - all because one dedicated Christian has decided to give his life for the cause of the unborn. Ross Bolton, 50, a former auto electrician, has made national headlines due to his peaceful demonstrations.

Bolton has styled his protest after the American-based Operation Rescue, directed by Randall Terry, a minister and graduate of Elim Bible Institute in Lima, New York. Like Operation Rescue activists, Bolton and his followers block clinic entrances in order to stop women from obtaining abortions. For his efforts, Bolton has been sent to prison four times, serving over 40 weeks in jail since he started rescues in August of 1987.

One of Bolton's tactics which differs from Operation Rescue is the use of men over 60 years of age in the clinic rescues. "Older men have little to lose by going to jail for trespassing," says Bolton. Advertising flyers declare: "Senior Citizens for Junior Citizens ... It is a man's job to defend his nation. It is a special honor for men full of years to offer the remainder (of their lives) to those just beginning."

Bolton says he has received "incredible resistance" from religious leaders in New Zealand and even lukewarm response from Catholic priests who have been active in many American rescue efforts. During a New Zealand-wide day of rescue, called a "closing down celebration," only 20 pro-lifers gathered at protest sites in Auckland and Wellington. Bolton said he contacted 100 Catholic priests by letter and only one priest attended the protest at Epsom Day Hospital in Auckland.

The New Zealand press has labeled Bolton a "martyr ready to face jail again." News stories have circulated throughout New Zealand and press treatment has been respectful. During an interview with Charisma magazine from his jail cell, Bolton said he was puzzled by the lack of support from pro-life pastors in his nation: "When I come to town to visit them, they leave. They refuse to even let me speak with them." A young man from Wellington, Jeff Waklien, has joined Bolton's rescue movement but has yet to serve time in jail for his clinic-closing activities. Bolton, his wife, and young son live by donations sent from Christians who read press reports and follow Bolton's activities in Humanity, a pro-life newspaper which circulates throughout New Zealand.

Mrs. Bolton agrees with her husband's campaign, but is also hurt by the reluctance of many pastors to participate in clinic rescues. But despite the fact that some people have labeled him a fanatic, a newspaper in Auckland, Dominion Times, described Bolton as "an unlikely protestor, if only because of his very quiet manner." At least one pro-life leader interviewed said he admired Bolton, and said he not only planned to join his efforts but would also urge others to do the same.

Bolton expects the rescue movement in New Zealand to grow because of strong pro-life organizations which "are beginning to grab hold of what we are doing." Pro-lifers are following the progress of Operation Rescue in the U.S. and express a growing disgust at the increasing number of abortions being performed in their nation every year. Nearly 9,000 abortions are recorded in the nation of some 3 million inhabitants, up 9 percent over the last year's figure.

Why I Got Arrested In Brookline: Operation Rescue Story

By Jay Rogers
June, 1989

On December 31, 1988, I was arrested in Brookline, Massachusetts, for blocking the entrance to an abortion clinic with 100 other "rescuers." As I was being dragged away by the police, a television camera captured the moment for a local news telecast. During the next few days in jail I began to reflect on the events that led me to this action.

I was first arrested during a Rescue in Brookline, Massachusetts on New Year's Eve, 1988. This photo was taken of me during another arrest sometime in the spring of 1989, also for rescuing in Brookline. I was acquitted in both of these cases.

Read the Boston Globe story of January 1st, 1989 covering the same arrests of those who effectively rescued children being taken away to slaughter on New Year's Eve, 1988.

In the spring of 1988, I sat on the Capitol Mall in Washington, D.C., at an international prayer rally called Washington for Jesus. It was the largest prayer meeting in American history. One of the speakers at Washington for Jesus was Melody Green, co-founder and president of Last Days Ministries. Melody spoke for a few moments on abortion and then asked for a show of hands of all those who had done something to stop abortion. Very few of the Christians present could say that they had done anything. I was ashamed to be one of them.

"OK - All you people who did not raise your hand -" Melody continued in a direct but gracious manner, "You need to do something. This is not somebody else's ministry. This is your responsibility as a Christian. If every one of you did something, abortion could be stopped in our country."

At that moment I prayed a simple prayer asking God what I could do. I was sincerely repentant and promised God that when I saw an opportunity, I would be obedient to His leading.

At the end of last summer, I began to hear news reports about Operation Rescue. Non-violent sit-ins in Cherry Hill, Pennsylvania, and Atlanta, Georgia, caught my attention. Here were people actually getting arrested for blocking abortion clinics. "Wow," I thought, "This is pretty radical" - but I doubted if I could go as far as to do the same.

Then last December, six members of my church took part in several rescues in the New England area. Their testimonies challenged me to take action. Finally, on December 31, 1988, I was arrested in Brookline, Massachusetts, as a part of the most successful rescue in our state up until that time. "Evening Magazine," a local news program, showed a brief scene of me being carried onto a paddy wagon.

The three days I spent in jail, refusing to post bail until our arraignment in court, was a life changing experience. I met some of the leaders of the movement and had many of my questions answered. I was also able to spend many hours in a holding cell in uninterrupted prayer. The most remarkable aspect of this time, however, was the abiding sense of the presence of the Holy Spirit. This experience went far beyond the feelings I have had during worship meetings and personal prayer times. I can only describe it as a supernatural sense of peace - "the peace of God which surpasses all understanding" (Philippians 4:7).

1988 was a year of spiritual renewal for me. It was a time of spiritual battles and many struggles, but the same year resulted in a greater holiness in my personal life. This transformation led me to take part in social activism for the first time. This is the pattern in which Jesus Christ is moving His Church on a grander scale. The coming awakening is beginning with a call to a deeper consecration to God and will result in the transformation of society through the cleansed saints of God.

As you are reading this article I would urge you to ask God about taking part in Operation Rescue. You should pray about being arrested. Even after hearing Melody Green's message, it would have been easy to pass off my responsibility by performing some type of superficial observance. I could have signed a few more petitions and said a few more token prayers. Or I could have written letters to my senators and congressmen. Although these acts are necessary, I doubt their effectiveness. I imagined myself writing:

Dear Senator Kennedy,

As a member of the Christian community of Boston, I would like to express my support for a constitutional amendment banning abortion. I urge you to protect the rights of the unborn. etc.

The utter absurdity of the thought drove me to other alternatives. In Massachusetts the liberal mindset is synonymous with politics. Participating in a prayer rescue seemed to be the only logical alternative. I made this choice for several reasons.

* First, I had to enter the abortion battleground in an attitude of humility and repentance. In the time I had been a Christian I had done little for the unborn. Taking part in a prayer rescue was a strong decision for action. But my actions were not heroic. I had acted several years too late.

* Second, a prayer rescue is an act of intercession. Rescuers physically place their bodies between the abortionists and their victims. This is an effective tactic in the natural realm but rescues are also accompanied by spiritual intercession. Hundreds of Christians gather for hours of praise, worship and prayer at the abortion site. This is a powerful weapon against the demonic powers which are behind the abortion holocaust.

* Third, rescues help to fulfill the great commission. Jesus said, "As you go preach, saying, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand.' Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out demons; freely you received, freely give" (Matthew 10:7-8).

The rescues I have participated in have been powerful testimonies to the gospel of Jesus Christ. Prayer counselors successfully turn women away from killing their babies; the news media gives coverage to the rescuers thus creating a powerful issue out of abortion; Christians from different parts of the Church band together in love and achieve more unity in a shorter time than man's contrived attempts could possibly ever accomplish; young people in the holding cells of local police stations are often won to Jesus Christ through the evangelism of the rescuers; and the Holy Spirit moves in remarkable ways.

One of the most interesting aspects of a rescue, however, is the fulfillment of Jesus' words in Matthew 10:17-18: "But beware of men; for they will deliver you up to the courts, and scourge you in their synagogues; and you shall even be brought before governors and kings for my sake, as a testimony to them and to the Gentiles."

By clogging police stations and court systems for many hours, thousands of Christians are able to witness to those who are responsible for enforcing and making the law - police officers, lawyers, clerks, and judges. This is surely a fulfillment of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Standing In the Gap for America

So why haven't more Christians participated in a rescue? We need to understand the level of disobedience in the Church. To do this, it is useful to survey the history of Israel. When the Israelites first left Egypt, they were commanded to drive out the inhabitants of the land of Canaan and completely destroy them. The Canaanites were abominable to God for one reason - the pagan ritual of infant sacrifice.

The Hebrew people were under strict commandments to abstain from this evil practice of offering babies as sacrifices to pagan gods like Baal, Molech and Asherah. "Neither shall you give any of your offspring to offer them to Molech, nor shall you profane the name of your God; I am the Lord" (Leviticus 18:21). Furthermore, they were commanded to destroy the Canaanites' places of worship: "You shall tear down their altars, smash their sacred pillars, and hew down their Asherah poles, and burn their graven images with fire" (Deuteronomy 7:5).

God Himself had raised up the Hebrew people to put an end to this detestable practice. Not only were they commanded not to take part in this pagan ritual, but they were to be judged as guilty if they allowed it to continue and leave those responsible unpunished. They were warned by the Lord through Moses:

"Any man from the sons of Israel or from the aliens sojourning in Israel, who gives any of his offspring to Molech, shall surely be put to death; the people of the land shall stone him with stones. I will also set my face against that man and cut him off from among his people, because he has given some of his offspring to Molech, so as to defile My sanctuary and to profane My holy name. If the people of the land, however, should ever disregard that man when he gives any of his offspring to Molech, so as not to put him to death, then I Myself will set My face against that man and against his family: and I will cut off from among their people both him and those who play the harlot after him, by playing the harlot after Molech" (Leviticus 20: 2-5).

This is a strong warning. Under the Old Covenant a person who did not try to stop the murderer was as guilty as the murderer. They were to be judged as those who played the harlot after Molech. These people were detestable to God because they defiled His sanctuary by their indifference and they came under the same bloodguiltiness.

In 20th century America, Molech worship translates into abortion. While the abortionist is often not aware of the demonic power behind killing unborn children, he is nevertheless promoting a hellish practice. In modern terms, we must realize that when we do nothing to stop the abortionist we are also playing the harlot with a murderer.

In the Old Testament the entire nation of Israel came under bloodguiltiness for this reason. In the time of Jeremiah the city of Jerusalem came under judgment because "they built the high places of Baal that are in the valley of Ben-hinnom to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire to Molech ... " (Jeremiah 32:35). Although there had been some reforms during the reign of King Josiah, this practice provoked God to such a great extent that he judged both Israel and Judah.

Under the New Covenant we should not think that God is any less angry over millions of murdered unborn children than He was in the Old Testament. Their blood still cries out. The question of God's judgment is rhetorical: "Will God not judge a people such as this?" The question rather should be: "Will God's judgment bring us to redemption or annihilation?" Judgment will continue to unfold in the Church and in our nation until the abortion holocaust is stopped. The Church will share the responsibility for turning back the tide. Is it too late? Already the timetable is set in motion. Year after year, the moral fabric of our nation will continue to unravel until justice is established.

In the Old Testament, Israel was judged to annihilation but Judah was judged and brought back to redemption. Have we gone the route of Israel - or of Judah? The decision to repent and turn our faces back to God, asking Him to forgive us, lies with the Church.

If every professing Christian who believes that the Bible is the Word of God would take an active stand against abortion, it could be stopped in a short period of time. Operation Rescue is an excellent way to get involved. It is the best way to get right into the thick of the battle. God may then lead you to do other things. But remember, there are no heroes in this movement. We are all guilty for acting 17 years too late.

We have a decision to make. So far the Church has been losing the abortion battle because of apathy and careless ease. But today we have a clear witness - we must rise up and stop the shedding of innocent blood.

SCORES ARRESTED DURING BROOKLINE ABORTION PROTESTS 200 DEMONSTRATORS ARE COUNTERED BY PROCHOICE GROUPS AT 2 CLINICS

Section: METRO

Page: 29

By Gus Martins, Contributing Reporter

BROOKLINE -- About 75 antiabortion advocates were arrested yesterday during demonstrations at two Beacon Street clinics that offer abortions.

Police estimated that 200 people participated in the antiabortion demonstrations at 1031 and 1297 Beacon St. They were countered by as many as 100 prochoice advocates.

Many of those arrested, whom a protest leader identified as members of Boston's Pro-Life Action Network, were transported by police in a bus from the Repro Associates clinic at 1297 Beacon St.

About 50 of the arrests were made in two police actions in front of the clinic. Others were made sporadically during the seven-hour demonstration in front of Repro.

Four protesters were arrested before 8 a.m. at the Planned Parenthood Clinic of Greater Boston at 1031 Beacon St., located about one mile east of Repro.

Brookline police Capt. Frank Hayes said the 60 officers deployed at the two demonstration scenes acted only against protesters who were found to be trespassing.

"We have a dual responsibility to protect conflicting rights," he said. "The protesters have a right to assemble, but they don't have a right to block an entranceway of any private business."

On Nov. 26, another demonstration was held at Planned Parenthood by Boston's Pro-Life Action Network and by Operation Rescue, a national group with which the network is associated. The local group also staged similar protests at clinics in Boston and Providence on earlier Saturdays in November.

Hayes said that about 30 demonstrators had gained access to Repro before police and that they had to be physically removed from the building. Two officers and three protesters were injured slightly, but none were hospitalized, Hayes said.

Clients, who were seen entering the clinic, were able to keep their appointments, police said. They entered the building to loud jeers and religious and moral pleas from the protesters not to go in.

Bill Cotter, a director of the Pro-Life Action Network, said that the protesters were guided by moral and religious convictions.

"We are here to try to prevent children from being killed in this abortion mill," he said. "We want to offer women alternatives and try to persuade them to make the choice for life.

"Abortionists and people on the other side act consistently with their beliefs," he added. "We believe abortion is murder, and we have to act consistent with our belief."

Ellen Zucker, a vice president of the Boston chapter of the National Organization for Women, said the counterdemonstration was organized shortly after hearing of the antiabortion protest.

"Even on the last day of the year and with people on vacation, the Boston prochoice community and NOW were able to assemble almost as many people as the antiabortionists themselves," she said.

Helene Weitzenkorn, also of NOW, said her group favors women's rights and decisions based on what they deem is best for themselves.

"We are out here today to support women trying to enter the clinic to exercise their right to receive a legal and safe abortion," she said.

Weitzenkorn charged that the protesters did not represent the majority of Americans.

The antiabortion demonstrators sang hymns and prayed in unison. Sister Miriam Patrice from St. John's Parish in Quincy said that the protest was designed to give a voice to unborn children.

"We are standing here to say in the name of God that children inside their mothers have a right to life," she said. "We are speaking in behalf of the children who cannot speak for themselves."

Kimberly Veltri, a Clayton, N.J., resident, criticized the legality of abortion. "Abortion and the killing and taking of an innocent is wrong," she said. "It is man's law, and God has called on us to pass his law."

Veltri, the mother of a 2 1/2-year-old son, said that she had participated in numerous such protests in several Eastern states during the last two years.

Tina Krail, of Willingboro, N.J., said that she had undergone two abortions and that she wanted to dissuade women who are contemplating having an abortion.

"I made the first decision when I was 17 and the second one at a time when both me and my husband were using drugs. Since Christ came into my life, I have regretted making those choices," Krail said.

Rebecca Goldfader, a counselor at Planned Parenthood, said that the decision to have an abortion is personal and should be made by the affected woman, with advice from loved ones.

"Women should have the right to decide," she said. "Prochoice gives us our right to choose."

Hartford Rescue

By David MacLean
10/89

In an age such as ours, when God's people are called upon to confront officially sanctioned evil, we may find ourselves faced with painful and life changing decisions.

As I sat in a West Hartford, Connecticut courthouse on Monday, June 19th, 1989, I weighed my options: either I would post bail and return to my job working with retarded adults, or I would strengthen my stand, remaining in police custody indefinitely and risk losing my job. Ultimately, I remained in jail for 24 days and every single day brought a new testimony of God's faithfulness and provision.

This was the seventh time that I had participated in Operation Rescue - a non-violent sit-in on the site of an abortion clinic - and the second time I had been arrested. I had arrived in Hartford on Saturday morning and had spent several hours blocking the stairwell leading to an abortion clinic along with 300 other people. Christians from many different backgrounds had come together in an attitude of repentance, praying and physically interceding for the children who were to be slaughtered that day. The outpouring of the Holy Spirit on those who had gathered there was breathtaking, and there was a unity and fellowship which transcended denominational barriers. This is Christianity the way it is intended to be!

As the day wore on, our success became apparent: no abortions were likely to take place that day, and at least one woman had changed her mind, deciding to receive the help of our counseling services rather than kill her baby. But there was one more detail that needed to be taken care of. In order to make sure that the clinic would remain closed, some rescuers were needed to block the buses being used to transport those who had been arrested. By causing further delays, we would insure that the clinic would remain closed. I agreed to go along and will never forget what happened next.

The whole scene was unbelievable: out in the parking lot, policemen were cursing, blaspheming, and in some cases, brutally torturing the rescuers. Men were groaning in pain as their hands were being stepped on. Older women (some past 60 years) were being dragged painfully by their handcuffed arms. I placed my body under a police bus and was there for a minute or two before being dragged out and painfully and tightly handcuffed.

When I responded to this abuse by audibly praying and forgiving the arresting officer, he grew visibly angry and when the time came for me to be dragged on the bus, the arresting officer threatened to break my wrists if I didn't walk. When I responded by singing and praising God, the officer almost proved his threat, but fortunately I am quite limber, and his best efforts (lifting me by my cuffed wrists, bending them back as far as possible while dragging me on the bus and jamming my wrists against the seats) did not succeed. I will never forget the unfettered anger I saw that day. All that I had heard about violence against blacks during the civil rights marches of the 1960s did not prepare me for that day in Connecticut.

Even as we were brought into a West Hartford courtroom, the abuse continued. One man, who was overweight and suffering from hypoglycemia, screamed in pain as police dragged him across the courtroom floor. We stayed there for two nights, and when our bail was set for that Monday morning, Judge Raymond Norko (who said that he ordered the police "to use no more pain compliance") sat and watched as a non-compliant rescuer was kicked by policemen.

Finally, we were brought to the Hartford County Corrections Center, where those of us who refused bail spent the next 20 days. I spent most of my time apart from the other rescuers in a barracks style bunk house along with 104 other men, most of whom were awaiting trial for felony charges.

What can I say about this painful yet precious time? God proved Himself faithful every day, as I learned first hand what it was like to be at the mercy of our arbitrary and overcrowded prison system. I had often dreamed of ministering to prisoners, but God gave me the practical every day experience of getting to know these men whose lives were in pieces as our court system repeatedly denied them their right to a speedy trial. The privilege of sharing my faith in Jesus Christ with dozens of men (including two struggling Christians) was absolutely priceless. And in my darkest hour, God compounded the blessing by using one of them to minister to me!

Ultimately, I emerged entirely unhurt: God protected both my physical body and my job, and made more fervent than ever my desire to see reform brought to every aspect of our society by the power of His Spirit!

In a scene out of hell, West Hartford police cruelly and unceasingly brutalized hundreds of Rescuers at the Summit Women's abortion mill in West Hartford on Saturday, June 17, 1989. The abortuary is located in a shopping mall with a large parking lot. Over 500 prayer supporters had gathered outside, while 281 others entered the third-floor procedure rooms where the killing is done. Those present were from all over the Northeast corridor: New York, New Jersey, Vermont, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania.

At approximately 11:00 a.m., police - wearing no badges or name tags - threatened to arrest picketers if they did not move to the sidewalk on the street side of the parking lot. They used billy clubs to prod the protestors, arresting a 68-year-old mother of 12 who stumbled, was knocked to the ground and handcuffed. The same was done to her 70-year-old husband when he objected; and then to a photographer whose film the police deliberately exposed after he was arrested for taking pictures.

This is when police first employed strappado - that was to become the standard arrest technique used throughout the day. Strappado is an ancient form of torture where the victim's hands are cuffed (in this case, plastic cuffs) behind the back. Next, billy clubs are inserted in each arm and then jerked up so that the victim's full body weight is either dangling or left to drag.

Since the public was driven from the mall, Rescue supporters went to the police station to check on the safety of those arrested. Police brutality - which included forced strip searches - had been visited on the Rescuers at an April 1st Rescue in West Hartford and the fear of more savagery was in the air - for good reason.

At the police station, one by one, men and women, whether young or old were dragged off the bus head first and dropped face down on the pavement - except for those who had already been subject to too much pain. Most everyone else was completely limp, totally peaceful. They winced, many with faces contorted in agony; some moaning, some screaming. As their bodies swung on the sticks, some were kneed or kicked by police.

Retired 72-year-old Bishop George Lynch was dragged off the bus, back first. His arms were then bent upward and he was dragged on the seat of his pants for several yards with the police twisting his arms and wrists. Finally, the pain was too great and he was forced to walk the few remaining yards into the police station.

By 8:00 p.m., the last Rescuer was dragged into the police station. Moans and screams could be heard from inside. The prisoners were denied access to lawyers and medical doctors. After the police denied an epileptic her medicine, she eventually had a seizure in custody, two days later, on June 19th. Only then were the paramedics brought in. Rescuers were consistently denied access to any legal and medical attention.

Another woman, a nurse and mother of two, had her shoulder dislocated while being arrested in the abortion mill. In an affidavit, she stated that the police had used mace while arresting. She had put syrup on her neck so that pressure point holds could not be used. This angered the police arresting her and they grabbed her by the hair and bashed her head on the ground, causing her to black out. Later, she was picked up by her hair and carried onto the bus, according to eyewitnesses. When she went to the hospital after her release, an attending nurse was stunned by the clumps of hair that were pulled out. One priest lay face down on the floor of the bus for the three-mile ride to the station. His wrists were bleeding from the too tight handcuffs. Some people were held in strangleholds; fingers were bent back.

Our people will willingly endure whatever the state imposes with gratitude, for it is their deepest purpose to eliminate the double standard that separates the preborn from the rest of humanity. One baby is confirmed alive and well in its mother's womb and will be brought to term. This was the victory our Rescuers sought and won in the face of a perverse and corrupt police department and legal system. They will not be stopped from saving babies.

Saving Superman: Operation Rescue Testimony

- by Laurie W. Porter

It was only a few hours ago that I followed the small group of cars through the drizzling rain. We had left the District Court, necessary papers in hand, and drove down residential streets of the small Pennsylvania town. It could have been mistaken for a funeral procession - we were solemn - but I felt nervous and excited, like on the first day of school. I didn't know what awaited us - humiliation? physical danger? an adventure?

We stopped at a pre-arranged point at the edge of town where another volunteer waited. She showed us the rest of the way past woods and old farm houses to the harsh institution that didn't seem to belong among the gentle Pennsylvania hills.

We parked our cars in a muddy makeshift lot. Seven others were with me: two retired couples, a single man, and two middle-aged fathers. We were expected. The guard glanced at our papers through the window and the locks on the heavy doors clicked open - just long enough for us to enter. The doors slammed and locked behind us, the deep thud resounding through reinforced metal and cement walls.

I rarely violate laws, except for an occasional speed limit, and have been considered a good girl for most of my 27 years. After graduating with honors from a Big 10 university, I worked for an international relief organization and a national women's education group on Capitol Hill. I attend church, vote regularly, and call my mother every few weeks. I never dreamed I'd do anything that would send me to jail.

We were checked into Westchester County prison with unending paperwork, finger printing (three times: for the state, county, and FBI) and mug shots (I smiled for mine - if I'm going to have a record, I reasoned, it might as well be a nice looking one). They locked me in a cell on the women's floor, but not before I was strip searched, sprayed with a de-licing chemical and given the worn drab-green uniform of inmates of cell-block C.

Now I'm alone in my cell, accompanied by the sound of barred doors sliding shut, guards' footsteps echoing down the hall, and an inmate's radio on a rock and roll station. I'm sitting down at a metal slab table protruding from the wall. Behind me is a stainless steel commode with no seat, to my side, a matching slab bunk bed with foam mattress, ripped sheets and stained flat pillow, no case.

My thoughts go back to the event that brought me here, the crime I committed over seven months ago last summer. I joined 591 others on Independence Day weekend to block the doorways of an abortion clinic outside Philadelphia, the "city of brotherly love."

As we were arrested and read our rights, we let our bodies go limp. The officers carried most of us away on stretchers. I remember a Catholic monk being picked up under his arms as he knelt in prayer. They loaded us on buses - Catholics, Jews, and Protestants, from teenagers to retirees - and took us to be booked and released an hour later.

We were found guilty of trespassing and fined $65. Yet I did not believe the judgment was justified. I had broken a lesser law to protect lives. Although jumping into a neighbor's pool may be violating private property, it is forgivable if rescuing a drowning child. It would be a crime not to try.

So instead of paying the fine, I opted for the prison sentence - one 24 hour period. Because there were so many of us, we were imprisoned a few at a time, over a period of several months.

Now I am in this cinder block and stainless steel room with the only personal belongings the guards allowed: my toothbrush, and extra pair of underwear, and a pocket New Testament. I borrowed a pen from another inmate before I was locked in, and I'm writing my thoughts on the only paper available - the toilet roll.

I even have a window - through the reinforced steel panes I see walls topped with huge loops of barbed wire that remind me of broken slinkies. The walls and guard towers hide the woods I drove through only a few hours ago. I've only been here a few hours, but I wish I could see those wooded hills.

I let my thoughts drift - over the hidden hills, across the state, 300 miles away, where my 6-year-old nephew is finishing his lunch and getting ready for a nap. His grandmother will tuck him in and give him a kiss. Stuffed animals will surround him - a giraffe, teddy bears, a hippo.

Some of his favorite games we play together when I visit are about superheros. Lindsay loves the type of superhero toy that turns from a rock into a robot man, conquers the enemy and turns back into a rock. He likes the kind with big muscles and sharp swords, the kind that are invincible - no matter what you do to them, they never die, but come back fighting.

I remember sitting for hours in the sun on the asphalt outside the abortion clinic. A man with a bullhorn led a prayer asking God to forgive us and our nation for allowing over 4,000 pre-born babies to be killed every day since Roe vs. Wade. I couldn't even comprehend those figures. All I could think of was Lindsay.

I cried at the idea of Lindsay's little body being cut up with a scalpel, sucked out with a vacuum. I cried when I thought I almost never had the chance to wrap him in my arms, to read him bedtime stories, to play superhero games with him, or to promise him I'd wait for him to grow up so we could get married.

Lindsay says he wants to be a superhero when he grows up.

He almost didn't get the chance - the territory of his mother's womb was almost trespassed into and his life almost arrested - he nearly paid the penalty for his parents' pre-marital passion. Before they decided to marry, some of his relatives suggested they just take care of "the problem" in the simplest way. A standard medical procedure would relieve the pressure and they could still get married at leisure if they wanted.

Instead, Lindsay became the first grandchild on both sides of the family and the apple of all his relatives' eyes. After the initial embarrassment and attempts to cover up his too early birth, it was clear he would not suffer for lack of love or attention. Every birthday, holiday, and for no occasion at all, those who thrive on seeing him happy give him toys, books, clothes, and stuffed animals.

He's my little hero. He made it, a survivor in a way he knows nothing about. He escaped joining the casualties, those who might have been future classmates - nameless bloody body parts in plastic bags, tossed in anonymous dumpsters behind anonymous clinics. Not everyone is invincible.

I hope Lindsay becomes a superman, like the baby superman tucked in a rocket by his parents and blasted away into space just before his planet totally disintegrated. Landing on earth, not knowing fully his roots but sensing his destiny, he grew up to help the earth's inhabitants, humans who needed superhuman assistance.

I am not a superwoman. I am human, and conscious of my need for superhuman assistance. I was afraid to block the abortion chamber door - afraid of having a criminal record, being denied future employment, concerned about what my family would think. I was afraid of being hurt, as I knew others had been, my arm yanked and twisted behind me or pressure points pinched until they bled to get me to move when I let my body go limp. I was afraid I would not be courageous, maybe cry out in pain. I was nervous about jail - spending time with hardened criminals - dare I sleep at night?

But with all these human fears, I am more afraid for the superheros who may never make it out of the krypton worlds of their mother's wombs before they are ripped apart, before they can be propelled out to a new world where others unknowingly need them.

You see, I'm not very heroic - I don't pretend to be - but I just couldn't live with myself if I didn't do something to try and save some lives, if only a few of the millions. I'm more afraid of when my grandchildren learn with horror of the holocaust of babies. They will look up at me with inquisitive eyes, an old woman with my stockings wrinkled around by ankles and poor eyesight, and ask, "Grammy, what did you do when they were killing the babies?"

My petty fears of family shame, police brutality, reputation, and risking job security will seem like nothing and I would have been left to rock away the rest of my days in regret that I did not act when I had the chance.

Tomorrow I'll be outside these walls, I'll drive back home to Washington, D.C., my friends and my work, and my own bed with three pillows, with cases. I'll tell people it wasn't as scary as I thought it would be. Most of the guards and inmates were even friendly, and the food wasn't much worse than that of my high school cafeteria.

Tomorrow I'll celebrate - but soberly - that I'm out of jail, that lives were saved when I helped block the clinic doors, and that I'm a proud aunt to a future superman. Tomorrow I'll celebrate a time when humans became superheros.

What's Happening in Wichita, Kansas

Editor's Note: John Collins of Tampa, Florida, a freelance photographer, went to Wichita to cover the Operation Rescue story. Believing that the national media had little to say that wasn't skewed toward the pro-abortion side; and little to say that didn't include a distortion of the facts, Collins investigated the Operation Rescue activities in Wichita. In addition to taking many revealing photos, he has compiled a story which accurately describes what took place on the pro-life side. Since so much of what is supposedly "objective reporting" by trained journalists pales when politicized issues come to the forefront, we wanted to include the "other side of the story." By no means are we claiming to be non-partisan on the issue of abortion issue, but merely factual - an element that has been missing from the reporting from Wichita.

The recent events in Wichita, Kansas have put it on the front page of virtually every major publication in the country. Operation Rescue has been blocking the doors to three abortion clinics. A federal judge has stepped in, possibly beyond his jurisdiction, to attempt to stop the protests. He has levied unprecedented fines against the organization, ordered the leaders arrested, and sentenced those arrested beyond any reasonable length of time.

On August 25, Operation Rescue vowed to pull out, if their leaders were released. The "final" weekend proved to be filled with major events and more controversy than any other.

In the midst of heavy police harassment, thousands of rural Kansas residents poured into Wichita Saturday morning to parade around the city in their tractors, trucks and cars.

The parade allowed the rural residents to show their views on the abortion issue and it gave them an opportunity to thank the organizations, including Operation Rescue, who have been in the city for the past month. "We just wanted to show our support for them," said Donna Terry of Harper, a small city about 40 miles southwest of Wichita.

The parade route covered about 20 miles and was full of pro-life vehicles the majority of the way. Trucks, with signs saying "Farmers for Life," "The heartland is pro-life" and "Stop Killing Babies," were cheered on as they drove through town. There were only about ten groups of vocal people who were pro-abortion, over the 20 mile route.

A large group gathered downtown at the corner of Waco and Douglas, where a Pro-choice/NOW rally was breaking up. Hundreds of pro-choicers were there shouting: "Go back to the farm!" But these farmers were not going anywhere until their message got through.

One tractor had an incinerator on it and a wheelbarrow full of dolls, with a sign that said "Hitler 6; America 27," referring to the millions of dead babies aborted each year in America.

The parade route continued down Kellogg Street where the office of George Tiller is located. This clinic became the center of controversy because it does abortions in the second and third trimesters of pregnancy. One truck, with three children in the back, had a sign that said: "Here's three you didn't get, Tiller."

Hundreds of pro-lifers, about 25 pro-choicers and 50 police officers were gathered on the sidewalks in front of the office. The pro-lifers waved support and yelled, "Thanks for coming!" to the passing parade. The crowd was made up of people of all ages, including some senior citizens. One man played hymns on his trumpet, right outside the clinic door.

While much of the controversy in Wichita has been over the belief that most of the members of the blockade were from out of state. About 95% of the vehicles had Kansas tags.

One of the participants in the parade was Doyle Terry, a former police officer in Wichita for 25 years. Terry said that the actions of the police department in Wichita embarrassed him so much, he was "reluctant to admit that I am a former officer." He also said: "If an officer under me had kicked the protesters, like I saw on TV last night, they wouldn't have been on my force anymore."

In another van, Loretta Ellerbee, a seasoned rescuer from San Antonio, Texas, talked about the pro-choice children she saw in front of Dr. Tiller's office. "It breaks my heart to see their parents brainwashing them, saying that killing is alright."

While Maureen Moore, a pro-choicer from Wichita, admitted the group was outnumbered at the clinic, she added that "there was a big rally downtown with about 400 people."

The rally she was referring to was attended by 3000 people, even though nationally known pro-choice advocates such as Eleanor Smeal were brought in from around the country. Since the abortion clinics closed that Saturday, the pro-life supporters were not attending a rescue. A large portion of that crowd was curious pro-life supporters.

Later that evening, a pro-life rally and concert downtown was attended by 10,000 pro-life supporters. Hosted by musician, Rich Mullen, who lives in Wichita, the concert drew very little media attention. One local news broadcast even estimated the crowd at 2500. Mike Stand, of the Altar Boys, flew in from California to let the crowd know that the rescuers from California supported their efforts. Also performing were Cause and Effect, a rap group from Chicago, and several local singers and speakers.

During the concert, on the other side of a small hill, there was a temporary grave yard. The headstones were dedicated to women who have died during abortions, since it has been legal. The headstones had newspaper clippings attached with stories about the clinics and women.

As the celebration from the stage continued, the crowd was reminded that there that there were those still in jail because of their attempts to save babies. A prayer vigil at the jail was announced immediately following the concert.

Outside the jail, police officers were leaving the work, while Christians of many different backgrounds joined together to pray. This crowd dispersed only to be replaced by another crowd which came to continue the vigil through the night.

As the prayer vigil continued outside the jail, back at the Wichita Plaza Hotel, the command center for Operation Rescue worked quickly to get information out. A sign on the door read: "Meet at the deck at 6:30 AM - Emergency! BABIES LIVES are at stake."

As the sun came up the next morning, car loads of rescuers quietly left the hotel. Their destination: The Wichita Family Planning Center. Typically closed on Sundays, the clinic would open to make up for money lost by being closed by Operation Rescue on Saturday. The rescue had no resistance at first, because no one expected it. The doors to the clinic were blocked off by 7 AM. The sidewalks were crowded with around 300 protesters carrying signs. When the abortionist and his entourage of workers arrived at 8:30 AM they had to wait for the police to clear the doorways.

On the sidewalks, crowds prayed and sang songs of hope. The crowd was made up of several groups, including Operation Rescue, Hope for the Heartland, and Sidewalk Counselors. The crowd at the door locked arms and prayed. A Wichita Police officer maced the peaceful protesters. The same officer, while attempting to pull the crowd apart began punching an elderly man. After realizing he was being videotaped, the officer stopped and backed away.

Dr. Christopher Deatherage, a member of the Reformed Christian Church, a sect similar to the Amish, brought his family from Chamois, Missouri. It seemed odd to observers to see a man dressed in Amish style clothes to be at the rescue. He explained: "We obey the law in every way possible. We do not speed. We do not steal. But when man's law comes above God's law, you have to do something. We attempt to do it as reverently and lovingly as possible. But the killing must be stopped."

Around 9 AM, a black female, her mother, and a friend wrapped towels around their heads and ran past the protesters into the clinic. The protesters offered her whatever she needed if she would change her mind and not have an abortion. Twenty minutes later, she came out and said she could not go through with it. This would be the 30th baby saved since Operation Rescue came to Wichita.

Later, a teenage girl who was being forced by her mother to have an abortion came to the clinic. She got to the rescuers and was taken to a safe house to continue her pregnancy. Life number 31 was saved. This brave girl was the one who tipped off the Operation Rescue that the clinic would be open on Sunday.

The herds of media quickly left the clinic to rush to Cessna Stadium at Wichita State University. One of the largest pro-life rallies in history was taking place. A crowd of 15,000 was expected. As Mary Wilkinson, spokesperson for Hope for the Heartland began the rally, cars were still backed up for miles, trying to park.

Wilkinson started the afternoon, by thanking Operation Rescue for coming to Wichita. This set off a standing ovation that lasted three minutes. It was clear that, contrary to the plane flying overhead pulling a banner that proclaimed that Wichita is pro-choice, this city is very opposed to abortion.

By the time Pat Robertson spoke, about 30,000 people had crowded into the stadium, sitting in the stands and in the the grassy end zones areas. Robertson drew several standing ovations during his speech. The most rousing came when he called for people to back Representative Robert Dornan's move to impeach Judge Kelly. Other speakers included: Beverly LaHaye, president of Concerned Women for America; Dr. Paul Davis, director of the 130 doctor coalition, Physicians for Life; Don Wildmon, president of the American Family Association; and a host of local ministers from several denominations.

As the rally came to a close, it was clear that the people of Wichita will work together to make Wichita the first major abortion-free-city in America. Father Jim Connely said, "At first I didn't think it was possible, but now I believe we can do it. It won't be easy. It's a long road. But we don't want abortion to be what Wichita is known for anymore."

In the national news media's coverage of the Operation Rescue activities in Wichita, Kansas, I noticed a curious omission. I do not see any mention as to why pro-lifers are peacefully blocking access to Dr. George Tiller's abortion center. That particular doctor brags about his "expertise" in doing third trimester abortions. He has publicly stated that he does them up to 8 1/2 months of pregnancy for any reason. If the Operation Rescue people can keep these pregnant mothers out of the hands of George Tiller for a few more days, these women may actually go into labor and deliver their full term, healthy babies.

Dr. Tiller states himself that he does 600 of these third trimester abortions per year. That amounts to 10 per week. These babies are in their 7th, 8th and 9th months of development. Were these children to be born, at the time of their otherwise scheduled abortion, they would stand an excellent chance of survival outside the womb. Dealing with the bodies of all these aborted children can be quite a problem. That is why Dr. Tiller has installed an incinerator into his abortion center - to burn the bodies of these babies.

Most of the mainstream media have consistently down-played or totally ignored the fact that these third trimester abortions are going on in Wichita. This is the kind of carnage which Roe vs. Wade has wrought. Is it something that the public should be kept in the dark about? Perhaps reporting the full Wichita story would undercut what little support there is for legalized abortion.

The Federal Judge in this case says that the local police have not "dealt adequately" with Operation Rescue. I can imagine the reluctance any policeman of good will would have in leading an 8 month pregnant woman into a place where a near-full-term baby will be snuffed out. The next time you see a newborn baby, imagine if it were his or her lifeless body about to be tossed coldly into George Tiller's incinerator. Roe vs. Wade was a far cry from a sane, reasoned and human decision. It ought to be overturned.

Cities of Refuge: An Interview with Keith Tucci

Director of Operation Rescue National

Operation Rescue is now holding a two-month training seminar for what it calls "cities of refuge," an event for the summer of 1993. OR will be training rescuers not just to block abortion clinics, but to also influence every facet of society in ridding our nation of legalized child killing.

When Roe v. Wade was decided in 1973, most of the evangelical church in America was too culturally irrelevant to be motivated to political action in fighting legalized abortion. In the 1980s, the pro-life movement was galvanized by the election of two pro-life presidents. Political activism increased bringing new awareness to the public over the abortion issue. Operation Rescue then burst onto the scene gaining national attention and bringing the abortion debate to the center stage. The furor and controversy sparked by the nonviolent prayer rescues and the blocking of abortion clinic entry ways made abortion the nation's number one social issue in the 1988 election. In the summers of 1991 and 1992, Operation Rescue staged national rescues in cities such as Wichita and Binghamton, New York. The national media coverage, although negative, ensured that the Rescue movement was not going to quietly die down.

On the 20th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade decision, President Bill Clinton signed five executive orders making the killing of babies easier than ever before and giving freedom for medical experimentation on living pre-born babies. This action has daunted all but a few in the pro-life movement.

In January, The Forerunner spoke with Keith Tucci, national director of Operation Rescue, asking some questions concerning the Rescue Movement's strategy for the 1990s:

FR: What is the ideology behind "cities of refuge" - the staging of national rescues in strategic cities such as what happened in Wichita?

Keith Tucci: "Cities of refuge" is a concept taken from Deuteronomy chapter 19. The Lord commanded Israel to build six cities to which an innocent man could run "lest innocent blood be shed." Obviously, the connotation is with someone who killed someone else by accident, but the principle there is that God is so concerned about the shedding of innocent blood that He wanted Israel to actually erect six cities of refuge. We believe that the Church is a city - a light set on a hill - and we should be creating cities of refuge where mothers can have a place to run [rather than seek an abortion]. In the past, we've done one national event in the summer. We felt that we could duplicate those efforts at a great reduction of cost: for instance, five cities for what it would cost us to do two. We're not talking about taking a national event and dividing it, but multiplying that one national event. We are going to be in cities that are strategically and geographically located so that people in almost every sector of the country, or within a day's drive, can be there and participate.

FR: So instead of having one Wichita, there will be six?

Keith Tucci: Exactly.

FR: Is Operation Rescue taking a different turn now, in training people not only to do rescues, but to influence every aspect of society?

Keith Tucci: It's not different from anything we've done before. We've just never taken the time to do the training. Our whole involvement has been to impact the culture. Our thinking has always been that abortion is just a symptom of a much greater problem. We've got to change the cultural power bases of our nation. That comes through Christian influence - but how do we get Christian influence? We've never done the systematic teaching on this and had a group of people lectured and demonstrated to by a group of people who have actually done it. This school concept is something we've had for years but it never got off the ground. This past year we felt that we had to get it done.

FR: What are you calling the school?

Keith Tucci: The IMPACT school: Institute of Mobilized Prophetic Activated Christian Training.

FR: What are some of the things you'll be teaching?

Keith Tucci: There's an emphasis on character and personal holiness - that being the foundation of everything we do. We can't recreate or reproduce anything that we are not. We're teaching personal, tactical and spiritual issues. As far as subject matter, we are teaching everything from "spiritual warfare" to "How to use the media before they use you." We're having doctors who used to perform abortions come in to teach about abortion and what really happens. We are teaching debating techniques; organizational techniques; how to build community alliances; how to network with people. We have several classes on the legal aspect of rescues as well.

FR: Since the rescues started in the mid-1980s, even the secular media has admitted that this is the main event that made abortion into an issue again. However, there has been a negative reaction by some in the Christian media lately who were previously favorable. How would you respond to Christians who are no longer favorable?

Keith Tucci: The church has realized that we are not just an event. We are talking about a lifestyle. We are no longer accomplices to the shedding of innocent blood in the many concentration camps going on in our country. Unfortunately, the church in our culture has an "event" mentality: "Let's come to a meeting; let's do one thing and then let's do something else." Rather than: "Let's have victory; let's have dominion, so that the next generation can take the gospel to the further ends of the world." What's happening now is that they are standing back and counting the cost. It's easier to attack the people who are saying: "This is how much it costs," than it is to try to dig the gold.

FR: What would you say to people who would call you arrogant, dangerous or counter-productive?

Keith Tucci: They just haven't taken the time to know the rescue movement. I'm sure there are people who make very grave and serious mistakes. Obviously, we can't be responsible for every person in the rescue movement any more than a denomination can take responsibility for every pastor who has ever fallen into sin or has ever done anything stupid or arrogant. If they say we are arrogant, I would say wholeheartedly that they haven't taken the time to get to know the true servant-leaders of the movement, or they haven't been involved themselves in the rescue movement. If they say we're counter-productive, I would say that they are listening to the wrong sources. They need to look at the grass-roots. Since Operation Rescue started, over 500 abortuaries in this country have shut down; there are less practicing abortionists than there have been in a decade; there are less medical colleges that teach abortion. We are getting hammered in the political arena, but that is not a problem with Operation Rescue. That just shows the fallacy of the failed political strategies of pro-life and conservative groups. It has very little to do with us. I think that we've helped to hold it together a little bit longer. So I think these people are looking at the wrong symptoms. Wouldn't it be wonderful if all the politicians let abortion be legal, but there wasn't a community in the country who would let an abortionist practice?

FR: So what you're looking at is making it impossible for an abortuary to function in this country?

Keith Tucci: We've got to make it intolerable and only then will we make it illegal. In the history of cultural change in this nation, it was usually the grass-roots and the church who dictated change. Abolition of slavery is the most obvious example. When they dictated change by their actions and by their willingness to spend themselves, then and only then did it become illegal. I'm a firm believer that things don't happen from the top down; they happen because the church will make a decision or won't make a decision. We made a very key foundational error 20 years ago in the pro-life movement: we began to try to convince the world - and either falsely assumed the church was in agreement or even made an even bigger assumption in that we didn't have to convince the church - but it was a key tactical error that has caused the church a lot of grief.

FR: Convince them that abortion is wrong?

Keith Tucci: That abortion is MURDER and that it is not optional to be in resistance to it.

FR: I was with Daroline Firlet and Bill Cotter in Massachusetts four years ago in the rescues in Brookline. I saw the humility in them and the willingness to stand up for the truth even more than their own families and their own lives. That had a great affect on me. Daroline is a fireball, definitely, but both of them are very humble people. I know that they are now serving the most severe prison sentences of anyone in the rescue movement. So I've been offended at some of the Christians who have ignorantly made these defamatory comments about the leaders of the rescue movement.

Keith Tucci: That's my feeling too. I'm not saying that there are not people out there like that. But they do not represent the rescue movement. They certainly don't represent the leadership. If I were going to judge a certain ministry, for instance, and cite all the inconsistencies and then hold the leader accountable, he would say: "How can you hold me responsible for that?" Even though I try to do a good job, I would say the same thing. If people hold us up to standards that they are not willing to be judged by, then they are making a very big mistake.

FR: It seems as though there has been a shift in the ideology of the leaders in the rescue movement. Someone told me that the leaders are moving towards a postmillennial worldview and the ideals of "taking dominion." Would you agree with this statement?

Keith Tucci: No, I wouldn't agree with it. I don't think there has been any shift at all. I think there has been an outworking of some things that were always foundational. Certainly, there are a lot of people in our group who don't have a postmillennial worldview - me being one of them. I think that someone standing on the outside looking at us might think that. But a lot of what is happening is an outworking of what was laid down in the beginning. We have sown some seed and that seed is producing a holy harvest right now. And that seed has not come without great expense.

FR: There are people in the church who have a fatalistic view of the way things are and they might believe that abortion is just going to be with us until the end. How does Operation Rescue view the long term effects of what you are doing? What are you hoping to see?

Keith Tucci: We're looking to see the church have spiritual integrity. That's our whole focus. Our number one obligation is to please God and to be a reflection of Him. The church, when it doesn't reflect Christ, brings destruction to society. We are the ones with whom God has charged to reflect Him, not civil government. If we reflect Him properly, then we can cause civil government to mirror some of those same attributes and ideas. But when we don't reflect Him properly, then how do we expect them to reflect Him properly?

FR: So it's more of an issue of reflecting God's character than an issue of some doctrine or eschatology?

Keith Tucci: I think so. Although I have been amazed at how some people's eschatology holds them captive. I've heard postmillennial people say that before and I definitely think that they have an argument. I think that eschatology can be an escape. People look at abortion as an issue; they don't look at it the way God sees it. But I think that's the challenge.

FR: I agree. It doesn't really matter what's going to happen; only that God's character be reflected in the church.

Keith Tucci: That's the mission of the church. We're the Body of Christ, so we're to reflect what the Head is. My heart cries for spiritual integrity. When I see people who represent Christ falling into sin and compromising, I think: "Well, we all do dumb things." But when I see obvious and complete character failure, moral violations and Christians suing one another, I cry for the Church and for the Lord. I know how I feel when I'm misrepresented in the press and I know how the Lord must feel when His church misrepresents Him day in and day out. He must scream for people to come forward and reflect who He is. That's what we're trying to do. Anybody who has been involved in this movement knows that. We've sifted out all the activists. We are down to people in our leadership ranks whose passion is for Christ.

FR: When you say "sifted out all the activists," do you mean people who just want to be involved in something?

Keith Tucci: People who just wanted to have some Christian fun, kind of like the Christian Olympics or the Christian Sports Channel, you know? They said, "Hey this looks like fun! This looks like a good thing to do." Yet they believed that they could do this without any cost or any consequence. So when the cost and consequence came, they ran for the hills. Unfortunately, they are victims of the kind of Christianity under which they have been discipled, which has God as the "golden butler" who caters to our every whim and we never have any problems. That's foolishness.

FR: What else can say about the IMPACT school that you are now conducting?

Keith Tucci: Our theme is Acts 1:2: "Everything Jesus began to do and teach." We believe that this is the model for discipleship. It's not just lecture, but it's demonstration. It's not just demonstration in character, but in tactic as well. Jesus had His disciples with Him not just to watch Him, but to demonstrate every aspect of His ministry. This included His healing ministry, His evangelistic ministry, His home visiting ministry, His publicity ministry. His disciples participated in every aspect of His life. That's what we're trying to do. We're trying to expose these people who are hungry to learn to people across the country who are positive role models. It's worth paying attention to their lives, not only their words.

Cities of Refuge: VICTORY!

By Margaret Farrar

MELBOURNE, Florida (FR) - Despite the predictions of the liberal media, Cities of Refuge - ten days of pro-life activities in seven strategic cities across America by Operation Rescue National - was a huge success. National media gave Cities of Refuge either negative or no coverage, possibly because they were disappointed by the low number of arrests. However, Cities of Refuge ranked among one of the largest and most effective pro-life events in American history.

On the average, 1856 people participated daily, with three out of four people participating for the first time. In a ten day period, 40 children were saved. From around the country the reported number of people affected by this event continues to grow.

* JACKSON, Mississippi - Hundreds of people interceded on behalf of women contemplating killing their children. Three successful, effective rescues occurred.

* CENTRAL FLORIDA - A travel camper was transformed into a mobile crisis pregnancy center and parked outside the Aware Woman mill in Port St. Lucie, Florida. Forty women were counselled during Cities of Refuge. Seven women were tested positive for pregnancy and all seven chose life for their children.

* SAN JOSE, California - Christians read the entire Bible in front of City Hall. The New Testament was read in front of Planned Parenthood's facility. A pro-abortion was moved to tears at one of the rallies while listening to pastor Johnny Hunter.

* PHILADELPHIA, Pennsylvania - Operation Rescue National leader, Keith Tucci was arrested in Philadelphia while he was in town scheduled to speak to area pro-lifers. Keith was held on a $200,000 bond before being released on his own recognizance.

* CLEVELAND, Ohio - Almost 300 pro-lifers were involved in street activities each day. Thirteen children were saved with no arrests. A large number of new activists were involved including many Cleveland area pastors who had previously been wary of Operation Rescue events. This was partially due to the fact that no arrests were scheduled to take place.

* DALLAS/FORT WORTH, Texas - Remains of murdered children were given a proper burial. Several successful rescues took place. One abortionist promised to quit. Three abortionists left town during the event. Two third-trimester children were saved through the efforts of sidewalk counselors.

Clearing the Media Smokescreens:

What's Behind the Pro-Abortion Rhetoric

By Jay Rogers

11/93

"He has dug a pit and hollowed it out,
And has fallen into the hole which he has made.
His mischief will return upon his own head,
And his violence will descend upon his own pate."

- Psalms 7:15,16 -

Until recently, the pro-abortion activists of America were content to decry the political and social efforts of the pro-life resistance. The non-violent activities of Operation Rescue groups in closing down abortion clinics were belittled as "ineffective." Pro-life campaigns - such as Spring of Life in Buffalo, Summer of Purpose in Baton Rouge, Summer of Mercy in Wichita and Cities of Refuge in seven cities across America - were labelled "Operation Fizzle."

To get their point across, abortion advocates used (as Randall Terry terms them) "the self-inflated ideological lap dogs of the death industry" - the liberal media. The strategy of the pro-abortion camp was to portray the rescue movement as being a bothersome yet futile fringe group. The liberal media quoted other pro-life leaders as saying that Operation Rescue was counter-productive to their cause. If the pro-life camp could be portrayed as divided against themselves, pro-aborts thought, they could be easily conquered.

But now everything has changed. The "oppressive anti-choice Reagan/Bush regime" has been defeated. Bill and Hillary are in the White House. The abortion advocates have a solid pro-death president, who signed five executive orders on his first day on the job making child-killing easier and more profitable than ever. In one stroke of the pen, our nation's president gave the abortion industry five hundred million dollars and legalized medical experimentation on live fetuses.

They ought to be happy. But they are not. A type of schizophrenia has set in. Rescue groups which were previously dismissed as "ineffective" and "counter-productive" and which had "fizzled" are now being labelled as a serious threat to the death industry. Pro-abortion activists now derisively label rescue groups as the "Green Berets" of the pro-life movement. In other words, they are viewed as the shock troops who are getting the job done. Suddenly, the same people who hailed Bill Clinton as their messiah are worried about the ineffectiveness of his pro-abortion legislation. What good are pro-abortion laws if there are no doctors who will perform abortions?

Even the pro-death media have begun to realize that despite all their previous rhetoric to the contrary:

"The anti-abortion activists may be winning."¹ So the strategy has changed. The rescue movement is no longer portrayed as ineffective. Suddenly it has become an "orchestrated strategic campaign of terror."² Time magazine claimed that Operation Rescue National used "a sophisticated array of technology"³ in fighting abortion. The media has frequently claimed that ORN is a well-funded, highly-organized and technologically advanced paramilitary force. In reality, fewer rescues are being staged and the total number of arrests nationwide are down. Yet the abortion advocates are "frightened, scared, and terrorized" by a campaign of what they term "harrassment and intimidation."

The truth is that the pro-life side is making progress against abortion because of dedicated servants who stand day-by-day in front of abortion clinics and counsel women not to have their babies slaughtered. They are winning because of the peaceful efforts of people who maintain their first amendments rights to free speech and demonstrate peacefully in exposing abortion for what it is: child killing.

In reading this, you may be asking: "What makes this guy such an expert? How can he speak with such authority about what really happens in front of abortion clinics?"

For one thing, my new address is 1575 Dixie Way, Melbourne, Florida - otherwise known as the "Green House." This is the house directly across the street from 1564 Dixie Way, otherwise infamously known as the Aware Woman Killing Center. I have been here since September 1st, producing The Forerunner out of a home office. Almost everyday I observe the activities of sidewalk counselors and prayer supporters.

The front lawn of the Green House may be the pro-life media capital of the world. I have encountered reporters on Dixie Way from the local news to CNN to the BBC to German and Japanese television. These reporters most often show up for a few minutes, take a few photos, shoot some videotape, get a few quotes and then rush off to spout their pro-death rhetoric.

But my perspective is unique. I live here. I see what really happens day-to-day. I read and view the media reports sensationalizing the activities to the point of surrealism. The most outrageous report thus far was by Paul Solotaroff of Rolling Stone magazine. In a lengthy, caricatured, Dali-esque article, Rolling Stone portrayed Aware Woman owner Patricia Baird-Windle as a suffering saint and "one of the most persecuted women in America." Local pro-life leaders were painted as a movement led "almost entirely by white men" who "fit the Son of Sam profile."⁴

The most disheartening media coverage, however, has not come from magazines such as Rolling Stone, but from Christian publications whose style resembles more that of the National Enquirer than of reputable journalism. Some Christian journalists have relied almost solely on second-hand news reporting and sound-bites of pro-life leaders taken out of context by the liberal media. It has been discouraging to me to hear and read bad reports of the rescue movement by fellow Christians.

A Personal Testimony

This is the reason I first came to Melbourne - to see for myself what was really happening here. I wanted to get to know the pro-life leaders on a personal basis and find out first hand what their character was like. What I have found is that the Rescue movement has changed little from the time when I first took part in pro-life activities in 1989 in Brookline, Massachusetts. The only major difference is that the movement has concentrated more on training leaders and has produced more focused and diversified ministries.

This has been my experience - God used my participation in Operation Rescue to call me into ministry through writing for The Forerunner. My first articles as a contributing editor in 1989 dealt with my thoughts and experiences from having taken part in several rescues in the Boston area. In the years that followed, I covered the abortion issue and the activities of the rescue movement frequently in The Forerunner. But my personal "activism" in pro-life did not extend beyond this.

That was until 1993, when I began to find that many Christian leaders who were previously favorable to Operation Rescue were beginning to back off their supportive stance. This was undoubtedly due to the biased media coverage which portrayed the rescue movement as being "violent, intolerant, extremist and arrogant."

Understanding that "the fear of man is a snare," I came to Melbourne to meet pro-life leaders Bruce Cadle and Keith Tucci. I found them to be extremely friendly, hospitable and approachable people. At that time, the IMPACT training school - a 12-week discipleship course attended by 22 local and national leaders - was in full swing. The first day I arrived, I was allowed to sit in on one of these supposedly "secret" training sessions. I had lunch with Keith and some of the IMPACT students. Bruce later invited me to his house late that afternoon for pizza where we discussed revival and reformation for about an hour before an evening pro-life rally.

Dr. David Gunn, a Pensacola abortionist, had just been shot a few weeks before this. Although this was a tragic occurrence, it was totally unrelated to the IMPACT training school. According to Keith Tucci, rescue leaders received numerous death threats after Gunn's murder. Death threats against the non-violent pro-life leaders in Melbourne were never reported by the national media.

I later took part in the April 10th demonstration in front of the Aware Woman clinic and was arrested for violating a court ordered injunction against pro-lifers. I spent the next seven days in the Brevard county jail with Keith Tucci and a several local leaders. Not only did I get to see the character of these people up close for an extended time period, but the jail time itself was a life transforming experience. For several months, I had been considering moving to another city. When I found out that Keith was going to make Melbourne his permanent base and pastor a church in town, I began to seriously consider moving to Melbourne as soon as the lease was up on my Orlando apartment.

Providentially, the house across the street from the Aware Woman clinic had been purchased by a Melbourne area resident and leased to the pro-life community shortly before the injunction was issued. This allowed sidewalk counseling to go on unhindered on the opposite side of the street during the months when the injunction stood. The first time I entered the "Green House" was April 18th, the day after I was released from Brevard county jail. As I surveyed the layout of the house, I had the strange idea that I might be living there someday. I didn't realize at the time that this thought had been divinely implanted.

I became a part of New Life Family Church, pastored by Keith Tucci, when it began in June. By this time, I had completely forgotten about my passing idea for the Green House. The local pro-life leaders are seeking a variance that would allow them to open up a crisis pregnancy center directly across the street from the killing center. Knowing that I was looking for a place to live in Melbourne, a local leader asked me: "Why don't you move into the Green House?" Until renovation begins on the house sometime in 1994, I will be living on the location of "pro-life media capital of the world."

Examining the Issue of Violence

Even though media spokesmen for Operation Rescue have denounced violent acts from the very beginning of the movement, many believe that Operation Rescue National and other rescue groups are somehow responsible. This is a question that needs to be examined objectively:

Has there been an increase of violence due to the influence of Operation Rescue?

According to statistics compiled by a pro-abortion group, the National Abortion Federation, overall violence has decreased since the appearance of OR. The peak of violent acts against abortuaries and clinic workers was from 1984 to 1986 when there was a rash of fires and bombings. Since 1987, when rescue events began to become more common place, there has been an overall decrease of violence against clinics and abortionists.

Undoubtedly, the reason for this is that rescue events give people a non-violent outlet to oppose abortion at the place where the killing goes on otherwise unhindered. People who felt strongly that they needed to stop the physical act of abortion were given an outlet. Without this outlet, some of these same people may have turned violent. This was the case before Operation Rescue appeared.

Recently, however, there has been an increase in violence. There are indeed a "fringe element" among pro-lifers who have turned more violent. The federal government and court ordered injunctions have begun to clamp down on demonstrations in front of abortion clinics. The new surge of violence is undoubtedly due to the frustration of singular people. More legislation against pro-life activities in front of abortion clinics will most likely result in more violence. Director of Operation Rescue National Keith Tucci testified to this before a Senate committee in March:

"There is no doubt in my mind that should this State push this sort of legislation, it will be responsible for escalating the confrontation at abortion facilities and for some to resort to abusive acts. This Senate and House will send a horrid message to the pro-life community. The message will serve as a match in a tinderbox. The message will be one of tremendous contempt and spite. And, the message will be devoid of any balm for the wounds inflicted on our national community by Roe v. Wade."5

The distortion invented by abortion advocates and propagated by the liberal media that pro-life activists are violent terrorists will only serve to exacerbate and not ameliorate the problem of violence. It is the fruition of the blatant disrespect for human life fostered by a pro-death ideology. Like the "enemy" in Psalm seven, the mischief and violence promoted by the pro-abortion camp will descend upon their own heads.

The Myth of Neutrality

The greatest contributor to the problem of violence is the sensationalistic coverage of the abortion issue by the liberal media.

"What most Americans know - or think we know - is what we have been told by the media. Few of us have arrived at our position on abortion by careful research. Rather, we have accepted whatever we have been told. For years the pro-choice position has had a hotline to our brains. By reading newspapers and magazines and watching television, we have all earned the equivalent of a doctorate in pro-choice thinking."⁶

One of the greatest myths propagated by the media is that they are unbiased on the abortion issue. There is no such thing as neutrality when dealing with moral issues. Jesus said, "He who is not for me is against me" (Matthew 12:30). With any moral issue, there are only two sides: the side of Jesus Christ and the side of the devil. On the abortion issue, the liberal media has taken the side of the devil.

The Los Angeles Times, for instance, required its writers to use pro-abortion terminology. David Shaw of the LA Times gives many illustrations of media bias on abortion in a study conducted in 1989: "Abortion opponents are often described as 'militant' or 'strident.' Such characterizations are seldom used to describe abortion-rights advocates, many of whom can be militant or strident - or both."⁷

If objectivity is defined as truth, then a journalist could report the facts of current events in the context of the moral Law of God. For instance, imagine a television reporter covering events from a biblical perspective:

"This is so-and-so reporting live for CNN in Melbourne, Florida. We are here live at the Aware Woman Center for Choice where 20 abortions have been performed today. On either side of the street we have activists promoting both sides of the issue. There are about 40 people demonstrating in favor of life and 17 people defending the clinic's ability to perform abortions. Standing beside me is Patricia Baird-Windle owner of the abortion clinic. Patricia, can you justify abortion when there are so many people here who believe that it is the killing of unborn infants?"

Both sides would be given equal time to present their argument live with no sound-bites. The reporter may be objective in her presentation of the facts. Instead of referring to the "right to abortion" and the "orchestrated campaign of intimidation and harrassment by anti-abortion protestors," the reporter would merely state the facts in light of biblical truth. The fact that abortion is murder; that it is child-killing; that the pro-choice ideology also spells death for unborn babies will never be hidden because it is an immutable fact sustained by the objective truth of the Word of God.

Removing the Smokescreens

The Bible portrays Satan as "the father of lies" and as a thief who comes to "steal, kill and destroy." So we shouldn't be surprised when we see pro-abortion media using the methods of the devil to portray the pro-life movement.

The smokescreens offered up by the media are contrived to keep the focus off the issue of the life of the unborn child. Instead of dealing with the issue of abortion there is the attempt to put the emphasis on alleged "violence" and "oppression" against abortionists, clinic owners and women seeking an abortion. Christians may counter various smokescreens by not being drawn into the argument on pro-death terms, but focusing instead on biblical truth.

Smokescreen #1 - There is a growing persecution of abortion doctors.

The Truth - Abortionists are murderers. If our society's laws recognized that the Bible equates child-killing with one of the most detestable acts in the sight of God, then this would not even be an issue. Abortionists would be tried and punished for their murders.

Smokescreen # 2 - All the violence has been carried out by the pro-life side.

The Truth - Just within the past year, two Christian ministers who were vocal about their pro-life views were murdered by people who were pro-abortion. There have been numerous instances of death threats and violence directed at pro-lifers. At rescue events nearly all of the people who are arrested are pro-life activists peacefully blocking a clinic door. Whenever a pro-abortion demonstrator is arrested it is usually due to an act of violence on a pro-lifer or on a police officer. There are numerous documented incidences of police brutality against rescuers. The liberal media has not shown this.

Smokescreen # 3 - The shootings of abortionists Tiller and Gunn were not spontaneous acts or isolated incidents.

The Truth - They were.

Smokescreen # 4 - Those who take part in rescue events are extremists and religious fanatics from the fringe element.

The Truth - Rescuers make up a broad spectrum of Christians and form a widely varied demographic. Most rescuers are arrested for the unborn once or twice a year on average, and fill their time with many other pro-life efforts, such as crisis pregnancy centers, pro-life education, literature distribution, sidewalk counseling, picketing, boycotts, political action, Life Chain and many other activities.

Smokescreen # 5 - The pro-life movement is led almost entirely by men.

The Truth - More women than men oppose abortion. According to a 1989 New York Times poll, 59 percent of women opposed abortion while only 46 percent of men opposed it. The great majority of pro-life workers are women. The staffs of groups such as Right to Life, Birthright, Crisis Pregnancy Centers and Operation Rescue National are made up of a majority of women. Pro-life rallies are attended by a majority of women with a heavy representation of youth and children. Even if this accusation were true, men ought to be able to take leadership. The killing of the unborn is a moral issue, not a gender issue.

Smokescreen #6 - At least two-thirds of Americans are pro-choice.

The Truth - In poll after poll, the vast majority of Americans have indicated that abortion, in up to 98 percent of the cases should be restricted. A poll conducted March 27-29, 1989, by The Boston Globe showed that most Americans would ban the vast majority of abortions performed in this country. Seventy-two percent said they would allow abortion in no circumstances or limit abortion to the circumstances that make up less than three percent of all abortions.

Smokescreen # 7 - It is unfair to bring "unwanted children" into the world.

The Truth - One and a half million married couples want to adopt children, yet these "unwanted children" are short in supply. Perhaps abortion is in part responsible for the occurrence of "black market babies," a practice in which children are kidnapped by underworld organizations and sold to couples who are unable to adopt. The concept of "unwanted children" needs to be eradicated from our national consciousness.

Smokescreen # 8 - Abortion is a woman's fundamental constitutional right.

The Truth - The so-called "fundamental right to an abortion" is based on an extremely flawed interpretation of the 14th amendment. Supreme Court Justice Blackmun stated in an interview with The Village Voice that the unborn are not included in the definition of the word person. Referring to the 14th Amendment, which states, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States ... No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of the law," Blackmun concluded, "So, the word person does not include the unborn."

The phrase "All persons" does not mean "only those persons"; the term is inclusive, not exclusive. The words "born" and "naturalized" are descriptive terms referring to "persons" - the intent of this amendment was to grant equal rights to all people, and (together with the 13th and 15th Amendments) to abolish slavery. This statement does not define what a person is, but states inclusively (not exclusively) which persons ought to be considered citizens and have the rights of life, liberty and freedom.

If Blackmun's reasoning was followed, only those born or naturalized in the United States should be considered "persons." What about those born outside the United States? Are they not considered persons, either? Should illegal aliens be killed the same way that abortionists butcher babies? It is amazing that a man who ascended to such a high seat of power applied such flawed thinking to a decision making process.

These are just a few of the arguments of the pro-death ideology that are easily refuted. The Forerunner recommends as an excellent resource to those who want to arm themselves against the pro-death rhetoric: Pro Life Answers to Pro Choice Arguments, by Randy Alcorn, Multnomah Books, P.O. Abortion Clinic Buffer Zone Ruled Unconstitutional

Federal court decides in favor of pro-lifers

MELBOURNE, Florida (FR) - In a major victory for pro-life activists, a federal appeals court ruled that a court ordered injunction against pro-lifers at a Melbourne abortion clinic infringed on freedom of speech. The court said that the order issued by Circuit Judge Robert McGregor should be lifted. In April, McGregor created a buffer zone around the Aware Woman abortion clinic in Melbourne that kept pro-life demonstrators from getting too close. About 150 pro-lifers were arrested earlier this year for violating the court order. (The Forerunner April/May 1993, "Christians Are Arrested For Praying.")

The federal court noted that Judge McGregor created a criminal statue prohibiting "pro-life free speech activity in a certain geographical location." Because the injunction contained "viewpoint specific" discrimination (i.e., it prohibited only pro-life free speech) it was deemed unconstitutional. This decision has monumental importance in the legal war over abortion and will be used as a precedent in arguing similar cases all over the country.

The appeal was won by Matthew D. Staver, attorney and president of the Liberty Counsel. Staver's case was argued on behalf of Myrna Cheffer, an Orlando area pro-life activist. Cheffer was not among the 150 pro-life individuals who were arrested for entering the buffer zone. Nevertheless, she filed this suit in federal district court seeking to prohibit enforcement of the state court injunction. Cheffer claimed that the injunction acted as a prior restraint on her free speech rights and that the threat of arrest chilled her ability to exercise these rights. The federal appeals court ruled in favor of Cheffer and handed the order back down to the district court recommending that it be repealed.

According to Staver: "It's a landmark decision. This particular order is one of the strongest of its kind as it relates to abortion picketing and free speech. It specifically indicates that this injunction is viewpoint oriented, content specific and it violates free speech. It is also significant as it relates to the buffer zone legislation that was going to be before the Florida legislature next week placing 50-foot buffer zones around abortion clinics and the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances bill on the federal level. This decision will clearly allow suits against those type of buffer zone restrictions. This particular injunction goes way beyond trying to restrict trespass or things of that nature. It restricts picketing that occurs within a traditional sidewalk, highway, residential area.

"We now have a conflict in the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals on the federal level and the Florida Supreme Court in their interpretation. That will be very strong basis on which the United States Supreme Court could accept this case on the appeal. In the meantime, we will ask the federal court to block the continued enforcement of this injunction. I would also caution the city of Melbourne Police Department from making arrests of people while they are within that 36-foot buffer zone because I think they tread a very thine line upon which they could be sued under this federal court ruling for deprivation of individual civil rights."

The following are excerpts from Chief Judge Gerald Tjoflat's decision: "Perhaps few Americans are content with the current legal status of abortion in America. Many see a woman's ability to choose abortion as a part of her fundamental constitutional right to self-determination that is ill-protected by wavering jurisprudence by the Supreme Court. Many others see the 1.4 million abortions each year as an American Holocaust permitted by the moral vacillation of the government. This case arises out of the clash of these opposing beliefs, and governmental attempts to restrict their free expression.

"On April 8, 1993, Judge McGregor issued an Amended Permanent Injunction in which he enjoined certain activities of Operation Rescue and others in a court-drawn 'buffer zone' surrounding the abortion clinic.... On its face, the injunction appears to 'criminalize' various acts of peaceful protest, including the mere penetration of the buffer zone by anyone acting 'in concert' with those named in the injunction ... The local police understood the injunction to require them to arrest 'pro-life' individuals who violated the buffer zone.

"An injunction is an extraordinary remedy that operates only on the parties before the court. Legislation operates more broadly, extending to all actors within the legislature's jurisdiction. Nevertheless, when Judge McGregor issued the Amended Permanent Injunction in the state case, he, in effect, created a criminal statute prohibiting 'pro-life' free speech in a certain geographical location. But by extending the injunction to nonparties and by attaching criminal penalties otherwise protected by the Constitution, Judge McGregor crafted a law.... We refuse to prefer form over substance; the injunction has all the attributes of a criminal statute and we will treat it accordingly....

"That free speech restrictions at issue here are viewpoint-based cannot be seriously doubted. Such a restriction is no more viewpoint-neutral than one restricting the speech of 'the Republican Party, the state Republican Party, George Bush, Bob Dole, Jack Kemp and all persons acting in concert with them or on their behalf.' The practical effect of this section of the injunction was to assure that while 'pro-life' speakers would be arrested, 'pro-choice' demonstrators would not. A viewpoint-specific restriction in a traditional public forum is unconstitutional....

"The Supreme Court has noted that '[t]he loss of First Amendment freedoms, for even minimal periods of time, unquestionably constitutes irreparable injury.' This is apparently precisely what occurred. Several of those arrested testified that they were designated for arrest by clinic workers and police officers because they were perceived to be 'pro-life.' Judge McGregor accepted this interpretation of the intent of the injunction and explained (to the arrestees): '[T]he injunction did not pertain to those on the other side of the issue, because the word "in concert with" means in concert with those who had taken a certain position in respect to the clinic, adverse to the clinic. If you are saying that is the selective basis that the pro-choice were not arrested when pro-life was arrested, that's the basis of the selection....'

"It is tempting, of course, to entertain the argument that the speech in this case is disruptive, discourteous, and offensive, but that is irrelevant.... We protect much that offends in the name of free speech - we cannot refuse such protection to those who find abortion morally reprehensible. The district court treated the state court injunction as an ordinary injunction when it had the effect of a criminal statute. Consequently, the order of the district court was founded on a mistake of law. We vacate the order, and remand for further consideration of the issuance of a preliminary injunction in light of this opinion.

"IT IS SO ORDERED."

Abortion and the News Media

By Mike Wade

Three months ago something happened that could forever help us in our fight to see abortion abolished. The details of the incident are necessary to study in full, before we implement this new weapon in the effort to overturn legalized child killing in our nation. We will study a list of gaffes by the "pro-choice" media, then, in a future article, we will look at how this new found knowledge can help us in our efforts.

I say all of this to warn that our real concern should not be that we now have a weapon with which to bloody our political opponents - rather our concern should be how to effectively use this weapon without defiling ourselves and dishonoring the Lord. So just what is this so-called "weapon?" Something that could only be the result of prayer, and also something that we are sure to loose if we do not soon discover what has been literally dropped into our laps: The news media has admitted that it is biased against the pro-life movement. No, that's not a typo or a glitch in our computer. I said, the news media has admitted that it is biased against the pro-life movement.

David Shaw, of the LA Times-Washington Post Service, wrote a two part editorial, that was printed in newspapers throughout the country, based on a comprehensive study by the LA Times of major newspaper, television and news magazine coverage. More than 100 interviews with journalists and with activists on both sides of the debate led the study to conclude that bias in favor of the pro-abortion side "often exists."

Now, this is just one man writing about one study. But that it came from within the bowels of the very system itself should have pro-lifers dancing in their prison cells. What gives the study so much substance are the concrete, unavoidable examples that they cite. The following cases are not only helpful in pinning editors to a wall (in love), but perhaps even more valuable in training us what to look for in scrutinizing future news coverage.

Some of these inconsistencies cited by Shaw are the following:

- * The news media consistently uses language and images that frame the entire abortion debate in terms that implicitly favor abortion-rights advocates.
- * Abortion-rights advocates often are quoted more frequently and characterized more favorably than are abortion opponents.
- * Events and issues favorable to abortion opponents are sometimes ignored or given minimal attention by the media.

- * Many news organizations have given more prominent play to stories on rallies and electoral and legislative victories than to stories on rallies and electoral and legislative victories by abortion-rights opponents.
- * Columns of commentary favoring abortion rights outnumber those opposing abortion by a margin of 2 to 1 on the opinion/editorial pages of most of the nation's major daily newspapers.
- * Newspaper editorial writers and columnists alike, long sensitive to First Amendment rights and other civil liberties in cases involving minority and anti-war protests, largely have ignored the same questions when Operation Rescue and other abortion opponents have raised them.
- * When the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in the Webster case, over a year ago, that states had more freedom of choice to regulate abortion, the decision was labeled "a major setback from abortion rights." Shaw asks, "Could it not also have been called 'a major victory for abortion opponents?'"

Words are everything

One of the activists interviewed was Douglas Gould, former vice president for communications at Planned Parenthood of America. Says Gould: "The language is everything." Comments Shaw: "In the abortion debate, the media's language consistently embraces the rights of the woman."

- * When the networks broadcast an abortion story, the backdrop has often been the large word 'abortion' - with the 'O' in the word stylized into the biological symbol for female. The networks could just as easily stylize the 'O' to represent a womb, with a drawing of a fetus inside, but they don't.
- * When Time magazine published a cover story on abortion last year, the cover was a drawing of a woman; when Newsweek published a cover story on abortion two months later, its cover featured a photo of a pregnant woman. Neither depicted a fetus.
- * When the Washington Post wrote recently about proposed anti-abortion legislation in Louisiana, it spoke of the state House of Representatives making a decision on a "woman's reproductive rights." Shaw quotes a pro-lifer protesting the choice of language, stating that the newspaper is adopting "both the paradigm and the polemic of the abortion rights lobby."
- * When the Los Angeles Times covered the same story, it referred to the proposed legislation as "the nation's harshest." That's the view of abortion rights advocates; it's 'harsh' toward women's rights. But abortion opponents regard the legislation as benevolent - toward the fetus.

Shaw points out that, for some reason, pro-lifers have been much less successful than abortion rights advocates at feeding their terminology into common news media usage, especially since the Webster decision.

"With that decision, the long dormant abortion rights movement suddenly was energized anew. Membership and fundraising skyrocketed. Political activism blossomed. Courtship of the media began in earnest."

Not that the media wasn't biased before Webster. Semantics, labels and stereotypes have been around for a long time. In the abortion debate they somehow always work to favor abortion rights groups.

Abortion opponents are sometimes identified as Catholics (or fundamentalist Christians)," says Shaw, "Even when their religion is not demonstrably relevant to a given story; abortion rights advocates are rarely identified with religion. Abortion opponents are often described as 'militant' or 'strident.' Such characteristics are seldom used to describe abortion rights advocates, many of whom can also be militant or strident - or both."

He cites the following examples:

- * The Louisville Courier Journal described an anti-abortion rally at which clergy men "ranted" against (Roe vs. Wade); in the same story, abortion rights advocates ... 'hailed' the importance of the decision.
- * The Associated Press, Washington Post, Boston Globe, and Time magazine, among others, have referred to those who oppose abortion "even in cases of rape and incest." But the media almost never refer to those who favor abortion rights "even in the final weeks of pregnancy."
- * The United Press International reported last year on a poll that showed a minority of all Americans take absolutist positions on abortion. The story said "only" 18 percent believed abortion should always be illegal. But there was no "only" before the 27 percent who said abortion should always be legal.
- * Newsweek said last summer that under new abortion regulations, "many women will be forced to seek out-of-state abortions - incurring travel expenses and losing time and income in the process." But abortion opponents argue no one is "forced" to have an abortion and that Newsweek's statement is tantamount to saying that if guns were outlawed, many murderers would be "forced" to use knives.
- * Some news organizations say that polls show that 'most' Americans favor abortion. But what polls really show is that Americans are enormously ambivalent about abortion, their answers depending on precisely how the question is phrased.

And on and on. This painful list is not printed to make you feel sick, although that might be a fitting response. The value here lies in the categorization of instances of news media bias. This list should help you to identify future cases. Members of the press must be held accountable, and I don't think any of us expect that to be done from within the institution itself.

How to go about using this new weapon will be the subject of the next article in this series.

Abortion and the News Media: What Should Be the Motive for Activism?

In the November Forerunner, we cited examples of news media bias against the pro-life movement, and promised a sequel that would discuss how to use that information to improve the odds of better treatment. The practices should be obvious: letters to the editor, visits to the newsroom and circulation of examples of such bias among other pro-life activists. What is crucial to any action of this kind, however, is not the action itself, but the motive of the heart within the activist.

Now to such a statement it is easy to imagine a lot of "amens" in response. But what exactly should the motive be? Is it to see abortion ended? A Christian journalist at Time magazine, a few years ago, discussed in print the problems of anti-Christian media bias. The examples he cited were interesting and relevant, but even more so were the corresponding problems he pointed out within the household of God itself.

What the Time correspondent pointed out was the way Christians - ministers especially - treat journalists: they view them as means of furthering our own interests and ministries. When journalists don't print what is expected, the Church is reduced into merely another special-interest group that demands to be heard, and treated "fairly."

I doubt that this article is revolutionary in doctrine to anyone. The solution, identified below, is something we should not only be able to agree on, but predict in advance. But since I, for one, have never seen it in print, please indulge me with my soapbox. We seem to be able to love prostitutes and beggars, but have a hard time with those who intimidate us in a more threatening manner.

Jesus Christ was never treated "fairly." Indeed, he even promised that those who obeyed him would be lied about and persecuted. To show us how to endure, He was our forerunner, and always managed to turn persecution in something that bore good fruit.

If nothing else, persecution will always bear fruits of the Holy Spirit within willing hearts of believers. But God also would like to turn media bias into something good: namely, the conversion of not only those who are throwing the stones today, but those who are holding the coats as well. No matter to what degree they oppose the Lordship of Christ, God is able to turn whatever unbelievers intend for evil into good. In fact, that's the whole idea.

The feminist radicals of the 60s and 70s understood this well, or at least they managed to somehow turn violent opposition into support. If you're over 30, you may remember fanatical drives to ban the bra, and beautiful women chopping their hair off in protest of what they perceived as sexism. You will also remember that they were the laughing stock of the nation - for a while. People, news writers and editors for instance, began to realize that these radicals were willing to suffer for what they sincerely believed in. This genuine faith turned the tide of public opinion.

Okay, I know. Much of the reason for this change was the fact that society was adrift from its biblical moorings, and the feminist victories such as Roe vs. Wade were simple matters of default. But remember, they moved in bitterness and selfishness. How much greater our weapons are if we move in love, with nothing to gain, but much to lose.

But one can only do this when one knows exactly what his or her mission is. God isn't expecting us to shoulder the responsibility for ending abortion any more than he held Jeremiah responsible for the refusal of his countrymen to turn from their wickedness. In Jeremiah's situation God even told him, to paraphrase part of the first chapter, that his efforts would meet with no success.

Therefore, our faithfulness in doing what God puts on our hearts is determined by motive, not energy expended or activities pursued. And, since good intentions aren't worth much, does God have any requirements that determine motive? Does God even look at them as requirements?

Yes, He does. And the fulfillment of those requirements is summed up for us in Galatians 5:14, "for the whole Law is fulfilled in one word, in the statement, You shall love your neighbor as yourself."

It is very liberating to understand that, no matter how vulnerable we might make ourselves in picket lines or letters to the editor - or anything in which we do for the Lord - that we are free to love people through it the whole time. This isn't to say we never offend them or directly, even harshly, confront them.

Love can take on a whole spectrum of emotions, but it always recognizes the dignity of everyone, whether it be an unborn child, a homosexual who spits on Christians and grotesquely mocks God, or even the reporter who portrays the hater of God as the basically good hero, and the Christian as the imposing, narrow-minded villain.

In Jesus' time the Sanhedrin had dispatched scribes throughout parts of Israel to be on the lookout for Jesus and the watch for anything that might be construed as an offense to the law. Jesus explains how He dealt with it in what is known today as the greatest sermon ever given: the Sermon on the Mount.

Here the persecutors were not atheists, agnostics or neo-pagans, as they are today. But in both situations they are people who assume they are doing everyone a big favor by opposing what they hate. One can find a lot to dislike about someone like this, until one realizes that the only difference between the persecutor and the persecutee is the grace of God. And if the Christian does not respond in love, he or she makes the statement that there really is no difference. Both are just seeking their own will.

The Christian who faced pagan Rome however, did suffer persecution much the same that we face, only ours is on a much smaller scale. It was not their great evangelism, logical teachings or wonderful press coverage that brought them results. It was sincere faith, genuine agapé, and complete dependence on God that ushered in a revival that has yet to be equaled.

There is nothing limp-wristed about this love. Jesus often responded harshly to the Pharisees. It's often said they are the only people he rebuked; but he also rebuked Peter. Jesus never came against the dignity that every man had, by virtue of being in the image of the Father, whether they were Mary, a prostitute; Levi, a tax-collector; Peter; as spiritual studmuffin; Nicodemus, a Pharisee; or Judas.

While the feminists were preparing to march in the streets, John Lennon told us to "Imagine" a world of peace, harmony and love. That is something everyone longs for and, of course, is only attainable by giving up a life of sin. Faith, however, hardly comes easily to the breast of Natural Man. Even Lennon's song calls for a world without religion (re: belief in a God of moral absolutes).

History, however, teaches that when Christians, by the grace of God, love their neighbors as themselves, revival is the result. The degree to which they are persecuted is the degree to which the Spirit of God is able to rest on them - and shine forth from them too.

In the ensuing months after the Supreme Court's Webster decision, it has become clear that America is about to be plunged into the most intensely divisive political debate since the Viet Nam War. Pro-life and pro-choice forces are mobilizing to vie for the support of the majority of the American people. Until now, most have remained ambivalent but in coming months it will become increasingly difficult to stay on neutral ground.

Politicians who try to hedge on the abortion issue will be forced to take a stand for or against restrictive abortion legislation. The coming political debate will reveal that the great middle ground is being pulled into two polar opposites.

The American public has been portrayed as being in favor of choice by abortion rights groups. Shortly before the Webster ruling, however, amidst a pro-abortion media blitz, A CBS News poll revealed the American public strongly favors putting limits on the legality of abortion.

When asked, "What if your state could pass a law that would only permit abortions in the case of rape, incest, and to save the life of the mother. Would you favor or oppose that law?" A greater percentage - 66% - favored the law limiting abortions and only 29% opposed it. In the same poll, only 21% said they would favor a law banning all abortions.

Only a very small percentage of the 1.5 million abortions performed annually are done in the cases provided for in the first question. Thus it can be seen that most Americans would ban the vast majority of abortions performed in this country.

Despite such clear and consistent poll results, pro-choice groups promise to keep the American public focused on the abortion issue in the 38 upcoming gubernatorial elections. In the New Jersey race, the National Abortion Rights Action League vows to pump as much as half a million dollars into campaign ads. Executive director of N.A.R.A.L., Kate Michelman, says, "America's political landscape will never be the same ... The New Jersey gubernatorial race is the first example of what we are going to do around the country."

In the past, pro-choice groups have relied heavily on pro-abortion rhetoric such as "a woman's fundamental right" to an abortion. The continued effectiveness of such an ideology will be tested.

National Right to Life-Political Action Committee Director, Sandra Faucher, warned that complacency among pro-lifers in the wake of the Webster decision could spell disaster. Even a reversal of Roe will accomplish nothing to protect the unborn. Faucher advised, "Protective legislation must be passed in each and every state."

Pro-life activists will be most effective in states where strong organizations already exist. Legislation which forces people to look at the implications of terminating the life of an unborn child will be employed. A bill that would make a woman listen to the fetal heartbeat and look at a picture of an unborn child at the same stage of development as hers before choosing an abortion will be introduced.

By shifting the debate from the Supreme Court to the state legislatures and the American people, where it belongs, many will be made more aware of the intrinsic issues which abortion carries. Most already recognize that human life begins long before birth. Precisely where that life begins and how to determine this will be questioned.

Advances in fetology, ultra-sound technology, and intra-uterine photography will be employed by pro-life groups to persuade those looking for an answer to this issue. Pro-choice groups will continue to use rhetoric which draws attention to the rights of the woman rather than to the rights of her child.

By drawing the abortion issue out of the courts and into the public arena, the unheard voice in this debate, that of the unborn child, is in the position to gain the most advantage.

A recent Boston Globe story described how an aborted baby continued to live, gasping and twitching in a bedpan, abandoned to a small room in a Philadelphia hospital with other aborted children.

Dr. Joseph L. Melnick was convicted of infanticide, or withholding proper medical treatment to a baby born alive. Melnick faces 3-1/2 to 7 years in prison.

The article stated that Melnick performed an abortion for a 13 year-old girl seeking her second abortion in 10 months. The girl and her mother told him that she was 4-1/2 months pregnant. The Globe stated that the baby was of 32 weeks gestation, or 8 months, and weighed 3 pounds 9 ounces and was 17 inches long.

Melnick testified that "the baby appeared like a doll. It just didn't have any life; it was listless and flacid, and it certainly did not breathe, and it didn't cry, I was very certain that the baby was stillborn."

But nursing supervisor Pearl Reznick testified that she found the baby alive an hour after the abortion. "The back was arched, the head was drawn back, the eyes were closed and the arms were limp hanging. And then I saw it take a gasp."

Reznick said she heard a faint heartbeat, three other doctors were called in and two of them said that they also heard a heartbeat. the baby was taken to the emergency room and pronounced dead at 11 p.m. Another hospital nurse notified the state, prompting Melnick's arrest, the Globe reported.

American Medical Association's Statement Condemns Abortion

When Doctors Used to Condemn Abortion ...

From the pages of American history

In 1871, abortion was considered a "foul, unprovoked murder" and unprofessional for physicians to perform. This was the stated opinion of the American Medical Association (AMA) - and it reflects how Christian morality has degenerated since that time.

According to the AMA, the physician's role was comparable to a "good shepherd," whose chief mission was to "do as much good as possible and as little evil as possible to the human family..." Abortionists were called "modern Herod's" and "executioners ... who were false to their profession," who sought "not to save but to destroy," according to the statement. "(W)e see in our midst a class of men, regardless of all principle, regardless of all honor, who daily destroy the fair fabric of God's creation; who daily pull down what He has built up; who act in antagonism to that profession of which they claim to be members."

Abortionists were condemned and "every physician of the United States" was to "resort to every honorable and legal means in his power to crush out from among us the pest of society ..." Discouraged from associating with abortionists, physicians were exhorted to "form themselves into a special police to watch, and to detect, and bring to justice these characters. They should shrink with horror from all intercourse with them, professionally or otherwise."

The statement continued: "(I)n the opinion of this convention, it will be unlawful and unprofessional for any physician to induce abortion or premature labor, without the concurrent opinion of at least one respectable consulting physician, and then always with a view to the safety of the child - if that be possible."

America Unites for Life!

By Bruce Donaldson

On April 28th, over 350,000 pro-life demonstrators crowded around the Washington monument to be counted as the majority of Americans who are sick of America's abortion holocaust. Their aim was to show the congress, the press and the nation that hundreds of thousands are prepared to travel at their own expense from all across the nation to make their voices heard.

Politicians generally assume that every letter they receive from a given perspective represents about two hundred other people who share the same view without bothering to write. How many people, then, do 350,000 live bodies represent?

President George Bush joined the rally via telephone saying "the widespread prevalence off abortion in America is a tragedy." He encouraged everyone "to continue to work for the day when respect for human life is sacrosanct and beyond question."

Vice President Dan Quayle appeared at the rally observing that the American people would not "continue to accept the notion that an unborn child is disposable.... Not in this country. Not now. Not ever." Quayle reaffirmed that "the majority of Americans have shown, in poll after poll, they object to the abortion of an infant for almost any reason up to the time of its birth."

"Those multitudes," Quayle said, "stand together against the terrible reality of unlimited abortion on demand. That overwhelming majority constitutes the largest coalition in American politics."

Overt political bias in the American press became evident as many of the country's major news sources ignored the gathering which made up one of the largest crowds ever to gather in Washington D.C., although Cardinal John O'Connor challenged the many news teams present to "tell America the truth."

Time and Newsweek did not cover the story at all; The Wall Street Journal told the whole story in less than one inch; Ted Turner's Cable News Network reported an attendance of 60,000 most of the day then grudgingly admitted 200,000. Decidedly pro-death, National Public Radio wouldn't budge from their report of 60,000 all day. Photographers shot away from the crowd toward the Lincoln Memorial where most of the overspill went, within earshot of the stage, to find shade and/or cool off in the fountain.

Many found their way to the Vietnam Memorial, a sobering 500 foot black wall, where National Right to Life President J.C. Wilke noted that if it was a memorial to the unborn, 25 million lives would need a wall 50 miles long. Wilke described the Rally for Life attendance as "awesome." The crowds attitude, he said, was enthusiastic, optimistic, determined and inspired. "They had all come for one reason - a deep dedication toward the cause of stopping the holocaust that kills over 4800 babies each day."

The dedication of the crowd gathered in Washington D.C. will carry over to the November elections with hopes that the candidates will respond to the majority's concerns. Yet in states like Connecticut and Florida "right to privacy" laws are being interpreted as providing the right to abortion by the state supreme courts.

In Florida, the decision is based on a privacy clause voters added to the state constitution in the 1980. Section 23 of the Florida Constitution reads as follows:

"Every natural person has the right to be let alone and free from government intrusion into his private life."

In the parental notification case the Florida Supreme Court used this clause to rule that a 13 year old girl can have an abortion in one of its unregulated clinics without her parents' knowledge. This ruling has ominous implications. First, even if leaders are elected to pass pro-life legislation, state Supreme Courts can use similar principles to rule that legislation unconstitutional. Second, even if the U.S. Supreme Court were to overrule Roe vs. Wade, Florida, at least would continue to be an abortion state.

The ballot box cannot be relied upon solely to turn the bloody tide of abortion. Pro-life activist Stephen Wood has recognized the only means powerful enough to break down an abortion stronghold - prayer. "If prayer can move mountains," says Wood, "it can shatter strongholds. Christians need to engage in serious prayer that either the hearts of our (Supreme Court) justices would be changed, or that we would have a change of justices."

Wood cites Psalm 82 which is about God judging the judges and rulers of the earth who failed to defend the poor, fatherless and afflicted. This passage of scripture is an inspired prayer and can be used in imploring God to intervene in our state legislatures.

Not far from the rally site, across the street from the White House, stood a sight to help inspire the much needed prayer of those concerned for our nation's future - "The Cemetery of the Innocents."

"The Cemetery of the Innocents" is a field of 4400 crosses and Stars of David, which represent the number of babies killed daily by abortion. It was placed by the American Coalition for Life which claims 50,000 members nationwide. During the days surrounding the rally, people could be seen kneeling amidst an overwhelming sea of white memorials to those slain that same day.

Overall, the Rally for Life '90 was a great success and should be an encouragement to those who for so long have given their lives, time, finances and prayers to see the long and embarrassing holocaust come to an end.

Most Americans Oppose Most Abortions, Wirthlin Poll Finds

Most Americans oppose the vast majority of all abortions being performed, according to the findings of a national poll of 750 people conducted in January.

The poll, conducted by the highly respected Wirthlin Group, found that pro-life Americans are also much more likely to vote single-issue than Americans who favor abortion. This means that pro-life candidates enjoy a seven percent voting edge, or "increment," over pro-abortion candidates.

The poll also found that Americans support the primary provisions of a Pennsylvania law now before the Supreme Court. An overwhelming majority - 85 percent - support a woman's right to know about abortion and alternatives, and 74 percent support spousal notification.

"When Americans are asked about abortion, they oppose abortion," said Wanda Franz, Ph.D., president of the National Right to Life Committee, the nation's largest pro-life group. "And pro-life Americans are much more willing to vote on the abortion issue alone."

Other major findings of the poll include:

- * A majority of Americans oppose the overwhelming majority of all abortions. 53 percent of poll respondents said abortion should be legal in three or fewer circumstances: in cases of rape, incest or to save the life of the mother. The Alan Guttmacher Institute, Planned Parenthood's research arm, reports that those three reasons account for less than 4 percent of all abortions. The Wirthlin poll also shows that just 11 percent of Americans support abortion on demand throughout pregnancy, while another six percent support abortion in the first six months of pregnancy.

- * Young people (those between 18 and 24 years of age) are more likely to voice pro-life views than the general population. Fully 61 percent of those age 18 to 24 voice pro-life views.

- * People who vote single issue on abortion are more likely to oppose abortion than to favor abortion. Of all Americans, 19 percent will vote single-issue pro-life, compared with 12 percent who will vote single issue pro-abortion.

- * A slim plurality - 43 percent - of Americans want the Roe v. Wade decision overturned, and that number jumps to 48 percent when they are told that the impact of overturning Roe would be to allow states to pass laws on abortions. An even stronger majority - 57 percent - want the Roe v. Wade decision changed.

* 50 percent of Americans oppose the so-called "Freedom of Choice Act" (FOCA), versus 45 percent in favor. When told that the FOCA would not allow parental notice laws to stand (as the ACLU acknowledges), 56 percent of Americans oppose and just 38 percent support the FOCA.

* A majority of Americans (63 percent) oppose federal funding of research using tissue from aborted human fetuses. 29 percent of Americans support this proposal.

* An overwhelming majority of Americans (80 percent) support parental notification laws.

During the 1980s, the issue of abortion emerged as the most pressing social concern in America. Once thought to be a settled issue, the abortion debate fiercely reentered the public arena with polarizing force. According to public opinion polls taken in the '80s, the majority of Americans viewed abortion as "one of the most important issues facing our nation today."

Both Ronald Reagan and George Bush made abortion one of the central themes of their campaigns by firmly stating their commitment to the sanctity of life. Bush's victory over his pro-abortion opponent - along with his outspoken promotion of adoption as an alternative to abortion - insured that the unborn still had a voice standing in favor of life. One of Bush's first actions as president was a meeting with pro-life activists in which he pledged his commitment to overturn Roe vs. Wade.

Throughout the decade, several pro-life justices were appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court, rounding out a pro-life majority which put the future of the Roe decision in jeopardy. The 1989 Webster decision was the first sign that the decision about abortion rights would eventually be returned to the states.

After many years of organization and prayer, groups such as National Right to Life, the Moral Majority, and Concerned Women for America made some headway against legalized abortion. But perhaps the most instrumental group to bring national media attention to the abortion issue was Operation Rescue (OR), a loosely organized band of pro-lifers who staged non-violent sit-ins in front of abortion clinics and risked arrest, incarceration, and police brutality. It was no coincidence that after 17 years of pro-life lobbying efforts and education programs, progress in a pro-life direction began to accelerate when the rescue movement began in 1987.

Taking Proverbs 24:11 as a biblical mandate ("Rescue those who are unjustly sentenced to death; don't stand back and watch them die."), OR turned hundreds of mothers away from abortion mills where their babies were about to be slaughtered. To date, 25,000 people have participated in rescues. Randall Terry, founder of OR, had been involved in the pro-life lobbying process, counselled pregnant women, and picketed the sanctioned murder of unborn children in front of abortion clinics. But one day Terry realized that while pro-lifers were winning some battles, "they were losing the war." Over 15 years of political lobbying had not achieved the necessary results.

"If my little girl was about to be murdered," reasoned Terry, "I certainly would not write a letter to the editor. If a child you love was about to have his arms and legs ripped off, what would you do? Would you write your congressman? No! You would do whatever you could to physically intervene and save the life of that child! That is the appropriate response to murder."

Even though the national attitude has changed concerning abortion, pro-life leaders realize that the ultimate victory over legalized abortion will be secured only when a constitutional amendment is passed which outlaws child killing. While very limited pro-life victories were gained on the state level in Pennsylvania and Missouri, the decade of the 1980s closed without any major sign that abortion would end. An estimated 15 million babies were killed through legalized abortion during the ten-year span.

A war of words was sparked during the '80s over the abortion issue. The news media implemented pro-abortion terminology, calling pro-life activists "anti-abortion" and those who favored abortion "pro-choice." Disproportionate coverage was given to pro-abortion demonstrations, and the American public was portrayed as favoring abortion even when major newspaper polls reflected otherwise.

But on the eve of a new decade, pro-life activists have not lost hope in the struggle to end abortion. Even though there is only a minority aggressively dedicated to the complete eradication of legalized child killing, history has shown that a minority standing up for righteousness can effect great change over time. Before the Civil War, abolitionists were a minority. Although most Americans favored restrictions on slavery in the early 1800s, few were initially dedicated to slavery's complete abolition. Christians dedicated to the sanctity of life in the 1980s are in the same situation. The 1990s have apparently been reserved for the final victory over the legalized killing of the unborn.

Attorney General's pro-life case will be heard by Supreme Court

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - President George Bush's reinstatement of Richard Thornburgh as attorney general has already set the wheels in motion for an early Supreme Court review of the infamous 1973 Roe vs. Wade abortion decision. The high court decided in early January to review a Missouri case involving a state law which bans the use of public funds or facilities to perform abortions, and which says that life begins at conception.

Susan Smith, associate legislative director for National Right to Life, says the court's decision is very encouraging. "We're anxious to see what is going to happen. Either the court will reaffirm the states' rights to say when life begins, or will place restrictions. But it would be a good case to open a review of Roe vs. Wade." David Andrews, acting president of Planned Parenthood, said the decision was "not unexpected" and that he was confident that the court would not reverse its stand on abortion.

Thornburgh, a former Pennsylvania governor who switched over from the pro-abortion camp, has vowed to fight for the reversal of Roe vs. Wade: "I'm opposed to the concept of abortion on demand or abortion as a substitute for birth control," he said. However, he does agree with President George Bush that abortion is appropriate in cases of rape, incest, and when a mother's life is endangered.

In cases of a fetus being detected as diseased, Thornburgh said he would not support abortion. "A person with a disease or defect is not a second-class citizen. I have a mentally retarded son who is 28-years-old, so that's a very real experience for me. The value of human life has to be underscored in some way by our governmental system."

During his gubernatorial term in 1982, Thornburgh signed a law requiring doctors to inform women of the risks of abortion and the option of adoption. However, the Supreme Court struck down the law saying it would "chill" a woman's "right" to an abortion and upheld the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision.

Thornburgh says his opposition to the Roe case is similar to Abraham Lincoln's position against the 1857 Dred Scott court ruling which upheld slavery. He quoted Lincoln as saying that the Dred Scott decision, which reaffirmed the status of blacks as slaves, was "erroneous." Lincoln promised to work to overrule the Supreme Court and to reaffirm the Constitution's guarantee of rights to all blacks.

"I think that characterizes the views of us who think Roe vs. Wade is wrong," he said.

Life's Edge: A Special Report on Baby David

HOUSTON, Texas - In December of 1989, a young man by the name of Chad Traywick was prompted by God to begin to do something about abortion in his community. He decided to picket the abortuary nearest his house. At three o'clock on a Saturday afternoon he entered the offices of Dr. Carpen of Houston, Texas to warn him to cease and desist or else he would begin to picket his facility. No one was there. Either the staff forgot to lock up or an angel opened the door - either way there is no denying the supernatural timing of Chad's visitation.

A brief and heart-pounding tour of the facility yielded fifteen buckets containing the broken remains of fifteen pre-born children. Chad grabbed one of the larger buckets and hurried home. Inside he found a seven-and- one-half-month old baby boy. The dilation and evacuation procedure that killed him had torn off both his head and right arm. The baby had bitten through his tongue, no doubt as a result of having his head grasped by forceps and then pulled from his body. An incision had been made along the back and organs removed and the brain had been scooped out of the skull cavity - both presumably for research.

Chad documented the death of the baby who had now come to be known as Baby David, taking both videotape as well as 35mm prints. He took the film to be developed at a one-hour development facility, warning them that the film contained very graphic footage of an aborted child. Unknown to him, the developed pictures shocked the facility's staff beyond credulity (they must have thought what almost everybody says who sees these pictures - "Surely this can't be legal!") and they contacted the police.

The police were also suspicious and a few days later Chad and his wife were "busted" in front of their house by several heavily armed police officers. The charge - suspicion of murder! The arresting officer later confided to Chad that they thought it might have been a ritualistic mutilation connected with some satanic ritual.

Chad was exonerated from the murder charges, but the story doesn't end there. I was later contacted concerning this story and went to Houston. I first placed several calls to the arresting officer who had privately expressed his horror at David's death and his willingness to testify sympathetically to the events surrounding Chad's arrest. None of them were returned.

After considerable effort I was able to procure his home phone number. His wife was at home alone the first time we called - she verified that we had the right number and asked us to call back later. When I did, I got the officer on the phone. After he confirmed his identity, Chad identified himself and began to discuss the possibility of having him talk about the Baby David incident on camera. He interrupted and said that I had the wrong number and then hung up. Obviously, someone within the establishment wanted this story to go away.

An additional bonus was provided by a neighbor. After describing the events surrounding Chad's arrest, he off-handedly commented as he looked at the pictures of Baby David that this wasn't the only time he had seen a mutilated baby like this. He then went on to declare that he had once worked for the City of Houston's water treatment plant. One of his jobs was to clean the screen that filtered the effluent as it came into the facility. Quite often he would remove babies from the screen, particularly on Saturdays (when most abortions are performed). Their ultimate lot, he testified, were to be thrown into a large grinder.

So goes abortion in America.

The Two Kingdoms

All of humanity can be divided into two "camps," two "federations of man" - the first Adam and his descendents; and the last Adam (Jesus) and His offspring. This is further expressed by several other biblical paradigms: the vine of earth vs. the vine of Christ; the sheep and the goats; the seed of the dragon and the seed of the woman; the kingdom of darkness and the kingdom of light; etc. All of humanity is born into the former; through accepting Christ's atonement individuals can be "reborn" into the latter.

Now, in the same way that there are only two kingdoms and two types of people, there are only two primary principles that guide mankind. The essential philosophy that energizes the fallen world is selfishness (the essence of sin), while love (the opposite of selfishness and the essence of holiness) is the guiding precept of the kingdom of light.

Now in Christ's parable of the wheat and the tares, he declares that the two are planted almost simultaneously and will exist side by side until the time of harvest - the point at which they reach maturity. What does "maturity" mean for the two kingdoms - the two types of people - the two essential philosophies that the wheat and the tares represent?

Obviously, selfishness as well as love can manifest in varying degrees in human character. And while there is not a single thing an unredeemed person can do to please God; from a human perspective, he can temper the raging fires of selfishness with the milk of human kindness. That kindness can come from the immutable laws of God that are written on all men's hearts - dim though they may be (Romans 2:14,15) or, and this is the far more likely of the two, the purifying influence of a strong Christian witness.

Reclaiming our Christian Heritage

It was the heritage of the Plymouth Brethren, for example, and the testimonies of Jonathan Edwards and the Great Awakening, the witness of William Penn, Patrick Henry, Nathan Hale and many others that energized the moral climate that restrained the unregenerate natures of others, such as the deists, and made them, externally at least, "men of Christian character" and opinion.

It was this potent witness that created a nation where, despite some glaring faults, its citizens experienced unprecedented freedoms and where practically everybody, redeemed or unredeemed, revered the scriptures as the Word of God and the unimpeachable standard for morality. Fornication, for example, was universally viewed as sin and abortion wasn't even to be mentioned in polite society.

In the last generation, however, something has gone terribly wrong. We must understand that a few decades ago, our nation knew that abortion was wrong.

Throughout America's history, however, the essential moral fabric of this nation, the Judeo-Christian ethic, was never seriously challenged. The selfish nature of the world system has been comparatively subdued over the first four hundred years of this nation's modern history - subdued by the purifying presence of the gospel. Yes, there have been occasional and at times even gross manifestations of selfishness. Slavery is perhaps the most notable; as was its cure - Christian men and women who were willing to fight and die to see that particular evil purged from the land.

In the last generation, however, all that changed. God was declared dead. Prayer and the Bible were taken out of the public schools and the latent selfishness of the world system was loosed and left to run its course.

Motivated by the age's creed of "Whatever feels good, do it!" and "I want it now!" - we began to spend our children's inheritance, amassing federal and personal debt that could enslave our descendents for generations. We divorced our spouses, committed fornication and adultery, and sanctioned deviant lifestyles to the point that now less than ten percent of all Americans live in the type of traditional family that historically has been the backbone of this nation.

We've polluted our minds and souls with filth that spews forth from our televisions, radios, books, art museums, and movie screens. And if that isn't enough, our sin has striven for the ultimate goal - to sacrifice the innocent by-products of our fornication (which is what the majority of abortion is really about) on the altar of self and selfishness.

Truly, the tares have grown to maturity.

The Future of America?

In this critical hour we need to come in the opposite spirit and allow good to overcome evil; for love to conquer death. And what kind of love can do this? Mature love, a love that allows us to die to self and live and fight for the babies, for the women who are truly troubled by a crisis pregnancy, even for the abortionists and those agitating for abortion rights. It's the same kind of love that gave birth to this nation two hundred years ago; that led men and women to pledge "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" for the freedom of others.

Like slavery a century ago, abortion is the issue of our generation - the issue because it contains and provides the logical climax for all other issues. And like slavery, it will probably ignite a battle that cannot be settled apart from a great civil war - a struggle between two opposing kingdoms and ideologies that will surely shake this once great nation to its foundations.

Perhaps God in His mercy will allow this struggle to be worked out without bloodshed. Let's pray and work fervently to this end. But let us not let love of comfort and a false tranquility, the very things that have gotten us into this predicament, keep us from joining the battle in earnest. As Benjamin Franklin said at the outset of the Revolutionary War:

Those who give up essential liberty to purchase a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety.

God, as He is apt to do, has placed before America a choice between life or death, a blessing or a curse. We can choose to die to ourselves and lay down our lives for this nation in honor - or our lives and the lives of our children will be laid down for us in dishonor.

God give us the grace to go on to maturity.

SICK OF DEATH: Testimony of Bernard Nathanson

by Don Feder

Bernard Nathanson needn't feel lonely anymore. A founder of the abortion movement, now an eloquent exponent of the unborn, Dr. Nathanson once was an anomaly. Today he is joined by a growing number of colleagues.

In November 1987, the Pro-Life Action League held a seminar in Chicago of former abortion providers, and they offered poignant witness against their erstwhile occupation.

Dr. Anthony Levatino did abortions for eight years as part of his Albany, New York practice, performing dilatation and evacuation in late-term abortions. "In a D & E abortion, you are pulling out pieces of unborn children," the doctor disclosed.

From the outset, Levatino was vaguely troubled by the work, but continued to do it for the money. "It's highly profitable. I could do three abortions in my office, in an hour and a half, and make more than caring for a woman nine months and delivering her baby."

It took a personal tragedy to prompt a change of heart. While he was doing abortions as a resident, he and his wife were trying desperately to have a child. "There I was throwing kids in the garbage, five or six a week. Just give me one, I thought."

Eventually, they adopted a child. Several years later, their daughter was killed by an auto in front of their home. The girl died in Levatino's arms. "If you lose a child, you look at things differently. What was once uncomfortable becomes intolerable. You feel that you're destroying a human being for money, like a paid assassin." At that point, the doctor disconnected his suction machine.

Dr. Joseph Randall of Atlanta had a different experience. Randall, the operator of a clinic, estimates he performed 32,000 abortions. Like Levatino, he used the D & E procedure.

After the operation, "you have to reassemble that baby - arms, legs, head, chest - everything [to be sure no pieces remain in the mother]. That's when it got rough, even for old-timers like me," Randall recalled.

He used ultrasound to determine the child's development. "When you looked at an ultrasound, there was no mistaking that this was a baby." Which is why "ladies who come in for midtrimester abortions were shielded from the images. Several nurses quit. They would bond with the baby they saw on the screen; they couldn't take it."

Randall finally stopped performing pregnancy terminations when a Christian woman, who had come to work in his office, convinced him of their immorality. Today, he does volunteer counseling at a facility offering alternatives to abortion.

`A certified medical assistant, Debra Henry worked at a Detroit-area abortion mill for six months in 1984. "Hearing the baby's bones breaking, as the doctor was taking it out of the woman - it was just an experience you never forget," she declared.

Clinic workers weren't allowed to refer to the unborn child as a baby, only as "tissue" or a "cluster of cells." Women were never told about the possibility of sterility or other complications, Henry claimed.

She quit after an encounter with a right-to-lifer who was picketing the clinic. Today, Henry is assistant director of the Michigan Pro-Life Action League.

Carol Everett was a merchant of death, operating two clinics in Dallas, from 1977 to 1983. Although not a health professional, she also assisted in the procedures, holding the women's abdomen, to mark the position of the child's head and buttocks for the abortionist. Says Everett, "I could feel the babies fighting, struggling to escape the forceps."

She maintains gross malpractice occurs at many clinics, which the medical establishment usually succeeds in covering up. ("We were maiming or killing one woman in every 500.") "A beauty of 21 came into the operating room. I'll never forget. My left hand held the baby in place. First the doctor pulled out the placenta, then her bowel. She had to have a colostomy."

Consumed by guilt, Everett finally sold her lucrative business, contributing most of the proceeds to the right-to-life movement, which she continues to support by maintaining a heavy speaking schedule.

Perhaps these deserters from the death-head's brigade will at last turn the tide. Surely their heart-rending testimony cannot be ignored.

Canadian Pro-Life Movement

TORONTO, Canada (EP) - The Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops added its voice to the many who continue to protest, lobby, and fight the recent Canadian Supreme Court ruling legalizing abortion-on-demand.

In an official statement March 17, the conference said it will accept nothing less than total protection of the unborn, concurring with other pro-life organizations in an effort to influence Canadian members of Parliament to "bring in a law reflecting pro-life views," said Laura McArthur, president of the Canadian Right to Life movement (which is not affiliated with the U.S. movement of the same name). McArthur said she believes that pressure brought upon Parliament by a number of groups "is paying off and the possibility of passing a pro-life law is"very, very, very strong."

Those who have never actively expressed their pro-life views are doing so now, says McArthur. "The middle-ground people are moving," she says. "Everything is coming to a head and it's overwhelmingly pro-life."

Canada's Supreme Court ruled 5-2 to strike down the nation's laws restricting abortion early in February of this year, an action that many called "a mirror decision" of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Roe vs. Wade case in 1973 which made abortion-on-demand a legal right of women in the U.S. The Canada decision ignited protests across Canada. McArthur vowed at that time to "defend [the unborn] as long as I have breath."

Government sources say that a law may be passed soon, said McArthur.

Confessions of a Convert

Peering over this precipice, I think back and see myself during my senior year in high school: the liberal-minded, intelligent young woman I thought I was. I remember distinctly the day I scandalized my friend when he asked what I'd do if I got pregnant. "Of course I'd get an abortion." What did he think I was supposed to do? Tell my parents? Right. I was almost out of there, and I knew about too many girls at school who'd dropped out before our graduation. I was going to college, and nothing would get in my way. Only luck spared me from making that easy "choice."

I've thought back countless times and cringed at my childish ignorance. The years have irreparably opened my mind. Curiosity gave way to an insatiable hunger to know more - more about what really happens in a supposedly "safe" abortion, and the psychological and physical pain women have until recently kept silent, more about human fetal development, feminist political theory, and more about the attitudes and policies that have locked those women who are supposedly most in need of "abortion rights" into miserable poverty and disillusionment.

I know now that abortion is not contraception; it violently destroys one human life, stopping one already beating heart. I believe that since 1973, when abortion became legal, our society has left women in crisis with only one "choice." I cannot defend abortion "rights" because women are ignorant of the repercussions of abortion and the resulting despair, and I cannot agree that these are necessary "choices" for any woman.

I have always believed that women, as all human beings, deserve the opportunity to develop their unique, immeasurable potential. But I'm told the world is unfair, imperfect. I ask why we can't address the world's problems without expecting women to accept abortion in the meantime. But I'm told to be realistic, that women have always had abortions. Yet, I know women had always been expected to wear corsets, bind their feet, take orders, be quiet. Those were the rules. The world must change. Why are we in this bloody stalemate?

Finally, I understand. Abortion forces women to manipulate their bodies and only offers them "liberation" through surgical alteration. Yet abortion has come to symbolize liberation, when other goals such as day-care reform, equitable pay, parental leave, and male responsibility are the ones which will truly liberate women. Abortion violates women, and this scandal is being ignored. Abortion is a hideous vestige of age-old, entrenched prejudices, in the guise of "safe" surgery, isn't it?

But I'm told SSHHH! Don't ask these questions. Forget all you've learned about human potential and settle for what we've got! Just accept Roe's abortion license, call it a "woman's fundamental right" and sanctify it as a "feminist" ideal. Don't ask if the abortion solution may have been a tragic historical mistake. Be satisfied with Roe's status quo. Be "pro-choice."

I learn I can justify abortion IF I pretend not to know there are two human hearts beating in very crisis pregnancy. I don't want to pretend. I learn I can excuse injustices IF I compromise some human's right. I don't want to compromise. I learn I can ignore all kinds of hate, violence, and pain IF I just close my eyes and label people. I don't want to close my eyes. I don't want to label people.

So I attempt a consistent progressive approach to discussing our national tragedy of unwanted pregnancies and run into daunting obstacles. When I talk about women's issues at all, some of my friends tell me I'm off the deep end of neurotic madness. When I defend the unborn and claim abortions will never be the solution to structural inequality, other friends tell me I've bought into the ideology that refuses to guarantee our absolute "choice." Every time it's a struggle to even get one idea across: We CAN speak out for women, men AND their children. A civilized society must protect every human.

I learn so much from my closest friends, some of whom adamantly defend abortion "rights," but I'm frustrated and speechless when some flatly refuse to acknowledge the humanity of even a 7-or 8-month-old fetus. I try to rip away the shackles of slogans and stereotypes, and not be intimidated by the pressures from both "sides." It's painful enough to disagree with people I love so fiercely. I've had to choose to think for myself - about abortion, about women's lives and our place in history, about the insidious ideas that perpetuate ignorance, disempowerment and human suffering - and this choice continues to be a bittersweet lesson. Who says you don't learn anything in college?

Mercy Becerra Valdivia, past co-director of the Harvard-Radcliffe Progressive Alliance for Life, is pursuing a Masters Degree in Maternal and Child Health at Harvard University.

Debater Admits: Abortion is Murder

By Chris Smelser

4/92

GAINESVILLE, Florida (FR) - Phyllis Schlafley, a conservative columnist most famous for her speaking tour which helped stop the passing of the Equal Rights Amendment, and Sarah Weddington, a lawyer who gained notoriety for arguing in support of the "right" to abortion in the Roe vs. Wade case, debated women's issues in front of a very partisan crowd at the O'Connell Center at the University of Florida in February. As all women's issues discussions do these days, the debate eventually turned into a supercharged session focusing on abortion.

With rare originality, Schlafley likened the modern debate on abortion to the historical debate over slavery. Schlafley made the comparison based on the arguments of a woman's right to choose to have an abortion and the state's right to choose to permit slavery. Weddington based her argument in support of abortion on the right of privacy. The surprise of the evening was Weddington's self defeating argument for abortion in which she acknowledged that abortion is murder. Weddington said that government sanctioned killing is perfectly ethical, citing the death penalty and war as other examples.

The behavior of the crowd was perhaps the most interesting aspect of the debate. Of particular note was the rudeness of a group of lesbians towards Phyllis Schlafley. After any statement which they did not approve of they laughed quite loudly, even laughing after a mild Schlafley comment that not all men are sexual harassers. I saw the lack of tolerance many a pro-choicer has toward those who disagree with them through the words of a young lady seated in front of me. In reaction to the standing ovation Phyllis Schlafley received after predicting the imminent reversal of Roe vs. Wade, she said: "That is so sad. I cannot believe there are people like that."

Perhaps the most substance of the evening came with the debate over Anita Hill vs. Clarence Thomas. Weddington informed the crowd that even though she has no evidence, she is sure Thomas is guilty on all counts of sexual harassment. Schlafley countered that she finds it hard to believe that Anita Hill, being a lawyer, did not have the strength to stand up to an alleged attack of dirty words. In hinting that the Hill story was a Democratic conspiracy to keep Thomas from being confirmed, Schlafley asked the audience if they had heard of the new Anita Hill doll. Apparently you pull her string and ten years later she talks.

Selling Lies: Deception & the Abortion Industry

By Trish Diggins

Editor's note: Some names have been changed to protect the identity of the women involved.

Barbara went into the family planning clinic at her mother's insistence. She wanted to have her baby and was anxious to have support from the women's clinic.

That support became a rushed abortion that Barbara still regrets.

"The woman at the clinic started spewing facts so fast," Barbara, 19, said, "They told me just enough to scare me ... they mentioned all three points but made adoption sound negative and birth tragic, then really pushed abortion.

"I told them I was more than 14 weeks (the cutoff for first-trimester abortions). She said they had to do it really quick because they couldn't do more than a 14-week and pushed me to make the appointment for absolutely that day."

During the abortion, Barbara nearly passed out from the pain in the "painless" procedure. "The attending nurse said, 'She's gonna pass out' and left the room."

"They played on my emotions. I didn't get any time to think about it, then it was over. When I came back for the checkup, they didn't care anymore."

Is this the caring attitude of a clinic that helps women?

Barbara is not alone in her experience. Jennifer decided to go to a Planned Parenthood clinic. "Planned Parenthood suggested only an abortion. No other options were ever discussed. They said abortion was painless and virtually risk-free ... having it done hurt like crazy. You can't imagine my shock and horror when I saw my dismembered baby after my "nice and easy" abortion. Planned Parenthood is not telling the truth to girls in crisis pregnancy situations. I have suffered severe emotional problems."

Sheryl had an abortion before she realized what had happened. She too went to Planned Parenthood and was offered no counseling and said the word abortion was never used.

"They scheduled me for an 'endometrial aspiration' which they said would start my period ... I didn't know if I was pregnant. The doctor ... used a machine to suck out the contents of my uterus. The pain was excruciating. After he finished he said, 'Do you want to know if you were pregnant?' ... I was shocked to realize I had an abortion. I was never given a choice ... I realize I've lost my child forever."

How could these tragedies occur in clinics, especially Planned Parenthood, who advertises as "A name you can trust in women's health care," and is the nation's most visible abortion and "women's services" provider? Money.

Carol Everett owned and operated several abortion clinics in the Dallas-Fort Worth area for six years. "The abortion industry is not about choices; it's about money," Everett says. "(It) is a skillfully marketed product sold to a woman at a crisis time in her life."

And sell they do. The last month she was in business, Everett made $13,625. She received $25 per abortion. In addition, the abortionist usually makes 20-50 percent of the total cost and can perform 10-12 abortions per hour. "Remember, (the clinics) sell abortions - they don't sell keeping the baby or giving up the baby for adoption or delivering the baby."

How much do abortions cost? Depending on the gestational age, anywhere from $250 to over $2500 for late-term abortions. Dr. Anthony Levatino provided abortions in private practice for 10 years in Albany, NY. "It's the one time as a doctor you can say 'either pay me up front or I'm not going to take care of you.' Either you have the money or you don't. And they get it."

Everett said clinic telephone operators use "telephone scripts" designed to overcome any objections the potential customer might have and to suggest ways to come up with the fee. "If they said they were thinking about adoption, the answer would be, 'Wait, how do you think that baby would feel knowing you had abandoned it?' We told them abortion could fix every problem ... we found their fear and amplified it. The counselor is paid to seduce her into a friendship of sorts to sell her the abortion."

She admits her clinic sold unnecessary abortion, "fixed" records and often drove "botched" abortion victims to the hospital herself to keep ambulances away from the clinic. "We always told them it was their fault (if something went wrong)," she said, adding that one in every 500 clinic patients had major surgery, including hysterectomy and colostomy due to rips and punctures from the abortion, or died. By the time the woman has been through an abortion, complications, and recovery she is not interested in telling anyone.

Dr. Bernard Nathanson had lobbied for legalized abortion in 1968 and later opened his own clinic. He changed his mind about the nature of abortion when technologies such as ultrasound and cordocentesis (taking the unborn child's blood to diagnose illness) led him to examine his view more closely.

"There was nothing religious about it," Nathanson said, "This was purely a change of mind as a result of this fantastic technology." Using ultrasound on a woman undergoing an abortion, Dr. Nathanson made the film Silent Scream, which shows the child in the womb struggling during an abortion.

"This was purely a change of mind as a result of this fantastic technology." After expressing his doubts to the medical community, he was dismissed from the pro-abortion movement that he helped to create.

Many doctors, having faced the reality of abortion and pressure from the public, have stopped performing abortions. In recent years, the rate of physicians performing abortions has dropped from 4 to 5 percent to about 2 percent.

Dr. David Brewer recounts witnessing his first abortion: "I can remember the resident doctor sitting down, putting the tube in, and removing the contents. I saw the bloody material coming down the plastic tube into a big jar, and looked to see what was inside." He was instructed to place the contents on a towel to make sure they had "gotten it all" as is standard practice after an abortion. What he saw shocked and sickened him.

"I had taken anatomy. I was a medical student. I knew what I was looking at. There was a little scapula and an arm ... some ribs ... a chest, a tiny little head. It was like somebody put a hot poker into me." Eventually, Brewer says he hardened his conscience and began to routinely perform abortions until witnessing a late term abortion, when the child was born alive, fighting for its life. "I just stood there and the reality of what was going on finally began to seep into my calloused brain and heart. You could see the chest was moving and the heart beating."

What would happen if women were told the facts when entering a clinic? How many women would not abort and how many dollars would be lost if clinic personnel said your baby's heart started beating 18 days after conception, at 42 days your baby has brainwaves, and at nine weeks we can tell its sex. There is no law that forces abortion providers to give the mother information about her developing child.

How can a women choose what is "right for her" if she is not given all relevant information?

After the abortion, the sale still continues. "We wanted them to be 'happy' because of the return rate," Everett said. The Alan Guttmacher Institute, the reporting arm of Planned Parenthood, gives a 43 percent return rate for second abortions. The women are given reinforcement for their decision and told that they did the right thing, that now their problems are over. But are they?

Many women suffer severe emotional effects. Often she will tell others (through clenched teeth and hands) how great her abortion was in order to assuage her guilt and pain.

"My mother won't accept that I feel my abortion was wrong," Barbara said, "and for years I insisted that I didn't either. But I knew what I had done was wrong, and telling others to do it affirmed my decision." Barbara is now active in Gainesville Right to Life. Her mother now helps to usher girls past pro-life demonstrators to obtain their abortions.

Abortion is the most performed surgical procedure in the nation and is the largest unregulated industry in the nation, second only to illegal drugs. Veterinary clinics are subject to greater regulation and more health department inspections. Many clinics, including some in Florida, have been closed due to gross negligence of health codes and sanitary procedures.

Women enter an abortion clinic scared and uninformed. They are sold the clinic's product, given a pat on the back, and left to deal with the emotional and physical scars. How much longer can we allow our dogs to be treated better than our women?

Special thanks to Carol Everett, Gainesville Right to Life, and those who shared their personal stories with me. This article was reprinted from the Florida Review: "Have nothing to do with the unfruitful deeds of darkness, but rather expose them" (Ephesians 5:11).

Trish Diggins is a student at the University of Florida.

Defending the Right to Life

By Adrienne Denny

According to Thomas Jefferson, author of the above quote from the Declaration of Independence, there are no greater or lesser human beings; all are equal.

Jefferson and the other Founding Fathers of the United States hoped to protect the people from an anarchistic society. According to this Declaration, each citizen should have an equal chance to establish himself and be successful in this republic. This was stated by noting the existence of unalienable rights. "Unalienable rights" means that there are certain conditions inherent to humankind that make a peaceful and pluralistic civilization possible.

The first stated here is the right to Life. This meant that each person had a right to exist and that no one has the right to attack another person; and if one is attacked, he has the right to defend himself.²

This point should be obvious; the idea of any other individual rights would be a moot point if people did not exist. The idea of "civil liberties" and the contents of the Bill of Rights in the Constitution would have no meaning if people did not have the right to exist in the first place. How can anyone exercise the right of free speech, or the freedom of religion, etc., if someone else has the right to destroy them at will?

The second unalienable right was Liberty. The Founding Fathers were working from a political viewpoint. They had experienced political repression at the hands of King George III and decided that, instead of letting people be subjugated to rules they had no part in creating, they would institute a "safety valve." This new nation would allow the people to form their own government. And, if the government started to go awry and work against the principles of society, the people had a right to abolish it and start over.

Let's say for instance, that the government began instituting policies that denied certain segments of the population their right to Life; that the government decided it was appropriate that individuals could destroy other human beings under various conditions. It would be the right (some would say the obligation) of the people to establish a new government that would not make the same mistake.

The final unalienable right in the Declaration is the Pursuit of Happiness. This right intended that people could own and protect property; it also allowed for the people to strive for the betterment of society.

Although the final two rights are unique to democratic societies, the only right that is established in some form around the world in all civilized societies is the right to Life. Every nation, state, and tribe in the world has some sort of law code. That code invariably has penalties for an individual who unjustly destroys another person of the society.

It should be noted, however, that not all societies dictate that all of their members are on equal footing. India, for example, had a caste system with some people (to use an Orwellian phrase) "more equal than others." In other societies, it would be possible for the weak or sick to be killed by members of the family at their will because it was "their business" and the laws dictated that certain humans were not persons and did not have legal rights. The United States has set forth that all of its citizens are equal to each other, no matter what their strengths and weaknesses, and all deserve equal protection.

Unfortunately, the high ideals on which the United States were founded do not truly exist today. On January 22, 1973, the United States Government instituted a private right for a mother to kill her own children at any time before they are born, for any reason whatsoever.³ Instead of all of society rising up in arms to overthrow this government that would dare encourage such disgrace to its founding principles, citizens actually march in the streets and pressure our elected government in all of its levels to make sure the destruction can continue.

The History of Abortion

In ancient times, abortion was not illegal, but it was also rarely practiced because it was extremely dangerous to the mother.⁴ In medieval Europe, abortion was only outlawed after the mother felt the baby move.⁵ Because little was known about the development of the human fetus, this arbitrary definition was instituted only because motion (or "quickening") was the only sign of "life" that could be pinpointed.

Even with these standards, abortionists were rarely prosecuted because the only proof of an abortion was the baby's dead body - which was rarely found.⁶ Around 1750, a new procedure for inducing abortion was invented whereby objects were inserted through the woman's cervix in order to cause miscarriage.⁷ It was still risky (as was all surgery at that time) but it was safer than the drugs or physical abuse a woman would suffer otherwise to have an abortion. (This process of opening the cervix is the foundation of abortion procedures used today). Again, there were no limits placed on early abortion simply simply because there was no evidence of "life."

In 1843, the physician Martin Berry observed the processes which he entitled "conception" between the sperm and ovum of a rabbit.⁸ This discovery marked a great change in medical thinking: life was not implanted by a man into a woman, but in fact, a man and a woman both contributed half of the material that created a new individual life when they were combined.

Human "conception" was observed under the microscope a few years later, confirming the theory.⁹ It was this discovery that caused the anti-abortion actions of doctors throughout the United States.¹⁰ By 1859, the American Medical Association (AMA) stood firmly against abortion at any time during pregnancy because of the knowledge that it destroyed a new life.¹¹ Eventually, every state in the United States protected life from its beginning by making abortion illegal.¹²

One of the most popular questions in the abortion debate is of when an individual life begins. The so-called "pro-choice" advocates say that life begins at birth, while the right-to-life advocates claim it begins at conception. It is difficult to reconcile the debate in this way because of a lack of consensus on the definition for "life."

There are several ways of defining life, which include religious, philosophical and biological arguments. Even if we dismiss religion and philosophy, it can be proven from a purely biological viewpoint, that life begins at conception.

Solid Evidence from Biological Science

Biology offers solid definitions and facts about processes that can be seen and proven. According to biological definitions, an organism is "alive" if it can grow, take in nourishment, and reproduce itself (or parts of itself). These attributes are true for all organisms. The human embryo, from the point when the nuclei of the sperm and ovum fuse, is alive.¹³

The cell divides and becomes many cells under its own power, with nothing added except the nourishment provided by the mother's bloodstream. Not only do the cells divide, they arrange themselves so that they form the basic shape of the human body. They then differentiate into the various types necessary for the body's function: bone, skin, muscles, brain, lungs, heart, liver and the hundreds of together specialized functions. Again, only something that is "alive" can do this. So when one speaks about the human fetus in the womb, they are definitely discussing a living creature.

Another frequently cited argument is whether or not the fetus in the womb is actually human. The so-called "pro-choice" side says no; the right-to-life side says yes. How is this question to be solved? History has shown that when a society uses unfounded reasoning for what the definition of "human" is, discrimination of certain groups is right around the corner.

In 1857, in the Dred Scott decision, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that black people were not human and could be owned as property - simply because of a different skin color.¹⁴ This decision was hardly a bright spot in human history. But this standard existed and was actually favored by the people of this nation simply because the definition of what was "human" was based on the arbitrary belief system of that time.

Biology offers an answer to the question of what is human. Humans have a unique genetic system that sets it apart from all other animals. Human cells each have 46 chromosomes that define and direct human body structure and function. Each human has a discreet set of genetic information. In analyzing the DNA from human beings, it can be noted that each individual's DNA is similar enough to the rest of the human race to define the individual as human, yet it is different enough to distinguish one individual from the rest.

This discreet information is created at the moment when the nuclei of a sperm and ovum are fused. The mother and father each contribute 23 chromosomes that recombine to create a new individual. Again, this individual's DNA defines it as human; the newly-formed embryo will never develop into a fish, or a frog, or a horse, or a chimpanzee - it is distinctly a member of the human race.

From this information, we can conclude that the fetus that is destroyed during an abortion is alive (it is growing and developing) and it is human (genetically it can be nothing else.) Therefore, making abortion legal is allowing an individual person to destroy another human life. That directly contradicts the principles that the United States was founded on by allowing the infringement on the right to Life of the the weakest humans in our society.

The Right to Choose?

There are two choices facing the public today: 1) stay on the present course and keep abortion legal and available on demand and 2) prevent further killing and outlaw all attempts to allow individuals the right to Life that all humans have in the United States.

If the most fundamental right of all humans can be legally sidestepped, it will only be a short time before the civil liberties built on the right to life will also crumble. The second course is much more difficult, since it would be necessary to reform public opinion. But it is necessary to keep America truly free - by protecting the most basic right we have: our own lives. And as it was said earlier, if we don't have our lives protected, our civil rights mean nothing.

The pro-choice movement encourages abortion made legal by playing on the public's sympathies and encouraging a twisted patriotism. Women were portrayed as "victims of reproduction" who could become "unpregnant." Abortion is portrayed as a "civil right;" the idea of a Constitutional "right to choose abortion" and a "right to Privacy" were created to accomplish their goals.¹⁵

There are some obvious flaws in these arguments: one is that the proponents of abortion forget that pregnancy is the nurturing of a new life - not a disease that must be eradicated like the Plague or AIDS. The abortion advocates consistently forget the unborn baby in their debates. Another snag is the definition of their newly discovered rights: they do not exist as such in the Constitution. The so-called "rights" of choice and privacy are never mentioned in the Constitution and it takes a great deal of creativity to find the passages that may hint at these "rights."

Finally, these "rights" are imposing on the most fundamental right to Life; if the right to "choose" an abortion really is a legitimate part of our society's ideals, our society's laws contradict themselves. Either the right to choose abortion must go or the right to Life must be removed. And if the right to Life is destroyed, then our other rights will soon follow - even the "right to choose." Yet even with these flaws, our society seems to have accepted abortion as a right.

Behind the "Pro-Choice" Rhetoric

How does one go about changing the attitude of a nation? The answer lies in the media and how it makes impressions on human nature. Americans, whether they like to admit it or not, follow trends and fads. It is human nature to want to "fit in," to be accepted and recognized as a member of a community. There is a tremendous rush to be "in vogue" or "in fashion;" to live up to what is perceived as the popular thing to be. This is the famous "peer pressure."

Simple things like hairstyles, clothing, perfume, and even sports and exercise foods can all be set on a pedestal called "high fashion" and the nation will flock to use them. Even those who call themselves individualists when placed in a group together look strangely alike. It is not an unrealistic idea, therefore, that people would want to hold similar values to fit in to their community.

This is how the so-called "pro-choice" community got its foothold. A fashion was created based on the public's desire to live the ideals of personal freedom that were revived in the 1960's. Abortion became "reproductive freedom."¹⁶ Procuring an abortion became "a woman's choice," or "a woman's right to control her body."¹⁷ The movement that created this fashion rewrote history to make women's lives seem more pathetic and dangerous.

It is commonly touted that thousands of women died because of illegal abortions and that "Women's lives are on the line"¹⁸ if abortions are eliminated. Slogans like "Keep abortion safe and legal" are waved around like flags;¹⁹ the implication being that the only safe abortions are legal ones.

Most recently, the abortion advocates are referring to themselves as the "pro-choice majority."²⁰ This mindset is the "icing on the cake;" "the majority favor this point of view," we are told. "And you do want to be a part of the majority, don't you?" A perfect tidbit to attract the public through their social human nature.

In spite of the fact that no one can prove that any of these statements are correct, the public does believe them.²¹ Ask any person on the street who is mindlessly "pro-choice" why they hold that opinion and they will answer, "It's a woman's right," or "Women will have illegal abortions, and those are unsafe." The pro-abortion advocates were able to accomplish the implantation of this mindset into America through television programs and through the media.

Through television programs, TV news items, newspaper ads, magazine features, and the like, the media has all but convinced the people of the United States that abortion is a right and it is incorrect not to believe so. This not only brought people to their side, but silenced those "pro-lifers" who oppose abortion by trying to make them think that somehow their cause is not worth fighting for because no one agrees with them.

How is it possible to turn the tide and make the public realize the value of the right to Life? By using the same tactics - with a few minor changes. Slogans and ads and favorable media coverage are needed to get the right-to-life movement in the public eye. There is one difference though: the right-to-life movement does not have to make up "facts" to support itself. A few photographs of a baby killed by abortion are difficult to ignore. A statement such as "Abortion kills human lives" is easy to prove.

Helping women support their families will also help by showing the public how much we care about these helpless lives. Basic lessons in reproductive biology in the schools are absolutely vital. In short, the public has to see (through working examples) that it is not only "O.K." to value human life from conception onward, but that it is the correct value to hold as human beings and Americans who recognize the most fundamental right to Life.

The effort needed to accomplish this work is immense. It took years to convince America that abortion is a "right." It will most likely take years to change that back, and the right-to-life movement is working against the forces that would have abortion remain legal. However, this is a challenge that all Americans must rise to. A country that dictates that "all men are created equal" and that life itself is an unalienable right will not succeed for long if its own laws contradict its founding principles.

As long as the basic right to life is denied the tiniest and most helpless members of the human race - the preborn - then it will not take long for the strongest members of our society to completely overpower the weaker ones who cannot protect themselves. And that situation will destroy the very foundations of our free country. That is our choice: either all human lives are protected, or none are protected. The United States of America is depending on us to protect its most valuable rights.

10/92

As we approach the presidential election of 1992, I am reminded of the strikingly similar campaign of 1856. The similarities include an unresolved constitutional issue, a controversial Supreme Court decision, a caretaker presidency, and most of all, a sense of national frustration.

In 1856, the unresolved issue was that of slavery. Slavery was an explosive issue whose fuse burned shorter and shorter. Slavery was not specifically forbidden in the Constitution, although the language in the Constitution and the framers' concept of natural law could be construed as condemning it. The result was a lack of national consensus and a division of the nation into two soon-to-be-armed camps. Each camp had some claim on the wording used by the Founding Fathers.

The unresolved issue today is abortion. The fuse on this issue is also burning shorter with each passing day. Abortion is not mentioned in the Constitution. Those who are pro-abortion have to "find" this so-called right. This view of course will not stand among those who are pro-life, who correctly see the pro-abortion lobby as having created "rights" which cannot be found in the Constitution. The result is the same as in 1856; a lack of national consensus and the division of the nation into two camps. Whether or not these camps become armed remains to be seen. However, if the historical pattern remains constant, a Harpers-Ferry type of incident can be expected to occur soon.

The overturned Supreme Court case of 1856 also mirrors a 1992 controversy. That being the Dred Scott case which upheld slavery and was undoubtedly bad law. It was turned de facto by the Civil War and de jure by the postbellum 14th amendment. In the same way, pro-lifers and many constitutional constructionists see Roe vs. Wade as bad law and one which must be overturned.

The election of a caretaker President in this election would also parallel 1856. In the same way that President James Buchanan was a time-serving do-nothing, who served neither side of a rapidly deteriorating nation, a movement toward a morally neutered, and mythical middle ground could lead to a severely crippled executive branch. Just as James Buchanan's attempt at centrist, amoral politics could not serve as a lightning rod for the tensions which were then building, neither will the same political philosophy or lack thereof help to decide our current cultural war. This trend is both ominous and dangerous.

The most obvious parallel between the election of 1856 and 1992 is the sense of national frustration in the air. I believe the reason that politicians "just don't get it" is due to the fact that they've lost contact with the people they are supposed to serve. If you talk to the average citizen, you will soon learn of the rapid moral decay in our land and the general frustration over the status quo. To paraphrase historian Shelby Foote, "They are being led in directions that they do not care to go." This mood is as electric in this nation as in the humid air before a thunderstorm. I know for certain that this mood exists in this nation.

We can only hope to hear soon of a lawyer from a small town in Illinois...

European Pro-life Forces Fueled by Webster Decision

ROME, Italy (EP) - Prompted in part by U.S. pro-life activism, European countries which permit abortion are experiencing increased opposition from pro-life groups.

Such groups have increased activities in Britain, France, Italy, Spain, and West Germany, organizing conferences and forming at least two international networks tied to counterparts in the U. S., which provide them with literature and films.

Only three European countries do not permit abortions: Belgium, Ireland, and Malta. However, it is expected that Belgium will legalize it this year. Ireland is the strictest of the three, making it a crime to provide information about the availability of abortion in any nearby countries where it is legal.

The most liberal abortion laws are in Austria, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Greece and the Netherlands, where abortion on demand is legal. France, West Germany, and Britain do not permit abortion after certain time periods, and all abortions must be approved by doctors. Portugal and Spain do not allow abortions after 12 weeks gestation; abortions done before that time can only be performed if a woman's life or health is threatened.

The U.S. Supreme Court's decision on the Webster case is likely to give fuel to pro-life groups in Europe. Most European countries legalized abortion after the U.S. Supreme Court Roe vs. Wade decision.

The Forerunners of the Women's Movement Were Pro-life

In a recent study of 51 of the major women leaders of the abolition-feminist movement, 48 came from Christian backgrounds. Some of these women included Lucretia Mott, an evangelical Quaker who helped to found the Anti-Slavery Society in 1833; Angelina Grimké, who presented female anti-slavery petitions to the Massachusetts state legislature; as well as Lucy Stone and Susan B. Anthony.¹

Popularized by New Awakening evangelicals, the women's movement gained momentum when people began to realize that there was no biblical support for inequality between the sexes. In Jesus' encounter with Mary and Martha, they found proof that Jesus valued women's roles as disciples. Jesus' rebuke to Martha clearly showed that women were not to be relegated to works of service toward men.² In the fifth chapter of Genesis, they found evidence that God had created men and women as equals: "In the day when God created man, He made him in the likeness of God. He created them male and female, and He blessed them and named them 'Man' [Hebrew: adam; literally: 'a human being'] in the day when they were created."³

The fight for justice and equality was the direct result of action taken by those with a Christian worldview. Most of these women suffered mistreatment, yet their courageous stance was shaped by a biblical view of sin and righteousness. They were willing to risk their honor to take up the work of both abolition and women's suffrage. They often pointed to the example of Jesus who died to bring salvation to the world. Their great courage and willingness to sacrifice was expressed in the words of Lucy Stone, writing in a letter to her mother, "Without the shedding of blood, there is not remission for sin."⁴

A great irony of history is that not only were these women against slavery and discrimination against women, but they were also unanimously opposed to abortion. They did not hold this position primarily because of the physical dangers: they believed that abortion caused the death of a baby. Susan B. Anthony voiced the common opinion when she called abortion "child-murder."

"I deplore the horrible crime of child-murder.... We want prevention not merely punishment. We must reach the root of the evil and destroy it.... [It] is practised by those whose inmost souls revolt from the dreadful deed."⁵ Anthony judged that women who had abortions were "awfully guilty," but laid the higher guilt on the head of the abortionist: "but oh! thrice guilty is he who ... drove her to the desperation which impels her to the crime."⁶

Matilda Gage likewise found that abortion was murder, but spoke of the dilemma of a crisis pregnancy due to rape: "[Abortion] lies deeper down into women's wrongs than any other.... I hesitate not to assert that most of this crime of 'child-murder', 'abortion', 'infanticide' lies at the door of the male sex."7 Elizabeth Cady Stanton argued that none are free till all are free: "When we consider that women are treated as property, it is degrading to women that we should treat our children as property to be disposed of as we see fit."8 Mattie Brinkerhoff found in abortion not freedom of choice, but despair: "When a woman destroys the life of her unborn child, it is an evidence that ... she has been greatly wronged."9

Alice Paul, the suffragist founder of the National Woman's Party and author of the Equal Rights Amendment [1923], objected to combining abortion arguments with the fight for the ERA; Paul termed abortion "the ultimate exploitation of women." Even Margaret Sanger said, "abortion was the wrong way - no matter how early it was performed it was taking a life"10 and termed "the killing of babies - infanticide - abortion" the "most barbaric method" of birth control.11

The suffragists of the 19th century cut across the deadlocked debate of the woman vs. the fetus, and called for a broader vision - one that linked abortion with the sexual exploitation of women. May the present-day champions of Susan B. Anthony, who march under her banner, pay her the ultimate compliment: listen to her.

Is abortion just a simple medical procedure? Four former abortionists who met in Chicago in February of this year told audiences about the horrors involved in the abortion industry - and made public apologies for what they had done to promote the practice. These individuals have joined a growing number of men and women in the American medical profession who are rejecting the philosophy behind the Roe Vs. Wade decision - because of what it has done to harm unborn children and their mothers.

Dr. McArthur Hill, Denver, Colorado

"I am a murderer. I have taken the lives of innocent babies. I have torn babies from the womb. I have poisoned babies by injecting salt solution into the bag of waters ... I did not feel right about doing abortions. My justification was that it was legal and that patients wanted it done.

"Abortion started to get to me in my dreams. I had a recurring nightmare in which I delivered a healthy, newborn baby. I held the baby up and faced a jury of faceless people, asking them what I should do with the baby. 'Thumbs up or thumbs down?' On the floor underneath the baby was a bucket of water for drowning the baby if the jury gave a verdict of thumbs down. I never put the baby in the bucket because I would always wake up.

"I started to cut back on the number of abortions I performed. When I moved back to Colorado, I did two abortions by prostaglandin because of Down's syndrome, but I began to develop the conviction that abortion was an evil that had to be stopped. One day a pastor came to my office and preached the gospel to me, persuading me to commit my life to Jesus Christ. That was when I quit doing abortions altogether."

Dr. David Brewer, Glen Ellyn, Illinois

"I didn't have a moral or ethical background when I went into residency. I remember the first abortion I witnessed. It was performed by the resident physician. I didn't know what to expect. It was my job afterward to undo the jar and see what was inside. It was a new experience, and I've always found it exciting to learn new things. When I opened the little bag, the resident physician said, 'Put it on the blue cloth to see if we got everything out.'

"I put it on the towel, and there were parts of a person. I saw a head, ribs, tiny hands, arms. It was as if someone put a hot poker into me. I had a conscience, and that hurt. I said, 'I guess you got it all.' I had no real convictions, and I was caught in the middle. I didn't do anything. I didn't talk to anyone. I got to see another abortion, and then another. As I saw more abortions, it hurt less.

"The first one I did was hard. But after a while, it didn't hurt. My heart was calloused against the fact that I was a murderer. When I was an intern I had to take care of the 'candy apple babies' (Babies who are delivered after saline abortions usually look similar in color to a candy apple because the outer layer of skin is burned off by the poisonous salt solution.) One night a lady delivered, and I was called to see her because she was uncontrollable. She was going to pieces, screaming and thrashing. All the patients were upset. I walked in, and there was her little saline abortion baby kicking and moving for a little while before it died of those terrible burns. I watched that more and more.

"When I became a Christian, I realized life begins at conception. It was very simple to stop doing abortions."

Dr. Beverly McMillan, Jackson, Mississippi

"I was not a reluctant participant in abortion. I was a radical feminist. During my residency at Cook County Hospital in Chicago in 1969, I made my decision to be an abortionist. At the hospital I noticed that quite a number of women who were bleeding and running a fever were being admitted. I started IV's and gave blood and antibiotics to the patients. About halfway through the night, it dawned on me that these women were coming from Chicago's illegal abortion mills.

"At the end of six weeks, I was angry at what I had seen. I thought that women should have a safe abortion and I would provide it. At that time, there was not one abortion center in the entire state of Mississippi. A group of 'concerned citizens and clergy' had already lined up a place to rent and had hired nurses and counselors. Everything was ready to open the first abortion mill in Mississippi, except that they needed a physician willing to become the 'town abortionist.' I initially declined, but later determined that I would run the best abortion facility in the country.

The new abortion mill was running smoothly. We only offered first trimester abortions because I felt later abortions were riskier. Nevertheless, I did experience complications, the worst of which was perforating a uterus and suctioning a piece of small bowel into the tube. I was so depressed I couldn't stand it. I started considering Christianity, and at one point prayed the scripture, 'I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me.' One day an employee at the mill asked to see the contents of the sock in the suction machine. I saw a beautiful arm, and I thought, 'What are you doing?' That was one of the last abortions I did.

"In the fall of 1978 I was baptized and I resigned from the abortion mill. Today I am a sidewalk counselor and was the first ex-abortionist to be arrested and jailed for sitting in at an abortuary. I have been arrested three times for participating in rescue missions."

Nita Whitten, Dallas, Texas
Former Clinic Assistant

"When I started working at the Fairmount Center in Dallas, I was a radical feminst and completely pro-abortion. But I became traumatized by what I saw every day. It's hard to work in a place where there is no love.

"One woman came into the clinic forcing her daughter to have an abortion. The daughter was in the second trimester at 15 weeks. She kept going to the bathroom, and it seemed that something was definitely wrong. Then the girl started screaming at the top of her lungs, 'It's a baby! Mama! Mama!' The doctor was in the middle of a procedure and couldn't come. She'll be scarred for life for seeing her baby in the toilet, which is where it landed.

"Another woman got an abortion because she had twins. Everyone went in to see what the twins looked like after the abortion. I had never been in the procedure room. I wanted to avoid it. In my heart, I knew they were babies, and I knew abortion was murder.

"I became depressed, despondent, and hooked on drugs. I took drugs to wake up, took speed at work, and took pot and alcohol in the evening. I also took birth control pills and developed amenorrhea. The abortion mill assumed I was pregnant and gave me an abortion, but it turned out I wasn't pregnant. Furthermore, the phantom abortion led to complications, including a severe pelvic infection.

"Finally, when I decided to give my life to the Lord, I got out of the abortion business. I told my husband that I wanted to get out of the 'rat race' and get a new job in a new town. Then, when I got pregnant, a physician recommended that I get an abortion because of the drugs I had taken. He predicted deformity. I absolutely refused to get the abortion, and now I have a beautiful four-year-old girl - my 'miracle baby' whose picture I always carry with me."

These testimonies were given at the "Meet the Abortion Providers" conference in February, 1989, at the Chicago O'Hare Marriott, sponsored by the Pro-Life Action League. This excerpt is reprinted by permission.

Freedom of Choice?

By Ronald H. Anderson

4/90

Viewing the birth of freedom, as it has been reported throughout Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union recently, brings to mind the rights of freedom we all enjoy in the United States. An issue which has been raging since the early 70s concerns the right of "freedom of choice." One choice concerns reproductive rights and the freedom to choose abortion or the birth of a child.

The new forming democracies in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union will be facing some cold, hard facts concerning the cost of freedom and democracy. The success or failure of these new democracies will depend on the inspired desire of the people and leaders to take on all of the responsibilities of democracy and the results of their actions. Freedom in this context will last only as long as those involved are willing to act responsibly in order to preserve that freedom.

We all have many choices to make in our lives, especially in our democratic society. If we choose to drive our automobile in an unsafe manner and cause an accident, we are responsible for that action and its consequences. If we choose to break to law in any other way and are caught, we must pay the penalty according to the law. In the realm of personal freedom, we are responsible for our actions.

Human reproduction is no different. If we choose to have intercourse and it results in the conception of a child, we are responsible for that action and its results. At that time of choice, our choice has been made. If it is our desire together or separately not to produce a child, then we have to take the responsible action to prevent that result.

Another fool proof option is abstinence. Many people in today's society have a difficult time accepting this basic concept of freedom and responsibility which are inseparable. Some of our baby boom, permissive generation of the 60s and 70s cannot relate to being responsible for the results of their sexual activity. Why not? Why destroy a life because it may be inconvenient to have a child?

Freedom is a precious right in all aspects. However, we must take full responsibility for it or we will lose it as happened in China. The Chinese people not only lost their bid for freedom, but are penalized if they have more than one child.

Let us not abuse our freedom but use it with responsibility. Abortion is not a responsible use of our freedom. Permissive legislation is not the answer in defending individual freedom - responsible legislation is! Comprehensive sex education in our schools, homes and religious institutions is absolutely necessary for the formation of a sexually responsible free society.

George Will calls Roe v. Wade "bad"

Newsweek columnist George Will recently called the Roe vs. Wade decision a "bad" and "anti-constitutional" decision which has "resulted in dismaying practices." The popular journalist, in a February 13 editorial, said that support for Roe was "collapsing perhaps in the Court and certainly among thoughtful people ... beneath the weight of its incoherence and accumulating weight of scientific and medical facts."

Will explained that the 1973 abortion decision was shaky due to a "doubly absurd proposition: no one knows when human life begins but the Court knows when 'meaningful' life begins." He went on to say, "The indisputable fact is that a fetus is alive and biologically human. Pregnancy is a continuum: what begins at conception will, if there is no natural misfortune or deliberate attack, become a child," he said.

He pointed out the contradictions in the decision making of the Supreme Court justices: on one hand, courts have ruled that a woman has the right to her own body; yet in other cases, courts have ruled to take custody of fetuses by "controlling, even jailing, pregnant women whose behavior (e.g. drug abuse) might jeopardize the health of their fetuses."

He explained that "science and society are radically and increasingly out of sync" in its treatment of human life. "Prenatal medicine's diagnostic and therapeutic techniques make possible intrauterine treatment of many forms of fetal distress and genetic problems. Medicine, the most humane science, can heal fetuses that the law says lack an attribute of humanity - rights."

A Higher Moral Code

After World War II, German citizens living around Nazi extermination camps were required to visit the facilities to witness the atrocities they had permitted to occur. Though it was technically "legal" to kill Jews and other political prisoners, the citizens were blamed for not breaking the law in deference to a higher moral code.

This is the way we feel about the slaughter of 25 million unborn children. Some of them are being burned to death by a salt solution only days before a normal delivery would have occurred. This is a moral outrage that transcends the law which sanitizes the killings. We are law-abiding people and do not advocate violence or obscene and disrespectful behavior, but to be sure, we will follow that higher moral code nonviolently, to rescue innocent, defenseless babies. And someday, the moral issues involved here will be as clear to the world as the Nazi holocaust is today.

Hollywood film carries strong pro-life message.

HOLLYWOOD, CA (FR) - In a day when abortion is constantly portrayed on television and the motion picture screen as an accepted alternative, a major Hollywood film was released in January which carries a strong pro-life message.

"For Keeps," produced by Tri Star Pictures, features the popular teen-age actress Molly Ringwald as a pregnant high school senior who decides to get married and keep the unplanned baby. The young couple wagers that love and good humor can beat the odds despite those who say teen-age marriages can't work.

"There have been many theatrical films about people being married and having babies," producer Jerry Belson said, "but they've never really done one about teenagers. Even though I realized it was sensitive politically, I still thought it was worth it to do a human story about kids like this."

Screenwriters Tim Kazurinsky and Denise DeClue said they began work by immersing themselves in the subject of teen-age pregnancy, reading articles and speaking directly to teen-age mothers. "According to our research," says Kazurinsky, "about 10,000 U.S. teen-agers a week who are pregnant keep their babies. And in every interview we had with young pregnant girls, they all said, 'I never thought it would happen to me.'"

Director John Avildsen said the script appealed to him because of the theme of the two teens' maturing relationship in the midst of a major problem that could have broken them apart. "You want them to work out their problems," he said, "and stay together."

Hospital bans elective abortions

ST. PAUL, MN (EP) - Pro-life forces in Minnesota won a major victory March 23 when the board of directors of St. Paul-Ramsey Medical Center voted to reverse that institution's policy and prohibit elective abortions at the hospital. That reversal has not yet been implemented, and is currently under review.

"This is a great victory for the pro-life movement," said Paul O'Donnell, president of Pro-life Action Ministries, which has carried on daily picketing at the hospital since January 22 of this year. "This decision shows that pro-life activism is effective in closing abortion centers. We were the ones who were sponsoring the picket demonstrations there. By the hospital's own admission it was the daily picketing that caused them to change their policy. We will continue our efforts until all unborn children can rest in peace and safety in their mothers' wombs."

The thrill of victory was tempered for pro-lifers by the hospital "super-board" decision to delay implementation of the ban while a study group examined the implications of dropping elective abortions. The findings of the study group are expected in three months. "We believe God has given us 90 days to do more work," said O'Donnell. "We believe that in the end we will be able to achieve victory."

About 600 pro-lifers demonstrated while the hospital "super-board" met March 30. Then on April 1, Good Friday, hundreds of pro-lifers demonstrated in front of the hospital. They chanted, sang, prayed, and carried a large cross to commemorate the day Christ was crucified. Daily picketing of St. Paul-Ramsey continues.

O'Donnell, a Franciscan brother, vowed that his ministry would continue its campaign of boycotting and picketing until the abortion ban is implemented. "We will not stop the daily picketing nor the boycott of St. Paul-Ramsey Medical Center until the last abortion suction machine is wheeled out of the hospital," he said.

Jerry Brown - Is he pro-life now?

by Leslie Bond
7/88

Former California Gov. Edmund G. "Jerry" Brown Jr., known to pro-lifers for his pro-abortion policies during his past political career, has now stated that he sees "the killing of the unborn as crazy."

Brown indicated his change of heart in a telephone interview with the National Catholic News Service, February 10. The former governor, who sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 1972 and 1980, had just returned from a four week visit to India where he spent much of his time volunteering in pro-life champion Mother Teresa's Home for Dying Destitutes in Calcutta.

Brown said his work with the dying "gave me a different perspective on the whole question of abortion." He said he could not support abortion after spending time "confronting and protecting the lives of the suffering with not as high a quality of life as a three-month fetus that is healthy and has potential," NC News Service reported.

The fact that "this country and Europe see the need to kill so many unborn does not seem to be justifie," Brown said. He added, "It's just that we've organized society to be anti-life."

Brown said he was impressed by the great respect Mother Teresa's Missionaries of Charity show for the dead and dying. The sisters "showed more respect for someone just off the streets than some people with substantial means get in developed countries," he said, adding, "It would be great to take the attitude that created that environment and spread it around the world."

Brown, who served as governor of California from 1975 to 1982, halted his political career in 1982 when he lost a bid for the U.S. Senate to Sen. Pete Wilson. He plans to re-enter the political arena, although not immediately, he said.

Kevorkian Let Victim Die Amidst Protests

Pro-life leader discovers incriminating report signed by "Dr. Death"

By Jay Rogers

9/93

MELBOURNE, Florida (FR) - Lynn Mills, a Detroit area pro-life leader, was reluctant at first to confront Jack Kevorkian, the euthanasia activist known as "Dr. Death." However, the very first day of surveillance at a home where Kevorkian had performed several killings turned up incriminating evidence. Mills discovered a crumpled death report in the garbage of Kevorkian's assistant citing the victim as having died amidst protests of "Take it off!" (referring to the carbon monoxide mask).

Mills had organized over 20 rescues and pro-life activities in front of abortion clinics in the last few years. "Professional police departments whose goal is to keep the two sides apart" are what led to no arrests in over half of the events, said Mills who was in Melbourne in September attending a Family Concerns conference.

Advocates For Life Ministries had asked Mills to begin picketing Kevorkian in 1992, but she remained unwilling to extend her ministry into a domain which she describes as "creepy." But when the number of "Dr. Death's" victims began to increase soon after the inauguration of Bill Clinton, Mills acquiesced.

"At first, the game plan was to follow Jack. If he had gas canisters in his arms we would have taken them out. We would have simply taken the lethal weapon away from him. I really didn't want to do any of this. We also thought about laying in front of the home of the victim or trying to handcuff ourselves to the hands of Jack Kevorkian. That would have been a trip too," says the Detroit rescue leader.

"After I showed (AFLM members) Dawn (Stover) and Andrew (Burnett) where he lived, we sat down in a restaurant in Royal Oak. We decided to start surveillance."

The most obvious plan was to start to watch the home of Neal Nichol, an assistant of Kevorkian, who had let four people die in his home. On the very first day, Mills went to the neighborhood and immediately saw Nichol taking the garbage out.

"It had snowed that day," remembers Mills. "There were no tire tracks in or out of the driveway. Later when I saw that tire tracks had appeared leaving the driveway, I took the garbage."

Later that night, Mills, Burnett and Stover picked through the garbage. "The first thing we found were two ECG strips with a heartbeat getting smaller and smaller and then going into a flat line," said Mills. "We just started crying. I had no idea what I would find when I picked up the garbage."

When a one page report of victim Hugh Gale's death was uncrumpled, they discovered something that made national news. They were shocked at what they read:

Patient placed mask over nose and mouth, elastic band around head. A plastic tent was put over his head and shoulders, lid at top open. The patient then pulled a string tied to his left index finger, other end attached to a clip, which was pulled off a crimped plastic tube, opening it from the outlet valve of a canister of CO gas to the mask. In about 45 seconds the patient became flushed, agitated, breathing deeply, saying "Take it off!" The tent was removed immediately, the mask removed and nasal oxygen started. He remained conscious and oriented, and within a minute calmed down to his normal breathing pattern. He was more relaxed and a bit somnolent, but awake and oriented. The patient wanted to continue. After about 20 minutes, with nasal oxygen continuing, the mask was replaced over his nose and mouth and he again pulled the clip off the crimped tubing. In about 30-35 seconds he again flushed, became agitated with moderate hypernea; and immediately after saying "Take it off!" once again, he fell into unconsciousness. The mask was then left in place. Hypernea continued for about 35-40 seconds, after which a slower and calmer breathing pattern ensued, lasting about 8 minutes, gradually diminishing in rate and intensity. Heartbeat was undetectable about 3 minutes after last breath.

The original document was signed by all involved including the victim's wife, Cheryl Gale and obituary workers, Neal Nichol and Margo Janus.

Mills believes finding the report on the very first day of surveillance was divinely appointed. "We did not work hard for this," she says. "I tried putting emergency calls into the prosecutor. I didn't know which one to go to. Unfortunately, the prosecutor in the county where Hugh Gale was killed put more weight on the words of living people than on the paper we found."

Since the prosecutor thought that Hugh Gale's wife and the two assistants present were credible witnesses they accepted their testimony. A second "doctored report" was offered by the alleged killers in which the cries of protest in the second instance had been removed. Mills sarcastically refers to this as the "38 word typo." She says candidly, "If this were in any other county, Jack would be in jail." On an ironic note, Kevorkian is now suing Mills because she is alleged to have told the media that he is a murderer.*

Note to readers of The Forerunner:

Together with the abortion issue, euthanasia promises to be the next battle ground for pro-life ministries. Jack Kevorkian would like to see killing made legal in all 50 states and has somehow avoided arrest in at least 15 known cases of assisted homicide. The fact that he has gone free in this obvious instance of guilt is even more frightening when we consider that Lynn Mills is being sued by Dr. Death for stating the obvious to the media.

Pray for Lynn Mills:

1. For her peace of mind while she is on trial

2. For wisdom for her attorneys
3. That Kevorkian would be further exposed
4. For guidance for Lynn Mills' future ministry

Learning Before Birth

GAINESVILLE, Florida (FR) - Evidence that a fetus is sensitive to sounds coming from outside the mother's womb could help parents get a head start on teaching their children speech and language skills, says a University of Florida professor.

"The time it takes for a child to learn anything in the first year of its life could be accelerated because it has now been shown that the fetus can receive sounds," says William S. Brown, director of the University of Florida's Institute for Advanced Study of the Communication Processes. "The notion that the child begins to relate to its environment before birth could accelerate and improve upon any learning that is associated with hearing."

Brown's findings build upon a 1989 study by Kenneth Gerhardt, chairman of UF's Department of Communication Processes and Disorders, and Robert Abrams, a professor in the College of Medicine's Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, that found that a fetus is exposed to certain low frequency noises. Brown joined that research team in 1990 and found that 60 percent of what is spoken at normal conversation level can be heard from inside the womb. To accelerate language learning, parents could, for example, read to a fetus, Brown said.

Most children only learn to speak a few words during their first year. But, if parents communicate with an unborn child, some may develop a better foundation for learning speech and language. Ultimately, talking to a fetus could result in better skills and fewer learning disabilities. "A child learns to talk by hearing," Brown said. "So any learning paradigms that require a child to use his hearing could be used before birth."

But the fetal ear's sensitivity to noise from the outside world should also be a warning to parents, Brown said. "It means they have to be careful because loud noise could be harmful," he said. The researchers are concerned that low frequency noise or excessive vibration might possibly damage the hearing of fetuses.

The research, based on a study that used sheep as well as humans, showed that the amniotic fluid inside a mother's womb enhances low frequency sounds - especially the voices of men - while it dampens high-frequency noises. Prior to the 1980s, researchers believed fetuses developed in an insulated, noiseless environment.

Life Without Roe: Making Predictions About Illegal Abortions

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Laws preventing abortion will not only dramatically reduce the total number of abortions, but also the number of women and babies killed by either legal or illegal abortion, according to a report released by the Horatio R. Storer Foundation.

"This report carefully and clearly debunks the myth that women will die if abortion is no longer available," said Cynthia McKnight, author of the report and a specialist in state legislative issues at the Storer Foundation. "Medical progress in treating complications, not legalization of abortion, accounts for the enormous drop in maternal abortion deaths from the 1940s to the 1970s."

The report, Life Without Roe: Making Predictions About Illegal Abortions, was released Wednesday, July 1, by the Storer Foundation, an educational foundation dedicated to examining issues related to life and death and affiliated with the National Right to Life Committee.

The report, both historical and forward-looking in its scope, examines previous studies and statistics on the number of illegal abortions before Roe v. Wade and the number of maternal deaths (deaths of mothers) from legal and illegal abortion to provide a scientific framework for predicting "life without Roe."

The report provides the basis for estimates that there were a mean of less than 100,000 illegal abortions annually in the years before Roe v. Wade, far fewer than the 1 million repeatedly claimed by abortion advocates.

"Today, there are 1.6 million abortions each year - 16 times as many as in the years before legalization," McKnight noted. "Even assuming an increased risk from illegal abortions, that means that the total number of women dying and being hurt by abortion would be less in a post-Roe America with protective laws than it is today."

* Before Roe v. Wade, there were approximately 100,000 illegal abortions per year, a number far lower than the 1 million claimed by abortion advocates.

* The largest reasonably possible number of illegal abortions in any one year before Roe v. Wade was approximately 210,000 in 1961; the lowest was about 39,000 in 1950. The mean was 98,000 per year.

* The data demonstrates an exponential increase in the number of abortions since legalization. There are roughly 16 times as many abortions now each year as there were in an average year before Roe v. Wade.

* The claims by abortion advocates that 1,000,000 or more illegal abortions occurred annually and 5,000-10,000 women died are based on inaccurately calculated extrapolations from flawed and erroneous data of the 1920s and the 1930s - the pre-penicillin era.

* The number of deaths of childbearing-age women for non-abortion related causes remained relatively constant in the years before Roe v. Wade, showing that deaths from illegal abortion could not have been "hidden" under other causes of death.

* Advances in medical technology, not the legalization of abortion, caused a significant drop in the number of maternal deaths from abortion:

- maternal deaths from illegal abortions were above 1,000 per year only in the pre-penicillin era (1940). The maternal abortion deaths dropped sharply with the advent of antibiotics (penicillin and sulfa) and other medical advances to treat infections.

- the maternal death rate had declined to 30 maternal deaths from illegal abortions by 1972, the year before Roe v. Wade was decided.

* If maternal abortion deaths were significantly under-reported in the official statistics, there would be an over-reporting of other causes of death. But multiple forms of analysis demonstrate this did not occur.

* The small numbers of maternal deaths demonstrate that there were a comparatively small number of illegal abortions pre-Roe, suggesting that the total number of abortions would drop substantially if protective laws were again in effect.

"As America looks forward to life without Roe, the debate on the legality of abortion must move beyond unsubstantiated claims and toward a realistic approach sensitive to the lives of both women and unborn children," the report concludes.

A recent article in The Tribune, the official newspaper of the Communist Party of Australia, expounded upon the Marxist view of abortion, adding new understanding to the international debate over the rights of the unborn.

"Human Life and Fetal Images," an essay by Rebecca Albury, appeared in the Australian publication on August 10 of this year. Albury made the following statements about the teachings of Karl Marx and their relationship to the unborn:

* A Marxist believes that personality and human value are imparted by the external and economic environment, not by any inherent spiritual value, or even by biological processes.

* The fetus, according to a Marxist, becomes a person when he is judged as such by "someone of higher wisdom." The humanity of the fetus depends upon how the mother perceives the "social relationship" that exists between them. If the mother desires to keep the baby, then she "fantasizes" it into becoming a human being. But, if she does not want the pregnancy, "it is something else entirely." Her opinion of the fetus thereby denies it of personhood.

* "Biological processes," says Albury, "do not carry automatic moral values as the Right to Life suggests ... Human economic, social, and political relationships create moral values."

* According to Albury, "Material conditions of life change, and so do moral values." This means that, to a Marxist, the unborn baby may be a human being for a time, but may then become depersonified and rendered 'pre-human,' all because his or her mother began to think differently about him or her. She adds: "Certainly, many women experience mixed feelings; the fantasy baby may even appear for a while. Women can tell it goodbye forever."

Dr. John Whitehall, who reported these statements to the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade in his article "Marx and the Unborn Baby," (September 15, 1988), commented on Albury's conclusions by saying, "The inhumanity of communism resides in this arbitrary assessment of human life, which is based on the Marxist valuation of certain social relationships. On this basis, millions have been told 'goodbye' - from the purges of Russia, to the genocide in Cambodia, to the killings in the Philippines, and now to the unborn baby."

Maryland Governor Becomes Pro-Life Convert?

Acknowledging that he is going back on a campaign pledge, Maryland Gov. William Donald Schaefer announced that he will not ask the state legislature for more money to help poor women obtain abortions. Instead, he plans to put more money in the budget to help poor women who want to bear children and put them up for adoption.

He also hopes to revise state laws to make adoption easier. Governor Schaefer said, "I'm more interested in the baby being born and adoption. Adoption ought to be easy. This is going to be a very heavy disappointment to people who are in favor of more lenient [abortion-funding] language. I said I was going to make the language more lenient. That's going to cause a lot of problems for me."

The announcement came on the same day that pro-lifers delivered petitions from more than 80,000 people opposed to Medicaid funding of abortions. The petitions were circulated by a dozen groups, ranging from church groups to Libertarians for Life demonstrating unprecedented state pro-life unity.

The Washington Times observed that Governor Schaefer had hinted of his change of heart on abortion funding the previous week when he wore a Precious Feet lapel pin at a public function. The pin displays, at actual size, a baby's feet at ten weeks gestational age, complete with fully-formed toes.

The state of Maryland has been spending approximately $2 million a year to pay for 4,000 abortions under the Medicaid program.

Medical Ethics

by Garry J. Moes

"The great law of the living world," philosopher Frederick Nymeyer wrote some 20 years ago, "is to survive."

Today the great law is being broken. In our increasingly lawless age, the survival instinct is dying.

We have coursing among us like a poison vapor a pervasive death wish - the ultimate lust of a society which has given itself over to its base desires. The stubborn will to survive, once so admired in a dying individual, is being replaced by a will to die. Where once it was a sign of spiritual maturity to endure and overcome suffering, it is now "dignified" to wish death upon oneself in the midst of suffering. "Death with Dignity" legislation is thus, expectedly, being proposed in many quarters.

The phenomenon is being even further institutionalized. Organizations with names like Concern for Dying and America's Society for the Right to Die are forming to promote it. Movements are underway not only to legalize suicide but to have it declared a fundamental right of man.

In California, America's seedbed of social phenomena, there exists a "Hemlock Society," with a name aptly reflecting the revival of ancient Greece's glorification of death, as embodied in the demise of Socrates. In the Netherlands, Europe's leading laboratory for experimentation in moral decay, such venerable institutions as the Royal Society for Medicine and the Synod of the Reformed Church have pleaded for "involuntary active euthanasia"- a euphemism translatable in no other way but murder of the weak and distressed.

Back when we called it "mercy killing," at least our language recognized it as killing. Now, perhaps to mask our guilt feelings, we use terms like "Americans Against Human Suffering," to cite a name associated with a ballot initiative collecting signatures for the November 1988 election in California. (The initiative, whose promotional campaign has a $2 million warchest, would legalize "assisted suicide" for those expected to die within six months.)

The New Jersey Supreme Court has now allowed the starvation of persons in a vegetative or comatose state even if they have never expressed a desire to die. According to this court's decisions, third parties may take such actions and nursing facilities may not refuse to participate.

The Wall Street Journal (August 21, 1987) reported in sickening detail the wide practice of "voluntary" euthanasia in The Netherlands, where an estimated 1,000 to 7,000 individuals are put to death by euthanasia annually, despite the fact that the practice is still officially illegal.

The report prompted one Dutch doctor, Richard Fenigsen of Willem-Alexander Hospital in Hertogenbosch, to disclose that "involuntary" euthanasia - often without the knowledge of either patient or families - is also widespread in Holland. Citing documented cases, Fenigsen told the Wall Street Journal (August 29, 1987), "Perpetrators enjoy strong public support and total judicial leniency." He said the practice is so widespread that many elderly are afraid to enter hospitals for fear they may never escape alive.

Such reports make it difficult to believe that only two decades ago it could be stated with accuracy and credibility, as Nymeyer did, that "Survival as an individual is universally accepted as being 'the first law of life.' "

If we are to save our instinct to survive, we will have to recall and implement Nymeyer's further observations concerning the role of God's moral law in our survival. Calling the great law of survival a "natural" law, he said: "Natural law and moral law, both, are designed to promote individual survival and welfare ... God has not given a natural law and a moral law different in purpose and character. Both are for survival of the individual and the species." (Origin of Damnation and Sin is Not by Inheritance but is Cosmological, Libertarian Press, 1967).

Our lusts and desires, including the urge for physical comfort, will have to be subordinated to the moral law of God. Only then will we recapture our will to survive and begin to protect ourselves from threats to survival. "Wants ... are overwhelmingly powerful," Nymeyer observed. "Wants should be looked upon as so irresistible that they control conduct ... When wants are determinative whether life will be retained or lost, customary restraints on conduct - all laws - are in jeopardy."

Abortion major issue in 1988 election

Although the 1988 presidential campaign focused on a variety of issues - from the Pledge of Allegiance to prison furlough programs - the abortion issue was cited as the major issue of the election by nearly a third of voters interviewed by ABC News, according to USA Today (November 9, 1988). Voters also called into the APEX Campaign Hotline about abortion more than any other issue.

The APEX Campaign Hotline featured a phone recording on 12 issues that voters could review. Of the 3,500 Americans who used the line, the majority were curious about the candidates' stand on abortion.

Over 2,000 pro-life "rescuers" have been arrested since the beginning of the year, and the rescue movement has been cited as pivotal in directing the nation's attention towards the abortion issue. Throughout the month of October, while many voters were making their final decisions about their ballot choices, evening news broadcasts featured coverage of several pro-life rescue movements in major U.S. cities.

Norm Stone - Abortion Walk

KANSAS CITY, MO (FR) - After trekking across America on foot to motivate and mobilize the nation against abortion, Rev. Norm Stone and Rev. Jerry Horn are ready to repeat the arduous ordeal again. In fact, they will be doing it seven times, beginning September 1st. Halfway through the second walk, they took a three month break to move their office and families from Wisconsin to Kansas City, Missouri.

They will be back on the road in September, beginning in Delaware. Stone said his son, Todd, a recent high-school graduate, will be joining him for the coast to coast trek. During the first walk in 1986, Stone said he and Horn received much publicity, especially because of the pro-life petition which was presented to President Reagan. Over three million signatures appeared on that petition, which called for an end to abortion in America. "We got a lot of national attention, and spoke to tens of thousands of people," said Stone.

Horn said the first walk was to "rally the troops," but the response was minimal. "People were not motivated by the statistics or gory pictures, but only by God's heart." All seven of the projected walks are scheduled to be finished by 1993.

"This second walk has been less fancy, and we haven't had very many resources," related Stone. "We needed to make a commitment to continue. We're doing our part, and we're not alone." The organization isn't sponsored by any national ministry, but Horn and Stone's families are supported from monthly pledges.

The two families spend 80 percent of their time on the road, walking miles each day to bring an end to the abortion holocaust. Results are not immediate, but they believe they are making a difference "one step at a time."

"The greatest disappointment is that we Christians see the need, and rally around it, but when things aren't changed after two years, we put it aside," Horn explained. "But I'm looking at the long haul. It's easy to rally around a cause, to do sit-ins and pickets, but we're looking at changing the heart of a nation."

Stone agreed, adding, "Apathy is a tragedy. I want to light a fire in people's hearts." The long-range goals of Walk America for Life (WAFL) are to see legalized abortion come to an end; to restore right attitudes toward the value of human life; and to lift up the name of the Lord Jesus Christ as the Author of all life.

Both wives, Judi Stone and Bonnie Horn, are fully supportive of the Walk. "Walk America for Life" began in 1985 at the Santa Monica Pier in Los Angeles. Stone and Horn logged over 100,000 miles on that journey. In 1983, they founded "Project: Save Our Babies" a non-profit educational program devoted to public discussion about the facts on abortion.

Stone said Walk America for Life was "born in my heart ... during an extended fast in January of 1985. As the Lord shared His grief with us over the destruction of the unborn, we determined to answer His call to speak for those who cannot speak for themselves - no matter what the personal cost."

Parental Consent Laws Now Required

TALLAHASSEE, FL (FR) - Minors in Florida and Kentucky are now required by law to obtain parental consent before getting an abortion. Kentucky's law went into effect on February 21, when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear an emergency appeal from pro-abortion advocates. One week earlier, a Florida state district judge in Jacksonville lifted an injunction which kept a state law dormant there since last fall.

Minors seeking abortions in Kentucky must now get the written permission of both parents or a legal guardian or obtain a court order. In Florida, one parent or either of the other options will suffice. The U.S. Supreme Court has yet to decide whether it will hear arguments on parental consent laws in the states of Minnesota and Ohio. Abortion advocates typically attack consent laws by claiming that they violate the girl's right to privacy and that the process is burdensome.

The history of parental consent laws is positive. In Minnesota, before a consent law was removed, a reduction of teen pregnancy was measured.

Point - Counterpoint

What do the scriptures teach?

The following letter was submitted in the Spring of 1991, as a response to contributing editor Mike Wade's series on pro-life activism:

Dear Mike Wade:

I hate to blow your heroic, "persecuted" pro-life Christian bit here, but if your "pro-life" efforts are being opposed by people, it is only because those efforts are fear-motivated, and work against women, the Jews, the Bible, millions of pro-choice Christians and the Constitutional guarantee of religious freedom (see the 1st amendment).

For example, Jewish tradition considers the fetus a person (a nephesh, i.e., "a breathing creature," translated as "soul" in Genesis 2:7, "life for life" in Exodus 21:23 and "man" in Lev. 24:17 - #5315 in the Hebrew dictionary in Strong's Concordance) only at birth.

Just check your Bible. The Bible's definition of "living" is breathing (Ps. 150:6, Ez. 37:10, 1 Kings 17 and similar passages. Try looking up breathing and breath in your Strong's Concordance). The Bible's definition of a human being is nephesh. It is translated 30 times as person in the King James Version, and also as "life," "man" and "soul."

Why, in Ex. 21:22-25, is only a fine paid for a miscarriage, and execution (life for life; nephesh for nephesh) required if the woman dies? It is because the unborn has not yet received the "breath of life" (through its nostrils - see Genesis 2:7). So biblically, (I'm not talking science here) it is not "alive." Therefore, abortion is not murder. Ask a rabbi or two, or three. Contact a few pro-choice Christians and look at the evidence. Kick the fear habit.

Just to confirm this, see page 139 of Operation Rescue. Randall Terry cuts off verses 23, 24 & 25 of Exodus 21, takes the passage out of the context of nephesh and "breathing," adds the idea of "accidental" (see Deuteronomy 25:11 on that idea), and tries to use Jewish scripture against the predominantly pro-choice Jews.

See George Grant's book Grand Illusions page 193 - Exodus 21 is buried under a lot of irrelevant passages, or see Grant's Third Time Around - no relevant material here. No attempt here to convince you of anything, just to give you the information that many cover up, so you can make an "informed decision." There are always people around who will use your good intentions for their purposes. - Good luck on this.

K.T. Frogg

1492 Ribbet Ave.
Oakland, California

A response from Mike Wade:

I thank Mr. Frogg for responding and providing this topic for discussion. He seems to have done considerable research on the subject, and I regret that his thoughts are not better organized so as to show full exegesis.

I'm afraid it takes more than ownership of a Strong's Concordance to arrive at logical conclusions about the Bible. As Mr. Frogg points out, God requires a penalty for the accidental death of an unborn baby boy or girl. How might God then feel about the intentional death of an unborn baby boy or girl? How might He feel about those who quote this scripture to PROMOTE such intentional killing?

Exodus 21 is in complete agreement with the rest of the Old Testament Law regarding the distinction between accidental manslaughter and intentional murder. Those who killed as the result of an accident were allowed to flee to another city (Deut. 19:5). To spell this out as clearly as possible, the penalty afforded in Exodus 21:22 was to be determined by the recklessness with which the killers were guilty. Two men struggling with each other could quite possibly strike a woman who interfered to such a degree that she miscarried. To strike her so hard that she died would take much more, and is very correctly described as manslaughter.

That Mr. Frogg tries to invoke Deut. 25:11 as an argument for his position either testifies of his faulty logic or further exemplifies his hit and run tactics of using an idea in his own defense long enough to hide behind but running to another idea before the logical conclusions of that idea can be used to disprove his original thesis.

As to the matter of breath, the Bible refers to spirits in a number of different metaphors such as fire, water, oil, and yes, breath. The key to understanding these metaphors is a sincere effort to respect context. The Old Testament clearly states that "the life is in the blood" (Lev. 17:11). This is no metaphor. Moses did not indicate that the breath of an animal be offered as a sacrifice and, for the Christian, the physical reality of Christ's shed blood on the cross is an essential tenet.

In Genesis, man is the only creature into which God "breathed" life. The imagery here is that of God taking one of his creatures and making man more than an animal: "and he became a living soul." We can't take "breath" to mean biological life anymore than we can fire or oil. Hearts can be said to "burn" and no one takes it to mean a Maalox moment God "breathed" life into Adam that he later lost as a result of sin.

The Messiah Jesus Christ provided this spiritual life to be born anew within us as a result of sin. Jesus provided this spiritual life to be born anew within us, wonderfully portrayed in John 20: 22: "He breathed on them, and said to them, 'Receive the Holy Spirit.'"

The reader has chided me for having some sort of problem with fear. If this were true, as a former supporter of abortion-as-a-means-of-birth-control, I can tell you that I would not now be radically pro-life. It takes virtually no courage to agree with militant feminists. When, I trust, the reader has discovered the person who is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, he will then be able to quote Psalm 139 with the same enthusiasm with which he has written of Exodus 21. I don't fear man, but I do fear God. It is the beginning of wisdom.

Poll reveals most Americans don't know facts on Roe vs. Wade

An overwhelming majority of Americans do not understand how available abortion is under Roe vs. Wade, a recent Gallup Poll reveals.

The recent poll, commissioned by Americans United for Life, asked 2,174 adults (18 and over) 200 questions in face to face interviews at over 360 locations nationwide. A mere 17.6% of those surveyed correctly answered that abortion is legal "for the duration of the pregnancy" under the Roe decision.

After 18 years since the Supreme Court decision, an great number of Americans do not understand how legal abortion is. For instance, in addition to the 17.6% who correctly realized that abortion is legal "for the duration of the pregnancy," 24.1% thought that it was legal only when "the mother's life is threatened," while 39.5% chose "only in the first trimester," and 12.6% were "not sure." Equally as unbelievable, 6.3% of those Americans who said that they were "familiar with Roe vs. Wade" said that the decision made all abortions illegal.

Although the Supreme Court effectively invalidated all bans on abortion in the 1973 decision, over 80% of Americans, according to Gallup, do not understand this. The political rhetoric of the pro-abortion minority has effectively kept these people in the dark about Roe.

Most Americans oppose abortions in most circumstances and would support legislation to protect unborn life. According to the recent Gallup Poll (which statistically has a plus-or-minus error factor of 2 to 3 percent) 91% of Americans oppose "sex-selection" abortions and Almost 70% favor "parental consent" for minors. Furthermore, 86% favor "informed consent" for the woman having an abortion.

In many cases, people who consider themselves pro-choice do not know what they are supporting. The "first trimester myth" is still being propagated by both pro-abortion groups and the national media, when in fact abortion remains legal throughout a pregnancy.

Researchers: Post-Abortion Syndrome a Growing Health Problem

Post Abortion Syndrome, the negative reactions many women experience after abortion, can be characterized as a form of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, and should be further researched, according to an article published in the Fall 1992 issue of the Journal of Social Issues.

The article, authored by clinical researchers and psychologists Anne Speckhard and Vincent Rue, found that significantly more research is needed to fully explore the phenomenon of Post-Abortion Syndrome, or PAS.

The authors identify PAS, as a combination of negative reactions to the abortion event, such as flashbacks, nightmares, grief and painful abortion recollections resulting in reduced responsiveness.

The researchers concluded that PAS is a type of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. Post Traumatic Stress Disorder has been recognized by the American Psychiatric Association in contexts other than abortion. PAS may result immediately following an abortion or it may be delayed. It may persist for many years and spontaneous recovery is not likely.

PAS is believed to be a series of related and unsuccessful attempts to gain mastery over the abortion experience. It results in partial to total cognitive restructuring and behavioral reorganization. Secondary symptoms of PAS include depression, substance abuse, sleep disorders and suicidal thoughts.

According to Speckhard and Rue, many symptoms are present after the abortion which were not present prior to abortion. These include: difficulty concentrating; exaggerated startled responses to memories of the abortion experience; physiological reactions to events that symbolize or resemble an aspect of the abortion; self-devaluation; and the inability to forgive the abortion decision. How voluntary the abortion decision was is largely responsible for the perceived degree of traumatization.

Speckhard and Rue concluded that flawed studies on the effects of abortion and political pressure have produced a lack of information, or informational deficit, concerning Post Abortion trauma; at present, it is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the incidence of Post Abortion Syndrome.

However, there are indications that PAS is present in a substantial number of women following abortion. For example, one study cited in the Speckhard and Rue article stated that of 80 women who had abortions at a Baltimore area clinic in the mid-1980s, approximately 20 percent had all of the symptoms of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder as established by the DSM-III R criteria of the American Psychiatric Association. The same study also found that 45 percent of the women were still having flashbacks of the experience even three to five years later.

The researchers have observed that PAS is not limited to women who have had an abortion. It has been documented in others who participate in the abortion, such as fathers, siblings and other family members of the child, and abortion clinic staff.

Speckhard and Rue recommend improved research on the subject and emphasize the growing need for specialized Post Abortion recovery treatment models and services as well as educational workshops for both the general public and professional groups.

Pro-Choice Rationale & Pro-Slavery Rationale

Pro-choicers on abortion seem perplexed why some of us persist in our dissent from their viewpoint. Convinced themselves, they cannot understand why the same arguments do not wear us down by sheer repetition. Perhaps viewing their arguments in a different light would help. Consider the pro-choice argument circa 1859:

"The whole slavery question is just a matter of a small religiously based minority trying to impose its morality on everybody. The northern Congregationalist, Unitarian and Quaker preachers draw huge crowds with their anti-choice sermons, but theirs is not the only Christian view.

"In the south, the Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist denominations strongly support a person's right to own slaves. Who are Henry Ward Beecher and his fellow agitators to impose their own views on so many other unwilling Christians?

"The law does not say that a person must own slaves. It is a matter of choice. Those who believe slavery is wrong need not participate in it, but they have no right to prevent others from doing so.

"The anti-choice forces say that a slave is a full human being with all the rights of white people. The Supreme Court says otherwise. In the Dred Scott decision, the court clearly stated that Negroes are not equal and that slaves are not entitled to full civil rights. If the anti-choice forces are allowed to alter the Constitution to change Dred Scott, will any of our rights be safe? If they can take away the right to own slaves, they can take away any right. It is a Pandora's box to change the Constitution or overturn established legal precedent.

"And what of the cost of emancipation? There are already many poor citizens, and resources are scarce. Can we afford the economic havoc that would be wrought by suddenly destroying the Southern economy and creating millions of new free citizens? The world is much more complicated than the simplistic anti-choice slogans indicate.

"Also, isn't it maddening that so many of the anti-choice leaders will never even have to face the slavery issue on a personal level? Virtually all of them come from states with only minuscule black populations (true in 1859). They will not have to live with the economic and social burdens their policies will cause those in slave-holding regions.

"Clearly, the anti-choice forces are frustrated by their inability to abolish the right to legal slavery. Unable to win by democratic means, they have resorted to violence and murder in Kansas, Missouri and Harper's Ferry, Virginia. Will we allow fanatics like John Brown to determine public policy in this country?

"The majority of Americans do not support abolition of the right to free choice in the matter of slavery (also true for 1859). That majority must be heard. Remember, we are not pro-slavery, we are just pro-choice!"

The pro-choice slavery argument fails because it ignores the critical point about the humanity of slavery. The pro-choice argument for abortion fails because of a similar omission about the nature of unborn children.

One cannot be pro-choice and claim not to make a value judgment about human life. The whole pro-choice argument is based on an assumption about the lack of intrinsic value of young human life. That assumption, and not the diversionary "pro-choice" argument, is the real issue, which abortion supporters prefer not to address.

Ray Warren is a Charlotte attorney and former member of the state House from Mecklenburg County, North Carolina. Taken from the News & Observer, Raleigh, NC.

Reader Questions Pro-Life Argument

The Forerunner teaches much totally false material regarding abortion rights and uses the Jews' own scriptures, twisting them in such a way as to threaten the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of pro-choice Jews. The Forerunner can only deceive naive people and children. I am neither of these. Please check out the following material for a proper biblical understanding of the status (legally, biblically) of the unborn, and why Jews are pro-choice.

- 1) The Bible's definition of life is "breathing." (See Psalms 150:6; Ezekiel 37:10; 1 Kings 17:22.)
- 2) The Bible's definition of person is "a breathing creature."
- 3) Exodus 21:22-25 commands a fine to be paid for the death of an unborn child; but execution is commanded for the death of a woman. (See Leviticus 24:17)

The Hebrew for "living man" is nephesh adam; this does not include the unborn.

Name withheld

Editor's Note: It would be grossly unfair to classify all Jews as pro-choice. There are many Jews, including many Rabbis, involved in the pro-life movement who base their stance firmly on the Jewish scriptures.

While the Hebrew word nephesh may be translated as "life," "soul," and "breath," the Jewish scriptures do not teach that only that which has breath is a living soul. A more accurate determination of a living being is found in Leviticus 17:11; "For the life of a creature is in the blood." Unborn infants have flowing blood and a beating heart at 3-4 weeks. In fact, unborn infants do breathe by exchanging oxygen for carbon dioxide through the mother's umbilical cord.

A careful study of the Hebrew legal code regarding the status of unborn children reveals that they are considered living human beings. Exodus 21:22 has often been erroneously used to downplay the hideous crime of aborting children. The event mentioned in Exodus 21 refers to an accident or involuntary manslaughter. The men fighting in this passage were not seeking to harm the woman or her child. The child's death is considered manslaughter and the prescribed punishment is in keeping with the rest of the Jewish Law concerning manslaughter.

Other passages in the Jewish scriptures show that an unborn infant is definitely considered a nephesh adam. In Hebrew, the same word is used to identify babies in the womb and those out of the womb.

Genesis 25:22 says, "the children struggled within her (womb)." The word "children" is the Hebrew word ben, which is used interchangeably to depict a person already born, or one yet in his mother's womb - there is no difference.

Probably the best known passage in the Bible concerning pre-born human life is Psalm 139: "For thou didst form my inward parts; Thou didst weave me in my mothers womb. I will give thanks to Thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made; wonderful are Thy works, and my soul knows it very well. My frame was not hidden from Thee, when I was made in secret, and skillfully wrought in the depths of the earth. Thine eyes have seen my unformed substance; and in Thy book they were all written, the days that were ordained for me, when as yet there was not one of them" - Psalm 139:13-16.

Not only is a unique human being present in the womb, but God Himself is intimately involved in the developing process. To destroy a child yet in the creative hand of God is murder.

2. The number of women dying from illegal abortions in 1972, the year before Roe vs. Wade, was:
A. 500 B. 5,000 C. 253 D. 39
3. How many abortions are now done each day?
A. 140 B. 500 C. 1,000 D. 4,000
4. The total number of abortions done since 1973 is _____.
5. Most Americans believe the majority of abortions performed in this country should not be legal. (True or False)
6. A heartbeat, brainwaves and response to touch are all present in an unborn baby by:
A. 2 months B. 3 months C. 4 months D. Birth.
7. It is legal for a minor daughter to have an abortion in most states without her parents' knowledge or permission. (True or False)
8. Abortions done for rape, incest and threat to the mother's life account for _____% of the 1.5 million abortions done each year in the United States.
9. An unborn baby can feel pain in the 3rd month. (True or False)
10. The number of couples waiting to adopt babies is:
A. 100,000 B. 2 million C. 1 million D. 500,000

Abortion I.Q. - Answers

1. 9th - In the court's Roe vs. Wade and Doe vs. Bolton decisions, abortions throughout the nine months of pregnancy were declared legal.
2. (D) 39 - This is the total number reported by the U.S. Center For Disease Control, a federal agency.

3. (D) - Over 4,000 abortions are done every day in the U.S.
4. 22 million - Total for 1973 through 1988.
5. TRUE - "Most Americans would ban the vast majority of abortions performed in this country." - Boston Globe, March 31, 1989, p. 1.
6. (A) 2 months - By 21 days the heart is pumping and brainwaves have been recorded as early as 40 days.
7. TRUE - In 38 states minors can have abortions without their parents' consent or notification.
8. About 1% - If mother's "health" is included - an Alan Guttmacher survey, as reported in The Boston Globe [March 31, 1989], reports that abortions for "rape, incest and danger to the mother's physical health" account for only about 7% of abortions in the U.S.)
9. TRUE - Dr. Vincent Collins, diplomat and fellow, American Board of Anesthesiologists, letter to President Reagan, February 13, 1984.
10. (B) 2 million - National Committee for Adoption, Washington, D.C.

Pro-life Leader Appointed to Federal Post

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - Kay James, one of the most respected leaders in the pro-life movement, was recently appointed as assistant secretary of Health and Human Services. James will be assisting Dr. Louis Sullivan, who has been criticized by pro-life leaders for his occasional statements of support for legalized abortion.

James has been active in the pro-life movement as a volunteer since 1978. She joined the National Right to Life Committee, Inc., in May of 1985, as the director of public affairs. She represented the committee on numerous local and national television programs such as "The Today Show," "Nightline," and "The Oprah Winfrey Show," and has appeared in various debates.

As founder of Black Americans for Life, James has worked to educate the black community in pro-life/pro-family issues and to develop policy solutions for women with crisis pregnancies. The National Family Institute, founded by James and her husband, Charles, was established to address crises within black American families.

When Dr. Sullivan was appointed by President Bush in January, Republican leaders had questions about his stand on abortion. However, after a meeting with a group of senators including Robert Dole and Gordon Humphrey, doubts about his position seemed to be resolved. Humphrey stated, "I am convinced that, like President Bush, Dr. Sullivan believes in his heart that the Roe vs. Wade decision should be overturned because the effect of that decision is the destruction of human life."

Sullivan's choice of Kay James as an assistant is seen as a clear signal that he will surround himself with pro-life staffers.

In a stunning development, the legislature of the western Pacific island of Guam, a U.S territory, voted unanimously to ban virtually all abortions. The bill was signed into law by Gov. Joseph F. Ada (D) on March 19, but a week later a federal district court judge issued a temporary restraining order blocking enforcement until a court challenge is heard.

The new law, by far the most restrictive in the United States, would forbid all abortions except when it is believed that the pregnancy would "endanger the life of the mother" or "gravely impair" her health. District Judge Alex Munson issued a temporary restraining order blocking enforcement until May 8, when the trial is set to begin. If the case makes it to the Supreme Court, it would force the judges to uphold or overturn Roe v. Wade, with which the law is clearly in conflict.

Nearly every state in the United States is considering some type of abortion related (mostly pro-life) legislation this year. The following states have already begun the legislative process of imposing restrictions on abortions.

* Alabama: A restrictions bill was passed in the state House on March 8 by an overwhelming 79-18 majority.

* Kansas: The state House passed a parental notification measure, 73-50, on March 1.

* Michigan: Gov. James Blanchard vetoed a Feb 23 parental consent bill, but the state legislature is likely to overturn the veto. Michigan Right to Life is gathering 192,000 signatures to place the measure before the legislature again.

* Mississippi: Both houses on Feb. 8 passed informed consent bills. Versions of a clinic regulation bill have also passed both houses.

* South Carolina: On Feb. 21, the House approved a parental notification bill which was then signed into law by Gov. Carroll Campbell on Feb. 28.

* Wisconsin: A parental consent bill, was passed enthusiastically (72-24) by the House.

New developments in many battles around the nation are occurring almost every day. Many states are considering pro-life legislation specifically designed to challenge the constitutionality of Roe vs. Wade.

"Public Views" on abortion depend on questions asked

NEW YORK, N.Y. (EP) - Polls taken to determine the American public's attitude toward abortion may get very different results, depending on how the questions are worded.

That's the conclusion of a New York Times analysis of abortion polling.

In a January 22 analysis of various abortion surveys, writer Tamar Lewin reported that in a New York Times/CBS News Poll only 29 percent said there should be a constitutional amendment prohibiting abortion, yet "when the same people were asked if there should be a constitutional amendment protecting the life of the unborn child, 50 percent said they would favor one."

In another such discrepancy, over half of the people questioned in a 1985 survey by the Louis Harris organization said abortion is murder, while a Gallup Poll the same year showed that over 90 percent thought abortion was sometimes the best way out of a bad situation.

Lewin explained, "Polling experts agree that more people are far more likely to say they favor abortion rights when the question is framed in terms of a woman's right to choose than when the question talks about protecting an unborn child."

Removing the Media's Smokescreens

by Jay Rogers
5/89

In the wake of the controversy over legalized abortion, most Americans are unaware of the nature of the Roe vs. Wade ruling.

Roe vs. Wade was a 1973 Supreme Court decision legalizing abortion in the case of rape, incest, or when the physical health of the mother is endangered. The court also determined that human life could only be legally protected after the first trimester (or first three months) of a pregnancy. The court granted individual states the right to regulate abortion laws in the second and third trimesters of pregnancy, but gave the individual woman the right to choose whether or not to have an abortion.

Since 1973, however, over 23 million abortions have been performed ... and most abortions are performed on demand without regard to the conditions of the original ruling. Ten percent of these, or over two million abortions, have been performed after the first three months of pregnancy.

A 1987 survey by the Alan Guttmacher Institute showed that three quarters of American women obtaining an abortion did so because having a baby would interfere with work, school, or other responsibilities.

About two-thirds in that sample said they could not afford to have a child, and half said that they did not want to be a single parent or were having problems in their relationship with their father.

Another poll conducted March 27-29, 1989, by The Boston Globe showed that most Americans would ban the vast majority of abortions performed in this country. Seventy-two percent said they would allow abortion in no circumstances or limit abortion to the circumstances provided for in the original Supreme Court ruling. According to the Guttmacher survey, those circumstances account for only seven percent of the 1.5 million abortions performed annually.

When rape or incest results in a pregnancy, or there is danger to the health and life of the mother, those surveyed overwhelmingly favored abortion. However, when pregnancy poses financial or emotional strain, or when the woman is unmarried or a teenager, the poll showed that a majority of Americans believe abortion should be illegal.

In the Boston Globe survey, 1002 registered voters were reached nationwide. Only 25 percent said that abortion should be legal in all circumstances, 19 percent said in no circumstances and 53 percent who believed that abortion should be legal only in certain circumstances were then asked a series of questions. Because of the reduced sample the question had an error margin of three percent.

The following circumstances were preceded by the question: "In this case, do you think it should be legal or illegal for a woman to obtain an abortion?"

* "A woman who feels that it's the wrong time in her life to have a baby" - 82 percent said abortion should be illegal.

* "A woman who cannot afford to have a child" - 75 percent said abortion should be illegal.

* "The father is unwilling to help raise the child" - 83 percent said that abortion should be illegal.

* "The mother wants an abortion but the father wants the baby" - 72 percent said abortion should be illegal.

Most Americans disapprove the use of public funds to pay for abortions and the vast majority is opposed to the use of abortion for gender selection or birth control.

Although most Americans approve of abortion in certain circumstances (rape, incest, or physical danger to the mother) the poll reveals that 72 percent of all those surveyed are against abortion in most instances.

A Contradiction?

Recent polls show that Americans are not in favor of abortion on demand, but there is a disparity in popular opinion. Gallup and Harris showed that nearly 60 percent of the country does not favor the overturn of Roe vs. Wade, while 57 percent want abortion to be legal only in certain circumstances. Such apparently contradictory results show just how unaware most people in America are of the availability of abortion under the Roe vs. Wade decision.

The decision has now been extended to such a degree that second and third trimester babies are being slaughtered by the hundreds of thousands annually. Many of these babies could survive outside of the womb at these stages of development.

A major contributing factor to the ignorance of the American public are distortions and highly publicized misinformation propagated by pro-abortion groups.

Douglas Gould, vice president for communications at Planned Parenthood Federation of America - a group campaigning in favor of abortion - recently stated that when the question centers around the "legal right of a woman" to have an abortion without government restriction, most Americans will give the decision to the woman to make. "That's the beauty of the Roe decision," Gould said. "It leaves the question where most Americans think it should be - with the woman and her doctor."

Guy Condon, executive director of Americans United for Life, a pro-life organization, put it differently:

"Our focus is on restoring legal protection of unborn children against elective abortions." He said that when the question is posed in terms of "legal rights of the unborn," most Americans disapprove of abortion, but when the question centers around personal choice, the focus shifts around to the pregnant woman rather than the child having that choice.

It is a great hypocrisy to believe that a woman should have the right to an abortion, and yet deny the right to life to an unborn child. The inconsistencies of such thinking can be seen in groups which seek to ratify the equal rights amendment or promote animal rights while denying unborn children the right to life.

Says author Winkie Pratney, "Many of the same apparently intelligent people who fight for the lives of baby whales, seal pups, and fledgling bald eagles also demand the right to abort a human child. Who has blinded them to the shocking inconsistency in their thinking?"¹

Seeing Through the Media Smokescreens

In the news media this injustice has been fed to the American public, and sadly, many have been deceived. Recently, the National Abortion Rights Action League ran a full page advertisement in the New York Times, featuring a picture of a coat-hanger and a message - "Just 16 years ago, for countless desperate women, a coat-hanger looked like the only way out of a crisis pregnancy." This ad and many more like it are last attempt scare tactics being used by the pro-abortion movement to intimidate the opponents of Roe vs. Wade.

The pro-abortion movement is now using extreme distortions to defend their cause. The most notable of these is - KEEP ABORTION SAFE AND LEGAL.

Although abortions are now legal, they are by no means safe. During the years following the Roe vs. Wade decision many malpractice suits have been filed against abortion clinics. The number of women who have experienced sterility, infection, perforation of the uterus, or psychological trauma since 1973 have far exceeded those in the years previous to the Supreme Court decision.

These statistics are the result of legal abortion on demand coupled with a skyrocketing curve depicting the number of pregnancies among unmarried young women. The result of these two positively correlated factors has been an even greater occurrence of traumatic horror and degradation than when abortion was legal.

Women in America are not "safer" under the Roe vs. Wade decision, but more prone than ever to abuse, exploitation, and barbaric treatment.

Other horrors related to abortion exposed in recent years include:

* Post-abortion syndrome - a state of depression and psychological trauma observed in women following an abortion.

* Live post-abortion births - forced births during second and third trimester abortions have often yielded live babies who are then left to die by starvation or neglect.

* Fetal experimentation - aborted babies have been kept alive in incubators and used in medical experiments; others have had their organs harvested for experimentation while still alive.

There are alternatives to abortion that are safer and more humane than this barbaric practice. Men and women possessed of a deeper and gentler humanity are forming Crisis Pregnancy Centers, which are the pro-life movement's answer to the abortion clinic. Women are given the right to choose adoption, and are also given counseling and financial assistance if they choose to take on the awesome responsibility of raising and caring for their child.

Crisis Centers are being established by people who display a more responsible attitude toward a crisis pregnancy. Thousands of compassionate people have volunteered freely to work at these centers and to take some of these women into their homes. Contrary to the distortion propagated by the National Abortion Rights Action League - Crisis Centers, not abortion, is the answer to a crisis pregnancy.

Another tactic being employed by the pro-abortion movement is the distortion of "unwanted children." Thousands of married couples have been waiting for years to adopt children, yet "unwanted children" are short in supply. Perhaps abortion is in part responsible for the recent occurrence of "black market babies," a practice in which children are kidnapped by underworld organizations and sold to couples who are unable to adopt. The concept of "unwanted children" needs to be eradicated from our national consciousness.

Our lawmakers and statesmen have also been blinded by the same deception that has overtaken the pro-abortion forces. Supreme Court Justice Blackmun recently stated in an interview with The Village Voice that the unborn are not included in the definition of the word person.

Referring to the 14th Amendment, which states, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States ... No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of the law," Blackmun concluded, "So, the word person does not include the unborn."

Blackmun's reasoning here is extremely flawed. The phrase "All persons" does not mean "only those persons"; the term is inclusive, not exclusive. The words "born" and "naturalized" are descriptive terms referring to "persons" - the intent of this amendment was to grant equal rights to all people, and (together with the 13th and 15th Amendments) to abolish slavery. This statement does not define what a person is, but states inclusively (not exclusively) which persons ought to be considered citizens and have the rights of life, liberty and freedom.

Furthermore, if Blackmun's reasoning was followed, only those born or naturalized in the United States should be considered "persons." What about those born outside the United States? Are they not considered persons, either? Should illegal aliens be killed the same way that abortionists butcher babies? It is amazing that a man who has ascended to such a high seat of power can apply such flawed thinking to a decision making process.

If Roe vs. Wade is overturned, individual states will then be given the right to regulate abortion. Liberal states, such as California, New York or Massachusetts could then become a haven for all those seeking an abortion. What is needed is a constitutional amendment guaranteeing the right to life for the unborn and making abortion an illegal practice. Then millions of children will be given their chance to live their lives and express their humanity freely.

Norma McCorvey: "Jane Roe" of Roe v. Wade

- by Leilani Corpus

She was a pregnant 21-year-old woman with a 10th grade education ... too poor to get an illegal abortion in Texas, or a legal one in California. He was a physician whose practice was suffering because he could not perform legal abortions. Norma McCorvey, Dr. James Hallford, and John and Mary Doe, a married couple who could not bear children or take contraceptives due to health risks, were all ripe candidates for what was escalating into a nationwide cause celebre in 1970 - the right of a woman to have an abortion.

Considered one of the centers of the nation's Bible belt, Texas law forbid abortion except in the case where the life of the mother was threatened. McCorvey's plight, as well as that of the Doe's and Dr. Hallford, provided a stage for pro-abortionists to challenge the Texas courts. The testimonies of a physician, a poor young woman, and a childless couple were models for Planned Parenthood's case. What American would not be moved with sympathy by McCorvey's testimony of being raped by three men and a woman? Or a physician who wished to perform safe, legal abortions?

In March, 1970, McCorvey filed a lawsuit on behalf of herself and "all other women similarly situated," along with the Does and Dr. Hallford. Their case set the wheels in motion towards overruling the 100-year-old abortion law. Later the Doe's and Dr. Hallford's cases were dismissed for lack of standing. The court also threw out McCorvey's case and reaffirmed the Texas state law.

In the meantime, McCorvey had given birth to her child and put the baby up for adoption. She was forced to give birth, according to court records, because of the length of the court case and the decision-making process. Ironically, today a 16-year-old child who was a candidate for the first legal abortion in Texas is now living, while millions of others have died because of the consequences of that decision.

Although she gave birth, McCorvey filed an appeal with the U.S. Supreme Court, and was represented by Sarah Weddington, a prominent Dallas attorney. Her case was heard the same day as that of a 20-year-old Georgia woman named Sandra Bensing. Her case, Doe vs. Bolton, also reached the Supreme Court level. Bensing was represented by feminist lawyer Marjorie Pitts Hames.

The two Southern women and their attorneys argued that the Texas and Georgia abortion laws were unconstitutional because of the infringement on a woman's right to privacy, as well as their supposed violation of the 1st, 4th, 5th, 8th, 9th and 14th amendments to the U.S. Constitution. The subsequent victory for pro-abortionists overturned every state law banning abortions and opened the door to legalizing a massive underground industry.

It had only been a matter of time. Stories about back alley abortionists maiming poor young girls, the changing perception of the value of human life, and an activist Supreme Court were factors that encouraged the decision. Prior to Roe vs. Wade, performing abortions had been an anathema for physicians and ran counter to the convictions of the Hippocratic oath. "We didn't like doing them ... because it had been considered taboo for so long ..." said Dr. Joseph Randall, who began performing abortions before Roe vs. Wade in Albany, New York. Dr. Randall said that with the passage of time he became "desensitized. Eventually, we became numb to the process as the taboos fell to the wayside."

Roe vs. Wade signalled not only a broader interpretation of the "right to privacy" - to include a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy - but swept in an era of judicial activism. The Court held that the fetus has no right of its own to claim protection, and redefined "life" for children and adults.

Roe vs. Wade's Cracked Foundation

Today, 16 years later, after 25 million abortions, the foundations of Roe vs. Wade are beginning to crumble. President Bush's reappointment of Attorney General Richard Thornburgh, and some recent and shocking disclosures by the original plaintiffs, as well as a surge of pro-life activism, are revealing that legalized abortion is in trouble.

Since the landmark Supreme Court decision, Norma McCorvey gave birth to her child, and Sandra Bensing never had an abortion. Both of these women have also come forward to admit that their testimony was false. In 1987, McCorvey told Washington Times columnist Carl Rowan that the Roe decision was based on false testimony. She admitted that her account of being raped in 1969 was a fabrication designed to invalidate the law. Instead, she confessed that she had become pregnant by her boyfriend.

Sandra Bensing also filed a request in early January of this year asking the Georgia Supreme Court to review her case. She told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution that she approached an attorney seeking assistance to secure legal custody of her children. The attorney told her that she would like her to be the plaintiff in a case challenging the Georgia state law banning abortion, and she agreed.

She stated that she never needed an abortion, and has never received one since the decision. "This could destroy the legal foundation for Roe vs. Wade," said Joan Moseley, a spokesperson for the plaintiff. "We believe we have discovered fraud, but we are protecting the plaintiff because she has been getting harassed by pro-abortion groups."

Bensing said during the abortion case that much of her life was in a "daze" and that she was examined twice at psychiatric hospitals. "I just had a really tremendous emotional stress on me. It was a hell I was living through." She described herself "like a little puppy on a leash. Wherever I thought anybody was going to help me, I would follow along."

She said she opposes abortion and hopes the Supreme Court ruling will be reversed. "I decided from the very beginning I would never consent to an abortion," she said. "I'm not a religious person but I believe in God. I know He's real. I know we don't take lives."

Although she knew was using the case to overturn Georgia's anti-abortion law, she said, "I decided from the very beginning I was not going to have an abortion. They told me if I agreed to go through the courts they would not force me to have an abortion." She said she is now determined to work against abortion.

McCorvey's attorney, Sarah Weddington, claims that her rape testimony wasn't a factor in the Roe decision: "I never touched the issue of rape and only emphasized the question of whether the Constitution gives to the state or leaves to a woman the questions of what she can or must do with her body." Since the Georgia plaintiff filed her request, Hames has actually hired an attorney to protect herself.

All of these developments have come on the heels of a recent Supreme Court decision to review a Missouri case, Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services. The issue before the court now is a state law which bans abortions and public funding, except in the case when a mother's life is endangered. Attorney General Thornburgh has asked the high court to review the case and to rule against the precedent established by Roe vs. Wade.

Meanwhile: The Effects of Abortion on the Nation

What have 16 years of abortion done to our nation? Planned Parenthood's sex education services have proliferated considerably onto junior-high and high school campuses. Consequently, studies indicate that the rate of teen pregnancies has skyrocketed, along with the use of contraceptives. Each year, over one million teenage girls become pregnant ... resulting in 400,000 abortions.

The abortion industry and contraceptive manufacturing has proven to be a very lucrative trade. According to a study published in Family Planning Perspectives, the 400 percent increase in the numbers of teens reached by contraceptive information has resulted in a 45 percent increase in teen pregnancies. Also, even among those teen-agers who were reported as always using contraceptives, 13.9 percent still got pregnant.

Besides the increase of teen pregnancies, experts have also documented the painful side-effects of abortion. Recently Surgeon General C. Everett Koop wrote a letter to President Reagan saying that there is inconclusive evidence to demonstrate the harmful side-effects of abortion on women. However, Koop's remarks have been strongly challenged by other experts in reproductive health and psychology. They maintain that there is a large body of scientific evidence which indicates long-term physical effects for most women who undergo abortion. Pro-life leaders affirm that stress can cause major emotional problems for women even five to ten years after the abortion.

Last year, a California abortion clinic was closed down temporarily by the city due to the high death rate and health hazards. Approximately 40 to 50 women had died from abortions at the clinic, said Kathy Walker, vice president of Women Exploited by Abortion (WEBA). The group, along with the Inglewood

City Council, was instrumental in closing down the clinic.

"There was one case where a woman had a D & C abortion at the clinic," said Walker, "and she started having a complication. Instead of taking her to the hospital down the street, they took her across town to another facility that was associated with the clinic. She was hospitalized for three days and died on the last day." WEBA also represented a teenager who was physically harmed by a saline abortion, but the case was thrown out, said Walker.

When asked how many women have died from abortions, Walker explained that it was hard to calculate because doctors usually place information about abortion-related deaths under a different category. "It's a cover up. The doctor has the authority to write what he wants. And doctors will cover up for other doctors."

WEBA began in the early 1980s and is growing rapidly in every state in the union, with chapters in Japan and the United Kingdom.

Besides the post-abortion psychological trauma for the mother, researchers have found that the fetus experiences pain. "Whatever the method used, the unborn are experiencing the greatest of bodily evils, the ending of their lives. They are undergoing the death agony," said John Noonan, a law professor at the University of California in Berkeley.

Dr. Michael Harrison, associate professor of surgery at the University of California in San Francisco and co-director of the university's Fetal Treatment Program, said, "Yes, fetuses do feel pain. They have the same response as a newborn baby."

Who Has Benefitted from Roe vs. Wade?

The only beneficiaries of the Roe decision have been the abortion industry and Planned Parenthood, since the actual plaintiffs have never taken advantage of the ruling in their favor. Possibly the other beneficiaries are the attorneys, Weddington and Pitts Hames, who have gained considerable notoriety among feminists and liberal politicians for their devotion to the cause of abortion.

The victims of the decision are the mothers, children, and doctors who have been physically and psychologically harmed by abortion. McCorvey and the Doe plaintiff have also been marked for the rest of their lives by the dark shadow cast by the Supreme Court ruling. The Georgia plaintiff says she often receives harassing phone calls.

1989 is a prime opportunity for the reversal of a case which has wreaked havoc upon the lives of teenagers, mothers, doctors and unborn children across the nation. With the Missouri case before the Supreme Court, recent disclosures from former plaintiffs, and the growing body of evidence which demonstrates the harmful effects of abortion on the mother and the child, the reversal of Roe vs. Wade is indeed a very concrete possibility.

Roe "Arbitrary" says Blackmun

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - The Washington Post reports that an internal memorandum written while the Supreme Court was considering the Roe vs. Wade case shows that the Court used "arbitrary" criteria in reaching its landmark abortion decision.

In a January 22 feature, the Post quoted a Supreme Court memorandum from Associate Justice Harry Blackmun, who authored Roe vs. Wade. In the memorandum, Blackmun acknowledged that he was using "arbitrary" judgment when determining how far into a pregnancy unrestricted abortion should be allowed.

The memo, found at the Library of Congress in the personal papers of the late Justice William O. Douglas, dates to November 21, 1973. In it, Blackmun said the first-trimester cutoff for unrestricted abortion "is arbitrary." He argued, "But perhaps any other selected point, such as quickening or viability [of the unborn child], is equally arbitrary."

The Post noted that although the Blackmun memo calls the cutoff arbitrary, his Roe vs. Wade decision calls a woman's right to abortion "compelling," and said it prevails up to approximately the end of the first trimester."

Safe, Legal Abortion?

* A 28 year old victim of a botched legal abortion, naked from the waist down, unwrapped, was forced to stand outside of a Washington D.C. abortion center and wait for an employee to drive her to a hospital. Before arriving she nearly bled to death from a severed uterine artery. An emergency hysterectomy was required to save her life.¹

* During an abortion done by Dr. Milan Vuitch, a young mother suffered perforations and lacerations of the uterus, cervix and bowel. She required a hysterectomy and extensive hospitalization for a massive infection caused by decayed parts of her unborn child which were thrust into her abdomen during the abortion. She suffered severe and long lasting emotional trauma, i.e. anxiety, depression, sleeplessness and nightmares, "often of pulled apart fetuses, dead children and other morbid themes."²

* Dr. Edgar Gonzalez performed a legal abortion on a 12-year-old girl who was seven months pregnant. The girl almost died during the abortion. She was rushed to a hospital where a hysterectomy and colostomy were required to save her life. The dead baby, two pounds, was removed at that time. This girl is now sterile.³

From Back Alley to Front Office

Legal abortion is not safe abortion. In fact, legal abortion is just as unsafe as illegal abortion. According to one medical study, "An unfortunate aspect of this procedure is the vast number of complications."⁴ The immediate life threatening conditions are heavy bleeding and infection. A British medical journal reports the following.

1. 17% of the patients lost over 500 ml of blood and 9.5% needed transfusions.
2. 27% suffered infections and fever above 100.4(o), lasting more than 24 hours.
3. Cervical lacerations occurred in 4.2%.
4. Perforation of the uterus occurred in 1.2%.

The article concludes, "This emphasizes that the termination of pregnancy is neither as simple nor as safe as some advocates of abortion would have the public believe. Moreover, the incidence of such complications as infertility, recurrent miscarriages, premature labor, ruptured uterus or emotional manifestations cannot be assessed at this stage."⁵

The womb during pregnancy is designed to protect the new life growing there. During an abortion the mouth of the womb, the cervix, is forcibly stretched open. This can tear the cervix, making the woman far more likely to miscarry her next pregnancy.

The powerful suction used in first trimester abortion can scar the uterus, resulting in scarred fallopian tubes, tubal pregnancies or sterility. It can also cause placenta previa. If an abortionist is too gentle with the suction tube he will leave behind parts of the unborn child or placenta - causing infection. If he is too forceful he will tear a hole in the uterus and an emergency hysterectomy may be needed.

Several medical studies of legal abortion are summarized below.

- * 4% of women having legal abortions will suffer from a damaged cervix.⁶

- * 5-10% will become sterile.⁷

- * Legalized abortion has resulted in:

- a.) a 300% increase in first trimester miscarriages of later pregnancies.⁸

- b.) a 400% increase in second trimester miscarriages of later pregnancies.⁹

- c.) a 200% increase in premature births.¹⁰

- d.) a 700% increase in placenta previsa.¹¹

- e.) a 200% increase in tubal pregnancies.¹²

Lets consider these facts in light of a pro-abortion slogan: "Freedom of choice in reproduction." What about the woman who had a legal abortion and as a result can no longer "choose" to have a baby. A woman and the child in her womb share the consequences of good treatment or bad. They are both complex systems made of delicate flesh. One inside the other. The abortionist's tools cut both ways. Therefore abortion aborts women as well.

One study estimates that one fourth of all aborted women will not be able to have a normal pregnancy again. After so many women have experienced abortion in this country, any feminist who fails to acknowledge the extent of abortion trauma can justly be accused of indifference to women's pain.

More and more, health researchers are noting a dramatic rise in sterility, tubal pregnancies and placenta previa.¹³ Vanderbilt University Medical Center noted an increase in placenta previa, a condition in pregnancy where the placenta covers the opening of the womb. This can lead to great blood loss to the mother during labor. It can cause death of the mother and death of the baby. Doctors on staff looked into the increase of this condition and found its cause to be the increase of legal abortions. The study concluded that aborted women were 7-15 times more likely to get placenta previa in later pregnancies.¹⁴

A doctor in private practice reported on 54 abortion patients ranging in age from 15-19. One of the ghastly stories included that of a 17-year-old girl who experienced bleeding and pain every day after a suction abortion. After four days she went into her bathroom and passed recognizable parts of her unborn child into the toilet. She then fainted and developed severe hysteria.¹⁵

Legal Abortion Deaths

Abortion advocates claim that things were worse when abortion was illegal. Some have claimed that 5,000 to 10,000 women died each year from illegal abortions. These unsubstantiated figures were advanced first by Dr. F. J. Taussig and then by Dr. Bernard Nathanson when he was co-founder of the National Abortion Rights League. Other abortion advocates admit that these figures are totally false and were used to make abortion acceptable to the public.¹⁶ The annual reports on vital statistics reveal the following.

* In 1965 there were 235 deaths from all abortions (legal, illegal and spontaneous).¹⁷

* In 1966 this number dropped to 189, in 1967 it was 160 deaths.¹⁸

* In 1968 there were 55 deaths from illegal abortions.¹⁹

* In 1972 (one year before Roe vs. Wade) there were 48 deaths from illegal abortions. In 1973 there were 33 deaths from induced abortions.²⁰

If abortion were made illegal again, would there be deaths? Yes. Expect illegal abortion deaths to replace legal abortion deaths about one to one. The Hyde amendment was passed in 1978 and cut off funds for 300,000 Medicaid abortions. Everybody was predicting dozens or hundreds of deaths as a result. The abortion industry has searched for the last 10 years for the expected death. It did not happen (see the CDC reports for early 1979).

David Reardon, author of Aborted Women: Silent No More (Loyola University Press, 1987), carefully tabulates statistics from the U.S. and Europe and finds a distressing portrait of female loss and pain. In three studies he cites, ectopic pregnancies increase after abortion 200%, 300%, as much as 800%. For every 100,000 ectopic pregnancies, there are 300 rupture/hemorrhage deaths. Ironically, abortion advocates distort these figures to prove that pregnancy is dangerous.

Reardon's book further exposes the lie that abortion is safer than childbirth. It is no surprise that abortion providers have tried to set our minds to rest by providing the political push to eliminate uniform legal requirements for reporting abortion related deaths. In the years when there was an accurate reporting procedure, Oregon reported 14 deaths per 100,000 legal abortions, compared with 8 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births. Maryland reported 40 deaths per 100,000 abortions, compared to 23 maternal deaths per 100,000 live births. In Sweden and Denmark, abortion mortality rates are twice the maternal death rate and conditions are safer there.

Here are some specific cases of women who died from their legal abortions:

1. Women's Care Center in Miami killed four mothers and their babies from 1979-83.²¹ (1)
2. In Los Angeles, a 16-year-old Hispanic girl bled for five hours during an abortion of her six-month-old unborn baby and died of cardiac arrest. Her family filed a lawsuit against Dr. Edward Allred, charging that her death resulted from negligence caused by his anti-Hispanic bigotry documented in local newspapers.²² (2)
3. Dr. James Franklin of Denver left parts of an unborn child inside a 26-year-old patient. When she went home she was packed with gauze and was bleeding profusely. She died two days later of a massive infection.²³ (3)

A Nation of Hurting Women

"Nearly 80% of the women surveyed believed they were denied information or were actively misinformed by their counselors prior to their abortions ... nearly 50% complained that they were not told about fetal development."

- David Reardon

Aborted Women: Silent No More

The emotional impact of abortion can be as crippling as the physical risks. Some women never bring their grief or guilt to the surface, yet it still affects them. One study of these emotional effects found, "Unresolved feelings of grief, guilt and loss may remain long after an abortion."²⁴ (1)

Women may try to artificially numb the intense pain through drinking or drugs. Many go through unexplained depressions and often the relationship with the father of the baby is destroyed.

Women Exploited By Abortion (WEBA) was formed to help women overcome being silenced by their shame and to illuminate the reality of abortion as an assault on women at every level of their existence. WEBA is also a refuge and a source of spiritual and emotional healing where members turn their pain and loss into personal growth and compassion for others.

Nancy Jo Mann, Founder of WEBA, remembers her saline abortion in Aborted Women: Silence No More: "For two hours I could feel her struggling inside me. But then as suddenly as it began she stopped. Even today I remember her very last kick on my left side. She had no strength left. Despite my grief and guilt I was relieved that her pain was finally over. But I was never the same again. The abortion killed not only my daughter, it killed a part of me."

The following accounts are of women that WEBA has helped.²⁵ (2)

* Cindy, 28, was hospitalized for psychiatric disturbances numerous times in the four years following her legal abortion. Four of those times followed serious suicide attempts.

* Terry, 36, has a recurring nightmare in which a child cries out to her in a pleading voice, reaching with tiny arms, until the scalpel falls, leaving only bloody nubs still reaching.

* Lynda was 15 when her mother dragged her, begging and crying, into the abortion mill. She was sedated and her mother signed Lynda's name to a consent form. Lynda has never been emotionally stable enough to return to high school.

* Debbie became pregnant as a result of rape. Following her abortion she suffered complications which culminated in a hysterectomy. Worse than her physical trauma was the realization that, "the man who raped me took a few minutes of my life, but I took my baby's entire life ... I perpetuated the worse crime. How I wish there had been one person who had offered love, support and encouragement."

* Karen Sullivan experienced nightmares, depression and suicidal thoughts the months and years after her abortion. She remembers: "During the abortion I looked down and saw the bits and pieces of my baby floating in a pool of blood. When I screamed, "I killed my baby!" the counselor told me, "Shut up." Today she wonders, "Since when has death become good for us?"

Can the brutality of abortion be a benefit for pregnant teens? Reardon found that those for whom abortion seems therapeutically "indicated," i.e. victims of rape or incest, women too young or poor or troubled, seem to be the ones who suffer most from the trauma of abortion. This finding lays to rest the assumption that legal abortion might be tragic but necessary in the hard cases.

Abortion Is Not The Answer

Abortion proponents often claim that a woman denied an abortion may attempt suicide. However, suicide among pregnant women has always been extremely rare. In Ohio there were only two maternal suicide deaths from 1955-1963.²⁶ From 1938-1958, over 13,500 Swedish were denied abortion. Only three committed suicide.²⁷

While maternal suicide is rare, women often attempt suicide after an abortion. A pediatric journal warned pediatricians to be on the lookout for young teenage girls who attempt suicide after legal abortion.²⁸ In 1981, Meta Uchtman, regional director of Cincinnati Suiciders Anonymous testified before the Cincinnati City Council, "Of over 4,000 that were seen by our group, 1,800 or more had had abortions.

An American psychiatric journal recorded cases of women who suffered complete disintegration of personality after a legal abortion.²⁹

Another claim we hear is that most women who are refused access to legal abortion will get abortions elsewhere, either out of the country or illegally. This is not true. In Canada, of 6,000 women who were denied abortion, only 13% of them got abortions anyway. The vast majority decided to keep their children. The study found that there were no major psychological problems associated with the women or children they gave birth to.³⁰

Many good, well-intentioned people support abortion because of what the media and the pro-abortionists have been saying: That it is good for women, that legal abortion is safe, illegal abortion is unsafe (killing thousands of women yearly), that women will get abortions anyway, etc. In short, this nation has been deceived and many of those who are committed to legal abortion do not know all of the facts.

Pro-life people are not taking the easy way out. Brave and generous behavior can be stressful. Being right does not ensure personal peace.

Nobody should make moral judgements purely on the basis of the resultant pleasure or pain. Abortion is wrong not because it will bring pain, though it will. Protecting human life is right because it preserves what God creates for His eternal purpose.

Second Thoughts

12/92

It wasn't a mistake, but I've had second thoughts.

I wasn't aware how this growth could control my life. I am affected physically, emotionally, and mentally. My hormones and my energy level, constant backache and fatigue all hinder my concentration on work. And of course all this affects my interpersonal relationships as well.

The worst is that I know that my choices and opportunities will become more and more limited by mundane responsibilities. And this state may last for years.

All this trouble for something which can't be considered human yet. After all, it can't function independently of me. Its thought processes are debatable, even if it CAN feel, does it have any memory of its experiences? My cat is just as "human," and I would have HIM put to sleep if I thought it necessary.

The "alternatives"? I can continue to support a lump of tissue that feeds off my resources, limits my choices and provokes my anger and resentment. How could I conceal my negative feelings from the child? How could I keep from hitting it? I can put it up for adoption - but I'm too selfish to act as someone's surrogate mother. If I wanted to go to all this trouble, it would have to be for myself.

Besides, these "solutions" just aren't fast enough. I want relief NOW. A safe and painless medical procedure, and my life can get back to normal.

I've made my choice. Now if I can only find a doctor willing to rid me of my toddler.

Jean Graham is a university professor and active with Feminists For Life of Ohio.

Stop the AFL-CIO from supporting abortion

You Can Help to Turn the Tide

By Dave Andrusko

Editor, National Right to Life News

In the ongoing abortion battle, few people on either side would ever thought that pro-abortion forces would make inroads into organized labor. For years, the two most fertile recruiting grounds for pro-life forces have been members of faith communities and labor. The members of both are disproportionately committed to protecting the unborn.

Alas, the 14.1 million member AFL-CIO now stands poised on the brink of adopting a resolution supporting abortion, unless pro-life members of union households, and other concerned citizens, immediately write to President Lane Kirkland. A stacked "Ad Hoc Committee on Reproductive Issues" is about to hold its second meeting and there is every reason to believe the committee will recommend that the AFL's Executive Committee lend its authority, political muscle, and influence to the cause of the anti-life forces.

Some background: Last November, six pro-abortion resolutions were discussed at the AFL-CIO's biennial national convention held in Washington, D.C. In a move billed as a "compromise," the resolutions were forwarded to the AFL-CIO's 35 member Executive Council for further consideration. Then, at a press conference on February 19th, Kirkland announced the formation of a 14 member committee comprised of members of the Executive Council to consider whether the AFL-CIO should take a position on abortion.

Kirkland's comments at the press conference encapsulated much of the history of the events between November and February 19. He readily conceded that he had been "flooded with mail." He added that, "There is evidently a campaign going on to write me and other members of the council."

Unfortunately, having first correctly noted that most of the mail was "anti-abortion," Kirkland then commented that "I've been around a long time, and I think I can tell grassroots from Astroturf."

But there is no question that there is intense opposition from all sectors of the labor movement, including state and local leaders. They have flooded the national headquarters with letters, pleading with the Federation to avoid taking a position on abortion.

And the grassroots opposition is, if possible, even more pervasive, as evidenced by the responses to two questions asked in a nationwide poll conducted in march by the prestigious Wirthlin Group, a national public opinion research organization. The company asked 1000 respondents whether they wanted the AFL-CIO to take a position on abortion, "or should it concentrate on issues such as wages and workplace safety?" An incredible 77% of members of union households said concentrate in the latter, while only 12% favored taking a position on abortion.

The polster then asked that if the AFL-CIO did take a position on abortion, should it be in support of or opposed to abortion? Again, pro-life sentiment prevailed: 43% to 31% among members of union households, with almost identical split between non-union households.

But most revealing of all, female union members wanted the position to be opposed to abortion by nearly a 2 to 1 margin - 52% to 28%.

Neil Newhouse, senior vice president of the Wirthlin Group, summarized the results by saying that the "AFL-CIO is out of step with its membership in two respects. First, members of union households overwhelmingly do not want the Federation to take a position on abortion. Second, if the AFL-CIO does take a position, its members want it to be anti-abortion."

Just how crazy it would be for the AFL-CIO to take a position - any position - on abortion was made clear in a column that appeared recently in the Washington Post. Written by Nat Hentoff, it showed that two recent court decisions make it clear that it would border on organizational suicide for the Federation to be co-opted by the abortion establishment.

One case out of Baltimore (Kidwell) seems to have extended to earlier Beck decision - which means that the Kidwell case appealed to the Supreme Court and upheld, no union employee could be forced to have any of his/hers dues go to political or other purposes not related to collective bargaining. And recent Supreme Court decisions having to do with limitations on political contributions by corporations would seem to make it abundantly clear that the Supreme Court would hold that no union may compel an employee to financially support union activities that 'infringe on their First Amendment rights" (to quote Hentoff).

But it's not too late ... if people write today. If you want the AFL-CIO to stay neutral on abortion, please write today to:

Lane Kirkland, President
AFL-CIO
815 16th St., NW
Washington, DC 20006

It would be a minimal expenditure of time with the promise of maximum payoff for the babies.

MIT study discounts safety of French abortion pill

RU-486, the controversial French abortion pill touted by pro-abortion groups as being "safe and effective," is under attack. This time the disparagement is not coming from the pro-life side, but from feminist researchers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

MIT's Institute on Women and Technology, recently released a report which uses the findings of every clinical study of RU-486 in the last ten years. The report disclaims the popular assertion by pro-abortion groups, such as Planned Parenthood and National Abortion Rights Action League, that RU-486 should be legalized and has been proven to be "safe and effective."

The authors of the report, Janice Raymond, Renate Klein and Lynette Dumble, are described by the Boston Globe as being "radical feminists" who support "a woman's right" to an abortion and rail against "anti-abortion fundamentalism." They argued in the report that the political climate surrounding the abortion issue makes "pro-choice" groups promote RU-486, even though the drug is more complicated and dangerous than clinical abortion. They concluded that there is "an urgent need for more informed feminist discussion" of the drug.

This serious doubt cast by ardent feminists comes in the wake of a congressional House hearing on speeding the U.S. approval of the abortion pill. Rep. Ron Wyden (D-Oregon) chaired the four-hour hearing of pro-abortion special interest group "experts" on RU-486. Several of the witnesses testified that blocking the abortion pill is discrimination against women.

The lone dissenting opinion heard by the committee was offered by Richard Glasgow of the National Right to Life Committee, who testified that RU-486 was far from safe. Rep. Wyden berated Glasgow and dismissed his evidence as his "constitutional right to be wrong."

Supreme Court On A Collision Course with Roe vs. Wade

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - The U.S. Supreme Court, having begun a new session on October 2, will hear three abortion cases which may result in an overturn of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision.

According to New York Times columnist Linda Greenhouse, these cases "offer a more direct road map for overturning Roe vs. Wade than the route offered by [Webster]."

Douglas Johnson, legislative director for National Right to Life Committee, said, "In any one of these cases, if the court is going to proceed in a principled way they should first determine what the standard of review is going to be, which means they should decide initially in each case whether or not there is a fundamental constitutional right to abortion."

On the same day that the Supreme Court decided Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services, it accepted three more abortion cases. Two of these cases, Ohio vs. Akron Center for Reproductive Health and Minnesota vs. Hodgson, involve parental notification as a requirement before an abortion is performed on a minor. In a third case, Turnock vs. Ragsdale, the Court will examine an Illinois law that requires that abortions be performed in a well-equipped, licensed facility.

A Court spokesperson announced that Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens will not take part in the Illinois abortion case. Stevens did not give a reason for his decision to withdraw himself from the case, but it is speculated the Justice may have a conflict of interest relating to the case, perhaps due to a previous relationship with a party in the dispute. Stevens has been a consistent supporter of liberal abortion rights; his absence in the case makes a pro-life victory likely.

In the Webster case, the majority ruled to uphold the Missouri law, but were divided on the grounds for their ruling. Rhenquist, White and Kennedy suggested that Roe be "narrowed and modified"; Scalia urged that Roe be overturned in the Webster case; and O'Connor viewed the Missouri statute as compatible with Roe and did not offer an opinion.

James Bopp, Jr, National Right to Life General Counsel, has outlined three reasons why the cases the Court will hear this term more directly implicate Roe than did the Missouri statute. First, the statutes apply throughout pregnancy, not just after "viability." Second, the statutes impose a "significant burden" on women obtaining abortions in the first trimester, thus contravening Roe's holding that left first trimester abortions unregulated. Third, in Turnock, the woman is prohibited from being counseled by her physician, a direct and absolute bar to one of Roe's key elements.

As a result of implications that these statutes make against Roe vs. Wade, the Supreme Court may reconsider a precedent. The issue of a woman's "fundamental right to an abortion," which is a key element sustaining Roe, may be reexamined by the Court.

Supreme Court Upholds Webster Case

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - In a decision widely hailed as a blow to legalized abortion on demand, the Supreme Court ruled that states may sharply limit abortion practices. The 5-4 decision upholding a controversial Missouri abortion law stopped short of overturning the Court's landmark 1973 Roe vs. Wade case which legalized abortion on demand, but left the door open for further abortion restrictions.

The ruling in Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services upheld three state restrictions on abortion. The court ruled that states may forbid abortions in public hospitals or other taxpayer supported facilities, may forbid public employees to perform elective abortions, and may require viability tests for fetuses thought to be at least 20 weeks old.

Writing for the majority, Chief Justice William Rehnquist agreed with a lower court opinion which said testing for viability in second trimester abortions would place an additional financial burden on women seeking abortions.

But Rehnquist said the problem was not with the Missouri law, but with the "viability" standard set forth in Roe v. Wade. "Key elements" of the Roe decision are "not found in the text of the Constitution or in any place else one would expect to find a constitutional principle," Rehnquist wrote in a stinging criticism of Roe. He added, "We do not see why the state's interest in protecting potential human life should come into existence only at the point of viability.

Rehnquist suggested that the Court adopt a new standard for evaluating abortion restrictions, focusing on the government's "interest in protecting potential human life." Rehnquist noted that there was no need for the court to overturn Roe v. Wade, but recommended, "We would modify and narrow Roe and succeeding cases" given the opportunity.

Justice Antonin Scalia filed a separated but concurring opinion, stating there were "not only valid but compelling" reasons to overturn Roe. He chastised the Court for limiting itself to the "most stingy possible holding today" and called the Court's action an "indecisive decision."

Scalia further lambasted his colleagues for refusing to reconsider the Roe vs. Wade decision, concluding, "It thus appears that the mansion of constitutionalized abortion law, constructed overnight in Roe vs. Wade, must be disassembled doorjamb by doorjamb, and never entirely brought down, no matter how wrong it may be ... We should decide now, and not insist that we be run into a corner before we grudgingly yield up our judgment."

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's views on abortion have been perceived as ambiguous, and her opinion in the Webster case did little to dispel that ambiguity. Her writing lacked some of the sharp criticism she has previously directed at Roe, but repeated her assertion that the Court's current "trimester framework" is "problematic."

O'Connor said that the Court was right in not revisiting Roe and said, "When the constitutional invalidity of a state's abortion statute actually turns on the constitutional validity of Roe vs. Wade, there will be time enough to re-examine Roe. And to do so carefully."

In a dissenting opinion, Justice Harry Blackmun, who authored the Court's majority decision in the 1973 Roe vs. Wade ruling, wrote, "I fear for the future. While for today, at least, the law of abortion stands undisturbed, the signs are very evident and very ominous, and a chill wind blows."

Fearing that the ruling will invite the states to pass restrictive laws against abortion, Blackmun attacked the majority in Webster for cowardice, deception, disingenuousness and brute force. The ruling, he said, "is filled with winks, and nods, and knowing glances to those who would do away with Roe explicitly."

A separate dissenting opinion by Justice John Paul Stevens concentrated on the Missouri statute's preamble, which declared that life begins at conception. Stevens argued that the Missouri Legislature's statement regarding the beginning of life is religious in nature, and therefore violates the First Amendment's clause forbidding the establishment of religion.

Stevens wrote, "This conclusion does not, and could not, rest on the fact that the statement happens to coincide with the tenants of certain religions ... or on the fact that the legislators who voted to enact it may have been motivated by certain religious considerations ... Rather it rests on the fact that the preamble, an unequivocal endorsement of a religious tenant of some but by no means all Christian faiths, serves no identifiable secular purpose."

The Court has three other abortion cases on its agenda for next session, two that involve parental notice when teens seek abortions, and one on a law requiring that abortion clinics be extensively equipped as medical facilities. Those cases are expected to define further the Court's shifting attitude toward abortion.

Before it would completely overturn Roe vs. Wade, the Court would probably have to be faced with a law completely banning elective abortion - striking at the heart of Roe's assertion that a woman has a constitutional right to terminate her pregnancy for any reason, at any time.

Third Trimester Abortion Exposed by NY Press

NEW YORK, NY - The New York Post's opening lead in a December headline read: "Police yesterday raided a filthy Lower East Side medical office and arrested a doctor they say ripped the arm off a fetus he was trying to abort - but who was born alive the next day."

Dr. Abu Hayat, 61, who is accused of ripping the arm off a third trimester baby during an illegal abortion, also frightened his client into paying $1,500 - Hayat reportedly charged his victim, Rosa Rodriguez, $1,000 in cash, plus her passport, green card and jewelry as collateral for the other $500.

The good news is that the baby, Ana Rosa Rodriguez, shown in bandages on the front-page of Newsday, has been released from a New York hospital, and is doing fine, although she is missing an arm.

There are about 100 abortion clinics in New York City. About a dozen are licensed by the state. The others are run by doctors who set up shop, and do the job with varying degrees of skill, counting the cash above their hygiene, staff credentials, records, and procedures. Even the licensed clinics are unsafe. The Eastern Women's Center on East 30th Street, for example, has been the site of the deaths of two females; between 1986 and 1988, it was fined $92,000 for all kinds of violations.

Few abortion clinics are ever closed by New York state. Even Dr. Abu Hayat, was not suspended by the state Health Department until the exposé coming from New York's sensational news tabloids promoted an outcry against Hayat. Legal abortion has moved from the back alley to the front parlor. The process is still unsafe, only the profits are a lot bigger.

TUPELO, MS (EP) - Domino's Pizza has notified the American Family Association (AFA) that they have canceled their advertising on "Saturday Night Live," becoming the third major advertiser to take this step.

Domino's owner Thomas S. Monaghan told AFA, "I feel that Domino's pizza promotes and maintains high family values and ethics, and will make every effort to avoid advertising on programs that do not."

"We appreciate Domino's decision," responded the Rev. Donald Wildmon, executive director of AFA. "We think they made a very wise business and moral decision, and we commend them for it. More and more corporations are beginning to say no to the exploitative and anti-Christian programming of the networks."

Ralston Purina and General Mills recently canceled their ads for "Saturday Night Live" after correspondence with AFA.

AFA recently dropped its boycott of Pepsi after Pepsi dropped its controversial ads featuring pop diva Madonna, and said they would not sponsor the singer's tour. AFA called for a boycott of Pepsi after the release of the video for Madonna's hit song, "Like a Prayer." Pepsi had used the same song, with different imagery, for a Pepsi commercial. While the commercial was inoffensive, the video for the song contained elements some found sacrilegious. Pepsi said viewers were confusing the commercial with the sexier and more controversial video, and halted Madonna's role as a spokesperson for the product - at a reported cost of $10 million.

This trend in advertising toward responding to public sensibilities comes at a time when a major Christian coalition is preparing for a boycott of companies that sponsor offensive programming. Christian Leaders for Responsible Television (CLEAR-TV), a coalition of approximately 1600 Christian leaders including the heads of 70 denominations, has scheduled a one-year boycott of one or more leading sponsors of sex, violence, profanity and anti-Christian stereotyping based on monitoring the group did during the April 27 - May 24 ratings "sweeps."

Wildmon, who organized CLEAR-TV, said, "Many companies are reevaluating their sponsorship of programs. Network officials are trying to convince the advertisers that they should continue supporting the sex, violence, profanity and anti-Christian stereotyping. But their efforts are beginning to fall on deaf ears."

Fred Silverman, former president of NBC, believes the general public is prepared to support a boycott of companies that sponsor objectionable programs. "Most of the press seems to forget ... that the television audience is not a single audience," Silverman told a syndicated columnist. "They write for the liberal, free-thinking yuppies, but there is another, sizable constituency out there. Call it what you want, the moral majority or whatever, but they represent the majority of the population, and they're very vocal. They wield an enormous amount of clout, and they've had it with trash television."

Wildmon said the AFA is preparing radio and television spots to promote the boycott, as well as bulletin inserts, boycott cards to be distributed in churches, and a planned mass-mailing of three million pieces.

"We have made repeated attempts to get the advertisers to respond to our concerns. We have offered to work with them prior to the monitoring and help them avoid a boycott any way we can. But once the monitoring is over and the boycott begins, it will continue for a period of one year," he concluded. "It has come to the point that advertisers don't take us seriously, and they will not until we can demonstrate that we can drop their profits. That is the reason the boycott will be for a one-year period."

Justice Department Urges Overturn of Roe vs. Wade

WASHINGTON, D.C. (EP) - The Supreme Court should overturn its landmark 1973 abortion decision because it is "not firmly grounded in the Constitution, adopts an unworkable framework," and allows courts to "usurp" the legislative function, the Justice Department told the Court February 23.

In a friend-of-the-court brief filed in a case involving Missouri's 1986 law restricting abortion, the Justice Department said the "time has come for the Court to abandon its efforts to impose a comprehensive solution to the abortion question."

The Missouri law in question forbids public funding of abortion or abortion counseling, requires that abortions performed after the first three months of pregnancy be done in a hospital, prohibits abortions in public hospitals and clinics, and mandates a "viability test" for unborn babies over 19 weeks old. The preamble for the law declares that human life begins at conception.

Previous attempts to overturn the Court's Roe vs. Wade abortion decision have been unsuccessful. In the last attempt, Roe was upheld on a 5-4 vote. Since then, however, pro-abortion Justice Lewis Powell had resigned, and been replaced by Justice Anthony Kennedy. Kennedy is believed to hold pro-life views, and could provide the critical fifth vote to cut back or overturn the Court's pro-abortion policies.

In another friend-of-the-court brief filed in the case, the Orthodox Christian Church asks that the Court overturn its legalization of abortion on demand. The Orthodox brief claims that the Roe decision inaccurately attempted "to show that abortion was philosophically and morally grounded in the Judeo-Christian tradition." The brief insists, "Rather than being ambivalent, or even condoning abortion, as suggested by the Roe Court's opinion, historic Christianity has always condemned abortion as murder, without regard for any distinctions as to fetal development or viability."

The case, Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services, is expected to be argued in April.

Victory for Pro-life in Pennsylvania

HARRISBURG, PA (FR) - In response to the Webster decision, which moved the abortion issue to the state legislatures, Pennsylvania has recently passed the strongest pro-life measure since the Supreme Court's July ruling.

The Pennsylvania House of Representatives adopted abortion restrictions protecting the lives of the unborn by a 143-58 vote. The Senate is expected to pass the measure in November. Democratic Governor Robert Casey, a strong pro-life advocate, stated that he will sign the bill.

The restrictions are an amendment to a child-abuse bill which requires a 24 hour waiting period before an abortion; outlaws all abortions after the 24th week of pregnancy except to save the life of the woman; bans abortions for the purpose of sex selection; and requires notification of the spouse before an abortion.

State Representative Robert Freind has led the fight to restrict abortion since he was elected in 1976. Freind, a former FBI agent and novelist, was responsible for introducing the pro-life bill to the state legislature. He said that he would love to see his bill challenge Roe vs. Wade in the Supreme Court. "It's a brand new ball game," Friend commented on the conservative make-up of the high court.

Although pro-abortion advocates tried to down-play the pro-life victory, the outcome of Pennsylvania's preliminary abortion battle indicates that great changes in abortion legislation are beginning to be advanced.

Denise Neary, National Right to Life Committee state director commented: "Those favoring abortion worked the press. We worked the Legislature and won."

Webster Case Reaction Varied

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Reaction to the Court's Webster decision in July, upholding state regulation of abortion was swift and predictable, with pro-life forces declaring victory, and pro-choice advocates mourning defeat.

President George Bush commented on the Court's Webster ruling through his chief of staff, John H. Sununu. The statement read by Sununu said, "We welcome this decision. By upholding the Missouri statute, the Court appears to have begun to restore to the people the ability to protect the unborn. We continue to believe that Roe vs. Wade was incorrectly decided and should now be reversed."

Faye Wattleton, president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said, "This is a sad day for freedom. Now a woman's access to abortion will become hostage to geography as states enact a patchwork of laws and regulations aimed at blocking abortions. While the Court did not go all the way, they have put in doubt the future of Roe vs. Wade. This decision shows that there are no longer five justices who would uphold that historic ruling."

Molly Yard, president of the National Organization for Women, condemned the decision as "a total disaster" and "an attempt to dismantle a woman's fundamental right to privacy and abortion."

Yard asserted that the Webster ruling is a precursor to a complete ban on abortion rights in the near future. "This is the first of a one-two punch that will completely knock-out abortion rights. The signal from the anti-abortion forces is that they are not stopping with this decision."

Yard further predicted the outcome of this decision, saying, "The Supreme Court has been stacked with anti-abortion justices. We are only one justice's vote away from complete reversal of Roe. This decision certainly comes as a blow, but we are prepared, and when we are hit, we always strike back."

On the pro-life side, Operation Rescue founder Randall Terry stated, "The decision is a mixed blessing. Although the press is making much noise over Roe's modification, the truth remains that child-killing is still legal. We are now in a state of Constitutional insanity. The Missouri statute declares that human life begins at conception, and yet it is legal to kill those human beings. God help us."

Terry predicted an "avalanche of legislation which challenges Roe," and vowed, "We will continue to rescue and use some of our manpower and momentum to introduce legislation which challenges Roe to its face. I am convinced Roe will fall by the end of this presidential term, and child-killing will be driven back to Hell where it came from."

Dr. J. C. Willke, president of the National Right to Life Committee said, "This historic ruling begins to restore a fundamental right to the American people - the right to protect human life. We are confident that the Court will eventually overturn Roe. We are also confident that the American people have the respect for life and the compassion to act now to stop the widespread killing of human beings."

What Would You Choose?

The father has syphilis and the mother has tuberculosis. They have had four children. The first one was blind, the second one died, the third one was deaf and dumb, and the fourth one had tuberculosis.

The mother is now pregnant with her fifth child but is willing to have an abortion if you determine that she should. What would you decide for her?

- A. Choose to have the child.
- B. Choose to have an abortion.

If you chose "A" ... congratulations! You have just chosen to save the life of one of the world's greatest composers - Ludwig van Beethoven.

Who Really Speaks for Women?

9/92

The National Women's Coalition for Life - with more than 1.5 million members - now dwarfs the National Organization for Women's claimed membership of 280,000.

When the National Organization for Women (NOW), the Fund for a Feminist Majority, and other women's rights organizations began planning their March for Women's Lives, they never anticipated the level of opposition they would encounter from the very people they claim to represent.

On April 3, just two days prior to NOW's march, the National Women's Coalition for Life (NWCL) became the largest pro-women's rights coalition in the nation, dwarfing NOW's claimed membership of 280,000. This new coalition, with groups from all sides of the political, religious, social, and ethnic spectrum, is united by a belief in the dignity of womanhood and in the sanctity of human life.

According to Beth Luteran, Communications Coordinator of NWCL, "We are here to reclaim the women's movement. NOW is nothing more than an abortion advocacy group. They have sacrificed women's concerns to the abortion 'rights' lobby. The foundresses of the women's movement were pro-life. We consider ourselves to be the true successors of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony. Put simply, NOW does not represent American women. We do."

In addition to reclaiming the women's movement, Luteran sees a need for NWCL to act as an "umbrella group" for diverse pro-life women's organizations. Membership includes groups ranging from the conservative Concerned Women for America to the liberal Feminists for Life.

"NWCL shows the media that the pro-life movement is as diverse as America. The fact that groups that disagree on many other issues can come together as a coalition speaks volumes about the significance of the pro-life position," stated Luteran.

NWCL wants to show America this diversity and the staunch opposition of many women's rights organizations to legalized abortion on demand. Thus it is working to coordinate public discourses about abortion with representatives from NWCL and pro-abortion women's groups. These discussions, which will likely take place on university campuses, are but one tier of NWCL's plan to reclaim the women's rights movement.

With the continued pro-abortion bias of the media, NWCL has its work cut out. However, there are some signs of change among the media. The Washington Post printed a story pointing out that the April 5th pro-abortion marchers were "out of touch" with mainstream America. Luteran theorizes that this recognition was inevitable: "Most women care about womanhood, motherhood, and life. We feel that womanhood and motherhood are intertwined ... Our message is one which almost any woman in America will agree with."

Women Injured by Abortion Bring Action Suits Against Clinics

4/89

ATLANTA (ALL) - At least four lawsuits have been filed in Atlanta against local abortion mills by women who are claiming mental and physical damages resulted from the killing of their babies at those clinics, according to Charlie Wysong of American Rights Coalition.

Mr. Wysong said he believed there are at least seven more suits being prepared.

American Rights Coalition, based in Chattanooga, Tennessee, seeks to help women who have been injured by abortion through referral for counseling, and for medical and legal assistance.

Mr. Wysong announced to the press in Atlanta March 20, that Atlanta area clinics are already reacting to this legal campaign. Staffers at the Atlanta Surgi-Center have three times in the past 10 days called ambulances to transport women to local hospitals, rather than covering their mistakes - and risking further liability - by using private cars, as in the past.

Pickers outside the Surgi-Center say they cannot remember seeing an ambulance there in six years.

Mr. Wysong remarked, "I think they are changing the way they treat women. I still think they have total disregard for the women and for the baby. But they understand the possibility now of massive malpractice suits."

The damages to women who have had abortions are real, but there is also a strategic component to Mr. Wysong's efforts. He explains that the pro-life movement has alleged for years that abortion injures women. "The malpractice lawsuits afford us the opportunity to prove the allegation beyond a shadow of a doubt. It's time we started turning the microscope on them and making them account for the way they've treated women. Abortion may be legal but fraud and malpractice are not."

Mr. Wysong's organization, ARC, now has 60 billboards up in Atlanta, encouraging women to call his toll-free number. There are 20 more in Augusta, Georgia, and 10 in Macon, Georgia. Soon there will be 40 or 50 in Birmingham, Alabama, and Mr. Wysong reports inquires from all over the country as Americans become aware that women who have had abortions often need to know where to go for help.

Mr. Wysong added that the American Rights Coalition is looking for women who have given birth to children with mental or physical handicaps after a prior abortion. He stated that abortion injuries such as scarring of the uterus can sometimes impair the development of the child in the womb. If the injuries are documentable, a damage suit may be successful.

Behaviorism

by Gary DeMar

Behaviorism originated with the work of John B. Watson, an American psychologist. Watson claimed that psychology was not concerned with the mind or with human consciousness. Instead, psychology would be concerned only with behavior. In this way, men could be studied objectively, like rats and apes.

Watson's work was based on the experiments of Ivan Pavlov, who had studied animals' responses to conditioning. In Pavlov's best-known experiment, he rang a bell as he fed some dogs several meals. Each time the dogs heard the bell they knew that a meal was coming, and they would begin to salivate. Pavlov then rang the bell without bringing food, but the dogs still salivated. They had been "conditioned" to salivate at the sound of a bell. Pavlov believed, as Watson was later to emphasize, that humans react to stimuli in the same way.

Behaviorism is associated today with the name of B.F. Skinner, who made his reputation by testing Watson's theories in the laboratory. Skinner's studies led him to reject Watson's almost exclusive emphasis on reflexes and conditioning. People respond to their environment, he argued, but they also operate on the environment to produce certain consequences.

Skinner developed the theory of "operant conditioning," the idea that we behave the way we do because this kind of behavior has had certain consequences in the past. For example, if your girlfriend gives you a kiss when you give her flowers, you will be likely to give her flowers when you want a kiss. You will be acting in expectation of a certain reward. Like Watson, however, Skinner denied that the mind or feelings play any part in determining behavior. Instead, our experience of reinforcements determines our behavior.

Behaviorism originated in the field of psychology, but it has had a much wider influence. Its concepts and methods are used in education, and many education courses at college are based on the same assumptions about man as behaviorism. Behaviorism has infiltrated sociology, in the form of sociobiology, the belief that moral values are rooted in biology. What are the presuppositions of behaviorism?

1. Behaviorism is naturalistic. This means that the material world is the ultimate reality, and everything can be explained in terms of natural laws. Man has no soul and no mind, only a brain that responds to external stimuli.

2. Behaviorism teaches that man is nothing more than a machine that responds to conditioning. One writer has summarized behaviorism in this way: "The central tenet of behaviorism is that thoughts, feelings, and intentions, mental processes all, do not determine what we do. Our behavior is the product of our conditioning. We are biological machines and do not consciously act; rather we react to stimuli."1

The idea that men are "biological machines" whose minds do not have any influence on their actions is contrary to the biblical view that man is the very image of God - the image of a creative, planning, thinking God. In fact, Skinner goes so far as to say that the mind and mental processes are "metaphors and fictions" and that "behavior is simply part of the biology of the organism."² Skinner also recognizes that his view strips man of his "freedom and dignity," but insists that man as a spiritual being does not exist.

3. Consistently, behaviorism teaches that we are not responsible for our actions. If we are mere machines, without minds or souls, reacting to stimuli and operating on our environment to attain certain ends, then anything we do is inevitable. Sociobiology, a type of behaviorism, compares man to a computer: Garbage in, garbage out.

This also conflicts with a Christian worldview. Our past experiences and our environment do affect the way we act, of course, but these factors cannot account for everything we do. The Bible teaches that we are basically covenantal creatures, not biological creatures. Our nearest environment is God Himself, and we respond most fundamentally to Him. We respond either in obedience to or rebellion against His Word.

4. Behaviorism is manipulative. It seeks not merely to understand human behavior, but to predict and control it. From his theories, Skinner developed the idea of "shaping." By controlling rewards and punishments, you can shape the behavior of another person.

As a psychiatrist, one of Skinner's goals is to shape his patients' behavior so that he or she will react in more socially acceptable ways. Skinner is quite clear that his theories should be used to guide behavior: "The experimental analysis of behavior has led to an effective technology, applicable to education, psychotherapy, and the design of cultural practices in general, which will be more effective when it is not competing with practices that have had the unwarranted support of mentalistic theories."³

In other words, Skinner wants behaviorism to be the basis for manipulating patients, students, and whole societies.

The obvious questions, of course, are: Who will use the tools? Who will pull the strings? Who will manipulate the technology? No doubt, Skinner would say that only someone trained in behavioral theory and practice would be qualified to "shape" the behavior of other persons. But this is contrary to the biblical view, which commands us to love our neighbor, not to manipulate him.

In summary, the ethical consequences of behaviorism are great. Man is stripped of his responsibility, freedom, and dignity, and is reduced to a purely biological being, to be "shaped" by those who are able to use the tools of behaviorism effectively.

Eastern Mysticism

from: Surviving College Successfully
By Gary DeMar

Man must take a leap of "nonreasonable faith" in the monistic worldview of Eastern mysticism. What makes Eastern mysticism the choice of a new generation of religious seekers, and how does it fulfill man's spiritual hunger?

1. Eastern mysticism is nonrational and borders on the irrational. In Zen Buddhism, for example, one's intuition is pitted against one's reason. The Hindus consider the mind to have all the stability and perception of a "drunken monkey" while the Hare Krishnas refer to the mind as a "garbage pail." All this might seem contradictory to the Western mind, and it is. But remember that the West has given up on rational explanations for the way the world works. Maybe East is best. If man is nothing more than a machine, why would we hold rationality in such high regard anyway? Western rationalism has failed.

Perhaps another reason behind the popular abandonment of rationalism in the West is its inability to provide spiritual satisfaction. As Zen master D.T. Suzuki explains, "Zen has come to the definite conclusion that the ordinary logical process of reasoning is powerless to give final satisfaction to our deepest spiritual needs."¹

We are often confused by the incessant chanting and the intellectual void associated with meditation on a mandala or some other fixed image. But these are simply the ways of the East. Much of Eastern thought is without intellectual content and meaning. The goal is to transcend the world of things and to reach a spiritual world beyond. The point is not to understand but only to do. This is the appeal of the East.

The Western reliance on rationalism has failed. In the West, the law of non-contradiction reigned (A is not non-A). The East knows nothing of such distinctions. In Western rationalist terms, "to know reality is to distinguish one thing from another, label it, catalog it, recognize its subtle relation to other objects in the cosmos. In the East to 'know' reality is to pass beyond distinction, to 'realize' the oneness of all being one with the all."²

2. Eastern mysticism is monistic. The Christian believes in a personal God Who is separate from His creation. We have called this the Creator/creature distinction. God did not create the world out of Himself, using the "stuff" of His own being to bring the universe and man into existence.³ "By faith we understand that the worlds were prepared by the word of God, so that what is seen was not made out of the things which are visible" (Hebrews 11:3; cf. Genesis 1:1-2).

Eastern thought makes no distinction between man and cosmos. The name for this is monism. Monism "is the belief that all that is, is one. All is interrelated, interdependent and interpenetrating. Ultimately there is no difference between God, a person, a carrot or a rock."⁴

Consider the ethical implications of such a view. The way you treat a person and the way you treat an animal are to be no different. This is why many advocates of monism are vegetarian. An animal is sacred; therefore, it cannot be killed for food. All is one. God and evil transcend the world of forms and plurality. God does not overcome evil. There is no value judgment in "good" and "evil." Ultimate reality is beyond good and evil. These rational and Christian concepts must be jettisoned in favor of an undifferentiated oneness.

The entertainment business has been quick to pick up on monism. In the Star Wars series, monism is quite evident in "the Force," a benign entity that neither condones the good nor suppresses the evil. The music industry was invaded in the early sixties by the Beatles, who held a monistic worldview.

In 1967, the Beatles made their now-famous link-up with a then-unknown guru, Maharishi Yogi and his occult-sounding product, Transcendental Meditation. In the same year Paul McCartney and John Lennon wrote "I am the Walrus" which opened with the pantheistic declaration: "I am he as you are he as you are me and we are all together." "Instant Karma" followed in 1970, and the next year saw the release of George Harrison's "My Sweet Lord" with its alternating chorus of "Hallelujah" and "Hare Krishna."⁵

Charles Manson adopted the monistic worldview of the Beatles, and at the LaBianca murder scene in 1969, he scrawled in blood on the refrigerator door the misspelled "He[a]lter Skelter," a song title from the Beatles' "White Album." The ambiguity of right and wrong became a reality for Manson. In Manson's words, "If God is One, what is bad?"

3. All is god. It follows from monism that if there is god, then all is god. Pantheism (pan means all; theos means god) is the theology of the East. There is no personal God who stands above creation. In fact, there is no creation as such. To speak of a creation would mean to postulate a Creator, someone distinct from the cosmos. Thus, the pantheist agrees with the naturalist that there is just one level of reality, although the naturalist would not consider it to be "spiritual" or "divine." In pantheism, there is no God who is "out there." God and the material world are one and the same. The word god should be used to refer to the sum total of reality rather than to some being distinct from the rest of reality.

In Christianity, God is distinct from creation. God is certainly present with His creation, but He is in no way a part of creation. To destroy the created order would in no way affect God. "The Creator God is not an impersonal force, energy or consciousness, but a living, personal Being of infinite intelligence, power and purity. God is not an amoral entity, but a moral agent who says 'Thou shalt not' and calls people to repentance and faith."⁶

4. We are god. The consistency of monism brings us to one of its most bizarre features. If all is god, then man is god in some form. "Swami Muktananda - a great influence on Werner Erhard, founder of est and Forum - pulls no pantheistic punches when he says: 'Kneel to your own self. Honor and worship your own being. God dwells within you as You!'"⁷

Eastern mysticism teaches some form of "chain of being" or "continuity of being,"⁸ the idea that man and God are one essence, and that in time, through an evolutionary process or a series of reincarnations, man becomes divine. Ray Sutton writes: "Life according to this system is a continuum. At the top is the purest form of deity. At the very bottom is the least pure. They only differ in degree, not in kind. God is a part of creation. Man, who is somewhere in the middle of the continuum, is god in another 'form.' In other words, god is just a 'super' man, and man is not a god ... yet!"⁹

Of course, Christianity teaches that there is only one God: "And you are My witnesses. Is there any God besides Me, or is there any other Rock? I know of none" (Isaiah 44:8). Man's first sin was the attempt to "be like God," determining good and evil for himself (Genesis 3:5).

5. There is no death. Eastern mysticism makes its "leap of being" from mere man to god through raising the state of consciousness, evolutionary development, reincarnation, or some combination of the three. Death is simply the final stage of growth; it is an illusion. Human beings, because they are of a "divine essence," are immortal. Ultimately, death does not exist. For death to exist would mean the extinction of part of the One.

Reincarnation is a fundamental pillar of New Age thinking. It "solves" the puzzle of death. Reincarnation has been popularized over the years through the writings of Edgar Cayce¹⁰ and most recently, Shirley MacLaine. The Eastern variety of reincarnation would have never been accepted in the Christian West if it had not been stripped of the hideous concept of the "transmigration of the soul."

Reincarnation, as it is usually understood in Hinduism, states that all life is essentially one (monism): plant, animal, and human life are so interrelated that souls are capable of "transmigrating" from one form of life to another. A person could have been an animal, plant, or mineral in some previous existence. However, this version is unpalatable to American tastes, so in the newer version the movement of human souls is limited to human bodies.¹¹

Modern proponents of reincarnation have cleaned up the Eastern variety. You don't hear Shirley MacLaine telling people that she was a rock or a slug in a former life. The typical reincarnationist usually believes that he was once some exotic personality. This is not true reincarnationism. This is "I've always been a star" reincarnationism.

6 Monism has spawned the New Age movement. John Naisbitt of Megatrends¹² fame sees a new age dawning at the corporation level. Old industrial structures must be dismantled to compete in the information society of the future. "Look at how far we have already come. The industrial society transformed workers into consumers; the information society is transforming employees into capitalists. But remember this: Both capitalism and socialism were industrial structures. And the companies re-inventing themselves are already evolving toward that new reality."¹³ But there's more!

* Mark Satin has described a New Age Politics¹⁴ that will "heal self and society."

* Fritjof Capra, author of The Turning Point,¹⁵ sees changes in science that will affect society and culture.

* Marilyn Ferguson, whose *The Aquarian Conspiracy*¹⁶ is considered by many to be the manifesto of the New Age movement, describes "a new mind - a turnabout in consciousness, a network powerful enough to bring about radical change in our culture."

Much of this literature is rooted in Eastern and occult philosophy, which emphasize oneness (monism): the unity and interdependence of all things. There is a clever mix between Eastern religious philosophy and Western religious forms. The sixties counterculture brought the esoteric music and religious ideology of the East into the West.

The Beatles made Eastern music popular on their "Rubber Soul" album when George Harrison introduced the Indian sitar music of Ravi Shankar.¹⁷ Transcendental Meditation was also popularized by the Beatles. Some of those in the ecology movement base their concern for the environment on the inherent "oneness" of the universe.¹⁸ Man and nature are one in essence. Man is not much different from the animals. He is only higher on the great scale of being. The environment should be protected, not as a stewardship under God, but because we are all god, nature included.

The advance of Eastern thought was gradual, but layer by layer it gained acceptance. As Christianity steadily lost its hold on the heart and mind of the nation, softer forms of religious beliefs were more easily embraced. Christianity's drift into an emphasis on experience over objective, written revelation has made it easy prey for the pure subjectivism of Eastern thought.

Robert J.L. Burrows, publications editor of the evangelical Spiritual Counterfeits Project in Berkeley, California, writes: "Humans are essentially religious creatures, and they don't rest until they have some sort of answer to the fundamental questions. Rationalism and secularism don't answer those questions. But you can see the rise of the New Age as a barometer of the disintegration of American culture. Dostoevsky said anything is permissible if there is no God. But anything is also permissible if everything is God. There is no way of making any distinction between good and evil."¹⁹

Os Guinness wrote about the meeting of East and West in 1973, in what has become a standard Christian critique of the decline of secular humanism, The Dust of Death. He tells us that the "swing to the East has come at a time when Christianity is weak at just those points where it would need to be strong to withstand the East."²⁰ He goes on to show the three basic weaknesses within the Church that open it up to Eastern influences.

"The first is its compromised, deficient understanding of revelation. Without biblical historicity and veracity behind the Word of God, theology can only grow closer to Hinduism. Second, the modern Christian is drastically weak in an unmediated, personal, experiential knowledge of God. Often what passes for religious experience is a communal emotion felt in church services, in meetings, in singing or contrived fellowship. Few Christians would know God on their own. Third, the modern church is often pathetically feeble in the expression of its focal principle of community. It has become the local social club, preaching shop or minister-dominated group. With these weaknesses, modern Christianity cannot hope to understand why people have turned to the East, let alone stand against the trend and offer an alternative."²¹

Western Christians have a faith that is "extremely blurred at the edges."²² This opens them up to any and all spiritual counterfeits.

New Age humanism is anti-Christian to the core. It is a utopian dream built on a flawed understanding of man's nature and a devotion to a westernized Eastern philosophy in which God is nothing more than a cosmic idea. The copy on the dust jacket to Ferguson's The Aquarian Conspiracy shows that the Christian's fears are justified: "A leaderless but powerful network is working to bring about radical change in the United States. Its members have broken with certain key elements of Western thought, and they may even have broken with history."

With all its seemingly "good" emphasis, the New Age movement is at heart humanistic (man is the center of the universe), materialistic (self-actualization is all-important), and anti-God (the God of the Bible is dismissed in favor of self-deification). The American public, with its inability to distinguish biblical truth from anti-Christian religious subtleties, is easily sucked in by the seemingly harmless religious and cultural goals of New Age humanism.

The college campus is a breeding ground for New Age concepts. New Age ideas are upbeat, optimistic, and seemingly life-transforming. At a time when you are most susceptible to change and influence, the New Age movement can be a dangerous "friend." Keep far from it.²³

Feminism

from: Surviving College Successfully
- by Gary DeMar

Several years ago, a constitutional Amendment was proposed to equalize the relations between men and women. Known as the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA), it circulated throughout the United States for several years, with each state having an opportunity to vote for or against it.

The ERA failed to get enough votes to become a constitutional amendment, but many writers have since noted that feminism has not been stopped by the defeat of the ERA. Instead, many of the main proposals of the radical feminists have been adopted as law. Feminism, in short, has triumphed, even as the ERA was being defeated. The feminist movement has been equally victorious in America's college classrooms.

A reporter at a recent meeting of the Modern Language Association in San Francisco observes that, "so prominent a part of the academic literary scene has feminism become that during one afternoon time slot at the convention no fewer than nine sessions on feminist topics from lesbian writing to "feminist dialogics" were droning on concurrently. Feminism has gone from being a special and rather narrow interest to having become one of the large clumsy categories by which literary study is organized in the university."¹

Feminists have also infiltrated other areas of study, such as history, sociology, anthropology, and even theology.

Even some evangelical professors claim to be "biblical feminists." Virginia Ramey Mollenkott, who teaches English at William Paterson College, calls herself an evangelical, but has co-authored a book advocating "covenantal homosexuality." At a meeting of the Evangelical Roundtable, she defended abortion, saying, "It is our right ... it is our body ... it is our choice."²

Within many mainline Christian denominations, a separate "feminist theology" has developed. One of the leading Roman Catholic feminists, Rosemary Radford Reuther, has proposed new liturgies for her "woman-church," including liturgies for healing after an abortion, covenanting of lesbian couples, and a Summer Solstice Party. Mary Jo Weaver, another Catholic feminist, asks what feminists can do about the traditional patriarchal church.

She sees two possible alternatives: "to reject the tradition and search for new alternatives (usually focused on the goddess and a revival of witchcraft) or to reinterpret the tradition in order to change its direction and open it to the influences and lives of women."³ Some churches have changed their hymnals and Bibles to avoid masculine references to God, and some have gone so far as to place crucifixes in the church sanctuary with female Christs!

Some feminist historians are interested only in studying the place of women in history, and some feminist biblical scholars are only interested in understanding how the Bible addresses the problems of modern women. These are worthy exercises, and can be very fruitful. A study of President's wives, for example, can reveal a lot about American politics.

In addition to this relatively mild form of "feminism," however, there is a group of hard-core, self-conscious feminists whose main goal is to destroy the traditional family and Western "patriarchal" culture. At an extreme, there is a relatively small group of feminist witches. Though often scorned by other feminists, whose goals are mainly political, feminist witchcraft is the fastest growing segment of witchcraft in America today.⁴

What are the presuppositions of the feminist ideology?

1. Radical feminists are virulently anti-Christian. Some advocate a return to the ancient mythologies because the ancient pantheon of gods included female deities. Others do not go quite so far, but in the end, they have replaced the Christian God with women. For the feminists, Woman is God. At a conference on woman's spirituality in 1976, the advent of the goddess was proclaimed. One feminist writer noted that "proclaiming that the 'Goddess is Alive' in a traditional church setting is proclaiming that ... being female is divine."⁵

2. Feminists seek equality for men and women. Some seek more than this, desiring feminine dominance over men. But, even equality between men and women is not a legitimate goal for a Christian movement. The Bible teaches that every institution in society has a structure of authority. There are elders in the church to rule the church; there are magistrates in the State to rule the citizens; and there are husbands who are to rule their families.

Though the Bible does not teach men to tyrannize their wives, the Bible clearly states that men are to be heads of the home, and women are to submit to them (Ephesians 5:22-23). In seeking to overthrow this God-ordained order, radical feminists are simply rebelling against God. Rebellious tendencies are also manifested in the feminist advocacy of "unisex," in which an attempt is made to overcome God-ordained differences between the sexes.

3. Feminism is often a form of Marxism. The feminists see themselves as the oppressed and alienated sex, and their goal is to throw off the chains of oppression in order to liberate themselves. What they are seeking liberation from, of course, is the traditional family structure. They are also able to make the claims that Marxists do, about the ideas of their opponents. Scholars who draw attention to the psychological and biological differences between men and women are dismissed because they are simply interested in maintaining the status quo. This tactic is often simply an attempt to dismiss evidence that is not consistent with the feminist outlook.

4. These presuppositions of equality and liberation work out in a consistent social program. As summarized by George Gilder, the ERA, if passed, would in all likelihood have had the following effects:

- * eliminated all rights of wives and mothers to be supported by their husbands, except to the extent husbands could claim an equal right;
- * eliminated all laws in any way restricting the rights of the gay liberation movement publicly to teach, proselytize, or practice their sexual ideology;
- * forced sexual integration of all schools, clubs, colleges, athletic teams, and facilities;
- * forced the drafting of women and the sexual integration of all military units;
- * compelled the use of government funds for abortions.⁶

Culture is also to be feminized. In fact, feminism has already made remarkable progress in transforming our culture into a feminist ideal. As one "biblical feminist" notes, "Feminism since the early 1960s, has begun to color interpersonal relations, the language we speak, family life, the educational system, child-rearing practices, politics, business, the mass media, religion, law, the judicial system, the cultural values system, and intellectual life."⁷

The feminist goal is nothing short of social, political, and cultural revolution. Beware of this when it emerges in your college classroom.

Feminism sidebar:

When the National Women's Studies Association had a recent annual convention at the University of Illinois at Champaign-Urbana, the following courses were offered for professors.* These are the actual course descriptions listed in the conference publication:

- * "Lesbian Studies: Creating Choices Both Inside and Outside the University. This session will explore lesbian education both within the university and in community based programs and will ask how feminist education can facilitate the choice of lesbian identity."
- * "Female Deities: Historical Perspectives. Panelists present historical overviews of female deities: one discusses intimate associations of female deities of the ancient world to various insects and beasts; the second panelist sketches some major trends in the history of the mother goddess religion; the third explores the patriarchal dichotomy of marriage in opposition to love."
- * Lesbian Nuns: Breaking the Silence. Unique revelations gathered from both ex-nuns and present nuns."
- * "On the Barricades for Abortion Rights: What We've Learned and How We've Won Against the God Squads. Four activists will discuss how we can defend our gains nationally against the right-wing campaign to turn back the clock for women's rights."

* "Lesbian Mothering. This session will deal with alternative conception, legalities and custody battles, and other related issues of lesbian mothering."

* "Incorporating Feminist Content into Traditional Courses: How the Revised Syllabus Looks."

* The convention was paid for with our tax dollars.⁸

Marxism

from Surviving College Successfully
by Gary DeMar

Marxism

Perhaps you've heard the joke: There are no Marxists in the Soviet Union because they all found professorships in American Universities. Some joke! And it is not far from the truth. Though universities are not centers of revolutionary violence today as they were in the 1960s, Marxism is still alive and well on the university campus.

Marxist scholarship is commonplace in literary studies, sociology, anthropology, and history. In some fields, Marxism and feminism are the dominant worldviews of scholars. Between 1970 and 1982, four Marxist textbooks in American government were published. In the 1960s, only a few universities taught courses on Marxism; today there are over 400 such courses at universities around the country.¹

The Marxist professor is not always a raving lunatic revolutionary. Many sociologists and economists, for example, employ "Marxist analysis" without adopting wholesale its revolutionary agenda. But there are raving lunatics too. Harvard biologist Richard Lewontin has written in New Political Science that Marxism, "can do nothing for the university; the real question is what can Marxists do to and in the university ... For the natural and social scientist the answer is very clear. The university is a factory that makes weapons - ideological weapons - for class struggle, for class warfare, and trains people in their use. It has no other leading and important function in the social organization."²

In other words, some Marxist professors at least are at the university to train students to be revolutionaries. No wonder Secretary of Education William Bennett has warned about the prominence of anti-democratic opinion on the college campus.³

As mentioned above, Marxism has permeated many different areas of study. Don't think you will be safe from Marxist influence by majoring in English literature. Marxist professors and concepts have infiltrated virtually every area of study.

What is the worldview of Marxism? It would be impossible to discuss every facet of Marxist thought in these few pages. So, we will look at a few concepts that are especially important to the Christian student.

1. Marx viewed all religions, including Christianity, as illusions. Despite recent efforts to reconcile Christianity with Marxism, atheism is a basic premise of the Marxist system of thought. Marx himself said that "man makes religion; religion does not make man," and concluded that religion is the "opium of the people," providing an illusion of happiness without true happiness.⁴

Marxism, in short, is a materialistic worldview; the consistent Marxist believes that the material world is the ultimate reality, that there is no God beyond the forces of history and nature.

Significantly, Marx's main attack was not on the idea of God's existence as such, but on God's sovereign dominion over all things. He rejected the Christian doctrine of creation, because he realized that a Creator-God is also a Sovereign God. Marx's philosophical hero was the mythical character, Prometheus, whose battle cry was, "I hate all gods."⁵

2. Marx's view of history, which has come to be known as "dialectical materialism," is consistent with his rejection of Christianity. History is not the story of God's dealings with men, but the progress of man from one social arrangement to another, from feudalism to capitalism for example. This progress takes place through changes in technology that lead to changes in the way that people are organized for production. Changes in the organization for production in turn lead to ideological and political conflicts between those classes which want to conserve the old order and those which seek to make drastic changes. Revolutionary class conflict, whether peaceful or violent, produces social change.

In the history of the West, this process has caused the change from feudalism to capitalism, and will, Marx believed, cause the change from capitalism to "scientific" socialism. In the last stage of history, after a transitional stage of the "dictatorship of the proletariat" (lower urban classes), the State will wither and a classless society will emerge. The details are not as important here as the basic point that Marx viewed history as the unfolding of completely materialistic forces.

3. Another key presupposition of Marx was his view of man. As a materialist, Marx denied that each man is a creature made in the image of a sovereign God. Rather, man is an essentially social being, with no individual human nature. His whole life is bound up with his social relations.

This did not mean for Marx that man has no control over his destiny, and in fact Marxism wavers between a deterministic view that socialism is inevitable, and the call to action. Man is determined by the social forces of history, but he can act to hasten the revolutionary change. This apparent contradiction is resolved by Marxism's ethical imperative for men to act in ways that correspond with the direction of history.

The ethical foundation of Marxism, in short, is to jump on the bandwagon that is moving in the direction of the revolution. The one ethical imperative in Marx is to "overthrow all relations in which man is a debased, enslaved, forsaken, despicable being," with the ultimate end being to restore man to his true humanity from which he is alienated by capitalist society. In other words, Marx sees his purpose as teaching that "man is the highest being for man."⁶ The revolutionary social transformation from capitalism to socialism will produce a new man and a new human nature, no longer alienated from himself and nature.

What makes Marxism so appealing on the college campus today? First, it provides a comprehensive, positive vision of human life and history. Once Christianity is rejected, some other worldview will fill the void, and Marxism is a total worldview. Second, Marxism is particularly appealing because it offers an alternative to Christianity that is very similar in structure to Christianity. Like Christianity, Marxism teaches that man can be saved from his present condition of alienation. Like Christianity, Marxism looks forward to a complete transformation of society.

Third, Marxism, in a simplified form, can easily be used as a weapon to attack your opponents. Marx's claim that ideas are products of class has been used to undermine any and all philosophies. The Marxist radical can debunk a Christian's claim that God blesses His people by saying that the Christian view is just a product of a particular social class.

Compassion: Missing Ingredient in American Christianity

By Colonel Donor

When I was a boy of fourteen I read a tract from an American missionary that described the brutal torture inflicted upon children by the Viet Cong in their strategy to intimidate people into submission through terror - the same sort of cold, calculated, total terror that the crazed colonel, portrayed by Marlon Brando, talked about in the Vietnam film classic Apocalypse Now.

When I read this small tract, I did not immediately dismiss it as something unpleasant or irrelevant to my life. I thought about it. I pictured the young children. I cried. I was filled with hurt and anger at the unspeakable evil of any power that tries to subjugate people through a philosophy that legitimizes terror as an appropriate weapon. The primary operating principle of Communist expansionism is its founder's, V.I. Lenin's, maxim that "the end justifies the means."

As a teenager, the more I learned about such atrocities, of man's inhumanity to man, the deeper my resolve became to do something about it. Why? Because I felt the pain of the innocent victims, I could see the anguish on their faces, I could hear their pitiful cries for help and their moaning over loved ones.

When South Vietnam and Cambodia fell to the Communists in the mid-seventies, I was about twenty-five years of age and was involved in sending aid to refugees from war zones in Vietnam. When I heard the news, I was stunned. I had not expected a Republican president (Gerald Ford) to allow the Democratic Congress to cut off military aid to our Allies when they were surrounded by a savagely brutal and bloodthirsty army.

I went into my office, locked the door, and turned off the lights. I grieved the entire afternoon. Not because I supported the way America fought the war (which I did not), not because we had lost an ally or because the United States had suffered a humiliating defeat. I wept for the victims of the unspeakable atrocities I knew was to come.

And despite hysterical protests to the contrary by the anti-war movement and the liberals within the media and Congress, news reports over the next few days and years bore out the worst of my fears. When Saigon fell, hundreds of young women killed themselves rather than suffer violent rape and death at the hands of their "liberators." Brave soldiers fought to the last man to protect their families. Public officials blew their brains out while giving their flag a last salute. The lucky survivors were consigned to "re-education" prison and torture camps.

Of course, what happened in neighboring Cambodia made Saigon look like a fun day at Disneyland. Pol

Pot, the Marxist "liberator" of Cambodia, massacred one-third of his entire nation's population after he seized power. This is reflected in the popular true-life film The Killing Fields. Several authors have confirmed that in their zeal to rid Cambodia of "pre-revolutionary holdover attitudes," Pol Pot's regime murdered anyone who had a college degree, worked for the previous government or even wore glasses (a sign of education in the old way).

Their first act of liberation was to execute the entire Parliament and then force march the entire population of the capitol city of Phenom Phen, including every patient in every hospital, into "relocation areas" several hundred miles away. Of course, most died en route, or perished when they got to their new destinations, which were nothing but wild jungles.

A decade later, in 1985, a group of one hundred Christian leaders gathered in Washington, D.C., to view a twenty-minute video showing several black Africans being "necklaced." This is a practice popular with the Marxist militants of the African National Congress (ANC), devoted to destroying the white government of South Africa through terrorizing any black leaders or black citizens who disagree with their methods or objectives. Victims have a rubber car tire placed around their neck that is then filled with gasoline and set on fire. People chant and cheer as the offending party burns to death.

I did not watch this video as a documentary about terrible or unbelievable things happening to people I did not know, in a country I'd never been to, and therefore didn't care about. I rose to my feet to demand that we as a group speak out against these atrocities. For the first time in my life I was unable to complete a speech (even a short one). My voice broke, and I could not go on. The pain I felt for those I had just seen martyred was too great to bear.

On perhaps a less dramatic but just as moving note, an experience occurred recently as my wife, Miriam, and I were driving through the countryside. On the side of the road was a large cemetery with a small hill in the middle. On the hill, next to a tombstone, sat a grandmotherly lady on the grass, all alone. How my heart went out to her. As I imagined her spending her days in loneliness, her sorrow and grieving for the lost "partner for life," tears coursed down my face. Today that particular vision still has the power to move me to tears.

I'm not suggesting that we be vulnerable to, or dwell on, every tragedy we see or hear about. In fact, the more sensitive you are, the more you have to be careful not to be overwhelmed, a problem I have been trying to balance for twenty-five years. I am saying that if we are to exercise compassion, we must begin with increasing our awareness and sensitivity to those in need, down the block, across town, in another state, or around the world.

Increasing Our Compassion

Our natural instincts are to avoid being compassionate. Most of us have enough problems of our own and don't wish to experience, even for a few seconds, the suffering of others.

While the Bible gives us clear instructions to take care of our businesses and families, we are not told to do so by ignoring everything and everyone else. A fact unfortunately misunderstood by most Christians is our livelihoods are, in fact, part of God's calling for us: "Whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God" (I Corinthians 10:31). At the very least our jobs or businesses should be viewed as something that sustains us so we can have the time and financial resources to help others. If God in His sovereignty prospers us financially, it is so we can fund the mercy works He calls His people to.

It is our total commitment to a "me" orientation, to selfish desire, to enjoy to the fullest whatever leisure time and activities our level of affluence, which we slave to maintain or increase, will allow, that hinders us from obedience to Christ in exercising compassion.

So, now we must ask ourselves, how can we increase our compassion?

First, we need to pray that God will give us His compassionate heart, that we might see the world and other people with the same compassion God does. This is a prayer I've often prayed, and God has always been faithful to answer it. Of course, this is the sort of prayer that we know will be answered because we are obviously praying that the will of God be done in our lives.

Second, we must study the Bible. We call ourselves Christians because we are supposed to follow Christ, not just believe He exists. If we truly "believe in Him," then certainly we will follow His instructions to serve, to help. We will want to follow His example of allowing human needs to move Him to compassionate acts.

We must use our Bible concordances and search the Bible to see how God feels about justice and compassion for the poor, the oppressed, the orphans, and all those in need.

We must begin to allow God to renew our minds by cultivating a Christian worldview. We must not look at the world as Christians wearing secular glasses and therefore seeing the world only the way non-Christians do. We must learn to see the world the way God does, for He expects this of us. When we view the world through God's standards of justice, righteousness, and compassion, we will be moved to action - to serve others.

Learning to Feel

Naturally, compassion does not exist in a void. The obvious needs of others act to bring out our compassion. So, we must begin to learn about the many needs around us. We need to allow God to unsettle us with a particular image that will release strong, motivating emotions within us. Only when we can feel with our emotions the pain of others will we be motivated to action, to sacrificing some of our precious energy, our valuable time, our scarce finances. "We have the mind of Christ and hold His feelings and purposes" (I Corinthians 2:16, TLB).

God does not condone or ignore oppression, exploitation, violence, dishonesty, or immorality. Evil angers God (see Jeremiah 44:1-14).

Proverbs 8:13 instructs us that "to fear the Lord" (i.e., reverence for God and obedience to His commands and Lordship over our lives, our time, energy, and resources) "is to hate evil."

Throughout the Old Testament, God literally wiped out nations because of their evil practices. His wrath and anger were stirred by things like child sacrifice, sexual abuses, and assorted other injustices.

God doesn't like these things any better today than He did then. The difference is that today, since we have received God's overwhelming power within us (see Ephesians 1:8-14, John 15:5-17, Philippians 2:13, 4:13), God expects us to feel His hurt, His anger, and to allow Him to use us to rectify the abuses and evils He brings to our attention.

When the New Testament describes multiple instances of Jesus' being "deeply moved" to compassion by the condition of those He looked upon, the Greek root word indicates that Jesus was moved by a compelling force from the deepest part of His body, from His "guts."

Testing Your Compassion

Developing compassion is like anything else. It takes a little practice. Perhaps it will be much easier for you than you think. Give yourself this "compassion test." Please read each example very slowly and think about it until a picture forms in your mind. Then ask yourself, "Would I feel moved to act if?":

1. Someone was killing innocent babies in my neighborhood.
2. My elderly neighbor was brokenhearted from loneliness.
3. I met an abandoned child, starved for love and positive affirmation.
4. I heard of a family out of work, unable to meet their food bills, being evicted.
5. An older or handicapped person explained to me that he had no place to live and would be forced to live and die on my corner sidewalk.
6. I heard of some orphans in my city who were growing sickly due to lack of nutrition.
7. I suspected local merchants were selling pornography that was bought by:
 - a. thirteen-year-olds forming their view of sexuality
 - b. married men "tired of just one sex partner"
 - c. potential rapists or child molesters
8. I knew local politicians were passing laws to make it easier to get away with rape and other violent acts.
9. My local Christian school was about to be closed by the government because sponsoring churches refused to obey bureaucratic orders.
10. My local Congressman consistently voted to spend more than the government took in; refused to help those resisting wars of aggression; refused to consider the best interests of his country and my family.

The list could go on and on. You could add many more examples of those in need of mercy, love, care, compassion:

1. Victims of our sexual ethics
 - a. AIDS victims
 - b. Rape victims
 - c. Divorce victims
 - d. Sexually damaged or abused children
2. Victims of racism and "welfarism"
3. Victims of our materialistic, selfish, narcissistic society
 - a. The unlovely
 - b. The failed
 - c. The poor, homeless
 - d. The handicapped
 - e. Unwanted children
 - f. The forgotten elderly

Did any of these visions move your emotions? If you felt motivated to intervene on any one of these situations, you are on your way to exercising compassion.

The absolutely crucial thing we must understand is that these things are happening in our community - our town, city, or state. We must understand that caring for our neighbor is not limited to the person next door. Our neighbors are whoever we see, wherever we see them as Jesus clearly taught in His parable on the Good Samaritan.

New Vision

Jesus Christ, as our example, told us to let our light - our expressing God's compassion, justice, and righteousness as through our actions - be an example to all mankind. He uses the illustration of a city of believers that would radiate God's light to all mankind. Such an example would inevitably attract others to God's justice and righteousness as a beacon of hope shining through the bleak darkness of man's exploitation of man.

"You are the light of the world. A city on a hill cannot be hidden. Neither do people light a lamp and put it under a bowl. Instead they put it on its stand and it gives light to everyone in the house. In the same way, let your light shine before men, that they may see your good deeds and praise your Father in heaven" (Matthew 5:14-16).

Imagine how our neighborhoods and even our nation would change if forty million Christians actually began to practice loving and caring for the needy. What an example it would be if we just practiced the Golden Rule of "doing unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Would the general public not follow our example as they saw the obvious benefit to society and to their own family? Would they not follow our lead to re-establish a just nation? Would they not select some of us to lead? Of course they would. It is precisely the way the early Christians in America molded our culture and built a government and civilization based on the motto, "In God We Trust."

That is why immediately before His parable on the city on a hill, Christ commanded us to be the salt or preservative that keeps our society together. But as Christ warned us in Matthew 5:13, when we as salt refuse to exercise our mandate to actively preserve God's vision for society, then we will be trampled upon by men.

If we are willing to commit ourselves to action as the salt of our society by rebuilding the standards of justice and righteousness necessary for its preservation, our vision will once again appear as a city of light set upon a hill reaching out to all men and women searching for answers for fear, alienation, and confusion.

Our nation is perishing for lack of a vision to hold us together, to inspire us, to guide us, to give us something worthwhile to reach for - the shining city on a hill.

If our nation is to avert its present course of self-destruction, of tearing itself apart, we must be united in our vision. As a first step, we need a symbol. The Greek root word for symbol means to unite together. Symbols draw us together and give us something to bind our otherwise divergent interests. Incidentally, semantically, the opposite to symbolic is the word diabolic. The Greek root word means "to tear apart," to disintegrate -exactly what America is now doing to itself. The name Satan is derived from this same Greek word diabolos.¹

If our vision is a nation based on God's compassion, justice and righteousness, we need a symbol. A symbol that will represent what we should all be to each other. A symbol that clearly sets an example of how we must proceed if we are to implement our vision.

What better symbol than the Good Samaritan?

America's new vision must come from those inspired by God's eternal standards of justice and righteousness. We have seen that for justice and righteousness to be effectuated, they must spring from a Christ-like compassion. We have learned that if we will be obedient to follow Christ's instructions to act as salt and light in our neighborhood, this vision will begin to become reality.

Truly God has the answers for our generation's fears and alienation, and these answers should comprise our vision for a better world for all people. The question remains though, just how convinced are we about what, or how much, God really expects of us in regard to this vision?

Four Spheres of Government

By Marshall Foster

FEW CHRISTIANS TODAY SPEAK OF THEMSELVES as God's world-changers, but that is what they are. The bumper sticker that reads "Christians are not perfect, just forgiven" epitomizes the attitude of many, who think the only difference between a believer and an unbeliever is forgiveness.

The Christian, in Scripture, is seen as more than a man who does good and avoids evil. He has within him, because of his faith in Christ, all the power to subdue God's earth to His glory.

Today in America our tendency is to think of the word "government" in purely external terms: as "they" - the people in city hall, statehouse, or in Washington, D.C. To us they are the "government." So, at first the term self-government seems strange. If it is used in a humanistic sense - suggesting that every man is free to govern himself however he wishes without reference to God's moral law - then self-government becomes anarchy. The word "Christian" is an adjective that should not be removed from use with self-government, for true self-government is only possible when one is ruled or governed by Christ.

In colonial America, the God of the Bible was seen as sovereign over men and their property, reflecting the "Biblical worldview" of the reformation. But in the past 100 years a disarming doctrine which sees Satan as the sovereign of this world, has been accepted in many Christian circles. Many Bible teachers today see Jesus as an absentee king who is concerned exclusively with building and maintaining His church until He returns to earth. They see Jesus as having the authority and right to rule, but as having given power to subjugate the world temporarily over to Satan.

Worldview of 20th Century Christians

The world is controlled by Satan

The Church

The worldview of the reformers was diametrically opposite to the above view. The reformers and the Puritans taught that Jesus Christ is the ruler of the earth (1 Tim. 6:16; Hebrews 2:14) and Satan, a defeated foe (John 12:3, Col. 2:15).

Self-governing Christian

Home Church State

Satan rules in the hearts of unbelievers and the "world system"

Our attitude toward the "sovereignty issue" is of paramount importance because it affects what is done in every area of life. God's sovereignty begins with the individual self-governing Christian who is the building block for the other spheres of society.

Sphere #1:
The Individual

Christ's government is internal, resulting in the Christian being self-governing, but always in accord with God's laws. Self-government that ignores God's laws or defies them is not true self-government and leads not to liberty, but to the bondage Jesus refers to in John 8:34: "Whoever commits sin is a slave to sin." Only when the Son sets you free are you free indeed.

The self-governing Christian has the power within him to bring all areas of life into submission to God. This is his ordained purpose (1 Cor. 10:31; 2 Cor. 10:5). United with the word of God and faith, he will accomplish all that His Lord has commanded (Psalms 8:3-6).

Sphere #2:
The Family

The self-governing Christian family is the engine of godly dominion and the hope of the future of our nation. God has ordained the family and has given to it the responsibility to care for all of its members both young and old. In our 20th century welfare state, we have given over to the state much of the responsibility of caring for our parents and educating our children. This is an abomination and, if continued, will lead us to destruction.

To the family, God has given us responsibility to educate and prepare godly children (Proverbs 22:6; Deut. 6:20). If we choose to share that responsibility with another, it should be in the godly environment of a Christian school, not under the tutelage of the humanist public school system. We must come to see that "public schools" really are "state schools" where the philosophy and the religion of the state will be promoted.

We as families must encourage the development of Christian schools. To make this godly movement fulfill its purpose, parents should insist that these schools not only provide Christian teachers and Chapel services but a Christian curriculum. That curriculum should reflect the godly educational philosophy of our Founding Fathers and the training of our youth to be self-governing citizens of this great land.

Sphere #3 The Church

The believing church in America makes up almost 200,000 individual congregations that can greatly impact the rebuilding of our nation and the reaffirmation of our covenant with God. If we are to fulfill our purpose before God as the Church of Christ, our pastors must be encouraged to teach the scriptural foundations of Christian self and civil government in the pulpits of our land just as they did at the time of the War for Independence.

Without giving up personal distinctives or compromising doctrine, millions of believers can unite in voluntary union to accomplish godly purposes. The churches, not the state, must once again become the great arm of God's "charity" reaching out to a needy people with the Gospel and its answers to society's social problems.

Sphere #4 The State

There is increasing discussion today of restoring our self-governing republic. The only possible way for such rhetoric to become a reality is if the critical path we have just discussed is followed. Discussion of civil government is left to the end not because it is the least important area of our lives, but to emphasize that the basic structure of government will not conform to its original Constitutional model until the people become self-governing in their homes, churches, schools and businesses.

We must also begin immediately to become involved in the political process, for there are issues that need to be confronted before our entire structure is destroyed. For example, God will not tolerate a nation that legally kills the unborn child, calling it "abortion."

Let us not forget the godly way of nation-building presupposes as its foundation Christian character and intelligent self-governing Christians. This is the reason we are failing in our current attempt to set up republics in foreign lands. It does little good to give a copy of the Constitution and plans for popular elections to a people who do not know how to govern themselves. The battle must be won from the internal to the external, from content to form, from character to its full expression as a Christian republic.

Honest Money

by Robert M. Metcalf
2/94

Inflation - the continual, apparently never-ending rotting away of the value of our money - constitutes an enormous overhanging danger to our nation, to our civilization. Inflation has been a contributor in bringing down past civilizations. At some point, we're going to see a climax in our own situation.

"Lenin is said to have declared that the best way to destroy the capitalist system was to debauch the currency ... Lenin was certainly right. There is no subtler, no surer means of overturning the existing basis of society than to debauch the currency. The process engages all the hidden forces of economic law on the side of destruction, and it does it in a manner which not one man in a million is able to diagnose."

Those true and profound words came from the earlier (and sounder) John Maynard Keynes himself, in his 1919 book The Economic Consequences of The Peace.

Even long before the foundations of society are completely undermined, inflation of the money supply is an important means of manipulation and control by which the few dominate the many: the socialistically-inclined "elitists" controlling the heights of society.

For much of history, a thick cloud of ignorance has enveloped money. But this situation is changing; growing numbers of people now hunger to see why social evils exist. We search for the truth and strive to bring about needed change. As for probing in monetary affairs, in our day we have witnessed such tragic results of ever-mounting inflation in so many nations that we urgently want to get at causes and corrections. In each nation's basic institutional ways, including its monetary system, we discern right actions under Moral Law itself, and wrong ones. And these actions translate into results - either good or evil.

What Is Money?

To understand inflation we must first understand money. Why such a thing as money? The exchange of goods and services by direct barter is burdensome and very inefficient. To replace such cumbersome means of trade, men were given this insight: use a commodity having a value of its own to exchange for goods or services. Money, then, is obviously a medium of exchange; its first attribute. Next, to serve well, money had to be an effective measure (standard) of value; hence, its second attribute; third, money had to serve as a store of value - a commodity which could be saved for future use. These, then, are the three qualities of money: (1) a medium of exchange, (2) a measure or standard of value, and (3) a store of value. These three attributes must be kept clearly in mind when considering the breakdown of a nation's monetary system.

In examining the basic characteristic of money - a measure or standard of value - the measuring unit is the denominated monetary unit. When men first went beyond direct barter, they searched for commodities having value of their own, as well as stability in value, to serve as media of exchange and as measures and stores of value. They found that the precious metals, gold and silver, were the most nearly ideal monetary commodities. (Silver can serve very satisfactorily as the single monetary metal; it was so set by Congress in 1792 as the standard money of the United States and served as our monometallic standard until the demonetization 81 years later, called the "Crime of 1873." Actually, with much justification, the term "silver" could be substituted for "gold" when the latter is used alone hereafter in this article.)

In mankind's search, gold was revealed as the most nearly ideal monetary commodity. Gold has certain inherent qualities which make it the ideal measure of value: (1) a high value of its own, (2) an intrinsic value which remains relatively constant, because in any given short-term period only a minute percentage of the world's gold stock could be newly-mined; (3) gold is durable, workable, easily portable, beautiful and recognizable. (Silver and a few other metals of lesser value also emerged as acceptable money, especially for coinage.)

Honest Money: A Value Of Its Own

There are "money substitutes" such as bills, notes, and bank credit papers - but they are only representations of the real money, which is the money commodity. History tells us two facts: money is a commodity given value in the marketplace, and whoever holds civil authority in a nation will be strongly tempted to manipulate or alter the value of that money commodity. Temptation must be eliminated as far as human resourcefulness can accomplish it. Thus the discipline of an absolutely unchangeable gold standard is a necessity (gold, it must be stressed, serves as a disciplinary agent; it is not to be an idol.)

Politicians and economist/apologists go as far as possible to convince people money substitutes are "real" money. These skillful practitioners want printed paper in the form of bills, notes or bank credit thought of as "money," because it is then easier to manipulate the monetary system and dilute the value of people's money and their savings in any form where denominated in dollars (fixed-value investments).

Sophisticated rationalizations are created for techniques of deficit spending, for taking away the gold backing of the monetary unit, and for stimulating bank lending in non-productive purposes. All is done to justify inflation and its temporarily and seemingly high popularity with the majority of the electorate. The most obvious debauchery of the monetary unit in early times was the clippage (shaving) of the realm's coins by unscrupulous rulers. Today, there are subtler methods of eroding the value (purchasing power) of what we use as "money."

Fractional Bank Reserves

Centuries ago, people began the practice of depositing their gold with a goldsmith for safekeeping. In return, the goldsmith would issue a certificate attesting to the amount of gold on deposit. It soon became convenient and popular to use "gold" certificates as a media of exchange (a substitute for gold). Thus began the legitimate practice of banking: the safekeeping, borrowing and lending of the real money commodity (gold or silver).

The fraud of fractional reserves first occurred when a goldsmith realized that all those who had deposited with him were never likely to claim their gold at the same time. Therefore, he would engage in a bit of deceit. He could issue gold certificates representing more than the amount of gold on deposit, and enrich himself by charging interest on the fraudulent certificates. Like the ancient goldsmith, today's banker who issues a money substitute (credit) not fully backed by funds on deposit, is creating something out of nothing. In doing so, he is creating something of value for himself at the expense - by dilution of the value of their monetary assets - of every other holder of cash or savings funds or fixed-value investments at that time. It may be done by the local banker in utter innocence, as is the typical case today after so many centuries of accepted practice. The same money debauchery applies when the government prints and issues paper currency (or bonds or notes) not backed by monetary metal.

One of the basic rules of banking under an honest monetary system is as follows: maintain a 100 percent reserve ratio of the money commodity to the money substitutes issued (bills, bank credit, government bonds, notes, etc.); to maintain anything less than a 100 percent reserve ratio amounts to fraudulent action on the part of the issuer of monetary obligations or paper currency, whether that issuer be a bank or government.

The dilution of the value of money by government and banks usually occurs in this manner: suppose the total U.S. money stock (including the money substitutes) is increased by 10 percent in any given year. If total goods and services available for purchase during that period increase only three percent over the previous year, the net increase in the money stock would be seven percent (to buy those goods and services). What happens? The purchasing power (value) is then cut by seven percent for each previously existing dollar. Why? Because the value of the original money stock was diluted by the net increase of the seven percent in the total money stock. The reduction in the value of each dollar may not be reflected immediately to that full extent in the marketplace prices because of a slower money velocity, movement of money out of the nation from a trade deficit, and delays in pricing changes, but the cutting of the dollar's value will show up in time.

What would a continuing seven percent rate of inflation do to our dollars? In ten years, inflation would rot away their value by one-half, debauchery on a huge and tragic scale. Worse yet was the 10 percent inflation averaged from 1977 to 1981.

For the banker or the government, that "something of value" created out of nothing is a new asset - make-believe money the banker can lend and the government can spend. For the consumer and the taxpayer, for someone with savings, such a scheme is a cruel deception. Should we not call it theft?

Some will argue fractional reserve banking is sound as long as the reserve ratio remains fixed, and money substitutes are issued only against goods being manufactured or marketed. The weight of moral evidence favors those who contend anything less than a 100 percent reserve ratio is wrong; the perpetuation of a wrong once committed is continued disobedience to the Moral Law. Good morals and successful economics are faithful companions.

Money Supply Size

Contrary to popular belief, there's no need for "a steadily-increasing money supply to support an enlarging economy." Such a theory is completely fallacious. So long as money (gold, silver, or whatever's accepted as solid money) can be divided into sufficiently small units usable in all transactions, a stable money supply is sufficient. Besides the coined money, there are of course the money substitutes: devised for such dividing and ease in handling.

The 100 percent reserve ratio, of course, protects those holding the money substitutes holders. In fact, if the money supply were to remain relatively fixed, and the value of the monetary unit were to become steadily more valuable in terms of all other goods and services, the result would be salutary: greater savings, increased investments, the build-up of capital goods, and an increase in the standard of living. The periodical "boom-and-bust" cycle could be eliminated altogether. Only the fractional reserve system allows such balloonings and subsequent shrinkages of the money stock in these cycles. Malinvestment by speculation can occur in such cycles; and we well know the harm and even personal suffering taking place in depression phases. A relatively stable money stock would not only bring a greater rise in the standard of living than in recent times, it would also tend to cause the yearned-for cycle-free economic stability.

Even if the money supply were to be decreased slowly making a possible return to full-gold backing, a "beneficent circle" resulting from increased savings and investment would emerge instead of the vicious circle of the inflation process. (See the steps outlined at the end of this article for the recommended transition phase.)

No Government Borrowing

Government deficit-financing through the banking system, without backing the money commodity, is simply another way to create something out of nothing (make-believe money). Such a device is as inflationary as creating unbacked printing press (fiat) money. All government expenditures must be fully covered by taxation; there must be no deficit financing whatsoever. Where government is held within its proper bounds, governmental expenditures will be small and comprise only a minor fraction of total national income.

The proper governmental functions are protection against external enemies; protection of society, life, liberty, property, contract, health, safety and morals; preserving order and the rule of law; rendering justice; and performing those few functions where the entire population is served indiscriminately and where there is no practical manner in which to pay for them except by taxation - streets, roads, etc. The other needs - education, help for the less fortunate, health care, etc. - must be organized and financed outside the bounds of government.

The Beneficent Cycle

During the 19th century, outstanding economic growth occurred in America, because of two primary factors: (1) a favorable economic climate generated by a society whose morally-directed people were hardworking, frugal and charitable, and (2) a morally-constituted civil government followed non-inflationary monetary policies while protecting its citizens' right to own, use and develop private property. However, in many recent decades, government has almost constantly pursued inflationary policies; incentives to save and invest have been (and are now being) systematically undermined. Such periods of persistent inflationary practices produce distressing consequences. Leapfrogging prices, wages, and interest rates - which some believe to be the causes of inflation - are but dire results of more and more make-believe money being created by monetary authorities or sponsored entities.

Prices, wages and interest rates react in ratchet-like fashion to increases in the money supply, but adjust unevenly, and unfairly. Speculators and money-changers may temporarily prosper in an inflationary environment, but the elderly on fixed-incomes and fixed-savings suffer great deprivation; they serve as a glaring example of the gross immorality of permitting government an inflationary monetary policy. When the government engages in deficit spending and finances those deficits by creating new "money," it insidiously steals purchasing power from its citizens - and those who suffer most are the ones who can least afford it.

On the other hand, when a non-inflationary policy is followed, the value of money will tend to grow and there is real incentive to save and invest in wealth-producing business activities. When not sabotaged by the government's inflationary policies, a free market economy (stewardship) automatically produces an unbroken process of steadily lowered consumer prices. This results from general industrial and commercial productivity, tending to rise more rapidly than the production of "money" (with increasing difficulty in extracting money commodities - gold, silver, etc. - from the earth or ocean).

The "benefit cycle" is as follows: a relatively stable money stock, based on a sound commodity money, will tend to cause the value of the monetary unit to rise steadily. In turn, money will increase in value, so there's a strong incentive to save. Savings institutions then invest a great part of those savings in capital goods and the return on those investments goes back to individual savers. This systematic investment in capital goods leads to greater productivity and an increasing Gross National Product (GNP) with a higher standard of living. This strong growth in productivity, in conjunction with slower growth in the money stock, will give greater value to the monetary unit. The results are an on-going growth/prosperity trend, producing an ever-rising standard of living.

The Return to Sound Money

How can we as a people turn from the present inflation-prone system of money-by-government-fiat and move toward a sound 100 percent gold-based banking system? If there comes to be sufficient recognition that these truths must be acted upon, how can our inflation way-of-life be eliminated? With much of our society's structure erected on this false foundation, and with countless millions of innocent participants held captive, can there be hope for a successful return to honest money? While man may be inclined to resist undue governmental intervention, his flawed and imperfectible nature all too often succumbs to calculated political promises of a free lunch and cradle-to-the-grave security.

Since money pervades every aspect of society, any corrective steps must be taken carefully and judiciously to ease the transition and avoid unnecessary economic shocks. But it can be done, gradually and persistently. The following actions would seem to be the most logical (and we hope such steps will be taken before a severe crisis brings on a fascistic regime jeopardizing our basic freedoms, justice and good order):

A) Stop all lending by financial institutions of any funds not deposited for savings purposes. An exception: loans made for the movement of goods in production or the marketing process, those to be phased out over a five-year period.

B) In two years, following the implementation of A, void the charter of the central bank (in the U.S., this of course being the Federal Reserve Bank). Where a sound banking system exists in a nation, there is no need whatsoever for a central bank. It is truly "an engine of inflation," as many informed observers have rightly called it, even before its chartering in 1913.

C) Mandate that the federal budget be in balance by the third fiscal year. The comparatively small expenditures of the very limited government (which we once had and to which we must return) can easily be covered by modest taxation of the citizens. Even adding urgently needed annual payments on the national debt as well as taxes for the funding thereof will be far from the burdensome ones they are today.

D) By Constitutional amendment, define the monetary unit in terms of gold by weight. One ounce of gold equals "X" dollars, this to become effective at the end of a five-year period at which time the value of gold shall be determined and fixed by the then free market price.

E) Remove the civil government from all money issuance, coinage and handling activities. Limit functions in this realm to a legitimate role: rendering justice. In monetary affairs, government shall supervise private banks to carry out their proper and moral operations. (The history of banking has repeatedly shown a periodic lack of public safety and a capacity and temptation for improper manipulation of the money supply; careful supervision by governmental authorities is required.)

F) After the five-year period and when the value of the dollar is defined in terms of gold (see D), prohibit creation of any money substitute by any party - bank, government or otherwise - unless that substitute (certificate, note or bank credit) is 100 percent backed by gold on deposit with the issuer. Exception: small-change coins made of lesser metals would be approved, provided the value of their metal content was substantially in proportion to gold's defined value for that coin in each case (half-dollar, quarter, dime, etc.).

The aforementioned actions would, of course, require constitutional amendment-type steps. (Actually, the constitution of a nation should have a considerable portion thereof non-amendable: where basic protections of life, liberty, property and other moral law rights are involved - and these money-protecting provisions are of this nature.)

As outlined above, these actions to establish a sound monetary system are so far-reaching, compared with what we now have, that surely we shall have to undergo some form of crisis to bring them about. But our disobedience to the moral law, and our departure from sound and right ways are generally moving us steadily toward that climax of our troubles.

Let us work mightily to educate our people and prepare them.

Earthly Victory

By Gary North

"Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; old things have passed away; behold, all things have become new. Now all things are of God, who has reconciled us to Himself through Jesus Christ, and has given us the ministry of reconciliation, that is, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses to them, and has committed to us the word of reconciliation. Therefore we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God were pleading through us: we implore you on Christ's behalf, be reconciled to God" (2 Corinthians 5:17-20).

Christians are ambassadors of reconciliation: primarily, the reconciliation of man to God, and secondarily, the reconciliation of covenant-keeping men to each other. Christians are assigned the task of announcing to the whole world that the gospel of Christ alone offers hope to the world. God is reconciling the world to Himself in history through His Son, Jesus Christ. This is God's program for healing the nations. No other program, no other faith, no other plan can work. This is the only basis of permanent peace that God offers to men and nations in history.

The church of Jesus Christ has never fully believed this, but especially in the twentieth century. Christians have always proclaimed one or another version of natural law theory as the proper basis of reconciling covenant-breakers to covenant-keepers in history: intellectually, politically, culturally, and internationally. To this extent, their message of God's reconciliation has been compromised.

The gospel is not designed to reconcile permanent covenant-breakers to God or to covenant keepers. The gospel is intended to create a society that subdues covenant-breakers externally, making them useful to covenant-keepers until the day of eternal wrath begins.¹ The gospel is designed to extend the dominion of covenant-keepers as God's authorized representatives on earth, not to create the basis of a permanent cease-fire agreement between covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers until Jesus comes to judge the world. The gospel is not the manifesto of a stalemate religion.²

Twentieth-century Christians have lost their confidence in the power of Christ's gospel to transform society. They have lost the vision of international victory that used to motivate Christian missions programs. The vision of the international kingdom of God that captured the minds of evangelists in the early Church (Mark 16:15), continued through the Middle Ages, and even lasted well beyond the Protestant Reformation,¹ faded rapidly with the coming of Darwinism.

The growing cultural inferiority complex of Christians combined with the growing cultural superiority complex of Darwinists to create a perverse coalition against consistent, world-transforming Christianity, which preaches the existence of progressive earthly manifestations of the kingdom of God in history, in every area of life.

Christians have lost a vision of earthly victory. They have no vision of a world progressively transformed by the gospel, or nations brought under Christ's covenant, one by one, or the Church of Jesus Christ speaking with one voice, as it did in Acts 15, or a confederation of Christian nations welcoming newly converted nations into the commonwealth of redeemed mankind.

They have no confidence in the Bible as a reliable intellectual weapon against the self-certified humanists who occupy the seats of influence and power in every nation. They view their earthly labors as historically futile, to be swallowed inevitably by the triumph of anti-Christian forces throughout the world. They are afraid even to announce the covenant of Christ as morally binding on their own nations, let alone on the whole world.

They have become confused by the inescapable choices that God's providential history imposes on them. They have accepted the humanists' lie that Jesus Christ has no legitimate authority over the civil affairs of men, or none that men can ever perceive in history.

The Yoke of Fear

The West has long believed that freedom, peace, and prosperity are available on a permanent basis completely apart from the God who establishes the ethical foundations of freedom, peace, and prosperity. Christians have also defended this view for a century by continued reliance on natural law theories and the humanist doctrine of permanent political pluralism.

The West has believed that evolution has overwhelmed every system of permanent ethics, so that no one can speak in the name of God's permanent principles. The Communists believed the same thing, but because they officially replaced the West's fading faith in God with Marxism-Leninism, they were able to delay the loss of faith longer. Solzhenitsyn and other Russian critics insist that this Marxist faith is now dead behind the Iron Curtain, but it still is alive inside Third World revolutionary movements and in many Western college classrooms.

The West has lost its faith in progress. The Soviets have lost their faith in Marxism. What keeps the Soviets on the offensive? The quest for power. They still believe in the power religion, even if they have lost faith in the details of Marxism-Leninism. In contrast, the West is in the process of adopting the escape religion.

Solzhenitsyn has sounded the warning, but no one in Washington's highest circles has heeded it: "This is very dangerous for one's view of the world when this feeling comes on: 'Go ahead, give it up.' We already hear voices in your country and in the West - 'Give up Korea and we will live quietly. Give up Portugal, of course; give up Japan, give up Israel, give up Taiwan, the Philippines, Malaysia, Thailand, give up 10 more African countries. Just let us live in peace and quiet. Just let us drive our big cars on our splendid highways; just let us play tennis and golf, in peace and quiet; just let us mix our cocktails in peace and quiet as we are accustomed to doing; just let us see the beautiful toothy smile with a glass in hand on every advertisement page of our magazines.' "2

This is the mentality of slaves. It is God's curse on covenantally rebellious people to allow them to become enslaved. This was God's message to Israel and Judah: "Disobey Me, and I will send Assyria and Babylonia to enslave you." If Christians want deliverance, it can come only through a new form of servitude: service to God. It must come from leaders who stand fearless before men because they are fearful of God.

We no longer have such leaders, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn knows: "Long years of appeasement have invariably entailed the surrender of the West's positions and the bolstering of its adversary. Today we can assess on a global scale the achievement of the West's leading diplomats after 35 years of concerted effort: they have succeeded in strengthening the U.S.S.R. and Communist China in so many ways that only the ideological rift between those two regimes (for which the West can take no credit) still preserves the Western world from disaster. In other words, the survival of the West already depends on factors which are effectively beyond its control.³

The Israelites in the wilderness feared death more than they loved the idea of winning the promised land. What did God give them? Death in the wilderness. If we fear the wrath of men more than God, then God will deliver us into the hands of fearfully wrathful men. We must heed the warning of Jesus: "And do not fear them who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. But rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matthew 10:28).

The Rockefeller Panel on foreign policy correctly assessed what the West needs to survive: "Tenacity of purpose as well as capacity for sacrifice, sustained over a long period, will be needed to meet the present challenge.⁴ Unfortunately for the deal-doing humanists, the West has run out of both: tenacity of purpose and capacity for sacrifice.

The Silent Christian Majority

The Christians of the West have remained silent, generally unaware of what is going on in international relations, unconcerned about it, and unwilling to present the claims of Christ on foreign policy, trade policy, and civil government in general. Christians have been watchmen on the walls who have not recognized that the enemy long ago infiltrated and bought off the leadership of the once-faithful nation, nor do they know what to do, now that the enemy's main army is nearing the gates of the city. They comfort themselves with an obvious illusion: that the morally defeated humanist leaders within the gates know what to do, despite three generations of failure. Christians have sounded no warning for three generations; they have forgotten how to blow the trumpet.

The blood of this civilization is presently on the hands of Christians, who have been too timid, and too unsure of themselves, to propose any alternatives to humanist foreign policy in the name of Christ and in terms of the Bible. God set them on the towers as His representatives to a fallen world, and they have remained silent.

They have thought it only natural that humanists should control every aspect of foreign policy, and that the nation-state should constitute the heart, mind, and soul of international relations. Now a time of vast international crisis lies ahead - military, economic, political, and biological (AIDS).⁵ The banking policies of the West assure us all of a coming economic catastrophe. It can be deferred; it cannot be avoided.⁶

In that day of multiple crises, Christians will not escape unscathed, any more than righteous Hebrews escaped Assyrian and Babylonian captivity. When ungodly men are allowed by the righteous to speak as representatives of a nation (point two of the biblical covenant model), then that nation will eventually experience judgment. There is a cause-and-effect relationship in history between covenantal standards and covenantal judgments.

Christians have defaulted on their responsibilities. They have assumed that covenant-breaking humanists can and should speak for them. They have not cared to see God's covenant publicly affirmed nationally. Thus, the 20th century has been the most bloody century since the Noachic Flood.⁷ It has become the age of totalitarianism, bureaucracy, and massive international tyranny, all in the name of (principle of representation) humanism's false god, the sovereign autonomous people.

The result will be default by the ruling pagans on their responsibilities to the West, the default of Western civil governments on their economic promises to the voters, the default of the commercial banks, and the default of private pension plans. The 20th century has been a century of moral and religious default, and sometime during the lifetimes of most of those who read this book in the 1980s, there will be a default by humanist institutions on a scale unimaginable today.

These looming crises offer hope for Christian reconstruction of a humanist civilization that is on its deathbed. But if Christians default once again, refusing to sacrifice their lives and fortunes for the crown rights of King Jesus in every area of life, then a new dark age of tyranny is the obvious alternative. There is no neutrality. We face these choices today: the kingdom of God on earth or the kingdom of Satan on earth. We face freedom under Christ or the Communist concentration camp. We face life in the Son or death by nuclear annihilation.

As Elijah asked the representatives of the tribes of Israel: How long will you falter between two opinions? If the Lord is God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him" (I Kings 18:21a).

Let us not be like those pragmatic Israelites, who wanted to see on which altar the fire would fall: "But the people answered him not a word (I Kings 18:21b).

Baal or God, humanism or Christ, the kingdom of God or the kingdom of Satan: choose this day whom you will serve. The fire will soon fall, and those who choose wrongly could become living sacrifices in history. Do not defer a decision on the assumption that God will rapture you out of all problems. He did not rapture Israel when the Assyrians came, or Judah when the Babylonians came, or the Greeks when the Turks came. Lenin's spiritual heirs are coming:

"As long as Capitalism and Socialism exist, we cannot live in peace; in the end, one or the other will triumph - a funeral dirge will be sung over the Soviet Republic or over world capitalism.⁸

The battle between two kingdoms rages, yet Christians in the West pretend that it is somehow all very distant, and all very spiritual, confined to distant lands and invisible worlds where angels battle demons beyond the perceptions of men.

The battle is in fact very close - no farther away than six minutes, as the submarine launched missile flies.

Beating Something With Something Better

Christians possess the Bible and the Holy Spirit. They have the law of God and the power of God at their disposal. They have the doctrine of the covenant in all its God-given authority. Yet they ignore all this, and instead proclaim Jesus as Lord of all the Church, but not of all the earth; Jesus as sovereign Master of the family, but not the civil government; Jesus as the Healer of a remnant but not healer of the nations.

They send out missionaries, but not to baptize nations. They send out pamphlets, but not handbooks for exercising godly rule. They send out physicians of the body and the soul, but not of the body politic. They have turned the world over to the devil by default (and sometimes in the name of New Testament theology), and then have vainly sought to persuade the devil's power-holding representatives to allow equal time for Jesus. Why should they allow equal time for Jesus? Does Jesus intend to allow equal time for Satan in eternity?

Christians have denied the covenant. They have denied with all their heart, mind, and soul that Jesus intends them to disciple the nations, including their own nations. They have denied the greatness of the Great Commission.⁹ They understand the consequences of such covenantal failure, but they have hoped in a last-minute rescue by God's cavalry. They have denied the comprehensive redemption offered at Calvary, and instead hope in a supernatural deliverance in the midst of the international failure of Christianity.

Did God intervene miraculously to bail out Jesus as He walked toward Calvary? Did He intervene to save Stephen from the stones of his adversaries (Acts 7)? No. Then why should He bail out today's Christians, who show none of Christ's courage in the face of death, and none of Stephen's taste for verbal confrontation with the Christ-hating rulers of his day?

If God refused to bail out those who, in the midst of crisis, have preached the Church's victory in history, why should He bail out those who, in the fatness provided by modern capitalism, preach the Church's defeat in history? If the Israelites who feared to die in the wilderness all died in the wilderness, and only those two men who were ready to fight from the beginning did survive to enter the land, what can modern Christians expect? A bed of roses? Or lilies on their caskets?

We possess all that is needed to put our enemies to flight. But to do this, we must pick up the spiritual weapons that God has provided. Saul's armor of natural law theory, permanent political pluralism, the myth of neutrality, and anti-covenantalism will not fit us, and if we try to confront Goliath with such armor as our defense, we will lose our heads.

People who live in God's house need to throw stones.

Christian Reconstruction: A Call for Reformation and Revival

By Robert Parsons

Christian Reconstruction is a call to the Church to awaken to its biblical responsibility to revival and the reformation of society. While holding to the priority of individual salvation, Christian Reconstruction also holds that cultural renewal is to be the necessary and expected outworking of the gospel as it progressively finds success in the lives and hearts of men. Christian Reconstruction therefore looks for and works for the rebuilding of the institutions of society according to a biblical blueprint.

Christian Reconstruction is also an attempt to answer the unprecedented threat facing the Church of Jesus Christ in the 20th century resurgence of secular humanism and parallel rise of statism. The state threatens to swallow the Church by such actions such as property taxation, zoning laws, and direct court action, all directly contrary to the Word of God. In one case, a church was taken to court for dismissing a practicing homosexual from its staff. In another, the church was padlocked by police for operating a Christian school without a licensed teacher. This is only the tip of the iceberg; there were several thousand civil cases pending against churches in 1985.

There are two fatal errors facing the Church as it is being called upon to respond to this threat.

Fatal Error #1: Retreat

Retreat is failing to apply the Word of God to society and culture. It seems as though many Christians are guided more by Plato in some aspects of their thinking than by Christ. They tend to deny the application of scripture to the secular. They fail to recognize that every sphere is spiritual and subject to the Word of God.

This shows up in a studied indifference to biblical teaching on civil law, economics, government and other cultural applications. It is pietism as opposed to true piety. There was, for example, little response to the abortion holocaust from the evangelical Church for over 10 years after the 1973 Supreme Court ruling.

Fatal Error #2: Accommodation

Accommodation is misapplying the Word of God in society and culture. This is by far the more subtle error. One glaring example would be "Christian socialism" like that espoused by Ron Sider in Rich Christians In An Age of Hunger. This perspective down plays biblical charity and poor laws (such as gleaning) in favor of the anti-biblical "solution" of government taxation and redistribution of wealth.

By way of contrast, the truly biblical welfare is local, personal, voluntary and usually requires the poor to work (2 Thes. 3:10).

The Christian Reconstruction movement has been raised up by God to awaken the Church to the reality of these two fatal errors.

Christian Reconstruction is a call to return to the vision of the Reformation, where men sought to restructure every sphere of life according to the Word of God. This is true biblical revival. Every example of revival in Scripture extended beyond individual repentance to impact every facet of culture. For example, rediscovery of the Law by King Josiah (2 Kings 22,23) produced a reformation (but not a revival) leading to reconstruction of the entire Hebrew culture. In the New Testament, proclamation of the crown rights of King Jesus resulted in changes to all life, it being said that the world had been turned upside down (Acts 17).

The Foundation:
Sovereignty of God

Christian reconstruction rests on one solid foundation stone: the sovereignty of God. Sovereignty refers to God's supreme power and rule. His reign and control extends into every sphere of life, here and now, not just in eternity. To defer His Kingship is to deny His Kingship. The Bible contains the directives of the King of kings for every area of human activity, including civil government, economics, art, science, family, church, and more. Activity in each sphere is to be governed by the Law of God, with minimal interference from civil government. There are no neutral zones.

God exercises His sovereignty through many secondary agencies. For example, civil government is responsible to God to bear the sword, executing God's wrath against violators of His Law. The Church, as the depository of the Law of God, is to provide Biblical instruction for every sphere, including civil government. She is not to control civil government, but rather to provide expert legal counsel (Deut.17:8-13). Many of her sons are expected to assume the mantle of civil leadership.

Resting on the foundation of God's sovereignty, four vital pillars support the Christian Reconstruction movement:

Pillar #1: Redemption

This is the sovereignty of God in salvation. All men are disobedient and worthy of eternal separation from God in Hell. But Jesus Christ, the perfect man, died as a substitute for sinners. Because Christ shed His blood in their stead, God justly pardons everyone who believes the Gospel, granting them eternal life. This is called justification (Rom. 6:23).

Justification is accomplished entirely by the grace and mercy of God. Sinful man, being totally depraved, is utterly dependent on the provision of God for salvation, including the ears to hear and even the faith to believe the Gospel. Salvation does not rest primarily on the "decision" of a particular man for God, but rather on God's decision to save that particular man. Jesus said: "Ye have not chosen Me, but I have chosen you ..." (John 15:16).

Pillar #2: Law of God

Christian Reconstruction upholds the authority of the Law of God in every sphere of society. This is the sovereignty of God in ethics. 1 Tim. 1:8 implies a lawful and an unlawful use of the Law of God. It is unlawful to seek acceptance with God by trying to obey the Law of God, the ceremonial law, or any manmade additions to the Law. We are justified by faith alone (Ephesians 2:8). On the other hand, man must look to the Law of God as his guide for holy living and civil statutes. The perfect standard of the Law shows us how we are to live, how far short we fall and how much we need a Savior.

"We know that the law is good if anyone uses it lawfully" (1 Tim. 1:8).

Unlawful Uses of the Law:

1. Salvation by Works
2. Sacrificial Observances (Gal. 3:24)
3. Manmade Traditions Added to the Law (Mk. 7:7ff.)

Lawful Uses of the Law:

1. Guide for Life
2. Convict of Sin (Rom. 3:20)
3. Civil Use (1 Timothy 1:8,9)

Therefore, "not under the law" means that we are no longer condemned by the Law of God since we are justified by faith. It does NOT mean we are no longer ethically and morally bound to obey Old Testament law. Legalism results from a misapplication of God's moral Law or from traditions added to the Law. Simple childlike obedience to the Law of God does NOT equal legalism.

The faulty interpretive principle of Old Testament law is to assume the the Old Testament is invalid unless confirmed by the New Testament.

The faithful interpretive principle is to assume that the Old Testament is valid and still in effect unless specifically changed by the New Testament.

Covenantal shifts have occurred in areas such as sacrificial laws, ceremonial laws, Sabbath laws, dietary laws and agricultural laws. 1 Timothy 1:9 goes on to list a category of civil crimes that the Law of God is to restrain under the New Covenant: murder, kidnapping, adultery, perjury, etc. Therefore, one useful use of the Law of God is to restrain evil doers in society.

The theological name for this approach is "theonomy," from the Greek words "theos" meaning God and "nomos" meaning law. When men reject the Law of God as a standard, they are left with autonomy (self-law). This takes many forms, including common sense, pluralism, natural law, democracy (law of the people), and statutory law. The result of rejecting God's absolutes is always chaos.

When the Church rejects God's Law, it usually adopts what it calls the "law of love" in its place as the guide to action. Often this is a love devoid of content, that exalts unity over truth to avoid confrontation. But true biblical love goes hand in hand with the Law. Jesus said, "If you love me, you will keep my commandments" (John 14:15,21). By rejecting the standard of God's Law, the Church has nothing of substance to offer the world and becomes irrelevant.

Pillar #3: Presuppositionalism

Presuppositionalism is the self-sufficiency of an authoritative Bible. This is the sovereignty of God in revelation. Presuppositionalism defines our approach to the sovereign Word of God. Too often Christians try to "prove" the Bible to the natural man by presenting evidences from creation or logic. They assume the problem is merely intellectual and that belief will flow naturally from an airtight presentation of the facts.

But the Bible says that natural man willfully suppresses the truth (Rom. 2:15). The problem is not, therefore, a lack of evidence, but the basic tendency to set oneself up as the ultimate judge of truth. The heart of Eve's sin lay in exalting herself as the judge of what God had said. (Gen. 3:5,6).

These presuppositions radically alter our approach to the non-believer. If our defense of the faith consists solely of presenting evidences to his supposed independent reason, we are simply encouraging his independence. Instead of a focus on persuasion with facts and logic, Christian Reconstruction challenges the natural man, who presumes himself to be the ultimate judge of truth. The sword of the Spirit does not need to be proved, it needs to be used. We presuppose that the sword of the Spirit will penetrate the hearts of natural men knowing that the Law of God in their hearts confirms its truth.

Pillar #4: Assurance of Earthly Victory

This is the sovereignty of God in history. The Bible insists that God's Law is to hold full sway in every sphere of earthly activity, in history as well as eternity (Mat. 6:10). God's sovereignty ensures it will hold sway. He has commanded His Church to carry His gospel ("teaching them to observe all things" - Matt. 28:20 includes God's Law) to the nations. He has given us power for this task. The only hindrance is a faithless Church that can only see giants in the promised land of earthly victory.

Some Christians say God has turned world rulership over to Satan until the second coming of Christ. But this denies God's explicit claim to ownership (Ps. 24:1) and the decisive work of Christ in destroying the power of the devil (Col. 2:15, 1 Jn. 3:8).

This view overlooks the various meanings of the word "world" (Compare John 3:16 with 1 John 2:15). Satan may be the god of the world system that opposes God, but to grant him a sovereignty that belongs to God alone borders on blasphemy.

In The American Covenant, Marshall Foster observes that the implications of which view you hold are profound:

If you see God as ruling the earth:

1. Your commission is to subdue the earth and build Christian nations through evangelizing and discipleship.
2. You see Christian culture to be the only acceptable culture and you see all others as aberrations.
3. All of God's world is holy and every activity in life is a religious activity to be seen as a spiritual work for God.
4. Reformation is expected.

If you see Satan as ruling the earth:

1. You must just concentrate on saving souls from this evil world.
2. You see Christian culture as a counter-culture, a persecuted minority in an evil world.
3. Church activity is primary and spiritual, while worldly pursuits are secular and to be dealt with only as a necessity.
4. Reformation is impossible and suspect, since things must get worse before Christ returns.

The above dichotomy illustrates the importance of ideas in determining consequences, because to the degree Christians have abdicated their leadership role and denied the "crown rights of Jesus Christ," to that degree the humanists have filled the void.

In summation, Christian Reconstruction is the only view that biblically answers the question of how Christians should relate to their culture.

Not RETREAT, that fails to apply the Bible to the problems of society (Fatal Error #1).

Not ACCOMMODATION, that misapplies the Bible to endorse various forms of humanism (Fatal Error

#2).

But RECONSTRUCTION according to the Law of God.

Individual salvation is the necessary priority, but Christian Reconstruction teaches that cultural renewal is an expected outworking of the Gospel. When Jesus said "make disciples of all nations," He meant it literally. The very cultural/govern-mental fabric of the nations is to be transformed by the preservative effect of their Christian citizens. This is the vision of the Reformers, the Puritans and the Pilgrims. This is the vision that we must rekindle anew today.

Peril on Oak's Mountain

By Nathan Middleton

2/93

ONCE UPON A TIME, THERE WAS A large and beautiful mountain. It was the envy of all the other mountains. Everyone who saw it was enamored by it's strength and majesty. There have been many mountains through the ages, some even larger than this one, but somehow, this mountain stood out among them all. In fact, mountain dwellers everywhere streamed to it to live while still others sought to copy its forms and structure and apply it to their mountain homeland. It was truly magnificent.

But there was one special and often overlooked characteristic of this mountain that made it unique. For rooted throughout the entire mountain landscape was a forest. But not just any forest. For this was an oak forest with deep roots and huge trunks; they were strong, resilient and tall - giving all who lived on the mountain protection and a deep abiding sense of security.

But then one day, one of the mountain dwellers said to one another, "You know, it sure would be nice if some of these trees were out of the way. For I love to frolic and play on the mountain and I'm sick and tired of the confining limitations these trees impose." Well soon, many more mountain dwellers began to agree. And they found themselves discussing all the many things they could not or felt should not do because of the forboding presence of the forest. And the more they talked about it, the more angry they became and soon began to despise the centuries old forest.

And so they began to consider ways to begin to remove the oak from the mountain. And they began to implement their ideas with little or no success at first. Patches of trees were removed here and there, but as a whole the forest was still strong and vibrant. But soon, the disgruntled mountain dwellers became quite adept at tree removal and the planting of a new species of trees that were smaller and more flexible - what became known as the "tolerant" species - to allow for the fun and frolic that became their just cause. And they gave convincing proofs to many other mountain dwellers to join in the advancement of their cause, creating strong alliances and coalitions, forming protests and even organizing lawsuits and boycotts against the mountain dwellers who sought to protect the forest any way.

And before too long, for the first time in mountain history, the strong protective oak foliage no longer dominated the landscape. In fact, many of the mountain dwellers scorned those who dared even consider the great mountain by what they now considered its archaic name - Oak's Mountain. Little thought was given to the consequences of this massive movement. "After all, our cause is just," said the mountain dwellers.

That is until one day. For a common rainstorm came, as they do to all mountains and just as it had come to the former great oak forest countless times before. But this time a strange thing happened. Violent landslide erosions were being triggered by the storm. This had never occurred before even when the scattered patches of oaks were removed. Unfortunately, the "tolerant" species of tree roots lacked the strength and depth that the oaks possessed and therefore could not stop the erosion. And the mountain dwellers were "stumped" for the answer as to how to stop it.

Interestingly, the mountain dwellers had so convinced themselves of the justice of their cause to remove the forest that they could not accept the true reason for the massive, consistent and gradual erosion. And so, not understanding the "root" cause, they just got used to the erosion. And then ultimately, one day, quite unnoticeably, the great, strong, majestic, enviable mountain had so eroded to become just like all the other mountains - groping for aid, strength and security it once gave to others.

"Righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people"

The Risk-Free Life

by Rousas John Rushdoony

It was shortly after World War II that I encountered the demand for an end to baseball playing by grade-school children. It was too competitive, said some angry women liberals; it was too individualistic, they complained, and a boy at bat, or catching a fly ball, had too much concentrated and isolated responsibility placed upon him. Such a game, it was said, could have traumatic consequences. The women were also against losing; they said defeat could be dangerous for some children.

They did not stop to think that there can be no victory where there is no possibility of defeat. It also did not occur to them that the more competitive a group game is, the more cooperation it demands for winning. As for traumatic effects, it is true that defeat can be traumatic for some, but to eliminate the possibility of victory is truly deadly.

It is true that the fear of defeat can be traumatic for a coward, but why encourage the coward in us all by eliminating risks? The risk-free life is a victory-free life. It means a life-long surrender to defeat, and nothing can be more deadly for man and society.

The lust for a risk-free life is all around us. It governs politics all over the world. Its logic leads to the world of Marxism, where the removal of the risks of failure for some means failure for all. An economy guaranteed against failure is an economy ensured against success.

All too often today men want to start with a guaranteed success, not with risks. As a result, we have in increasing evidence fraudulent successes, i.e., insider trading, artificially inflated stocks, and much much more. The goal in all these dishonest activities is success without risk.

The risk-free life, however, is a deadly illusion. Freedom always involves risks. Eliminate the risks of freedom and you thereby establish slavery and defeat. But risk is still not eliminated! If the risks of freedom are banned, the risks of tyranny are ensured. Slave- labor camps represent a higher risk in the U.S.S.R. than do the risks in a free society. But this is not all.

The Soviet military intelligence, GRU, for example, has a high risk factor to ensure performance. Anyone entering the GRU knows from the beginning that, if he disobeys or fails in even minor ways, he will be cremated alive in punishment. (Viktor Suvorov: Inside the Aquarium, pp. 2f., 93, 162, 190, 233, 237, 239f. New York, NY: Macmillan, 1986) In every aspect of the risk-free" life in the Soviet Union, the risks of slavery make pale by comparison those risks which freedom requires.

Unhappily, throughout the Western world, the risks of freedom are highly unpopular. It is not an accident that capitalists and unions alike live monopolies and subsidies: they fear risks. In state after state in the U.S., gerrymandering by Republicans and Democrats serves towards ensuring their control of the political machinery and eliminating risks of defeat.

In whatever the sphere of action, those in power are most opposed to risk, because it can bring about defeat for them. The establishment uses its power to lessen risk for itself as a necessary step towards retaining power. After all, revolutions are made by those out of power who are seeking power!

But there is more, much more. Those who have the most to lose are those least prone to risks and to bold actions. Remember that the bold, enterprising and innovative work that went into the birth of computers came from young outsiders. Most of the bold entrepreneurial action of the post-war years has come from new-comers. The major corporations have declined or stagnated, and their "gains" have come from buying out the new men. Bankers favor such loans, because banks invest usually in established success, which means that banks invest in the past.

Today, in the U.S. and elsewhere, the major political forces are made up of well-established and powerful men. These are men who have the most to lose and hence the least to venture apart from money. Given the liberal establishment of the U.S., it is not surprising that the Democrats command the most wealth in their ranks. The number of wealthy men ready to risk the wrath of the powers that be is very few, and they are under attack. Power always draws the strongest support.

The Republicans, however, are no different; power is always concerned with power, not risk. The conservatives also play the same game. In order to create a movement to win the country over to their cause, conservatives create groups of powerful men, and thereby sentence themselves to impotence, because they have created an alliance, council, or organization of men who have too much to lose to be bold. The result is sterility, and such groups become as effectual on the national scene as a ladies' sewing circle.

It was no accident that the major political and social impact of recent years came from student movements. These student groups were sometimes chaotic, disorganized, and highly foolish, but their total impact was remarkably great. They had little to lose and hence were ready to lose it. Their causes were far more important to them than any penalties that risks would involve.

In the U.S., since Dorr's Rebellion and the Whisky Rebellion to the present, the risk-takers have commonly been foolish and have shown a talent for courting defeat. On the other hand, the established power groups have uniformly drifted into disasters because all their efforts have gone to keeping power, not towards creating a harmonious society.

Elsewhere, the men like Cassius, men of envy, hatred, and enmity, have overthrown by revolution their hated power brokers, only to become far worse instruments of power. They have taken risks, but only for evil ends.

It is thus important to examine the full implications of a risk-free world. Risks are inescapable, and we face either the risks of freedom, or the risks of tyranny. But risks rest on a world order beyond man and society. We are born into a world of risks, because we face the risk of death from the moment of our birth. Men may imagine it, but they cannot abolish the risk of death from this world.

This is not all. There is also the fact of moral risk. From Day One of creation, man faced moral risk, and death, if he partook of the forbidden fruit (Genesis 2:17). Risk was built into paradise, and it is certainly very much a part of our fallen world.

To dream of a risk-free world is to imagine a creation without hell, and also without heaven. It means the denial of any moral antithesis in creation. If there is no good nor evil in the universe, then there can be no heaven nor hell. This involves denying the reality of justice. Justice rests on the premise that it matters to God and to the very being of creation that good prevail and that evil perish.

From my earliest days, one of the resounding verses of scripture for me has been Judges 5:20, from the Song of Deborah: "They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Justice is written into every atom of creation, and justice is inescapable. To deny hell is to deny justice. As Emory Storrs observed years ago, "When hell drops out of religion, justice drops out of politics." One can add that, when hell is denied as a reality and place, hell reappears as world-wide injustice and evil. Earth then becomes hell because the reality and finality of justice is denied.

To deny hell is to insist that life must be without moral risks. When churches become antinomian, they quickly then downplay the fact of hell because it emphasizes the ultimacy of God's law and justice. To deny hell is to deny the reality of morality and justice and to affirm a cosmic relativism. The fact of hell is our reassurance of cosmic justice.

But there is more. If we seek to eliminate risk from life and society, and to eliminate hell from eternity, we also eliminate the Sabbath rest and heaven. The Sabbath rest is meaningless apart from salvation. The Sabbath is a covenant fact, a celebration of salvation (hence, the Passover dates the weekly Old Testament rest, and the Resurrection the weekly New Testament rest). If there is no salvation, there is no rest. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked" (Isaiah 57:21).

Paul tells us, that our "Labour is not in vain in the Lord" (I Corinthians 15:58). He does not say that it is risk-free. In fact, Paul is able to catalogue the risks he took by preaching the gospel, and the penalties he suffered: imprisonment, beatings, stonings, shipwreck, and much, much more. What he does tell us is that the moral risks have their certainty of reward because God's law and justice govern all creation.

It was after the end of World War II that our child-centered, risk-free culture began to predominate. Today's newspaper carried a story about the growth of criminal activity among children under 10 years of age; one police officer expressed his dismay at the evil dispositions and vicious street knowledge of such children. This should not surprise us. Children who have been spared the trauma of punishment are taught thereby that justice does not exist. It is still true, "He that spareth his rod hateth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes" (Proverbs 13:24). We teach our children that there is no justice if we do not punish them.

The dream of a risk-free life is an evil dream, because it is in essence a denial of causality; it is an insistence that cause and effect do not exist, and it is a denial that "the wages of sin is death" (Romans 6:23).

It is also a denial of justice, because it rejects the fact that life involves inescapable moral judgments and risks.

The dream of a risk-free life is closely related to the pornographic imagination. Pornography gives man a world which is an imaginary one, one in which moral consequences are totally absent, and a world in which all things revolve around the individual's desires. Real people are lacking in the world of pornography; the evil imagination runs riot and re-orders all things to suit itself. Risks are removed from pornography in order to satiate without limitations the evil imagination.

The only risk-free world is in the evil imaginations of men: it has no substance nor reality. It cannot exist in the real world. Those who dream of a risk-free life are sooner or later, all losers.

The Attitude of the Godly Towards God's Enemies

By Andrew Sandlin

"Do I not hate them, O LORD, that hate Thee?"
- Psalm 139:21

This statement by David, as well as scores of others in Scripture, including several significant ones made by Paul, no doubt sounds strange - perhaps even offensive to the ears of many modern believers. The apostle in one instance says: "If any man preach another gospel than ye have received, let him be accursed" (Gal. 1:9). The idea of a Christian's hating not only wickedness but wicked people is largely incompatible with the religious sentimentalism pervasive in modern Western Christianity epitomized in the popular but spurious expression, "Love the sinner; hate the sin."

It is plausible to assume that this sentimentalism can to a certain degree be attributed to the influence of theological liberalism.¹ A sentimental attitude toward God's enemies does not square with Biblical precedent. If we imitate the example of God and His people as revealed in Scripture, our disposition toward the wicked must be much more austere.

This attitude does not refer to mankind in general; it refers to the overtly wicked and vicious individuals whose actions destroy lives and damn souls - that is those who are actively seeking to subvert the kingdom of God.

Our Attitude Toward The Wicked

For example, the martyred saints in heaven petition God with regard to their murderers, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" (Rev 6:10). I suspect that many Christians today would have responded, "Lord, don't harm these your wicked enemies; give them time to be saved. Don't be cruel to them." The apostle John observed that "much people in heaven" rejoiced at the utter destruction of the vile Babylon (Rev 19:1-3). The utter destruction of an evil society, such as Nazi Germany, or the death of a cruel dictator such as Mao or Saddam Hussein, ought to be an occasion of praise and gladness, as it was for the saints as in recorded in Revelation 19.

Defective view of God. In many cases, one supposes, Christians' queasiness over the proposal of God's judgment of the wicked flows from their defective view of God Himself. Because God is a perfectly balanced Being, His attributes are equally ultimate. He is equally a God of kindness and justice, mercy and judgment, love and hate.² It is not our discretion to conform God to our distorted image; we must accept Him as He has revealed Himself in His Word.

Prayer for Judgment on the Wicked

While Scripture affords clear examples of dedicated believers who remonstrated with God to delay or withdraw impending judgment on His own people (e.g. Abraham for Lot, Moses for Israel), it is equally reticent about any such appeal on behalf of the heathen and the wicked on the part of God's people. All to the contrary, the obvious and frequent examples display God's children as actually invoking God's wrath on the heathen. The imprecatory Psalms³ contain petitions by David and others for God to harm and destroy wicked individuals. These are called imprecatory Psalms because an imprecation is a calling down of God's curse. Paul's imprecations recorded in Galatians 1:7-9 and implied in 5:12 parallel the psalmist's imprecations.

As Revelation 19:2 makes clear, those who rejoice at the demise of God's enemies are impelled by a desire to uphold the righteous judgment of God. That is, they're more concerned with God's justice and righteousness than they are with the welfare of wicked individuals. They are careful not to reverse the order of the first and the second great commandments: loving God with all of one's heart and then loving one's neighbor as oneself.

What are the sentimentalists really saying?

What sentimentalists are really saying when they balk at praying for God's judgment upon evil individuals is that they are uneasy about a cause and effect relationship between sin and judgment. If we hate the evil, vicious results of pornographers, abortionists and cultists, yet we simultaneously shrink from requesting God's judgment on the perpetrators, we are really saying that we dislike or disfavor a world in which judgment follows sin.

When sentimentalists concede that they yearn for a world in which judgment is the consequence to be delayed until the final judgment, what they are really saying then is that they are willing to sustain all of the evil results of the vile individuals. This would necessarily accompany a desire for God to delay His judgment because of the sentimentalists' queasiness over God's judging wicked people. In other words, they prefer homosexuality, dismembered infants, and child molestation to God's judge homosexuals, abortionists, and child molesters.

The pattern of the Biblical saints is different: the prayers of God's saints for His judgment on the wicked implore Him to act immediately, without delay (Psalms 79:5,6; Rev. 6:10). They despise the horrid results of evil workers and know that those results will be cut off as soon as the evil workers themselves are cut off.

Judgment as grace. They are aware, as we should be, that judgment is a form of grace, just as grace is a form of judgment. God executed His judgment upon Christ in order that He may extend His grace to us. (2 Cor. 5:21). Similarly, God extends His grace to His people (and mankind in general) when He destroys the wicked, because in destroying the wicked, He is averting their evil works that so plague God's children and mankind in general.

Isaiah knew the truth of which sentimental Christians are ignorant: "Let favor be shown to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness" (26:10); yet, "when Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness" (26:9). God's judgment - not His favor - leads the world to righteousness. We should petition God's judgment on the wicked because judgment is a form of grace.

"Up" With Imprecations⁴

It is not unreasonable to assume, therefore, that the terrible moral and spiritual plight the Western world is presently suffering is due partially to the sentimental attitude of the Christian Church. They are like citizens in a democracy who castigate the politicians but who neglect to vote. They hate perversion, abortion, and cults, but they are too queasy and sentimental to pray for God to judge perverts, abortionists, and cultists. They suffer from a sort of irrationality that accompanies those who refuse to affirm and perform the whole counsel of God.

Worse, no doubt some of them are reluctant to practice imprecatory praying because they believe that increased evil is a precursor to the Lord's return. In other words, they enjoy the spread of evil because it indicates that the Lord is coming soon - "Yes, things are pretty bad; but praise God for the increased murder of infants, spread of AIDS, and molestation of children, because that means Jesus' coming is right around the corner."

If that attitude seems perverse to you, that's because it is.

When we hate God's enemies (not our own [Mt. 5:44]), we demonstrate our love for God (Psalms 139:19-22). When we cry out to God to judge speedily the wicked, we are expressing our hatred for the harmfulness of evil deeds and our desire that they be frustrated (Rev. 6:9-11).

We must be certain that it is God's enemies, not our own whom we hate (Ps. 139:21,22); and we must be sure our own hearts are clean in the sight of God (vv. 23,24).

If we love God and hate evil, we should hate His enemies and pray that they, and consequently their evil works, be judged.

³ See Psalms 7, 35, 55, 58, 59, 69, 79, 109, 137, 139.

⁴ Imprecations are defined as: prayerfully uttered curses on God's enemies. Fortunately, imprecatory prayer is experiencing a revival among Bible-believers; see Bill Hall, "Imprecatory Prayer," Faith For The Family, March, 1981, 10-14; Editorial [Bob Jones], idem., p.2; Gary North, When Justice Is Aborted, 90-94.

A Model for Reformation

Based in part on an interview with Andrew Sandlin, editor of Chalcedon Report
2/94

Today we have a situation where the civil magistrates will not uphold the law of God. At some point it may become necessary for Christians to institute a competitive government to bring lasting reformation. This would be similar to what happened in the time of John Knox, Oliver Cromwell or at the time of the American Revolution when the colonists broke away from England by electing a Continental Congress.

But to have reformation in society first there needs to be reformation in the Church. We can't undo 150 years of antinomianism (anti-Biblical Law position) in the Church in two or three years. It has to be done incrementally. Ultimately, the Church believes not in revolution but in regeneration and reformation. That is not to say that revolution in all circumstances is wrong. We certainly need to take the intermediate steps first. Any idea of violence or revolution should be the last resort. But it is something that we cannot rule out.

Instituting a competitive or shadow government, something similar to the British model under Oliver Cromwell, is an excellent idea. If there ever came a time of a great monumental national disaster, it would be wise to be prepared for that. But most Christians are not adequately prepared for that because of a faulty theology. Even so, it is something that we need to be thinking about. The shadow government could begin to issue various statements in opposition to the ruling power. For instance, if a president of the United States signs executive orders supporting fetal tissue research, the Christian commonwealth could issue a proclamation stating disagreement.

The steps toward declaring an alternate shadow government are enormous tasks. First, there has to be greater unity in the Church. We would do that not by getting rid of distinctives but by establishing the bare minimum distinctives which would be based on orthodoxy found in the councils and creeds of the early Church. Councils or presbyteries could be formed on the basis of Church covenants between local churches in specific regions. All churches could work together from Baptist, to Reformed, to Methodist, to whoever affirmed the core elements of Christianity.

Second, a national synod could be called. A number of representatives from each group could be sent. The idea would be to get together and discuss the platform, the goals of the new Christian republic and then elect representatives. But first there is the strong necessity of unity on the basis of orthodoxy. Unity is necessary before we can have this kind of shadow government.

Holding ecclesiastical courts could be a prerequisite to instituting a shadow government. We could begin by issuing proclamations to the leaders of the country and to people who are involved in the abortion industry. The proclamations would state that they are in violation of the moral Law of God by promoting child killing. They would be called upon to repent or suffer the wrath of God.

The filing of these "covenantal lawsuits" presupposes that the Church has specifically endowed power from the Lord according to Matthew 16:19 that "whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven." The Church is an earthly extension of the heavenly throne room. When we are operating according to the word of God and we make declarations, they mean something - not just here but in heaven. We are saying that we are the Church of God and authority is given to us here on earth because authority has also been given to us in heaven. John the Baptist shook his finger in the face of the king and said, "It is not lawful for you to have her" (Matthew 14:4). The Church needs to do that as well.

John Knox, in his book The Reformation of Scotland, outlined model without which the British model of government under Oliver Cromwell never would have been possible. Knox discovered the biblical process by which a monarch might be deposed; Cromwell implemented it. They were so covenantal in their thinking that they recognized that civil government is based on a covenant between the magistrate (or the representative or king) and the populace. The view was that when the magistrate defects from the covenant, it is the duty of the people to overthrow him. There is definitely an association between Knox and Cromwell. When Charles I was beheaded, the understanding was that he had broken faith with the people. Their view was that when the magistrate breaks faith, then he may legitimately be deposed.

The Puritan view of the relationship between the Church and the State was the foundation for the American colonial view of government. This was true of Massachusetts and Connecticut and to a lesser extent in the Southern colonies. When the Mayflower Compact was written, the Pilgrims had a covenantal idea of the nature of civil government. This was a foundation for later colonies established throughout the 1600s. These covenants were influenced by what Knox had done in Scotland and what the Puritans had done in England.

We can also look at Puritan America and the colonists as laying the foundation for issuing the Declaration of Independence to King George III in 1776. Although it is true that there was a strong deistic influence at the time of the signing of the Declaration, there is no question that there were the residual effects of strong Puritan influence. The American Revolution could not have occurred without the 150-year-old Puritan foundation in America.

Then we need to understand the Jeffersonian distinction between Church and State. The idea of "separation of Church and State" is very misleading. It is not a constitutional phrase but it came afterward in the writings of Jefferson. The Church and the State are separate spheres of government. Separation of Church and State does not mean separation of the State from God. The issue is not whether the Church should intrude on the State's affairs. The Church should not. Neither should the State intrude on the Church's affairs. But God has a right to interfere in the affairs of both. Civil government is not secular; it still stands under the law of God.

With this whole groundswell of political conservatism in the Church, we also need to have a revival of the Puritan idea of the authority of the law of God. Of course, that needs to begin in the churches. But our age is an antinomian age. When Paul says, "For you are not under law, but under grace" (Romans 6:14), for so long that has been interpreted to mean that the law does not have any effect on our lives. But Paul was saying that the law was not over us in a sentence of death because we have been justified. We do not adhere to the law as a basis for justification. But after we are saved, the law is the standard of individual sanctification, ecclesiastical sanctification, social sanctification and political sanctification. The Church has to understand and preach the law of God as the only standard.

What we are seeing today in the groundswell of Christian conservative activism is an instinctive flailing of the arms back and forth. We know that abortion on demand is prominent and then falsely believe that our society is under satanic rulership. But we need to have a long term, principled, theological response to the situation. The Puritan covenantal understanding of the law of God can provide that.

In the meantime, we need to keep pressing our advantage. The Church should begin by making public declarations against sin in our society. We must declare the areas in which the civil government has violated the moral Law of God. And we must do this fearlessly. The gates of hell shall not prevail against the Church.

If I were to subvert a culture ...

By Andrew Sandlin

If I were given the ignoble task of subverting a culture, I have a fair idea of what my agenda would be.

First, I would trivialize its religion. Since religion is an essential ingredient of culture (the word's very root betrays its indissoluble link to religion), I would assure that the civil government discouraged religion by banning it from any place in government itself, and especially in education. I would be shrewd however. I would not state plainly I was trying to eliminate the traditional religion; instead I would appeal to the fact that civil government should not be in the religion-promoting business in the first place. If schools in this culture were the province of the government rather than of private citizens, I could excise religion much more easily.

I would argue loudly that the rights of children would be violated if some were forced to watch others pray or talk about their religion. I would declare in the most altruistic and moral tones that religion has its place in church and nowhere else. Since youth are more moldable than adults, I am convinced this tactic would be especially effective. In this way I would convince naive but fair minded people that I was being neutral, when in reality, I would be using neutrality as a guise to promote my hidden agenda. In the literature and acting of that culture I would depict the culture's traditional religion and its followers as hypocritical, bumbling and unsophisticated. I would render it likely that the youth would consider the traditional religion a panacea for foolish old women and emasculated men, the mentally and emotionally unstable.

Next, I would sever the foundational associations of the culture, voluntary or otherwise, since these, like religion, are the adhesive that holds cultures together. I would devalue the importance of the idea of family in that culture. I would assert that nobody has a right to say which family is the "right" family, all the while knowing I was concerned only that one sort of family, the traditional one, be weakened or destroyed.

I would try to transfer the dependence on the traditional family for livelihood in difficult financial times and in old age to the civil government, which I would increasingly control. I would make it easy for families to break up by keeping the members away from each other most of the day and by allowing one parent to renege on the marital oath for the most trivial reasons. I would persuade the citizens that they themselves, and not their children, are most important, and that they should entrust the bothersome children to the daily care of me and my subversive friends, who would ceaselessly inculcate into the children's tractable minds our own subversive ideas.

Afterward, I would undermine the money system of the culture by stressing instant gratification and government interference. I would convince the citizens of the culture that wealth and possessions are the most important things in life, and that they can have both before they earn them by work. I would encourage them to borrow wealth and possessions on the promise to pay back the lenders, and then push the citizens to borrow beyond what they can reasonably repay. I would do this quite easily by displaying a certain "standard of living" as normative, inciting peer pressure to cause the recalcitrant to conform if they are to expect to be treated as "normal."

I would assure that the government, in addition, spends more money than it raises by taxation. The way I would accomplish this would be by persuading the government leaders to promise free wealth, possessions and services to the citizens (who would already be satisfied with nothing less than more wealth and possessions) if the citizens would let them become (or remain) leaders. As a result, the citizenry is tied to debt by leaders who must spend into debt in order to please them. Consequently both the citizens and the government would suffer from severe debt.

Then I would insist to the leaders that the only way to survive debt would be to inflate the currency even more so citizens could pay off some debts, an action that would make debtors happy but creditors and investors angry since money invested and lent loses value just like money owed. Investors would have no incentive to reinvest. This factor would eventually and inevitably cause the economy to collapse.

Then I would debase the arts, a staple of culture. I would convince artists it is chic to compose or perform senseless, nihilistic works of art. I would insist they deal with cheap, bawdy and sensual themes, calculated to drive the youth to both fantasy and despair. I would do everything imaginable to obscure the traditional music of the culture. By various media I would have performers display bizarre behavior and tout it everywhere as normal. This would cause people to abandon the type of living that shaped the culture in the first place.

Finally, I would encourage all forms of countercultural deportment, especially countercultural morals and defy anyone to restrict me. If they did, I would accuse them of trying to limit freedom. I would use freedom as a means to subvert freedom. I would appeal to noble themes like freedom and equality in order to crush freedom and equality and enthrone my own subversive agenda. For instance, under the guise of personal freedom I would restrict the freedom of local areas to legislate against moral evils in their community, evils whose proliferation would enhance the subversion of the culture.

Moreover, under the guise of economic freedom I would limit the freedom of some citizens by confiscating their property in order to limit the freedom of other citizens by keeping them dependent on the government for subsistence. Under the guise of equality I would render the culture radically unequal by tipping economic advantage in favor of those who are likely to preserve my subversive program and shouting down those who appeal for equal time against my agenda. I would operate allegedly on the assumption that all are deserving of the policies of equality, but some are more equally deserving than others.

Gratifyingly, attempts of such subversion are highly unlikely to happen in our United States.

The Church in our generation needs reformation, revival and constructive revolution.... There cannot be true revival unless there has been reformation; and reformation is not complete without revival.

Imprecatory Prayer: Enforcing the Covenant of God

By Ray Sutton

"I will drive them out before you little by little, until you become fruitful and possess the land."
- Exodus 23:30

How do we establish a society based on the biblical covenant? This question needs to be raised because there is some confusion about how a Christian society is created. Covenantal culture cannot come from the top-down, meaning by some "theocratic elite" forcing everyone to be a Christian, or believe a certain way. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

God told the Israelites that their biblical culture would come "little by little." It did not come suddenly, or overnight. It came gradually. The covenantal society can only come the same way. That is, if it is to survive, it must come from the bottom-up. Sure, the covenant structure can be implemented in the home and established in the church. But its fulfillment in society-at-large will be much more difficult. It can only successfully come about (and stick), if it takes hold at the grass-roots level through evangelism.

The expansion of the Gospel from Jerusalem to Rome serves as an example. Jesus says at the beginning of Acts, "You shall receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you; and you shall be My witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in Judea and Samaria, and even to the remotest parts of the earth" (Acts 1:8). This verse summarizes the spread of the Gospel from one part of the world to the rest. It began in Jerusalem, and ended up in Rome. The method was little-by-little evangelism, just like the land of Canaan.

Yes, Acts parallels the book of Joshua. Joshua is the account of the conquest of the land; Acts is the story of the conquest of the world. But there is one striking contrast. Joshua took the land by use of the sword, even though it played a secondary role. None of the Apostles used the sword to spread the Gospel. Why the difference? Joshua, although a type of Jesus Christ, was under the Old Covenant. The Old Covenant was a covenant of the flesh, graphically portrayed in the sacrament of circumcision. And, if anything, the Old Testament teaches that the kingdom of God could not be established in the flesh, meaning by the sword.

The garden of Eden was sealed off by a "flaming sword" (Gen. 3:24), prohibiting reentrance. Man could not return to that particular garden by a carnal weapon because his sword could not stand against God's. Even David, a great man of God, was unsuccessful in creating God's kingdom. He was a man of war, so he was not allowed to build the Temple (1 Kings 5:3). When the disciples asked Jesus, "Lord, is it at this time that You are restoring the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts 1:6), they were expressing their confusion about the nature of the kingdom of God. They still thought it would be a political order, that is, a kingdom established by the sword.

They were wrong. The next verses in Acts speak of a new regime. The New Covenant kingdom is created by the spirit. God had conquered Jericho by His might, to be sure. But the Holy Spirit had not come in all of His historical fulness. Christ had not yet come in history. Israel needed to use the sword, but Israel ultimately failed. The Church succeeded. In Acts, the Spirit of God went forth and created the beginnings of a Christian world from the bottom-up.

The instrument the Spirit used was evangelism, witnessing. The role of the witness is twofold. Positively, he stands before men and the courts of the world, and he testifies of the Resurrected and Living Christ. Peter, John, Stephen, and Paul all became witnesses in the courts of man. Indeed, Acts tells how God sent them before Jewish and Roman courts, and even into prison for this reason. The task of evangelism is the challenge of being a witness in the unbeliever's place of holding court. As we see in Acts, this can be a place of education or doing business, as well as an official court for passing judgment (Acts 19 and 16). The idea is that God sends His witnesses before man's seats of judgment to proclaim God's judgment, particularly through Jesus Christ.

Much has been said and written about evangelism, so I will not spend any more time on this phase of little-by-little covenant expansion. The sword cannot hold the inheritance for the future; only education, missions, and evangelism can. The Gospel is to be spread household-by-household, a very bottom-up approach to witnessing.

The Covenantal Lawsuit

It is the other bottom-up aspect of being a witness, a negative side that is virtually unknown, or neglected that needs to be addressed. Bringing testimony can also become a covenant lawsuit. Taking dominion in a pagan society is frustrating at times - these days, most of the time! One of the greatest concerns is the "wicked people" - abortionists, pornographers, statist politicians, etc. - who stand in the way of the visible reign of Christ (Heb. 2:8ff.). How should they be dealt with? Because the Biblical covenant commands Christians to be lawful, they are not allowed to use violence, except in the event of self-defense and a legally declared war by proper civil magistrates. Are they, therefore, left only with what some Christian activists call "a smile and a 'God loves you'"?

No. The Bible specifies a special kind of lawsuit that can be filed with God against the wicked called a covenantal lawsuit. This Biblical concept is consistently used by the prophets. In a covenantal lawsuit, the blessings and curses found in Deuteronomy 28 are turned into accusations against lawless covenant-breakers and enemies of the Church, calling down God's sanctions on them. Yes, a covenant lawsuit asks God to remove the wicked. God removes the wicked one of two ways: by conversion or destruction. So, a covenantal lawsuit is not "unloving." But it is a Biblical method for taking dominion when opposition is met! A Christian's greatest weapon in the face of opposition is not a "carnal" weapon but a spiritual one (2 Cor. 10:4), the covenant itself turned into a lawsuit before God.

Who Files the Lawsuit Today?

There are only two classifications of people: covenant-keepers and covenant-breakers. These are the only two, each having opposite inheritances. The covenant-breakers may appear to be blessed on the "front end" of life. But in the end, they will lose everything forever. The covenant-keepers get to be like Job: greatly tested but richly blessed in this life and the one to come.

In the Old Covenant, the prophet brought the covenant lawsuit. The question is: "Who files the lawsuit today?" Can any individual curse someone he doesn't happen to like? Does the State file the lawsuit? Does the Church?

Jesus sheds some helpful light on these questions when He says, "Where two or three have gathered in My name, there I am in their midst" (Matt. 18:20). Two things stand out. First, the reference to "two or three" is a formula used for legal testimony in the Old Testament: "On the evidence of two or three witnesses, he who is to die shall be put to death; he shall not be put to death on the evidence [literally "mouth"] of one witness" (Deut. 17:6). Second, Jesus applies this formulas at the end of the section on Church discipline.

Thus, we should conclude that a covenantal lawsuit can only be brought in the context of a Church court, or worship service (also a Church court before God's throne), since the imprecatory (judgment) Psalms (Ps. 83, 94) were intended to be used in worship. Individuals need witnesses in order to file a lawsuit with God, and certainly the State has no function in filing a covenant lawsuit before God. Imprecatory Psalms should only be prayed "where two or three have gathered." This means that these prayers are offered as worship when people have entered the presence of God.

The imprecatory Psalms are not to be treated lightly, nor autonomously. They have a two-edged nature to them. If they are abused, they could kill the user!

Is it wrong for Christians to use the covenant lawsuit? Are not Christians supposed to "love the sinner and hate the sin?" No! God hates the sinner as well as his sin (Psalms 11:5). And since the Church is the New Israel, Paul commands it to pray and sing the Psalms (Eph. 5:19) - all of them, especially the imprecatory Psalms that call down God's destruction and conversion of the wicked (Psalms 74, 83, etc.).

Israel was built by the covenant, it was torn down on the basis of the covenant. Man gains dominion by covenant, and he loses it by breaking the covenant. We are reminded with richer understanding of Moses' words, "So keep the words of this covenant to do them that you may prosper in all that you do" (Deut. 29:9)! Now we know the words of the covenant are kept and applied in society little by little.

666, Anyone? (Pick a Date! Any Date!)

By Randall A. Terry

11/93

"I think things are going to get even worse before the Lord returns."

- Prison chaplain, on why people involved in Operation Rescue are wrong for their actions

They just don't give up. The rapture date-setters and the Antichrist-namers never seem to skip a beat, in spite of how many times they've been wrong. In recent times, the Antichrist was assuredly Henry Kissinger (Jewish!); then Jimmy Carter (a professing believer - hmmm); then Mikhail Gorbachev (he had that thing on his head); then Saddam Hussein (if he attacked Israel the trumpet would sound). I wonder who their next victim will be. I'm taking bets on Boris Yeltsin or Bill Clinton. (Horror, there's an idea.)

And, of course, there was the best seller, 88 Reasons Why the Rapture Will Be in 1988. I wanted to write the sequel, 88 Reasons Why It Wasn't. I don't think many publishers would have been interested.

Now the insane book, by Harold Camping, 1994, is a best seller (as of the spring of 1993). This book will also be wrong. "How can you be so sure?" you may ask. Well, every time, since the Ascension of Christ, some well-meaning (or deceived) Christian has defied Christ's words and tried to pick a date, they've been wrong. The date-setters are batting 1000 percent at being wrong.

So ... I predict 1995! (The whole year! Those reading after 1995, don't smirk. Just beware of the next date-setter.)

The truth be known, I cut my teeth spiritually around people (and tapes and books) that proved to me - with lots of Bible verses - that because Israel had again become a political state in 1948, and because vultures were laying two eggs instead of one in the Middle East, and because the Soviets' military hardware could be burned like coal for three-and-a-half years, and because someone was developing a microchip to put in people's foreheads or hands so we could be a cashless society, and because our credit cards had a hologram, and because "The Beast" (computer in Belgium) was working for the revived Roman Empire, and ... and ... and ... the secret rapture of the church was going to be any minute.

It was probably useless to plan to be in Russia to preach the gospel during the 1980 Olympics because we would be raptured by then. Certainly, we would be whisked away before 1981. Of course, 1981 came and went, as did 1984, as did 1988, as did the war with Iraq. The date-setters and vulture-watchers had substantial vulture egg on their faces. The late, great, planet earth is still here! (It was undoubtedly a greater earth for those who had a good hunk of change in their pockets from book royalties - something an author never scoffs at!)

It would be bad enough if the date-setters simply deluded themselves with New York Times-CNN headlines. But it's worse than that. Not only don't they fight to stop America's moral collapse, they sometimes seem to rejoice in it.

America Is Dying. Hallelujah!

For the secret rapture watchers, the rapid collapse of America's families and the rampant immorality we see all around us are signs that we are fast approaching the end of time. Like a numbing theological narcotic that keeps people in their rapture-watching armchairs is the belief that the more corrupt America becomes, the more certain we can be that the rapture is any second. "Let it rot, baby! We're going up!"

The worse it gets, the better. The prevailing wickedness of the hour is a welcome confirmation for the prophets of escapism. "More Christians are being oppressed! The divorce rate is skyrocketing! Homosexuals want to take over! Glory to God, the end is near! Jesus must be coming any second!" This latter part is shrieked in increasingly shrill tones.

Explain to the oppressed Christians in China or in the former Soviet Union - who have suffered for decades - that the minor persecution of American Christians is the prelude to Armageddon. What a joke.

Well, forgive me for being blunt, but I just don't buy it anymore. I am sick of date-setting and antichrist-watching. I'm sick of the unhealthy distraction it is to Christians. I'm sick of it ripping their hearts out.

Now, please don't misunderstand me. I believe the Scriptures. The Bible clearly teaches of the bodily return of the Lord Jesus (Acts 1:11), the blessed hope (Titus 2:13). It will be a glorious event. And I believe His return may happen today, or tomorrow. We should live to please Him, so that if He appears, we will not be ashamed before Him at His coming (1 John 2:28). We should also live in a way that if He doesn't come for two thousand more years, we will not deliver a cursed nation to our great-great-grandchildren. We want to leave a legacy of righteousness and courage for our grandchildren, not escapism and cowardice.

Frankly, it wouldn't surprise me if the Second Coming was two thousand years from now. (Don't close the book yet! I'm not a heretic!)

The Long Last Days

"But what about the signs?" some will ask. "We're in the last days!"

Yes, we are in the last days. We've been in the last days since the day of Pentecost. On the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit was poured out with incredible power, signs, and wonders, commencing with the one hundred and twenty disciples speaking in other tongues, Peter stood up and declared we were in the last days (Acts 2:15-21).

Frankly, I believe date-setting is probably a distraction and a deception from hell. Well-meaning, overzealous men and women have fallen into the enemy's snare. Obviously, they've all been wrong. And for the Christians over the centuries who have built their lives or altered their plans based on these erroneous predictions - they have thrown away months, years, perhaps decades of their lives. For example, I wonder in recent times how many Christian men had a yearning to be a congressman or a judge, but abandoned the dream early on because "Jesus is coming any second." This nonsense of date-setting has robbed the church and the culture.

Saints who are unhealthily preoccupied with the Lord's coming generally aren't obeying the parabolic command to "occupy till I come" (Luke 19:13).

Jesus said, "A tree is known by its fruit" (Matt. 12:33). The fruit of date-setting, second coming star-watchers, and antichrist pickers have been utterly disastrous. Whether Christians sell all they have and cloister on a mountaintop waiting for the trumpet blast, or whether they run up big credit card bills to leave the antichrist while they cloister in their safe, cozy, and culturally irrelevant churches, the result is the same. They are useless in the great cultural battles for biblical justice and righteousness.

What if, rather than being deluded into accepting America's moral collapse as our divine destiny, a "sign of the times," the millions and millions of Christians who were unhealthily preoccupied with the rapture for the past seventy years had been the salt of the earth and fought against baby-killers, pornographers, condom-pushers, messianic statistes, and sodomite evangelists? We wouldn't be in the mess we are in now!

We have been deceived by Satan himself into surrendering the greatest nation in the history of the world (save ancient Israel) to pagan elitists - and we've done so believing that God had destined for this nation to moral collapse, that he destined the church for defeat! We've foolishly believed that God was pleased with us for standing idly by while a nation sank into the bowels of hell, because we were watching eternal drama play out. God deliver us from the theology of escapism.

Yes, the Lord will return. Yes, His coming is the blessed hope. Yes, we should pray with John the Beloved, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. 22:20c). But I believe the American churches' excessive preoccupation with the Lord's return is out of balance, unbiblical, and has led us into a retreatist, escapist mentality. Compare how much of the Bible is devoted to how we should live here and now, to how little of the Bible is devoted to eschatology (the study of end times).

Why Polish Brass on a Sinking Ship?

As I stated earlier, the fruit of the date-setting "any second rapture" crowd has been absolutely disastrous. Literally millions of American Christians - perhaps yourself included - are content to let America slide into moral anarchy because they think it's God's will for wickedness to flourish before the Lord returns. It's a sign of the times! Jesus is going to come any second.

And besides, if Jesus is going to come tomorrow, why be involved in the moral issues of today? Or to quote a famous radio Bible teacher, "Why polish brass on a sinking ship?"

If you are a rapture date-setter, I have this question for you: What if America's moral disintegration has absolutely nothing to do with the Lord's return? What if the mockery of righteousness has nothing to do with Matthew 24, but everything to do with Matthew 5? "If the salt have lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men" (Matt. 5:13, emphasis added). The Living New Testament says the salt is "worthless"! That's what many Christians have become - worthless.

I believe the rise of persecution against Christians, the mockery of Christianity, and the spurning of Christian principles in America have nothing to do with the Lord's return. We and our most sacred principles are mocked and trampled underfoot because we are the salt that lost its savor. Our own selfishness, laziness, bless-me-club Christianity, coupled with our detachment from and irrelevance in this culture have gotten us in this mess. Our own folly has made us a prey to the jaws of tyranny. To use the Lord's words, we are good for nothing. And as He promised, we are being trampled under foot of men.

Cast Off the Shackles

I believe we must challenge the date-setting preoccupation in the church because of the damage done to the church and the nation. I also believe the great escape mentality has helped bring us to the brink of destruction. Because of the incredible amount of ground we have lost since the early 1900s, we are now entrenched in a life and death struggle for our own survival and for the survival of America as a free nation. We've been clearly losing since the early 1960s. To top it off, most Christians don't have a clue how to fight, where to fight, who to fight, when to fight, and most importantly, why to fight.

I recently talked with an "expert prophecy teacher" who insisted that he could still be an "activist" while being pre-occupied with the rapture. (It was a very polite and amiable conversation.) I told him, "Perhaps you can live with that apparent schizophrenia, but the average person in the pew cannot. Some of the hugest evangelical churches in America that are unhealthily preoccupied with the Lord's return have little or no influence in the power bases of their communities (the schools, media, universities, the police force, the judiciary, the medicines, the arts, etc.). They have the manpower to take back the 'power bases,' but instead they're all worked up about the latest New York Times headline about Israel or Sadaam Hussein."

A woman sitting by and listening in suddenly spoke up, expressing her deep frustration. "Every time I go to my church and try to get them involved, people tell me 'the Lord is coming any time now, and we don't need to worry about changing the world.'" The prophecy expert ignored her anecdotal evidence and my arguments.

Moreover, many Christians believe we are destined to be defeated. Before the Lord's return, society will have decayed so completely that it will be impossible to reform it. There's no way we can win - "until that trumpet blast." For now, well there's not much we can do. So why bother? The average Christian simply isn't going to get in a battle he isn't going to win. I know a few people declare, "We must remain faithful till the end." But not many Christians will join the fight if the battle cry is "We're going to get slaughtered, God has destined us to lose, but we're called to be faithful! Let's see who can bang their head against the wall the longest!"

Another tragic side effect of "rapture fever" is amnesia. We forget. We forget from whence we've fallen as a nation. We forget what great freedom and justice our spiritual forefathers fought for, and sometimes died for. And perhaps more tragically, we forget our responsibility to our children, grandchildren, and our great-grandchildren. Many Christians have little or no sense of compelling duty for their yet unborn children and grandchildren. Why? Because they think the end of the world will be here before their grandchildren or great-grandchildren are.

In the Year 2525

But millions of American Christians aren't burdened about their offsprings' future. The only dark spot they see on the horizon is Armageddon. And for them that is a bright spot! So why strive to achieve righteousness and justice in the judiciary, politics, the medicines, schools, universities or the media, for future generations? Why be burdened for our offspring and their offspring? We'll be long gone!

What grieves me so deeply is that it doesn't have to be this way. The pagans don't have an irrevocable destiny to run this country into hell. They are not invincible. American Christians have the manpower and the money to take back the power bases. Just consider the tens of millions of professing Christians, and the billions we spend on buildings and entertainment. We have the numbers and money, but we don't have the vision, the passion, or the sense of duty before God to take the Lordship of Christ in every citadel of authority.

If the enemy continues to seduce us to let America perish, and we continue to squander our children's freedom, future generations throughout the world will hold us in harsh contempt. Our great-grandchildren will curse this generation of Christians for our cowardice and escapist mentality. But I'm sure some Christian author or teacher will try to tickle itching ears in their day telling them that they are the terminal generation. ("This time we're really sure. Vultures are laying three eggs!")

So, you may be wondering, what is my eschatology? I'm a pan-millennialist - with post-millennial tendencies. I believe it's all going to pan out in the end. And I assure you, I'm right. It all will pan out in the end! I know that sounds like a cop-out, but it's not. Let me put more flesh on the bones.

The Antichrist Who Isn't

Finally, the Bible does not say there will be one special antichrist. John said, "Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time" (1 John 2:18, emphasis added). That's right. Many antichrists. "Who is the liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist, that denies the Father and the Son" (1 John 2:22). Anyone who denies that Jesus is the Christ is an antichrist.

I understand that the antichrist-watchers believe the "man of sin" of 2 Thessalonians 2:3 and the "Beast" of Revelation 13 is the Antichrist. However, this is a strained, unbiblical leap of logic.

Our preoccupation with an antichrist is an unhealthy, sinister distraction. Daniel wrote, "The people who know their God will display strength and take action" (Dan. 11:32) - not "those who know their antichrists." Christians who are supposed to be looking for Christ's glorious appearing are instead looking for an antichrist.

Please, friend, take an honest look at the fruit of the date-setting, antichrist-watching, we're-destined-to-be-defeated theology in the church; look at what it has done to America. It should give you pause, and at least make you very suspicious of the current or next wave of date-setters.

Yes, the trumpet will sound, and Jesus will return in great power and glory to judge the quick and the dead. It could happen today. It might not happen for two thousand years. Just in case He decides to wait for the "restoration of all things" (Acts 3:21b), let's get busy taking ground from the enemy's hands for His kingdom.

A Confession of Victory

By Randall A. Terry

I believe righteousness is a greater force than wickedness (Eph. 6:10-17).

I believe we are the light of the world (Matt. 5:14).

I believe that although gross darkness is on the peoples, that the glory of the Lord will shine on us and ultimately cover the earth (see Isaiah 60).

I believe light is greater than darkness, and that darkness cannot overcome light (John 1:5).

I believe "greater is He who is in you than he who is in the world" (1 John 4:4).

I believe Jesus will build His church, and the gates of hell will not prevail against it (see Matthew 16:18). Gates are for defense. When the church of God is on the offensive, walking in holiness and obedience, the "gates of hell," protecting the interests of hell, cannot withstand us. Child-killers, earth-worshippers, and pornographers are no match for an obedient, Holy Spirit-filled church. When we are doing what we should be doing, with God's anointing, the wicked cannot prevail against us.

I believe the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof, not the devil's (Ps. 24:1a).

I believe Jesus was manifested to destroy the works of the devil (1 John 3:8). If we are conformed to His image (Rom 8:29), we will also destroy the works of the devil. I believe we can rebuild the ancient ruins and raise up the age-old foundations of righteousness (see Isaiah 58:6-12 and Isaiah 61:1-6).

I believe that the Kingdom of God is like a grain of mustard seed, which grows into a plant that dominates the whole garden (Luke 13:18-19).

I believe Christ is the Rock cut without hands who smashes the idol's feet and slowly fills the earth (Dan. 2:45).

I believe all authority, in heaven and earth, is given to Christ now (Matt. 28:18).

I believe He is the King of kings and Lord of lords now (see 1 Timothy 6:15). He is the boss.

I believe all kings, princes, and judges are duty bound to obey Him now, lest He destroy them in His wrath (see Psalm 2).

I believe Jesus is returning for a glorious church--without spot or wrinkle (Eph. 5:27)--not some beaten down church whimpering in the corner until Jesus comes!

The parable said, "Occupy till I come," not "hide out till I come" (Luke 19:13).

Finally (and this is for the true eschatological student), I believe most of Matthew 24 and book of Revelation are history.

This is a quick (and not comprehensive) view of my eschatology.

God's Law is Supreme

By Randall Terry

After nearly fifteen years in Christian ministry, I have been through more battles (and certainly more jails!) than most Christians will go through in a lifetime. As I have observed the Church throughout the second half of the seventies, the eighties, and now the nineties, I have been hopeful at her potential, yet troubled, dismayed, and even brokenhearted at her inability - or unwillingness - to stand for God and His Word in our nation and to impact the culture at large.

Most Christians today pay lip service to the concept of "Higher Law." They acknowledge that God's Law is higher than man's law. Even those who are the most rabidly against Operation Rescue, even those who say we should always obey the law of man, celebrate the Fourth of July. So much for consistency.

I'll bet that most Christians in America have never stopped to seriously meditate on "The Fourth of July," its biblical and philosophical underpinnings, and what the Declaration of Independence meant for the signers.

- * It meant the signers were breaking the law.

- * It meant that they were guilty of treason.

- * It meant that they were prepared to go to war for the freedoms we take for granted.

- * It meant that real men fired real bullets at other real men who shed blood, died excruciating, real deaths, and left behind real grieving widows and orphans on both sides of the war.

The American Revolution was not a debate about Romans 13 nor a civics lesson on freedom. It was a war for freedom dedicated to the proposition that all men are created endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights; it was a war founded on a belief in Higher Law.

Tragically, while most Christians pay lip service to "Higher Law," they do not possess a concrete or even modest conviction or understanding of Higher Law.

Those Christians who argue against Operation Rescue or smuggling Bibles into China or praying at high school graduations on the basis of Romans 13 have foolishly turned the Bible on its head. They have made God's Word subservient to man's evil law - in the name of Romans 13. In the name of the Bible, they subjugate the Bible to pagans. Unfortunately, those "law and order" Christians have not looked at the whole Bible, nor rightly divided the Word of Truth. Let's take a little closer look at Romans 13:1-5:

Let every person be in subjection to the governing authorities. For there is no authority except from God, and those which exist are established by God. Therefore he who resists authority has opposed the ordinance of God; and they who have opposed will receive condemnation upon themselves. For rulers are not a cause for fear for good behavior, but for evil. Do you want to have no fear of authority? Do what is good and you will have praise from the same; for it is a minister of God to you for good. But if you do what is evil, be afraid; for it does not bear the sword for nothing; for it is a minister of God, an avenger who brings wrath upon the one who practices evil. Wherefore it is necessary to be in subjection, not only because of wrath, but also for conscience' sake.

Please note that God ordained government to punish wicked doers and to praise the righteous. Question: What do we do when the government rejects its God-ordained duty and does the exact opposite - praising and protecting the wicked, while punishing and persecuting the righteous? This passage does not deal with that dilemma.

I believe the apostle Peter answered the question most succinctly when he said, "We must obey God rather than men" (Acts 5:29). Again and again we see in the Scriptures that when God's law and man's law conflict, the saints of God must obey God.*

The saints of God "broke the law" not only when they were commanded to do evil, but when they were commanded not to do good. "Don't pray!" Daniel was told. "Don't preach," the apostles were told. Christians nowadays are told, "Don't rescue babies"; "Don't smuggle Bibles"; "Don't preach about political matters in your church"; "Don't pray at school commencements."

We need to do some serious studying and thinking and do it fast. The conflict between God's Law and man's law is not only in the realms I've mentioned. The battle is intensifying in America on a multitude of fronts. The pagans are using the law to slowly crush biblical morality and justice on all fronts. The God-haters are using the law to harass and intimidate families and churches who believe and practice the teachings of the Bible. "Children's rights" lunatics are using the law to persecute parents who spank their children. The statists are slowly using man's law to obtain control over what pastors preach and whom they hire.

First Principle - God Rules

We've got to accept this simple principle: God rules. His Law is supreme. And he requires all men in all nations at all times to obey his laws. And when His law and man's law conflict, His law is the unquestionable authority. Man's law at that point is unrighteous tyranny.

For those who doubt this conclusion, please consider these questions:

* Whose law is eternal - God's or man's?

* Can God's Law be rescinded, revised or improved?

- * Does God hold His Law or man's law to be higher when the two are in conflict?
- * Does God want His people to obey His Law or man's when the two are in conflict?
- * Does God hold all rulers in all nations - including non-Christians - accountable to His Law, or are the lost free to do what they want?

If the lost are free to do as they please, to what standard will God hold them accountable? By what standard will He judge them? How can the Holy Spirit convict them of sin if the measure of sin (the Law) has been removed? We need to forever settle in our minds and hearts the supremacy of God's Law. While we quibble over what place we think the Bible should have in culture and law, our enemies know exactly where they want the Bible.

Our Enemies' Vision for the Bible

Our enemies want the complete eradication of Christianity and biblical principles from our public schools, our city, county, state, and federal governments.

The secular Humanist elite preach "tolerance," but they are absolutely intolerant of a God-centered, Bible-based view of law and culture. They want the influence of the Law of God eradicated from this nation (except, of course, that part in Romans 13 that the pietists wrongly believe calls them to submit to the pagan government's every demand - rebels in power love to wave Romans 13 in front of Christians).

The pagan elite and Bible-phobes boldly march forward, trying to stamp out biblical Christianity, while we timidly speak of a "Judeo-Christian ethic," "pluralism," and "tolerance." I believe that those Christian leaders, teachers, and pastors who side with man's law above God's Law are unwitting collaborators with the enemy for America's demise. They might mean well - they might be sincere - but they are sincerely deceived and sincerely deceiving.

Our Vision of the Bible

Let us be just as bold - no, more bold - than God's enemies. Not only is God's Law above man's law, but it must undergird man's law. For man's law to be legitimate, it must be founded on biblical law.

We want our nation and all its institutions to be self-consciously built on the laws and principles of God's Word. Any other foundation will crumble. God's Law is over all human authority. And God's Law is the only unchanging, transcendent law from heaven, the only set of moral absolutes upon which human authority can rest.

Those Christian leaders who insist that we not enter the cultural fray with the Ten Commandments as our spoken foundation are misguided, and they are leading the church astray. Not only are many Christian leaders unsure of the supremacy of God's Law over man's law, but they question whether or not we should even discuss human law in connection with biblical law. They feel it's out of bounds for us.

The antichrists in power like nothing better than when pastors proclaim hell's party lines: "Religion and politics don't mix," and "Don't bring politics in the church," and "We live in a pluralistic society, so we can't bring our Christian convictions into politics." This is foolishness, a deception from hell. The rebels in power pronounce their rebellion against God, and we so much as tell them this is their right, that God accepts their "pluralistic" rebellion.

But God warns them: "Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling, Kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way" (Psalm 2:11,12).

Equal Time With Hell

Yet another attempt at compromise that many Christian leaders have come up with at first seems reasonable, but it is rotten to the core. It goes like this: "We just want equal time."

Wrong! We don't want "equal time" with baby-killers, condom pushers, New Agers, and sodomite recruiters. We do not want them to have any access to public schools. We won't tolerate their having a single minute to expose our children or anyone else's children to their godless agenda. Planned Parenthood, Queer nation and their cohorts from hell have no right to give the time of day to children in school and fill their unsuspecting minds with filth. We don't want equal time, because we want them to have no time.

We will not put the flawless, eternal Word of God on the same par with godless laws, or the ungodly lies of men and demons. God's Law is supreme and will abide forever. man's rebellious thoughts are as chaff for the fire.

Intolerance Is a Beautiful Thing

In the light of God's holy, flawless, unchanging eternal Word, we have a duty to be intolerant of the pagan world agenda. They often accuse us of being intolerant. We should wear this intended insult as a badge of honor.

Consider a few biblical figures:

* David was intolerant of Goliath (1 Sam. 17).

* The prophet Elijah was intolerant of Jezebel (1 Kings 18,21).

* The apostle Paul was intolerant of books on witchcraft - the books were burned! (How's that for being politically incorrect! See Acts 19:19).

Or let's consider some recent historical figures who were intolerant - including men and women the so-called liberals cherish.

- * Thomas Jefferson was intolerant of King George III.
- * George Washington was intolerant of British troops.
- * Frederick Douglass and Harriet Tubman were intolerant of slavery.
- * Susan B. Anthony - a pro-life suffragette - was intolerant of only men voting.
- * Lech Walesa is intolerant of communism.
- * And Mother Teresa is intolerant of abortion.

Intolerance is a beautiful thing!

Long Live Righteous Intolerance!

In the book of Revelations, Jesus rebuked the church of Thyatira because "You tolerate the woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess, and she teaches and leads my bondservants astray, so that they commit acts of immorality and eat things sacrificed to idols" (Rev. 2:20).

So please, don't waver. Your love for God and His Word should make you intolerant of abominations and perversions. We must reach out in mercy to those who are trapped in sin; we must offer the grace of God to His enemies, but we are not called to shower "mush love" on those who are knowingly, deliberately leading people astray. We must warn the enemies' leaders of the coming judgment of God and encourage them to repent and turn to Christ.

But we must also denounce their agenda and fearlessly rebuke their paganism, especially in public settings. Your allegiance to the King of the Universe should make you intolerant of the prophets of Baal - the leaders and the agenda of the rebels of our day. In fact, you may want to read 1 Kings 18 to see the contempt God's prophets have for Baal's prophets. The false prophets were proclaiming lies. Elijah was prophesying God's Word. Elijah mocked them.

Why? Because Elijah knew the only true God and had received His Word. The prophets of Baal were following deceptive demons, prophesying lies, and leading the people astray. Elijah did not dignify their pagan deity, pagan ideas, and pagan immorality by showing pluralistic respect for what he knew was a hellish lie.

God's Law is supreme. Heaven and earth will pass away, but God's Word will not. And if the culture is going to survive, every power base must be rebuilt on the bedrock of God's Law. We cannot compromise with the prophets of Baal. We cannot appease those who are dedicated to our demise.

* See Ex. 1:15-2:5; Heb. 11:23; Josh. 2; Dan. 3; Dan. 6; Matt. 2:1-12; Acts 9:23-25; Acts 12:5-10; 2 Cor. 11:32-33.

Intolerance Can Be A Beautiful Thing!

Consider the people throughout history who would have been judged as "intolerant" by the politically correct ideology of our day. In the light of God's holy, flawless, unchanging eternal Word, we have a duty to be intolerant of the pagan world agenda. They often accuse us of being intolerant. We should wear this intended insult as a badge of honor.

Consider a few biblical figures:

David - intolerant of Goliath (1 Sam. 17).

Lech Walesa - intolerant of communism.

Mother Teresa - intolerant of abortion.

Long live righteous intolerance!

The Idol Of Reputation: Are You Nicer Than Jesus?

Just Don't Preach the Whole Word of God!

By Randall Terry

"I just wish you could do things a little different. I mean, you read about it in the paper. I wish you could do it in a way that doesn't give Christians a bad name ..."

- Prison chaplain, on why people involved in Operation Rescue are wrong for their actions

I don't know how I do it, but I consistently bring out the worst in people. People I don't even know hate me. Newspaper columnists who have never met me write against me. Television commentators I've never had a minute with rail against me. (And I'm a likeable guy!)

I go to speak in churches all over the country, and I'm met by frothing, screaming, pro-abortion and/or homosexual activists. One time in Philadelphia the "activists from hell" gathered at the entrance of a church parking lot and threw condoms at our people as they entered. Another time I was scheduled to speak at the University of San Francisco. (Yes, I knew this was a dumb move from the beginning. "Thanks" to my hosts!) About sixty Christians got inside, then the homosexuals surrounded the entry way, then the building. They kicked in a plate glass window, kicked a door off its hinges, refused entrance to those who wanted to get in, and made such raucous and violent threats that the police forced us to cancel the meeting. Our people had to escort each other to their cars. However, the police did not arrest any of the sodomites.

The Idol of Our Reputation

Okay, I'll be honest. There are times when I'm encouraged when our enemies come out. It strengthens me because it reminds me that I'm on the right track. But there are times when unjust or unfounded criticism bother me - especially from Christians - and I want to defend myself. But I learned a long time ago that the preservation of my reputation is of very little consequence to God.

Before I go any further, let me bring some balance. The Apostle Paul wrote that if someone was to be an elder "he must have a good report from them which are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil" (1 Tim. 3:7). And so, having a good name and a good reputation for righteous living are noble goals. "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches" (Prov. 22:1).

But let's face it, for many of us having a good reputation has become something of an idol. What we desire is not a "good reputation" according to biblical terms. We want a good reputation on this world's terms. We dread the thought of looking too radical, of sounding too controversial, of doing or saying anything that would upset our neighbors, co-workers, or family members; we dread the thought of tarnishing our precious image.

Most Christians tend to refuse to take a strong public action on a controversial issue. You would never catch them taking a public stand against child-killing, sodomy, school condom giveaways, or intrusion by "social services" into families' lives. They wouldn't want to appear at a prayerful protest with a bunch of radicals. Even worse, many Christians refuse to even say what they believe to relatives, fellow employees, neighbors, or even fellow Christians, for fear of displeasing them. When an opportunity presents itself, or duty cries for a simple verbal response, millions of Christians are deafeningly silent when they should be professing God's Word.

Herein lies the problem. When the dear old brother said to me that he didn't want Christians to have a bad name, he wasn't referring to a bad name because of sin, he was talking about a bad name because of zeal for righteousness. It was said of Christ, "... The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up" (John 2:17).

As Christians we must believe our Lord's words and follow His example. As we will see, that might mean we will be heroes, or we may be villains.

They Loved Him; They Despised Him

Consider Jesus' example. At times the crowds thronged around him and exciting reports about Him spread across the country. "But so much more went there a fame abroad of him: and great multitudes came together to hear, and to be healed of him of their infirmities" (Luke 5:15).

Jesus became famous. The multitudes sang His praises. The talk in the coffee shops was great. The editorials were positive. The disciples were basking in the attention they experienced from being close to Jesus, and it was definitely going to their heads. "Let one of us sit at your right hand and the other at your left in glory" (Mark 10:37). Perhaps they thought, "This discipleship stuff is awesome! If this is what it means to be a disciple, I can handle it! Yo, Jesus, count me in!"

However, Jesus' popularity did not extend to all quarters. He wasn't making everybody happy. When He taught the multitudes, the malcontent maligned Him, saying, "He deceives the people" (John 7:12). When He healed the sick, the nay-sayers berated Him, saying, "This man is not from God, for He does not keep the Sabbath" (John 9:14-16).

The apostles quickly learned that they would have a mixed review at best in this world. At times, eager inquirers clamored to be near enough for their shadows to fall on them. At other times, their shadows were extinguished in a dark jail cell. The unhappy locals screamed, "These men who have upset the world have come here also" (Acts 17:6). In Ephesus, the local merchants created a mob scene that could have cost Paul his life had the disciples not intervened (see Acts 19:23-41).

And lest you think these injustices and false accusations were only for Christ and the apostles, think again. "The disciple is not above his master, nor the servant above his lord. It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them of his household?" (Matt. 10:24-25, emphasis added).

I'd love to see that promise embroidered, framed, and hung in the office of every Christian leader in America. The Bible teaches us clearly: We are going to be hated and persecuted for doing what is right.

Do They Hate You? Great Job!

Now, now, cheer up. In fact rejoice! Jesus commands us to rejoice when our reputation is ruined on His account. "Blessed are you when men revile at you, and persecute you, and say all kinds of evil against you falsely, on account of Me. Rejoice, and be glad, for your reward in heaven is great, for so they persecuted the prophets who were before you" (Matt. 5:11-12).

If your reputation is perfectly intact on every front, if you never irritate anyone, if you never make a stir, you might be doing something wrong - or more likely, you're not doing something right. "Woe to you when all men speak well of you, for in the same way their fathers used to treat the false prophets" (Luke 6:26). The Bible has a crystal clear promise: All who live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim. 3:12). If we never experience persecution, if we never make a single soul angry (as Christ often did), something is probably wrong. Probably very wrong.

When we stand for the Lord Jesus Christ and the laws of God revealed in the Bible, it is inevitable that we will offend someone. And in that hour we must not shrink from our duty - no compromise. In that hour of trial the unwholesome preservation of our reputation is of little consequence to God. In fact, He might be trying to smash the idol of reputation. The Prince of Life hung naked and shamed on a cross for you and me in the fulfillment of God's will. God has the right to require that our reputation be laid in the dust in obedience to His will.

If we are mocked, falsely accused, berated, and maligned for doing or saying what our Lord has commanded, so be it. Blessed be His name. He has given us the indescribable privilege of experiencing the trials with the prophets and of following in our Savior's blood-stained steps. As the apostle Paul wrote, "For unto you it is given in behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake (Phil. 1:29).

"I'll Take a Padded Cross, Please"

The demand of discipleship for the Christian has never changed. It is simply this: death to self. We must pick up our cross daily (see Luke 9:23).

Consider this: We love the cross of Christ, and well we should. On that God-ordained cross our Savior was slain, our sins were atoned for, and we were redeemed to God. We embrace the cross of Christ, but we despise and reject the cross He has commanded us to bear - the believer's cross.

The believer's cross doesn't atone for our sins, it doesn't redeem us to God, and it doesn't make the sky grow dark. It simply kills us. Usually uneventful, unhistorical, and unrecorded, the believer's cross is our call- nay, it is our duty - to lay our reputations, our self-preservation, our very lives at the feet of the Lamb of God.

"For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's" (Rom. 14:8). When we become the grain of wheat, falling into the ground and dying alone, then we will bear much fruit (John 12:24). You may desire to be used of God in a great way. Are you willing to go with Christ outside the establishment, or as the Bible puts it, "outside the city gate bearing His reproach"? (Heb. 13:13).

You may desire to speak for God before multitudes. Are you speaking for Him during our lunch hour at work? Are you declaring His Word to your relatives and neighbors? If you shrink back from speaking before the few for fear and love of your reputation, what makes you think you could withstand the blistering heat of prolonged public hatred?

Friend, if you have bowed the knee to the idol of reputation, repent. Ask God for forgiveness. And then ask Him for courage. As you meditate on these truths, certain situations, certain relationships, may come to your mind where you have not said or done what you should have. God will give you another chance. Each time He proves you, He will give you greater and greater responsibility and anointing for His kingdom. If you fail a test, don't despair. Again seek forgiveness - and prepare yourself for the make-up exam! There is no end to opportunities to die to ourselves, to stand for God in this troubling hour, and to lay our reputation at His nail-scarred feet.

May God help us learn to loathe the preservation of our nice, safe, non-confrontational (uneventful, unfruitful) lives; may we learn to live out Christ's command that we hate our own lives in comparison to our love and zeal for Him (see John 12:25-26). When people are prepared to lay down their lives, they become very dangerous. Why? They are not afraid. They can't be bought off or cowed into silence. When we "love not our lives, even unto death" (Rev. 12:11), we will become truly dangerous to the enemies; armies and truly useful for the extension of our Master's kingdom.

So smash that idol of reputation!

The Three "R's" of Christianity: The Power to Transform Culture

By Jay Rogers

2/94

SOME MODERN EDUCATORS HAVE DISCOVERED the truth that the teachers of one-room school houses of the 1800s new well: for a child to excel in study, he must learn to become a self-educator. The child is taught the basics (or the three R's) which are the basis of all learning skills. If these are mastered early on, the student becomes self-governing and is prepared for all areas of study.

Christianity, also, has the three "R's" of faith: revival, reformation and restoration. If mastered, these three powerful truths will equip the Church to be the cultural transformer she was destined to be. The Church must begin with the historical orthodox faith and then build upon this foundation with subsequent principles of cultural transformation. Let's define three of these principles:

REVIVAL - This begins with a recovery of the Lord's testimony in a given generation. The resulting effect of the revived Church on society with large numbers of people being converted is termed a spiritual awakening.

REFORMATION - This is defined as the corresponding effect of a spiritual awakening on a particular society. Great social reforms occur due to the sanctifying power of a revived Church acting as a redeemer to its culture.

RESTORATION - This occurs as each successive wave of revival restores great truths which were part of the normal experience for the early Church of the apostolic age, but had been lost during the time of the Middle Ages.

These three great forces, working together throughout time, have brought us to a crucial juncture in history. We desperately need to understand what God has accomplished in the past and to examine the current state of world affairs. The purpose of such understanding is to create an atmosphere within the Church of our generation which is conducive to yet another wave of revival which will reform the nations and complete the Great Commission. As we begin to understand the mechanism through which God was worked in the past, we will be able to have hope for the future.

We should realize that there is revival happening all over the world today. There is spiritual awakening which has swept hundreds of millions of people into the Kingdom of God within the last decade. There is revival in Africa, South America, the former Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, the South Pacific Islands, and Southeast Asia. The sheer volume of people coming to know Christ in this "World Awakening" not only rivals but even surpasses what happened in America in centuries past.

One of the most obvious effects of spiritual awakening in the world today was in dealing a death blow to communism - the dreaded enemy of liberty and Christian culture. Although the secular press has not presented this fact, the Church was more instrumental in bringing the downfall of many communist governments throughout the world than any other single force.

We can understand what is next on the agenda by examining God's promises to his Church, especially those found in Isaiah 60 and those found in the Great Commission (Matthew 28:18-20). As we turn to our own nation and Europe, we see that the supposedly "Christian" nations of the world today are sadly deficient in terms of revival experience. Nevertheless, in times of great darkness in America's past revival has dawned bringing new light and hope. So we can hope and pray for a Great Awakening in America which will surpass all past experience.

In our own nation, we can see that the coming awakening will bring an end to abortion - America's number one social problem. Reform efforts of a revived Church will also overthrow ungodly influences in art, music and the sciences. We can expect that lewd homosexual art, rock music, and the theory of evolution will be targets of the awakened Church. The many social problems our nation now faces - sexual immorality, AIDS, racial problems, economic woes - are reformation tasks for the Church of the new awakening.

Paradigm Shift 1992

BY JEFF ZIEGLER

THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST IN AMERICA is currently undergoing a radical shift in doctrine, purpose and function. This shift is bringing the Church toward her proper role. Committed Christians all over the nation are now changing their attitudes and asking new questions about the Church, such as: "What should she be doing?" - and - "What should she look like? These questions are being answered in a current transition period - what I have termed "Paradigm Shift 1992."

What is a Paradigm?

A paradigm is a set of beliefs which act as a model for one's sense of reality. This model or belief system will ultimately shape one's actions. In other words: "What you view is what you'll do." Another way of looking at paradigms would be to see them as a set of proven value judgments which reside at the core of one's being. This is commonly referred to as a "worldview." When we are talking about paradigms, we are looking at patterns of thinking which - whether you realize it or not - determine your conduct and lifestyle.

There has been much heated debate in recent years about paradigms. This discussion has focused on the shifts which occur when an old paradigm is seen to be obsolete or false. In which case, one paradigm gives way to another. This transfer of belief systems and values is termed a "paradigm shift."

A good example of a paradigm shift in the business world would be the transfer of the influence and power of computer manufacturers that came with the invention of the personal computer or "PC." Prior to the invention of the PC, larger, well established computer manufacturers produced bulky, expensive computers which had to be run via a mainframe to a computer terminal. The invention of the PC by a smaller, less established company provided a compact, inexpensive computer that could be run from a built-in "hard drive." Small businesses and individuals found that the PC was much more reliable, useful and efficient than its older counterpart. While this smaller company has grown by leaps and bounds, the larger computer manufacturers are now scrambling to shift their entire operation to compete with this younger innovative company.

Paradigm shifts are not confined to the business world. In fact, we can see a common historical paradigm shift which has occurred in the Church just prior to every revival and spiritual awakening. The pattern has generally followed that an old paradigm has become entrenched in the Church and God's people are unable to discern the need for revival and reformation along with the new paradigm or vision that is carried along with it.

No one pours new wine into old wineskins. If he does, the new wine will burst the skins, the wine will run out and the wineskins will be ruined. No, new wine must be poured into new wineskins. And no one after drinking old wine wants the new, for he says, "The old is better."

- Luke 5:37-39

While it would be interesting to investigate the times, events, and paradigm shifts which have preceded each revival movement over the past 500 years, I believe it would be more useful to find the overriding biblical principle of paradigm shift which leads to revival. This is especially critical in our generation, for the evidence would indicate that the paradigm shift is already underway in the United States.

Jesus' Parting Words Before His Ascension

On one occasion, while he was eating a meal with them, he emphasized that they were not to leave Jerusalem, but wait for the Father's promise. "You have already heard me speak about this," he said, "for John used to baptize with water, but before many days are passed you will be baptized with the Holy Spirit."

This naturally brought them together, and they asked him, "Lord, is this the time when you are going to restore the kingdom to Israel?"

To this he replied, "You cannot know times and dates which have been fixed by the Father's sole authority. But you are to be given power when the Holy Spirit has come to you. You will be witnesses to me, not only in Jerusalem, not only throughout Judea, not only in Samaria, but to the very ends of the earth."

- Acts 1:4-8 JB Phillips

The School of Christ

Here we find an all important example of paradigm shift. The scene is set just prior to the inauguration of the Church on the day of Pentecost. The resurrected Christ issues forth His final instructions to the disciples before His Ascension. This school of Christ was to last forty days. A new paradigm, the Church, was being erected on the site of an old paradigm (the Sanhedrin, the Temple, Judaism, etc.) yet with none of the old discarded materials.

The subject matter of this last day school of Christ was the bedrock for the new paradigm. The elements of this new order were as follows:

1. The emphasis on the Kingdom of God
2. The ministry of prayer (Being commanded to wait on the Lord)
3. The reception of the Holy Spirit

What is Ecclesiology?

These three subjects fall under the theological category termed ecclesiology. The word comes from the Greek root: Ekklesia meaning "the called-out ones" or "the Church." The term ecclesiology is defined as the study of the doctrine, purpose, and function of the Church as Jesus intended it to be.

The forty day school of Christ instructed the disciples in the present reality of the Kingdom of God along with the immutable eternal purposes upon which it was based. The place for the discovery and implementation of these Kingdom principles was to be the commanded prayer meeting. And the empowerment for the testimony and expansion of this Kingdom was to come in the person of the Holy Spirit.

Jesus Christ intended this victorious worldview to encompass the globe even "to the ends of the earth." This new paradigm - "the Church" - was given a grand and glorious vision with all the power and divine authority of the resurrected Christ to carry out her mission. (See Ephesians 1:17-23.)

However, the disciples had great difficulty in this school of Christ. The new paradigm of ecclesiology - what they were to be as the Church - was a new and foreign idea being clouded by an old paradigm. That old paradigm was an emphasis on eschatology or a study of the end times.

What is Eschatology?

Eschatology is derived from the Greek word Eskatos, which means "the last things." Eschatology is the study of the "end times" or the final events in world history.

Notice that the disciples ask the question: "Lord, is this the time when you are going to restore the kingdom to Israel?" The question is distinctly eschatological in nature. They were caught in the old paradigm of the Sanhedrin which had an undo emphasis on eschatology, especially the dates, times and endless speculations about the coming of the Messiah, rather than on the lessons of the school of Christ. It should be noted that while the Sanhedrin was very adept at knowing prophetic writings, it failed as an institution for they had no sense of the redemptive purposes of God for all nations. Thus they speculated about the time of the Messiah's coming, yet missed the day of their visitation.

Jesus responded to the disciple's eschatological question by bringing the paradigm shift into a burning focus: "You cannot know times and dates which have been fixed by the Father's sole authority." Clearly Jesus shifts the emphasis away from eschatology and refocuses the disciple's attention back to the lessons of the school of Christ or ecclesiology: "But you are to be given power when the Holy Spirit has come to you. You will be witnesses to me, not only in Jerusalem, not only throughout Judea, not only in Samaria, but to the very ends of the earth."

The question our generation faces is very similar to that of the disciples. Will the Church in America be able to make a paradigm shift away from an undo emphasis on eschatology to a proper emphasis on ecclesiology as we move toward another Great Awakening? There are signs that a paradigm shift is already well under way in the Church. We will look at the signs of this shift momentarily, however, we must understand a recurring pattern between the paradigms of eschatology and ecclesiology.

We see in times of stagnation or decline within the Church an overall loss of vision and testimony. The challenge of the Great Commission and the Church triumphant seems beyond our scope of experience and no great emphasis is placed on ecclesiology, for the times and the poor state of things dictate that the best days of the Church are behind her. Thus prayers for revival and massive, global spiritual awakening are not only seen as naive, but are actually frowned upon by a paradigm of malaise and decline.

Historically, we find an emphasis on fatalistic eschatology, which gradually makes its way into the Church and severely hampers her global mission. Speculative date setting about Christ's Second Coming and undo attention to current events, and subjective extra-biblical interpretations of prophetic writings have always hindered the Church. These were the very things for which the disciples were rebuked.

This pattern has shown itself not only in our example from Acts chapter one, but also just prior to the Reformation, the First and Second Great Awakenings, and the Pentecostal/Charismatic movement. We can also see that before any of these movements were brought into full fruition, a paradigm shift took place away from eschatology and toward a victorious ecclesiology.

Today, we find that the Church in America has been obsessed with a calendar driven, date-setting, escapist eschatology which demeans the role of the Church in the world. The results over the past seventy five years has been a Church which has disengaged herself from society and given it over to every anti-Christian power imaginable. As the Church has withdrawn from society, a vacuum has been created, and pagan humanism concealed within the Trojan horse of pluralism has captured most of the societal institutions of our land, including many "Christian" denominations, seminaries, and pulpits. The deplorable result was a prayerless, hopeless church without purpose, purity or power.

However, approximately twelve years ago a sovereign prayer movement for revival and spiritual awakening began to take shape all across the land. The results of this prayer "counterattack" has been astounding in its scope and effect - especially in the last three years. As the prayer movement has turned into a holy conflagration so too, a clear paradigm shift has been evidenced. The victorious ecclesiology for which Christ successfully labored forty days to impart to His disciples is again making a dominant resurgence as we move toward yet another Great Awakening.

The following outline depicts this paradigm shift. Here is a common ecclesiology and eschatology based in confessional orthodoxy, yet poignant and robust in pointing the way for revival in our generation.

I. Common Ecclesiology

A. The Church is the only institution to advance Christ's Kingdom on earth. No other institution is intimated.

B. Christ has furnished all the means to accomplish His work (His finished work on the Cross, the Word of God, the Holy Spirit).

C. We have the witness of the Early Church in triumph over the Roman Empire, the Great Awakenings, and today's Third World Awakenings as evidence of a victorious Church.

D. It would dishonor the gospel of God, and the work of the Holy Spirit to intimate that the Church will ultimately fail in accomplishing the Great Commission.

E. The Purpose of the Kingdom of God

1. To prevent the universal spread of idolatry
2. To preserve the testimony of Christ's reign
3. To gather the elect
4. To reaffirm the covenants and moral law of God
5. To triumph over all

II. Common Eschatology

A. All nations will have an identifiable indigenous witness of Christ and the Church.

B. Ethnic Jews will be reingrafted in a mass way.

C. All anti-Christian powers shall be destroyed not only judicially but practically.

D. Christ shall return in person to judge the living and the dead.

E. The saints will inherit the consummated Kingdom.

Calvin on Justification By Faith Alone

"Why, then, are we justified by faith? Because faith we apprehend the righteousness of Christ, which is the only medium of our reconciliation to God. But this [justification] you cannot attain, without at the same time attaining to sanctification.... Christ therefore justifies no one whom he does not also sanctify. For these benefits are perpetually and indissolubly connected, so that whom he illuminates with his wisdom, them he redeems; whom he redeems, he justifies; whom he justifies, he sanctifies.... Since, then, the Lord affords us the enjoyment of these blessings only in the bestowment of himself, he gives them [justification and sanctification] both together, and never one without the other. Thus we see how true it is that we are justified, not without works, yet not by works; since union with Christ, by which we are justified, contains sanctification as well as righteousness."

Models for Reformation: John Knox (1505-1572)

John Knox was ordained a priest in the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland at the time when John Calvin began the Reformation of Geneva. The flames of the Reformation began to be kindled in Scotland in the heart and mind of Knox's close friend George Wiseheart. Being on familiar terms with Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, Wiseheart was chosen by King Henry the Eighth for going to Scotland and interceding for the hand in marriage of Mary Stuart, the infant "Queen of Scots," with Edward, the infant son of the King of England. Wiseheart was an unwilling tool of King Henry in this matter and his action set Catholic Scotland against him. When Wiseheart was burned at the stake by Cardinal Beaton, the fires that consumed his body fired the heart of John Knox. From that hour he was the enemy of the Roman Catholic Church. Two years later, Beaton was assassinated by "parties unknown."

Shortly after the death of Beaton, John Knox came to Edinburgh as a newly ordained priest, having been accused of "hatching the plot" against the cardinal even though he did not personally take a hand in executing it. Soon Knox had a growing group of followers. He accused the Catholic clergy of Scotland of being "gluttons, wantons and licentious revelers, but who yet regularly and meekly partook of the sacrament." Knox traveled to Geneva three times to study under Calvin who had a high regard for the young Scotsman. Knox returned to Scotland, was married at age 38, and was widowed a few years afterward.

Then hell sent a close call for the Reformer in the person of Mary Queen of Scots. Mary's mother was Mary of Guise, a French woman married to King James of Scotland. Knox bore a terrible hatred toward Mary of Guise. His book, The First Blast of the Trumpet Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, had Mary Tudor, Mary of Guise, and Mary Queen of Scots, in mind. As soon as Mary Queen of Scots had landed on Scottish soil, Knox fled fearing for his life. Before long he returned to Scotland and sought a personal interview with the queen, then 20-years-old, "with intent to bring her heart to Jesus." Mary then tried her hand at converting Knox back to Roman Catholicism - or the "Mother Church" - with bribes of political power. Stormy interviews followed, punctuated by "covenantal lawsuits" served up by Knox and his followers.

In response to Knox's imprecatory prayers, Mary Queen of Scots is reputed to have said: "I fear the prayers of John Knox more than all the assembled armies of Europe." In response to the rising resistance of the Scottish Reformers, Mary fled Scotland and was later put to death by a court of English who had accused her of plotting to assassinate Elizabeth I. Knox was survived by the Scottish Covenanters, who drew up a compact in 1638 asserting their right, under God, to national sovereignty.

Models for Reformation: Covenantal Lawsuits of the Church of Scotland

Increasing persecution by the Catholic authorities against the Scottish Reformers in the 1500s led them to adopt a form of public prayer proclamations or "covenantal lawsuits." The intent of these prayer proclamations was to implore their enemies to come to the knowledge of salvation. If the wicked rulers refused to repent of their murders and idolatries, the Church, acting as an ecclesiastical court, was giving them over to hell. These declarations warned their oppressors to repent or suffer the consequences of facing a militant uprising led by the Church of Scotland. The text of one such proclamation reads as follows:

"To the generation of Antichrist, the pestilent prelates and their Shavelings within Scotland, the Congregation of Christ Jesus within the same, sayeth,

"To the end that ye shall not be abused, thinking to escape just punishment, after that ye in your blind fury have caused the blood of many to be shed, this we notify and declare unto you, that if ye proceed in this your malicious cruelty, ye shall be entreated, wheresoever ye shall be apprehended, as murderers and open enemies to God and unto mankind; and therefore, betimes cease from this blind rage. Remove first from your bands of bloody men of war, and reform yourselves to a more quiet life; and thereafter mitigate ye the authority which, without crime committed upon our part, ye have inflamed against us, or else be ye assured, that with the same measure that ye have inflamed against us, and yet intend to measure to others, it shall be measured unto you: That is, as ye by tyranny intend not only to destroy our bodies, but also by the same to hold our souls in bondage of the Devil, subject to idolatry, so shall we with all force and power, which God shall grant unto us, execute just vengeance and punishment upon you.

"Yea, we shall begin that same war which God commanded Israel to execute against the Canaanites; that is, contract of peace shall never be made till ye desist from your bloody idolatry and cruel persecution of God's children. And this we signify unto you in the name of the eternal God, and of his Son Jesus Christ, whose verity we profess, and Evangel we will have preached, and holy Sacraments rightly ministered, so long as God will assist us to gainstand your idolatry. Take this for advertisement and be not deceived."

The Scottish Covenanters refuted the idea of the "Divine Right of Kings" arguing that the King himself is in covenant with God. The people, as the king's subjects, were also a part of the covenant. Yes, God ordained earthly rulers, but only those who were just and obedient to God's law. If a king broke covenant with God, the people were obliged to throw off the shackles of tyranny - otherwise the people would be guilty of submitting to the unjust commandments of wicked rulers. John Knox implored the earthly rulers to submit themselves to God's authority:

"The name and the cloak of the authority, which ye pretend, will nothing excuse you in God's presence; but rather shall ye bear double condemnation; for that ye burden God, as that his good ordinance were the cause of your iniquity. All authority which God hath established, is good and perfect, and is to be obeyed of all men, yea under the pain of damnation. But do ye not understand, that there is a great difference betwix the authority which is God's ordinance, and the persons of those which are placed in authority? The authority and God's ordinance can never do wrong; for it commandeth, That vice and wicked men be punished, and virtue, with virtuous men and just, be maintained. But the corrupt person placed in this authority may offend, and most commonly doth the contrary hereof; and is then the corruption of the person to be followed, by reason that he is clad with the name of the authority? Or, shall those that obey the wicked commandment of those that are placed in authority be excusable before God? Not so; not so. But the plagues and vengeance of God taken upon kings, their servants, and subjects, do witness to us the plain contrary.

"Pharaoh was a king, and had his authority of God, who commanded his subjects to murder and torment the Israelites, and at last most cruelly to persecute their lives. But was their obedience (blind rage it should be called) excusable before God? The universal plague doth plainly declare that the wicked commander, and those that obeyed, were alike guilty before God. And if the example of Pharaoh shall be rejected because he was [a gentile], then let us consider the facts of Saul: He was a king anointed of God, appointed to reign over his people; he commanded to persecute David, because (as he alleged) David was a traitor and usurper of the crown; and likewise commanded Abimelech the High Priest and his fellows to be slain: But did God approve any part of this obedience? Evident it is that he did not. And think ye, that God will approve in you that which he did damn in others? Be not deceived: with God there is no such partiality. If ye obey the unjust commandments of wicked rulers, ye shall suffer God's vengeance and just punishment with them. And therefore as ye tender your own salvation, we most earnestly require of you moderation, and that ye stay yourselves, and the fury of others, from persecuting of us, till our cause be tried in lawful and open judgment."

The consequences of disobeying the covenant of God was suffering the severity of God's judgment. If the persecutors of the Scottish Church refused to repent, they would suffer excommunication. Knox and his followers knew that God himself would give victory to the Church. Judgment would come on their oppressors in some way, either in the case with Ananias and Saphira being struck down immediately (Acts 5:1-11); in the case of Simon the Sorcerer in being brought to repentance (Acts 8:18-24); in the case of Herod being struck down by disease (Acts 12:23); or in the case of Elymas the Sorcerer who was incapacitated by being struck by blindness (Acts 13:8-11). Armed uprising was not the first priority of the Church. They were first to dispense with all effective means of Church discipline. But armed resistance, as a last means of self defense, was never ruled out.

Models for Reformation: Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of England (1599-1658)

There is definitely an association between John Knox and Oliver Cromwell. Knox, in his book The Reformation of Scotland, outlined the whole process without which the British model of government under Oliver Cromwell never would not have been possible. Yet Knox was more consistently covenantal in his thinking. He recognized that civil government is based on a covenant between the magistrate (or the representative or king) and the populace. His view was that when the magistrate defects from the covenant, it is the duty of the people to overthrow him.

Cromwell was not a learned scholar, as was Knox, nevertheless God elevated him to a greater leadership role. Oliver Cromwell was born into a common family of English country Puritans having none of the advantages of upbringing that would prepare him to be leader of a nation. Yet he had a God-given ability to earn the loyalty and respect of men of genius who served him throughout his lifetime. John Bunyan, author of Pilgrim's Progress served under his command in the English Civil War, and John Milton, who penned Paradise Lost, served as his personal secretary.

Cromwell's early years were ordinary, but after a conversion experience at age 27, he was seized by a sense of divine destiny. He became suddenly zealous for God. He was a country squire, a bronze-faced, callous-handed man of property. He worked on his farm, prayed and fasted often and occasionally exhorted the local congregation during church meetings. A quiet, simple, serious-minded man, he spoke little. But when he broke his silence, it was with great authority as he commanded obedience without question or dispute. As a justice of the peace, he attracted attention to himself by collaring loafers at a tavern and forcing them to join in singing a hymn. This exploit together with quieting a disturbance among some student factions at the neighboring town of Cambridge earned him the respect of the Puritan locals and they sent him to Parliament as their representative. There he attracted attention with his blunt, forcible speech as a member of the Independent Party which was made up of Puritans.

The English people were bent upon the establishment of a democratic parliamentary system of civil government and the elimination of the "Divine Right of Kings." King Charles I, the tyrant who had long persecuted the English Puritans by having their ears cut off and their noses slit for defying his attempts to force episcopacy on their churches, finally clashed with Parliament over a long ordeal with new and revolutionary ideas. The Puritans, or "Roundheads" as they were called, finally led a civil war against the King and his Cavaliers.

When he discerned the weaknesses of the Roundhead army, Cromwell made himself captain of the cavalry. Cromwell had never been trained in war, but from the very beginning he showed consummate genius as a general. Cromwell understood that successful revolutions were always fought by farmers so he gathered a thousand hand-picked Puritans - farmers and herdsmen - who were used to the open fields. His regiment was nicknamed "Ironsides" and was never beaten once, although they fought greatly outnumbered - at times three to one.

It was an army the likes of which hadn't been seen since ancient Israel. They would recite the Westminster Confession and march into battle singing the Psalms of David striking terror into the heart of the enemy. Cromwell's tactic was to strike with the cavalry through the advancing army at the center, go straight through the lines and then circle to either the left or the right milling the mass into a mob, creating confusion and utterly destroying them. Cromwell amassed a body of troops and soon became commander-in-chief. His discipline created the only body of regular troops on either side who preached, prayed, paid fines for profanity and drunkenness, and charged the enemy singing hymns - the strangest abnormality in an age when every vice imaginable characterized soldiers and mercenaries.

In the meantime, Charles I invited an Irish Catholic army to his aid, an action for which he was tried for high treason and beheaded shortly after the war. After executing the national sovereign, the Parliament assumed power. The success of the new democracy in England was short-lived. Cromwell found that a democratic parliamentary system run by squires and lords oppressed the common people and was almost as corrupt as the rulership of the deposed evil king. As Commander-in-Chief of the army, he was able to seize rulership and served a term as "Lord Protector."

During the fifteen years in which Cromwell ruled, he drove pirates from the Mediterranean Sea, set English captives free, and subdued any threat from France, Spain and Italy. Cromwell made Great Britain a respected and feared power the world over. Cromwell maintained a large degree of tolerance for rival denominations. He stood for a national church without bishops. The ministers might be Presbyterian, Independent or Baptist. Dissenters were allowed to meet in gathered churches and even Roman Catholics and Quakers were tolerated. He worked for reform of morals and the improvement of education. He strove constantly to make England a genuinely Christian nation and she enjoyed a brief "Golden Age" in her history.

When Charles I was beheaded, the understanding was that he had broken faith with the people. Their view was that when the magistrate breaks faith, then he may legitimately be deposed. The Puritan understanding of the covenantal nature of government was the foundation for American colonial government. This was true of Massachusetts and Connecticut and to a lesser extent in the Southern colonies. When the Mayflower Compact was written, the Pilgrims had a covenantal idea of the nature of civil government. This was a foundation for later colonies established throughout the 1600s. These covenants were influenced by what Knox had done in Scotland and what the Puritans had done in England.

Models for Reformation: Puritan America (1620-1776)

The voices of Christian philosophers, authors and poets - men possessed of greater faculties of insight - had much to say about the destiny of our continent long before the United States came into existence. As the colonies began to prosper and grow, a group of English Puritans began to prophesy a new turn in history. While the American colonies were still in their infancy, they predicted growth in power and civilization, heralding a Western empire.

George Herbert (1593-1633), the Anglican poet, seeing the Puritan emigration to America, prompted by conscience and the desire for religious liberty, was inspired to write the famous verses:

"Religion stands on tiptoe in our land,
Ready to pass to the American strand."

Herbert died in 1632, twelve years after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, and two years after the larger movement of the Massachusetts Company which began the settlement of Boston. These verses were almost suppressed by the English government being unsympathetic to the Puritan cause and refusing the proper license for publication. They at last yielded, however, calling Herbert "a divine poet" and expressing the hope that "the world would not take him for an inspired prophet."¹

John Milton (1608-1674), author of Paradise Lost and the heroic Sonnets, wrote a treatise on the emigration of English Christians to America:

"What numbers of faithful and free-born Englishmen and good Christians have been constrained to forsake their dear dearest home, their friends and kindred, whom nothing but the wide ocean and the savage deserts of America could hide and shelter from the fury of the bishops! O, if we could but see the shape of our dear mother England, as poets are wont to give a personal form to what they please, how would she appear, think ye, but in a mourning weed, with ashes upon her head, and tears abundantly flowing from her eyes, to behold so many of her children exposed at once and thrust from things of dearest necessity, because their conscience could not assent to things which the bishops thought indifferent? Let the astrologer be dismayed at the portentous blaze of comets and impressions in the air, as foretelling troubles and changes to states; I shall believe there cannot be a more ill-boding sign to a nation (God turn the omen from us!) than when the inhabitants, to avoid insufferable grievances at home, are enforced by heaps to forsake their native country."²

Although such statements are not public prayer proclamations in the strictest sense, the English Puritan writings contain the covenantal model of the blessings and curses of God on nations. It may have been merely a practical understanding that England would suffer by losing its and most intelligent, industrious, prosperous and pious citizens. Yet the prophetic nature of the writings of the Puritans cannot be ignored.

We can view the First Great Awakening of 1740 as the impetus for issuing the Declaration of Independence to King George III in 1776. It would be stretching the truth to say that the Declaration was a type of covenantal lawsuit, yet it is undoubtful that through the waking up of the minds of all classes through the Great Awakening, Puritanism was carried into our form of civil government. The First Great Awakening produced a general discussion of the principles of freedom and human rights, the habit of contending for rights with religious zeal, and the preparation of the mind for all questions pertaining to civil government in the American colonies. Although it is true that there was a strong deistic influence at the time of the signing of the Declaration, there is no question that there were the residual effects of strong Puritan influence. The American Revolution could not have occurred without the 150-year-old Puritan foundation in America.

Thomas Jefferson, a man described by his contemporaries as "a French infidel in respect to religion" was ironically indebted to the Puritans for his model of civil government. The evangelical explosion of the Great Awakening in Puritan New England provided the seeds for the first Baptist churches to be planted in Episcopal Virginia, which held to a Calvinistic theology and a congregational form of church government. Jefferson gained his first clear idea of a republican government from seeing the congregationalism of a Baptist church in his vicinity. It was good politics, too, since he strengthened his party's stance among the people through an alliance with the Baptists and all friends of religious freedom.³

The Jeffersonian distinction between Church and State is very different from the idea promoted in our day. The very phrase "separation of Church and State" is very misleading. It is not a constitutional phrase but it came afterward in the writings of Jefferson. It originated as a Calvinist/Puritan distinction between the spheres of authority of church and civil government. The Church and the State are separate spheres of governmental authority. Separation of Church and State does not mean separation of the civil sphere from God. The issue is not whether the Church should intrude on the State's affairs. The Church should not. Neither should the State intrude on the Church's affairs. But Jesus Christ intercedes in the affairs of both. Civil government is not secular; it still stands under the moral Law of God. This was the understanding of most American legislators until the 20th century.

William Bradford: Governor of Plymouth Colony

William Bradford, the second governor of Plymouth colony elected to fill the place of the deceased John Carver, was responsible for the infant colony's success through great hardships. The Pilgrims were part of a strain of Puritanism known as Separatism, which denoted the aim to completely secede from the Church of England. The Pilgrims held to a Congregational rather than a Presbyterian form of church government.

Not all of the Plymouth colony were Christians, however, and some spoke of using their liberty in defiance of the Pilgrims. Unless they could be held together in unity there was little hope they would survive. The success of the Plymouth was based on covenantalism - the belief that men could form compacts or covenants in the sight of God as a basis for government without the consent of a higher authority. The church of the Pilgrims was already bound by a strict mutual covenant. But to include those outside of the church, a civil compact was drawn up - the constitution and foundation of a Christian democratic republic in the New World.

The Mayflower Compact acknowledged the right of everyone who signed it to share in the making and administering of laws and the right of the majority to rule. It was the constitution of a pure democracy, the principle of Congregational church government applied to the state. This was all the law they had for several years. It worked because they chose Christians as their leaders and all understood that they were to be self-governing under the moral law of God.

John Winthrop: First Governor of Massachusetts

While en route to the New World on board the Arabella, John Winthrop wrote a sermon entitled "A Model of Christian Charity," in which he outlined the purposes of God for New England. Winthrop had a deep understanding of God's divine purposes for the colony. "We shall be a city set on a hill," he said of Boston - where the church was the center of life during those early years of the city's history. He described a harmonious Christian community whose laws and government would logically proceed from a godly and purposeful arrangement.

John Winthrop also believed that this new form of government would help bring about a "Golden Age" and that one day all the nations of the world would copy this form of government: "We shall find that the God of Israel shall be among us, when ten of us shall be able to resist a thousand of our enemies; when He shall make us a praise and glory that men shall say of succeeding plantations, 'the Lord make it like that of New England.'"

But Winthrop also gave a warning: "The eyes of all people are upon us, so that if we deal falsely with our God in this work we have undertaken, and so cause us to withdraw His present help from us, we shall be made a story and a byword through the world."

Winthrop set out clearly the revealed purposes of God and warned that the success or failure of their endeavors would depend on their dedication to the ideal of selfless community. History shows us that this ideal was never realized, however, Winthrop laid the foundation for generations yet to come.

Models for Reformation: Cotton Mather

Cotton Mather was the most famous minister in New England at the close of the 17th century. Toward the middle of the 1600s, the Puritan revival in America began to wane. The social order of Puritan society had begun to degenerate very early in its history because of the lack of a much needed evangelical awakening.

The second generation of Puritans were often unable to claim that they had had the same experience with God as their parents. When the high standard of the law which was embraced by their parents was imposed in turn on their children, it only served to inflame their passions. The result was occurrences in the late 1600s such as the witchcraft hysteria, severe punishments for non-violent crimes such as the stocks, public floggings, hangings, etc.

"By the time Mather undertook his history, Magnalia Christi Americana, the original Puritan community had vanished, leaving behind heirs to its land and fortunes but not to its spirituality.... Everything that Mather wrote can be seen as a call to defend the old order of church authority against the encroachment of an increasingly secular world. As an apologist for the 'old New England way' there is no doubt that Mather left himself open to attack, and by the end of the 17th century he had become a scapegoat for the worst in Puritan culture."¹

Models for Reformation: Jonathan Edwards, The First Great Awakening

Jonathan Edwards, sometimes known as the postmillennialist's postmillennialist, is best known for his role in the Great Awakening, which began as a revival in several churches along the Connecticut River Valley. Through his preaching, revivalistic fervor spread like wildfire throughout the colonies. Evangelistic zeal and millennial hopes went hand and hand. Edwards' preaching that the millennium would commence in America fueled reformation zeal within our embryonic nation.

In his work, History of Redemption, Edwards saw all of human history as a progressive march toward victory for the kingdom of God. Edwards believed that revivals in the colonies were but a forerunner of what would commence in centuries to come - the ultimate glorious light of a "Golden Age." He taught that history moves through a pulsation of seasons of revival and spiritual awakening; that there are times of retreat and advance; that the work of revival is carried out by "remarkable outpourings of the Spirit."

Says Edwards: "Time after time, when religion seemed to be almost gone, and it was come to the last extremity, then God granted a revival, and sent some angel or prophet, or raised up some eminent person, to be an instrument of their reformation." Edwards himself was to be the instrument of New England's reformation in the 1730s and '40s. He always insisted that there would be times of conflict, remissions and lulls between the sovereign outpourings of the Spirit. A decline in the spiritual and moral character of our nation, according to Edwards, is to be interpreted as a preparation for an even greater outpouring.

Wesley to Wilberforce: Thought Upon Slavery

On February 24, 1791 at age 88, six days before his death, this last letter was addressed to William Wilberforce. Wesley had spoken out forcibly against slavery his whole life. In 1774, he wrote the influential Thoughts Upon Slavery.

Wilberforce, a Member of Parliament, was active at the time in the unsuccessful attempt to pass abolition. Debate continued for several years and in 1807 the abolition of slavery was effected throughout the British Empire.

The text of the letter is given below. The "tract" to which Wesley refers was written by a former slave, Gustavus Vassa who was born in 1745 in Africa, kidnapped and sold as a slave in Barbados. In 1757 he was sent to England and was converted to Christianity.

Dear Sir:

Unless the divine power has raised you up to be as "Athanasius against the world," I see not how you can go through your glorious enterprise in opposing that execrable villainy, which is the scandal of religion, of England, and of human nature. Unless God has raised you up for this very thing, you will be worn out by the opposition of God and devils. But if God be for you, who can be against you? Are all of them stronger than God? O be not weary of well doing! Go on, in the name of God in the power of His might, till even American slavery (the vilest that ever saw the sun) shall vanish away before it.

Reading this morning a tract wrote by a poor African, I was particularly struck by the circumstance, that a man who has black skin, being wronged or outraged by a white man, can have no redress; it being a LAW in our Colonies that the OATH of a black man against a white goes for nothing. What villainy is this!

That He who has guided you from youth up may continue to strengthen you in this and all things is the prayer of, dear sir,

Your affectionate servant,

John Wesley

The Christian Abolitionists

By Jay Rogers
11/90

In the early 1800s, Christian evangelists were seeing thousands of individual's lives changed through the preaching of the Gospel. Charles G. Finney and other reformers of this time believed that Jesus Christ, working in the lives of a perfected people, was going to change the world.

Up until the early 1800s, those within the abolitionist movement saw the elimination of slavery as a long, slow process. But it was not until the preaching of Charles G. Finney that Americans began to realize that slavery could be done away with suddenly, once and for all.

Charles G. Finney, the great revival preacher, recorded in his Memoirs, "I had made up my mind on the question of slavery, and was exceedingly anxious to arouse public attention to the subject. In my prayers and preaching, I so often alluded to slavery, and denounced it, that a considerable excitement came to exist among the people."¹

The excitement that accompanied Finney's revivals affected one young man named Theodore Weld. Weld was initially and vehemently opposed to Finney's work, but was converted in Utica, New York, during one of Finney's meetings. Weld was a formidable enemy to Mr. Finney, but after his salvation he became an ardent supporter. Weld traveled with Finney, assisting the preacher in his meetings and later emerged as a student leader at Lane Seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio.²

For a period of time when Weld traveled with Finney, he was taught the biblical view of sin and its effects on the individual and society. Finney believed that individuals could be liberated from sin and that sin in society could be confronted and overthrown through preaching the Gospel. Anything that was destructive or dehumanizing to the human race was deemed as sin.

Studying the Old Testament story of the tribes of Israel and their liberation from slavery in Egypt, as well as the teachings of Jesus Christ, both Finney and Weld came to a common conclusion: slavery was sin. Therefore, it had to be rooted out and destroyed immediately. It could not be tolerated, not even temporarily. Slavery, according to Finney and Weld's view, must be attacked and overthrown by the power of God's Holy Spirit in the believer's life.

Other Christians such as Lyman Beecher, Harriet Beecher Stowe and William Lloyd Garrison emerged later and did much to fan the flames of the abolitionist movement. From beginning to end, the most notable abolitionists were Christians who had dedicated their lives to bringing social justice to America.

Women's Suffrage

By Jay Rogers

11/90

Coupled with the abolitionist movement was a growing women's rights movement, which demanded that the same rights guaranteed in the Constitution to men be extended to women also. The women's movement in America was birthed out of the ranks of the abolitionists. As Christian women began to speak out for the rights of blacks in their country, they began to realize that they, too, were victims of slavery.

In a recent study of 51 of the major women leaders of the abolition-feminist movement, 48 came from Christian backgrounds.¹ Some of these women included Lucretia Mott, an evangelical Quaker who helped to found the Anti-Slavery Society in 1833; Angelina Grimké, who presented female anti-slavery petitions to the Massachusetts state legislature; as well as Lucy Stone and Susan B. Anthony.

Popularized by New Awakening evangelicals, the women's movement gained momentum when people began to realize that there was no biblical support for inequality between the sexes. In Jesus' encounter with Mary and Martha, they found proof that Jesus valued women's roles as disciples. Jesus' rebuke to Martha clearly showed that women were not to be relegated to works of service toward men.²

In the fifth chapter of Genesis, they found evidence that God had created men and women as equals: "In the day when God created man, He made him in the likeness of God. He created them male and female, and He blessed them and named them 'Man' in the day when they were created."³

The fight for justice and equality was the direct result of action taken by those with a Christian worldview. Most of these women suffered mistreatment, yet their courageous stance was shaped by a biblical view of sin and righteousness. They were willing to risk their honor to take up the work of both abolition and women's suffrage.

They often pointed to the example of Jesus who died to bring salvation to the world. Their great courage and willingness to sacrifice was expressed in the words of Lucy Stone, writing in a letter to her mother, "Without the shedding of blood, there is not remission for sin."⁴

Models for Reformation: Charles Finney, 19th Century Revivalist

"Now the great business of the Church is to reform the world, to put away every kind of sin. The Church of Christ was originally organized to be a body of reformers ... the Christian Church was designed to make aggressive movements in every direction - to lift up her voice and put forth her energies against iniquity in high and low places - to reform individuals, communities and governments, and never rest until the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High God - until every form of iniquity be driven from the earth."¹

The foremost itinerant revivalist of the Second Great Awakening was also the leader of many reform movements of the early 1800s. Finney taught that man had the ability and moral responsibility to repent of any and all sin. He identified the social and moral problems of the day as sin that must be repented of immediately. Social reforms which Finney championed included abolition, dietary reform, dueling, education, gambling, hygiene and temperance. As the president of Oberlin College, he pioneered co-education of the sexes and enrolled both blacks and whites. The first black woman in America to receive a degree graduated from Oberlin.

His most controversial measures included allowing women to lead prayer during meetings, appealing by name to sinners while preaching, long protracted meetings without a planned format, and teaching the possibility, even the necessity, of totally eradicating sin both in the individual and in society. Some estimate that over 80 percent of his converts during the revivals stayed true to Christ without ever backsliding. In later years, he moved away from sensationalism and put more emphasis on the power of the Holy Spirit through prayer.

William & Catherine Booth: Founders of the Salvation Army

William and Catherine Booth, founders of the Salvation Army, devoted their lives to serving the industrial urban poor of London. In 1864, William began a mission in one of London's worst districts which became a tightly knit, selfless, zealous military organization. Their unconventional methods - open air meetings held in the streets with drums and musical instruments - encountered violent opposition. Members were often arrested for "disturbing the peace."

Catherine, a powerful public speaker, was effective in reaching and caring for women. Reading Song of Songs 6:4, "Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners," Catherine Booth realized that it was the Church's destiny to be an army of reformers. Her brilliant preaching and writing affected hundreds of thousands. Her temperance tracts, written under an assumed name, were widely distributed throughout Europe.

William Booth published In Darkest England and the Way Out in 1890 describing the economic, social and moral problems of London. The book prescribed rescue homes for prostitutes, a farm colony, suburban villages, a poor man's bank and preventative homes for girls. The book was a blueprint for the rehabilitation of an entire nation, a grand social reconstruction plan a century ahead of its time.

The works of Christian social compassion and practical concern launched by this holy army are legendary. Almost every type of outreach and care for the poor and downtrodden imaginable were both attempted and usually successfully implemented by this radical band.

Martin Niemöller: The Resistance (1892-1984)

Martin Niemöller had been a World War I hero as a German naval lieutenant and U-boat commander. He was ordained as a Lutheran pastor in 1924. One of the earliest Protestant critics of Nazism, he and a few brave Lutherans formed a resistance movement called the "Confessional Church" of about 3,000 pastors. Dietrich Bonhoeffer, author of The Cost of Discipleship, came into contact with Niemöller when he joined the "Pastor's Emergency League," which was formed under Niemöller.

In The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, William L. Shirer describes the spiritual pattern that led to the mass slaughter of human beings. In the chapter entitled "The Persecution of the Christian Churches," Shirer points to a sterilization law passed in 1933 as the event which began the persecution of Christians and Jews throughout Germany.

"On July 25 [1933], ... the German government promulgated a sterilization law, which particularly offended the Catholic Church. Five days later the first steps were taken to dissolve the Catholic Youth League. During the next years, thousands of Catholic priests, nuns and lay leaders were arrested, many of them on trumped up charges of 'immorality' or of 'smuggling foreign currency.'"

Abortion was also made legal during this time. This was the spiritual impetus which brought a revival of human sacrifices being offered to ancient pagan deities - complete with Nazi rituals - to the forefront. The Holocaust was preceded by vast pageants which Hitler used to promote neo-Paganism. Among the various sects of Protestants (most of which had adopted liberal theology and had apostatized in the late 1800s), a new "German Church" was instituted:

"Dr. Reinholdt Krause, the Berlin district leader of the sect, proposed the abandonment of the Old Testament, 'with its tales of cattle merchants and pimps' and the revision of the New Testament with the teaching of Jesus corresponding entirely with the demands of National Socialism. Resolutions were drawn up demanding 'One People, One Reich, One Faith,' requiring all pastors to take an oath of allegiance to Hitler and insisting that all churches institute the Aryan paragraph and exclude converted Jews."

Pastors who resisted the neo-Pagan religion of the Nazis were jailed. Many were eventually led to the gas ovens of the concentration camps. Millions of Jews and Christians were executed. The sad state of the liberal Protestant churches led Germany to this holocaust. Although there were enough evangelical Christian leaders strategically positioned throughout Germany in the 1930s to resist Hitler; only a few stood against him.

"Not many Germans lost much sleep over the arrests of a few thousand pastors and priests or over the quarreling of Protestant sects. And even fewer paused to reflect that under the leadership of Rosenberg, Borman and Himmler, who were backed by Hitler, the Nazi regime intended to destroy Christianity in Germany, if it could, and substitute the old paganism of the early tribal Germanic gods and the new paganism of the Nazi extremists. As Bormann, one of the men closest to Hitler, said in 1941, 'National Socialism and Christianity are irreconcilable.'"

As the methods of oppression by the Nazis grew worse, the resistance movement justified previously unimagined types of disobedience. For Niemöller and the resistance, the plan to assassinate a tyrant was a matter of obedience to God. They reasoned that Hitler was anti-Christ, therefore they decided to join the underground plan to eliminate him. Niemöller remained a key figure in the resistance movement until his arrest and imprisonment. In 1937, Niemöller preached his last sermon in the Third Reich knowing that he was soon to be arrested:

"We have no more thought of using our own powers to escape the arm of authorities than had the Apostles of old. No more are we ready to keep silent at man's behest when God commands us to speak. For it is, and must remain, the case that we must obey God rather than man."

Under orders from Hitler, he was imprisoned and finally transferred to the infamous Dachau concentration camp until the end of the war in 1945. He emerged from his years of detention as a towering symbol of the Church's struggle. In his travels to America, he addressed over two hundred audiences, sometimes with the concluding words that have become famous:

"First, they came for the socialists, and I did not speak out because I was not a socialist. Then they came for the trade unionists, and I did not speak out because I was not a trade unionist. Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out because I was not a Jew. Then they came for me, and there was no one left to speak for me."

Niemöller did much more than speak out, however, as did his friend Dietrich Bonhoeffer. As a consequence, Bonhoeffer lost his life and Niemöller lost eight years of his freedom.

William L. Shirer, The Rise and Fall the Third Reich (Simon and Schuster, New York, 1960) p.234-239. Christian History, "Dietrich Bonhoeffer," Issue 32 (Vol. X, No.4), p.20.

Applying Models for Reformation: The United States in the 1990s

It has been said that drastic times call for drastic measures. Today, we have a situation in our nation in which civil authorities will not uphold the moral law of God. Together with covenant-breaking policies of the current presidential administration, we have new federal laws, foreign to the philosophy of the Puritans and our founding fathers, directed against Christians who would champion the moral law of God. Ultimately, the Church believes not in revolution, but in regeneration and reformation. That is not to say that revolution in all circumstances is wrong. Someday we may have to defend ourselves from an oppressive government.

Any idea of violence or revolution should be the last resort, but it is something that we cannot rule out. At some point, it may become necessary for Christians to institute a competitive government to bring lasting reformation. This competitive or "shadow" government would be similar to what happened in the time of John Knox, Oliver Cromwell, or at the time of the American Revolution when the colonists broke away from England by electing a Continental Congress.

There have been many instances of societal reformation led by the Church which we may view as models for our present situation. What we are seeing today in the reemergence of Christian conservative activism is an instinctive gut reaction. We know that lawlessness in our society is prominent and we sense a need for godly leadership. But we need to have a long term, principled, theological response to the situation. With the recent groundswell of political conservatism in the Church, we must also have a revival of neo-Puritanism, an understanding of the authority of the Law of God, and a covenantal model of government.

Of course, this model needs to begin in the churches. But our age is an antinomian age. When Paul says, "For you are not under law, but under grace" (Romans 6:14), for so long that has been interpreted to mean that the moral law of God does not have any effect on our lives. But Paul was saying that the Law was not over us in a sentence of death because we have been justified. We do not adhere to the Law as a basis for justification. But after we are justified, the Law is the standard for sanctification. The Church has to understand and preach the law of God as the only standard. We can't undo over 150 years of antinomianism in the Church in two or three years. It has to be done incrementally.

If we are to have reformation in society, first there must be a neo-Puritan revival in the Church. We say that this revival must be "neo-Puritan" because only the revivals of this strain have brought lasting societal transformation in past centuries. The "renewal" movements of the 20th century have been sadly pietistic and mystical, lacking the transforming power of the Great Awakenings. What passes for "revival" in modern times is merely a tickling of the fancies of our whimsical, man-centered 20th century evangelicalism.

A crucial step in promoting a neo-Puritan awakening in our society would be the institution of a "shadow" civil government. This would be an excellent place to start, but the steps toward declaring an alternate government are enormous tasks.

First, there has to be greater unity in the Church. We would do that not by getting rid of distinctives, but by establishing the bare minimum distinctives. Unity would be based on historic orthodoxy found in the councils and creeds of the early Church. Councils or presbyteries could be formed on the basis of a Church covenant between local churches of specific regions. All churches could work together - from Reformed to Baptist, Methodist, Independent, Charismatic - to whoever affirmed the core elements of Christianity.

Second, a national synod (or council of churches) could be called several times a year. A number of representatives from each local presbytery could be sent. These could include pastors, church members, and also representatives who currently hold elected and appointed civil offices. The first step would be to get together and hold a national conference to discuss the platform and goals of the new Christian Commonwealth. Then representatives could be elected with consent of their local church bodies.

But first, there is the strong necessity of catholicity. Unity is necessary before we can have this kind of shadow government. Theological dialogue and education on all levels is a prerequisite. Holding ecclesiastical courts, as did John Knox and the Church of Scotland, could lead to instituting a shadow government, as did Oliver Cromwell and the English Puritans. We could begin by issuing proclamations to the leaders of the country and to people who are involved in the abortion industry. These proclamations would state that they are in violation of the moral law of God by promoting abortion and other ungodly injunctions. Our civil legislators would be called upon to repent or suffer the wrath of God.

The filing of these "covenantal lawsuits" presupposes that the Church has specifically endowed power from the Lord according to Matthew 16:19 that "whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven." The Church is an earthly extension of the heavenly throne room. When we are operating according to the Word of God and we make declarations, they mean something - not just in heaven but on earth. We are saying that authority is given to us in heaven and also here on earth because we are the Church of God. John the Baptist shook his finger in the face of the king and said, "It is not lawful for you to have her" (Matthew 14:4). The Church needs to do that as well.

The national synod could be called several times a year for the purpose of issuing various statements in opposition to the ruling power. For instance, if a president of the United States signs executive orders supporting fetal tissue research, the "Christian Commonwealth" could issue a proclamation stating disagreement. If there ever came a time of a great monumental national disaster, which happens all-too-frequently in history, the Church would then be wise to be prepared to assume leadership. But most Christians are not adequately prepared for that because of a faulty theology. Even so, it is something that we need to be thinking about.

The Church needs to be prepared to directly confront the federal government through elected representatives who are born-again and hold to a covenantal theology. This presupposes that the Church is responsible for training civil leaders who will not only take a stand for righteousness, but who also have a covenantal theology undergirding their legislative activism. Once again, we need to throw off the crippling notion of the "Divine Right of Kings." Many modern evangelicals falsely believe that all powers which exist are ordained by God. Scripture clearly indicates that only those powers which are covenantal are ordained of God. The Church must reform, resist and, if necessary, overthrow powers which are lawless. This is what the Presbyterians and Puritans did in Scotland, England and America.

We also need modern day Oliver Cromwells who can correctly discern the weaknesses of the current "army" of street activists. There is a biblical basis for the Church to personify Wisdom "crying out in the gates of the city." But we need to have responsible Christian "generals" who will maintain a correct spirit and doctrine in prophetic social activism. These leaders would serve as representatives of the Christian Commonwealth on the level of the local presbyteries.

We may even come to a place where church leaders, such as Cromwell, will become responsible to form armed militias that may defend our families and communities from a tyrannical federal government, as did also the pastors of many Congregational, Baptist and Presbyterian churches at the time of the American Revolution. The Christian Commonwealth should state emphatically from the outset that we would take every conceivable step to avoid every violent conflict with a hostile government. However, we ought to throw off the Ghandist pacifistic notion that armed conflict is wrong in all circumstances. We need to be prepared to defend ourselves if wrongfully attacked.

Another important strategy is to have both church and civil leaders understand that there is a covenantal basis for the separation of Church and State spheres of government, as did the American Puritans. In this way, we would be able to fully articulate our views in the "public square" when those who enforce power unlawfully would attempt to intimidate United States citizens and rob them of their God-given rights and duties in the civil arena. Even civil leaders who are not Christians would be constrained to legislate according to the moral law of God. John Hancock, Samuel Adams and Thomas Jefferson were civil leaders who were educated by the church as to the civil leader's obligation to defend the rights of the people against tyranny.

In the meantime, we need to keep pressing our advantage. The Church should begin by making public prayer proclamations against sin in our society. We must declare the areas in which the civil government has violated the moral Law of God. And this we must do fearlessly.

"They that forsake the law praise the wicked, but they that keep the law shall resist them" (Proverbs 28:4).

The Battle for World Dominion

by Ron Boehme

Recently I saw a copy of a letter from a young, zealous, French Marxist that was written to a friend who had become a Christian. What he had to say was both intriguing and very sobering. Here is the essential body of that letter:

"The gospel is a much more powerful weapon for the renewal of society than is our Marxist philosophy, but all the same it is we who will finally beat you. We are only a handful and you Christians are numbered by the millions. But if you remember the story of Gideon and his three hundred companions, you will understand why I am right ... We Communists do not play with words. We are realists and seeing that we are determined to achieve our objective we know how to obtain the means.

"Of our salaries and wages we keep only what is strictly necessary, and we give the rest for propaganda purposes. To this propaganda we also 'consecrate' all of our free time, and part of our holidays. You, however, give only a little time and hardly any money for the spreading of the gospel of Christ. How can anyone believe in the supreme value of this gospel, if you do not practice it, and if you sacrifice neither time nor money for it?

"Believe me, it is we who will win, for we believe in our communist message and are willing to sacrifice everything, even our life, in order that social justice may triumph. But you people are afraid to soil your hands."¹

This young man knew something, as a Marxist, to which most people on earth are totally oblivious. In the world today, a great battle is taking place for the hearts and minds of men and nations. For this young man it was a battle that was worth fighting for, and worth winning.

This committed young Communist had made his commitment, and was doing everything in his power to change his society. He chastised his Christian friend for the shallowness and apathy of the brand of Christianity that he was familiar with. He questioned whether Christians really believed in the value of the gospel. He ridiculed their unwillingness to give time and resources to their cause. He said they were "afraid to soil their hands." And he boldly proclaimed that he and the cause of communism would ultimately win because they believed in their message and were willing to sacrifice for it.

This young man was right about one thing: There is a great contest going on in the earth for the prize of world dominion. This has always been true, and has its basis in the two competing kingdoms, but in terms of reality and manifestation, it has come down to a war between a number of competing worldviews. In many ways, the direction that the 21st century will take boils down to the outcome of this battle.

As Christians, we first of all need to understand the war that we are in. Then we need to commit ourselves to participate in the army of the Lord Jesus Christ. The war is well into motion, and many troops and platoons have taken the field. But the outcome is far from settled, and in this, we have the privilege of participating on the victorious side.

Worldviews in Conflict

Abraham Kuyper said near the turn of this century that he believed there were five primary worldviews that were battling for dominion upon the earth. There are, of course, many more religions and philosophies than that, but Mr. Kuyper believed that the majority of them fit into one of five categories (the others were so insignificant that they weren't worthy of mention): They were:

- * Paganism - (including Hinduism, Buddhism, other Eastern religions, New Age philosophy, etc.)
- * Islam
- * The Institutional Church - (consisting of "mainline" Protestant denominations and Catholicism.)
- * Modernism - (which includes Marxism, humanism, and any other carryovers from the Enlightenment.)
- * Biblical Christianity

Dr. Kuyper believed that these religions or philosophies basically encompassed all of humanity. At the least, these five competing worldviews were the most powerful forces for the development of culture and change that existed in the world. Let's take a brief look at these five worldviews. Their ideas and concepts give birth to a myriad of consequences!

Paganism - This overall Eastern concept of reality teaches that God is actually in creation, making all idols and human beings a part of the "divine." This is classic pantheism, and gives birth to a panorama of idolatry as evidenced in the Far East. In this framework some men rise to become "god-men" (maharishis, the Buddha, etc.), and in ancient cultures were known to rise to a place of divine despotism (as in Egypt, Greece, Rome, India, Japan etc.). Since divinity is found in all creation, any development of resources and the environment is upsetting the "divine ecology." Progress and development is thus discouraged, and the result is poverty and backwardness.

Islam - The Islamic view of life teaches that there is a God (Allah) that rules all of life, but he is distant and distinct with no essential link with his creation. The Moslem religion has generally a low view of man, and believers are encouraged to subjugate, convert, and even exterminate unbelievers as an act of worship to Allah. There is little individual conscience and human rights here. Women are inferior to men, and thus become exploited as in the Western playboy philosophy.

This idea carries over into the Islamic idea of the world, which is also a plaything to be exploited and not developed. For this reason, most Moslem nations are poor and undeveloped, and would be, if it were not for oil, the most impoverished nations on earth.

The Institutional Church - This primarily Catholic view of Christianity teaches that the Church is the mystical link between God the Creator and His creation. As the source of God's revelation on earth, only the Church can accurately interpret God's ways and designs in history.

This idea tends to produce a hierarchy or class system among men, with a class of priests, bishops, and pope giving leadership at the top. It also produces the concept of the divine right of kings and the state church structures which Lutheranism carried on. In this view, the world and the church are in total conflict which will not be resolved until the coming of Christ's future and perfect kingdom. This hope in the future tends to create a large feudal class, and does not encourage much development in this present sinful world.

Modernism - This is the modern tree of atheism with its offshoots of humanism and Marxism. God is dead, and man is alone in the universe to rise to leadership and divinity. He must be his own savior. Men are all equal (except in Marxism where some men are more equal than others), and there is no God to raise up some and put others down. This is the role of the state, either through humanistic democracy, socialism, or the total authoritarianism of communism.

In this view the world has been constantly and randomly evolving, and needs movements of radical change through revolution to aid it along. Revolution is viewed as progress and development, regardless of the effects on the environment and physical world.

Biblical Christianity - This is the non-institutional approach to Christianity as revealed in the Scriptures and seen in the life of many Bible-believing movements. God the Creator and His creation are historically linked together through Christ, brought together by the Holy Spirit, and intellectually linked through the Bible. God is available to every believer. Men are all equal before God and His Word, and many authorities have been given to create harmony and freedom. Regarding the world, man is responsible for culture, and is to bring all aspects of the world under Christ's Lordship.

It is within these worldviews that the battle for planet earth has been waging for thousands of years. Every once in awhile a new offshoot of a certain form comes into existence (like the 20th century phenomenon of Marxism-communism), but the main roots have been there for eons of time. Each of these systems, despite their great differences, is a total worldview that produces a comprehensive orientation toward life.

As Dr. Kuyper surveyed this truth, and analyzed the need of the day in which he lived, he came to the conclusion that if true Christianity were to win the war for the minds of men (world evangelism) it needed to be taught and lived out as a total way of life - not a half-baked philosophy that was tucked away in the religious cubby-hole of the mind. To triumph it had to be true. To be true, it had to be more powerful and comprehensive than the rest. Comparing it to the assault of modernism, he proclaimed:

"If the battle is to be fought with honor and with a hope of victory, then principle must be arrayed against principle; then it must be felt that in Modernism the vast energy of an all-embracing life-system assails us, then also it must be understood that we have to take our stand in a life-system of equally comprehensive and far-reaching power."²

It had to be the truth of the Bible lived out in every dimension of life. Then and only then would it be worthy to compete in the battle of the times.

The Essentials of a Victorious Worldview

As I have pondered these different life-systems, and analyzed their appeal and historical effectiveness, I have come to the conclusion that there are certain elements within them that are crucial to their success. All of these aspects come from biblical Christianity, and are either borrowed or perverted. After all, it is only God's ways that work, but men can take them as truths and apply them for selfish gain in everyday life. The good things of God can be used wrongly by men, and in doing so, the strengths of the principles themselves will often shine through the evil of the motive involved.

There are principles of leadership and principles of victory. To the degree that a religion or philosophy lives out those truths, will be to the degree that their worldview rises to prominence in human affairs. Let us now look at these essential ingredients:

A victorious worldview must first be able to provide a sense of destiny and hope. It has to be able to look into the future and offer its adherents a plan of victory and a spiritual sense of the inevitability of its cause. It has to be seen as progressive, and that which offers the greatest amount of hope and purpose to the individual or society. Ray Sutton explains, "The major ideologies of the world have all held to some concept of destiny: Christianity, Islam, Marxism. All three implicitly espouse a doctrine of destiny. That is, each person believes that the world belongs to him, and that someday the world will be dominated by his religion."³

Without this concept of destiny or determination, it will not be viewed as worthy of extensive propagation. And the spreading of its sound to many others is central to its plan - it wants to, and believes that it can conquer the world. It is out of this fountain of inevitable triumph that its rallying cry builds momentum and power.

Secondly, a victorious religion or life-system must inspire a great degree of zeal, commitment, and character. Without the strength of a strong ethical base, it cannot begin to accomplish its task. The world is a big place. There are many people in it and many obstacles to overcome. So a triumphant worldview must be successful in creating in its people a willingness to sacrifice, work tirelessly, and have the strength of character and diligence to achieve its goals. Commitment of character becomes the ultimate advantage in the war of competing ideologies. In the end, in most cases, those who want the victory the most will rise to possess it. This is the law of labor and discipline. A successful life system has found a way to make its goal appear worthy of sacrifice unto victory.

And lastly, a victorious worldview needs to find strength and continuity in a written absolute. It needs to have a "book" to guide its movement and development. It cannot span the generations without a written ideal that makes its way into the hearts and minds of its followers. Without some guiding light of "revelation" it cannot stand the test of time and debate. It must be worthy of scrutiny. A written manifesto for the adherents to live by is an essential source of strength and continuance. Without it, the emotions can die and the passions be lost. It needs a foundation that it perceives to be "true," and this usually takes the form of its written doctrine and beliefs.

There are a number of other things that are important to a victorious worldview, but I believe that these three things: destiny, character, and a written absolute are the most foundational and essential. In the end, the worldview must work to be victorious, but this is not essential to its primary spreading and initial effectiveness.

Which Philosophy Will Rule?

The philosophy of pantheism and its many Eastern offshoots (including the current New Age movement) has millions of adherents, but no gripping appeal. Especially in the New Age version, it possesses a general sense of destiny, but in its true Eastern forms, this destiny is simply the continual cycle of life that is monotonous and endless. Very few are willing to propagate for very long a philosophy without a clear vision of triumph. Even less will be willing to give their lives for a cause this germane. And paganism by definition contains so many gods, that there is no way of verifying its accuracy and absolutes. Especially in written form!

Likewise, the institutional church will not rise to give major leadership in the coming years. Those years of supremacy and infallibility are behind her, and many peoples and nations have been left with a very dry taste in their mouths. The church as an institution possesses the "Book" that contains a sense of destiny, power for character, and is her written absolute, but her mystical understanding of relationship to Christ, and her relegation of the Bible to the priesthood and hierarchy have kept its power out of the lives of the common man.

As to the conflict with the world, the church has given up, and rather placidly awaits the return of Christ's kingdom. But there is nothing in this world to live and die for - there simply is a "wait," and this lack of vision and practical power only condemns the religious to a life of either asceticism, or in the norm, mediocrity.

As we near the 21st century, the battle lines are increasingly being formed and clearly drawn. Three major religion-philosophies:

- * Humanism-Marxism-Communism

- * Islam

* and biblical Christianity will vie in mortal combat for supremacy in the earth. They will do so through varying means and methods. But nonetheless, a war will be waged for the hearts and minds of the billions who must choose. Everyone must choose. The further we go, the narrower the choices will become.

I believe that we are living in a day that will be the church's finest hour. Though the polarization will be great, and the problems be multiplied world-over, an opportunity will be presented to us to take the dominion of Christ into all the earth in love, in strength, and in glory.

To do so, we must have a true worldview that presents the comprehensive plan of Christ's salvation to every person on earth. We will need to rise up as biblical Christians and present the claims of the Lord Jesus Christ to every dimension of life.

Lee Grady is right when he says, "It is imperative for Christians in this generation to lay hold of our biblical philosophy of world dominion. God has not purposed for the Communists to rule the world, and they will not succeed in their plan to do so. The Bible speaks clearly that a generation of Christians will take dominion over the world, and if we could commit ourselves wholly to that idea, we could be that generation.⁴

Biblical Christianity - the seeking of the true kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven - is the answer to the needs of the hour. This has always been true, and the war for supremacy has always been fought over this reality. But many of us have not seen it as a comprehensive worldview that alone can subdue the earth.

A generation ago, this lack of understanding had a staggering result. Listen to this amazing story told by the great Methodist preacher Dr. E. Stanley Jones:

"I was speaking in a cathedral in West Germany on the kingdom of God. On the front seats were prominent German leaders. As I spoke they kept pounding their benches with their fists. I was puzzled. I did not know what it meant. Was it for me or against me? But at the close they revealed what the beating of the benches meant: 'You seem to sense why we turned to Nazism. Life for us was at loose ends - compartmentalized. We needed something to bring life back into wholeness, into total meaning and goal. We thought Nazism could bring that wholeness. But it let us down, let us down in blood and ruin. We chose the wrong totalitarianism. We now see that what we were seeking for was the kingdom of God, but we didn't know it. That's why we pounded the benches, we missed the kingdom of God.'

"That opened my eyes. I saw in a flash the meaning of these various revolts - the totalitarian revolts, the revolts of youth, the revolt of the races. Are they not all seeking for the kingdom of God and don't know it? The answer is yes ... Someday it will dawn upon them and then we will have the greatest spiritual awakening that this planet has ever seen. For men need nothing so much as they need an absolute from which they can work out to the relativisms of the hour - some master light of all their seeing."5

They missed the kingdom of God, and a world was plunged into war. In the coming mighty battle, will we as biblical Christians so reveal Christ's kingdom to the earth that the results will be quite different?

A Call for Action

The only way that Satan can ever rule over men is by deceiving them into setting up his system. Only when he has secured his power base and the nations are too enmeshed to extract themselves will Satan show his hand.

We know that Satan's strategy is to deceive the world, but it is not enough to know this. God expects us to do something to oppose Satan's plan. Since we have been given minds with which to think, we need to look around at the world in which we live and ask the question, "How does Satan deceive the masses of the people of the world?"

It seems to me that for Satan to deceive the world, he must gain control of the news media and the educational institutions. Of the two, the educational institutions are by far the more important. People who are well educated in truth can not be easily misled nor fooled over a long period of time. For example, people who know the true history of what has happened to the economy of nations ruled by communists cannot be fooled by learned professors who extol the virtues of the prosperity of the communist worker's paradise. Only those who do not know the true history of the endless economic disasters would believe these platitudes and lies. The ignorant cannot long remain free.

Freedom's Requirements

There are two indispensable requirements for a free society. There must be a large enough segment of society to stabilize and direct the society in the ways of freedom, and this controlling segment must be (1) moral and (2) educated. It must be moral in its values and actions. It must be educated in truth and wisdom. Immorality and ignorance are always destructive to a free society.

What does this have to do with America's freedom and future?

President Reagan, at the beginning of his term in office, asked a group of qualified people to evaluate the status of education in America. In their report they stated that the level of education was so bad that if an enemy nation had done this to us, it would have called for a declaration of war.

Starting in 1963, when the federal government began spending billions of dollars on education, the Scholastic Aptitude Test scores for high school seniors began a steady decline that by 1980 had gone down 74 points. At the present the decline in scores has stopped, but there has been no substantial recovery in spite of spending over $300 billion per year on education.

Adult illiteracy is increasing at a rate of 1.5 million per year. A nationwide math test of 17- year-olds asked the question, "How much would it take to repay a $850 loan for one year at 12% simple interest." Only 6 percent could solve the problem. Fourteen percent of adults could not identify the United States on a world map. Almost half could not find the state of New York or Illinois. Twenty-five percent could not identify the Pacific Ocean or the Soviet Union.

But the greatest tragedy of all is the appalling ignorance of history. The vast majority of Americans have not been taught meaningful history of Western civilization and therefore do not understand why it has been the predominant civilization and what the principles, values and morals were that created it.

It has been in the Western civilization where the common man has gained relative freedom and the United States has gained the highest pinnacle of liberty for its people. From Western civilization has come the great advances in science, industry and government. The printing press, automobile, airplane, radio, electric light, and nearly the total array of power and scientific tools of the modern world are the products of Western culture.

And the major distinctive factor of Western culture from the other cultures of the world has been its Christian religious foundation. Freedom and scientific knowledge have emerged from a Christian heritage. No one can understand Europe, and more particularly America, unless they have some knowledge of the Bible and its influence on men and governments. A man may reject God, but he cannot understand the modern world and be ignorant of the Scripture.

Could You Pass The Test?

On a plane trip I interviewed eight adults, all of whom had graduated from high school and two of whom were college graduates, and asked them 14 questions to test their general knowledge of the Bible and history. I asked them if they had ever heard the expression and could explain: "Manna from heaven," "being a good Samaritan," "as old as Methuselah," and "the patience of Job." I asked if they could identify and tell me anything about John Wycliffe, Martin Luther, John Calvin, and John Wesley.

Five scored zero, and the highest score was 22 percent correct. These were intelligent people, but the educational system had failed to educate them about the scripture and some of the most important men who shaped western civilization.

The dominant figure of all history is the Lord Jesus Christ. There have been more songs and books written about Him than about all other people. He has been a major influence on art. He has had more influence on more people within the Western civilization than all other men. Today, after 2000 years, there are buildings in nearly every city and village in Europe which honor His name, and in North and South America which are still being used to teach His truth. Can any man call himself educated who does not have some basic knowledge of Jesus Christ? Yet, our public education totally ignores Him and His influence on history.

The result is that our country is rapidly declining. Government has influence on both public morals and public education. Great changes for good could be wrought if our leaders in government were brought under the awesome power of prayer. This is our task.

The Blessings of a Christian Society

Have you ever stopped to wonder what this country would be like if Christian principles were indeed the basis of our public policy? I can imagine a country in which:

- * a small, limited federal government releases the public from overbearing taxation;
- * a sound monetary system completely rids the nation of inflation;
- * an environmental policy based on the principles of Christian stewardship forces industries to stop raping the land and wasting valuable resources;
- * strict and well-enforced justice codes bring swift sentences against criminals, and the crime rate is drastically reduced;
- * families, freed from the tax burden, are able to save, invest, and pass on their estates to their children, thus dramatically raising the standard of living in just one generation;
- * the welfare system, which has locked so many poor people into its cycle of dependence, is systematically abolished as local community service groups help to train the poor in job skills so that they can join the work force.

All of this is part of the vision for a Christian society. Doesn't sound so bad, does it? On the other hand, consider the world that a small minority of Americans would like to create for us all. It would be a society without restraints, in which:

- * free, state-funded abortions would be available to all women, bringing more emotional trauma, disease, and sterility to millions;
- * the nation reaches a below zero population growth rate, thus drastically changing the demographics of the country, stagnating business growth, and forcing social security programs to end in bankruptcy;
- * homosexual marriage is legalized, and laws against homosexual acts are repealed - breaking down the family unit as we know it and inviting more sexual disease to run a free course across the nation;
- * continual tax increases to fund ever-growing federal programs reduce the ability for individuals to save or invest, lowering our standard of living and increasing poverty;
- * more and more lenient sentencing of criminals, along with the legalization of many harmful drugs, invites a new wave of crime and violence.

Which scenario appeals to you? The society without restraints? or the Christian moral order in which justice, property rights, individual freedoms, and prosperity are protected within the secure confines of God's law?

To most Americans, there is no question: the first scenario is the obvious choice. Throughout history, true Christianity has always brought positive, lasting benefits to society when its truths were embraced by a nation. But there are those people who would have us to believe that God's laws have no place in public policy.

I recently received a letter from a young Spanish Christian who is interested in publishing a Christian newspaper in his country. He described the plight of his nation in this way:

"Spain today is a country in darkness with a socialist-atheist government which is openly anti-Christ. They control the main mass media and the only two television channels in the country. Spain today is the most leftist country in Europe. The socialist government scorns Christianity as an old, pre-scientific tradition while homosexuality and every other sin is promoted."

Then this young man said something that shocked me about a prevalent attitude in Spain:

"They say the true plague in the world today is not AIDS but the puritanical/evangelical movement in the U.S."

I was actually encouraged to know that people in Europe are very aware of the growing Christian revival in America. Apparently some Spanish people are afraid that such a movement will eventually make its way over to the continent and affect their lifestyles as well. It is indeed sad, however, to realize that some people view a Christian revival as a "plague" which would have negative results on their society.

Although it has not been as prevalent here in the U.S. because of our strong Christian heritage, there is a vocal minority of secularists in this country who have tried to spread the fear of a "Christian takeover" among the population. Political leaders, educational leaders, and even some evangelical Christians have expressed cautious reservations about the idea of Christians being involved in the political process at all - out of fear that the gospel might somehow reshape our society during the next decade.

This apprehension has emerged because Americans have bought the idea that Christianity should be relegated to a mythical "private" arena. For decades, Christians have taken the back seat in running our society; we have not served the nation, nor have we brought Christ's principles to bear upon our institutions. As a result, whenever Christians show any aggressiveness in reclaiming lost ground, they are represented by the media as Ayatollahs or McCarthys who are on some type of witch hunt to rid America of the unfaithful. Christians are thrown into the same category with "fundamentalist" Muslims and Nazi storm troopers.

We are indeed entering into an intense time of debate over a very basic issue. The question all of us must face is this: How far does the law of God apply to an unbelieving culture? This is the issue of the decade. How we answer it is going to have far-reaching implications for the entire world before the year 2000.

Because Christians have abandoned their social responsibilities during most of this century, America - as well as most of the world - is falling apart at the seams. Our original understanding of self-government under God has now been traded for an omnipotent, omnipresent federal bureaucracy. Christian stewardship and the Protestant work ethic have been eroded by the growing welfare mentality and the tax-and-spend syndrome. Christian responsibility in the economic realm has been replaced by skyrocketing deficits on the government, corporate, and private level.

Meanwhile, the priests of the almighty state tell us that an insurmountable wall of separation has been erected between Christianity and public policy. Legal battles are now being waged on a daily basis as secularists attempt to push Christians further and further into a zone of non-existence.

Casting Off the Restraints

We need to realize that what the secularist minority doesn't like about the idea of a "Christian society" is the restraint that such an order imposes on their personal freedoms. In Psalm 2, we read:

"Why are the nations in an uproar, and the peoples devising a vain thing? The kings of the earth take their stand, and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord and against His anointed: 'Let us tear their fetters apart, and cast their cords from us!'"(verses 1-3).

According to the letter I received from the young Spaniard, there are people in Spain who are upset about the possibility of the "cords" and "fetters" of Christianity coming to restrain their nation.

But we do not need to make apologies for our "cords." Moral restraints are the fibers which hold our society together. If the Christian gospel does not bind its benevolent influence on our nation, it is going to self-destruct. God never intended that His law be applicable only in some ethereal "personal realm" where it has no direct, practical application to society at large. God intends for His law to become the basis for public policy in this and every other nation on this planet.

The leaders of groups like Planned Parenthood, People for the American Way, and other anti-Christian organizations in the U.S. usually say that Christian activists only want to take Americans into another "Dark Age." They warn that all personal freedoms (especially the sexual ones) will be forcibly removed by Bible-carrying believers who stone homosexuals and burn Communist flags. Their campaign is the ultimate in disinformation.

Americans - along with citizens from any other country - have no reason to fear a blossoming of Christian society. But we do have much, much to fear if we allow the secularists to remove all restraints and complete their national agenda.

Christian Committees of Correspondence: An Answer to the Political Doldrums of the 1990s

By Gavin Quill
8/92

In this season of political conventions, we are deluged by news reports of the frenzied activities of the two major parties as they jockey to promote their "change agendas" for America's future.

But what choices for change do we really have?

Many Americans feel they have little choice. That's why 50% don't even bother to vote, and why many others were so eager to embrace Ross Perot long before he gave any clear indication of exactly what he stood for.

The lack of meaningful choices is particularly acute for Bible believing Christians whose interests are arguably less represented by the major parties than are those of most other American communities. Though once the driving force behind the conception, birth and early development of this great nation, in this century Christians have allowed themselves to be slowly marginalized to the point where they are often treated as second class citizens when they seek a voice in government.

The gradual loss of our fundamental Christian civil liberties has taken decades. We should not expect it to be restored overnight. That means we should not be looking for some Christianized version of a Ross Perot to single-handedly reverse our cultural and political decline with one election victory. Real change can only come from long-term hard work at the grass-roots level. This requires education, mobilization and participation on the part of the entire Christian community.

Thankfully, a number of organizations have risen up in recent years to begin the arduous task of re-educating Christians concerning their biblical and constitutional rights and responsibilities. One of the most visionary of these is the Plymouth Rock Foundation with its revolutionary offshoot known as the Christian Committees of Correspondence.

These Committees or "ComCor's" are groups of committed Christians in hundreds of towns and cities across the country, who are concerned about the decline of the American republic, and who desire to rebuild the biblical foundations of this nation. They join together to learn the true Christian history of the United States, to study scriptural principles of government, economics and education, and to apply those principles to both their personal lives and public affairs.

This is accomplished through prayer, education, communications, and community service under the umbrella of the local church. These activities train ComCor members to articulate and actively demonstrate the biblical precepts of self and civil government as they pertain to contemporary issues of community, cultural and political concern.

Committees of Correspondence are not really a new idea. They were actually pioneered by our Founding Fathers as they laid the groundwork for our national independence. The first committee was formed in Boston on November 2, 1772. Its membership included such dedicated Christian patriots as Samuel Adams, John Hancock, and Paul Revere. Other Committees quickly spread throughout the thirteen colonies, uniting them first in thought and later in revolutionary action. From these small groups sprang the philosophies, policies and statesmen which eventually produced the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and a new nation.

Although there are literally hundreds of political action groups (in addition to the major parties) vying for our support, only a handful of them are self-consciously and comprehensively Christian. A fundamental tenet of the ComCor's is to make the Christian community and society as a whole, "less susceptible to the manipulation of demagogues; less likely to let themselves be 'used' by those who hide ungodly panaceas behind a facade of false promises and calculated slogans."

Yet how much of the time and resources of the Christian community have been co-opted to serve the purposes of politicians of both the left and the right, who are out to build their own kingdoms without reference to the will of the Creator.

It seems sometimes that half of Christ's kingdom is enthusiastically fighting for justice, truth and righteousness, but are unwittingly taking orders from the commanders of the enemy's armies. Meanwhile, the other half of Christ's soldiers, fearing the deception which has befallen the first half, seem to believe that they have been ordered into a full cultural retreat until the King himself arrives with the angelic calvary.

The Christian Committees of Correspondence see themselves as Jesus' stewards. They refuse to be "unequally yoked with those who question the inerrancy of God's Word or those who deny the crown rights of Christ Jesus as both Savior and King." At the same time, as stewards, they accept the scriptural responsibility to labor towards redeeming every aspect of our culture and our civic institutions for the glory of our Lord.

Membership in the Plymouth Rock Foundation's "Pilgrim Family" and in the Christian Committees of Correspondence "crosses denominational lines, spans all socio-economic strata, and includes all professions and trades." The ComCors are unique in that they are self-governing. "There are no top-down edicts: no 'headquarters' policy pronouncements."

As a truly grass-roots network, they serve as excellent models of the biblical principle of unity with diversity, and the value of every individual believer as a necessary contributor to the holy cause which has been entrusted to us. May it be that in our generation these Committees of Correspondence might be used to spark an even greater Christian revolution than the one produced by their forebears two centuries ago.

For more information write to: The Christian Committees of Correspondence, Fisk Mill, Box 577, Marlborough, NH 03455.

You will receive their Community Action/Leadership kit, along with information on how to join a local Com Cor or to start your own. Annual membership in the Plymouth Rock Foundation is $25.

Christian Committees of Correspondence: Beginning a "Second American Revolution"

2/93

By the rude Bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world.

Spirit, that made those heroes dare
To die, or leave their children free,
Bid Time and Nature gently spare
The shaft we raise to them and Thee.

- Ralph Waldo Emerson
Concord Battle Hymn

THERE IS A NEW AMERICAN REVOLUTION going on today - one without bullets or armed conflict, but just as vital to the preservation of our freedom.

In the 1770s, "committees of correspondence" were created by American Patriots. These committees had a tremendous impact on the social institutions of the colonies and played a vital role in winning America's independence from Great Britain.

Plymouth Rock Foundation's Christian Committees of Correspondence (or "ComCors") is the modern version of these groups. The national office is a resource center which networks other ComCors throughout the United States; and provides basic study materials in biblical principles of government, education, economics and U.S. history.

Perhaps God is calling you today to be a 21st century patriot - to be used to change the world you live in. You will never know until you seize your destiny in God and get started with an organized plan of action. One good way to get started is to receive Plymouth Rock Foundation's Leadership Manual. For only $25, you can receive all the information you need to get started in a bold plan to revolutionize America in our day.

The Gospel and Social Reform

Can Faith Change the World?

By Jay Rogers

11/90

When we think of the word "prophet," we usually picture a melancholy, old man with a long, white beard and a robe forecasting gloom and doom. This stereotype has its basis in the long list of Old Testament characters who were called prophets. Most of these men called the nation of Israel to repentance. If they didn't change their ways and obey God's law they were going to be destroyed by the hostile nations that surrounded them.

Of all the Old Testament prophets, Isaiah stands out as unique. Isaiah was an optimist. Historians tell us that Isaiah appeared on the scene to forecast Israel's destruction. After a few years of preaching and writing he mysteriously disappeared. There is a twenty year gap in his recorded prophecies. No one knows for sure what he was doing during this time.¹

We are told in Isaiah chapter six, "In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw the Lord." One day Isaiah was a famous prophet; his family was of a royal lineage; and he may have also been a priest ministering in the Temple at Jerusalem. Then Isaiah had an experience that was so shocking that it put him out of business for twenty years.

Isaiah's prophecies were recorded and circulated by his young disciples who kept preaching and teaching until the day when Israel was destroyed. Twenty years later Isaiah reappeared, only this time he spoke of Israel's restoration, the rebuilding of the Temple, the coming of the Messiah and the Kingdom age. His message was no longer one of despair but of hope.

Now he prophesied things like: "The nations shall come to the brightness of your rising" and "Behold I create a new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" and "I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall no more be heard in her, nor the voice of crying."²

What was Isaiah doing during those twenty years? We might guess that he was shut up alone with God, totally isolated and cut off from the prominence and respect that he once had. But during that time he had a revelation of faith in which God showed him all of human history culminating in the glorious kingdom that was coming on the earth.

Faith That Changes the World

What then is the "revelation of faith?" Simply put: "It is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Faith is the ability to know the heart and mind of God. We are also told: "Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear."³

Now this verse appears to mean that the physical, material universe was spoken into being by the word of God. But this is not what this means at all! The word in the original Greek language rendered "world" in English is not the word kosmos which is most often used in the New Testament. In this verse, the Greek word aion is used for "worlds," but it is better translated as "ages."

Through faith we understand that the ages were created by the word of God. The world that is now - the kingdom of this age which is characterized by sickness, hunger, war and death - this age is coming to an end. The world that is to come - the kingdom of God which is characterized by health, prosperity, peace, and abundant life - this age is about to appear in its fulness.

We live in an age of transition. The world that is now, is passing away, while the world that already is, but is yet to come in its fulness, is forcefully advancing in the world. In this state of dynamic tension, God is releasing a people into the earth, who will understand that the ages were created by the word of God.

The writer of Hebrews wanted us to understand that the age that is to come, the Kingdom age, will be brought into being by our faith. Through faith, we act as a catalyst to bring the age to come into being. The great prophets of history were not justified by their words, but by the faith they had in God. Yet their words were necessary in order to determine the course of human history.

Isaiah was instrumental in getting the thoughts and desires of God into the minds and hearts of God's people. When the truth of God's Word was diffused en masse, people began thinking the thoughts of God and speaking the Word of God. This will always precede the reality of God's will coming into being.

All of human history has been the manifestation of God's forethoughts from the beginning of time. God's ultimate purpose is being revealed in an unfolding plan in history. God told the prophet Amos: "Behold, I do nothing unless I first reveal it to my servants the prophets."⁴

Abraham was just one man - but his faith brought the kingdom of God into being in this world. We are told in Hebrews that Abraham looked for "a city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God."⁵

Through faith his wife, Sarah, conceived though she was well past child bearing years. Through Abraham's faith the Jewish nation came into being in the course of history, as well as the Messiah - Jesus Christ. Abraham believed all the promises of God and spent his whole life looking for a city of promise.

What is this city of promise? Although Abraham never saw it during his lifetime, his descendants built an earthly kingdom which still exists today, Israel, and ultimately the Messianic kingdom with its eternal ruler Jesus Christ, which is now coming into being in the earth.

Yet how many of us today really believe that one person can have an effect on an entire nation? Let's take a look now at a few notable examples of men and women who had the faith to change the world.

A Tale of Two Cities

Voltaire was a vicious atheist. He wrote a satire Candide, in which he wrote off any possibility of Christianity doing any good in the world. His message was essentially that the whole world is a horrible place to live in with disease, famine, and war and that faith isn't going to change anything. "It is not the best of all possible worlds." He scoffed at any thought of the Bible having the answers to the problems that the world faces.

But on the other side of the English channel - one man - John Wesley - changed his nation. Historians credit Wesley with having caused the great revival that restored social order to England. John Wesley, by faith, believed in the promises of God. He saw God's promises fulfilled in the return of his nation to the principles of biblical Christianity.

Wesley was misunderstood by the people who upheld the religious status quo of his day. (And here I must emphasize that there have always been religious hypocrites who lacked love, and gave men like Voltaire ammunition for their cynical attack on Christianity). Barred from preaching in the rich Anglican churches of his day, which were deadlier than a doornail, Wesley went out to the open places and lifted up his voice for Jesus Christ. The poor and outcast people of England - the coal miners, prostitutes and drunks - flocked to hear him by the thousands.

And in the message of hope that Wesley offered, so many had their lives changed that all of England was born again; the entire English society was transformed.

Wesley labored for 53 years, preaching the Gospel, aiding the poor, building orphanages and schools. Wesley was a demonstration of what one man, empowered by God, can do to transform a society. Meanwhile on the other side of the English channel, Voltaire taught that human being needed to be liberated from the moral teachings of Christianity. Out of Voltaire's revolutionary ideas came the savage and brutal breakup of social order in France.

By comparing the destinies of these two nations, we can see the great transforming power that can come from just one person believing God and laboring to bring His kingdom on the earth. In stark contrast to the great light that can be unleashed on a nation, we also see that spiritual darkness and the legacy of war, disease and social unrest that can come from the ideas of just one person who hinders the faith of God's people.

Yet the faith of men such as John Wesley is the force in the earth that is destined to overtake the ideas of men such as Voltaire.

Uncle Tom's Cabin

Another woman in history, Harriet Beecher Stowe, single-handedly brought the anti-slavery movement to a fervency. Harriet Beecher, as a young woman, had already experienced the personal spiritual renewal which characterized the lives of many during the Second Great Awakening of early 19th century America. But she also experienced the radical social commitment of that great revival as well.

Harriet's father, Lyman Beecher, was the president of Lane seminary in Cincinnati, Ohio when she first encountered a radical group on that campus, the Anti-Slavery Society, which entered into a series of debates on the slavery issue. This hotbed of controversy led Harriet to enter into her own study of slavery. Cincinnati's proximity to Kentucky gave Harriet access to firsthand knowledge of the slavery system. She spent time watching slaves and their owners on a nearby plantation and carefully recording her observations.

"The slave system," she wrote, "as a system perhaps concentrates more wrong than any other now existing." Later she prophesied: "No nation can remain free with whom freedom is privilege and not principle."⁶

Harriet Beecher Stowe, now married and living in Brunswick, Maine, began to pen Uncle Tom's Cabin in 1850. By this time, she had interviewed hundreds of former slaves and had carefully verified their tales of abuse and cruelty by their former masters. The slavery issue began to weigh on her like a heavy burden.

The inspiration for Uncle Tom's Cabin was birthed out of her prayers concerning the plight of the slaves. She began to feel a divine call to write out the case histories of the slaves she had interviewed in the form of a novel. Uncle Tom's Cabin was finally published in 1852; it sold more copies in the next few years than almost any other book in the history of American publishing.

By faith, Harriet Beecher Stowe stirred up waves of anti-slavery sentiment through her novel and influenced the course of events that led to the Civil War, Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and the end of slavery in America.

The Common Denominator

The common denominator in both of these stories is the word "compassion." Wesley felt deeply for the English coal miners. Harriet Beecher Stowe had a burden for the African slaves.

The compassion of just one person can change the world. It doesn't matter if the whole world is set against you. One plus God makes a majority. When we act as ambassadors of love, we represent the purposes of God in the earth. This is a love for people that is birthed out of a deep revelation from God.

It is not surprising, then, when we learn that, according to the Bible, "Faith works by love."⁷

Communist China

Call it fate - or call it destiny. Either way, there seem to be some people who are born for greatness.

A young man named Kristin Ang was one who was destined to quietly turn an entire nation on the hinges of God's purposes. Kristin had an express route in and out of China during an era when the bamboo curtain was still intact and Mao's bloody regime - the PLA (People's Liberation Army) - gave the term "Red China" another meaning.

After losing his passport in the Spring of 1989, during the infamous Tiananmen Square Massacre, Kristin returned home to the Philippines with an exciting and insightful story to tell. Because Kristin's parents were Chinese citizens, a quirk of Filipino law allowed him to travel freely in and out of Mainland China with no restrictions as if he were a Chinese citizen.

As an exchange student at the university in the coastal city of Xiamen, Kristin was instrumental in planting an underground "house church" that quickly grew to over 100 believers in less than two years. When Kristin first arrived at Xiamen University, he was a new believer of only six weeks. He had had no missionary training and had no burden for the Chinese people.

"I didn't care," he remembers, "All I wanted to do was sightsee and shop." But then one day, Kristin had an experience which changed his life forever. Looking out across a dormitory courtyard he saw a Chinese student. "The Lord showed me that there were millions of people in China, just like this one, who were not saved."

Over a period of time, Kristin began to aggressively share his faith in Jesus Christ with the Chinese students. In a two year period, he saw over one hundred students come to know the Lord and become a part of an illegal church that met on that campus. Several PLA officers became Christians as well as some students who were Communist Party members.

But perhaps most significantly, one young man that Kristin led to the Lord, organized a pro-democracy rally in Xiamen City that occurred the same week as the Tiananmen Square Massacre. When the massacre broke out, Kristin was in Hong Kong attempting to smuggle Bibles into China for the numerous students who were becoming Christians. When a state of martial law was declared and rioting broke out in Hong Kong, Kristin had his passport revoked and had to return to the Philippines.

Christian missionaries in China report that since the time of the massacre, as much as ten percent of the student bodies of Mainland China's most prominent universities have become Christian and the numbers are growing. This is significant because only the future leaders of China are allowed to attend the universities. Many speculate that sometime within the next year China's Communist government will fall. The difference these new believers will make in determining the fabric of Chinese society will be crucial.

Kristin Ang, now living in Manila, plans to go back to China when this revolution takes place. Kristin plans to continue his work among the students. "Some of them are going to become government officials," He says, "If they become Christians, China is going to have hope."

"The situation in China is amazing," Kristin said, "When I talked to the people, I saw so much emptiness in their lives that it made me want to cry ... Jesus is the only answer."

Once again, we see that the compassion of just one person can affect change in an entire nation.

An Estonian Pastor Brings Revival to the USSR

Others are not born great, but attain greatness after a long, hard struggle.

After over 20 years of eluding the KGB, Jaanus Karner escaped from the death grip of communism and narrowly missed being sent to a labor camp in Siberia. Jaanus is an Estonian pastor, whose ministry is responsible, in part, for revival in Estonian churches and other parts of the Soviet Union.

The sudden and drastic changes that have been occurring in Eastern Europe are the result of the struggles of just a few heroes who resolutely stood against communism. In June of 1940, Estonia was invaded by the Soviet Union and forcibly annexed. Shortly after this, Jaanus was born. Growing up in a repressive world in which your neighbors could be informing the KGB about your activities, Jaanus struggled his whole life against the repression.

The faith of Jaanus' mother was responsible in part for this young man's desire to know more about the things of God. "I wanted to be a youth pastor," Jaanus remembers, "and I started a music ministry among the young people." This worked marvelously because Estonians love to sing; it is not unusual for up to a million people to gather in nationalistic festivals to sing about their yearning for freedom.

A youth movement sprung from Jaanus' church and spread to Lithuania and Latvia, the neighboring Baltic States, and when visitors came to their meeting from Russia, Jaanus became a catalyst for revival in the east as well. But this new spiritual freedom did not come without a price to be paid. Some informers told the KGB about their meetings and they began a long investigation of Jaanus and his family that has lasted 20 years.

By faith, Jaanus was able to resist the KGB for so long. Finally Jaanus and his family were able to escape to the United States. Now after ten years in America and the recent changes in the Soviet Union, Jaanus is thinking of returning to his country. Jaanus says that he is getting over the long years of harassment now and that he has compassion for the Russian people.

"As a Christian I cannot feel resentment toward them," Jaanus says. "The Russian people are victims. I hope for a universal revival in the Soviet Union. I yearn for a day when 280 million people will be touched by God."

The move of God which has continued to occur in Estonia has been called the "Singing Revival." Since Estonians love to sing, Christian missionaries have recently been appearing at nationalistic festivals to lead the people in songs which speak of something greater than national freedom. They are getting to the point where they realize that freedom can only come from God. This realization which began with just a few people like Jaanus, is now spreading all over the Soviet Union.

And the power of this realization is destined to change the whole world.

Revival in New Zealand

While growing up, a young man named Bob Muni seemed to be going nowhere fast. Bob yearned to quench his gnawing desire to break out of the rut of day to day living. But something radical happened to Bob. He heard a message - that not only could he come to Jesus and have his sins forgiven, but that he was saved and called with a divine destiny that was given before the foundation of the world. According to this destiny, Bob had a calling to be a world changer!

Eventually this calling led him to the University of Auckland in New Zealand, a campus where Christians were not highly regarded. Yet Bob won a tremendous victory for the Kingdom of God by moving in compassion. In the past Christian groups on this campus had moved in a confrontational manner toward campus leadership which had consisted largely of radical socialist and militant feminist students.

This confrontational approach can only bring negative results. When Muni first came to Auckland, he resolved: "Just to love people ... It doesn't do any good to pour salt in open wounds," he reasoned. One particular student, who was the Chair of the student government, a militant feminist and the leader of the homosexual and lesbian groups which dominated school politics, opposed Bob's efforts. This young woman was extremely bright, extremely articulate and extremely antagonistic toward Christians.

Yet by faith Bob Muni saw this student's life changed. This is the faith that works by love.

After Bob's church had established a growing body of young believers at the University of Auckland, this woman decided to wield her power in student government and have Bob's group kicked off campus. After learning that his church had been exiled from campus, Bob reacted instructing his church to "stay in an attitude of love."

Three days later this same woman called a member of Bob's church to say that she had totally changed her mind and asked to meet with her to pray and get her life right with God. As a result of faith working through love, many of the campus radicals wanted to meet with Bob and talk about God, having seen the change in one young woman's attitude.

Too often people had been confronted in harshness. Now for the first time they had been confronted with the fact that God loved them. As individuals embraced this reality, the spiritual atmosphere of an entire campus was changed.

And this spiritual reality is destined to change the entire world.

God's Army of Reformers

The point of this article is to get you out of the rut of living for the kingdoms of this world, into the understanding of the Kingdom age that is coming on the earth. You, too, can be a world changer. Even now, God is grooming a troop revolutionaries who will accomplish great things simply by making themselves available to God. The primary characteristic of this end time army will be their wisdom and compassion for the lost and dying souls of this world.

"What do I have to do then," you may ask, "to get into the purposes of God, and radically affect change in my world?"

First, you must have a total reliance on the Spirit of God to direct and order your life. Many of the plans that we devise look wise and wonderful in our own eyes, yet they are a hindrance to what God wants to do with our lives. Seek the wisdom of Christ in every matter. God's wisdom is a mystery which is now hidden, but it is being revealed in the last days through His people.

Second, you must have faith that causes you to hope for great things. This will automatically set you apart from the type of Christianity that is currently in vogue in America today. While many of God's people survey world events with pessimism, God's wisdom will cause a faith to grow in your heart that will enable you to understand how every event is just another step toward Christ's victorious kingdom being established on the earth.

And finally, you must learn to love. When you begin to experience this love, you will see that there is a "hidden wisdom, which God predestined before the ages to our glory."

"Things which eye has not seen and ear has not heard,
And which have not entered the heart of man,
All that God has prepared for those who love Him."⁸

Bridging the Intellectual Void

By Glenn Duneheew

Many of the great scientists of the past several hundred years were Christians. During their day, Christian thought prevailed. Of course, there were some popular writers and philosophers who were not Christians; but Christian thought was the mainstream, and ministers were considered the best educated people in the community.

As author Richard Lovelace states, "The leaders and shapers of the Reformation, the Puritan and Pietist movements, and the first two Awakenings included trained theologians who combined spiritual urgency with profound learning, men who mastered the culture of their time and were in command of the instruments needed to destroy its idols and its innovations."¹

Today, however, the local minister is not held in high regard, or considered a man of great knowledge. He is, instead, viewed as archaic and out of touch with reality.

The goal of the Church and its ministers should be to pull down the idols of their culture through the preaching and the practical application of the gospel. But without a clear understanding of current thought and knowledge, this is impossible. Without a clear understanding of socialism, its structure, its economic basis, and its general philosophy, its corrupting influence cannot be brought down or destroyed. As a result, many churches today support socialism simply because of their minister's word. Without a clear understanding of biblical morality and ethics, how can we take a stand on issues such as abortion, AIDS, values clarification, or homosexual rights? Without this clear understanding in the pulpits of America, where are we headed?

During the Reformation, the progress of Christian thought was greatly reflected in the many scientific discoveries and inventions of that era. However, in the 1600s men turned their attention more to exploration for profit rather than for the glory of God. The results of their greed for land led them to corrupt the new society that had been established in America. These decadent years demanded a response from local ministers both in England and in the American colonies.

These idols of greed and avarice had to be subdued by Christian thought. This is, primarily, what brought about the Great Awakening at the turn of the 18th century. This movement altered every area of life in our nation - including the philosophical and scientific community. It also paved the way for the creation of the American system of constitutional government.

At the turn of the 19th century the effects of the Great Awakening were waning. Again, philosophical and scientific questions began to face the Christian community. God's answer to these "new innovations" was the Second Great Awakening. The resulting waves of thought brought about reformation in civil rights as well as the conduct of society as a whole. This changing of thought tore the United States apart, bringing about a war of brother against brother. But this Second Awakening brought the scientific and philosophical communities back into the confines of Christian thought for a brief period.

The next spiritual awakening in our national history was the Prayer Revival of 1858, a spontaneous, lay-directed movement of daily prayer meetings for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. This movement was accompanied by the Welsh Revival of 1904 on the other side of the Atlantic.² These noted revivals were marked by the increased participation of non-trained ministers. Although this awakening greatly increased the number of people propagating the gospel, few individuals totally prepared themselves for the philosophical battle that lay ahead.

According to author J. Edwin Orr, these movements "led to a progressively shallower spirituality among evangelicals and to a loss of intellectual command. This loss of intellectual mastery proved to be a critical weakness, since the secular humanist worldview - which had been under construction since the days of the Enlightenment - was receiving powerful reinforcement from the teachings of Charles Darwin, Karl Marx, and Sigmund Freud."³

A changing world was grasping for answers, and yet the Church was devoid of educated men and women who were filled with the power of God. The intellectual vacuum left by these last awakenings demanded a response from the Christian community. Basically, three major ideas offered the most serious challenges: Albert Einstein's theory of relativity, Darwin's theory of evolution, and Freud's theory of the inner man.

Moral Relativity

Einstein's theory of relativity was not intended to move into the philosophical realm, but rather to apply to gravitational fields and Newtonian physics.⁴ In fact, Einstein believed in moral absolutes and acknowledged the existence of God. However, by the 1920s, "the belief began to circulate that there were no longer any absolutes: of time and space, of good and evil, of knowledge, above all of value." ⁵

Because of the intellectual void among Christians, these ideas on moral relativity went unchecked. The morality of America and Europe was at stake - and this void allowed immorality to be cultivated without any serious questions about its ultimate results on society. The next step was predictable: men would try to do away with God.

Charles Darwin, by describing man as nothing more than a product of nature, concluded that man has no need for God. Evolution theorizes that God is simply an archaic, superstitious concept. Darwin's theory not only legitimated some archaeological ideas that were circulating at the time, but managed to leap into the realm of philosophy. Evolution as a theory really has no power in the scientific realm alone, because it cannot be proven scientifically. But as a philosophy, applied to areas of life like economics or civil government, Darwin's notion of the survival of the fittest "was a key element both in the Marxist concept of class warfare and of the racial philosophies which shaped Hitlerism."⁶

We must ask this question: how could the idea of evolution move into such a position of prominence in intellectual circles without arousing even a cynical look from Christian thinkers? This is where psychologist Sigmund Freud comes to the rescue. In his worldview, a person who disagrees with a "scholar's" analysis is suspect of behavior problems himself. Havelock Ellis, an experimenter in human eugenics, wrote to psychologist Carl Jung, "My inclination is to treat those colleagues who offer resistance exactly as we treat patients in the same situation."⁷ In other words, dissent is a state unacceptable to intellectual thought. It is also a convenient way to avoid ideas which are "lacking" in scientific proof or other sources of factuality.

Paul Johnson, in his book Modern Times, said this of Freud's ideas: "Later, the notion of regarding dissent as a form of mental sickness, suitable for compulsory hospitalization, was to blossom in the Soviet Union into a form of political repression."⁸

Ellis went on to say, "Freud was not a scientist but a great artist."⁹ Many find Freud outside of mainstream medical practice; yet those who first believed in his form of psychoanalysis were vocal in support of his ideas, and thus they gained wide popularity among the general public. Says Johnson, "He believed in a hidden structure of knowledge which, by using the techniques he was devising, could be discerned beneath the surface of things."¹⁰ An exchange of "scientific" thought again replaced Christian thought - without a challenge from the Church.

"In the Freudian analysis," says Johnson, "the personal conscience, which stood at the very heart of the Judeo-Christian ethic, and was the principal engine of individualistic achievement, was dismissed as a mere safety-device, collectively created, to protect civilized order from the fearful aggressiveness of human beings."¹¹ Thus an onslaught of ungodly ideas, more fierce than any form of external violence, began to take its toll on the modern world.

What happened to the Christian community during all of this? We stopped fighting ideological warfare.

The war of ideas is not just between nations, as British historian B.H. Liddell points out: "Lenin had a vision of fundamental truth when he said that 'the soundest strategy in war is to postpone operations until the moral disintegration of the enemy renders the delivery of the mortal blow possible and easy.'"¹³ This is the underlying strategy of the communists. Is it not the same for the secular humanists in their quest for the minds of men?

The time has come for Christians to arm themselves for the real battle, and address the complex questions being asked by our generation. Richard Lovelace offers this challenge to us: "If a whole generation of young evangelicals can mature in their spirituality, and if older evangelical leaders can expand their vision, we have the potential for a new level of evangelical impact within the Church and on society."¹⁴ The time is now, whether you are an established leader or one on the rise; "History may be considered as a series of stages in which one territory is substantially conquered for Christ; a contraction follows as the war is opened within a wider radius; and then a new Christian assault sweeps outward to widen the diameter of the realm of Christ."¹⁵

As every area of thought and life is brought under the lordship of Jesus Christ, there will be an expansion of His dominion over every area of life. The idols of this world will be subdued for His glory. The time is now to be relevant to a changing society. General Douglas MacArthur's words ring out loud and clear to us today: "The history of failure in war can be summed up in two words: Too late. Too late in comprehending the deadly purpose of a potential enemy; too late in realizing the mortal danger; too late in preparedness; too late in uniting all possible forces for resistance; too late in standing with one's friends."¹⁶

Marching to Victory: The Aftermath of the Collapse of Communism and Desert Storm

by Mark Beliles

When are Christians in America going to stop being so pessimistic and unbelieving about the great things that are happening in the world today?

The Berlin Wall is gone, Eastern Europe is free, Soviet communism has collapsed and democratic movements are making great progress in Africa, Latin America and other parts of the world. Desert Storm stopped aggression against Kuwait and opened up the Middle East to western Christian principles. Eleven African states are now democratic and six more have just begun to move strongly that way after years of post-colonial dictatorships. All but Guyana in Central and South America now have freely elected governments.

After victory in the Gulf war, secular commentators spoke of an "exorcism" of the demons of doubt and pessimism that lingered in the American psyche ever since the Vietnam era. I believe that such comments are very accurate - that indeed the attitudes of Americans, including Christians, have been subject to spiritual forces (2 Corinthians 10:4).

My question is: Has the Christian community really been delivered yet? Let's face it folks, things are happening today in the world that are historic and very positive, perhaps as significant as the Protestant Reformation. Why should Christians be tentative and always saying "Well, let's see what happens" before they can rejoice.

One of the problems, I believe, is the lack of a Providential perspective toward current events. If God really is controlling and directing events, why should we be pessimistic? Even if people whom He is using are not Christians, or perhaps are Christians but have obvious shortcomings and sins, does that prevent us from affirming the workings of God? Does that not rather glorify Him more when he uses fallible clay vessels and still accomplishes His purposes? Why dismiss everything out of hand and not embrace it just because it comes to us with flaws in terminology and mistakes in judgment?

To have a Providential perspective on history is to see the Almighty behind each event, without swallowing or embracing everything that comes along, but neither rejecting it at first sight when we see unbiblical or unholy elements mixed in with it. God looks at us and sees flaws and sins and foolish judgments and yet still calls us by His name and uses us to accomplish His will. So He does with the nations. Sure, America has sinned in the past and continues to do so, but I believe God has called America "good" just as He did with many sinful kings or governments in Judah and Israel. Those kings were judged by God in the Bible as either "doing evil" or "doing right" based on their alignment with His basic purposes in their generation, not on their complete obedience or perfection. Many of the leaders who God said did "right" in His sight had also committed sins and had done evil, as in the case of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. 20:32-33) or Amaziah (2 Chron. 25:2).

If modern American Christians were to be making the evaluations, most of those leaders called "good" by God would be rejected and accused and second-guessed today. No one does right all the time and yet God still uses them. That is the amazing way in which the Bible portrays all of its heroes. They were all sinners and fallible men.

Many Christians today all too often evaluate leaders and events unrealistically. Books and newsletters are churned out preoccupied with what is wrong with this leader or that program and warning Christians of the dangers that lie ahead. Much of this so-called "prophetic" criticism is nothing more than slander, tale-bearing, and bearing false witness, which the Bible condemns (Ex. 23:1,2; Deut. 19:15-20). Their "facts" are not researched and even if they were true, they do not redemptively use those facts in line with the Biblical commandment to "honor the king" and love your neighbor.

Certainly there is the necessity for speaking out and blowing the trumpet against sin and calling people to repentance. Certainly there is the prophetic responsibility to warn against dangers that are well-founded and proven. There is a valid place for rebuking rulers who sin and make foolish decisions, but there are Biblical guidelines for doing so.

A Providential perspective doesn't blindly follow anything that comes along, neither does it downplay sin anywhere. It doesn't offer a candy-coated "all is well" commentary. But what it does is move the focus less on the importance of the man or men whom God is using and more on the God behind them; less on the flaws of the men and more on the will of God; less man-centered and more centered on God and His sovereignty.

Many Christians, from both the dispensationalist and reconstructionist perspectives, have a pessimistic, and often critical and conspiratorial, view of world events. While conspiracy talk and criticism of others sells more books, such writings are not what Christians need to best equip themselves. People like gossip, but what they need are answers - solutions! What we need to impart to others is faith and encouragement to be involved. American Christians today tend to view government as an adversary rather than as a minister of God and a servant of the people as the Bible speaks of it. The result is a separation and detachment from social problem-solving.

Government can become a dangerous "beast" that devours when power is centralized in the hands of sinful men. The message of the book of Revelation warns of such beasts of the sea and of the land that bring oppression, and which Christ and his saints must resist and overcome. But Revelation and the prophecies of the Old Testament also speaks of our victory over the beast and injustice, and of the nations of the world being transformed by the power of the Gospel through changing men's hearts and minds (Daniel 2; Revelation 13).

I believe we are finally seeing an era which Jesus promised would come to pass among the nations. Jonathan Edwards believed that the end of the twentieth century would mark the beginning of the "Golden Age" for the nations as a result of the progressive influence of Christianity. My hope is that Christians would seriously think about this possibility at least as much as they think about books such as 88 reasons Why The Rapture Will Be in 1988 or The New Dark Age or The Middle East and Armageddon.

The Soviet Coup and the March of Liberty

* Margaret Thatcher, former Prime Minister of Britain, said: "The crumbling of the coup was the victory of ... liberty over darkness.... The forces of dictatorship and communism have been defeated."

* Senator Daniel P. Moynihan of New York asserted in the Washington Post on August 22: "The age of totalitarianism is over. More important, the possibility of totalitarianism may be over as well."

* Time Magazine (Sept 2) said: "The event is one of the turning points of world history ... "

* Another Post article proclaimed: " A new historical epoch began."

Could this be part of what the resurrected Jesus meant when He answered the disciples' question in Acts 1:6 concerning the restoration of the liberty of Israel and liberation from Roman bondage? He said "It is not for you to know the times or epochs which the Father has fixed by His own authority" (verse seven). Then in verse eight He adjusted their focus in two ways: (1) the important thing is not so much when, but how this liberty will come, i.e., by the internal to the external (receiving the "Spirit of the Lord" who brings liberty), and (2) this liberty will not only come to the Jewish nation, but to "the ends of the earth," i.e. all nations!

I believe we are seeing today the fruits of a 2000 year Christian revolution. Great hymns such as are sung at Christmas-time each year speak of it. "It Came Upon A Midnight Clear" proclaims that "lo! the days are hastening on, by prophet seen of old, when with the ever-circling years shall come the time foretold when preach shall over all the earth its ancient splendors fling and the whole world send back the song which" the angels sang at Christ's birth.

I believe there is evidence that the outpouring of the Spirit that has been going on for years in much of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union is directly associated with the changes that are taking place externally in their government. Is there evidence enough to go further and say that the events which are going on in Europe and the Soviet Union are a "Christian" revolution? To answer that question accurately, we must define what we mean. It does not mean that the right-wing Christians overthrow the governments of the world and set up a top-down, coercive regime based on biblical laws and morality. That whole idea (which is commonly, but erroneously, identified with Reconstructionists) is pagan, not Christian.

In a recent article of Imprimis published by Hillsdale College, Malcolm S. Forbes, Jr. wrote:

"We have a chance, in short, to build a brave new world, but one that is very different than the term popularly implies. It will not give rise to collective institutions designed to control the masses or to remake the world. It will not be brought about by political decrees or fancy crusades. The new world order will be one that leaves individuals freer than ever before....

"Now, most people regard technology as an enemy of individual freedom -- the world conjures up 1984 (Orwellian)-style totalitarian governments, and, ... berserk computers that want to take over the world. Nothing could be further from the truth. Technology is in reality the mortal enemy of tyrants and bureaucrats; it doesn't suppress ordinary people - it frees them from centralized control and gives them unprecedented power over their own destinies....

"Even in the most closed societies a person can fax written documents, receive satellite communications, and transfer billions of dollars in an instant via computer - in such an environment, how can repressive regimes do more than postpone their own inevitable collapse? ... Another thing to remember is that it will not bring about political unity; it is quite likely, in fact, that we will see political disintegration at the same time that we see more economic integration."

A Christian revolution is one of ideas. These ideas have an impact on a society through their permeation of the culture by evangelism and educational efforts that lead to a significantly enlightened citizenry who democratically pass laws that reflect their Biblically-based system of values and justice.

A Christian revolution does not even have to be led by Christians. If Christian ideas are being furthered and established by democratic processes in the political system, then it is a Christian revolution. King Henry VIII was not a godly man, yet when he broke from the Catholic Church he started something in England just as significant as when Luther nailed his theses to the door in Wittenberg, Germany. Rather than getting hung up on who God is using, we should look at the outcome.

Christian ideas of individuality, self-government, private property, decentralization, union, equality, and liberty are what we should look for. In the revolution now occurring in Soviet countries we see that these ideas are conquering the pagan ideas of totalitarianism that have held sway in that area for a thousand years.

The manner in which the goals of the coup leaders were completely reversed has few historic parallels, the best being the story in the book of Esther where Haman ends up being hung on the gallows that he had constructed for Mordecai. It is interesting to note that although Esther and Mordecai were Jews, and therefore related to Jehovah, this whole book never once mentions God. These historic political changes in the midst of a pagan government and society are only told in terms of human agency and events. So also the new Russian Revolution may at first seem only a secular event, yet in reality it is a spiritual one.

Not only were some of the leaders of the Russian Revolution Christians, but I believe the reason such a move toward liberty could occur in the USSR is because the Soviet people had been prepared in their hearts and minds through the influence of the gospel in recent years to support such a change.

Baskakov was one of the commanders of the Russian defense unit #34, but retired last year as a senior officer from the Tamanskaya tank division because of his Christian faith. In August, when the people began to gather around the Russian Parliament building where Boris Yeltsin was leading the resistance, Baskakov said, "I just knew my place was there ... As a Christian, I had to be on the barricades." His old tank division was the first to come over to the side of the resistance. As reports of an expected attack were increasing on Tuesday, "an organizer with a megaphone called, 'All courageous men who are willing to defend the building, please come forward!'"

As thousands watched about 90 men formed three rows on the stairs, even though they knew their resistance would mean certain death if they were attacked. A clergyman ascended the steps and led everyone in the Lord's prayer. Prayer was prominent in this period, and when the coup failed, people acknowledged God's aid. One young tank commander in the forces controlled by the coup plotters shouted as they began to retreat from the city: "It's over! Thank God, we're heading home." A member of a construction crew who heard him from the side of the road responded similarly as the convoy passed by: "Yes, Thank God!"

The Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church, Aleksei II, denounced the coup publicly, word of which was sneaked onto the controlled Tass news on Tuesday afternoon. He issued an appeal to all the "people, especially to our soldiers, to show restraint in this critical moment for the motherland. Do not allow the spilling of fraternal blood." He also called the resistance a "fight for a sacred cause." When the coup failed, this clergyman asserted boldly that "God has saved Russia."

Time magazine said that the Russian revolution was "a miracle" (Sept 2), as did 32 year old Elena Averiova. On the day after the coup failed, she and thousands more gathered in Red Square and listened, with tears in their eyes, to the cathedral bells. Oksana Shersheleva, 13, said "I'm a believer and all of my friends believe, too. God has helped us all."

What appears as the most significant blunder of the coup plotters - the failure to detain Boris Yeltsin - was not just a forgotten agenda item. They had indeed dispatched KGB agents and troops to arrest him at his home before he could rally opposition, but they were providentially "delayed" so that Yeltsin left 40 minutes before they arrived (reported in Time, Sept. 2, p. 35). Once he got to the Russian Parliament building, it was too late. Also, on the crucial day that the coup plotters ordered an attack on the building, critical commanders began disobeying orders and some even defected to Yeltsin's side (although not before the death of three resisters on the barricades).

For the Russian Revolution to continue, the people must grow in their reliance upon God and in applying His truth in their society. An article in Time (September 9, 1991) entitled, "Rebuilding a Moral Framework" by High Sidey reveals the likelihood of this taking place.

"If communism as we have known and hated it is out of the way, perhaps George Bush can now talk unabashedly to Soviet officials about such good old-fashioned values as God, truth and the sanctity of human life. Evangelist Billy Graham, who talked to Boris Yeltsin and Mikhail Gorbachev shortly before the botched coup, returned from the Soviet Union and passed word to his friend Bush that both men had told him of the need for 'some philosophy, some religion, an inner strength' for their society.... White House planners are anticipating a reemergence of Christianity in Russia, bringing with it a moral framework that has long been absent from Soviet political life."

A USA Today poll of Soviet citizens revealed that 85% of the people now believe that "religion [will be] playing an increasingly important role in Soviet society." The newspaper also said that "young people appear especially open to religion."

America was created by God through the sacrifices of committed Pilgrims who came here to start a new world based on the Bible. Christian ideas were infused in the institution and the laws of America, culminating in the formation of a Christian union under the Declaration of Independence and the U.S. Constitution. This Christian nation of America has been a model for scores of nations seeking liberty, prosperity, and justice, and is why millions of people admire America and want to imitate her. Just a couple of months ago, for example, when Secretary of State James Baker visited newly freed Albania, 300,000 people spontaneously rallied in a square where he was and began to wave American flags and chant "USA, USA!"

While no nation should be idolized or take the place of God as the true source of liberty, it must be emphasized that God alone can give this influence to a nation, as He has America, and which our Christian Founding Fathers frequently affirmed that He wanted to do. As long as America acknowledges God and points to the source of her blessings and refuses temptations to become imperialistic, then God will grant her honor among the nations, This is what God promised Israel if she would remain faithful to God - gentile nations would come to her, admiring her laws and liberty and prosperity, and praise and seek to imitate her (Deut 4:5-8). There is nothing wrong with being praised for conducting your nation the way God desires. If, however, America continues to backslide as she has in past decades, God will eventually discard her, as He has other nations, on the ash-heap of history.

One hundred and fifty years after America's Christian revolution a new order called communism emerged in the Soviet Union and spread to a number of nations. This alignment of nations became known as the "second world," in contrast to the western "first world." All those nations that were dependent on the help of more developed countries but were not politically aligned with either the West or communism were labelled the "third world," beginning in the 1950s. Today, in a matter of a few years, a whole "world" has disappeared, the second one. The first world, the philosophy of government and economics that was based on the Christian idea of man and reality, will now proceed to envelop the globe.

In conclusion, I urge the Christian community in America to seriously examine its attitudes and methods. We should ask God to deliver us from our critical spirit and to give us His perspective and understanding of present history. We must seek to work with Him to fulfill His purposes in the earth, and not against Him. Yes, there will undoubtedly be times of chaos and war and disaster as the nations learn how to handle their liberty, and as leaders with no Christian character or values are removed. Certainly, it is possible that in the vacuum of the communist world there may arise another world, perhaps of Islam or secular humanism, that may be even more difficult to overcome. But despite some imperfect situations and actions taking place both here and abroad, let us not call "evil" what God may be calling "good."

Pioneers, Settlers and Aristocrats: Three Generations of Christians in America

By Jay Rogers

9/93

The Pioneers

The first generation of Americans were pioneers. Many of the first Europeans who came to America were Christians, more importantly they were Protestant Christians who came to the New World during a time when the Reformation that was going on in Europe was still very much in progress.

These people had a new sense of what it meant to be a Christian. Belonging to the Church was no longer a guarantee of salvation. Salvation came through an individual's relationship with Jesus Christ, the sole mediator between God and man. Although all members of this new society were expected to behave as though they were Church members, salvation was a matter of election, the Calvinist idea that God had predestined certain individuals for eternal life.

Furthermore, they believed that God was sovereign and was guiding their destiny. This divine sovereignty placed God as the sole ruler over their society. There was no longer a need for kings, bishops and popes the rule in the affairs of men. Each had the responsibility to be self-governing and to stand alone before God in accountability. A man's actions were rewarded as he obeyed the supreme laws of God. This alone was the necessary motivating factor in maintaining the social order.

These pioneers realized that saving grace was no longer a theological concept or a doctrine but an everyday experience. They lived and breathed and avoided death in a hostile environment because of the protective hand of God. In this strange new world they were without the intermediary of a national Church to insure salvation in the hereafter. These Christians saw their salvation being worked out by God alone in the here and now.

The Kingdom of Heaven was already comprised of individuals who were alone accountable before God. From this realization came the concept of individuality. God had made them individuals; each one of them was unique and had been called and predestined by God to fulfill a special destiny in this new unfolding society.

The Settlers

The second generation of Americans were settlers. This was the generation who took their destiny back from God. By the time that the first generation had accumulated wealth and passed it on to their children, a comfort and ease had begun to set into their society. No longer was life and death in the hands of an almighty God; predestination began to become a concept and salvation began to lose its relevance in the here and now.

Two other factors that determined American idealism during this time period were an unlimited access to land, wealth in the form of natural resources and freedom from European feudal systems in favor of private ownership and capitalist investment. From this perspective came the notion of unlimited wealth, the Protestant work ethic and the free enterprise system.

Capitalism in its pure form existed in this society; surplus was reinvested in order to gain a larger surplus. Because wealth was unlimited in the New World, wealth was available to all at the expense of no one. The only prohibiting factor was the amount of industry provided through individual initiative.

By the time that the second generation had settled in and had become comfortable, fewer could claim to have had the same experience of saving grace as the previous generation. This was the age in which Church membership and not election began to become the basis salvation.

The Aristocrats

The Pioneers baptized their children believing that they would have the same inner experience of a personal relationship with God when they came of age. But when it came time for the third generation to be baptized, the wealth which had permeated the society kept their children away from a need for a Savior.

They were like the Laodiceans: they already had everything they needed. They were aristocrats; they lived in comfort and ease. Many of them could not testify to having had a personal experience with their God. Their parents resolved to compromise, however, and let them continue as Church members although they had no experiential faith. The result of this was a repetition of some of the same circumstances which the reformers had protested. Church membership soon became the basis for salvation.

The drives of individualism, materialism and competition began to replace the idea that individuals were to work toward God's reward and that wealth was only to be had as a blessing by Christians who were but stewards, part time owners of God's material blessings. Individualism is distinct from individuality; materialism from the work ethic; competition from free enterprise. The former are birthed from selfish motives; the latter are descriptive of an individual's God-given character and giftings.

The Spirit who gave life to these godly principles of the early Pilgrims had departed and these distinctly American characteristics now existed as merely an empty shell. The stage was set for a new move of God.

The Great Awakenings

The same pattern has followed in the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries. We see a Spiritual Awakening beginning around the turn of the century with three generations of pioneers, settlers and aristocrats in each. The following chart shows the three generations of Christians in the four centuries of American revival and reformation:

Although this chart is a generalization, we can see a definite pattern of spiritual awakening stirring America around the turn of each century during a time of great moral darkness and national crisis.

David McKenna, author of The Coming Great Awakening, offers this analysis:

"Has God given up on our society or passed us by? Are evangelical prophets of doom, who squint into the twilight and fix their eyes on the darkness, right about our civilization? I say no. God has not given up on us. If we watch closely we can see the stirrings of the Spirit among us today....

"Awakenings invariably begin in a time of cultural conflict. The cause may be a natural period of exhaustion and decline in the culture. When speeding social change creates moral disjunctures in the culture and makes the traditional ways of coping with change obsolete, a society is in trouble. In either case, malaise sets in, along with self-doubt and despair. The symptoms of cultural conflict are threefold:

- (1) the existing moral consensus breaks down;
- (2) the traditional authority of established institutions, such as the home, church and school, is rejected; and
- (3) the credibility of legitimate leadership is questioned.

"Each of the awakenings in American history began in a time of trouble caused by moral conflict ... (which) caused disjuncture throughout the whole nation, from national leadership to grassroots. Social change with its resultant tension is not enough to stimulate the process of spiritual awakening. In a Great Awakening, the cultural conflict must be moral and the social tension must be disruptive....

"Whenever society is threatened by revolutionary change, particularly in the field of morals, the first reaction is to return to the ways that worked in the past. Students of the Great Awakenings call this conservative swing a "nativist reaction."

According to McKenna, the "nativist reaction" can actually stall a move of God rather than promote it. Nativism is defined as the revival of traditional values of a particular culture. In Puritan America, Cotton Mather spearheaded the call for a return to the "Old New England Way." He was responding to the acculturizing trends of 18th century rationalism. But it wasn't Mather who was responsible for bringing the Great Awakening to America but Jonathan Edwards who appeared on the scene just a few years after Mather's death. Unlike the nativists, revival figures, such as Jonathan Edwards and 18th century evangelist Charles G. Finney, appear as children of their age - not enemies of progress.

In our day, the Reagan presidency and voices coming from what has been termed the "Christian right" called for a nativist return to "traditional family values." Some imagined a return to the 1950s - Ozzie and Harriet television reruns, tail fins on Chevys, drive-in theaters and crew cuts - as if that would bring us a much needed moral awakening. We are still waiting for the Finneys and Edwards of our own generation.

We, in the 1990s, are the aristocratic, Laodicean generation of the 20th century. But if the pattern of revival and spiritual awakening holds, the next thirty to forty years promise to be a time of one of the greatest outpourings of the Holy Spirit in American history. Will you be prepared for it?

The Power of Hope

By Jay Rogers
2/94

"And these three remain: faith, hope and love."
- 1 Corinthians 13:13 -

If you are like most people, you have probably heard much on biblical themes such as the "Power of Love" or the "Power of Faith." In the 1960s and 1970s, the Jesus Movement emphasized the theme of the Love of God. The Word of Faith movement appeared soon after this to bring a message about Faith. Love and Faith are often repeated themes today. But how often do we hear a message on Hope?

Is America Cursed or Blessed?

Many Christians who are involved in social and political activism were deeply grieved this year by the ascendancy of Bill Clinton to the White House and his administration's promotion of a long series of ungodly and anti-Christian agendas: government sponsored abortion, fetal tissue research, homosexual rights, legalized drugs, a state run health care program, etc.

Some Christians are ready to give up hope. They think: "God is surely judging our nation by giving us Bill Clinton." And from one perspective, they are right. The fact that Clinton has broken covenant with God means that terrible retribution could be brought on our nation from a holy and jealous God who is also our rightful sovereign.

The legacy of Bill Clinton is a far cry from that which was left to us just a few years ago by Ronald Reagan who stood against sodomy, child-killing and free distribution of condoms to our nation's school children. But Reagan's greatest accomplishment was that he understood that we are building on the foundation of America's Christian heritage. Reagan was consistently optimistic about America's future. He held a belief that having a great hope for America's future was required for reclaiming our nation's greatness. Therefore, Ronald Reagan, from his first entry into politics, strove to instill a sense of hope in America's people.

In his farewell address, Reagan spoke of the basis for America and our freedoms: "Are we doing a good enough job of teaching our children what America is and what she represents in the long history of the world? ... We've got to do a better job of getting across the idea that America is freedom - freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of enterprise. And freedom is special and rare. It's fragile and it needs protection ... So we've got to teach history based not on what's in fashion, but on what's important, on why the Pilgrims came here ... If we forget what we did we won't know who we are - I am warning of an eradication of the American memory that could result ultimately in an erosion of The American Spirit."

Conspiracy Theories

Ever since the Reagan presidency ended, there has been a rise of conspiracy theories in America. Conspiratorial thinking is defined as the belief that national and world events are determined by a secret plot, human or demonic, to bring about an evil end.

In the world of media, we are hearing a lot about conspiracies: It is one of the short cuts to the best seller list. But no one seems more obsessed by conspiracies than the evangelical Christian. Much time and energy is spent in an effort to discover all the evil intentions of the government and other institutions. Potential frightening scenarios are explored in great detail. With all the critical tasks facing the Church, have we ever stopped to consider whether this obsession might be distracting us from more important responsibilities?

Recently, I was showing a Christian friend some computer programs I work with. One is a useful financial program which provides a check register, a bank account reconciliation, budget reports, transaction reports, financial graphs, etc. He asked me: "Why do you cut so many checks?" He informed me that I was leaving a long paper trail that could easily be traced by the government. He advised me that I should do as much personal business as possible in cash so that no one would be able to investigate me. I was told by another Christian that I should never give out my social security number since it is wrongfully used for identification and - even more frightening - "It could be the Mark of the Beast."

The thinking behind such statements is representative of a pervasive attitude among many Christians who believe that coming persecution is inevitable and that we are entering an era when the state will begin to control every aspect of our lives. This idea is based on a flawed interpretation of Revelation 13. It has become a popular past time among modern evangelicals to try to match daily newspaper headlines with what they believe to be cryptic passages in Scripture.

Many Christians have unconsciously adopted a worldview in which they see themselves as individuals plucked out of an evil world who are now just awaiting heaven. In the meantime, their goal is to avoid being caught in a web of conspiracy. They de-emphasize their destiny in God's foreordained historical chain of Christianity. They have forgotten their heritage. They cannot go forward as God's world changers because they don't know where they have come from.

Paradigm Shift 2000

Even Christians who have become more reformed in their thinking in the past few years still hold on to nuances of conspiratorial thinking. Gladly, many evangelical leaders are becoming more aware of the need for Christians to reform all aspects of our society according to biblical principles. They have shifted from a dispensational model of thinking - which often leads to retreat from the world - towards more of a covenantal model which emphasizes the responsibility of the Christian to advance God's kingdom into every area of culture.

A shift in thinking, when it occurs on a large scale, is called a "paradigm shift." A paradigm is a set of beliefs which act as a model for one's sense of reality. This model or belief system will ultimately shape one's actions. This is also commonly referred to as a "worldview." When we are talking about paradigms, we are looking at patterns of thinking which determine conduct and lifestyle. There has been much heated debate in recent years about paradigms. This discussion has focused on the shifts which occur when an old paradigm is seen to be obsolete or false; when one paradigm gives way to another.

For instance, in the world of physics for over 100 years, Isaac Newton's laws were the paradigm or model for interpreting all data. When Albert Einstein proposed his theory of relativity, it took almost a generation for modern physicists to forsake to old model of Newtonian physics and begin to interpret their data according to the new model.

In the business world, the transfer of influence among computer manufacturers came with the invention of the personal computer or "PC" which created a paradigm shift in that industry. Prior to the invention of the PC, computer manufacturers produced bulky, expensive computers which had to be run by a mainframe computer to a terminal. The invention of the PC provided a compact, inexpensive computer that could be run from a built-in "hard drive." Small businesses and individuals found that the PC was much more affordable, reliable, useful and efficient than the older counterpart. Computer manufacturers have now shifted towards this innovative paradigm.

In a paradigm shift, it takes time for the old system to break down completely. Newton's laws were not completely thrown out the window until there was so much new incoming data that didn't seem to fit the old model. Einstein's model seemed to explain things that physicists were seeing so much better. Slowly, the scientific world began to herald the theory of relativity as a revolution in physics. Well-established computer manufacturers, likewise, tried to compete at first with the "PC" manufacturers, but soon had to scramble to keep up with a fast changing market. We see this pattern everywhere - the first automobiles looked a lot like "horseless carriages"; the first television sets looked like radios. It takes time for human nature to let go of the old and embrace the new in a paradigm shift.

Paradigm shifts are not confined to the worlds of science and business. We can see a common historical paradigm shift which has occurred in the Church just prior to every revival and spiritual awakening. The pattern has generally followed that an old paradigm has become entrenched in the Church and God's people are unable to discern the need for revival and reformation along with the new paradigm or vision that is carried along with it.

"No one pours new wine into old wineskins. If he does, the new wine will burst the skins, the wine will run out and the wineskins will be ruined. No, new wine must be poured into new wineskins. And no one after drinking old wine wants the new, for he says, 'The old is better'" (Luke 5:37-39).

The Church of Jesus Christ in America is currently undergoing a radical shift in doctrine, purpose and function. This shift is bringing the Church toward her proper role as a body of reformers. The old paradigm of dispensational theology is being replaced by a "neo-Puritan" worldview which is called covenantal theology. The old paradigm of dispensational thinking leads to conspiracy theories. The new paradigm of covenantal thinking leads to a providential worldview and an understanding of progress of the Gospel throughout all of human history.

Providential Worldview

America was founded by a people who held to a providential worldview. It was this belief that led to the settling of the American colonies and the success of our nation in its early years.

Noah Webster, who compiled the first American dictionary (1828), defines Providence as: "The care and superintendence which God exercises over His creatures ... Some persons admit a general providence, but deny a particular providence, not considering that a general providence consists of particulars. A belief in divine providence is a source of great consolation to good men. By divine providence is understood God himself."

William Bradford, in his History of Plymouth Plantation, tells of the Pilgrims reliance on Providence in the midst of their many tragedies: "But these things did not dismay them (though they did sometimes trouble them) for their desires were set on the ways of God, and to enjoy His ordinances; but they rested on His Providences and knew whom they had believed."

The Declaration of Independence, written in 1776, concludes with these words: "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor."

An Example From History

The Civil War was the greatest judgment of God on our nation in history. The war killed more Americans than any other. After the war was over, Abraham Lincoln showed no elation over victory. Four years of strife had cut deep lines of sadness into his face. But it had not made him despair.

By 1865, many Americans wondered: "Why had the war continued between people who read the same Bible and prayed to the same God?" In his Second Inaugural Address, Lincoln wisely attributed the war to the providence of God. With these words, Lincoln urged our nation to hope for a better future:

"If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of the vilest offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that he gives to both North and South, this terrible war, as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a Living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope - fervently do we pray - that this might scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue, until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash, shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as it was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said 'the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.'"

Examples from Song and Verse

The great hymns indicate that the providential worldview is a part of the Church's heritage. Charles Wesley, for instance, described the progress of the Gospel in the following verses:

When He first the work begun,
Small and feeble was His day:
Now the word doth swiftly run,
Now it wins its widening way:
More and more it spreads and grows,
Ever mighty to prevail;
Sin's strongholds it now o'erthrows,
Shakes the trembling gates of hell.

In a hymn of Isaac Watts, the belief is expressed that a better day is dawning. We can see there was much optimism among Christians of Watts' age:

Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Does His successive journeys run.
His kingdom spread from shore to shore
Till moons shall wax and wane no more.

Isaac Watts' famous Christmas Carol "Joy to the World" contains, in two little sung verses, the hope of the worldwide conquest of Christianity:

No more let sins and sorrows grow,
Nor thorns infest the ground;
He comes to make His blessings flow
Far as the curse is found.

He rules the world with truth and grace,
And makes the nations prove
The glories of His righteousness
And wonders of His love.

"It Came Upon a Midnight Clear" by E.H. Sears, contains the following line:

For lo, the days are hast'ning on,
By prophet bards foretold,
When with the ever-circling years
Comes round the age of gold;
When peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendors fling.
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing.

Julia Ward Howe's famous "Battle Hymn of the Republic" also expresses the hope of the ultimate conquest of Christianity:

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men
before His judgment seat;
Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer Him!
be jubilant, my feet!
Our God is marching on.

Biblically Optimistic Worldview

Biblically optimistic worldview should never be confused with what the New Age movement has offered its place: positive thinking, motivational training, mind training, EST or the Forum. Even the Christian "positive confession movement" is not what we are talking about here. Our goal is not to become optimistic or positive in all our thinking but to become completely biblical in our beliefs and to promote the Lordship of Jesus Christ in every sphere of life.

A Biblically-based worldview takes the principles of Scripture and applies them to every area of life. History, for instance, is divided into two eras: B.C. and A.D. - the birth of Christ being the dividing line of history. After thousands of years of darkness, the gentile nations first began to see the light of the Gospel shining forth again. As we trace the history of nations, we see that pagan societies without the Gospel have accomplished little but a cyclical pattern of events leading nowhere. But as we see the Gospel introduced to nations, we see literacy, the arts, science, medicine, education, law and government being established, built upon, reformed and then elevating that nation to a great state of civilization.

When we view the effect of Christianity on western civilization in the last 500 years, we have every reason to hope for a better future for the entire world. Christianity has elevated economic theory and practice, social life, intellectual life, art, music and has lifted the individual to a level of importance in society.

When we look solely at the Bible, we find that there is no other way of thinking that leads to a higher sense of optimism. As Biblical saints we have every reason to hope! Not only do we have the hope of residing in heaven in the presence of God for all eternity, but we have the opportunity to be ambassadors of Christ in our day and age. While God is shaking the heavens and the earth to bring in His kingdom, we have the honor of being His representative! We can take part in advancing the kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven.

Reformation Bible Institute Correspondence School

Reformation Bible Institute equips students on a theological and practical level. Students are also given extensive training in the historic and global dimensions of their faith in order to form a comprehensive Christian worldview. RBI also offers ministry internships to students who graduate and assists in finding good affiliations for potential ministers. Reformation Bible Institute is training Christians who desire greater intimacy with Christ and increased fruitfulness in their ministry. Your life will be dramatically impacted by RBI correspondence school.

RBI Correspondence Curriculum

Systematic Theology for Reformation - Development of a systematic theology based upon a biblical worldview and the common Biblical principles in regard to the church's mission. Soteriology, Ecclesiology and Eschatology from a Reformed perspective is delineated. The differences between Revival and Spiritual Awakening are explored. Texts: Workbook 21, Jeff Ziegler and Systematic Theology, Charles Hodge.

Covenantalism and the Scriptures - Exploration of the historic Reformed position in regard to the interpretation of Scripture in contrast to the dispensational model. This class is essential in understanding the progressive nature of spiritual awakening and reformation. Text: Wrongly Dividing the Word, J. Gerstner.

Anatomy of Revival - Serves both as an introduction to the concepts to the concepts of revival and missions as well as a primer in spiritual warfare.

Texts: Ministry of Intercession, A. Murray; Operation World, P. Johnstone; Workbook 200, Ron Auvil.

RBI Registration: All classes $98, or all three for $275

Reformation of the Nations

by Peter J. Leithart
3/88

All over the world, governments are busily engaged in various kinds and degrees of reform. South Africa has repealed many of the "petty apartheid" laws that once restricted black advancement and maintained white supremacy. Mikhail Gorbachev's criticism of past Soviet abuses and his (thus far) meager reforms have made glasnost common parlance in Western countries.

Some Eastern European countries have begun to follow the Soviet lead. In China, land has been redistributed into small, quasi-private farms, with resulting increases in agricultural production.

South Africa has been accused of making only cosmetic changes, reforms that change the surface appearance of South African society but leave the fundamental structures of oppression and injustice in place. the same accusation has not been raised as readily against China and the Soviet Union, but such an argument could easily be made.

For example, writing in Commentary about the state of Soviet letters, Walter Laqueur commented recently that the USSR needs, above all, a "cultural revolution," something that the current regime shows no sign of permitting. Moreover, Christians are still in Soviet jails. In fact, without a thorough abandonment of communism, any "reform" in the USSR is, in the last analysis, sheer propaganda. (It is interesting in this connection that the basic meaning of glasnost is not, as the American media claims, "openness," but "publicity.")

Similar criticisms can be leveled against the Chinese agricultural reforms. It must be admitted that Chinese agriculture has made remarkable progress since the reforms were begun in the late 1970s. Yet the State continues to fix prices for many goods. Prices for staples in cities are suppressed, keeping the urban middle class warm and well-fed, but effectively stifling the incentive of farmers.

Technically, Chinese farmers can sell crops either on the free market or to the government, but in reality it is often difficult to shift to more profitable goods because the government arranges coercive "contracts" for staples. Without these "contracts," no sane farmer would sell his produce at the artificially low government prices. The State also continues to be the de jure owner of all the farmland.

In short, the fundamental realities of Chinese agriculture - in particular, price-fixing and State ownership of land - have not changed.

In the Philippines, the "people's revolution" has had discernible effects on attitudes, politics, and the press. Yet, James Fallows reports in The Atlantic that Filipino society is "the only non-communist society in East Asia in which the average living standard is going down." This is not, he argues, due entirely to the corruption of the Marcos regime. Instead, just as Japan and Korea demonstrate that culture can make a country rich even if it is poor in resources, the Philippines illustrates that "culture can make a naturally rich country poor."

All this raises the question: What is fundamental reform? In South Africa, democracy - one man, one vote, or, as Kendall and Louw have proposed in After Apartheid, "one man, many votes" - would be widely hailed as a fundamental reform. In the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, and China, privatization of land and abandonment of socialist planning would be recognized as fundamental reforms.

But do such reforms really touch the heart of social problems? Do even these kinds of reforms go deep enough?

When Ronald Reagan was elected in 1980, American conservatives rejoiced. This was the beginning of fundamental reform. As time went on, however, many within and without the administration discovered that fundamental reform was easier to talk about than to implement. David Stockman saw his budget plans trashed to make political hay. Interior Secretary James Watts' attempts to bring sanity to ecological issues were dashed to pieces on the reefs of media hype and distortion.

Spending increased, and the bureaucracy got bigger. Reagan is now reluctantly, hesitantly, and evasively talking about tax increases. We still have a Federal Department of Education. Few observers today would deny that whatever the Reagan revolution might have accomplished falls under the category of "cosmetic reform."

In the face of widespread failure, many conservative activists have lost heart. They have concluded that fundamental reform is impossible. Their idealism has been shattered and they have become cynical, because they have learned "how the world really works." As a result, they have become less activist.

The problem with such conservatives is that they were engaged in the wrong kind of activism to begin with. They were seeking to achieve fundamental social changes through political means. Their program was fundamentally statist, and thus conceded the presuppositions of the opposition. They were seeking to rebuild the walls of the city with sledge hammers.

Christian activism operates in an entirely different atmosphere than humanist activism, whether conservative or liberal. Christian reform is not basically political, though it has a political dimension. In fact, Christian reform is the only reform that is not cosmetic, because only the Christian gospel gets to the heart of social ills by getting to the sinful hearts of the men who make up the society.

Christians alone can avoid cynicism about the long-term chances of reform, because only the Christian can be sure that his work will be established if he faints not.

A Call For A Renewed Reformation Zeal

By Jeff Ziegler

"Is there not a cause?"
- 1 Samuel 17:28 KJV

The cause of God in church history has often ignited the same kind of Davidic passion within the elect to perform exploits against indolence, ignorance and iniquity. The words may be different, but the intent and spirit; the reformation zeal of David the warrior king, remains the same.

Indeed Martin Luther declared: "Here I stand," and John Wesley: "Give me a place to stand ... to shake the earth." These men and many others in the church's illustrious history are illustrative of the divine stuff of zeal so sorely needed in our generation. They were men with a cause, a mission from God.

David was once surrounded by an indifference to God's purposes when his nation was challenged by Goliath, the giant from hell, who sought to shame God's people and eclipse the testimony of God.

"And the Philistine said, 'I defy the armies of Israel this day! Give me a man, that we may fight together.' When Saul and all Israel heard those words of the Philistine, they were dismayed and greatly afraid" (1 Samuel 17:10,11).

David's oldest brother, Eliab, dismayed and fearful, became angry not with the deity-mocking, godless giant, but with David who, in reformation zeal, eclipsed the carefree existence of Israel by arriving on the field of battle ready for mortal combat despite all of the natural circumstances arrayed against him.

"Then David spoke to the men who were standing by him, saying, 'What will be done for the man who kills this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should taunt the armies of the living God?' ... And Eliab his oldest brother heard when he spoke to the men; and Eliab's anger was kindled against David" (1 Samuel 17:26,28).

Eliab goes on to ridicule David as being prideful, irresponsible and full of mischief, to which David retorts with divine ire: "Is there not a cause?"

Complacency, lethargy and malaise concerning sacred or secular matters have long been universally loathed attributes of human behavior. Yet in today's anemic evangelicalism such an attitude is not only being tolerated but is actually being nurtured and promulgated as a portrait of "balanced" Christianity. Introspection, stoicism and a marvelous indifference to Christian maturity suddenly are the means to a happy life free from responsibility, duties and demands. This kind of placid indifference is supposed to protect individual saints from "burnout" and to remove from our lives any call or cause which will demand sacrifice, pain or rigorous exertion.

"Happiness is a choice," some would say. "So away with troublesome righteous causes and the biblical injunction of 'going on to perfection.' After all, happiness and contentment are the highest goals of life."

This kind of sickening sentiment is a selfish, hellish philosophy which strips from the Church the depth of Christian character and reformation zeal needed to transform our society.

There are a number of reasons for the cause for the churches slide toward mediocrity in our day. Here are two of the top detrimental trends:

First, the greatest hindrance to a revived state in any believer is a short and truncated relationship with Christ our true vine of life in glory. There can be no vision nor vitality of life without an intimate, prayerful, powerful, reciprocal relationship with Jesus.

Amazingly, when saints are found "short of the glory of God" instead of drawing nigh to Christ using the means of grace of prayer, meditation upon the covenant forever, they look for the quick fix of the latest paperback at their local bookstore which generally excuses rather than challenges their lukewarm condition.

"I am the vine, you are the branches; he who abides in Me, and I in him, he bears much fruit; for apart from Me you can do nothing. If anyone does not abide in Me, he is thrown away as a branch, and dries up; and they gather them and cast them into the fire, and they are burned" (John 15:5,6).

The second trend which stifles Godly animation is the increasing popularity of pop psychology. Typically these psychologists are short on biblical theology and demeaning to the comprehensive work of Christ upon the cross. Any behavior which is deemed by these "experts" to be unbalanced is somehow related to a dysfunctional background or a co-dependant relationship. No thought is given to man's depravity or an individual's personal responsibility for his own actions.

Interestingly enough these same psychologists take great pains to demean and tarnish the testimony of the reformers and revivalists of yesteryear, for their lives eclipse the new "balanced theology" they are trying to promote.

For example: Luther is described as an "insecure workaholic." Never mind that he saved the church from apostasy, published the Bible for the common man, initiated the Protestant work ethic and was the bedrock for Western Civilization as we know it.

Or take the case of John and Charles Wesley, who are described as "having manic depressive tendencies" and "dangerously unbalanced." Of course, John and Charles Wesley were dangerous, TO HELL, that is! Between them, they preached 85,000 sermons, wrote 250 books and 7000 hymns. In addition to this, they saved their beloved England from the kind of blood bath embodied by the French Revolution. Oh, that we should have more of such unbalanced, insecure, workaholic, manic depressive warriors. We might actually win our current culture war!

These same psychologists are guilty of historical and theological revisionism which robs the saints of their robust and glorious heritage and replaces it with the touchy-feely, blame-your-parents-for-everything syndrome, effectively neutering and contradicting orthodox Christianity.

"Our great God and Savior, Christ Jesus gave Himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify for Himself a peculiar people, zealous for good works" (Titus 2:13,14).

The following is a complete "recovery plan" for those who wish to renew their spiritual passion:

1) Cultivate your relationship with Christ in a fresh and vital way. Unload preconceived ideas which have skewed your vision of who Jesus is and search after Him as a man searches for a treasure. Look for the underpinning principals and patterns of scripture in order to rebuild a Godly vision and purpose for your life.

Then dare to be abandoned in executing God's purposes for your life with much fasting, prayer and concentrated Bible study. Do not fear "burning out" for God! Indeed to burn out upon the altar of self-promotion or to run upon the ecclesiastical treadmills of futility, that is certainly sin. However, to know real exhaustion after a major spiritual conflict and victory, that is true satisfaction.

2) Reclaim your spiritual heritage by reading the original source material of historic Christianity, not books written second hand. For example, if you wish to study the works of John Calvin, then read Calvin, not books about Calvin which may have a bias or untoward agenda. Be rich in your Christian heritage, so that you may have a foundation for destiny in God.

3) Begin to build a comprehensive Christian worldview. Know your election and mission from God within this context and then hurl your every faculty toward this purpose. Yes indeed, "Seek first the kingdom of God!"

Rivalry Over Great Principles Reaching Impasse

By Andrew Sandlin

3/93

IF POLITICS IS THE ART OF COMPROMISE, almost every cranny of American society has become politicized. In refusing to endorse the presidency of Bill Clinton, a Little Rock, Arkansas newspaper complained that the governor's problem is not that he sacrifices his principles, but that it is uncertain he has principles to sacrifice.

That criticism is just as applicable to Republican and independent candidates and educators and entertainers and media personalities and military leaders and mechanics and bus drivers and housewives and librarians. Increasingly, the strategy of pragmatism and the message of pluralism from which it issues dominates American life.

The modern pluralistic thesis goes like this. All of us in this professedly pluralistic country are not going to agree on all - or perhaps even most - issues. The United States is increasingly diverse. We are liberal and conservative; male and female; Catholic, Protestant, Jewish and Islamic; black, white, Hispanic and Asian; heterosexual and homosexual; elderly, middle-aged and young; upper-, lower-, and middle-class. The most prudent way of dealing with the problems engendered by the close proximity of such diverse individuals and groups is to affirm the ultimate, fundamental, indeed, the seemingly only, axiom on which all may agree and which serve as the social cohesion amidst overwhelming diversity - I'm OK and You're OK, just as long as Your OK doesn't infringe on My OK.

This is the pluralistic message. It is guided by the employment of pragmatism, the view that nothing can be accomplished without compromise, that fundamental principles are amenable to revision in terms of the even greater goal of social harmony. The really important thing is that everybody get along, a state accomplished by the willingness of everybody not to be too insistent on individual beliefs.

The increasingly numerous supporters of this social philosophy are naive, however. They do not recognize that some visions of reality, civilization, justice, freedom and the future are fundamentally irreconcilable, mutually contradictory. Certain principles are great precisely because they are not subject to compromise. Pivotal events in the history of the United States highlight this inflexibility of great principles. In the Revolutionary Era the colonists were convinced compromise with the policy of taxation without representation was tantamount to complicity with tyranny, that, in the words of Jefferson, "[W]hen a long train of abuses and usurpations ... evinces a design to reduce [citizens] under absolute despotism despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government...." Jefferson justified this revolt by appeals to great principles, so-called "self-evident truths."

Similarly, Abraham Lincoln was willing to spill the blood of a nation at the hands of its own citizens to preserve what he considered a fundamental principle, that the Declaration of Independence in principle secured the liberty of all humanity, not just white males. He was emphatically not motivated by the mentality so prominent today, which transported to and immersed in 1850 became; "It's OK for Southerners to own slaves, just as long as they don't try to force slavery in the free territories." Indeed, just such thinking obtained in various antebellum compromises, all of which were miserable failures. It was because Lincoln repudiated the sort of thinking so prominent in our modern United States that slavery no longer exists here.

While many beliefs are discretionary and subject to compromise, others are held so tenaciously that compromise is virtually impossible. For example, the pro-abortion arrayed against the pro-life forces are locked into a fight to the death. The great guiding principle of the pro-abortion devotees is the right of a woman to "reproductive freedom." to her body, to "her own choices that affect her life." The undergirding principle of pro-life is the right of the fetus or unborn child to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. These two visions are mutually exclusive and compromises between them like those between slavery and abolitionism preceding the Civil War are futile: no amount of regulation short of banning abortion is likely to appease those who believe abortion is murder. No amount of regulation is likely to appease those who believe abortion is murder. No extension of abortion rights to anything less than unrestrictive "reproductive freedom" will satisfy those who believe the lack of such freedom is a violation of a woman's constitutional rights. The hostility at the doors of abortion clinics between pro-abortion and pro-life forces is simply the visual manifestation of the war between two rival thought systems.

This sort of worldview rivalry exists over the issues of environmentalism, homosexuality and multiculturalism. Supporters of the two sides of each of these views are combatants; they are not interested in a pragmatic solution to the rivalry because the very nature of their vision precludes the existence of the opposite vision. Each side, like Krushchev in his comment to the American press, is working for victory, like coexistence. Coexistence for the disciples of opposing visions is defeat.

The foundational meaning of commonwealth is a group of people united by common interests. Stable nations are designated commonwealths because they presuppose common interests, but when interests no longer are common, a commonwealth is no longer possible. Therefore, it is incumbent on the United States to address the issue of great fundamental principles if it is to survive as a vibrant republic. The solution is not to assume that all principles may be compromised or, more naively, that none have principles to compromise.

Our history reminds us that postponing or compromising decisions over fundamental principles is the supreme exercise of futility.

The Ruling Power of Ideas

"Little minds think and talk about people.
Average minds think and talk about things and actions.
Great minds think and talk about ideas."
- Benjamin Franklin (adapted)

Yes, ideas rule - ideas theological, ideas philosophical and social, political and economic.

Be certain that yours is a great mind, dealing with ideas - or make it grow into one. Think deeply and think long-range.

"Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God!"
- Romans 11:33

Study - study hard to see how to bring our beloved country and our world back to greater Godly faithfulness and Godly principles of Living.

Shiloh Christian Fellowship

- by Leilani Corpus

3/89

OAKLAND, CA (FR) - Plitner Avenue in the inner city area of Oakland, California, was one of the hottest crime and drug spots in the city. After years of being harassed and burglarized by drug dealers, and ignored by politicians, some landlords wrote a letter to Pastor David Kiteley of Shiloh Christian Fellowship - asking him to help clean up the neighborhood. Kiteley responded by opening up his church building to hold a meeting for local law enforcement officials.

He and his church members didn't realize that just five blocks away was one of the most dangerous, drug infested areas in the city. "It put our church in a whole different arena," said Kiteley. "We've heard a lot about reforming and rebuilding the city, but now we are putting it into action. It's no longer rhetoric." This led to the first massive "block party" and a March for Righteousness down Plitner Avenue.

Since the march in 1985, Plitner hasn't been a problem, and Kiteley has spearheaded a massive neighborhood community movement which has been effective in reducing crime and drug use. Police say that 6,000 were arrested on drug charges in Oakland in 1987, and estimated that 7,000 were arrested in 1988.

"Now we don't even think about Plitner," said Lt. Fred Peoples of the Oakland Police Department. "We've cleaned up the area and have moved into other areas. The only thing we heard about Plitner was a shoot-out two years ago," he explained. "That was because after we had the march, the dealer moved away and then decided to come back. We haven't heard anything from there since then."

Lt. Peoples added that Shiloh Christian Fellowship is the best thing that has happened to the Oakland Police Department. "They have been the impetus behind this movement," he said. After the 1987 march, a Berkeley police officer told a daily reporter, "I don't feel elected officials are going to solve the drug problem. I'm convinced that to solve the problem what we need is a higher moral attitude. If my son was doing drugs, I'd want the police to arrest him."

The Oakland Block Party Council, which is directed by Kiteley, holds monthly block parties and annual marches through high crime and drug areas. The block parties against drugs are massive neighborhood celebrations where residents get in touch with local resources for legal problems, health matters, or food and clothing needs.

Dubbed the Neighborhood Corps during the last half of the 1980s, the Neighborhood Community Block Party manual notes that churches have a basic orientation to reach out and help those that are around them: "In generation after generation church assistance and values have been the foundation of neighborhoods and communities. We believe in a Christian foundation, and the churches of Oakland stand ready to serve their neighborhoods and help coordinate the resources necessary to meet the needs of the people."

The block parties are organized to encourage residents to interact with each other as well as to provide agencies, community organizations, and churches an outlet for meeting practical needs. "This means that we will not just concentrate only on housing or only on jobs, but we will endeavor to see that the total person is bettered and helped. This therefore means that every agency or organization has a piece of the pie."

The block party movement has been notably successful. In 1988, a car was firebombed by a drug dealer on Apricot Street - but the car was owned by a block party captain. Lt. Peoples commented that the dealer was driven out of the neighborhood and "they don't mess with her anymore." On 67th Avenue, an effective home alert group has literally driven the drug dealers out of the area. Kiteley added that when giving seminars on dealing with drug pushers in the neighborhood, their theme has been "Just Say Go!"

Last year the group broke new ground in holding its first community health fair, which drew 2500 participants. "We had doctors, nurses, and mobile units out there volunteering their time. We also prayed for the sick," said Kiteley. Held at Fremont High School, the fair offered a gamut of services from free blood pressure checks, AIDs prevention information, to items such as toothbrushes, toothpaste, and diapers.

Besides fueling the vision for reformation of the city for Shiloh's members, the block party movement has also brought unprecedented unity to Oakland churches. Kiteley said his family is also very involved: "My children cook hot dogs and give away food and clothing along with me."

The three-year-old organization has received accolades and honors from city and state government officials. Kiteley, a pastor for 21 years who has traveled to 30 different nations, has gained the respect of the mayor's office and city council for his persistence and diligence in bringing the gospel to areas where drugs, immorality, murder and poverty have attempted to rule the city.

Gov. George Deukmejian's Office of Criminal Justice Planning honored the church for its outstanding crime prevention efforts. Shiloh was also recognized in 1988 by the California State Legislature for its "commitment and dedication to improving the quality of life for citizens in Oakland, California." In 1988, Kiteley was honored by the National Crime Prevention Council.

His advice is sought by city officials and community organization leaders on how to best spend public funds on crime prevention efforts. In fact, Kiteley and his church have ventured into several areas usually left to government welfare agencies, and have experienced considerable effectiveness in addressing problems that local politicians and law enforcement officials could not solve. With the assistance of churches and mobilized citizenry, there has been a significant decrease in crime and drug traffic.

Shiloh Christian Fellowship appears to be on the cutting edge of a major trend for churches in the 1990s.

They are also experiencing the reality of the words of Jesus Christ when He said, "Let your light shine before men in such a way that they may see your good works, and glorify your father who is in heaven."

What is a Worldview?

By Ron Auvil

What is this concept called "worldview?" A brief explanation would see worldview as a comprehensive sense of personal relationship to the world surrounding us. Simply it is a sense of destiny and purpose.

There are many worldviews confronting people in the world today. Humanism, for example, is a worldview which states that the universe is centered upon man and his achievements. Marxism is a worldview which believes in the inevitability of class struggle based on economic factors.

Major world religions are based upon worldviews. Hinduism is a worldview based upon many deities, and endless life-death cycle and inevitability of human suffering. Islam, on the other hand, is a religion of martyrdom, conquests by force, and police state modesty. Thus to understand any of these movements and religions, we must understand the worldview they are founded upon.

The importance of worldview cannot be overstated. For any movement of religion, it is the motivational factor that causes it to expand, contract, appear, and dissolve. Adherents to a particular movement test their worldview by acting upon it and observing the effects. The chart below illustrates:

Any individual's worldview causes them to act based upon how they perceive their role in the world. This action causes a result which upon observation will either verify or prove incorrect their worldview.

For example, a Marxist believes that class struggle is inevitable, thus he acts to form revolutionary cells bringing disruption to the present system. When the disruption erupts it will verify his worldviews thus spurring him to greater revolutionary activity. This worldview caused Marxism to violently expand both in Europe and Asia. Marxism is now disappearing because it has been proven false based on its results of economic ruin and human misery.

Developing a Christian worldview is of extreme importance in order to advance Christ's kingdom as false systems collapse under their own corrupted weight. One reason for the decline of Christianity in western culture is the lack of biblically based worldview. Instead the cultural worldview of materialism, selfishness and greed has become the predominant vision.

The first step in addressing this problem is by admitting that by and large the Church in the West has a spiritually bankrupt worldview that can be summarized by the saying, "Shop till you drop," rather than "Pick up your cross and follow me."

Thus if we were to properly understand the role of worldview, we would understand it as a set of rules that reside at the very core of our being. If our set of values is earthly, carnal and debased, then our actions will reflect such rot. However, a change in this set of values will bring a change in our actions. If we are taught a biblically based worldview, radical change will take place. Believers the world over will experience revival and evangelism will become more effective than ever.

What then are the chief elements in a Christian worldview? Listed below are the foundations for the building of this godly vision.

1. Christian worldview begins with Christ's words, "You must be born-again," and this wonderful truth was preached by the apostles to the intent that the corrupt sin ridden depraved human nature and an incorrect view of the world around us would be displaced by a true worldview based on the Bible truth and the indwelling Holy Spirit.
2. Christian worldview must be based upon who Jesus is and upon Him alone. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians 3:11). This sounds so basic, so true, that seemingly no one could disagree. However, it is alarming to note the new and numerous doctrines which are advanced in our day, which focus not upon the glorious Christ but upon earthly events such as a unified European economic community, Soviet maneuvers, and futile speculations as to where the antichrist is hiding.
3. Christian worldview must express God's mission for His people on earth. This is expressed in the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12:1-3; 13:16; 11:17,18) as a blessing of ALL nations of the earth with the Gospel. This is made applicable to the Church in Galatians 3:12,29, and is verified in the language of the Great Commission (Matthew 28:18-20). This is the highest priority of the Christian worldview and implies unlimited prayer and, financial and human resource be provided for its accomplishment. This effort is demanded until a closure with the goal is achieved. This means that the Gospel is to be preached until every peoples group has a functioning expression of the Church that will act as a witness and testimony to them.
4. Implicit in this worldview are revival and spiritual awakening as the great means of forwarding God's purposes on the earth. The unrevived, stagnant Church would have as much chance of achieving God's purposes on earth as would a corpse winning the 100-meter dash at the Olympics. Therefore, all attention must be given to the state of revival progress in the Church.
5. This worldview will spur ministry to alleviate social ills and utilize ministry to spread the Gospel to all levels of society. Society will then be changed and become more responsive to the demands and claims of Christ.
6. The true Christian worldview must express Christ in every area of the believer's existence. Family relationships, work, finance, entertainment, politics, all areas of endeavor must be subject to the absolute Lordship of Jesus Christ. No division of activities into "Christian" or "secular" can take place. All things will involve the work of Jesus. If He is not Lord of all, He is not Lord at all.
7. All issues must be understood through this worldview. In short, it becomes a filter through which everything from the profound to the mundane is examined.

As you can see, Christian worldview will express the Lordship of our glorious Lord in every area of life. It will displace every other worldview and show them to be false. The Church will be spurred on to the completion of the Great Commission. The Gospel will be demonstrated in society, and great sweeping change will be effected.

In our next article we will define and examine history in light of Christian worldview.

The World's Greatest Thinkers Were Christians!

by Gary DeMar and Peter Leithart

While most Christians will admit that they have a mind, many seem to think that they don't need it. In fact, some Christians today seem to believe that thinking is an act of unbelief. Many Christians do not even begin to think about how the Bible might apply, for example, to economics, law, or education. They might have opinions about these areas but no formulated, thought-out worldview.

This view has not always prevailed in the history of Christian culture. In fact, some of the greatest thinkers throughout the centuries have been Christians. Of course, not all of them were perfectly consistent in their application of Christianity to various intellectual pursuits. The important point is that they did not believe their faith kept them from using their minds.

* In the area of LAW, Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England has remained a classic of legal scholarship since it was first published in the mid-1700s. Blackstone defined law as "a rule of action dictated by some superior being." He claimed that God dictated laws for men, which could be discovered in nature and in the Bible: "Upon these two foundations, the law of nature and the law of revelation, depend all human laws; that is to say, no human law should be suffered to contradict these."1

* In LITERATURE, the number of great Christian writers through the centuries is astounding. To look only at England, we find that many of the greatest poets were Christians, even clergymen: John Donne, George Herbert, and John Milton. Samuel Johnson was, in his time, the leading literary critic in the English language, and the compiler of an early English dictionary. Even into this century, many leading English literary figures were Christians, including G. K. Chesterton, T. S. Eliot, C.S. Lewis, and Dorothy Sayers.

* In PHILOSOPHY, Christians dominated the West from the fifth century until modern times. The great philosophers of the Middle Ages were all theologians: Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, Anselm of Canterbury, William of Ockham. When philosophers began to abandon Christianity in the 17th century, most continued to be influenced by Christianity and to address the issues that Christians had been wrestling with for centuries. Even the "father of modern philosophy," Rene Descartes, despite the evil effects of his thought, was trying to provide a secure proof for the existence of God.

* In POLITICS, many of the important political leaders of the medieval and early modern West were Christians. Until the later Middle Ages, every king of Europe claimed to be Christ's representative on earth. In Russia, the czars claimed to be the protectors of the Orthodox Church right up to the time of the Bolshevik Revolution. In the modern era, such outstanding political figures as John Adams, George Washington, William Gladstone, and William Wilberforce were all to varying degrees professing and practicing Christians.

* In the ARTS, we discover again that most of the (sometimes anonymous) medieval painters, sculptors, and architects were evidently Christians. The great cathedrals of Europe, the magnificent stained glass windows, the colorful altar pieces, the statuary that adorned the cathedrals - all were dedicated to Christian themes, and were generally produced by Christian artisans. During the Renaissance and Reformation periods, artists began to gain more individual recognition, and we have clearer evidence that many were believers. Among these were Rembrandt van Rijn and Albrecht Durer, two Protestant painters.

* In MUSIC, much of Western music was written by Christians.² Johann Sebastian Bach and Georg Friederich Handel are two representatives of the great German Christian tradition in music. Handel's "Messiah," a series of Scripture texts set to some of the most exhilarating music ever written, is still a holiday favorite today. Everyone recognizes the tune to Handel's magnificent "Hallelujah Chorus." Bach was, if anything, even more self-consciously Christian than Handel, and dedicated many of his compositions to the glory of God.

* SCIENCE and technology in the modern world often seem to be at odds with Christianity, but this was not always the case. In fact, after Christianity had taken over the Western Roman Empire, there was an unprecedented burst of innovation in agricultural technology. The inventions included the heavy plow, crop-rotation, new types of harnesses for horses, and nailed horseshoes. Some scholars have concluded that this burst of technology, which continued throughout the medieval period in Europe, was a result of Christian beliefs and attitudes.³ Many of the leading scientists of the early modern world were also professing Christians: Isaac Newton, Johann Kepler, Robert Boyle, Lord Kelvin, Louis Pasteur, Michael Faraday, Clerk Maxwell, and many more.

Puritan Storm Rising

By Jeff Ziegler

While evil is being codified at the highest levels of American government and carnal chaos erupts in our urban centers, the Church in America is undergoing a massive and historic paradigm shift, which despite her failings is positioning her as an agent for the inauguration of yet another great spiritual awakening along with the accompanying fruit of societal reformation.

This shift, which emphasizes a victorious ecclesiology and a biblically optimistic worldview, is nothing less than a renaissance of Puritanism, and is a common trend historically, especially in the embryonic stages of spiritual awakenings. Not only is the rise of Puritan thought a common "pre-awakening" occurrence, the great body of Puritan truths are essential to any biblical revival and reformation and thus should be welcomed and nurtured.

This sweeping Puritan resurgence is cutting a broad swath across the evangelical spectrum as a whole and its promotion is rapidly preparing the Church corporate in America as an agent for the most comprehensive societal reformation in this nation's history. Indeed "neo-Puritanism" is having its greatest effect among those evangelicals who are involved in the revival prayer movement which has acted as something of a spiritual womb in incubating the first fruits in a "Golden Age" of strapping Christianity.

Of special note is the mounting momentum which Puritan thought is having among charismatic churches who have, in general, been intuitively covenantal in relationships and church polity and have had a subjective appreciation for the "Dominion Mandate." This is a common thread in historic Puritan thought. Charismatics, who have had this unconscious and subjective appreciation for Puritanism, are now overcoming an inbred prejudice of American anti-intellectualism and are building in the objective theological moorings of Puritan thought. This will inevitably bring and unflagging and comprehensive worldview to their ranks an with it an historic Protestant orthodoxy which will shake the very foundations of the United States.

However, I must caution, this encouraging movement among evangelicals at large should not be viewed with a "Pollyanna" optimism. There exists, unfortunately, many entrenched strongholds of sin within the Church which must be vanquished in order to see genuine awakening. These fixed fortifications of iniquity will not fall easily, for sin has been theologically rationalized, codified and institutionalized by widespread antinomianism (or contempt for the moral law of God), pietistic monasticism (or fatalistic and private religion) and sentimental mysticism; with its inherently relativistic morality and emphasis on emotionalism as being superior to immutable biblical principle.

It is equally important to note that the existence of such evil should not cause us to have a "give up the ship" mentality. Our Sovereign Lord has ignited the engines of the Puritan juggernaut throughout history, often (from a human perspective) just in the nick of time. Thus we, the Lord's elect knighted ones, cannot cower in hopelessness nor retreat to the bunkers of fatalism.

While each Puritan renaissance has its particular emphasis, there are elements which are common to each. The most common element is a distinctly reformed soteriology or theology of redemption. Historically, reformed soteriology is sometimes accepted wholly and at other times in degree depending on the depth and force of the particular Puritan resurgence in question.

A general explanation of such would entail an Augustinian-Calvinistic approach to the issues of salvation and sanctification. This could be defined in very simplistic terms by placing the majesty and supremacy of God over against man's absolute total depravity. This "goodness and severity" principle is brought to the fore primarily through preaching, not only in an evangelistic sense, but also in the provoking of the saints to "run the race unto perfection." Reformed soteriology and its application in revival preaching is the surest antidote to the antinomian, pietistic, sentimental, defeatist theology which has surrendered American society to hellish machinations.

Another elemental key to any resurgence of Puritanism is a victorious ecclesiology or a triumphant view of the purpose, function and doctrine of the Church. Such an optimistic view of the Church would see her as victorious in time and history and would emphasize a covenantal approach to Scripture as well as a covenantal model as a basis for relationships between individuals, churches and the state. This covenantal model could be thus summarized: "The God who created the universe reveals himself in history, lays down immutable fixed Biblical laws, brings predictable results, both blessings and sanctions in terms of these laws, and raises the elect to a place of victory in history."

Some of the practical benefits of such a covenantal and conquering worldview will include actions by the Church which have not been evidenced since the days of the Scottish Covenanters and John Knox. There will be an increase of cooperative ecclesiastical actions such as functioning presbyteries, which will legislate God's moral law over cities and regions through covenantal imprecatory prayer and public proclamations. Practical cooperation between ministers in covenantal relationships will be evidenced in such areas as church discipline, reformation think-tanks, ecclesiastical courts and the sharing of resources to accomplish goals.

Generally, an increase of Christian activism at the grass-roots level will be in evidence. Operation Rescue and the covenantal-prayer-proclamation movement are the first-fruits of this new Puritanism. Socially, one can expect great reaction and upheaval from both Church and society as the pluralistic moral relativists within the Church and the secularistic social Darwinists within the power structures of society rise in raucous denunciation of any movement which dares to proclaim and enforce the absolutes of God's Law-Word. But such is the stuff of such "Puritan storms," for revival, reformation and revolution are very close cousins indeed.

The Nature of the Apostolic Ministry

By Jim Buchan

Some people would argue that there is absolutely no place for apostles in the church today. Such a ministry, they would say, ended many centuries ago, either in the first century or at least by the time the canon of Scripture was completed and recognized.

Other commentators would be a little more open-minded, but would limit the present role of apostolic ministry to missionary work in areas of the world where the gospel has never yet been preached. In fact, the word "missionary" comes from a Latin word meaning the same as the Greek word "apostolos," one sent forth.

The Function of an Apostle

Before responding to the various viewpoints on whether apostles are - or should be - present today, it is important to first take a look at the role and function of apostles in the First Century churches.

1. Taking the gospel to unreached areas. Paul said to the Romans, "It has always been my ambition to preach the gospel where Christ was not known, so that I would not be building on someone else's foundation" (Romans 15:20).
2. Laying a firm foundation (Christ Himself) for the churches being established. Paul speaks of this important apostolic role: "By the grace God has given me, I laid a foundation as a wise master builder, and someone else is building on it. But each one should be careful how he builds. For no one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians 3:10,11).
3. Training the initial leaders and appointing elders. When Paul and Barnabas made their second visit to Lystra, Iconium and Pisidian Antioch, they prayed and fasted and ordained elders in each church (Acts 14:21-23). Paul likewise instructs Titus to "set in order" the churches in Crete and appoint elders in every city (Titus 1:5).
4. Dealing with specific problems, false doctrines or sins in the churches that had been established. Paul's first letter to the Corinthians illustrates his use of apostolic authority to speak to a number of problems in the church he had planted at Corinth: disunity, immaturity, pride, immorality, taking other believers to court before secular authorities, questions about celibacy and marriage, disputes about meat sacrificed to idols, wrong handling of the Lord's Supper, misuse of spiritual gifts, confusion about the resurrection, etc.
5. Promoting unity in the Body of Christ. The unity principle was applied on many different levels. In Philippi, Paul had to deal with a situation of contention between two ladies in the local assembly, Euodia and Syntyche. In Corinth, there was apparently city wide disunity in the church because of various believers choosing to rally around dynamic leaders such as Paul, Apollos, and Peter. Paul also performed the apostolic role of providing a link of communication and sharing with the universal Body of Christ around the world.

6. Demonstrating and imparting the supernatural dimension of the Kingdom of God. Although it is God's intention for all believers to heal the sick, cast out demons and perform miracles by the power of the Holy Spirit, those in apostolic ministry are particularly to bear this credential. Thus it is said that God did extraordinary miracles through Paul. Apostles were often used in a special way to impart the power of God to other believers.

In stating these six functions of apostles in the First Century church, it must be realized that each of the apostles in the New Testament was unique as to how he carried out his apostolic role. Peter was particularly gifted in reaching out to the lost. Paul seemed to excel in teaching and in building believers together as a functional expression of the Body of Christ. John's apostleship carried with it a prophetic heart that God's people would continually walk together in righteousness with the Lord and love each other. James, the half-brother of Jesus, also seems to have functioned as an apostle, even though the focus of his ministry was more pastoral and localized in Jerusalem.

It is also important to realize that having an apostolic calling did not automatically mean that the apostle had the right to exercise full authority in all places and situations. It was a ministry based upon relationship and not only on calling.

Also, it means that the authority of an apostle waned in certain ways once the local church was firmly established and provided with the oversight of local elders. The relationship and the authority still existed when necessary to intervene in problems not being remedied by the local leadership, but it was Paul's perspective that he was like a father whose role of authority diminished once his son or daughter reached adulthood. His heart was not to establish a "chain of command," but rather to see each church established under the headship of Christ.

What about today?

Many commentators have come to the conclusion that after the Apostle John died, the "apostolic age" officially came to an end and there ceased to be any valid apostolic ministry. This view is based upon two erroneous assumptions:

1. That the role of the apostle was limited to the original twelve apostles chosen by Jesus. A careful reading of the New Testament will show that others are specifically referred to as apostles: Matthias, Paul, Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, Andronicus, Junias, Epaphroditus, and many more. The Twelve are indeed said to have a special role in the purposes of God, but that does not mean they are the only apostles.

2. That there is no need for apostles today. This objection can be best be answered by looking again at the list of functions of an apostle. Are the functions still relevant today?

Relevant Functions for Today

Unreached Areas - Although the gospel has gone out to some degree to every nation of the earth, there are still an estimated 16,000 "people groups" that are geographically or linguistically isolated and have never even heard of Jesus Christ.

Foundation Laying - Many churches in America and all over the world have never really been established on a solid biblical foundation. They have been built upon human traditions and human opinions, but not upon Christ Himself and His eternal Word.

Training Leaders - Today the apostolic function of training leaders has been largely replaced by seminaries and Bible schools. Appointing the leaders of local churches has been made a matter of congregational voting, selection by a denominational hierarchy, or ambitious aspiring young preachers simply starting their own churches and appointing themselves the pastors. The result has often been that leaders are put in places of responsibility that they are not really called to by God, and are not adequately equipped to fulfill. They may have been good students at the seminary, but are likely to miss the kind of personal training and character development that Timothy received from Paul.

Problem Solving - It is clear that local churches frequently encounter problems that they have difficulty solving without outside assistance. Pastors are often without any personal accountability and often have no one to give them input regarding church problems. Sometimes local leaders have blind spots and cannot even see the shortcomings that exist. There still a need today for men of apostolic authority to pierce through the blindness, ignorance and pride, speaking the Word of God to areas of sin, imbalance, false doctrine, division and other problems.

Unity - The disunity of the Body of Christ is still a scandal that robs us of the full blessing of God and undercuts our testimony to the lost. Men of genuine apostolic heart have a burden to see God's people come together as a united family and a united army. They see an overview of the universal church around the world and can sense the heartbeat of what the Lord is speaking. The vision is sorely needed in the church today, and only men of apostolic insight and authority can bring it about in a significant way.

Supernatural - We live in a day when God is moving mightily to restore signs and wonders to the church. For too long we have relied upon our intellect, human wisdom, and persuasive words - the very things Paul put no confidence in: "My message and my preaching were not in wise and persuasive words, but with demonstration of the Spirit's power, so that your faith might not rest on men's wisdom, but on God's power (1 Corinthians 2:4,5).

Yes, we need apostles today!

I admit that I've always been a little wary of people who go around calling themselves an "apostle" or "prophet" or some other high sounding title. Sadly, it has often been that those most eager to use such a title have been woefully in character and credentials. Nevertheless, God is raising up apostles to serve His church today, and if we are wise we will recognize our need for such output.

Jesus is restoring His Church today! We still have a long way to go, but let us receive those He sends to be part of the restoration process!

The Characteristics of a Prophet from Last Days Newsletter

- by Keith Green

Now with all this talk about misguided, young zealots going around blasting people with the truth minus love, I don't want to give the impression that God has not called certain people to fulfill the ministry of a prophet. There are many references in the book of Acts concerning people anointed by God to preach with prophetic urgency, (Acts 2:16, 3:22, 8:28,30, 13:20, 21:10-11, 28:25).

These men were called "prophets" by the writer of Acts. And Paul, in his teaching about the Body of Christ, talks about the different offices and callings in the body to help build up, strengthen, and establish the Church (1 Cor. 12:27-30; Rom. 12:4-16; Eph. 4:11-16).

First of all, he would be a CHRISTIAN - he would be like Jesus. Yes, he would hate sin like Jesus, but more importantly, he would love sinners like Jesus! He would not be arrogant, but he would be a broken man who was softened by many nights alone in prayer. He would be loving, kind, and gentle, always seeking to get the truth across in the most direct way, and yet never offending anyone if he could help it.

The prophet, above all, would be a man of God. He would seek to display all the qualities of love found in 1 Corinthians 13. He would not be easily provoked or moody or unduly harsh - but patient, merciful, and slow to anger. He would not seek to be a prophet, nor glory in that position, but just like Gideon, Jeremiah, or Moses, he would ask God to make sure he was the man of His choice before he would speak out against sin and hypocrisy (Judges 6:36-40; Jer. 1:6; Ex. 3:11-12).

Lastly, he would be a broken man, well acquainted with grief and tears. He would have a broken heart over the sin in the world and the worldliness in the Church. Before Jesus made a scourge of cords to whip the moneychangers (when he turned over the merchandise tables in the temple), He first wept and prayed over the straying city of Jerusalem before He entered her gates (Luke 19:41-46).

The prophet, like his Master Jesus, would weep before he whipped, pray before he spoke out, and walk in dread of being in the wrong spirit. For unlike James and John, he would know what spirit he was of.

The Characteristics of an Apostle

from The Early Church
- by Gene Edwards

One of the biggest problems of our day, among a multitude of big problems, is the fact that no one is really qualified to be serving the Lord. The servants of God in this age universally lack experience in really deep encounter with the living Christ. They lack complete abandonment to Him. Even beyond these deficiencies and dozens more, the Christians of this age haven't the vaguest idea of what God's central burden is! They do not have a vision of the centrality of His church. The preparation modern ministers receive before entering the ministry is almost 100 percent ineffective, if not useless, in light of God's purpose.

I have chosen to list here the characteristics of a true Apostle. The portrait is based on the lives of Apostles of the first century, but you can also expect, if God is merciful enough to restore this office, to see men who bear these same marks in their lives today.

When you have finished reading this list you will have, not only a good idea of what to expect in an apostle's life, but also a idea why this breed of man vanished from the pages of history so long ago.

The standard set by those first Apostles is, at the very least, ruggedly high.

Please be clear, this is not a list of "qualifications for you to meet to become an Apostle." You could acquire all these attributes and still not be an Apostle. But it would be very hard indeed to find an Apostle who did not exhibit all of these characteristics.

If this list serves no other purpose, dear reader, perhaps it will serve to humble your heart and to stir up a seeking spirit within you.

1. An Apostle will not be young.

He will be in his late thirties or early forties before commissionship to Apostleship is even given to him! Most of his adult life until then will have been spent in preparation.

Young men ought not to serve the Lord in this capacity. Young men ought to sit, watch, experience Christ, and enjoy the church.

2. He will have spent years in the church, having fully experienced church life.

He will have been a simple brother in the church, living a normal life; he will have had a good long period of being a nobody; he will have lived under authority in the church and learned submission ... just like everyone else.

3. He will not fit anybody's preconceived image of what an Apostle should look like.

Apostles have a disconcerting way of not looking like Apostles.

4. He will be a man totally outside of the religious system.

This is imperative.

There could be no Apostleship inside that system. The two are mutually exclusive.

Why? The reasons are endless. But here is one.

Apostleship takes nothing if it does not take courage. If a man has not found the courage to step utterly, totally and completely outside the religious system, to leave it and its ways, then he hasn't even taken step one toward a deep knowledge and experience of Christ and the church. Along with this:

5. He will not lead some organization.

He will not be the head of some organization.

He will be utterly outside of that kind of thing. No, he will not sit behind a glass-top desk, nor head any movement.

6. He will be beyond reproach in language and conduct.

7. He will have an almost inexhaustible ability to suffer and to bear the cross.

8. He will be hated.

He will hate no one. He will be widely criticized. He will criticize no one.

And he will live constantly in the skillet of this treatment. Having been abused and betrayed throughout his whole life, he will come to the end of his life still without bitterness, criticism or hurt, filled with compassion, patience, understanding and even optimism!

9. He will know the Scripture as few men in all church history have ever known it. He will be master of that Book.

At the same time, he will not "teach the Scripture" nor tell people things like "You've got to know the Bible to be a victorious Christian." It is not the scripture which will characterize his ministry. You will sense that though he uses the Scripture, it is in no way the cutting-edge of his message. Oh, you may learn the Scripture from him, like you never dreamed it could be known, but he won't be teaching you the Scripture; if you learn the Scripture; if you learn the Scripture under him it will be a byproduct, a secondary result of the fact he is showing you Christ! Christ alone will hold pre-eminence in all he says and all that he calls men to.

10. He will know Christ.

He will know Christ well, and he will know Him supremely.

11. He will minister Christ.

When he speaks, he will minister not doctrine, not creeds, not chains of interwoven verses to prove some teaching. He will speak Christ. He will tell men, show men how to know Jesus Christ. Christ will be his sole occupation, his only topic.

12. He will pray.

13. He will raise up churches.

He won't be coming up with visions of church substitutes. No. The church will be his only obsession. He will live only to raise up the church (locatable, visible, attainable, observable; not that ectoplasmic, ethereal, universal, out in the wild blue yonder goo) and to strengthen the church. He will suffer for, live for, and probably die for her and for her alone!

14. He will not hinder another man's work.

He will in no way interfere in the life of a church raised up by other men in another city. He will not engage in conflict with other servants of God. He will leave alone the works of all other men, and he will, for the most part, steer clear of churches not raised up by his hand.

15. He will not hinder another man's work.

Apostle's pioneer.

16. He will eventually release every church he raises up.

He will not hold the church in his hand nor use it for himself. He will eventually set it utterly free, free to Christ. How? He will leave. The people will be left utterly on their own.

17. He will not turn the churches he raises into some kind of a closely knit movement.

He will not father, or oversee, a movement.

18. He will be humble, hidden, gentle, and submissive to others.

He will not rule or dictate. He will not call for men to submit to him.

19. He will have been sent by the Holy Spirit.

20. Lastly, there will be but one proof of his Apostleship. He will raise up churches, and those churches will remain and they will flourish.

The church will stand ... free of rules, regulations, organizations, or structure. There will be no specially trained men left behind who have to make sure she survives.

The church will survive, but only because she is the living Bride of Christ.

And the hallmark of those churches will be their love for one another! Such will be the general tenor of the life of an Apostle, for this is the way it was when such a species walked the earth before.

May God hasten the day when the world has to contend once more with such men. Not far behind that day will be another day, the day of the restoration of true church life on this earth.

Servant To All

by Ron Boehme
3/89

God is doing a wonderful work in the world today, and much of it centers around increased Christian compassion and servanthood in the nations of the world. Despite the dark storm clouds of sin and judgment that are also present, this emphasis on servant leadership is raising to the forefront because:

- * There is a worldwide awakening taking place in the Church,
- * The cause of world evangelization has risen to new urgency,
- * and societal reformation is needed in many places to fulfill the Great Commission.

To make disciples of all nations is to teach the followers of Christ to live out their faith in all areas of life - and this could lead to the changing of whole nations. This can only take place when we live out a biblical Christian worldview that brings redemption into every area of man's life. Because there are only two kingdoms in this fallen world, there are two types of leadership: The servant leadership of Christ through love and influence, or satanically-inspired domination through fear and control. God has called us to serve in both the spirit and methods of Jesus. He is our perfect example, and the source of all power and strength.

The greatest need in the world today is for the Church to follow the example of her Lord and Master and serve the nations of the world better than anyone else. The ultimate key to leadership is the full manifestation of servanthood. The words of the Lord Jesus could not be simpler: "But the greatest among you shall be your servant" (Matthew 23:11 NASB) .

True greatness comes through serving others. There is no greater key - those who serve best are those who are worthy to lead. Notice once again the words of the world's greatest leader: "In this world the kings and great men order their slaves around have no choice but to like it. But among you, the one who serves you best will be your leader. Out in the world the Master sits at the table and is served by his servants. But not here, for I am your servant" (Luke 22:25-27 TLB).

The great challenge of the Church at the end of the 20th century is whether she will rise to her appointed position in human affairs by assuming the place of the world's greatest servant. As Jesus so clearly stated, whoever serves people best will be given leadership and authority. This is an inescapable principle in the world God created. If atheists, or humanists, or Marxists, or humanitarians, or Moslems, or Hindus, or any other group serve their nations better than the body of Christ, then they deserve to lead in those nations.

If there should be a race for supremacy in the world today, it would be in the area of serving, not armaments. If Christians learn to serve their cultures and peoples as Jesus would have them do, the world will see the greatest revolution ever. Leadership will be established through either servanthood or through slavery. The Apostle Paul said: "For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a servant to all [emphasis mine] that I might win the more" (I Corinthians 9:19).

A Servant Leader

The word serve or servant is found some 1,452 times in the Bible. It is one of the largest topics of Scripture. (Remember, whatever God wants to emphasize, He says many times in Scripture.) Let's look at eight different characteristics of servant leadership in Scripture.

1. Humility: a servant leader must be humble. Only a humble person has been set free from the tyranny of ego and pride to see the needs of others. The more humble you are, the more significant other people become.

Christ produces humility in us when He saves us from ourselves. When we admit our selfishness, and turn to Him to be forgiven and changed, He empowers us to humbly reach out to others. We have been set free to humbly serve. Pride is a slave to ego; humility is a servant to Christ and to others. Pride leads to difficulties; humility produces freedom, and brings true leadership. Jesus said, "Whoever exalts himself will be abased, and he who humbles himself will be exalted" (Matthew 23:12).

Christian leader Bob Mumford says we would never trust a man or a woman who doesn't limp. This refers to Jacob, who wrestled with an angel and came out limping, a broken and humble man (Genesis 32:24-31). You can see true humility in the broken and contrite spirit of a man or woman who has wrestled through selfishness and come out the other side. You can trust broken people the same way you can ride horses that have been broken.

Myron Augsburger, a Mennonite leader adds, "Servant leadership often means leading from our weaknesses, not using our strengths to hide behind lest our inadequacies be seen. Actually, our faith to move with our inadequacies makes possible the Spirit's dominant role."¹ The humble person will have authority to lead.

2. Under Authority: a servant leader must be a man under authority. The New Testament has a word, huperetes, that stresses the role of the servant in relation to his superior. A true servant is not an independent soul - he has a clear line of authority under which he serves. To be a true servant one has to recognize masters, and operate in submission, counsel, and under control. You cannot be a Christian Lone Ranger and profess to be a servant. If you do not place yourself under the authority of others, you really are not under the authority of Christ.

If you have not learned to be a good follower, you are not qualified to be a good leader. Leaders who are not good followers almost always become tyrants. Rebellion and independence is within them, and this combined with egotism can be deadly. The true servant leader willfully places himself under the care and authority of others. This is easy because he is a broken man who knows the depravity of his own heart all too well. He gladly submits to others because he needs them to walk the pathway Christ has laid out for him. He appreciates authority for the protection it provides. The more humble he is, the more authorities he will recognize in many areas of life. His submission is a mark of his servanthood, and it automatically gives him the authority that others will want to follow.

3. Accountability: a servant leader is accountable. This is similar to being under authority, but the emphasis here is on what the servant accomplishes for the one he serves. A common word for this in the New Testament is the Greek word doulos. A doulos is a bond-servant who is aware of the stewardship entrusted to him by his master. The servant acts as a good steward with the overriding sense that he is accountable for his actions.

Jesus so graphically spoke of this in the Parable of the Talents. In that story, all of the servants did something with the money they were given. But only two of the three multiplied their stewardship with a keen sense of their master's expectations. This is the essence of true accountability. They did not settle for good or better - they set their sights on the best. They were rewarded for their servanthood, and the servant who settled for less had everything taken away.

If Christians are to serve the peoples of the world, we must know God's expectations and act accordingly. We must believe that we are accountable (not just encouraged) to make disciples of all nations and teach them all that Jesus commanded. We must accept as a stewardship the commandment of world evangelization. We must become accountable to being the best servants in the world, as well as the best stewards of our time, our money, our resources, and our people. We have a reason to do so - we must give account of ourselves to God.

4. Zeal and Diligence: a servant leader must be zealous in his work. A servant works hard and does his work well. In the Scriptures, there is a Greek word that describes this - diakomos. The stress of the word is the goodness of a servant's work. There is no such thing as leadership without hard-earned labor. It is the hand of the diligent that rules.

This is so basic. Most leadership is not glamorous. It's not a special privilege, nor a life of ease. It is just plain hard work, and those willing to pay the price gain authority by simply out-serving others. When you study the lives of great leaders in history, both inside the Church and in the world as a whole, you always find this quality of diligence in labor. Great servant leaders know what they want to do, what the needs of their people are, and then work to the bone to accomplish the task. They are exalted to leadership because they work harder for their cause than anybody else. A good servant leader combines a good cause with righteous methods and plain old hard work.

Most Marxist revolutions have been won through this quality of leadership, even if the righteous goal and godly means were missing. Vladimir Lenin brought the Bolsheviks to power in Russia in 1917 through tireless effort. He made himself a majority by working harder than the rest, and today much of the world is filled with atheistic communism because of this example.

We must be willing to work harder and more zealously than anyone else on the horizon. A servant leader gains influence by righteously winning the battle of labor. This is cultural conquest through hard work. There is no other formula for victory.

5. Character: servant leadership is steadiness and faithfulness of character. A true servant is quiet and dependable. They know that they have a job to do, and the master can always count on the job being done. A leader does not have to be flashy or have a dominant personality - but he does need to be steady and totally trustworthy. When an employer finds a faithful worker, he tries to hang on to him with all his might. What usually happens is that the faithfulness of the employee is rewarded by increasing leadership and responsibility.

In a world that knows increasingly little about faithfulness and commitment, the Body of Christ has a golden opportunity to aspire to leadership in literally every dimension of life. One way in which Christians can give vastly needed servant leadership is to cultivate an outlook for steady, long-term growth and development. Most people today have lost the sense of working toward the future. With foresight and faithfulness of servanthood, the Church can give the world a beacon of hope. The present tumultuous time in history will cause people to look for leadership that is steady and firm. That leadership should be found in the Church of Jesus Christ.

6. Team Spirit: servant leaders love to work as part of a team. This flows out of their humility which values the gifts of other people. More and more the world is realizing that the best leadership is shared leadership. An awakened Church can offer the beauty of teamwork that comes from knowing God. M. Scott Peck, in his thought-provoking book The Different Drum, challenges world leaders to look to this important truth: "The strength for real servant leadership can be found only when people work together in love and commitment. It can only exist in a climate in which leaders are emotionally sustained in community. It cannot exist in a climate of competitive isolation in which idealism and humaneness are crushed. Only through community will our officials be strong enough to truly be our leaders, truly to be peacemakers."²

True servant leadership has always been associated with teamwork. The best example of this is the cooperation of the Godhead Who operate in different functions as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, yet govern the Universe as One in the perfection of unity. This perfect model has been given to the Church and has resulted in the concept of plurality of leadership and teamwork in the Church.

The day of the super pastor, as well as the day of the super executive, are coming to an end. Only in the strength of shared servant leadership can we cope with the immensities and complexities of life upon our planet. Here again, the Church has an amazing opportunity. But first it needs to follow the Head - then as a united team of servants, lead the world into greater fruitfulness and productivity.

7. A High View of Each Individual: servant leadership is committed to developing the potential of others. A righteous leader is a true spiritual gold miner: He sees the gifts latent in the lives of others and wisely uses all means to extract and develop that gold. He knows success is not achieved through dominance, but through releasing the rich human deposits found in every man and woman made in the image of God. A high view of man is essential for good and lasting leadership. Christians should make the best leaders in the world because they respect the talents of others, given by the hand of their Creator.

In this area, the Christian worldview towers over all others battling for supremacy on earth. Marxism and Islam share a low view of man and selectively suppress individual talent. Generally, they both crush initiative, creativity, and abilities. Talented people only want to escape their oppression, while the majority simply give up. Biblical Christianity is not threatened by the gifts and abilities of people: rather, it is pleased to help propel them into their destinies.

A true servant leader will use power to release and elevate others. Dennis Peacocke wisely explains: "Power, or leadership, can go one of two ways. You can use it to make people or things do what you want them to do, or you can use it to draw God's purposes out of people or situations ... God views power as the ability to draw out of people and situations the purposes for which they were created. Servant leadership is just that; it serves by drawing out potential, helping turn it into achievement."3

8. Not Self-seeking: a servant leader does not care about position or status. This is contrary to his very nature. He exists to serve, and is motivated to do so out of the joy serving brings and the pleasure that comes to the heart of God. His is not the leadership of force or power. He has the leadership of loving influence and sacrifice. This humble quality is what gives him his true authority: He can be trusted to lead because he doesn't care about power.

Servants are not concerned about rank, privileges, titles, and benefits. A servant wants to give his life meeting the needs of others. If he can do that through a position of responsibility, that is fine. But if his position is taken away and given to someone else, that doesn't matter either. Nothing has changed in his heart. Titles and positions may be means to the end, but the goal of the servant leader is plainly and simply to serve.

Servants to All

Every Christian must follow Jesus Christ by becoming a servant to all. Now is the moment in history to accept the challenge of changing nations through Christian servanthood. This is an offensive posture, not one of retreat. The strategy is nothing but the power of service.

The world is crying out for leaders to guide them. But no answers will work except those of the King of kings and Lord of lords. His is the pathway of obedience and servanthood. At this crucial juncture in human civilization, with a new century looming in front of us, this question paraphrased from Esther 4:14 asks the Church: "Have we not come into the kingdom for such a time as this?"

We must set our hearts on serving people and nations in the spirit and true servanthood of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we emphasize authority, we will end up in tyranny. If we properly emphasize serving God and serving people, we will give good leadership.

Will we try to lead by worldly means, or will we pay the price of serving people better than anyone else? There are short-cuts to power through manipulation and control. But the manner in which we gain power will also determine how we use that power - will it be by force and coercion, or by loving influence and servanthood?

The cultural mandate of developing the earth is still the goal of God through His Church. Pat Robertson is right when he says: "It is clear that God is saying, 'I gave man dominion over the earth, but he lost it. Now I desire mature sons and daughters who will in My name exercise dominion over the earth and will subdue Satan, the unruly, and the rebellious. Take back My world from those who would loot it and abuse it. Rule as I would rule.'"4

Leadership will be exercised in the world for the remaining days that God allots to man upon this fragile planet. Someone is going to give direction to the nations as we head into the 21st century. It could be the various forces of evil plunging entire peoples and nations into gross darkness and human despair.

But let our prayer and action be this: that the Church may arise to her destiny, and give light and blessing to the peoples of the earth through serving them better than anyone else.

The Deeper Significance of Pentecost

By Frank Bartleman

THE WORLD IS THE FIELD, the true Church is the treasure - like a kernel in the shell. But the great nominal Church, the ecclesiastical body in each generation, is also like a field in which the true mystical Church - the living Church - like a treasure, is hidden.

But even this true, mystical Church is far from being the treasure of Divine life and power originally planned and provided for in the purpose of God. Ever since the early Church fell from New Testament purity and life, she has been like a backslider, fallen from the summit of apostolic days - though destined to return and yet enter into the full blessing of the Father's house.

I refer to the true, mystical Body of Christ. It is a "prodigal son," wandered from the Father's house, but since the Reformation gradually returning. Nearly five centuries have now passed since the Reformation. The route back has been devious and long, with many a dark valley, as well as many a glorious summit. But steadily, relentlessly, the mighty Spirit of God has been moving on, restoring that which was lost and heading things up toward that great prophetic revelation of the Body of Christ in unity and fullness - even one Body, fully matured "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ!"

Beloved, unless we understand this, we will not be able to move on with God and understand the different stages, experiences, and various standards and operations in the Church's history. That is why most Christians have failed to move on with God and to accept His cumulative unfoldings in the restoration of revelation, light and experience, once lost, but now being restored to the true Church.

If you do not fully see this, or if it seems to differ from your present conception of things, do bear with me. Before I am finished, I believe you will understand, and, if so, it may well transform your life, giving new and vital direction to your prayers and ministry.

THE HEART OF OUR TROUBLE

The human soul is ever lazy toward God, and no one generation has seemed to be able to travel very far on its way back to God and His standard from which the early Church fell. It is true that human error or conceit continually satisfies itself with a part instead of the whole, but the real fact is that men are not willing to pay the full price to come back fully to God's standard, to be all, the Lord's.

The early Church came forth from the "upper room" fresh in her "first love," baptized with the Holy Spirit, filled with God, possessing both the graces and gifts of the Spirit, and with a one hundred percent consecration for God. This was the secret of her power. She was all for God, and God was all for her. This principle will apply in all ages, both individually and collectively. No sacrifice on the altar means no fire. The fire of God never falls on an empty altar. The greater the sacrifice, the more the fire.

When the prodigal gets home, and the Church becomes one hundred per cent for God again, we will have the same power, the same life - and the same persecution from the world. The reason we have so little persecution now is that the Spirit cannot press the claims of God home on the world through us. When that happens, men must either surrender or fight.

"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today, and forever!" God never changes. We have changed. We are not waiting for God. God is waiting for us. The Holy Spirit is given, we are still heirs to the promise fulfilled on the day of Pentecost. But God can only work when we are willing, yielded, and obedient. We tie God's hands.

The history of the Church has been the same. Each company that has come forth in the line of restoration has run the same course. That is, human, fallen nature. It is human failure, not God's. When everything dries up and dies out, we call upon God. This alone makes it possible for God to come. He must have some place to put His Spirit, and only empty vessels can be filled.

When we are filled with our own ways, think ourselves rich and increased in good spiritually, God can give us nothing. To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet. The crumbs tasted good to the Syrophenician woman, but well-fed children despise even dainties. They will throw the food across the table at one another. Like the children of Israel, they despise even "angels' food."

The best preacher in the land cannot preach with liberty when his message is not desired or received. The oil ceases to flow as soon as there are no more empty vessels to be filled. This will often explain why good preachers sometimes have liberty and at other times have no anointing. Criticism will stop the flow of oil through any preacher. Oil will not flow when frozen.

HOW IT ALL BEGAN

The early Church ran well for a season. Everything went down before it. But by the third or fourth century, they had compromised to escape the cross. They sold out to the devil, backslid, and went down into the "Dark Ages." They lost the Holy Spirit anointing, the gifts, the life, the power, the joy, everything. The Church became a prodigal, left the Father's house, and went to feeding swine.

The devil found he could not stamp out the early Church by killing them. For every one he killed, two sprang up. Like the children of Israel, "the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew." The early Christians vied with one another for a martyr's crown. They exposed themselves purposely, recklessly, for this reward. Someone has said the greatest call that ever came to man is the call to suffer in a noble cause.

Without question, it was God's desire to restore the backslidden, prodigal Church at once, when she fell, just as He must have desired at once to restore the human race in the beginning when they fell. But He could not. Human, fallen nature was too weak.

God also wanted to take the children of Israel right into Canaan from Kadesh-Barnea when he brought them out of Egypt. It was only a short journey, but they frustrated His purpose and desire. "They grieved God and limited the Holy One of Israel" just as it has ever been. In consequence, they stopped going forward, went to "milling around," and "their carcasses fell in the wilderness."

Beloved, whenever we stop going forward, we go to "milling around." When an individual stops going forward for God, he begins to go in a circle. Just as a man when lost in a forest ceases to go straight forward but wanders in a circle.

So it was with the early Church. When they ceased to go forward, they started wandering in a circle and became lost in the Dark Ages. The devil had found he could not destroy them or stop their march by persecuting and killing them, so he removed the cross, offering them titles, positions, honor, salaries, profits of every kind - and they fell for it.

They no longer needed to look to God for their protection and support. They were "like the nations round about them," just as the children of Israel when they rejected God as their King. And it is so with our great church bodies of today. History repeats itself in every movement through human weakness and failure.

THE REFORMATION AND SUBSEQUENT HISTORY

Out of the Dark Ages came the great politico-religious ecclesiastical, Roman hierarchy, which in time dominated the whole world, both political and religious. And the same condition has developed out of every fallen movement. An illegitimate, hybrid monster has come forth.

This was the condition of the formal church in Martin Luther's time. However, the living seed of the true Church had remained buried in the mass, even through those long, dark centuries. This seed now began to spring up and germinate - the Church within the Church. The prodigal backslider began to come to himself at last and desire to return home. The Church had fed on swine long enough!

Through the labors of such men as Huss, Wycliffe, Luther, Foxe, Wesley, Darby, Muller, Moody, Evan Roberts, Wigglesworth, and a host of others, the prodigal Church has been coming home. But each company which God has been able to bring forth and give a fresh deposit of the Spirit and of the truth once lost, has sooner or later stopped short of the full goal. Although often gaining much ground and experiencing tremendous blessing, each group has ceased to go forward as a body and completely return to the early New Testament standard and realization.

Again and again the Church climbed from the depths of some sectarian stranglehold, with its various stages of formalism and spiritual darkness, only to fall again, within perhaps only a generation, into sometimes an even worse state. Fortunately, each time, some new light and understanding of truth and God's ways was given upon which the next revival company could build. But in it all, it is the failure of man, not God's failure. Each company has only gone so far. It was certainly God's desire to fully restore the early Church to her first love at once, as it is true with every backslider. To think otherwise is to charge God with sin. But the Church would not.

A backslider does not get back to God in a moment. He generally has more or less of a battle to get back, according to the light and experience that he has sinned against. The early Church had great light and experience. If it were too easy to be fully restored, it would be too easy to backslide.

There is a natural law which is similar to this. Faith has been broken down. It is like a tubercular case, where the tissues of the lungs have been destroyed. It is a hard fight back, even under favorable circumstances of rest and climate. To return to the "lowlands" generally means a return of the disease. So it is with the restored backslider. He must keep away from temptation ground and aggressively walk in obedience.

Today we can look back and see the different companies that, in the line of restoration, God has brought out in the Church since the Middle Ages. We can see where they ceased to go forward with God, where they began to mill around in a circle, and where their carcasses fell in the wilderness as a body - Anglicans, Lutherans, Congregationalists, Methodists, Salvation Army, and so forth. They ceased to be a forward company.

Whenever we cease to go forward and keep on the offensive for God, we stop and die as a people. In fact, a movement is no longer a movement when it stops moving - be it the Holiness movement, the Pentecostal movement, or any other movement. It may continue to increase both in number and in wealth, but that is not necessarily a sign of life and power with God. All anti-Christian movements can show that kind of growth. No movement has ever recovered itself as a body, when it has once gone on the skids.

GOD'S MOVEMENT

We do not have to leave movements. We simply move on with God! As long as a movement moves, we move with it. The different movements in the history of the church, although part of His true restoration, are only incidental with God. God has one great movement we should all belong to, and that has never ceased moving. It is God's move through the ages to redeem a fallen, lost world and carry that great blood-washed assembly on to His eternal purpose. It began when the Lamb was slain before the foundation of the world and will end when the last saint gets safely home to glory.

We must work for the Kingdom of God as a whole, not for some pet individual party, organization, or movement. That has been the curse and cause of hindrance to our going on with God to full restoration in all generations. We have worshipped certain doctrines, party standards, partial experiences, and blessings, all fine as far as they go, but abnormal in themselves and only a part of the whole.

Most of these have been unbalanced, exaggerated misstatements of truth at best. In the end, they have generally brought bondage in place of blessing. They have broken fellowship, divided the children of God, and put the Church in bondage to men and their ideas, standards, understandings, and opinions.

We must keep moving! The clearest light on truth and experience has not yet come. We still wait for the full restoration of the "pattern shown in the mount," that of the early New Testament Apostolic Church as a whole.

The great mistake has been to stop with sectarian, partial, abnormal revelations. We must keep our eyes on God, not on a party. Keep free from party spirit. That is respect of persons. Seek only God and His plan as a whole, His Church as a whole.

Every company, in time, repeats the experience of the early Church. The compromise to escape the cross and accept positions, salaries, titles, and ecclesiastical power. An ecclesiastical hierarchy arises just as it did in the early Church during the second and third centuries.

The backslidden Church is still in an abnormal condition. It will continue to be so until it becomes fully restored to the first standard of apostolic Christianity from which it fell. No experience or revelation in the line of gradual restoration has been perfect in itself. All is abnormal, both in understanding and experience, until the perfect whole is realized and restored.

We need a readjustment of all our doctrines to the full, clear light of God in the Word. All past experiences must be examined and redefined in the light of the perfect whole.

Someone has said that every reformation is at its best and highest tide when it first comes forth. This would seem to be so, but at the same time the true Church is ever moving on to maturity. I speak of the Church within the Church, the kernel in the shell, not the surrounding movement. Just as the individual believer who goes on with God gradually matures, so the Church within the Church is maturing toward the end of the age when she will be a full-grown Church. The goal is not just the standard lost by the early Church but that toward which they themselves were pressing - "a fully matured man," even "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Ephesians 4:13).

APOSTASY AND RECOVERY

As with Israel in the Exodus, the "mixed multitude," the exterior shell of every movement with which it loads itself and in which it later becomes buried, falls to lusting for "flesh." One can usually judge the progress of this process by the things the movement comes to demand. Instead of delight in the pure Word, prayer and worship, a love for souls and zeal for good works, there comes entertainment, programs, musicals, sensationalism, and oratory. These things have no place in essential, true Christianity, but are professionalism - flesh! Oh, God, deliver us from fleshly substitutes for the Spirit.

Most meetings can only be kept alive now by continuous entertainment, professional evangelism, and a strong social spirit. And this is all too true in Pentecostal, Holiness, and interdenominational circles, as well as in the older denominations. Where is the life itself to draw the people and bring God to them as in the beginning! This is not New Testament. It is abnormal, grieving and limiting the Holy One of Israel in our midst.

The fight gets harder as we get higher up in our restoration from the early Church's fall. When Adam fell, the Satanic powers intervened between the fallen race and God. God removed the set of His presence with man from earth to heaven. So when the early Church fell, she again lost the image of God which had, in a sense, been restored in New Testament days when the body of believers became the Temple of the Holy Spirit. In a higher sense than Adam had known, the "spiritual wickedness in high places" intervened between the Church and God again. Now, the prodigal Church, coming up out of the Dark Ages, has had to fight her way back through these evil powers. Each movement, as we go higher toward full restoration, has to meet a higher order of these wicked spiritual powers and intelligences and hence must fight harder.

Each step forward requires of necessity a deeper preparation and greater spiritual equipment for a greater measure of restoration. It was never God's decree that the experience of the Church should be so long and drawn out in recovering the normal standard and going on to fullness. But we have ever sought to call our present abnormal understanding and experience normal. We must see that all has been abnormal since the early Church's fall.

Experiences, understanding - everything has been partial, unbalanced, and abnormal. Nothing has been perfectly understood, and all the different truths and experiences have only been parts of the whole.

We have not understood these truths and experiences, just as no machine is properly and clearly understood in detail except as we understand the whole. We have been recovering the whole, in parts, without seeing the whole - thus we so often distort and overemphasize the truth or experience which our particular movement has recovered. I trust you grasp this, for it is very important.

The New Testament church in the Book of Acts entered normally into the fullness of the Spirit immediately at its inception, as for instance at Cornelius' household in the tenth chapter of Acts. The different phases of our salvation were all viewed as just so many parts of one glorious, normal whole. But all the various movements in the restoration, since the early reformers, have ceased in their turn to go forward to full realization. They have established their party standard of a partial, abnormal revelation, putting a part for the whole. Then, in human conceit, they have each contended they had it all.

This is sectarianism, and it is like a lot of dams holding back God's people from flowing on toward the vast ocean of God's fullness. God cares little for these partial standards of men - their names, sects or parties, slogans or standards. All is only partial distorted light which finally becomes the enemy of the real truth as the Lord marches on to glory.

Each oncoming wave of the sea toward high tide must fight its way through the last receding one. So it is with different movements toward a final restoration of the Church. The immediately receding one especially hates and opposes the next oncoming one. What fools the devil has made of us! Oh, that we might see it! However real and good, as far as they have gone, these past revivals and movements are each but faltering, uncertain steps toward the final goal.

LET'S GO ON!

God has but one Church, whether in heaven, or here on earth. And there is yet very much land to be possessed before we realize the Divine purpose to which we are destined. We must recognize the whole body of Christ. In our human conceits, we fail to recognize God when we meet Him. Those who dare to go further with God toward the full restoration are denounced and opposed by others as if they were of the devil. And this was not just true of Luther and the Catholic Church - it was also true of Wesley and the Anglican Church, of Booth and the Methodist Church, etc. And it is still true today. But, beloved, we must face it - the backslider has not yet been fully restored, the prodigal has not yet reached home. We must keep moving on!

Elijah's rain came out of a clear sky, without even the sign of a cloud to begin with - the result of faith alone. So the Pentecostal outpouring came in 1906. And this has been the case with every revival. Revival is the property of faith, not sight. There is nothing for sight to see in fallen nature but hopelessness. Revival and restoration must come from God, out of a clear sky. We are earthly and fleshly, but God is spirit. God's Word is "spirit and life," and faith in that Word brings the living God on the scene regardless of circumstances or outward prospects.

Will God visit His people again? Why not? As surely as He has done it in the past, He will do it again. God's skies are full of Pentecosts. He only waits for us to claim them. Do we not need one? Then we can have it, when we are willing to pay the price of obedient faith.

The Church is not fully restored. No past group, after it has waned, has had the faith and vision to move God to visit them again. If they had, they would not be strewn along the way as more or less dead movements, their bones bleaching in the wilderness. None of them had future faith. They stopped short of the goal. None of them went clear through. "They limited the Holy One of Israel," just as we do today. They would not pay the price. That was the trouble.

But worse than this, they justified themselves in their abnormal standards and opposed and condemned others who would go further ... and still they do so.

The sin of the Jewish high church in Jesus' time was the same. They refused to go further themselves and set themselves in their backslidden condition to oppose all who wished to go forward. That spelled their doom, and it will bring down the judgments of God on any denomination, movement, or group who follow in their steps.

But Gideon's band is forming again today. Faith is rising. Another visitation from God is coming. It is only the Gideon's band that can ever bring or receive it - only a praying, consecrated, pilgrim band. They of the "mixed multitude" will not be in it, for they are too many and too fleshly. "Upon the flesh of man," the Lord said of the precious anointing oil in the tabernacle, "It shall not be poured." God usually has to work with the little things, the weak things - the small, consecrated groups.

"I will pour water on him that is thirsty and floods upon the dry ground." Dryness is a condition that invites rain. At such times men cry for rain. It is a cause for encouragement when we thirst for God. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst, for they shall be filled. It was after an awful drought that Elijah's rain came. The rain is ready, beloved - when we want it, and when we are in a condition to receive it.

We must have the spirit of Caleb and Joshua, a different spirit from the multitude. They "followed the Lord wholly," therefore, they entered Canaan with the next company to go forward. They had their portion in it, while the old crowd died in the wilderness. No movements, as a movement has ever gone all the way through to full restoration for the reasons we have explained. Hence, we must never become the property of or limit ourselves to, a party or a movement. Worship only God. Join God in His great movement. Keep moving!

FINAL RESTORATION

We are rounding the corner toward complete recovery. God is again pressing His full claims upon His Church and upon the world. But the devil is also pressing his claims with great vigor. Whom will we serve? It is either one hundred per cent for God or for the devil - there is no neutral ground. We are nearing the awesome climax of this deadly war between the Kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan. Each must be at his best for his side.

A normal Church is always one hundred per cent for God. There can be no flirting with the enemy. The Church has no other business than to carry the Gospel to the world and press the claims of God upon His own. All its energies and resources should be used with that one object in view. "Then shall the end come." God waits for this.

Nothing but the zeal and the one hundred per cent consecration of the early Church, both in laboring for the salvation of the nations and in building up the one true world-wide Church, will or can satisfy God. He will accept no substitution or compromise with our ideas and fleshly plans. There simply must be an utter abandonment to His full will and His great eternal purpose in His own children! Nothing short of this can clear our conscience and responsibility in the day of judgment. We could have done this long ago - if we had willed to do so - but we have not. Oh, let us not delay longer, but at once go right up and storm the enemy's citadels, vowing never to withdraw our sword until Jesus comes and the while land is ours!

We are rapidly approaching the last days. I am convinced that God is going to put the Church through the fire to destroy the dross. Judgment begins at the house of God. And, believe me, nothing but one hundred per cent reality will remain! A theoretical salvation will not do.

We are reaching the culmination of this age, and nothing but a practical application of the Gospel can hope to survive. God is going to have a Church without spot or wrinkle. But do you and I want to have a part of it? A sectarian competitive, selfish, self-seeking Church cannot survive. The Church must return to the spirit of the early Church in the Book of Acts. She must yield to God and press into His "present truth" for this last hour.

... Let us go on!

Early Church

By Gene Edwards

His name is Nathaniel, but everyone calls him Nat. He has just finished high school and is planning to enter college in the Fall.

Right after graduation, to his own surprise, Nat was converted to Christ. It was a new experience for him; in fact, it was a whole new world. Nat had not been raised in a religious home and had never been around Christians. He had no idea what a Christian was supposed to do, but he had a vague notion he should "go to church." So the very first Sunday after his conversion, Nat decided to give it a try. He got up early, earlier than he evr had on Sunday, walked over to his closet and began looking for his best tie and suit.

In that simple and innocent act, Nat joined something called the Christian religion. Unknowingly he had taken his first step into a 1,700-year-old tradition and had set his course, not toward knowing Jesus Christ, but toward tradition. Nat had unwittingly set his course 180 degrees in the opposite direction from the life and experience which was known by the first century believer.

By now you may have asked yourself, "If the early church was totally different from today's church, where did all these present day practices come from?"

To find the answer to this question, we will have to follow a day in the life of a twentieth century Christian. Let's watch Nat. He is about to be introduced to Christianity's ways. Keep score as we go along. List all the things he runs into that came from the first century church, and then list the things that are only traditions.

You may get a shock.

Let's begin with Nat's first act: putting on a coat and tie. This is the practice of getting dressed up to "go to church." First century? Did first century believers get dressed up to "go to church?" Of course not. In the first place, they knew that men can't go to church. In the second place, who needs to dress up to sit on the floor in someone's living room?

Then where did "getting dressed up to go to church" get started? In the Middle Ages! Mark one up for the customs of men.

Nat leaves home and in a few minutes arrives at "church." It is 9:45 a.m.; he is just in time for Sunday School.

"Don't tell me you are about to question Sunday School?!"

Yep!

The Sunday School movement was born in the late 1800's. Its clearest origin can be traced to D.L. Moody and the slums of Chicago, Illinois. The Sunday School building, sometimes called the Christian education plant, came even later. Attaching education buildings got started in this century.

Mark two for the traditions of men.

Sunday School is over. Now Nat leaves the Sunday School building and starts over to the church building.

Church buildings! Is there Scriptural basis for church buildings?

No!

The Church was born in 30 A.D., and for the next 300 years it always met in homes. In 324 A.D. that changed. In that year the Roman Emperor, Constantine, along with his mother, Empress Helena, invented the church building. Constantine and Helena had been born and raised as pagans. They were a part of the elite of the empire.

In keeping with their position and customs of the day, they had often erected pagan temples in honor of various gods. After Constantine was converted, he continued this custom, with only the slightest variation. Now he erected "Christian" temples. The "Christian" buildings looked exactly like the pagan ones, the only difference being that the new temples commemorated dead saints instead of pagan gods.

Let's take a moment and talk about Constantine.

It was during this period, the age of Constantine, that the church was made part of the world system. The church was literally ordered to become part of the Roman Empire's department of religion. This age saw politicians become ministers ... for one reason: their property was exempt from taxation if they were clergymen. (Even the term clergy was taken from pagan temple priests.)

This was the age when the early church slipped quietly off the pages of church history and something called "Christendom," patterned in structure and in practice after the Roman Empire, took the center of the stage. This was the age when the church building was invented or, to be more exact, was adopted from pagan temples.

Look at the score card.

The traditions of men: three. The Scripture: zero.

As Nat stepped out of the Sunday School building and started toward the beautiful sanctuary, he gazed upward to take in the sublimity of the building's stained glass windows. Stained glass windows were first used extensively in church buildings in the Basilica of St. Denis in France in the middle of the 12th century.

Four to nothing.

As Nat neared the building he also noticed the church steeple. That was invented shortly after the stained glass windows, also in France.

Five.

For the first time in his life, Nat enters a church building.

He walks down the aisle a few feet and slips into a pew. He can thank the Reformation of the 1500s for his seating accommodation.

Six-zero.

It is now 11:00 a.m. Nat gets very quiet. "Church" is about to begin.

Nat, of course, doesn't know this, but "church" starts at about 11:00 a.m. almost everywhere on earth. Why? Nat can probably thank Martin Luther for that. Luther didn't like getting up every Sunday at 4:30 a.m. for early morning mass and, consequently, Protestant meetings start much later in the morning.

Seven.

Oh! Now Nat sees the choir coming in ... singing. Where did church choirs come from? We are back to Constantine again. The choir came into the church during the mid 300's. It was taken straight out of the Roman pagan temple rituals which included choirs and choral chants.

(Of course after Christianity had adopted this pagan practice, somebody had to find a Scripture verse somewhere to justify it. If you can believe it, dozens of Scriptures were found! Of course they were all taken out of the Old Testament)

Eight-zero.

Nat now looks at the printed bulletin to see what the order of worship will be.

Now who invented this? (Peter maybe?)

Probably this universal ritual started in Wittenburg, Germany in the 1500's. It stuck like flypaper ever since and is about as exciting as the white pages of the telephone book.

Nine-zero.

Nat opens the hymn book.

Hymn books: probably about 400 years old.

Ten-zero.

After the songs, etc. there is a second's pause. Nat looks up at the pulpit.

The pulpit?

The pulpit was invented during the Reformation. Actually, Roman Catholic cathedrals contained small wooden buckets attached to one of the interior pillars. The Catholics used this box mostly for making announcements. During the Reformation, many of those cathedrals were taken from the Roman Catholics by the Protestants. The wooden bucket turned into the modern day pulpit. (And, believe it or not, the Protestants found a verse of Scripture to justify even the pulpit. In the Old Testament again, of course.)

(You can throw your score card away if you wish. It's obvious who is winning).

Nat watches as the pastor stands up and walks up to the pulpit.

Ah ha! The pastor! At last, something right out of the New Testament and the early church

Don't be too sure.

True, the word "pastor" does appear in the New Testament. One time! But never, anywhere, is that office clearly explained. It is not defined, and there is no illustration of it anywhere in first century literature. Certainly the Scripture contains nothing similar to this modern day thing called "our pastor."

Today "the pastor" is literally the cornerstone of Christianity. He holds Christianity together.

But is the present day position of pastor Scriptural?

Of course not! The present day concept of the pastor originated no further back than the Reformation. A pastor has less Scriptural foundation than the pulpit he leans on.

Martin Luther unwittingly invented the modern pastor. Soon after Luther broke with the Pope he turned his ex-Roman Catholic cathedral into a place to expound the Bible. Many priests and nuns left the Roman Catholic church after he did and literally came pouring into his town by the oxcart load.

These priests turned Lutherans wanted to remain in religious service. They, along with others who sat under Luther, picked up his way of doing things. Many of these men later left Wittenburg and began taking charge of other Roman Catholic cathedrals turned Lutheran cathedrals in other cities. They just naturally continued the practices they had learned from Luther.

So was born something that later acquired the handle of "pastor." It would be nice if someone told Nat this. It would be even nicer if someone would tell the "pastor!"

Let's get back to Nat.

The week after he was saved, Nat heard about several Christian conferences being held during the summer. He decided to go to one of them.

Nat will go to this conference asking for bread, and he will be given a synthetic vitamin pill. He will be given a formula for success and he will probably believe it and seek to build his whole Christian life on it. If it doesn't work, and it won't, Nat will blame himself, not the formula.

Outside the experience of the church there is no secret to the Christian life. There is no spiritual depth in the religious system. God will not share His deepest secrets with that system. He never has. He never will.

Nat, Jesus Christ alone is the secret of the Christian life. May the day come when you know the overwhelming depths of that simple statement.

And church life alone makes Him relevant. May the day come when you experience that fact.

Well, by the time the summer is half over, Nat is pretty well entangled in the paraphernalia of the religious system. He thinks he is entering into the Lord's answer to the Christian life. But the fact is, if Nat continues on his present course, one of two things will happen to him: he will not find enough strength in the "secrets" he has been given and he will go back to the world; or he will close his eyes to the desperate needs of his own soul, convince himself he is doing great, and level off on a very shallow spiritual plane. And if Nat is not careful, you will soon meet him at another conference, only this time he will be one of the speakers. It will be Nat who is standing up front telling other young people about the "deeper life!"

What else is out there waiting for Nat?

Summer is over. Nat will soon be going off to college. He plans to join the denominational church nearest him and to get into some fiery inter-denominational organization while on campus.

What is ultimately going to come of all this? What will happen to Nat?

Perhaps at another time we can pursue Nat's life as a Christian a little bit further ... and see all that lies ahead for him.

For now, let's hope he doesn't get any further into the religious system than he is now. Let's hope, by the merciful providence of God, that early in his Christian life he is awakened to an interest in God's eternal desires. And let us hope Nat some way gets into a genuine experience of Church life, soon, while in his late teens or early twenties, while he is still new in Christ.

There are some questions to be asked at this point. If the recovery of church life is a lifetime project, maybe two or three lifetimes, would it really be worth the venture? After all, a whole lifetime ... gambled on the unknown!

Besides, can God really restore church life? Can men ever hope to see again an experience similar to what was once known, but lost so long ago?

Dear reader, if you are desiring to know the Lord on a higher plane, these are good questions. They demand an answer. And there is an answer! It is a very ancient answer, one that every seeking heart burns to hear, longs to respond to. It is a word once spoken by a man named Philip to a fellow seeker. And what is that word?

"Nathaniel, Come and See!"

The Feast of Tabernacles

By Jay Rogers

2/92

"You shall observe the Feast of Tabernacles for seven days ... And you shall rejoice, you and your son and daughter ... because the Lord your God will bless you with increase in all the work of your hands, so that you shall be altogether joyful."

Deuteronomy 16:13,14,15

JERUSALEM (FR) - Why do Christians from all over the world come to Jerusalem to celebrate with the Jewish people during the Feast of Tabernacles? There are three Feasts in the Old Testament during which the Jewish people were commanded to come up to Jerusalem:

- * The Feast of Passover
- * The Feast of Weeks (or Pentecost)
- * The Feast of Tabernacles

These feasts were the most important events of the year in Old Testament times. Today, we are seeing a resurgence of interest in the feasts from Jews the world over, as they come to Jerusalem each year to celebrate. But these feasts have a deep spiritual meaning to the Christian as well. In each one of these feasts, Christians can see one of the ministries of Jesus Christ in the earth. The feasts are a type or a symbol of the ministry of Jesus on earth. Christ's ministry on earth while He was a man was a fulfillment of many Old Testament promises.

* On the feast of Passover, Jesus Christ gave Himself as the Passover Lamb. When He was crucified in Jerusalem, Jesus fulfilled the role of the sacrificial lamb, whose blood was shed to cover the sins of the Jewish people. In the New Testament, Jesus is called "the Lamb of God Who takes away the sins of the world."

* On the feast of Pentecost (or Weeks - Shavout), Jesus Christ gave the promised Holy Spirit to His disciples who were waiting in an upper room in Jerusalem. With the outpouring of the Holy Spirit came the blessing of the "firstfruits" - a grain offering given 50 days after Passover. Pentecost was a fulfillment of the "former rain" (the Holy Spirit) which brought the first fruits of the Holy Spirit.

* On the feast of Tabernacles, the third feast of the Jewish calendar, there is no definite New Testament fulfillment. Many Christians who celebrate in Jerusalem each year at the Feast of Tabernacles are looking for the fulfillment of the "latter rain" which will bring the harvest - a great end time gathering of souls into the Father's barn.

The latter rain was promised too, in the New Testament: "Be patient, therefore, brethren, until the coming of the Lord. Behold, the farmer waits for the precious produce of the soil, being patient about it, until it gets the former and the latter rains. You too be patient; strengthen your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is at hand."

We must be careful about making any wild speculations about the coming of the Lord based on the coming fulfillment of the Feast of Tabernacles. However, it is evident from the Scriptures that Jerusalem is to be the focal point of the fulfillment of the "latter rain." What will the Lord give on the Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem?

The Golden Age

By Mike Wade

THE OLD TESTAMENT SPANS SOME 4000 YEARS. Of its 39 books, ten cover a period of only 120 years.¹ This time period is often referred to as the Golden Age of Israel. Divided into successive 40-year reigns by three kings, the era has always been an irresistible source for comparison and contrast. But the lives and times of Saul, David, and Solomon speak more directly to us today than they have to any other generation.

As the Church prepares to enter her own "Golden Age," she is well instructed to look back on this epoch for instruction that will be both fundamental and necessary for the days ahead. The power of God will become most evident in those who are not satisfied with any of the "camps" and pine for the "new thing" that God is preparing, even if the process is to be a long and painful one.

The reigns of Saul and David can be likened to past moves of God which have gone on in the Church. "Solomon's reign" in the Church is yet to come and will be so glorious that every stream and movement of Christianity will be raised up to see the glory of God. No group will see itself as independent of the others or more favored by the Lord.

In looking to these three kings to find direction for today, the most important thing to keep in mind is that Saul, David and Solomon are not two-dimensional Bible characters. Neither are they Door #1, Door #2, or Door #3. Each is an extremely fluid model, in which God had different purposes for each and a different calling to accomplish His mission. Each had different strengths and weaknesses; not to mention severe failures. But God is calling each one of us today to have the zeal of David and the wisdom of Solomon.

The amazing thing about Solomon was his ability to serve the purposes of God in his generation: a virtue elsewhere attributed to David (Acts 13:36). Why did God give Solomon such incredible wisdom? It was not simply because he was David's heir; nor was it so people would honor him. It was because of Solomon's humble and sacrificial prayer that he might govern properly. The riches and honor that came to Solomon were given to him by God because he did not request them when God told Solomon he could have anything he asked for (1 Kings 3:11,12).

When Solomon ascended the throne of his father he became commander-in-chief of a fierce war machine. David had established an army that simply could not be defeated. In the same way, we owe the saints of past moves of God our gratitude for gaining ground we often take for granted. Using David's armies, Solomon had the opportunity to build an empire like that of Rome. He could have used his newfound wisdom to build a kingdom like that of Greece, having ushered in something of a Jewish Renaissance.

"Not satisfied with the idle life of an Eastern monarch, he set the example of, and gave encouragement to, study and literature - the range of his inquiries extending not only to philosophy and poetry, but also to natural sciences in all its branches."²

But neither of the two types of empires would do. And the combination would certainly have produced a spiritual city much more like the old Babylon than the new Jerusalem

It is no small thing to turn one's attention away from building an empire to building a temple, even if it was only a temporary change. From our perspective, the choice should be an obvious one. But would we do the same if the choice was offered? Solomon's story is presented to us today so that the choice can be just as easy. As God raises us up to be a prophet to the nations, anoints us to deliver the afflicted, and financially prospers us, will we use these resources to build an empire, or will we use them to build the Temple of the living God - the New Jerusalem?

God revealed to Solomon that He would give him great wealth and honor because he sought first the kingdom of God - His wisdom and grace. It was only fitting that wealth and honor be used as a testimony of the Lord's supremacy over every other nation and religion. So it will be in our day. Just as an entire nation came to pay homage to Solomon and his God through the lips of the Queen of Sheba, so tremendous advances will be made by the Gospel in the years ahead.

During the Golden Age, the Church will no longer be at war with many of its present enemies; rather she will be feared by them. Some will fear her simply because of her overwhelming spiritual authority. Others will more properly fear her because she is the representation of God's truth on earth. Sheba paid homage to the God of Israel out of reverence. Edom did so because it knew of military superiority. Every nation, tongue and people will be able to recognize the Church in all her glory and receive God as their God, or lay low to fight another day.

In another vein, Solomon's heart-aching compromises sadden the soul. Yet they provide instruction we must heed. In the coming Golden Age there will be unholy alliances with New Age forces. The anointing upon the Church will be so powerful that spiritual reality will be evident to all kinds of mystical organizations. The principle to learn here is this: Solomon built the temple largely with materials from nations other than Israel. Just as God sent Joseph into Israel and Daniel into Babylon, so He will send His sons into all kinds of other groups to draw out precious stones that will be masoned in right along with the rest of us. For many this will be a stumbling block, but don't be surprised to see sovereign moves of God among the mainline denominations and even among questionable sects.

Of course, we shouldn't make alliances God has clearly forbidden. The way to tell the good from the bad will be to simply look at the fruit. Who is being influenced by whom? The world may have left its mark on Joseph and Daniel, but it was only in culture and not in conscience. The effects of these men on Egypt and Babylon, on the other hand, are legendary.

If it is the era of Solomon - "the Golden Age" - that we are entering into, we need to embrace Solomon's strengths and reject his weaknesses - as well as those of David and Saul. As surely as God lives, the whole earth will be full of His glory. The way to prepare for that is not to be lounging around in an elegant palace waiting for David to die. It is to be serving God's sheep, surrounded by green pastures and quiet waters, fighting off the bears and lions, dreaming of the day when we will be called to accomplish all of the purposes of God in our generation.

Being Jewish and Knowing Jesus

- by Daniel Juster

11/89

As a young philosophy student, I wanted to believe the Bible, but my academic training left me very skeptical. "Supernatural revelation?" I wasn't sure, but I found one evidence for the Bible's veracity hard to ignore: God's faithfulness to the people of Israel. Scriptures promised that the Jewish people would never cease to exist as a nation. Even as he promised their dispersion throughout the earth, a curse and a punishment, God promised Moses: "Yet for all that, I will not forget my covenant so as to destroy them utterly ... that they will never cease to be a people before God" (Leviticus 26:44).

Still, this was not sufficient for faith. I continued to search in intense anxiety as I wrestled with the meaning of life.

Yet despite this, God's hand was on my life. I entered seminary and there found that archaeological evidence of biblical events, the fulfillment of prophecy, and evidence for the resurrection of Jesus were excellent. My faith became solid and sure - both spiritually and intellectually.

I left seminary with a deep desire to build a community of faith to counter the modern meaninglessness and alienation I saw in so many of my generation. Still, an abiding sense of God's faithfulness to the Jewish people stayed with me. I entered the Presbyterian ministry, and, to my surprise, received my first call to the pastorate from a Presbyterian congregation comprised primarily of Jewish people.

This amazing happenstance opened up a floodgate of questions: What is God's purpose for the Jewish people? Do they have a distinct future? Should Jewish believers in Jesus continue to live a Jewish life? Did God spend 2,000 years developing a cultural background for understanding the gospel only to completely do away with it? What dimensions of that culture, if any, have continuing validity? After two years of intensive study, I came to some firm conclusions.

Eschatology (the doctrine of "last things") has never been easy for the Church. Often it leads to division and bickering. Yet my studies of the Jewish role in the last days led me to conclusions which I believe are relevant to the whole Church and not divisive. I share them because they're what led me to intensive involvement in the Messianic Jewish movement.

I find in Scripture a promise that the Jewish people at the end of this world's present age will turn overwhelmingly to Yeshua (Jesus' Hebrew name), accepting him as their Messiah, their Savior. This promise comes not because the Jewish people are in some way superior, but because of God's love and the covenant that he made with their forefathers (Romans 11:29). God's covenant with Abraham, and Abraham's response, not only blessed the great patriarch - it is spilled over into his descendants as well. While God promises to punish the wickedness of men three and four generations down the line, he also promises to bless a righteous man to one thousand generations (Deuteronomy 7:9).

As miraculous as Israel's continued existence is, her election does not imply automatic salvation. Jews, like everyone else, need to repent and believe in Yeshua. The gospel, said Paul, "is the power of God for everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile" (Romans 1:16).

Yet still there's something unique about the Jewish people. Later in Romans, Paul says that, "As far as the gospel is concerned they are enemies on your account, but as far as election is concerned, they (Israel) are loved on account of the patriarchs, for God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (Romans 11:28,29). What is that gift and that call? It is a call to demonstrate God's faithfulness to the world by keeping Israel as a people and a nation despite humiliation, persecution, faithlessness, and wanderings throughout the earth. Whether scattered in unbelief or regathered, Israel's preservation demonstrates God's existence and his covenant faithfulness.

Even more than a demonstration, Jewish acceptance of the gospel brings enrichment to the entire Church. As Paul shows in Romans 11: "Because of (Israel's) transgression (i.e., rejection of the gospel), salvation has come to the gentiles to make Israel envious. But if their transgression means riches for the Gentiles, how much greater riches will their fullness bring!" In a sense, the Jewish people are parents of the Church. Jewish Christians led by Jewish apostles brought the gospel to the world. Israel's salvation as a people would be like a child's joy as he sees his parents come to follow the Lord. Not only did Yeshua come into the world through Jewish parents, but the Jewish people also left a cultural heritage rich in symbolism that 4,000 years has prophetically prepared the world for God's Messiah - something Greco-Roman culture hardly offers.

Israel's hardening is only in part and only for a time - "until the full number of the Gentiles has come in. And so all Israel will be saved" Romans 11:25,26).

What then is the future of the Jewish people? Despite many unscriptural views of a continued separation of the Church and Israel, Paul's view of the future includes the ingrafting "into their own olive tree" (Romans 11:24). Though most Jews are enemies of the gospel today, they are elect and destined to believe for the sake of their forefathers. Hence, all Israel will be saved (Romans 11:28).

Paul looks forward to a day in which Israel will corporately accept Jesus as the Messiah and reverse the decision of the first century Jewish leadership (the Sanhedrin). This will end the terrible judgment of seven woes that Yeshua pronounced on Israel's corporate leadership (Matthew 23). Yeshua ended this pronouncement of woeful judgments by expressing deep longing and hope for his people:

"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those who are sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing. Look, your house is left to you desolate. For I tell you, you will not see me again until you say, 'Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord'" (Matthew 23:37-39).

So Zechariah predicts that the Jews would look upon him whom they pierced and mourn for Him (Zechariah 12:10). Peter connects this repentance to the restoration of all things (Acts 3:21). The salvation of the Jewish people is a key part of the restoration of the Church. The restoration of Israel does not destroy Jewish identity, but it does reincorporate Israel into the one people of God.

Consequently, Paul enjoins Gentile believers to live so as to make Israel envious and to show mercy to Jewish people that they might receive the mercy of God - a far cry from the history of institutional Christianity!

In light of this, I believe that Messianic Jewish congregations are part of God's restoration in the Church. They provide an expression of faith in which the gospel can be understood in a Jewish context whereby Jewish people can embrace faith in Jesus as Messiah and Savior. We have not left the rest of the body. Rather, the history of the institutional Christianity shows that the body left its Jewish roots and often substituted Greco-Roman paganism and compromise.

Our congregations invite both Jew and Gentile to participate equally. All who appreciate Jewish roots and have a call to encourage an ongoing people are welcome in our membership. We seek out and maintain solid relationships with the rest of the body of believers. However, our chief aim is to be a movement preparing the way for the revival of Israel. We are concerned that our children are raised in their Jewish biblical heritage so that every generation will see a larger and larger percentage of the Jewish community saved. We do not wish to be simply a halfway house of assimilation into the Gentile world. This would not enrich the Church nor would it lead to a growing people movement for Jesus in the midst of the Jewish community.

Practically, this causes Jewish believers to express their New Covenant faith in Jewish ways. Fulfillment of the law did not do away with God's moral standards. Nor did it do away with the Jewish people and their unique national existence. Instead of dismissing them, Jewish celebrations can now be celebrated in the context of their New Covenant fulfillment.

* Passover is not only Israel's national birthday; it's also the renewal of life in the Passover lamb in the partaking of the broken bread and the cup symbolizing his body and his blood.

* Shavuot (Pentecost) is not merely the early Israeli harvest or the anniversary of the giving of the Law on Sinai; it's also the celebration of the Spirit being poured out (Acts 2).

* Sukkot (Tabernacles) not only recalls God's provisions when his people dwelt in the desert; it looks forward to the restoration of all things in the Messianic Kingdom (Zechariah 14).

* The Sabbath is the renewal of our sabbath rest in the Messiah Jesus.

Hence, the feasts still function by pointing to the meaning of Yeshua for the Jewish people.

The last days revival of the Jewish people, and God's supernatural work in Israel to bring Israel to himself, will be one aspect of God's demonstrating himself to the nations. It will be an aid to the Church in her witness. We are a restoration movement. And so, we seek the support of all believers that through their mercy, Israel might receive God's mercy.

Daniel Juster is a graduate of Wheaton College and McCormick Theological Seminary and serves as spiritual leader of Beth Messiah Congregation in Rockville, Maryland. Since 1973, he has pastored messianic congregations and currently labors as an apostle to Jewish congregations who seek to live out their new life in Jesus in a uniquely Jewish way.

The Harvest

By Rick Joyner
12/89

The Lord has revealed to many of His prophets that there will soon be a great outpouring of His Spirit. This revival will be greater than all those preceding it. This vision includes key elements to this coming harvest and what the Lord is doing in the Church now to prepare for it.

This outpouring will ultimately result in some very radical changes for both the Church and the world. These need to be understood by those who would be used by God for one of the greatest events in history. To those who are diligent seekers of God and obedient to His will, this vision does not represent disruption. These things will happen to them as a natural flow of the Spirit moving them to increased light and intimacy with Him. Those who are comfortable and resistant to change will have a very hard time. I ask you to openly and prayerfully reflect on what I am sharing. Some of these statements may not speak to you now, but I believe they will in the future, giving you great peace and confidence as you remember them.

Fitting Together

For the coming harvest the Lord is preparing a great spiritual "fishnet," one able to hold the catch that is coming. This net is formed by the linking together of His people. The stronger the intercommunication and interrelationships, the stronger this net will be. It is not only happening in the local churches among the members, but between ministries and congregations throughout cities, states, and crossing international barriers around the world.

In Ephesians 4:15-16, we see this principle: "We are to grow up in all aspects into Him, who is the Head, even Christ, from whom the whole Body, being fitted and held together by that which every joint supplies ..." A joint is not a part, but it is where two or more parts come together. There is a great fitting together going on in the Spirit right now, and it will increase in the near future on all levels.

Walls to Come Down

The Spirit is compelling pastors to get together with other pastors, prophets with prophets, apostles with apostles, and even whole congregations are beginning to visit and interrelate with other congregations apart from their own circles of emphasis. This is the Lord's doing. Some of these meetings may seem fruitless because of improper agendas, but they will bear fruit. Links will be made. Soon the Lord's presence in these meetings will melt all presumption and remove the façades which separate us from union with Him and each other. His presence will stimulate a worship which brings about Psalm 133 unity. As we anoint the Head with our worship the oil will flow down to the edge of His robes, covering the entire Body.

He is beginning the breakdown of barriers with the leadership because this is where most barriers originate and where they are the strongest. As the walls come down here the entire Body will begin to flow together. If the leaders resist this move, the Lord will continue it through the congregations. These groups will begin to relate to other members of the Body of Christ and their bonds will grow stronger, regardless of the resistance or warnings of their pastors. Some pastors and leaders who continue to resist this tide of unity will be removed from their place. Some will become so hardened they will become opposers and resist God to the end. Most will be changed and will repent of their resistance.

Because of the magnitude of the "catch," this net will be rent many times and will be in need of constant mending. Much of the discord now taking place in the Church is being used by the Lord to prepare those whose task in the harvest will be almost exclusively that of mending and binding this great net. These peacemakers will have a great part in building the net and have a major impact on the entire effectiveness of the revival. Those who seem to always find themselves in the middle of conflicts should be encouraged with the knowledge that they are being prepared for a great work.

Some who were used greatly of God in the past have become too rigid in doctrinal emphasis, or are too engaged in spiritual "Ishmaels," to participate in this revival. Some of these will try to join the work, but their interrelationships will be so superficial that they will be quickly torn from the net with the first catch. Those who are linked together by doctrine or who gather around personalities will quickly be torn away. Only those who are joined by and through Jesus alone will stand the pressure this harvest will bring upon the Church (Colossians 1:17).

Enormous Stress

The redemption of so many will bring much joy, but the newly redeemed will come with problems which bring enormous stress to congregations and ministers. The cords of unity must be very strong to stand this pressure. Those who have not learned to take the Lord's yoke and resist trying to carry the burdens themselves will be overwhelmed. Entering the Sabbath rest of the Lord will become a major emphasis in preparation for the harvest. Heed this word!

A large number who are now considered Christians - even spirit-filled Christians - have never been led to the Lord. They were led to the church, to a personality or to a doctrine or emphasis. Some of these will think they are important links in the net but will actually become part of the harvest, starting over again on the proper Foundation - Jesus. This group includes many well-known ministers and pastors. Their humility in this will lead multitudes to question and strengthen their own relationship to the Lord. This will strengthen and encourage the entire body of Christ.

Many denominations, extra-local fellowships and circles of emphasis will begin disbanding and severing those ties - even those that were ordained by God for a season - in order to take their place in this great net that the Lord is now forming. For some these ties will just be ignored or forgotten until they have passed away, almost without notice, because of the greater intensity and substance of this new move. For others it will be a very painful rending as they are persecuted and rejected by those who do not understand. Those who are required to leave much behind will soon receive many times what they have left.

Marvel of the World

Some leaders will actually disband their organizations as they realize they are no longer relevant to what God is doing. Others will just leave them behind to disband by themselves. Ultimately, all circles of ministry or influence with individual identities will dissolve into a single identity of simply being Christians for all who become part of this harvest. Single presbyteries will form over cities and localities. These will be made up of pastors and leaders from all backgrounds. Their unity and harmony in purpose, as well as that of the various congregations, will become a marvel to the world. The Lord will give these presbyteries great wisdom and discernment but there will be no doubt that Jesus alone will be the Head of His Church. What is coming will be bigger than any man or council of men could control or administrate.

The Lord's purpose in preparing for the harvest is to join, not separate. The dismantling of organizations and disbanding of some works will be a positive and exhilarating experience for the Lord's faithful servants. They will not be just leaving something behind; they will be going on to a much greater work. Those who have fallen to worship the work of God more than the God of the work will have trouble, but most of these too will be set free by the tremendous anointing that is coming.

Those who feel called to attack and tear down the old will not be sent from the Lord. There will be many "stumbling blocks" circulating in the Church that will cause confusion and some destruction from time to time. They will perceive themselves as prophets sent to judge and deliver. Those serving in leadership must trust their discernment and remove the stumbling blocks.

To be distinguished from the "stumbling blocks," a great company of prophets, teachers, pastors and apostles will be raised up with the spirit of Phinehas. Just as the son of Eleazar could not tolerate iniquity in the camp of the Lord, this "ministry of Phinehas" will save congregations, and at times even whole nations from the plagues that will be sweeping the earth. They will be moved by the jealousy of the Lord for the purity of His people. They will be sent to save and preserve the work of the Lord, not tear down, as the stumbling blocks do.

A Great Shaking

For a time, there will be such an inflow of people that even this great net cannot hold them all. Many of the former works and organized churches will be swelled with this overflow. Because of this they will assert that they are both the cause and primary purpose for this revival. This delusion will not last long because concurrent with the harvest a gripping tribulation will arise in the world and eventually consume them. This is the judgment of the Lord against the works He did not commission: The great "sea," or mass of humanity, that they sought to rule, will rise up to destroy them.

Wars will increase. There will even be some nuclear exchanges, but on a limited basis, mostly between Third World nations. Far more will perish by plagues and natural disasters than by wars during the period of this vision. The very foundations of civilization will shake and erode. Even the world's most stable governments will be melting like wax, losing authority and control over their populations. Eventually it will be hard to find anyone with the courage to assume authority. This will cause sweeping paranoia throughout the entire earth.

Huge mobs will attack everything in their path. The infrastructure of the great denominational churches and large visible ministries will be one of their primary targets and will vanish almost overnight. Pagan religions, cults and witchcraft will spread like plagues but these will also become targets of the mobs. By this time governments will have broken down to the point that lynchings and mass executions perpetrated by these mobs will be ignored by the authorities.

Fear and deep darkness will cover the earth, but this just makes the glory which is appearing upon the saints more striking. Huge masses of people will be streaming to the Lord, the inflow so great in places that very young Christians will be pastoring large bodies of believers. Arenas and stadiums will overflow nightly as the believers come together to hear the apostles and teachers.

Extraordinary Miracles

At this time few congregations will remain separate or individual entities. Many elders and pastors may be stationary, but groups they oversee will be constantly changing. Some of these are moving on because of persecution and others because the Lord scatters them to carry His message abroad like seed. Near the end (of the vision) the Body of Christ is like a great, flowing river sweeping about as freely as the wind. One day there may be meetings in a public auditorium or stadium, the next day in a park, and continually from house to house.

Great meetings that stir entire cities will happen spontaneously. Extraordinary miracles will be common while those considered great today will be performed almost without notice by young believers. Angelic appearances will be common to the saints and a visible glory of the Lord will appear upon some for extended periods of time as power flows through them.

A Different Authority

Conferences of apostles, prophets, pastors, elders, etc. will be called and used greatly by the Lord, but without denominating and separating from the rest of the body. Their unity will be in Jesus and He alone will be the Head of His Church. Eventually, the Lord's presence will be so great during this revival that, like the 24 elders in Revelation, all will cast their crowns at His feet and spiritual presumption will be unthinkable.

Those in leadership will be the most humble of all. When anyone presumes leadership without calling, it will be apparent to all. The leaders of this move will be true servants, not interested in reputation or position. Their humility will open them to become channels for wave after wave of living water. "He will dwell with the humble of the land."

This harvest will be so great that no one will look back at the early Church as a standard; all will be saying that the Lord has certainly saved His best wine for last. The early Church was a firstfruits offering; truly this will be a harvest! It was said of the Apostle Paul that he was turning the world upside down; it will be said of the apostles soon to be anointed that they have turned an upside down world right side up. Nations will tremble at the mention of their name.

These men and women of God will take little notice of their own accomplishments because of their burning love for the One Who works through them and the recognition of His accomplishments. Like Jesus, they will flee to the mountains when men try to make them kings or exalt them in any way. Their exaltation or authority will not come through man but only from above. As the masses will be seeking anyone to take authority during these times, this comes as a warning! If the people make you king, who rules? The authority that the Lord will establish will be very different from what even His own people now perceive. Do not try to rule, just serve. Through this His authority will flow and begin to bring order through peace.

I do not believe the actual magnitude of these events can be expressed here - neither the chaos nor the move of the Holy Spirit. As to the "rapture" or second appearance of the Lord Jesus, I have my own ideas but was not given anything concerning them in this vision. What I was allowed to foresee ended with increasing chaos and increasing revival.

Points of Emphasis

There will be words and exhortations, originating from the very throne of the Lord and carrying great authority, coming to prepare His Church for the days to come. Though I do not presume this will be all that He will be saying, I believe we will soon hear His prophets and teachers begin to emphasize the following:

- * Build upon the only foundation that can be laid: Jesus Himself. Works that are built upon truths instead of the Truth will not stand in this day. Many congregations and ministries are today devastated by the slightest shaking. The works that are properly built on Jesus will withstand the greatest trials and attacks without being moved. There will be a great emphasis on the Lord Jesus Himself in the days to come. The increasing revelation of Him will overshadow the many emphases of the past like the sun does the moon when it rises. The truths that have been such a distraction will seem insignificant as the Church begins to see Him "in Whom are hidden all of the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Colossians 2:3).

- * Remove the barriers and facades that separate us from the Lord and each other. We must become more intimate with Him and, through Him, with each other. Spiritual pride and the exaltation of men, individual truths or works, will come under unrelenting discipline from the Lord and will soon be understood as a "strange fire." Those who continue to offer it will perish from the ministry with such demonstration that a pure and holy fear of the Lord will sweep the Body of Christ. This will help the Church to move into true spiritual worship and a unity that is based on that worship.

* Abide in the Sabbath rest of the Lord. This will become not only an increasing emphasis in the teaching but a reality as the Lord enters His temple, the Church. Our growing intimacy with Him will bring a peace that will actually calm the storm of the rising sea of humanity. The intensity of the times will overwhelm any pseudo peace. We must be one with the "Lord of the Sabbath."

* Heed the spiritual preparation which may be reflected in the natural. For example: Some have begun moving their assets into precious metals or land. This may be helpful, but it is far more important to take the spiritual land and to lay up our treasures in heaven. The Lord is seeking givers who will become channels of His supply. For them there will not be any lack. Those who hoard or do not learn to freely give may suffer increasing crisis in their earthly affairs. This is the Lord's discipline to set them free. Some who are faithful and generous givers may also find themselves in increasing crisis, but it is for their preparation to be great channels for the provision of many. Remember Joseph!

Some are feeling they should limit their travel to certain areas and are beginning to emphasize cleanliness because of the AIDS epidemic. This may be helpful, but there is only one deliverance from the judgments of God - the one found in Christ. Spiritual purity is far more important than the natural and can alone protect us from AIDS or any other plague.

*"The just shall live by faith," not fear. Fears will greatly increase in the world. Actions taken by the Church because of fear will almost always prove destructive. Some "faith teaching" has muddied the waters to the degree that some do not even want to hear the word "faith." This frequently happens before the Lord begins a great work. A great revelation of true faith is coming; it will be an essential revelation for us to serve in these days. Some will be called to walk where angels fear to tread. Know that He Who is in us is much greater than he who is in the world. The vessels He is now preparing will walk in a boldness and confidence that will astonish a world gripped in fear. Our faith will grow as the presence of the Lord increases. True faith is the recognition of the One in Whom we believe. When one truly and properly fears the Lord he will not fear anything else.

In the coming days many will exist in the miraculous on a continual basis. It will become as natural to them as the gathering of manna was to Israel. Some of the Lord's exploits on behalf of His people will be unprecedented, exceeding the greatest biblical miracles. These will seem almost normal as they take place because the presence of the Lord will cause more wonderment than His works. He will be very close to His people in these days.

* The Lord will soon open our understanding of His Word and purpose to a depth beyond our present comprehension. The "books" are yet to be "opened" as they will be. When they are opened, our understanding of even the basic truths such as salvation, being born again, etc., will be enormously increased. This will give far more substance and depth of purpose to the entire Body of Christ. The functions of the gifts and ministries will come with increasing authority and power as their confidence increases with knowledge. The spiritual dimension will become more real to the Church than the natural. When the proper foundation has been adequately laid in the Church (our union and devotion to Jesus Himself) the Spirit of Revelation will be poured out as never before.

Do not resist the Lord in this work. Seek greater intimacy with the Lord and open yourself to your fellow members in the Body of Christ. Reach out to them and remove the barriers.

The Lord will merely cause His people to rise above such differences and worship Him in unity. As He is lifted up, we will gradually begin to wonder how many things that were so important to us, and often divided us, could have had so much of our attention. As this final battle begins, we are all going to be amazed and sometimes ashamed at those we find on our side.

Humble yourself under His mighty hand so that you may take part in a great exaltation. Those who allow themselves to be emptied, who lay aside all personal ambition to become of no reputation, who patiently suffer rejection and misunderstanding, will soon stir the entire world with the King's message.

The Kingdom of God

How many times have we heard the Kingdom of God mentioned? We have heard it said that the Kingdom of God comes not with observation; the Kingdom of God is not food and drink; the Kingdom is like seed cast on the ground; and on and on. But, just exactly what does the Kingdom of God consist of?

In 1 Chronicles 17, God is speaking to King David just before he dies, and in verse 11 we read: "And it shall come to pass, when your days are past and you must go to be with your fathers, that I will raise up one of your offspring after you, which shall be of your sons; and I will establish His kingdom. He shall build me a house, and I will establish His throne forever. I will be His Father, and He shall be my Son; and I will not take my mercy from Him, as I took it from him that was before you. But I will settle Him in my house and in my kingdom forever; and His throne shall be established forevermore."

Now this word was never fulfilled in King Solomon. In fact, Acts 2:30 tells us that David knew that this meant Christ, not Solomon, and that this kingdom that was to be established forever was the Kingdom of God and that Christ was the King that was to sit on the throne forever. This kingdom that God promised is an eternal kingdom, with Christ as King.

Now let us look to see when this kingdom is to be set up on the earth. Some may say that it was set up when Jesus came, but this is not what the scripture says. In Daniel, chapter two, Daniel interprets the king's dream, and in it is contained a short summary of the history of the world kingdoms from Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon down to the present democracies and dictatorships of the present day.

In Daniel 2:4, we read of God's kingdom and when it shall be set up and what it shall do: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. For just as you saw that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it broke in pieces the iron, brass, clay, silver and gold; the great God has made this known to the king what shall come to pass in the future. The dream is certain and the interpretation is sure."

All the kingdoms of this world - and the glory and power of them - shall fall before the onslaught of the Kingdom of God!

Before we go any further, let us stop right here and think about what a kingdom is. The definition of a kingdom is a people or domain over which a king rules and has absolute authority. For instance, the kingdom of Spain would be that people over which the king of Spain had dominion. The kingdom of France would be that people over which the king of France had dominion.

And so the Kingdom of God is that people over which God has dominion and rulership, and which are under His authority and obey His laws. The Bible says that in the last days God will set up this kingdom, that this kingdom will never be destroyed, and that it will destroy and consume all these world kingdoms.

But what about what Jesus said when He was here on earth - that the Kingdom of God was at hand? True. And it was. For Jesus was the Kingdom of God on earth while He walked here in His mortal flesh body. The Pharisees asked Him one time about when He would set up the kingdom. He answered, "The Kingdom of God comes not with observation, for the Kingdom of God is within you."

Now Jesus did not say - nor did He mean to say - that the Kingdom of God was in those hypocritical, sinful, old Pharisees, for it was not. But the word He used for "within" was entos, meaning - "in the midst." And so it was. Right there in the midst of them stood the Kingdom of God, the first man on earth to qualify for the kingdom. Jesus was the first man that ever lived who never was in rebellion against God, and who daily lived to fulfill the will of God.

Go back to Bible history, take the greatest men of the Bible, look closely at their lives, and you will see that they missed the mark. Look at Adam. He walked with God in the Kingdom realm and had dominion and authority and everlasting life until he fell in sin and rebelled against God, and God put him out of the Kingdom.

Look at the patriarch Noah. Was he in subjection to God when he got drunk and brought a curse on his son and his seed? Of course not. Was Abraham in subjection to God when he lied about his wife, and when he took a concubine and brought forth Ismael? Was Moses walking in the Spirit when he murdered a man, and when he struck the rock rather than speaking to it? Was David not in rebellion to the laws of God when he committed adultery and murder?

Every one of God's greatest men fell short of the mark, and could not qualify for the kingdom. God said, "I sought for a man to stand in the gap and make up the hedge, and found none." Romans 3:23 says that "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

Come short of what? - Of the Kingdom walk!

And then, praise God, Jesus came! And with the coming of this man, God had a body on the earth through which He could show His glory, and the power of His Kingdom, for here was one that was in complete subjection to the will of God. He kept the law of God perfectly, though He was not concerned with the traditions of men.

In Mark 1:14 we read: "Now after John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, saying, 'The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand; repent and believe the gospel.'"

Yes, the time was fulfilled, and now it could be truly said that the Kingdom of God was at hand, for once again God had a domain over which He had absolute rule and authority. Yes, it could be said that the Kingdom of God was in the midst of those Pharisees, but they did not know it because they were blinded by their hatred and sin.

Now we begin to see how the Kingdom of God could have been here at that time, and yet was to be set up in the last days. For when Jesus died, He planted a seed that was to bring forth a great harvest, and that when this harvest got fully ripe, God would have a people on the earth who would walk 100 percent in the Spirit. Romans 8:29 tells us that in the purposes of God, He has fore-ordained a people who would be conformed to the image of His Son, and would come forth in His likeness, fully qualified for the Kingdom.

For we could not lift ourselves out of sin and rebellion and live in that Kingdom realm by our own power. Therefore, Jesus came to die for us, that by coming down to us, He might lift us up to where He is. He took our place on the cross of Judgment, suffered our penalty, and gave us His life and His holiness that we might by His grace come to the will of God.

This seed has been growing and the life of this thing has continued down through history since Calvary, even through the dark ages, up until this present time. Then what are we waiting for? Why hasn't God harvested this crop? Because the harvest has not yet come to full maturity, and it does not yet look like the seed was planted.

James 5:7 tells us: "Be patient therefore, brethren, until the coming of the Lord. Behold, the farmer waits for the precious produce of the soil, being patient about it, until he receives the early and the latter rains."

The thing that ripens the grain and brings it to full maturity is the latter rain. Latter is a word meaning last. Now some may say, "I thought we received the latter rain two generations ago," and some others may say, "No ... we got it one generation ago." We got some rain alright, but it was not the last rain. For there is another revival coming, another mighty move of the Spirit, and this move will bring the harvest to maturity and bring God's people in absolute obedience to the will of God.

Even now, God is perfecting and getting ready to harvest the first fruits of this great harvest. They shall enter the Kingdom realm and make a place for the Bride in the time of the first outpouring of God's power, glory, judgment and wrath upon the world. This outpouring shall end by bringing God's true church into complete subjection to Him, out of the leadership of man's ideas. Then He shall set up His Kingdom and it shall consume all the kingdoms of this world. This is all very near at hand, closer than you think.

God would have you to rule and reign in His Kingdom during the time when the Latter Rain is being poured out. Now some might ask, "How can we get into this Kingdom?" The Scripture is full of teaching concerning the Kingdom of God. But in John 3:3 we see that Jesus says that you cannot enter the Kingdom of God unless you have been born again. So you must die out to yourself and put on Christ, for that is your only hope.

* Colossians 1:12 says that we have been delivered from the power of darkness and transformed into the Kingdom of God.

* Acts 14:22 tells us that we must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom.

* Matthew 11:12 says that the violent take it by force and press into it.

* 1 Corinthians 4:20 tells us that the Kingdom of God is not in word, but in power.

* Romans 14:17 says that the Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Now when you understand that the Kingdom is a people over which God rules supreme, these scriptures begin to make some sense. By our new birth we have been delivered from sin, and translated into a new realm where Jesus is King.

But be honest now ... even though you have been saved and perhaps filled with His Spirit, you still rebel against the will of God at times, and there are still fleshly attitudes and spirits that are not like Christ. So, to conform us to the image of Christ and bring us into complete subjection to the Spirit of God, He puts us through the fires of tribulations and trials that we might enter into that perfect Kingdom realm.

I know that when a Christian dies, though he never reached perfection in this life, he will enter the Kingdom realm in Heaven where there is no rebellion to God. But even so, God has purposed that He would have a people in this life that are totally given to Him. So I can tell you for sure that someone is going to make it! And I'm trusting and praying that, by the grace of God, I may be one of them.

Jesus prayed, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth, as it is in Heaven." What did this mean? - Simply that God's Kingdom that exists in heaven, shall be brought to completion in the lives of men and be put on display in this present world, in order to put to shame the claims of Satan that no one can live and serve God in perfection.

Jesus did it and put principalities and powers to an open shame, but He has purposed that His Church which is His Body shall attain to that same realm, subdue all nations and rule them with a rod of iron, and put every power and every principality under His feet. This is His purpose in His Church and that is what He is doing at this hour.

It is not a great sweeping harvest of lost souls that God has purposed (though that that will surely come in the greatest harvest that the world has ever seen), but it is in the hearts of men and women everywhere, hidden away from the eyes of the world and most of the church - here God is gaining control of every thought, every spirit, every attitude.

Now is the day to seek the Lord for the rain to fall in your life, and to ask God to put the refining fires to work in your life, that you might die out to everything that is natural and carnal, and walk with Him in the Kingdom realm, and be made into His image.

"But we all, with an open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Corinthians 3:18).

God's Perestroika

by Rodney Lensch
12/89

The word "perestroika" is the term Mikhail Gorbachev uses to describe what is happening in the Soviet Union these days. It means the "restructuring" of the economic and political systems which are stagnant, unproductive, outmoded, if not totally unworkable. Gorbachev's desire is for the people's basic needs to be met, for a new spirit of democracy to be released in the land, for the Soviet Union to become a partner in world commerce, yes, for communism to take on a brand new face.

It is causing a new springtime in the Eastern bloc countries as well as in China. Who would ever have believed such a thing could take place? Yet in Russia the people are confused and perplexed. Will it work? Where is it going? Will Gorbachev survive politically? Will things get worse before they get better? It is a time of massive turmoil, ferment and upheaval. But no one would deny that it is a reality. Nearly everyday "perestroika" is mentioned on the front page of the newspaper.

The good news is that God has a "perestroika" of His own going on in the Church worldwide today. There is a sovereign "restructuring" occurring in the kingdom of God that doesn't make the evening news, (at least not too often!) but it is an undeniable reality just the same. Personally, in all my years of being a Christian, I have never known a time of such change, stress and bewilderment within the Church. Everything seems up for grabs.

The predictability and security of past traditions can no longer be taken for granted. It is as though we were walking in the midst of an ecclesiastical earthquake. Pastors are checking out of the ministry. Bishops are wringing their hands over all the problems in charismatic and non-charismatic churches alike. Sincere born-again believers are staying home on Sunday mornings and having church by themselves because the confusion and frustration in so many local churches is more than they can bear.

As an advocate and a victim of God's perestroika, allow me to make some prophetic sense of all the shakings, quakings and breakings that are taking place in the Church today. What I will have to say is not the last word on the subject but a humble attempt to shed some spiritual light on what God is about from my limited vantage point. Come Holy Spirit! Be our Teacher and our Comforter as we in faith embrace the perestroika of God.

The Prophetic Basis for God's Perestroika

It is a biblical truth that God is never surprised at what occurs on earth, least of all in His Church. He knows the end from the beginning and has a plan that is methodically being worked out in the fabric of history. He is finally the Lord of history. And secular history is God's handmaiden, for Paul writes in Ephesians 1:22-23: "And He (the Father) put all things in subjection to His (Christ's) feet and gave Him as head over all things to the Church, which is His body, the fulness of Him who fills all in all."

We need to understand that when God wraps up this age it will be much like the time when Jesus walked on the earth and fulfilled His redemptive mission. It was a time of prophecy being fulfilled, of the divine and the demonic hitting head on with mighty fury, of change, upheaval and new direction as the Old Covenant ended and the New Covenant began, of the end of the apostate Jewish system and the releasing of the Body of Christ after Pentecost. It was indeed a roller coaster ride! Will the culmination of the age be anything less spectacular? It is apt to be even more dramatic and cataclysmic!

Hear the Word of the Lord!

* Haggai 2:5-9, "As for the promise which I made when you came out of Egypt, My Spirit is abiding in your midst; do not fear! For thus says the Lord of hosts, 'Once more a little while, I am going to shake the heavens and the earth, the sea also and the dry land. And I will shake all the nations; and they will come with the wealth of all nations; and I will fill this house with glory,' says the Lord of hosts ... 'The latter glory of this house will be greater than the former,' says the Lord of hosts, 'and in this place I shall give peace.'"

The holy writer is looking down the corridors of history to the close of the age and sees God's perestroika unfolding. Everything that can be shaken will be shaken, and in the midst of it all the Lord's glorious Church will emerge. The glory of the latter house no doubt has a double connotation. First, it refers to the surpassing glory of the New Covenant over the Old Covenant which Paul contrasts so powerfully in II Corinthians 3. Secondly, it points to the exceeding glory of the Church of the last generation over that of any preceding generation of New Testament history.

Jesus will present to Himself a glorious Church as Paul outlines in Ephesians 5:27. However, to bring this about, mighty shakings will be necessary: Holy Spirit fire on the inside and persecution and tribulation fires on the outside. But never fear, Haggai says, at length there shall be peace in the glorious Church!

* Ephesians 2:13-18, "But now in Christ Jesus you who formerly were afar off have been brought near by the blood of Christ. For He Himself is our peace, who made both groups (Jew and Gentile) into one and broke down the barrier of the dividing wall,* by abolishing in His flesh the enmity, which is the Law of commandments contained in ordinances, that in Himself He might ... reconcile them both in one body to God through the cross, by it having put to death the enmity ... for through Him (Christ) we both have our access in one Spirit to the Father."

According to Paul, Christ's blood was shed not only for vertical reconciliation, namely, that Jew and Gentile alike can be forgiven of their sins and be made right with the Father, but the blood of Jesus was also shed for horizontal reconciliation between Jew and Gentile in the one Body of Christ, the Church. All of the legal and carnal reasons (enmity) which kept Jew and Gentile estranged, socially and spiritually, were done away with in the blood of the cross. So the great miracle of the Church of the first century was that Jews and Gentiles could publicly relate together in peace and love as the people of God under Jesus Christ. This got the world's attention!

I dare say that an even greater miracle will shock the world in the last generation when this horizontal reconciliation will be manifested between Christians of hundreds of separatistic traditions in the one Body of Christ, the glorious Church, after it has gone through enough shakings. You can count on it, the blood of Christ shed for true Body unity will not have been shed in vain. Given our sectarian traditions we may not have faith and vision for it but God does because His plan will prevail. It is only a matter of time. Shakings will speed up the process!

* John 10:14, 27, 16, "I am the good shepherd; and I know My own, and My own know Me ... My sheep hear My voice and I know them, and they follow Me ... And I have other sheep, which are not of this fold; I must bring them also, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock with one shepherd."

These familiar words of Jesus beautifully correspond to His high priestly prayer in John 17 where the Lord prays for true spiritual unity among all of His sheep such as will be visible to the world and trigger the last harvest. In John 10, Jesus prophesies what He prays for in John 17. He says, "They shall become one flock with one shepherd." This is not a matter of "maybe" or "hope so" but of divine certainty, "They shall become one flock with one shepherd." As the prophetic scriptures about Jesus' conception and birth were literally fulfilled so these prophecies about Christ's Body at the close of the age will be literally fulfilled. Again, God's perestroika will aid in accomplishing this, if we have ears to hear.

The Primary Target of God's Perestroika

The primary target of God's perestroika is the Babylonian spirit which has been at war with the rule of God over His people ever since the Fall. Literally from Genesis 11 to Revelation 18 this evil conspiracy has been at work. In Revelation 17:5, which predicts her doom at the close of the age, she is described as "... a mystery, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and of the abominations of the earth."

That she has been at war with the true Church of Jesus is evident in Revelation 17:6, "And I saw the woman drunk with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus."

That even true believers can unwittingly be associated with her evil influence is clear from Revelation 18:4, "And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, 'Come out of her, My people, that you may not participate in her sins and that you may not receive of her plagues.'"

That she reserves her most vicious attacks for apostles and prophets is implied in Revelation 18:20, "Rejoice over her, O heaven, and you saints and apostles and prophets, because God has pronounced judgment for you against her."

In the early days of the charismatic renewal we used to joke with the classical Pentecostals about how their fathers at the turn of the century felt constrained of God to "come out" of the old-line denominations that rejected their baptism in the Spirit. How dare they call these church bodies "Babylon"! I'm wondering now if they did not have some genuine light and that the Spirit was warning us of events soon to occur as the end of the age draws near.

Characteristics of the Babylonian Spirit

If we study the account of the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11, we can observe some significant characteristics of this spirit.

- It is a spirit which attempts to deny, frustrate and usurp the rule of God over His people. In Genesis 9:7, the Lord told Noah and his family, "And as for you, be fruitful and multiply; populate the earth abundantly and multiply in it." However, in Genesis 11:4, we are told of Noah's descendants, "And they said, 'Come, let us build for ourselves a city, and a tower whose top will reach into heaven, and let us make for ourselves a name; lest we be scattered abroad over the face of the whole earth.'"
- It is a spirit which elevates man and ministers to human pride. In Genesis 11:4 the people said, "Let us build a tower whose top will reach into heaven and let us make for ourselves ... Let us make for ourselves a name."
- It is a spirit which delights in uniformity. In Genesis 11:3 we read, "and they said to one another, 'Come, let us make bricks and burn them thoroughly.'" Bricks are not only something that man creates but they speak of uniformity. In God's living temple the saints are called "Living stones" which speak of divine life and divine diversity.
- It is a spirit which causes confusion and division. Because God is opposed to a united humanity under the control of the Babylonian spirit, He passed swift judgment upon those building the tower of Babel. We read in Genesis 11:7-9, "Come, let Us go down and there confuse their language that they may not understand one another's speech. 'So the Lord scattered them abroad from there over the face of the whole earth and they stopped building the city. Therefore, its name was called Babel, because there the Lord confused the language of the whole earth.' "

Only when people repent of their sins, come under the lordship of Jesus Christ and allow the Holy Spirit to bring forth the kingdom of God will there be unity among men on earth that pleases God. Meanwhile, where the Babylonian spirit operates, confusion and division will follow as a sign of God's displeasure.

We would like to think that this spirit only operates in church groups that blatantly deny the gospel of Christ. My conviction is that it tries to manifest itself in all Christian denominations, even those that have the most spiritual light.

Manifestations of the Babylonian Spirit in the Church

- The usurpation of Jesus' lordship by establishing a central hierarchy/bureaucracy that controls the life and ministry of the local church. This trend began in the second century when apostles and prophets were replaced by bishops and archbishops who controlled large geographical areas and consolidated more and more power. When the baptism in the Spirit was lost to the Church, human control and tradition naturally supplanted Christ's rule. According to Revelation 2 and 3, Jesus desires to speak directly to every local church without bureaucratic interference. This is why Rev. Wolfram Kopfermann, the German charismatic from Hamburg, recently said, "The peoples' church is historically out of date. The hour of the free Church is here."
- The attempt to control local assemblies by requiring their property to be owned by the central bureaucracy. The Roman Catholic church has operated on this basis for centuries and owns billions of dollars worth of real estate worldwide. Only recently has American Lutheranism fallen into this trap. The new Evangelical Lutheran Church in America is a case in point. Obviously it will be much more difficult for churches to leave their denomination if they can't take their buildings with them. This is all part of the devil's strategy.
- The notion that "our group" is the best or the only legitimate expression of the Church of Jesus Christ. Here is Babylonian pride at work. We will make a name for ourselves. In seminary I was taught that my denomination was the true visible Church of Christ on earth.
- The attempt to prevent church members or member churches from leaving their denomination by using intimidation and false guilt. Because the Babylonian spirit is always trying to build up a denomination at the expense of the unity of the Body of Christ, it resists anyone's leading to leave. Such a person or group is apt to be told, "If you leave you will suffer loss. You will come under judgment. You will be disloyal to God or to your confirmation or ordination vows. God would never call you away from here."
- The refusal to change any doctrine or tradition as if "our way of believing and doing" is the epitome of Christianity. Recently I read about a Lutheran pastor and his wife who wondered why there was such a violent reaction to any godly change they wished to introduce to their congregation. In reading some old church records they discovered a resolution adopted in 1873 which stated, "No so-called new measures, anxious bench systems and the like, in doctrine or in practice, shall ever be tolerated in any shape or form in this congregation." New measures obviously referred to any and all changes resisted by the established church of the day. The "anxious bench system" was an altar call or praying with any form of emotion at the altar.
- The rejection of the baptism in the Holy Spirit. This is due to the fact that when the Holy Spirit comes in power, and not just as a doctrine in the Creed, He exposes the Babylonian spirit and seeks to liberate the people of God from bondage to human control and tradition. This is why the great reformers in every age were martyred, excommunicated or exiled. This is what Revelation 17:6 is referring to. This also explains why the Inquisition followed the Reformation. Who follows in their train?
- The subtle attempt to weaken the Church by luring it to embrace the world's philosophies and temptations. Here we need only to consider how secular humanism, feminism, parapsychology, homosexuality, abortion and liberation theology are readily accepted by many denominations as compatible with the faith of Christ as revealed in Scripture.

Recently I learned of a Lutheran congregation where a feminist woman pastor was being interviewed as a pastoral candidate. Although she denied the Virgin Birth and the reliability of the Bible as God's Word, 60 percent of the people voted for her. They said her theology was her business. They just wanted a pastor, and she was willing to serve. When the charismatic members, who voted against the woman, left the church they were accused of being unloving and divisive.

A Contemporary Analogy of the Babylonian Spirit

The best illustration of the nature of the Babylonian spirit is the hamburger franchise. Immediately we think of McDonald's or Wendy's or Burger King. Though they are very different they have a lot in common! Each of them is controlled by a central office. Each of them conforms to a certain menu, decor and architectural style. Each of them is out to compete against the others and be number one. Each thinks its products are the best. It would be unthinkable for McDonald's to serve a "Whopper" or for Wendy's to serve an "Egg McMuffin." It would be heresy to even suggest that all three franchises merge into one super hamburger chain for the sake of simplicity, variety and profit.

When we think of the denominational church franchises on every corner on mainstreet America, it doesn't take a prophet or the son of a prophet to tell us that the Babylonian spirit is alive and well in today's visible church. Because Jesus is not returning for a "McChurch" He is sending down from the throne a divine remedy for all this confusion, and it is called God's perestroika, a wholesale restructuring that will produce in time the glorious church.

Make Way! - The Blueprint for March For Jesus

It's new and it's old! Christians have been taking to the streets since the day of Pentecost, giving glory to God in public places and proclaiming the Holy Spirit energized truths of the Gospel in praise, as well as in preaching. This is beginning to burst out in England, as well as in other parts of the United Kingdom, with crowds as large as 60,000 gathered in one place to worship and pray. The Church in many places is becoming visible again with a voice that needs to be heard.

Graham Kendrick, writer of many praise and worship songs and director of Make Way Music, is spreading his vision for "Praise Marches" in the streets of many cities and towns in England.

"A lot has happened in the Church in the last 15 years," Graham says. "There have been many changes and it is only natural that what was at one time an underground river has begun to surface. Make Way is just one means by which the Church has surfaced and become more visible. In many ways, it is an easier method of witnessing than the old-style open-air meetings."

The vision behind Make Way Music is to provide the Church with the musical tools for taking praise, prayer and proclamation onto the streets of our cities and towns. Make Way Music provides a series of shouts, chants, prayers and songs which can be used in the marketplaces, on the streets, on floats in conjunction with parades. It is an effective way to bring the Church to the people instead of the people to the Church.

Although these happenings appear to be new, this concept has a legacy which is many centuries old:

- * John Huss, leader of a revival movement in the fifteenth century, composed folk hymns in his native Czech for his followers to sing in the marketplace, fields and meadows.
- * The Catholic and Orthodox churches still continue in the tradition of processions in many places today, particularly those associated with pilgrimage.
- * The banners that often hang inside Anglican churches were not intended for that purpose, but for taking out around the parish. In England, Whit Sunday has always been a time for processions, particularly in the Midlands and the North.
- * The Salvation Army took their brass bands onto the streets in the late 19th century. They were not always popular. The Worthing Gazette of 1883 described them as "excitable young men and hysterical young women who mistake a quasi-religious revelry for Godliness."

* When the Spirit was poured out upon Wales in 1904, society could not escape its impact. For a time, the courts had no new cases to try and the taverns emptied. A report read: "The revival of 1904 united denominations as one body, filled the chapels nightly, renewed family ties, changed life in mines and factories, often crowded streets with huge processions, abated social vices and diminished crime."

And now, this underground stream, which has renewed the Church in growth and vitality, is beginning to burst out once again. Many Christians around the world believe that it is time to take to the streets. It is already happening in Great Britain where over 200,000 at one time have taken to the streets to "March for Jesus."

"It seems to give Christians greater boldness and somehow breaks the spell of silence," says Graham Kendrick. And because there is a spiritual warfare element to it, Make Way can be an effective strategy to drive out spiritual darkness.

"But Make Way is not a short cut," explains Graham. "Some think that by having a praise procession the betting shops, pubs and strip-joints will close down overnight, but I am more and more convinced that the message of Exodus 23:30 is more realistic: 'Little by little I will drive them out before you until you have increased enough to take possession of the land.'

"If we really want to break Satan's power in a town or city, I think it is going to happen little by little as the Church grows in holiness, purity, love, power and authority."

The Make Way concept is now spreading world wide - large praise marches have taken place in Europe, the United States, Canada and Australia. Different groups around the world have been doing similar things for years, but to many, Make Way provides a taste of something completely new.

European church leaders are already beginning to talk together about the vision for a day of simultaneous processions in scores of major cities across Europe to take place in 1992. A day of praise and proclamation will take place in the major cities of Europe. In conjunction with this event, churches will be praying for the evangelization of Europe.

March for Jesus 1992

By Jay Rogers
5/92

Christians have been taking to the streets since the day of Pentecost, giving glory to God in public places and proclaiming the Holy Spirit energized truths of the Gospel in praise, as well as in preaching. The Church in many places is becoming visible again with a voice that needs to be heard.

The March for Jesus concept is now spreading world wide - large praise marches have taken place in Europe, the United States, Canada and Australia. Different groups around the world have been doing similar things for years, but in many cities, March for Jesus 1992 is making way for something completely new.

This May 23, March for Jesus events will take place in more than 120 U.S. cities, as well as in Canada, Mexico and Puerto Rico. A day of praise and proclamation will take place in the major cities of Europe. In conjunction with this event, churches will be praying for the evangelization of Europe. Every capital city in Europe - from Moscow to Madrid, Budapest to Berlin - will be having praise marches. In Berlin organizers expect more than 100,000 marchers to pass through the site where Hitler once displayed his troops - the Brandenburg Gate.

Next year, organizers around the world will plan marches the United States in which over a million Christians will participate. Believers lifting up the Name of Jesus Christ will march in every country of the world.

In 1994, the first global March for Jesus has been scheduled for June 25. Marches will begin in capital cities around the world at 10 a.m. in every time zone in such a way that for an entire 24 hour period the whole world will be marching for Jesus. Some cities, such as Seoul, South Korea, anticipate 1 million to 2 million marchers on that day.

Graham Kendrick, writer of many praise and worship songs and director of Make Way Music, has spread his vision for "Praise Marches" in the streets of many cities and towns all over the world.

"A praise march is just one means by which the Church has surfaced and become more visible." says Kendrick. "In many ways, it is an easier method of witnessing than the old-style open-air meetings."

The vision behind March for Jesus 1992 is to provide the Church with the musical tools for taking praise, prayer and proclamation onto the streets of our cities and towns. A series of shouts, chants, prayers and songs will be used in the by the marchers on the streets, and in rallies held in conjunction with parades. It is one way to bring the Church to the people instead of the people to the Church.

Although these happenings appear to be new, this concept has a legacy which is many centuries old:

* Jan Hus, leader of a revival movement in the fifteenth century, composed folk hymns in his native Czech for his followers to sing in the marketplace, fields and meadows.

* The Catholic and Orthodox churches still continue in the tradition of processions in many places today, particularly those associated with pilgrimage.

* The banners that often hang inside Anglican churches were not intended for that purpose, but for taking out around the parish. In England, Whit Sunday has always been a time for processions, particularly in the Midlands and the North.

* The Salvation Army took their brass bands onto the streets in the late 19th century. They were not always popular. The Worthing Gazette of 1883 described them as "excitable young men and hysterical young women who mistake a quasi-religious revelry for Godliness."

* When the Spirit was poured out upon Wales in 1904, society could not escape its impact. For a time, the courts had no new cases to try and the taverns emptied. A report read: "The revival of 1904 united denominations as one body, filled the chapels nightly, renewed family ties, changed life in mines and factories, often crowded streets with huge processions, abated social vices and diminished crime."

And now, this underground stream, which has renewed the Church in growth and vitality, is beginning to burst out once again. Many Christians around the world believe that it is time to take to the streets. It has already happened in Great Britain where over 200,000 at one time have taken to the streets to "March for Jesus."

The marches in England began with small churches who decided to take what they were experiencing in their churches out into the streets. In May of 1987 several ministries in London, joined together for a Prayer and Praise March through the streets. To their surprise more than 15,000 people turned out, in spite of pouring rain. As they marched through a financial district of the city, they prayed that God would expose the schemes of the enemy and stop the inflation and greed. In the days that followed they saw insider trading and fraud exposed, and the stock market crashed.

Encouraged, the march organizers planned another event for May of 1988. This time 55,000 participants turned out. As they marched, their prayers were focused on the government. That evening following the march, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher publicly spoke of her faith in Christ. This sparked a controversy over religion that allowed the truths of Scripture to be articulated in Parliament and in the national media for several months. In 1989 and 1990, marches occurred all over England and Ireland and both times more than 200,000 people participated.

"It seems to give Christians greater boldness and somehow breaks the spell of silence," says Graham Kendrick. "And because there is a spiritual warfare element to it, praise marches can be an effective strategy to drive out spiritual darkness."

"But praise marches are not a short cut," explains Kendrick. "Some think that by having a praise procession the betting shops, pubs and strip-joints will close down overnight, but I am more and more convinced that the message of Exodus 23:30 is more realistic: 'Little by little I will drive them out before you until you have increased enough to take possession of the land.' If we really want to break Satan's power in a town or city, I think it is going to happen little by little as the Church grows in holiness, purity, love, power and authority."

March organizers also want to stress what March for Jesus is not:

1. It is not a protest. March for Jesus is not to be confused with protest marches, demonstrations for political causes, or with anything confrontational. It is a positive witness of the Good News, a time to boldly and confidently declare our faith in Jesus.
2. It is not to be used to promote any one particular ministry. Although many churches and ministries are associated with the event, march organizers are careful not to let it become a vehicle for self-promotion. No mailing lists will be compiled, no man-centered ministries will be lifted up, and marchers will not carry banners advertising the name of their church or movement.
3. It is not just another "event." Many churches plan evangelistic outreaches, community service events, and church social functions throughout the year. But March for Jesus is a time for lifting up the name of Jesus. The sole purpose is to praise His Name publicly. It is a time for Jesus alone.

March for Jesus

May 23, 1992

What is March for Jesus?

March for Jesus is celebration. The March calls Christians to unite and take the joy of knowing Jesus beyond the church walls and into the streets with praise and prayer.

March for Jesus is repentance. It is a time for humbling ourselves; for publicly repenting of the sins we have committed as individuals, as the Church, and for our nation. We are asking God to come and forgive our sins and heal our land.

March for Jesus is a witness. We are taking part in Jesus' command to go into the whole world and preach the gospel, making disciples of every nation. On May 23, every nation in Europe and over 120 cities in America will hold Marches.

Operation: Second Exodus

JERUSALEM (FR) - Day and night planes are landing in Jerusalem filled with Russian Jews. Israeli experts are predicting the arrival of at least one million Jewish immigrants in the next few years. It is truly a modern day Exodus with biblical significance.

For years Jews and Christians around the world have worked and prayed for the fulfillment of God's promise to bring back the people of Israel to their land of promise. Isaiah 43:5,6 speaks of this event: "Do not fear for I am with you," says the Lord, "I will bring your offspring from the east, and gather you from the west. I will say to the north, 'Give them up!' and to the south, 'Do not hold them back.' Bring My sons from afar and My daughters from the ends of the earth."

Jeremiah 16:14,15 predicts: "Therefore behold, days are coming," declares the Lord, "when it will no longer be said, 'As the Lord lives, who brought up the sons of Israel out of the land of Egypt,' but, 'As the Lord lives, who brought up the sons of Israel from the land of the north and from all the countries where he had banished them.' For I will restore them to their own land which I gave to their fathers."

Since 1967, the modern Exodus of Jews from the Soviet Union began. The numbers rose sharply in the 1970s but fell off in the early 1980s as Soviet leaders came and went. Under Mikhail Gorbachev the numbers rose to astonishing levels. The number of Soviet Jews coming to Israel this year is expected to reach 150 thousand.

To physically absorb this many people, presents a unique challenge. Israel's population could increase 25% within the next few years from its present number of 4 million. More Russian Jews are coming to Israel than ever before. However, most Israelis are displaying a feeling of brotherhood to the new Jewish immigrants.

In October, thousands of Russian Jews arrived during the Feast of Tabernacles, and were met by Israeli Jews with open arms. The festivities of the moment, the singing and dancing, were a welcome relief from the years of persecution they received in the Soviet Union. More Jews than ever before are expected to come to Israel as both Christians and Jews have donated 1.5 million dollars to the airlifts bringing in the Russian Jews.

As Jewish worshippers celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles in early October, they were joined by thousands of newly arrived Russian Jews. More significantly, it marked the end of the Year of Jubilee, a Jewish tradition which, in biblical times, mandated the release of slaves. Hope for a glorious future for the state of Israel is as strong as ever.

Not For Prophets Only

By Keith Green

In the midst of the current interest concerning prophets and prophecy, we wish to share the following testimony by Keith Green. Although this article was written nearly a decade ago, it speaks to the current prophetic movement as accurately and effectively as if it had been written with the current movement in mind.

It all started in a small Bible school that my wife, Melody, and I went to during our first year as believers. One of the teachers had recently been to a seminar where the speaker had gone through all the aspects of each of the gifts and callings on men and women of God. He had talked about teachers, administrators and so on.

The teacher in that class was very excited about sharing all the aspects and characteristics of a prophet to the class. He started reading his notes from the seminar he had been to, and he read things like, "Prophets are very moody, they are often hard to get along with, they see things in black and white and might seem to lack compassion. They are often considered to be rude and brash, but inside they mean very well, and only want to share the truth - but they don't seem to mind if they step on people's toes while they do it.

While our teacher was reading from these notes, I'm sure he didn't notice the smile spreading across my face from ear to ear. Why, everything he was reading fit me to a tee! I just couldn't believe my ears ... at last, I had found my calling!

To top all this off, when our teacher was through reading, he turned to the class, pointed his finger at me and said, "My friends, we have a prophet in our midst!" Well, that was it - I was hooked. That's all I needed to hear! It took the Lord about another five years to completely deflate my head from the delusions that innocent and well-meaning Bible teacher helped to promote in my life. A lot of what he shared was true, but it certainly needed a good deal of warning to go with it.

The Prophet Syndrome

This article is sort of a confession. You see, I have struggled with the problem of being labeled a "prophet" for the past six years, and that's quite a long time, considering I've only been a Christian for about seven. I must admit it has kind of a nice ring to it - the word prophet - but I think it causes a lot more trouble than it's worth.

Because we at Last Days have a nationally-known ministry, many people show up at our door from all over the country and want to see first hand what's going on. From time to time though, someone shows up with a "word from the Lord." (I'm not trying to be sarcastic. We've had some pretty interesting characters show up at the door.)

We had one guy show up and when we invited him to eat a meal with us, he said that God had told him not to eat. We asked him, "How long?" He said he didn't know, but he wasn't supposed to eat. Another time, we had a guy with long robes show up who said that God told him to come and tell all the ministries around here that the Garden of Eden was in the state of Georgia!

These are some extreme examples of something I think is a very common problem in the church today - young people (usually men) who believe that God has raised them up to tell people what is wrong with their ministry or their lives, or both! These people are usually hurt, independent, talkative, stubborn, unteachable and unyielding. I know, because I have been one of them!

What is a true prophet?

God does speak to His people today - not just His special ones - but to all His people. He speaks to them in many ways - through the Holy Spirit who lives in them, through men and women of God in their church and around them, but mainly through the Word of God, the Bible. Whenever the Holy Spirit gives us guidance, it will always line up with the Word God, or it isn't from Him.

As I was studying His precious Word over the past year, it suddenly dawned on me that my whole view of myself and my calling was all backwards. So many people had told me that I was a "prophet" over the years that I believed "they must be right." I saw myself as a spokesman to my generation in the church - not the spokesman, but one of a number, chosen by God to be used to correct and exhort believers to obey God and thus win this world for Jesus.

It's not that I no longer believe that I'm called to do that, it's just that now I see that every believer is called to do that - to call all Christians everywhere to obey God and win the world for Christ!

The main thing that God has shown me through all this is: I'm not called to be a prophet, I'm called to be a CHRISTIAN - a servant of the living God! That is the HIGHEST calling that anyone can realize. And the most beautiful thing has happened in my heart. My whole goal in life has completely changed - the only thing that I want to achieve, is to have the Lord tell me when I stand before Him, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant! Not, "Well done, thou good and faithful prophet."

To be a Christian, to live up to that wonderful word - that is my ONLY goal. After all, Paul starts out that meaty book of Romans with these words: "Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle." Not "... an apostle of Jesus Christ, called to be a servant." No, Paul had his priorities straight - he knew what went first!

A lesson to be learned

I'm sure you know someone in your fellowship who has all the earmarks of being a potential "prophet." They don't beat around the bush, but they say exactly what's on their mind. They aren't very popular, but they don't care because they believe that they're "being persecuted for righteousness' sake." They're always finding fault with almost everything and rarely have a kind word to say.

And the thing that usually happens to these misguided souls with all the rough edges is that somebody tells them, "Hey! I know what you are, you're a PROPHET!" And then they say to themselves, "Wow! That's why people are so down on me all the time! Why that's just the way they treated Elijah and Jeremiah!"

And then they start getting "words from the Lord" and all the rest that comes along with being a "prophet." The saddest thing about all this is whenever someone is brash, obnoxious, or loud, we label him a "prophet."

But you know, deep down inside, most of them really do want to please God, but now they're so insulated from criticism and protected from rebuke (because they think they're a rejected "prophet") that no one can help them or reach them. And unless God intervenes in their lives, they cannot be used in any long-term way because of their unteachable, uncorrectable spirit.

One of the main problems for them is that most of what they see as wrong, really IS wrong! But they have little love or grace to share the truth with - they just aim their big cannons and BOOM! They blow their hearers to bits.

I'm not trying to say that what I wrote or preached in the past was wrong. It's just that some of it could have been said a little differently - and with a lot more grace. Even so, if the Lord says to speak out on an issue, I'll be glad and ready to do it - but I must do it as a servant, not as a prophet. That is Jesus' way.

Hallelujah for the freedom that comes with repentance! Oh, how He makes us new, forgiving us and changing us into His glorious image!

The Coming Reformation of Righteousness

by Ken Unger

The Lord has made wonderful promises to His end time Church; promises of restoration, abundant fruitfulness and prosperity. He's predicted a Reformation of Righteousness that leaves no aspect of life untouched by the blessing of God:

"I will restore the fortunes of Jacob and have compassion on his dwelling places; and the city shall be rebuilt... and the palace shall stand on its rightful place. And from them shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of those who make merry; and I will multiply them, and they shall not be insignificant. Their children also shall be as formerly, and their congregation shall be established before Me; ... and their leaders shall be one of them, and their ruler shall come from their midst; ... In the latter days you will understand this" (Jer. 30:13-24).

The implication is clear. The Church will disciple the nations, leading them into the incredible blessings that only come to those who obey what Jesus taught. For this to happen, there is something He must do for us. As it stands the Church is neither ready, equipped nor capable of achieving His purposes. It's too crippled to be an effective army.

The Church has been beaten, bound up and abused. In many places it's too embattled to do anything beyond survival. The sheep have been wounded by the shepherds; the shepherds ravaged by wolves disguised as sheep; and the satanic lion is free to devour at will. A disabled soldier can't fight, nor a lame tradesman build, nor a blind physician heal.

Most of Christ's Body has also been weakened by the spiritual junk food of dispensational theology. It's a belief system which shamelessly compromises the scriptures, spurning the notion that God still heals or has a crucial purpose for His Church in the latter days. And without that hope many embrace a shallow, escapist eschatology; one that asks no more of us than to break a few bad habits and stay in a celestial holding pattern, furiously circling just off the ground of hard core reality until Jesus returns to rescue us from our defeated, sin scarred existence.

Many are too weak and fearful for anything more rigorous. But for those who embrace Kingdom Christianity God predicts far better:

"I know the thoughts I have for you, says the Lord, thoughts of peace and not of evil, to give you a future and a hope. Then you will call upon Me and go and pray to Me, and I will listen to you. And you will seek Me and find Me when you search for Me with all your heart. And I will be found by you and I will bring you back from captivity" (Jer. 29:11-14A).

Marvelous things come to those who wholeheartedly seek Him. Scriptures say we've not even conceived of the glorious things He's prepared for those who love Him; things not limited to Heaven. Eternal life begins now for those who truly know Christ. And the Lord's calling those who met Him into an intimate knowledge of Him; the kind that enables us to fulfill our highest and noblest destinies.

For that to happen He must heal our wounds. Until we're mentally, spiritually and emotionally healthy His purposes will be hampered, His hands literally tied by the ropes of His people's bondages. for much of the church is so unhealthy and babes born into it wouldn't be disciplined or healed. And the Lord loves the lost too much to allow that.

Thank God He'll feed our hunger for healing. He can heal us, body, soul and spirit:

"For I will restore you to health and I will heal you of your wounds, declares the Lord" (Jer. 30:17A). It's crucial to His end time plan (vs. 24). And God always keeps His promises.

"For I will restore you to health and I will heal you of your wounds, declares the Lord" (Jer. 30:17A). It's crucial to His end time plan. And God always keeps His promises.

Without a reformation of righteousness the Church is not ready for revival. If the Lord sent a harvest of new Christians we wouldn't have enough spiritual nurseries to keep them alive let alone raise them to maturity. But that is not the only reason we are not ready for revival. The Church is too wounded to evangelize, disciple or heal the broken people God wants to reach.

The reason for this is simple. Most people do not come to Christ when they are doing well; they come when they are usually pretty messed up. And unfortunately, few churches are equipped to heal these walking wounded. That is why any church that wants to be used in the upcoming harvest must face its own people's need for healing and prepare to minister to it. Only then will the world stop saying, "Physician heal thyself." Only then can God send us the harvest for which we're praying.

Secular man faces unparalleled problems. Multiple divorce, working mothers, work addicted fathers, abortions, adultery, AIDS, homosexuality, alcoholism, pornography, drug abuse, money abuse, rageaholics, food addictions, rape, violent assault and painful rejection have decimated our society. No one is untouched by slavery to sin and disease. If we think we can lead these people through the sinner's prayer and persuade them that they don't have to resolve the damage sin did to them we're consigning them to an early spiritual death. The Lord loves the lost too much to send revival before we can bring them to health and maturity.

It is estimated that one in three people need serious psychological help. One in six of us will spend time in a psychiatric hospital. And of those who enter the secular mental health system I'm told 93% depend on counselors or drugs for the rest of their lives. Sadly, the Church hasn't done much better with the hurting. We are known as the only army that shoots its wounded. No wonder people today are so hopeless. There is a hunger for healing that medicine and psychology can't satisfy. If we can't offer them Christ's true healing, New Age religion will offer them its twisted version, and they'll be worse off instead of better.

But there is good news. Though many Christians have also been wounded by sin that very fact contains the seeds for hope. It is as if the Lord allowed the Church to get inoculated so we can provide the spiritual medicine our sin sick world needs. As we get the healing we need, we'll also receive the training and sensitivity necessary. Any church that learns to restore the health of its members is preparing to heal the hurting world in which we live. Better yet, the healing God creates for His people a contagious quality of Christian life and a spontaneous flow of His love. It uncorks the fountains of life, shedding abroad rivers of living water to slake the thirsty people in the dry, arid spiritual deserts of our modern world.

In the wake of that, revival can safely come. And when it comes, (when, not if) God's people will be ready, willing and enthusiastically able to participate in it. For once they have touched His healing Love they will be compelled to pass it on no matter what the cost.

Reader disagrees with Gene Edwards' article

I am writing out of concern over an article found in the May 1990 issue of The Forerunner ("The Early Church" by Gene Edwards). In this article there were several comparisons between "The Early Church" and "Christendom." The character-vehicle of the this thesis, "Nat," met with some of modern Christianity's "paraphernalia" and "had set his course, not toward knowing Jesus Christ, but toward tradition. Nat had set his course 180 degrees in the opposite direction from the life and experience which was known by the first century believer."

It is my contention that Nat's course would be totally different from the life and experience of first century believers primarily because he was born in the twentieth century and not because of his getting dressed up to go to a church.

Further, I believe that Christianity is a life lived in the context of the historical settings and cultures of the people who embrace it. It is not bound in the strict sense to the identical forms, mediums and customs of any particular century.

Go back to living-room floors, reject the modern idea of "pastor," forget nice clothes, steeples, stained glass windows, pews, and pulpits if you want. But leading others down some rebellious chase for the past calling it "reclaiming the Early Church" still is not going to make a group of people in 1990 squatting on a living-room floor in Anytown, USA without hymnals "The Early Church."

Three Tabernacles

By Jay Rogers

IT WAS THE MISSION OF JESUS, during the time when He walked as a man on the earth, to establish a new order of worship for all true believers. Regarding true worship of the Father, Jesus said: "Those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth" (John 4:24).

It is important for us today to determine what "true worship" is and not hold to any preconceived notions about what God desires as a display of devotion to Him. Preconceived ideas about worship have a way of clouding the plan of God for our lives and the Church.

The Old Testament histories recount the journey of God's people out of Egypt into the Promised Land of Canaan as God Himself sought to create a glorious kingdom out of a nation of slaves. From the wilderness of sin, Egypt, to the center of God's presence, the Holy of Holies, was an arduous journey and a period of preparation for God's people.

In studying the different types of worship in the Old Testament, we can get an understanding of the form of worship that God desires for us today. We can also see that much of the Church continues in a form that is inferior to the true worship which was the mission of Jesus to establish.

The Tabernacle in the Wilderness

We are admonished in Hebrews 3:7-8, "Today if you hear His voice, do not harden your hearts as when they provoked Me, as in the day of trial in the wilderness."

What exactly was this provocation?

From the very beginning God desired to have a people to praise Him. When the Jews came out of Egypt into the wilderness, God instructed them through Moses that they were to be a kingdom of priests, a holy nation; each believer would have the privilege of true worship, which is ministering to Him.

God instructed them, "Now then, if you will indeed obey My voice and keep My covenant, then you shall be My own possession among all the peoples, for all the earth is mine; and you shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exodus 19:5,6).

But instead of pressing into God, the people shrank back. When Moses delivered the covenant that they were to obey in the form of the Ten Commandments, God also displayed His great power:

"And all the people perceived the thunder and the lightning flashes and the sound of the trumpet and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they trembled and stood at a distance. Then they said to Moses, 'Speak to us yourself and we will listen; but let not God speak to us lest we die'" (Exodus 20:18,19).

True worship is the process of entering God's Presence, hearing His voice and obeying Him. Sounds very simple, doesn't it? But the Hebrew people were too stubborn to have it this way and they provoked the Lord to anger. Instead of taking a great honor upon themselves they were afraid of God and asked Moses to be their mediator.

What was the end result of this provocation?

God honored the people's desire to have a mediator by choosing Moses, Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel to minister to God in a complicated ritual of daily sacrifices. The Levitical Priesthood was established to do the work of the ministry and only Moses was allowed to come directly into God's Presence. The people were not even allowed to draw near to God and the elders could only worship at a distance. The God of Israel hoped that the drudgery of service in a ritualistic system of religion would cause the people to yearn for something more.

Even within this system, there was still a provision available for those who would still repent and serve God. When two men in the camp who were not a part of the seventy elders of Israel began to prophesy, Joshua was indignant and asked Moses to restrain them. Moses knew the heart cry of God, however, and replied, "Are you jealous for my sake? Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, that the Lord would put His Spirit upon them!" (Numbers 11:29)

So we see that even under the Old Covenant, God provided a way out of legalism. We see that from the very beginning God desired all His people to have His Spirit - that they might know Him and be His prophets.

God summoned Moses to Mount Horeb (Sinai) to receive instructions for the construction of a tabernacle. The Tabernacle in the Wilderness was to be a burdensome system of worship requiring bloody sacrifices day after day as a continual reminder to the people of their carnal nature. Under this system, only Aaron, the High Priest could enter God's Presence, and then only once a year.

But even while God was giving Moses these instructions, the people had devised their own system of worship. They fashioned a golden calf and danced around it singing, "This is your god, O Israel, who brought you out of the land of Egypt!" (Exodus 19:8) The Hebrews were merely imitating the idol worship they had seen in Egypt. In their time of slavery God had become a concept, the religion of Egypt had become acceptable to them. Although they had heard about the God of their ancestors, they did not know Him.

"And the Lord said to Moses, 'I have seen this people, and behold, they are an obstinate people'" (Exodus 32:9). God's anger burned against them and Moses had to plead with God to keep Him from destroying them. Yet even in His anger, God promised Israel that there would always be a prophet in the land like Moses to speak the Word of the Lord to them. Ultimately God Himself came as a man in an attempt to secure a remnant of Israel who desired true worship. As we shall see, this was a long and arduous process.

Today under the New Covenant, Jesus has made a way for all people to come to the Father. The old system of worship under the Law is no longer required since Jesus' death on the cross fulfilled the requirements of the Law. We are now able to enter into God's Presence through a new and living way. Through the Blood of Jesus we can worship God in the Spirit.

Yet like Israel, the Church has done the same thing to provoke God. Instead of the life and freedom available through the Holy Spirit, many churches have imposed a dead system of religion on the people. A liturgy has been invented and an endless list of prayers, creeds, and legalistic proceedings abound which are nothing more than an Old Covenant form of religion.

Many churches have set apart a class of Priests who are responsible for ministering to God. The people, or the laity, are viewed as being separate from the Priests and do not share the same responsibility to minister to God. Although there is some truth in this system, it is still a man-made form of religion. Dead formalism is not God's plan under the New Covenant and it is impossible to breathe new life into an order which has passed away.

It is God's plan and purpose for every believer to push on into perpetual communion with Him. God desires for us to soften our hearts - to open our ears to hear His voice - and to gladly obey His commandments.

The Tabernacle of David

Five hundred years after the Lord had established the Tabernacle of Moses as a place of worship, King David finally succeeded in driving the Jebusites out of Jerusalem. David captured the stronghold of Zion and lived there calling it the City of David. David fortified Mount Zion desiring to bring in the Ark of the Covenant, which had been in the Tabernacle of Moses on Mount Gibeon.

"Now David built houses for himself in the City of David; and he prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched a tent for it. Then David said, 'No one is to carry the ark of God but the Levites; for the Lord chose them to carry the ark of God, and to minister to Him forever ... Now David was clothed with a robe of fine linen with all the Levites who were carrying the ark, and the singers and Chenaniah the leader of the singing with the singers ...

"Thus all Israel brought up the ark of the covenant of the Lord with shouting, and with the sound of the horn, with trumpets, with loud-sounding cymbals, with harps and lyres ... And they brought in the ark of God and placed it inside the tent which David had pitched for it, and they offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before God. When David finished offering the burnt offerings and the peace offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the Lord. And he distributed to everyone of Israel, both man and woman, to everyone a loaf of bread and a portion of meat and a raisin cake" (1 Chronicles 15:1,2,26-28;16:1-3).

What a contrast this was to the provocation in the wilderness! In contrast to the gloom and doom of Mount Sinai that led to the establishment of Moses' Tabernacle, the celebration on Mount Zion was a joyful occasion. We are given samples of the songs that Israel sang on Mount Zion in the Psalms:

Praise Him with trumpet sound;
Praise Him with harp and lyre.
Praise Him with timbrel and dancing;
Praise Him with stringed instruments and pipe.
Praise Him with loud cymbals;
Praise Him with resounding cymbals.
Let everything that has breath praise the Lord.
Praise the Lord!
(Psalm 150:3-6)

From this description in Psalms we see a festive celebration. God desired His people to be joyful. The presence of the Ark of the Covenant, now in the open, indicates that God desired to dwell among His people. The God of Israel was shattering the religious notion that He was like the pagan gods who lived only in temples. No, He is an all-present God who desires to dwell among men and He desires all of us to live and move and have our being in Him.

The important point to consider here is that Mount Zion was only an indication of something greater to come. The worship on Mount Zion was open for the people to observe, but the musicians - the worship leaders - were still a part of the Levitical Priesthood.

Although the people were allowed to take part in singing the high praises of God, only the Levites were able to take the responsibility of handling the ark and the playing of the instruments. Then David made offerings to God, blessed the people, "And he distributed to Israel, both man and woman, to everyone a loaf of bread and a portion of meat and a raisin cake" (1 Chronicles 16:3).

Doesn't this sound like many of the Church's meetings of today? We begin our meetings with a few lively praise songs, interrupted by the worship leader with "pep talks" (C'mon praise Him! Lift your voices!). This is followed by two or three worship songs. Maybe at some point one, two or three of the more "spiritual" people in the church will give a prophetic utterance. This is followed by prayer and a sermon from the pastor, then the offering and the announcements - and finally the end of the service when people finally get to interact in fellowship - (this is the part of the service that usually has the most life to it).

Although there is more life in this type of a meeting than in the dull, repetitious, liturgical services that resemble the worship in the Tabernacle of Moses (see Numbers 7:11-88), God has an even higher plan for us than this! We should be careful that we do not become so satisfied with what is good that we miss God's best. God desires for each one of us to walk behind the veil and enter into His Presence. Hebrews 7:20 tells us that we are able to do this because "Jesus has entered as a forerunner for us, having become a High Priest forever according to the Order of Melchizedek."

From the Epistle to the Hebrews we can know a couple of things about the Order of Melchizedek. First, it isn't a Priesthood determined by patrilineal descent, that is, it doesn't matter who you are. You can be a Jew or a Gentile. You don't have to be genetically related to Abraham, Levi, or Aaron. You don't have to be in the full time ministry; you don't even have to be very old in the Lord. God is no respecter of persons.

Second, the Levitical Priesthood is far inferior to the Order of Melchizedek. The High Priest under the Old Covenant only served for a period of a year. At the end of the year the High Priest came into the Presence of God once - and then resigned his office. But Jesus Christ is a High Priest forever, according to the Order of Melchizedek, and He ministers in the Presence of God continually. Under the New Covenant this Priesthood has come upon every child of God.

In the time of King David, the minstrel office was a part of the Levitical Priesthood - a priesthood inferior to the Order of Melchizedek, which is now available to every believer. This becomes significant when we find that there is no ministry of singing or of music in the New Testament. The fact that no musical instruments are ever mentioned in New Testament worship does not rule out music ministry. However, the absence of the minstrel office does indicate that the responsibility to minister to God has come to each and every believer.

In the New Testament, the office of worship is the responsibility of every believer - not the pastor, not the worship leader. We are not to come to be entertained or to judge "how good" the worship was in a particular service. The worship "in spirit and truth" which Jesus referred to in John 4:24 is a state of heart preparation. Jesus said, "God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship in spirit and truth."

This should be a festive time; but it should also be a sober time. We should be excited about what God intends to do; but we should also cultivate a healthy fear of missing God. In view of God's holiness we should be worshipping Him in reverence and awe. Yet there is so much noise and so little of His Presence in most of our meetings that we should wonder if we are missing something.

Some may argue that we already have a "measure" of the Presence of God in our meetings - that there have been outpourings and blessings that indicate we are experiencing a "measure" of revival. Many confuse the hype of a "good" service with the actual Presence of God. We are told that we can "just enter into the Presence of the Lord," but there is a world of difference between a few neat little feelings and the experience of entering into the actual Presence of God.

Are you prepared to enter into true worship?

The Temple of Solomon

After bringing the Ark to Mount Zion, David went back to Mount Gibeon to offer bloody sacrifices to God.

"And he left Zadok the high priest before the tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon, to offer burnt offerings to the Lord on the altar of burnt offering continually morning and evening, even according to all that is written in the law of the Lord, which He commanded Israel" (1 Chronicles 16:39-40).

Even though the Ark of the Covenant had been moved to Zion, the daily sacrifices were still being carried out at Mount Gibeon because the law required them to be made. After seeing this, David inquired whether or not he should build a temple on Mount Zion which would be the permanent dwelling place of God. Through the prophet Nathan God spoke, saying that David was not to build the house of God; that task would fall upon David's son, Solomon.

Solomon realized that it was not for God's benefit that this house was built, "Behold, heaven and the highest heaven cannot contain Thee; how much less this house I have built" (2 Chronicles 6:18), but it was for man's benefit that God desired to dwell among His people.

Solomon built the Temple of the Lord on Mount Moriah, a hill to the north of Mount Zion. It required the work of over 150,000 men and took 20 years to build. The gold, silver and bronze utensils and ornaments that adorned the temple were in such a great quantity that their worth was beyond measure. The priests sacrificed so many sheep and oxen for the burnt offering that they were beyond numbering. Then the priests and the singers brought the ark of the covenant to Mount Moriah. They sang and praised God with musical instruments and the temple was filled with a cloud and the glory of the Lord filled the temple. Then Solomon stood at the altar and facing the people he prayed.

"Now when Solomon had finished praying, fire came down from heaven and consumed the burnt offering and the sacrifices; and the glory of the Lord filled the house. And the priests could not enter into the house of the Lord, because the glory of the Lord filled the Lord's house. And all the sons of Israel, seeing the the fire come down and the glory of the Lord upon the house, bowed down on the pavement with their faces to the ground, and they worshipped and gave praise to the Lord, saying, 'Truly He is good, truly His lovingkindness is everlasting.'"

When the Presence of the Lord came in its fulness, even the priests were unable to enter the temple to minister. The division between the priests and the people had been erased. All Israel worshipped and gave praise together. Once the presence of God came in its fulness, these divisions were unnecessary.

It is interesting to note that during the time when David had moved the ark from Mount Gibeon to Mount Zion, the daily ritualistic sacrifices went on as usual. The Law still required them to be made even though the ark had moved on to Jerusalem. Later Solomon moved the ark to Mount Moriah.

This should be an illustrated warning to those of us who like to camp around doctrines, traditions, rituals and formats of worship. While we go on with our programs and rituals, God is doing something new today. He will not be constrained by the religious systems devised by men. We may like our present forms of worship, but where has the ark gone? Where is God's Presence abiding?

"An hour is coming and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth; for such people the Father seeks to be His worshippers" (John 4:23).

The Charismatic Renewal of the past three decades is over - the Pentecostal and Charismatic churches of the world today stand at the crossroads. The new awakening that is coming will be a revival of the actual Presence of God. When the Holy One comes, He will come with more power than we have yet experienced. The Lord Jesus Christ shall come suddenly to His temple and there will be a return to true worship.

"And the Lord whom you seek shall come suddenly to His temple, and the messenger of the covenant, in whom you delight, behold, He is coming," says the Lord of hosts. "But who can endure the day of His coming? And who can stand when He appears? For He is like a refiner's fire and a fuller's soap. And he will sit as a smelter and purifier of silver, and He will purify the sons of Levi and refine them like gold and silver, so that they may present to the Lord offerings in righteousness" (Malachi 3:1-3).

In this century, the gifts of the Holy Spirit have been restored to the Church. Many Christians have witnessed miracles and signs demonstrating that Jesus is alive today. But it is important not to confuse the gifts of the Holy Spirit with the Presence of God. It is true that God's Presence is almost always accompanied by a supernatural display of power, but gifts may be displayed with or without the baptism of the Holy Spirit.

As evidence of this, we see that in the New Testament all of the gifts of the Holy Spirit that were available after Pentecost were available before Pentecost. Even before Jesus died, was raised from the dead and poured out the Holy Spirit, His disciples healed the sick and cast out demons, the dead were raised and lepers were cleansed.

This is true because the Holy Spirit has no gifts of His own to give. Every one of the gifts mentioned in the New Testament are given by Jesus. We call them "the gifts of the Holy Spirit," but they are just as much "the gifts of Jesus." In Ephesians 4:7,8, we are instructed:

"But to each one of us grace was given according to Christ's gift. Therefore it says:
'When He ascended on high,
He led captive a host of captives,
And He gave gifts to men.'"

The gifts were all available before Pentecost because they emanated from Jesus. In fact, the only gift not manifested before the outpouring of the Holy Spirit is speaking in tongues. And even here we are admonished:

"If I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but do not have love, I have become a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal" (1 Corinthians 13:1).

This is an allusion to the praise in the Tabernacle of David in Psalm 150:

Praise Him with loud cymbals;
Praise Him with resounding cymbals.

While speaking in tongues is something that every Christian should desire, the gift of tongues - or the display of any gift - when not accompanied by love is just a lot of noise to God. The true worship of God is not so much characterized by the display of gifts as it is by devotion to Him. The baptism of the Holy Spirit is characterized by a passionate desire to experience the Presence of God. The baptism of the Holy Spirit is a baptism of love; and if you haven't experienced this love, then you are not filled with the Spirit.

Those who have really tasted something of the Manifest Presence of God speak only of loving Jesus. Their lives are so overflowing with His love that no one doubts that they have had this experience. The love that they give to others is all the evidence they need to show.

Have you experienced the Manifest Presence of Jesus? Do you have a burden to see true revival? Are you distraught at the current state of the Church?

If you are grieved at the shallowness and the hype that is being passed off as the power of God, know that God is calling you to stand in the gap. Biblical concepts are being taught, hollow words are being spoken, yet God is raising up saints who will not be satisfied with doctrines until they are backed up by actual spiritual experience.

If you share this burden, know that you can be instrumental in bringing about revival. Pray that God would reveal Himself to you in this added dimension. Pray that the people around you would catch a desire to experience His Presence and never be satisfied until they see the fulness of His glory.

If you begin to adopt this burden as a lifestyle of prayer, you will have entered into the Priesthood of Melchizedek. God will begin to change you and will use you to reach others around you in ways that you never dreamed were possible.

Restoration of the Church

By Arthur Wallis

"Remember not the former things nor consider the things of old.
Behold, I am doing a new thing.
Now it springs forth,
do you not perceive it?"
(Isaiah 43:18,19)

In relation to this theme of revival and spiritual awakening, let us first survey the past, then view some of the significant trends of the present, and finally say a word about the prospects of the future.

If we are to understand what God is doing in these days - if we are to perceive His "new thing" for our day - we need to study the past. Not merely from history books, with their limited human viewpoint, but we must study history as we have light cast upon it by the Spirit through God's Holy Word.

Let us take a brief panoramic survey of the work of God's Spirit in the years that are past. As we scan the centuries, let us try to discover the principles on which God has been operating. What has He really been after during the years of the Church's history?

Obviously, this is a large subject which could occupy volumes, but here we wish simply to point out what has been the master strategy behind the successive quickenings of the Spirit that have blessed the Church in the past. In a word, we want to show that every wave of spiritual blessing has had in view not only the immediate renewal of spiritual life in that generation, but also the recovery of spiritual truth.

In all the great spiritual movements through the years, the Lord has been seeking to recover lost truth and bring His people back to original Apostolic Christianity. This reformation, or "recovery," aspect of God's moving through the centuries is unmistakable - and usually has been a balancing thrust in one or other of two directions. Since truth and experience are inseparable and must be in balance if either is to reach its divine objective, we see the Lord moving to emphasize either doctrine and principle, or purity and fullness of life and power.

But whatever may be the emphasis or particular truth or phase of experience involved, in the mind and purpose of God there has always been one objective in view. That objective is a Church - washed by the water of the Word of God - which shall fully experience and fully express Christ, not only in the earth, but in the whole universe. Let us go back and trace through history this principle in action:

In the New Testament we have a clear picture of the early Church. It wasn't a perfect Church because it was composed of human beings, and they are never perfect. However, the early Church was perfect in constitution, perfect in the revelation of God's mind, received through His holy apostles and prophets.

They had complete light and thus had no need to progress into fuller revelation in the ensuing centuries.

Through the apostles, the early Church received in that first century a complete revelation of the mind of God. This revelation is, of course, contained in our New Testament. But also, as they walked in the light of this revelation, not only the revelation but they themselves became a model of God's intention.

But alas, they did not always walk in the light that they had received, and things often went wrong. However, when this happened, the situation was dealt with in a way directed by God, and that also constitutes a pattern for restoration. Thus, not only in doctrine and principle, but also in practice, we have been given a perfect guide in the pages of the New Testament.

As the years went by, the Church, which had been born in persecution, thrived in persecution. As with Israel of old, in bondage in Egypt, the more the Church was persecuted the more she flourished and multiplied. The blood of the martyrs was then, and ever has been, the seed of the Church.

Finding that this persecution was hastening God's purpose, the devil changed his tactics. In the fourth century A.D. Constantine became the Roman Emperor. He officially embraced Christianity. Whether he was genuinely converted to Christ is unknown, but nevertheless, Christianity became the legalized and accepted religion of the Roman Empire.

Instead of suffering the persecution of the state, the Church now enjoyed the patronage of the state. She was taken off her guard. The people of God, who had been watchful, prayerful, and faithful in the time of opposition, were now lulled into a false sense of security.

Without doubt, imperial favor brought the world into the Church, and what Satan had failed to do by persecution he achieved by patronage. As Dr. Edwin Orr has said, "It is one thing for the ship to be in the sea, but a different matter when the sea gets into the ship!" It is one thing for the Church to be in the world, but when the world gets into the Church a spiritual decline sets in.

Thus the conversion of Constantine, with the changes that this brought about - the introduction of practices of pagan origin, the rise of an ecclesiastical hierarchy based on the world system rather than Scriptures, etc. - led to a swift decline. The Church descended into the "dark" Middle Ages, and the light of true Christianity was almost extinguished.

However, even through those dark centuries, as E. H. Broadbent shows in The Pilgrim Church, the light of testimony was kept burning here and there. A few men like Francis of Assisi, arose as mighty giants of light and revelation, but the refreshing glow of their lives did not change the basic structure of things. There was no widespread movement, no general turning of the tide; and century after century, for a whole millennium, the tide of spiritual life continued to recede.

A thousand years from the time of Constantine brings us to the birth of a man destined to be one of the first great instruments in turning the tide. He was an Englishman, and his true name was John Wycliffe.

In the fourteenth century, England's only Bible was the Latin Vulgate. The common people, utterly ignorant of its contents, were living in abysmal spiritual darkness, until this brilliant Oxford scholar gave to England a version of God's Holy Word in the tongue of the common people.

This was God's first strategic move to bring back His Church to New Testament faith and practice. A return to Apostolic Christianity must of necessity be a return to the Word. Thus the foundation was laid. With Wycliffe there began that stirring of opposition to a Church that had become so lifeless. A great preacher as well as a great scholar, Wycliffe soon made his voice heard. His position and influence gave him the ear of the people as he began to question the unscriptural practices of the Church of that day. In the providence of God, a mighty wave of spiritual life began to roll in upon the shores of Christendom - the Recovery had begun!

Following Wycliffe, we have the spiritual movement known as the Lollards. They were the "poor priests" that Wycliffe sent out to take the simple message of the Gospel from place to place. They were humble itinerant preachers. And in the century following Wycliffe, so successful was this movement that at the height of its power fifty percent of the population of England were either Lollards or in sympathy with them - a remarkable movement of the Holy Spirit.

They preached the Word, which contained the message of life, and the hungry people received it. The Lollards were even more outspoken than Wycliffe. God was paving more outspoken than Wycliffe. God was paving the way for the great movement that took place in the following century.

The sixteenth century saw the raising up of Martin Luther, John Calvin, and other great leaders. Under these Reformation giants, the Church arose from its awful bondage, and set herself free from the ecclesiastical tyranny of centuries.

The glorious Reformation broke over Europe, bringing into clear light the great truth of justification by faith. People began to understand the genius of the Gospel of God's grace which had so long been obscured by a doctrine of salvation by works.

The work of reformation, however, was by no means complete. Although the reformed churches had abandoned much that was plainly contrary to Scripture, they still retained very much which was traditional - things that belonged more to the old order from which they had been delivered than to the New Testament Christianity toward which they were groping.

In the century following the Reformation, we have the great Puritan movement. God raised up expositors, men mighty in the scriptures. They utilized and expanded the light that had come through the reformation. The emphasis, of course, was on the importance of believers being well-grounded in the great doctrines of Scripture.

The hearts of God's people were expanding as God was giving them more truth, more light, and more understanding. More things that belonged to the past were put away, and earnest hearts began to grope forward again to a true position in the light of the teaching of God's Holy Word. Out of the Puritan Revival came two strategic Church movements which were significant developments in the move back to Apostolic Christianity.

The Congregational Movement was a reaction against interference in the affairs of the local Church from an ecclesiastical hierarchy. They had recovered the truth of the autonomy of each local church, its right to order its own affairs under the direct Headship of Christ. The Baptist Movement which was closely connected, also stood on this ground, while going a step further in emphasizing the truths involved in the believer's baptism by immersion.

The force of the Puritan Movement was spent as the eighteenth century dawned, and things seemed to be going from bad to worse. Too much emphasis on doctrine had no doubt caused a neglect of the "life" factor, and death was once again setting in. Religion was at a dangerously low ebb. Those who were supposed to be spiritual leaders had become corrupt and licentious; the common people were immoral and blasphemous.

It was then that God raised up two great men. They were Anglican clergymen; one, John Wesley, the other, George Whitefield. They were the two instruments in His hands for the great evangelical awakening that saved England from the horrors of the French Revolution.

The emphasis of the Methodist Revival, as it sometimes has been called, was at least threefold:

First, a bold assertion of instantaneous salvation by faith, accompanied by the inner witness, or assurance of the Holy Spirit. This was followed, secondly, by a strong emphasis on the subjective side of Christian life - holiness of heart and life. God was bringing His people back to the doctrine of heart purity and sanctity of walk.

Thirdly, there was the recovery of the truth - startling to the people of those days - that it was not necessary for a man to be formally educated and "ordained" to preach the Word. Any man who knew the commission of heaven could go forth as God's ambassador.

The requirements of a "consecrated building" in which to preach was also exposed as a dead tradition - why not preach in the open air as the Master did?

Thus Whitefield, Wesley, and their followers, under the open canopy of heaven, preached to vast throngs, and multitudes were swept into the Kingdom. Another great step in the Recovery was consummated!

But by the turn of the century this wave also had spent itself, and again the spiritual tide had receded. The need of revival was great. Here and there in the early part of the century there were stirrings outpourings of the Spirit in the United States, followed the next year by a similar outpouring in Ulster and in Wales almost simultaneously.

The revival in Ulster spread quickly to Scotland and soon was making its impact felt in different parts of England. God had again come in gracious power.

This century witnessed a number of significant movements in the great purpose of God to bring His people back to Apostolic Christianity. One preceded the mid-century revival by a number of years, others were the products of it. How different these movements were, and yet each made its own contribution to the progress of spiritual recovery.

The first was the Brethren Movement commencing about 1830, emphasizing the sufficiency and not merely the infallibility of the Book. They recovered the truth that the Bible reveals all that we need to know for both our daily walk and the ordering of our Church affairs. They saw that the truth of the one Body of Christ, as composed of all true believers, was the antidote to sectarianism. They also recovered the practical implications of the truth of the priesthood of all believers. Here was a serious attempt to return fully to New Testament Christianity.

Unlike many of the other recovery movements, the Brethren, to a very large extent, embraced all that had previously been recovered, besides adding the deeply significant points listed above.

However, again there came to be too much emphasis on doctrine, and out of the great revival of 1858 and 1859 there came further sweeping waves of refreshing heavenly life. These could be viewed as a divine reaction to the Brethren tendency to overemphasize objective teaching, thus supplementing the objective truth of what we are positionally, with the subjective truth of what we should be experientially.

The 1859 Revival in England brought a great wave of evangelistic fervor and missionary enterprise. Believers broke through denominational barriers and demonstrated in home evangelism and missionary outreach the oneness of the body that the Brethren were teaching.

In the midst of this wave of evangelism, the Salvation Army was born. A child of Methodism, the Salvation Army re-emphasized Wesley's teaching on holiness and grasped what most of God's people had missed - the social implications of the Gospel. They had a concern for the underprivileged, the down-and-out, the underdog. With dauntless courage, heroic zeal, and challenging self-sacrifice, they preached the simple Gospel of God's grace and ministered to all who were in need.

Another wave of heavenly life focused on developing the great truths governing the personal victorious life, and especially the emphasis on the New Testament doctrine of the believer's union with Christ in His death and resurrection while the believer was still on this earth.

The Keswick Movement was no doubt the principal expression of this life-giving wave of blessing, as is expressed in the writings of Hannah Whitall Smith, Andrew Murray, Jesse Penn-Lewis, and a host of others.

The present century commenced with a gracious movement of God's Spirit in the principality of Wales - the great 1904 Revival. A similar occurrence at the Azusa Street Mission in Pasadena, California followed in 1906. Out of that revival came the world-wide Pentecostal movement with its special emphasis upon the fullness of the Holy Spirit as a distinct experience, and its affirmation that the supernatural "gifts" of the Holy Spirit bestowed at Pentecost have never been permanently withdrawn from the Church.

This movement we could view as another supplementary reaction to the great recovery principles of the Brethren Movement. It may be a surprise to some to know that the Pentecostals have the fastest expanding missionary movement in existence today.

As we see what God has done in past centuries, it becomes obvious that we should not think that any movement has recovered everything, or has consummated the process. The attitude of - "We have got it all" - has too often characterized the more enlightened of God's people. In fact the more light we have, the greater the danger of falling into this trap. This is spiritual pride and inevitably results in the halting of further spiritual progress.

We must see each movement as part of a divinely instituted spiritual process that must go on till the consummation of the age. What a long way we have to go! Yet, there are signs today that God is working. Let us notice two significant trends.

First, God is stirring hearts all over the world with vision and faith for true unity - even that spiritual unity of the one Body of Christ - and, second, at the same time He is also moving in nearly every circle of Christian life creating a thirst for Himself, for revival, for the Holy Spirit.

Although still rather scattered and obviously in a formative stage, several amazing demonstrations of the strength of this movement are demanding the serious attention of the Christian world. Many firmly believe that it will not be too long before the eyes of millions of restless, thirsty Christians the world over will be opened to see the significance of what God is doing, and a sweeping revival of New Testament Christianity will burst upon us.

The Way Of the Eagles

By Bill Britton

Thunderheads rolled ominously over the Western hills, as the lightning bolts streaked across the sky. In a lush green valley below, two birds together in a barn lot reacted in different ways. Appearing similar in some ways, the birds were actually different as day and night. The chicken, with her head down and her beak busy in the trash of the barnyard, stepped up her pace as she scratched among the debris and filth searching for grubworms, scraps, and bits of corn. Knowing that time was short, and that she would soon have to take refuge in the safety of the barn, she worked frantically to get a meal before the full fury of the storm struck.

Quite strange was the appearance and actions of the other bird. He sat on a fence post, his head lifted to the sky and his sharp piercing eyes searching among the clouds. He stretched his wings lazily, and gusts of wind almost lifted him from his perch. It was a thrilling sight to see the magnificent wingspread, and it was easy to see that the feathers of his wings that had once been clipped back to prevent him from flying away, had once again grown to their full length. It was obvious that this bird was not a chicken.

On a mountain peak far above the farm, the farmer had taken an egg from the nest of an eagle. He had placed it under a sitting hen and hatched it out with a brood of little chickens. With much patience he had raised it and tried to tame it and make a domestic bird of it. But from the very first it had not fit in with the routine of the chicken lot. It walked alone, for it found no fellowship with the other little chicks nor the hen. And though from the day it had hatched out it had known no environment but the domestic life around it, yet from deep within something of the wild, free nature of the eagle cried out that this was not "home." As it grew larger, its wings had been clipped. Unable to fly, it sat in the barnyard daily, looking upward ... its body confined to the earth, but its heart in the sky. Not knowing why, unable to explain, yet knowing that there was a constant call from within to rise to greater heights in heavenly places above.

The young eagle stretched, the wings the farmer had failed to keep clipped, and as he did so his eyes caught sight of another great eagle riding the storm clouds. At that moment his ears caught the sound of a sharp piercing cry from the eagle in the sky. Suddenly a gust of wind caught under his outstretched wings and lifted him from the post. With a scream of victory and freedom, he left the barn lot forever and soared into the sky to meet those of his own kind.

I hope you can see what I am getting at. I'm not the least bit interested in eagles or any other kind of birds just for their own sake. And neither is God, but He sure has a lot to say about eagles in the Bible. And what He has to say is very significant in relation to His saints, the Body of Christ, those who are called to the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Eagles are symbolic of a certain type of person. "But they that wait upon the Lord ... shall mount up with wings as eagles" (Isaiah 40:31). The mounting up process is important and necessary to the sons of God who are to be conformed to the image of the Son of God and rule and reign with Him forever. But it only comes to those who will wait in His presence until the glory that shine from His face changes them from the image of the earthly into the image of their heavenly King.

Chickens are also symbolic of people. The only time chickens are referred to in the Bible, Jesus used them as a type of those people in Jerusalem who could not hear His message nor heed His call. They travelled in crowds, in broods, and they were earthbound. They kept their eyes upon the things of this world, scratching out a bare existence, and never lifted their heads to see Him who is from above. They ate the handouts that were cast to them, and searched greedily in the crowded barn lot for more to fill their bellies. For the chicken is by nature an unclean bird, and will eat dead things and unspeakable filth. They are bound to their existence on the right and on the left by fences, and are satisfied.

But not the eagle. For he has inherited a nature that cannot and will not survive in the confining captivity of the barnyard fowl. To be happy and to fulfill his purpose in life, he must be free to soar in the wide open spaces among the clouds of heaven. It seems lonely up there, for there are not many who will dare to rise to such heights, but the eagle does not care, for it is not in his nature to mingle with the multitudes or the majority.

There is much we can learn about our heavenly calling as we consider what the Bible says about eagles. Deuteronomy 32:11 tells us how the young eagle gets his introduction to the practice of soaring in the heavens. Let the eagle saints hear carefully. It says that the mother eagle "Stirs up her nest" - "flutters over her young" - "spreads abroad her wings" and "bears them on her wings." The time has come when the young eagle must leave the nest and strike out on his own.

ut looking down from the dizzy heights of the mountain peak, he is not ready to begin such a new and dangerous enterprise. He has "not passed this way before," and is reluctant to start out. So the mother eagle begins making things uncomfortable for him in the nest. The nest is so soft, so safe, so comfortable, and he is satisfied to remain there. None of this business of "trying out your wings" for him. So the mother eagle "stirs up the nest." She tears up his soft bed, breaks the twigs until the jagged ends stick out. In other words, she begins to make life very miserable for him in the place that had once seemed so nice.

Does it seem that God is dealing harshly with you? Is He tearing up your soft, comfortable nest? Does the place in God that once met such a need in your life now seem rough, tight, and uncomfortable? What is happening? The Lord is getting ready to push you off to heights that you never dreamed of. Do the jagged edges of that which was once such a comfort to you now stab you with grief and pain? Have you been wondering what the trouble was, and perhaps doubt that you were even in the will of God? Doubt no longer, but expect in faith for the next great work of God to come forth in your life. It is not the wrath of God trying to destroy you. It is the love and wisdom of our God making you willing to take another big step in the plan and purpose of God for His Church. We, by nature, love security. So the Lord has to make us utterly sick of our "nest" in order to make us willing to launch out into pioneer spiritual journeys in the heavenlies.

Still the young eagle does not leave the torn up nest. So the mother eagle begins to "flutter over her young." In other words, she begins beating him with her wings. the wings under which he once hid from all danger now have become his greatest enemy, it seems. What a terrible turn of events! To escape those terrible wings, he climbs to the side of the nest, and as she spreads her wings abroad, he hops upon her back. Where she goes now, he will go. For the nest has ceased to be the safe, warm home it once was. See the mother eagle as she soars high into the sky, with the little eagle hanging on for dear life. High up above the clouds she goes, and suddenly, without warning, she dives out from under the little eagle, leaving him hanging on to nothing. He screams with fear as he tumbles through the air, but instinctively his wings stretch out and begin trying to catch the air.

Down, down, down, he falls as his untried wings fail to function enough to hold him up. When it looks like all hope is lost and he is about to crash on the rocks below, the mother eagle swoops under him and bears him up on her wings. What a relief! Back into the heights of heaven they soar ... on her wings. But just as he thinks all is well and he is sitting on the top of the world, the bottom drops out again. This time his wings begin to operate a little better, become a little stronger. Until finally he learns how to catch the currents of air and soar by himself, needing no longer the mother to catch him from falling.

But sometimes a little eagle is taken from the nest and refuses to fly. He will not try his wings. He just waits each time until the mother eagle catches him and bears him back unto the heavens on her wings. Time and again the process is repeated until the mother eagle is convinced that there is no hope for him, that she cannot teach him to launch out on her own. Now if he were a chicken, someone would watch over him, feed him, protect him. Not so the eagle. Either he learns to soar for himself, or he starves to death, or becomes a prey of wild beasts. Knowing this, the mother eagle takes him high into the heavens for one last ride. The with a wild screech of pain and disappointment, she dives out from under him and flies away, leaving him to drop to his death on the rocks far below.

Eagle saints have a special training all their own. The flutter of His wings make us think sometimes that He is going to beat us to death. But the Bible says that if we do not receive His chastisement, it is a good sign that we are not His sons. When we are finally willing to leave the nest, trusting completely upon Him, then He takes us into heights of glory never before experienced. Well, everything seems to be wonderful, and we are rejoicing in our new and glorious experiences. Then suddenly the bottom drops out, and he is not there. As we drop from the dizzying heights of glory to the depths of gloom and despair, we flop our feeble wings desperately and unsuccessfully, and wonder why God has left us to perish like this.

Suddenly, He is there! And as He bears us on eagles' wings back into the heavens, our strength and joy returns - only to find that the process must be repeated. Over and over, until finally we find ourselves able to use our God given "wings" and be sustained on high by the power of His strength within.

But some refuse to move into this realm. They rebel against the processing of God. They resent being placed in the furnace of fire. They love the nest on high, the safety of His wings, but they despise the chastening, the disciple, the necessity of learning to stand alone in the heavenlies. He is patient. He is longsuffering. He works with them, giving them chance after chance. But some will not learn, will not yield their rebellious spirits to His will. So He finally leaves them to fall to destruction on the craggy rocks of a carnal earthly nature.

You have seen them, and so have I. And I have wondered how that those who once soared among the stars could have fallen so low and come to such an end. How could some who have had such revelation, such marvelous gifts and ministries, have come to the place where they could accept such heretical doctrines of devils? Or cheapen their ministry and sell out the gift of God for fame and fortune? It has happened, and you know it. It does not make the true revelation of the Spirit any less true. Nor does it take away from the reality of the gift God had given them.

It would have been better if they had remained as chickens, in the safety of the barn lot. But they had prayed to be eagles, and God answered. But the tests had brought out the rebellious nature that would not submit wholly to the dealings and discipline of the Holy Ghost. And they fell. Now a chicken may fall off his roost, or off the chicken house, but he never falls far. For he never rises to great heights. But when an eagle falls, he falls a long way and is seen by many. But it is necessary, for there must be no rebels among those who make their nests on the tops of the mountains and soar above the storm clouds.

Those who rule with Christ must rule from the heavens. For that is where the throne is. The chicken yard is very confining. You can go so far, and no farther. The Plymouth Rocks stay in the Plymouth Rock pens, and the Rhode Island Reds remain in their allotted place. It would be scandalous if Farmer Brown's hen slipped over to Farmer Jones' and ate his corn, or laid their eggs in the wrong place. It doesn't matter if you are in the Methodist pen, or Baptist, or Pentecostal, or whatever. You may cackle and crow about the advantages in your particular chicken yard over the others, but just be sure and remain within your set confines.

Not so the eagles. No chicken yard could hold him. Put him in a cage and he will wither and die. He can only find happiness in the freedom of the uncovered heavens. There is lots of room where the eagles gather. Truth flows like a mighty river. No creeds, bylaws, or rigid statement of beliefs to separate the Body of Christ. Sweet fellowship with all who dwell in this place, and no divisive man-made boundaries exist. Heavenly worship, gifts of the Spirit, and glorious deliverances are the order of the day here. The dull monotonous routine of a "chicken yard" religious system is forever a thing of the past for those who rise on wings of eagles into this place of God.

What a variety of glorious treasures in the Holy Ghost there are for those who dare to believe, and who "are called according to His purpose." The time is at hand, the call is going forth. Turn loose every hindrance of earth and cast aside every weight, and rise with the wings of eagles into heavenly places where you belong!

See the chickens, how they scurry about hunting for shelter when the storm breaks. Huddling together in their misery, hoping their shelter won't crash down on them, fearing every lightning streak and thunderbolt. Pity those who cannot find shelter, perhaps doomed to death by drowning or hail.

Not so the eagle. The very same storm that pounds upon the poor earthbound creatures, produces the violent winds that lifts the eagle effortlessly above the storm clouds. Revelation 12:12 speaks of both classes when it says: "Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea!" Yes, the storm is breaking, and its full fury will fall upon those who have not known the way of the eagle.

God is delivering many today from their earthbound existence, lifting them by the Holy Ghost into heavenly places in Christ. Things of earth grow strangely dim in the light of His glory and grace. They do not fear the storm. The same persecution and tribulation that shall bring great travail upon a dead, backslidden church filled with earthly efforts, shall cause the eagle saints to soar to heights never before attained by man since Jesus set the example.

The place in the heavenlies which we are to inherit, is now occupied by demons, principalities and powers, a place they usurped from Adam. From this place they are "rulers of the darkness of this world." But God has purposed to bring forth a people that will ascend or be caught up to this place and cast Satan and his army down. Jesus did it, but he purposed not to be alone in this. He was planted as a living seed that should bring forth a great harvest in His likeness.

The eagle is noted for great vision. And so are eagle saints. They can believe for things that others, whose eyes are riveted to things of earth, cannot even see, or conceive of. "Where there is no vision, the people perish" (Proverbs 29:18). But there is vision with the eagle saints. They are the pioneers of faith that break through to new realms in the Spirit

Back to The Forerunner!

REVIVAL AND SPIRITUAL AWAKENING

By Jeff Ziegler and Jay Rogers

IN A PREVIOUS ISSUE OF The Forerunner (Nov./Dec. 1991), revival was defined as a recovery of the Lord's testimony in a particular generation of the Church. This definition would obviously imply a tarnishing or loss of testimony among the saints, which would need to be regained if the Church were to have an impact upon society.

Such reviving takes place with the application of immutable biblical principles within the context of organized prayer on a congregational level. Thus the fostering of such awakenings, along with all of their accompanying holy grandeur, are not dependent upon certain cultural conditions being favorable toward revival, or by periodic evangelistic campaigns.

Also noted previously, was the symbiotic relationship of revival in the Church and the corresponding effect the revived Church has upon society, termed "spiritual awakening." Spiritual awakening generally sees large numbers of converts being added to the Church in a very short period of time, and as a result of such harvest, a reformation of culture takes place to some degree.

Having reviewed our progress thus far, it is now time to look at the historical impact of revival upon the Church. This impact is progressive in nature, corresponding with each successive wave of revival, and should not be viewed as an event which occurs on a random basis in history. Thus, whether we are discussing the Reformation period, the First and Second Great Awakenings, or the Holiness Revivals at the turn of the century, we are examining different episodes of a continuum which are divinely orchestrated to advance the Church and with it the Kingdom of God, to a plane of triumph at the time of Christ's second coming.

We will confine our examination of historical revival mainly to a 500 year time period beginning with the Reformation, and concluding with our generation's opportunity to complete the Great Commission. We will try to concentrate on the area of the Lord's testimony recovered in each movement, rather than on the personalities of the men involved.

The Early Church

In dealing with the subject of revival, we must define Christianity in its most primitive terms. If we were to number all the denominations, all the sects, all the various movements within the Church over the last 2000 years, we would find that Christianity is indeed the most influential movement in history. From this broad perspective, the Christian movement could be defined as the world's most successful religion. But when we speak of revival, we are dealing with something much more essential.

Revival is a return to a Book of Acts experience of Christianity. It is an emphasis more on the power of God than on the form of religion. It is more of an emphasis on the recovery of the Lord's testimony among His people, than on the total number of Christians in any given movement.

Acts 1:8 describes the essence of revival:

But you shall receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth.

We read of the fulfillment of the promise of the Holy Spirit in Acts 2:1-4, speaking of Jesus' disciples:

When the day of Pentecost came, they were all together in one place. Suddenly a sound like the blowing of a violent wind came from heaven and filled the whole house where they were sitting. They saw what seemed to be tongues of fire that separated and came to rest on each of them. All of them were filled with the Holy Spirit and began to speak in other tongues as the Spirit enabled them.

Let's look at this experience of being baptized in the Holy Spirit. The main result of this incredible event was twofold: the sudden appearance of the power of God; and the recovery of the Lord's testimony (both had been missing among God's people for centuries). The baptism in the Holy Spirit meant something much greater to the disciples than merely speaking in tongues. "Baptism" means overwhelming. "Baptism in the Holy Spirit" means immersion in the Holy Spirit, an overwhelming. The baptism in the Holy Spirit is the power of revival. On the day of Pentecost the Lord's testimony was proclaimed publicly and 3000 souls were added to the Church in one day.

The Middle Ages

Sometime during the early centuries of the Church, the power of the Lord's testimony was tarnished and finally lost. Revival speaks of the recovery of something that was once lost. We can see this principle working throughout history. During the Middle Ages Christianity did not cease to spread. The Church was the great civilizing force of the Western world. However, the experience of the Church of the Middle Ages was far removed from the experience of the first century disciples.

Sporadically, powerful revival preachers, such as St. Francis of Assisi, would appear and the common people of Europe would once again receive the power of the Lord's testimony. But the attempts to restore the experience of the first century disciples gradually became lost amidst the pageantry and formalism of the medieval church. Time and time again revival preachers would appear to condemn the excesses of the Roman church hierarchy.

Girolamo Savonarola, a fifteenth century Italian friar, charged the church of his day with idolatry in sermon after sermon: "In the primitive Church the chalices were of wood, the prelates of gold; in these days the Church has chalices of gold and prelates of wood." With fiery oratory, Savonarola likened the Roman hierarchy to the "wood, hay and stubble" that the Apostle Paul had warned the first century Church about: "This is the new church, no longer built of living stones; but of sticks, namely, of Christians dry as tinder for the fires of hell."

More often than not, preachers of reform, such as Savonarola and the Bohemian preacher Jan Hus, were put to death by church authorities. It became evident even to the common people that the Roman church was corrupt; the deaths of the great martyrs only rallied sympathy for their cries for reform.

For the people of the Middle Ages, the restoration of revival power had lacked one essential ingredient: the written Word of God. Ever since the time of St. Jerome, the fifth century monk who translated the Greek Septuagint and the Greek New Testament into vulgar Latin, the Word of God had remained obscured from the common people.

It wasn't until the invention of moveable type by Johannes Gutenberg in the late 15th century that the Bible became available in mass quantities. The invention of the printing press now set off a revolution in Germany. Now, every scholar could own a copy of a book or some type of printed material. The Latin editions of the Gutenberg Bible proliferated among the nobility and the church leaders of northern Europe.

Ironically, Gutenberg's livelihood came mainly from the printing of indulgences: one page documents which were paid for by Catholic parishioners in order to obtain pardon for their sins after receiving the sacrament of penance. German priests grew rich from the sales of these indulgences. Only the intellectual elite could benefit from the printing of the Gutenberg Bibles, since they were only available in Latin. If you happened to be a scholar or a nobleman, the print revolution might have affected you spiritually; but as for the common people of the fifteenth century - the masses - there was little benefit in terms of reform.

Reform was a slow process occurring over the space of centuries. The Bible was painstakingly translated into the common tongue of each nation. The common people of Europe had to become literate before mass revival was to take place. This was a long struggle won with the blood of the martyrs.

The Reformation Period

The Reformation of the Church in the 16th century marked the end of the Middle Ages, a time in which the Church had been mired in every wretched, vile depravity known to man. Under the weight of papal abominations, sexual promiscuity, financial scandal, and sweeping ignorance of God's Word, the Church had lost the testimony of Christ's character. In the midst of such carnal chaos, the Lord began a process of restoring truth, order, and vitality to the Church.

Men such as Martin Luther, John Calvin, and Ulrich Zwingli were used of the Lord to recover foundational truths of the Christian faith which had been lost for nearly a millennium. God chose rough hewn men of conviction, intelligence, and spiritual depth to carry the day, and win the fight for Christ's testimony in their generation.

The mechanism for reform in the beginning was not as spiritual as we would like to imagine. King Henry VIII spawned the reformation in England a generation before Luther when the pope failed to recognize his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. Henry separated the Church of England from the Church of Rome for purely selfish reasons. There was little reform in the Anglican Church in the area of Christian doctrine or experience.

Martin Luther, on the other hand, appearing just a few years later, championed a rising dissent coming from every political, social and religious sphere in Europe. Moved more by genuine spiritual motives than selfish political desires, Luther protested the many abuses of the Roman Catholic Church. Having been one of the elite who had studied the Latin Bible, Luther realized that there were many areas of official church doctrine which did not align with the teachings of the Word of God.

When Luther posted his 95 theses on the church door at Wittenburg, he was merely calling his colleagues to a theological debate: a common practice in his day. In the controversy that ensued, church officials demanded that Luther recant his theses, although they were not willing to debate the stocky German friar concerning his knowledge of scripture. The soldiers who came to arrest Luther did so only after Luther refused to recant his theses. His immortal words were the galvanizing force of Protestant Reformation of the 16th century: "Here I stand; I can do no other; God help me. Amen." It was only the assistance of the armies of Frederick the Wise which kept Luther from the same fate as prior reformers.

Meanwhile in Zürich, Switzerland, a young priest named Ulrich Zwingli began to push for reforms which went beyond those of Luther. In 1523, Zwingli, with the full support of the civil authorities, came out against monastic vows, clerical celibacy, the intercession of saints, the existence of purgatory, the sacrificial character of the mass, and the teaching that salvation can be obtained by good works.

Twenty years later, in Geneva, Switzerland, John Calvin published his Institutes of the Christian Religion. In it, he outlined a comprehensive theology for Protestant Christianity, something Luther had failed to do. He articulated and implemented a plan of church government separate from the rule of bishops and popes. His theology emphasized the ultimate sovereignty of God and the idea of divine election as being the necessary prerequisite for salvation.

This period of reform saw the following areas of doctrine restored:

- A) Justification by faith alone.
- B) God's sovereignty over all men and nations as an already established fact.
- C) Christ's work in His death and resurrection as finished, complete and this great victory communicated to the church.
- D) All believers comprise the priesthood and each may approach Christ without a human mediator.

E) The Church as the visible demonstration of the Kingdom of God in the Earth.

F) The Bible may be read by the common man and can be applied to all areas of life.

The impact of the Reformation upon Western Civilization is nothing less than astounding. The invention of the printing press during this time made the Bible, and with it reformed theology, widespread throughout the German states, Switzerland, the Scandinavian countries, and eventually Britain. These recovered doctrines spawned large movements of evangelistic exploits, along with great Christian optimism.

Thus the Church, with a fresh biblical worldview began to effect every sphere of culture including work, art, music, and most significantly the realm of government. The reformed Church became the engine for progress, not only in the West, but also in a missionary sense, making Christianity coextensive with the whole inhabited world.

The Contribution of the Puritans

By the end of the 16th century, the nations of northern Europe had broken the bonds of the political-ecclesiastical system which had tied them to Rome. But what effect did this tumult have on the economic, political, and moral state of the common man? Many a peasant still lived in the medieval shadow of a manor house or castle laboring to sustain the demands of his lord or baron. He had to pay a fixed percentage of all he produced to his lord as rent and was legally bound to personal service on his lord's domain. Between the numerous wars, unemployed mercenary troops roamed the countryside plundering the peasant villages. All men carried swords or knives to defend themselves whenever they ventured from their homes.

The moral life of the peasant was as lax as the times were cruel. Undernourished and overworked, the peasant consumed as much as a gallon of beer or wine on an average day. Weddings and holidays were occasions for drunken revelry; huge festivals and frolics were held which gave peasants the opportunity to engage in every sort of crude behavior. The Reformation was really only the threshold of a longer reform process. The effects on the political landscape were not clearly defined until the end of the Thirty Years' War in 1648. The economic and moral state of the common man awaited further reform.

The Puritans - whose name was originally used as a term of derision, given because they shunned the frolics of the common people - arose in England in the 1560s. They were a group of radical nonconformists who believed that the Elizabethan Reformation had retained too many Catholic ways and wished to purify the Church of England. The Puritans were repressed by Queen Elizabeth who deplored their Calvinist practice of lay participation in Church affairs, for she foresaw that a voice in the Church would lead to a voice in the state and thus threaten the monarchy.

Despite the derision of fellow citizens and repression by the monarchy, the Puritans were widely influential in England. More than any other group of reformers, they stressed individual responsibility and duty. The Puritans held to a "Reformation Worldview" concerning every sphere of societal life. They studied the Bible to isolate biblical principles which could then be applied to specific areas of human life. Every human activity described in the Bible (i.e., marriage, government, economics, art, agriculture, science, etc.) was viewed as an "Institution" ordained by God to be reformed according to biblical principles.

In the 1600s, James I harassed the Puritans with laws requiring conformity to the Church of England. During his reign, the most radical Puritans, unwilling to compromise their reform efforts, fled to the New World in a mass exodus. The Puritans who came to America saw the New World as an unconquered kingdom in which to advance the gospel. They saw the world as the property of Christ to be cultivated and cared for by men. They became convinced that even as they had been reborn as individuals, now whole societies might do the same. It was in America that the Reformation worldview attained its highest ideal. American society was unique in that it was the first culture in the world (with the exception of ancient Israel) to have biblical precepts as the sole basis for its laws and civil government.

Seventeenth century America saw great strides of reform in the areas of civil government, law, history, and literature. The following reformed institutions were features of 17th century America, were founded by the Puritans, and have since been imitated all over the world:

* CIVIL GOVERNMENT - The Puritan experiment with civil government began at Plymouth Plantation. Since only 27 of the 100 persons aboard the Mayflower were Puritans, the leaders of the group decided to require the signing of a "compact" or "covenant" (see 1 Samuel 23:18) to quell any dissent among the unconverted passengers, who had previously made discontented and mutinous statements. They chose a governor from among the "elect" (i.e., the converted - hence the word: election) to rule for a term of one year as the civil authority. The signing of a mutual agreement or "compact" became the foundation for constitutional government and was a model for the later documents most closely associated with the American republic.

* LAW - The sole basis for law among the Puritan settlers was the Bible. All civil laws had their basis in biblical principles. Governor William Bradford, the second governor chosen from among the Puritans, relates the following incident: When the first marriage was to be performed in the New World, the Pilgrims chose a civil magistrate rather than a minister to perform the ceremony. They reasoned that this custom was consistent with the Scriptures (see Ruth 4). This law or decree about marriage was agreed upon since no passage in the Bible describes the pronouncement of marriage to fall within the duty of the minister as a part of his office.

* HISTORY - The Puritans saw all of human time as progress toward the fulfillment of God's design on earth. Pre-Christian history was read as the preparation for Christ's entry into the world. They believed that God's hand was present in every human event and that success or failure of both the individual and of nations was a sign of God's approval or condemnation. God's design was seen in every event no matter how small. When, for instance, a sailor aboard the Mayflower mocked those Puritans who were sick, Governor Bradford, recounting the incident in his History of Plymouth Plantation, found it fitting that the sailor should succumb to a "grievous disease."

* LITERATURE - Perhaps the most highly literate society of modern times was the Massachusetts Bay colony, which succeeded the Plymouth colony. The American colonies by the time of the mid-1700s had scarcely one million inhabitants, yet this period is rich with literary classics. The high literacy rate among the Puritans was due to their emphasis on responsibility of the individual before God to both read and understand the Bible. Some Puritan writers who are still included in American literature courses of today include: William Bradford, Anne Bradstreet, Mary Rowlandson, Edward Taylor, Sarah Kemble Knight, Cotton Mather, and Jonathan Edwards.

The contribution of the Puritans included the following areas of restored truth:

A) Reformation worldview & the idea that all spheres of human life are Institutions given by God and subject to reform.

B) Emphasis on the laity as having a voice in church affairs.

C) Individual responsibility and duty & a spirit of enterprise and initiative translating into republican government and the free market system.

D) Covenants and compacts as the basis for church and civil governments.

The First Great Awakening

The First Great Awakening of the 18th century could be considered the first sweeping revival to take place since the time of the apostles. While confined geographically to Great Britain and colonial America, the effect of this awakening would eventually bring revolutionary changes to the world at large. While this awakening recovered more of the Lord's testimony within the Church, it was not at the expense of the foundational truths which were set forth in the prior Reformation period. Rather the First Great Awakening was incubated and birthed in reformed doctrine and then went on to build upon that foundation.

While we are concentrating on the truths which were restored in each successive wave of revival, if we did not mention the major vessels of kingdom glory which God used so mightily in this period, we would be remiss. From America came its greatest theologian Jonathan Edwards. At the same time Britain boasted a stable of apostolic power unequaled since the time of the early Church. Men such as John and Charles Wesley, and George Whitefield are some names connected with the advance of this awakening.

Fittingly, the roots of the First Great Awakening were in Germany, where the Reformation left off, and where a man named Count Nikolaus Ludwig Von Zinzendorf founded a community called Herrnhut (The Lord's Watch) in 1724 in the province of Moravia. The Moravian' society was a move of the Holy Spirit; Zinzendorf and his disciples began a prayer meeting that lasted 100 years, 24 hours a day! They committed time periods throughout the day to pray for the unconverted within the folds of the Church and the unconverted in the world. The Moravians sent out two types of missionaries; those to win the lost, and those to win the Church.

In the meantime, Jonathan Edwards, a Northampton, Massachusetts pastor, began to pray for his unconverted congregation and for the unconverted of North America. His efforts to promote revival enjoyed huge success in his village church as early as 1734. Edwards' passion was for the glory of God, and for the kingdom to be advanced among the lost:

"My heart has been much on the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the world. The histories of the past advancement of Christ's kingdom have become sweet to me. When I have read histories of past ages, the pleasantest thing in all my reading has been to read of the kingdom of Christ being promoted. And my mind has been much entertained and delighted with the Scripture promises and prophecies of the future glorious advancement of Christ's kingdom on earth."

Edwards vividly described the onset of the awakening as "A Divine and Supernatural Light" which had invaded western Massachusetts from heaven. The revival occurring among his own congregation was the first in a series of revivals which spread from Maine to Georgia. Hardly a person in Northampton remained unaffected by the revival. The news soon spread among the surrounding villages. Those who came to Edwards' church to inquire about this phenomenon, returned to their towns greatly convicted and soon the revival spread - in the small New England towns of Sunderland, Deerfield, Hatfield, Hadley, Longmeadow, Springfield - throughout the county.

The onset of the awakening did not occur solely among the religious, but according to Edwards "the worst persons in the town seemed to be suddenly seized with a great degree of concern about their souls." Within the next seven years the awakening had seized the colonies. Church records of this time period indicate that as much as one-third of the population of the American colonies had had a salvation experience. The magnitude of the awakening caused Edwards to wonder aloud whether the millennial reign of Christ was not descending on the earth. If another 20 years of awakening passed unabated, Edwards extrapolated, there would be no one left to save.

Across the Atlantic, the deplorable social conditions set the stage for the revival efforts of John Wesley and George Whitefield. The Puritans had left their mark on America, but in England Puritanism had been rejected with the restoration of the monarchy. James II ferociously persecuted the remaining Puritans and they were forbidden to preach under severe penalties. The poor were unspeakably wretched - gin had made the people cruel and inhuman. There were the spectacles of daily public hangings applauded by men, women and children; prisons were unimaginable nightmares; mothers were forced to scavenge for scraps of food to keep their children from starving. By 1730, life in England was morally corrupt and deeply crippled by spiritual decay.

Into this world, John Wesley was born in 1703 to ministering parents. In 1709, their parsonage burned, with a very close call for John who was asleep in the upper chambers. In a dramatic rescue, young John was coaxed to leap from the upper story into his father's arms. Moments later the building collapsed. Wesley's mother, Susanna, believed her son's life to be a "flaming brand plucked from the burning" to serve some great purpose of God. Wesley was trained from childhood for the ministry and he later attended Oxford.

In 1736, John Wesley travelled to Georgia in hopes of seeing Indians converted to Christ. After two years of frustrating failure he met the disciples of Von Zinzendorf on the voyage home to England. The Moravians showed a "great seriousness" and were calm during the winter storms that buffeted the ship, while Wesley was afraid for his life. On his return journey to England he began to doubt his salvation:

"I went to America, to convert the Indians; but O! who shall convert me? who, what is he that shall deliver me from this evil heart of mischief? I have a fair summer religion. I can talk well; nay, and believe myself, while no danger is near; but let death look me in the face, and my spirit is troubled. Nor can I say, 'To die is gain.' I who went to America to convert others, was never myself converted to God. 'I am not mad,' though I thus speak; 'but I speak the words of truth and soberness.'"

Although he preached holiness, Wesley was uncertain of his own salvation. Wesley was convinced of his unbelief and finally resolved to leave preaching, "How can you preach to others, who have not faith yourself?" He asked a Moravian missionary friend, Peter Boehler, whether or not he thought he should leave preaching. Boehler answered, "By no means." Wesley then asked, "But what can I preach?" Boehler then gave him the advice that would change his life and affect the destiny of all England: "Preach faith till you have it; and then, because you have it, you will preach faith."

Two months later, Wesley very unwillingly went to a society in Aldersgate-street, where someone was reading Luther's preface to Romans: "About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation; and that an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death ... And herein I found the difference between this and my former state chiefly consisted. I was striving, yea, fighting with all my might under the law, as well as under grace. But then I was sometimes, if not often conquered; now, I was always conqueror."

Soon Wesley was preaching in the open places to tens of thousands of sinners who never frequented a church building. Wesley preached like a great apostle, carefully laying out the foundations of the faith in the hearts of his hearers. Previously he had failed to reach a single soul in America, yet now he reaped a great harvest.

George Whitefield, a colleague of Wesley, had also come to the same state of spiritual crisis a few years before. But Whitefield's background was quite different than Wesley's. He was raised in a gin house - a hotel tavern run by his parents - and served the highway robbers who planned their attacks around the tables. Here, Whitefield developed a vivid imagination and an expressive speaking voice as he imitated and entertained the tavern guests.

By the sovereign grace of God, Whitefield was offered a chance to attend Oxford at age 17. Whitefield began to reevaluate his life and met Charles Wesley, who invited him to attend the "Holy Club." Whitefield came under tremendous conviction and made several legal attempts to be a better person. He subjected himself to rigorous discipline which almost drove him insane. Then, after receiving a revelation of grace, Whitefield preached his first sermon as a newly ordained minister. The results?

"When I came into the pulpit, I could have chosen to be silent rather than speak. After I had begun, however, the Spirit of the Lord gave me freedom, and at length came down like a mighty rushing wind, and carried all before it. Immediately, the whole congregation was alarmed. Crying, weeping, and wailing were to be heard in every corner; men's hearts failing them for fear, and many were to be seen falling into the arms of their friends."

During his lifetime, Whitefield visited almost every town in England, Scotland and Wales, crossed the Atlantic seven times, preached in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and many other towns on the eastern seaboard of America. His life was like a meteor streaking across the sky - "a bright and shining light" - magnificent yet brief. He died in Newburyport, Massachusetts the young age of 56. Having returned to his parsonage from preaching with an illness, he paused on the staircase before retiring to bed, when some visitors begged him to remain with them for a while longer. Whitefield preached his last sermon from the staircase until the candle on the bannister burned down, flickered and went out. With the drama of a great actor, Whitefield retired to bed and died.

Wesley, in contrast to Whitefield, had great staying power. This undaunted determinism was a supernatural gift from the Holy Spirit. He was undiscouraged by controversy and being barred from preaching in many churches. Once, openly confronting this unfortunate situation at his father's church in Epworth, he stood upon his father's tombstone in the churchyard and made it his pulpit. A huge crowd gathered to hear him preach, and ultimately the pastor of his father's former parish was converted! He was able to calmly face mobs who were ready to stone him or beat him to death. Later in life, however, he became immensely popular. He preached before parliament and continued his ministry until a few months before he died at age 88.

Wesley's life is awe-inspiring. Historians testify that it was John Wesley's Methodists that provided the moral ballast that kept England from sliding into the same bloody tragedy that was experienced just a short distance away in the French Revolution of 1789. At the end of his life he had trained 750 preachers in England and, through his student Francis Asbury, 350 in America. At his death there were 76,968 Methodists in England and 57,621 in America. His brother Charles wrote hundreds of hymns which are still well known and sung today.

The Methodists continued in a move of the Holy Spirit keeping up their fervor until the latter part of the 19th century. Wesley's work significantly affected the theology of American churches during the Second Great Awakening in the early 1800s. Many revival preachers, such as Charles G. Finney, taught a modified Wesleyan doctrine of holiness which energized revivalism in America.

By the 1770s, at the onset of the American Revolution, the thirteen colonies had become radically transformed. Believers from separate denominations shared a common spiritual experience. And all felt an internal spiritual unity which naturally led to an external union. It was the Great Awakening, begun in Jonathan Edwards' church which led to the emancipation of America, both spiritually and politically.

The major truths recovered in this period include:

- A) Concerted prayer meetings with the fixed purpose of reviving the Church and for the salvation of the heathen nations.
- B) Power evangelism, mass scale conversions and spiritual awakening on a national scale.
- C) The sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit to enable believers to live victoriously over known sin.
- D) Judgment within the Church purging unconverted ministers.
- E) Spiritual prosperity and liberty translating to societal righteousness and governmental liberty.

The Second Great Awakening

While it may not seem desirable to run together all of the various revival movements of the 19th century under one heading, the Second Great Awakening can be understood as a series of revivals - beginning in the late 1790s in the sparsely populated western frontier states, to the Great Revival of 1857, and ending with the Holiness revivals and the Pentecostal revival at the turn of this century - a continuum built upon the mounting momentum of the previous reforms.

Even as the First Great Awakening was waning, the seeds of revival were again being planted. Upon George Whitefield's death in Newburyport, Massachusetts, the Methodist followers of John Wesley in England and sent missionaries to America. The revivals of the 1700s centered around the villages and cities of the east coast, but the work of the Second Great Awakening began in the sparsely populated frontier. The major personalities of this period include the Methodist circuit riders Francis Asbury and Peter Cartwright.

In August of 1801, the Cane Ridge Revival meeting occurred. The scenario is a six-day camp meeting attended by 20,000 people! It was a remarkable event, since this occurred in the sparsely populated frontier. Among the thousands who were converted was a young skeptic, James B. Finley, who wrote this account:

"The noise was like that of Niagara. The vast sea of human beings seemed to be agitated as if by a storm. I counted seven ministers, all preaching on stumps, others in wagons and one standing on a tree which had in falling, lodged against another.... Some of the people were singing, other praying, some crying for mercy in the most piteous accents, while others were shouting most vociferously. While witnessing these scenes, a peculiarly strange sensation such as I had never felt before came over me. My heart beat tumultuously, my knees trembled, my lips quivered and I felt as though I must fall to the ground. A supernatural power seemed to pervade the entire mass of mind there collected.... I stepped up on a log where I could have a better view of the surging sea of humanity. The scene that had presented itself to my mind was indescribable. At one time I saw at least five hundred swept down in a moment as if a battery of a thousand guns had been opened upon them and then immediately followed shrieks and shouts that rent the very heavens."

This was the beginning of the Second Great Awakening. America's early westward movement was characterized by true Christianity. The figure who dominated America's revivalism during this period was Charles G. Finney. A young lawyer who had become convicted by the Holy Spirit after having read the book of Romans as a part of his legal studies, Finney's ministry began with the following experience:

"Without any expectation of it, without ever having the thought in my mind that there was any such thing for me, without the recollection that I had ever heard the thing mentioned by any person in the world, the Holy Spirit descended upon me in such a manner that seemed to go through me, body and soul. I could feel the impression, like a wave of electricity, going through and through me. Indeed it seemed to come in waves of liquid love; for I could not express it in any other way. It seemed like the very breath of God. I can recollect distinctly that it seemed to fan me, like immense wings. No words can express the wonderful love that was shed abroad in my heart.

"I wept aloud with joy and love; and I do not know but I should say I literally bellowed out the unutterable gushings of my heart. These waves came over and over me, one after the other, until I cried out, 'I shall die if these waves continue to pass over me.' I said, 'Lord, I cannot bear any more;' yet I had no fear of death."

Finney's early ministry took place in western New York State, a region known as the "Burnt Over District" because of the area's frequent revivals. Finney's preaching sometimes resulted in entire towns being converted. The focus of Finney's revivalism centered on social reform. He attacked every vice known to society and insisted that societal sin in every form be done away with completely. The roots of virtually every social reform movement of the 1800s can be traced to Finney's revival meetings.

The Prayer Meeting Revival took place in 1857-1858 and was the height of the Second Great Awakening. In less than one year, nearly 20% of the American population was swept into the Kingdom of God. Then in 1861, judgment fell in the form of the Civil War. The revival continued, however, on both sides of the camp with both union and confederate soldiers being converted by the thousands.

The latter half of the century gave the world such great revivalists as, D.L. Moody, William and Catherine Booth, Hudson Taylor, George Mueller and many great theologians such as Charles Hodge and B.B. Warfield. They and many others helped to make this century an age of optimism and explosive missionary activity.

The Holiness revivals in England and America of the late 1800s, stressed personal and social holiness. A theology of sanctification was developed and an emphasis on the infilling of the Holy Spirit was stressed as being necessary to live a holy life. These revivals were a natural precursor to the Pentecostal revival which followed at the turn of the century.

This period of restoration saw the following areas of testimony restored:

- A) Large movements of missionary activity unprecedented in the history of the Church.
- B) Social sanctification as a result of an activist Church.
- C) Optimistic worldview and faith to complete the Great Commission.
- D) Greater emphasis on spiritual gifts within the Church and mission field.

The Pentecostal Revival

At the beginning of the 20th century, the Pentecostal movement carried the torch of revival to the nations of the world. The largest missionary movements in the world today have come from within the Pentecostal movement which began as a sporadic manifestation of the gifts of the Holy Spirit in places as diverse as California, Kansas, Wales, Eastern Europe, India, and Korea.

The gifts of the Holy Spirit appeared at Azusa Street, the sight of a 1906-1908 revival in Los Angeles. Prophecies, tongues, words of knowledge and miracles all occurred at Azusa Street, but there was an emphasis on the gift of speaking in tongues, believed to be the "evidence" of the baptism in the Holy Spirit.

In the 1940s and 50s, the "Latter Rain" movement and healing revivals emphasized other gifts: inner healing and deliverance, miraculous healing, and the restoration of the five-fold ministry gifts (Ephesians 4:11). The charismatic movement of the 1960s and 70s brought the gifts of the Holy Spirit to the traditional denominational churches. The neo-Pentecostal and charismatic movements can be understood as extensions of the Pentecostal outpouring of the turn of the century. Thus the 20th century move of the Holy Spirit (while not nearly approaching the magnitude of past awakenings) can be understood as a revival of the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

As we approach the year 2000, we are poised on the brink of another awakening, this time global in focus and likely to bring the fulfillment of many end time prophecies concerning the glory of God, a victorious Church, and world evangelization.

The "Three R's" of Christianity

In order to form a comprehensive understanding of revival and spiritual awakening, we must begin with our initial definitions about the nature and purpose of revival and then add each of the restored doctrines and areas of testimony since the time of the Reformation. We must start with the framework of historical orthodoxy and then build upon this foundation with the subsequent principles and doctrines emphasized in each successive revival.

In addition to defining revival, we must also incorporate the definitions of spiritual awakening's accompanying fruits, namely: reformation and restoration. Let's define the three foundational tenets of revival theology:

REVIVAL - This begins with a recovery of the Lord's testimony in a given generation. The resulting effect of the revived Church on society with large numbers of people being converted is termed a spiritual awakening.

REFORMATION - This is defined as the corresponding effect of a spiritual awakening on a particular society. Great social reforms occur due to the sanctifying power of a revived Church acting as a redeemer to its culture.

RESTORATION - This occurs as each successive wave of revival restores great truths which were part of the normal experience for the early Church of the apostolic age, but had been lost during the time of the Middle Ages.

These three great forces, working together throughout time, have brought us to a crucial juncture in history. We desperately need to understand what God has accomplished in the past and to examine the current state of affairs. The purpose of such understanding is to create an atmosphere within the Church of our generation which is conducive to yet another wave of revival which will reform the nations and complete the Great Commission.

As we begin to understand the mechanism through which God was worked in the past, we will be able to ask the following questions and give some answers about the future:

* What are the chances another revival of the magnitude of the First and Second Great Awakenings occurring in our generation?

We should first mention that there is revival happening all over the world today. There is spiritual awakening which has swept hundreds of millions of people into the Kingdom of God within the last decade. There is revival in Africa, South America, the former Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, the South Pacific Islands, and Southeast Asia. The sheer volume of this "World Awakening" not only rivals but even surpasses what happened in America in centuries past. As we turn to our own nation and Europe, we see that the supposedly "Christian" nations of the world today are freaks in terms of revival experience. Nevertheless, in times of great darkness in America's past revival has dawned bringing new light and hope. So we can hope and pray for a Third Great Awakening in America which will surpass all past experience.

* What will be the effects of future awakenings on the societies of the world in terms of reformation of culture?

The most obvious effect of revival in the past decade was in dealing a death blow to communism - the dreaded enemy of liberty and Christian culture. Although the secular press has not presented this fact, the Church was more instrumental in bringing the downfall of many communist governments throughout the world than any other single force. In our own nation we can see that the coming awakening will bring an end to abortion - America's number one social issue. Reform efforts of a revived Church will also overthrow ungodly influences in art, music and the sciences. We can expect that lewd homosexual art, rock music, and the theory of evolution will be targets of the awakened Church. The plethora of social problems our nation now faces - sexual immorality, AIDS, racial problems, economic woes - are reformation tasks for the Church of the new awakening.

* What great truths are there left to be restored to the Church?

We can understand what is next on the agenda by examining God's end time promises to his Church, especially those found in Isaiah 60 and those found in the Great Commission (Matthew 28:18-20). God will bring about a spirit of unity through prayer which will be the impetus for an awakening of global proportion. Walls which separated denominations and movements will be let down, or in some cases violently destroyed in order to allow a "flowing together" of the Body of Christ for the purpose of intercessory prayer. The fruits of this prayer will be the fulfillment of the following biblical promises:

A) Signs and wonders akin to the experience of the New Testament Christians. (The dead will be raised, highly specific prophecies will be given, etc.)

B) All the nations will be disciplined in fulfillment of the Great Commission. (In some cases whole ethnic groups will be converted, in many nations at least one-third of the country will be converted with many Christians occupying the highest seats of government.)

C) Poverty, hunger, disease will all but be eliminated as Third World nations are evangelized.

D) Great wealth will come into the Church which will be used in the reformation of international political, economic and social problems.

E) Israel will become a respected nation in the world as the majority of ethnic Jews living within its borders are converted.

Jonathan Edwards: Concerts of Prayer

- or -

"A humble attempt to promote the agreement and union of God's people throughout the world in extraordinary prayer for a revival of religion and the advancement of God's kingdom on earth, according to Scriptural promises and prophecies of the last time."

FORWARD

WE STAND AT AN HISTORIC POINT IN TIME much like New England did prior to the Great Awakening. God's wind of holiness is blowing and His banner of grace has been lifted up in preparation for the revival which is certain to follow. God is pouring out new wine and calling for new wineskins to contain it. The remainder of this century promises to be part of the most exciting time the Church has ever known.

We have worked to recapture the truth of this portion of Jonathan Edwards' writings from the archives of Christian history and experience. We have attempted to modernize the language without losing the heart of the message. It's a message that needs to be heard again today. There's much we have to learn from those who have gone before us. Here in New England, God is awakening hearts to pray. Beware of legalism! Beware of relying on your own understanding! Remember "Ishmaels" are born to those who love God but attempt to fulfill the promises of God in their own abilities. They are also costly to the generations that follow. May God inspire us all to pray believing His promises until He answers from heaven. There are no shortcuts!

"So do not throw away your confidence; it will be richly rewarded. You need to persevere so that when you have done the will of God, you will receive what he has promised. For in just a very little while, 'He who is coming will come and will not delay. But my righteous one will live by faith. And if he shrinks back, I will not be pleased with him.' But we are not of those who shrink back and are destroyed, but of those who believe and are saved."

- Hebrews 10:35-39

Scripture references have been changed to the New International version except where Mr. Edwards refers to it in his text. These Scriptures have been left in the King James because changing them would make some of his points less clear.

A Humble Attempt ...

The Future Glorious State of Christ's Church

"This is what the LORD Almighty says: 'Many peoples and the inhabitants of many cities will yet come, and the inhabitants of one city will go to another and say, 'Let us go at once to entreat the LORD and seek the LORD Almighty. I myself am going.' And many peoples and powerful nations will come to Jerusalem to seek the LORD Almighty and to entreat him'(Zech. 8:20-22).

In this chapter Zechariah prophecies of the future, glorious advancement of the Church. It is evident there is more intended than was ever fulfilled in the Jewish nation during Old Testament times. Here are plain prophecies describing things that were never fulfilled before the coming of Messiah, particularly what is said in the two last verses in the chapter where Zechariah speaks of "many people and strong nations worshiping and seeking the true God," and of so great an addition of Gentiles to the Church that the majority of visible worshipers consist of Gentiles, outnumbering the Jews ten to one.

Nothing ever happened, from the time of Zechariah to the coming of Christ, to fulfill this prophecy. It's fulfillment can only be in the calling of the Gentiles during and following apostolic times, or in the future, glorious enlargement of God's Church in the end times, so often foretold by Old Testament prophets, particularly by Zechariah. It is most likely that the Spirit of God speaks here of the greatest revival and the most glorious advancement of the Church on earth, the blessings of which will benefit the Jewish nation.

Indeed, there is great agreement on this point, between this prophecy of Zechariah, and other prophecies concerning the Church's latter day glory. Consider Isaiah 60:2-4,

"See, darkness covers the earth and thick darkness is over the peoples, but the Lord rises upon you and his glory appears over you. Nations will come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your dawn. Lift up your eyes and look about you: All assemble and come to you; your sons come from afar, and your daughters are carried on the arm."

Without doubt, this entire chapter foretells the most glorious state of the God's Church on earth, as does Isaiah 66:8, Micah 4:1-3 and Isaiah 2:1-4:

"In the last days the mountain of the LORD'S temple will be established as chief among the mountains; it will be raised above the hills, and peoples will stream to it."

"Many nations will come and say, 'Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob. He will teach us his ways, so that we may walk in his paths.' "

"The law will go out from Zion, the word of the LORD from Jerusalem. He will judge between many peoples and will settle disputes for strong nations far and wide. They will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. Nation will not take up sword against nation, nor will they train for war anymore."

Nothing whatsoever has happened to fulfill these prophecies. Moreover, since the prophecy in my text (Zech. 8:20-22) and the following verse agrees with them, there is reason to think it addresses the same times. Indeed, there is remarkable agreement in the description given throughout this chapter with the representations of those times elsewhere in the prophetic books.

Though the prophet is at times referring to the future smiles of heaven on the Jewish nation, yet the Spirit of God doubtless refers to events far greater than these, of which these are but faint resemblances. The Jews had just returned from the Babylonian captivity, Chaldea and other countries, and resettled in Canaan where they were experiencing great increase of both numbers and wealth.

We find it common in the prophecies of the Old Testament that when the prophets are speaking of the favors and blessings of God on the Jews, attending or following their return from the Babylonian captivity, the Spirit of God takes the opportunity from there to speak of the incomparably greater blessings on the Church, that will attend and follow her deliverance from the spiritual Babylon, of which those were a type.

The prophet, in this chapter, speaks of God's bringing his people again from the east and west to Jerusalem (vs. 7-8), and multitudes of all nations taking hold of the skirts of the Jews. Although this prophecy literally refers to the Jews return from Babylon, its fulfillment cannot be seen there for no such things spoken of here attended their return. Therefore, it must refer to the great calling and gathering of Jews into the fold of Christ, and to them receiving the blessings of His kingdom, after the fall of the Antichrist and the destruction of the spiritual Babylon.

The Power of Prayer

In Zechariah 8:20-22 we have an account of how this future advancement of the Church should occur. It would come to fruition as multitudes from different towns resolve to unite in extraordinary prayer, seeking God until He manifests Himself and grants the fruits of his presence. We may observe several things in particular:

1. THE NECESSITY OF PRAYER. Some suppose that prayer includes the whole of worship to God and that prayer is a part of worship during the days of the gospel when sacrifices are abolished. Therefore, this can be understood as a prophecy of a great revival of religion with true worship of God among His people, repentance from idolatry, and growth of the Church.

However, it seems reasonable to me to suppose that something even more special is intended regarding prayer given that prayer is not only repeatedly mentioned, but that this prophecy parallels many other prophecies that speak of an extraordinary spirit of prayer preceding that glorious day of revival and advancement of the Church's peace and prosperity. It particularly parallels what the prophet later speaks of the "pouring out of a spirit of grace and supplications" as that which introduces the great religious revival (Zech. 12:10).

2. THE GOOD WHICH SHALL BE BROUGHT BY PRAYER: GOD HIMSELF. Scripture says, "They shall go to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of Hosts." The good that they seek for is "The Lord of Hosts," Himself. If "seeking God" means no more than seeking the favor or mercy of God then "praying before the Lord," and "seeking the Lord of Hosts" must be looked upon as synonymous. However, "seeking the Lord" is commonly used to mean something far more than seeking something from God. Surely it implies that God Himself is what is desired and sought after.

Thus, the Psalmist desired God, thirsted after Him and sought after Him:

"O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee. My flesh longeth for thee, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is, to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary ... My soul followeth hard after thee ... Whom have I in heaven by thee? And there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee."

The Psalmist earnestly pursued after God; his soul thirsted after Him, he stretched forth his hands unto Him. All of God's saints have this in common: they are those that seek God. "This is the generation of them that seek Him." "Your heart shall live that seek God," etc.

If this be the true sense of this phrase "seeking the Lord of Hosts," then we must understand that God who had withdrawn Himself, or, as it were, hid Himself, would return to His Church, granting the fruits of His presence and communion with His people, which He so often promised, and for which His Church had so long waited.

In short, it seems reasonable to understand the phrase, "seeking the Lord of Hosts" means not merely praying to God, but seeking the promised restoration of the Church of God after the Babylonian captivity and the great apostasy occasioning it is called their "seeking God, and searching for Him;" and God's granting this promised revival and restoration called His being "found of them." (See Jer. 29:10-14)

The prophets occasionally represent God as being withdrawn and hiding Himself: "Verily thou art a God that hideth thyself, O God of Israel, the Savior. I hid me, and was wroth." The prophets then go on to represent God's people seeking Him, searching and waiting for and calling after Him. When God answers their prayers and restores and advances His people, according to His promise, then He is said to come and say, "Here am I" and to show Himself, and they are said to find Him and see Him plainly.

"Then you will call, and the Lord will answer; you will cry for help, and he will say: Here am I ..."

"But Israel will be saved by the Lord with an everlasting salvation ... I have not said to Jacob's descendants, 'Seek me in vain.' I, the Lord, speak the truth; I declare what is right."

"The Sovereign Lord will wipe away the tears from all faces; he will remove the disgrace of his people from all the earth. In that day they will say, 'Surely this is our God; we trusted in him, and he saved us. This is the Lord, we trusted in him; let us rejoice and be glad in his salvation.' We wait for you; your name and renown are the desire of our hearts." (Isa. 58:9; Isa. 45:17,19; Isa. 25:8-9)

3. WE MAY OBSERVE WHO IT IS THAT WILL BE UNITED IN SEEKING THE LORD: "the inhabitants of many cities ... yea, many people and strong nations." Many people from all over the world will unite to seek the Lord.

From the the prophecy, it seems reasonable to assume that this will be fulfilled in the following manner: First, God's people will be given a spirit of prayer, inspiring them to come together and pray in an extraordinary manner, that He would help his Church, show mercy to mankind in general, pour out his Spirit, revive His work, and advance His kingdom in the world as He promised.

Moreover, such prayer would gradually spread and increase more and more, ushering in a revival of religion. This would be characterized by greater worship and service of God among believers. Others will be awakened to their need for God, motivating them to earnestly cry out to God for mercy. They will be led to join with God's people in that extraordinary seeking and serving of God which they see around them. In this way the revival will grow until the awakening reaches whole nations and those in the highest positions of influence. The Church will grow to be ten times larger than it was before. Indeed, at length, all the nations of the world will be converted unto God.

Thus, ten men, out of all languages and nations, will "take hold of the skirt of" the Jew (in the sense of the Apostle), saying "We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you." Thus will be fulfilled, "O thou that heareth prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come."

4. WE MAY ALSO OBSERVE THE MANNER OF THEIR UNITY IN PRAYER. It is a visible and voluntary union that was first proposed by some of God's people with others readily joining in over time. Those who live in one city will declare to those of another city, "Let us go" etc. Many of those who hear their declaration will not only join with them but will make the call for the unity in prayer known to still others. As a result, the movement will grow, prevail and spread among God's people.

Some suppose that the words, "I will go also," are to be taken as words spoken by the one making the proposal. He states this expressing his willingness and desire to do what he is asking his hearer to do. But this is to suppose no more than is expressed in the phrase, "Come and let us go ..." itself. It seems more natural to me to understand these words as being the consent or reply of the one to whom the proposal is made.

This is much more agreeable to the flow of the text which represents the compliance of great numbers of people in this movement. And though if these words are thus understood, we must suppose something understood in the text that is not expressed: Those of other cities will say, "I will go also." Yet, this is not difficult to conceive of as such figures of speech are common in the Scripture (Jer. 3:22; Ps. 1:6,7).

5. NEXT, WE CAN OBSERVE THE MANNER IN WHICH THEY AGREE TO PRAY: "Let us go speedily to pray," or, as it says in the margin: let us go continually. Literally translated this means, "let us go in going." The Hebrew language often doubles words for emphasis (e.g., the holy of holies signifies that which is most holy). Such doubling of words also denotes the certainty of an event coming to pass. For example, when God said to Abraham, "in multiplying, I will multiply thy seed," God implies that He would certainly multiply his seed, and multiply it exceedingly.

6. FINALLY, THIS PROPHECY GIVES US A PICTURE OF THIS UNION IN PRAYER BEING AN INVITING AND A HAPPY THING. We sense God's pleasure, and the results prove tremendously successful. From the whole of this prophecy we may infer that it is well pleasing to God for many people, in different parts of the world, to voluntarily come into a visible union to pray in an extraordinary way for those great outpourings of the Holy Spirit which shall advance the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ that God has so often promised shall be in the latter ages of the world.

An Example From History

Let me relate a brief history of what has happened in Scotland:

In October of 1744, a number of ministers in Scotland, considering the state of God's Church, and mankind in general, believed that God was calling those concerned for the welfare of the Church to unite in extraordinary prayer. They knew God was the Creator and source of all blessings and benefits in the Church so they earnestly prayed that He would appear in His glory, and strengthen the Church, and manifest His compassion to the world of mankind by an abundant outpouring of His Holy Spirit. They desired a true revival in all parts of Christendom, and to see nations delivered from their great and many calamities, and to bless them with the unspeakable benefits of the Kingdom of our glorious Redeemer, and to fill the whole earth with His glory.

These ministers consulted with one another on this subject and concluded that they were obliged to begin such prayer and attempt to persuade others to do the same. After seeking God for direction, they determined that for the next two years they would set apart some time on Saturday evenings and Sunday mornings every week for prayer as one's other duties would allow. More importantly, it was decided that the first Tuesday of each quarter (beginning with the first Tuesday of November) would be time to be spent in prayer. People were to pray for either the entire day or part of the day, as they found themselves disposed, or as circumstances allowed. They would meet in either private prayer groups or in public meetings, whichever was found to be most convenient.

It was determined that none should make any promises or feel under strict obligation to observe every one of these days without fail; for these days were not holy or established by sacred authority. However, to prevent negligence, and the temptation to make excuses for trivial reasons, it was proposed that if those who resolve to pray cannot take part on the agreed upon day, they would use the next available day for the purpose of prayer.

The primary reason for this cooperation in prayer was to maintain, among the people of God, that necessity of prayer for the coming of Christ's Kingdom, which Christ directed his followers to do. We are, unfortunately, too little inclined to pray because of our laziness and immaturity, or because of the distraction of our own worldly, private affairs. We have prayed at times, but without special seasons for prayer, we are, likely, to neglect it either partially or totally. But when we set aside certain times for prayer, resolving to fulfill this commission unless extraordinarily hindered, we are less likely to neglect it.

The return of each new season will naturally refresh the memory and will cause us to remember these teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the obligations we have as His followers. We will be renewed in the importance, necessity and unspeakable value of the mercy we seek from God, and by frequent renovation, the vision to pray will be kept alive in our hearts at all times. Therefore, those ministers from Scotland determined that such gatherings would help encourage greater prayerfulness among God's people for revival throughout the year. They also believed that the quarterly gathering would encourage and strengthen people to pray, especially if they knew that many other Christians in so many distant places were praying for the same things at a same time.

It was thought that two years would be a sufficient trial period, after which time would be given to evaluate fruitfulness of the endeavor. It was not known but thought best to allow some time to make some adjustments if necessary. The time period, though short, was thought sufficient to judge its fruitfulness. Those involved would have the opportunity to communicate their thoughts, and perhaps improve, on this manner of prayer.

As for promulgating this concert of prayer, the ministers decided to simply pass the word through personal conversation, and correspondence with others far away, rather than any formal advertisement in the press. At first it was intended that some formal paper outlining the proposal should be sent around for proper amendments and improvements, and then agreement. But after more thoughtful deliberation, it was concluded that this would only give rise to objections which they thought best to avoid in the beginning.

Great success seems to have met their labors for great numbers in Scotland and England, and even some in North America joined with them. As to Scotland, many people in the four chief cities, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Dundee joined. There were also many country towns and congregations in various other areas that participated. A Mr. Robe, of Kilsyth, stated that "There were then above thirty societies of young people there, newly erected, some of which consisted of upwards of thirty members."

The two years ended last November. Just prior to this, a number of ministers in Scotland agreed on a letter, to be printed and sent abroad to their brethren, proposing to them, and requesting of them, to join with them in continuing this concert of prayer, and in the endeavors to promote it. Almost five hundred copies of this letter were sent over to New England, with instructions to distribute them to the Massachusetts-Bay area, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Carolina and Georgia. Most were sent to a congregational minister in Boston along with a letter from twelve ministers in Scotland. Other copies were sent to other ministers in Boston, and some to a minister in Connecticut.

The proposal, dated August 26, 1746, opens with an explanation of the purpose and times for the concerts of prayer, and an entreaty to the ministers to communicate their opinions after the two year period had completed.

The ministers then go on to assure their Bostonian brethren that the concerts are not to be seen as binding; men are not expected to set apart days from secular affairs, or "fix on any part of ... precise days, whether it be convenient or not." Nor are they to be seen as "absolute promises, but as friendly, harmonious resolutions, with liberty to alter circumstances as shall be found expedient." Because of such liberty these prayer times cannot be judged to infringe upon those "religious times" appointed by men.

The letter also asked ministers to consider composing and publishing short "persuasive directions" regarding the necessity of prayer, either by particular authors or several joining together. Without such repeated reminders men are apt to become weary and begin to neglect their duty. Ministers are also asked to preach frequently on the importance and necessity of prayer for the coming of the Lord's Kingdom, particularly near or on the quarterly times.

The Boston ministers are to understand that these prayer concerts are not restricted to any particular denomination, but is extended to all who have "at heart the interest of vital Christianity, and the power of godliness; and who, however differing about other things, are convinced of the importance of fervent prayer ..."

It was proposed that the prayer should extend for seven more years and the ministers agreed to this. However there was concern that zeal for spreading news of the concert would wane because of the length proposed. Nevertheless, it was agreed that the first period of time (two years) was too short.

If persons who formerly agreed to this concert should discontinue it, would it not look like that fainting in prayer Scripture so ardently warned against? Would this not be particularly unsuitable given the need of public reformation?

Those ministers in Boston said of this proposal: "The motion seems to come from above, and to be wonderfully spreading in Scotland, England, Wales, Ireland and North America."

AFTERWARD

IT HAS BEEN OVER 250 YEARS SINCE Jonathan Edwards preached his famous sermon "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" to a small church in Enfield, Connecticut. On July 8, 1741, Edwards provided the spark that lit the entire eastern seaboard of America afire. The spirit of revivalism that followed the preaching of this sermon transformed complacent believers during a period of spiritual fervor known as the "Great Awakening."

Edwards' sermons stand today as awe inspiring works of intellectual achievement; yet they are graspable and relevant to all who read them seeking for true spiritual experience. This Northampton, Massachusetts pastor began by seeking to restore a sense of commitment to God which he felt had been lost in America since the days of the Puritan exodus. He wanted to transform his congregation from mere believers who understood Christian doctrines to converted Christians who were genuinely moved by their experience. It was Edwards' conviction that we must do more than understand spiritual ideas; we must be moved by them experientially: the difference, as he says, is like that between reading the word "fire" and actually being burned.

"A Humble Attempt" has been reprinted, in part to mark the passing of the fifth Jubilee of the onset of the Great Awakening, but mainly to stir true believers from all parts of the Church to the intercessory prayer that America so desperately needs.

Revival - Edwards and Wesley

By Jay Rogers

We need only look to the great awakenings of past centuries to see that the Church of 20th century America has fallen from great heights ...

The men who led these great awakenings were ordinary men. They were intelligent, but they carried none of the distinguishing marks that accompany those who are capable of changing a nation. There is no money or fame here - no power or prestige. In fact, the greatest characteristic of these men was that they were consumed with a passionate love for Jesus Christ. They were humble men who loved the holiness of God. They were jealous of God's glory and refused to compromise with those who would lower the standard of His holiness.

Jonathan Edwards

One of the most notable examples of such a great man of God is Jonathan Edwards. Although little honor is given to him in most history classes, historians will testify that Jonathan Edwards' life had such an impact on the American colonies that our nation was born. Out of the unity of the Spirit that was the Great Awakening came Independence and Freedom. America was transformed by this Great Awakening which began in the ministry of one man - Jonathan Edwards.

Mason Lowance, a literary critic and historian at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, has this to say about Jonathan Edwards:

"Edwards was clearly the most important figure in the eighteenth century, perhaps even more critical to the development of Western thought than his contemporary Benjamin Franklin ... Franklin's political thinking far exceeded Edwards' ... However, Edward's writing has had far greater influence than has Franklin's..."¹

John Fiske, a 19th century philosopher and historian, who taught at Harvard University, adds this assessment of Edwards:

"One of the great names in the history of philosophy is that of Jonathan Edwards, the profoundest thinker that America has ever produced. His best known work is his 'Treatise on the Will,' a marvellous specimen of deep and powerful reasoning, a book that no student of philosophy for many a year to come, can afford to neglect"²

Jonathan Edwards was the congregationalist minister who preached the Word of God in his home church in Northampton, Massachusetts. His preaching was the spark that set the fire that later became known as the Great Awakening. Edwards delivered intense sermons enlivened by concrete and vivid illustrations.

The most notable of these, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God," was so pointed in its portrayal of the horrendous evil in the hearts of men compared to the virtue which is God, that his listeners became suddenly aware of the uncertainty of life and their own sinfulness. There was a marked intrusion from the heavenlies into their midst.

Edwards delivered this sermon in Enfield, Connecticut, a town about 30 miles south of Northampton, on Sunday, July 8, 1741. We are told that Edwards read his sermon in a level voice with his sermon book in his left hand, and in spite of his calm "there was such a breathing of distress, and weeping, that the preacher was obliged to speak to the people and desire silence, that he might be heard."³

Where did such anointing and conviction come from? What was it that set Edwards apart for such a great destiny? Where did the seeds of greatness begin to germinate? What were the conditions that brought about such a complete reformation of society? To answer these questions we need to look at Edwards' inner life - a life of prayer that is hid in Jesus Christ.

From his youth, Edwards spent much time in secret with God seeking His Presence. He would often walk alone in the fields or the mountains praying to God with a deep affection. He spent much time reading and meditating on the Song of Solomon until he had a deep understanding of God's sweetness and light. He experienced God's presence as a sudden intrusion from "the other world" upon his natural senses. Edwards was used in a great way because he sought to be intimate with the actual Presence of God.

"I had an inward, sweet sense of these things, and my soul was led away in pleasant views and contemplations of the loveliness and sweetness of Jesus Christ. The sense I had of divine things would often kindle up a sweet burning in my soul, that I know not how to express."⁴

He continued his pursuit until he found an undeniable, unquenchable longing after the holiness of God.

"The heaven I desired was a heaven of holiness, to be with God, and to spend my eternity in divine love, and holy communion with Christ"⁵

The Great Awakening

These experiences led Edwards to confront the members of his congregation with the holiness of God, especially the young people of Northampton. The result of this preaching was a revival in Northampton in 1734, which was the first of a series of revivals, now known as the "Great Awakening," which spread from Maine to Georgia, and did much to unite the colonies in spiritual fervor. This was the foundation of a new feeling of strength and unity among the colonies which resulted in the birth of a new nation in 1776.

The Northampton revival continued for about 15 years until Edwards once again began to confront sin in his congregation by naming backsliders from the pulpit and refusing communion and church membership to those who had not had a personal salvation experience. As a result of his renewed zeal, Edwards was ousted as minister on June 22, 1750.

Joseph Hawley, a man whose father had committed suicide during the early years of the revival, blamed Edwards for "religious hysteria." In a noble farewell sermon, Edwards resolved, "Let God be judge." Although the congregation had difficulty in naming a successor to Edwards, they preferred no sermons rather than let Edwards preach.

Joseph Hawley later repented of his part in the controversy and begged for the forgiveness of the slandered minister. Edwards simply removed himself from Northampton. Edwards spent the rest of his life as a missionary to the Indians at Stockbridge, Massachusetts and later as president of Princeton University.

It could be argued that if Edwards had been more easy-going and less intense he would never have had any problems with his flock - but then he wouldn't have been Jonathan Edwards.

Edwards was a reasonable and intelligent man but he was also keenly aware of the holiness of God and would not allow compromise. He could not accommodate the intrusion of an increasingly secularized society into his church. He disdained the outward show of religion as wood, hay and stubble that would only be consumed by the fires of a holy God.

The townspeople were unwilling to put up with these standards and opted for a more comfortable faith. Thus Northampton, Massachusetts holds the distinction of having rejected the greatest social philosopher that America has ever produced.

To most of Northampton's citizens today, Edwards is a shadowy figure of antiquity. Yet he remains her preeminent genius. The curious may see Edwards' likeness in a bronze memorial tablet in the First Church on Main Street. His sermons and other writings are his true memorial; they belong to all who seek after seek after the heart of God and love His holiness.

John Wesley

It was John Wesley who said:

"Give me one hundred men who love only God with all their heart and hate only sin with all their heart, and we will shake the gates of hell and bring in the kingdom of God in one generation."

John Wesley was one of the greatest men of God in modern history. Secular historians credit John Wesley, together with his brother Charles, for a great awakening which saved England from the same blood-bath which was experienced just a short distance away in Paris during the French Revolution in 1789. Wesley shook a backslidden nation bound by immorality and unbelief. When Wesley was born-again, England was born-again. The revival that began among Wesley's Methodists preceded an awakening that swept through all England.

Wesley's work also significantly affected the theology of American churches during the early 1800s. Many revival preachers, such as Charles G. Finney, taught a modified Wesleyan doctrine of holiness which greatly impacted the early growth of American revivalism.

John Wesley was born in 1703, in Epworth, England. He was raised by godly parents and was trained for the ministry at Oxford. During this time, Wesley, his brother Charles, and later George Whitefield, met with a group of young men at Oxford for the purpose of reading classic sermons three nights a week. Their purpose was to inquire how they could become more holy. One night a week they visited the poor and prisoners. Many at Oxford derided the "Holy Club" and felt they had gone "too far" in their pursuit of holiness. This reputation followed Wesley throughout his life. "More than a few," Wesley later admitted, "took me to be a little crack-brained at Oxford."

Soon after this, Wesley sailed to Georgia with his brother and the Reverend John Oglethorpe with the intent of preaching to the American Indians. On the voyage, Wesley was distressed by storms and related: "O how pure in heart he must be, who would rejoice to appear before God at a moment's warning!"

On another occasion, he related that Reverend Oglethorpe asked him if he was saved:

"'Do you know Jesus Christ? Do you know he has saved you?' I answered, 'I hope he has died to save me.' He only added, 'Do you know yourself?' I said, 'I do.' But I fear they were vain words."

While in Georgia, Wesley desired to preach to the Indians. However, domestic disputes with his parishioners kept him from fulfilling his purpose. He was not released from Savannah by Oglethorpe because there was no other minister to tend to the people there. In the two years that Wesley was in Georgia, he was not successful in any of his endeavors and did not see a single soul converted.

On his return journey to England he began to doubt his salvation:

"I went to America, to convert the Indians; but O! who shall convert me? who, what is he that shall deliver me from this evil heart of mischief? I have a fair summer religion. I can talk well; nay, and believe myself, while no danger is near; but let death look me in the face, and my spirit is troubled. Nor can I say, 'To die is gain.'"

Anyone who would have met Wesley at this time would have seen a Christian. He had given his life to preach the gospel; he was an ordained minister; he pursued the holiness of God; he loved all men; and he was zealous for souls. Yet he admitted he lacked saving faith.

"I who went to America to convert others, was never myself converted to God. 'I am not mad,' though I thus speak; 'but I speak the words of truth and soberness.'"

In all this, Wesley's preaching was already radical - "I was desired to preach at St. John the Evangelist's. I did so on these strong words, 'If any man is in Christ he is a new creature.' I was soon afterwards informed many of the best in the parish were so offended, that I was not to preach there anymore."

The Church of England in that day was so asleep that few were ready for a man like Wesley who preached, "You must be born-again." His assertion that the "New Birth" was something that even baptized Church members needed to ensure salvation caused a great controversy. Wesley was barred from preaching in many churches because of this doctrine.

Although he preached powerfully, Wesley was uncertain of his own salvation. Wesley lacked this assurance because his strivings after holiness were legalistic. He was extremely zealous for God but his spiritual experience consisted mainly of making resolutions and feeling as though he could never live up to the standard of God's holiness.

A Life Changing Experience with God

Wesley was convinced of his unbelief and finally resolved to leave preaching, "How can you preach to others, who have not faith yourself?" He asked a friend of his, Peter Boehler, whether or not he thought he should leave preaching.

Boehler answered, "By no means." Wesley then asked, "But what can I preach?" Boehler then gave him the advice that would change his life and affect the destiny of all England: "Preach faith till you have it; and then, because you have it, you will preach faith."

On Monday, March 6, 1738, Wesley began to preach a new doctrine: JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

Two months later, Wesley very unwillingly went to a society in Aldersgate-street, where someone was reading Luther's preface to Romans.

"About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation; and that an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death ...

"And herein I found the difference between this and my former state chiefly consisted. I was striving, yea, fighting with all my might under the law, as well as under grace. But then I was sometimes, if not often conquered; now, I was always conqueror."

Power and Anointing Comes through Faith

The revelation of faith was so strong in Wesley's heart that not only was Wesley's life changed, but he soon saw multitudes begin to stream into the kingdom of God with signs and wonders following.

Soon Wesley was preaching in the open fields to tens of thousands of sinners who never frequented a church building. Previously, he had been so tenacious of every point relating to decency and order, that he would have thought it was a sin to preach salvation outside the covering of the Church of England.

On many occasions God moved so powerfully at his open air meetings that thousands were saved at a time. At one such meeting he related the following scene:

"Four persons sunk down, almost in the same moment. One of them lay without either sense or motion. A second trembled exceedingly. The third had strong convulsions all over his body, but made no noise, unless by groans. The fourth, equally convulsed, called upon God, with strong cries and tears."

Though shut out from the Church of England, Wesley preached like a great apostle, carefully laying out the foundations of the faith in the hearts of his hearers. Previously he had failed to reach a single soul in America, yet now he reaped a great harvest. Wesley's revelation of the victory through faith in Christ Jesus became the force and impetus that changed a generation.

And what about you, dear reader? - Is there a victory of faith in your heart today? What are you basing your relationship with God on? Have you fallen into a "works" mentality? Many see their past successes as evidence of God's favor. Yet God is not even remotely interested in accepting you on the basis of the holiness which you have attained in the past. Others see their failures and have a distraught feeling that God could never use them because of sins that they have committed in the past. These people will always struggle with feelings of guilt and condemnation.

Yet this is justification by faith - Jesus Christ accepts you unconditionally and salvation is available through trusting in Him. This revelation can give you all power over all sin - a restful assurance that Jesus saved you, and is saving you, from the law of sin and death.

You Can Be a World Changer!

Are you like John Wesley who was intensely dissatisfied with his experience with God? Because of his hunger after God and his continual obedience, God used him to shake his nation. If you desire to be like John Wesley, know this - rather than living a mediocre life, you can be a world changer!

From the lives of Wesley, Edwards and others like them, we see a pattern emerging. These men were not anything special in natural terms - but God used them mightily because they loved to be intimate with Him. These men were world changers. They altered the course of history in the nations in which they preached, but their influence was felt far beyond their own lifetime, even to shaping the destinies of many generations.

Despite their greatness in the kingdom of God, these men were without exception opposed by the religious establishment of their day. They sought the heart of God and walked in the spirit at all times.

They desired only to hear the voice of the Lord and obey him.

If you desire this type of life with God, then you must develop the same lifestyle of prayer. This goes beyond simply praying for revival but praying revival prayers.

Revival prayer can be seen in the ministry of Jesus. During the days when Jesus was a man, he agonized in prayer, sometimes with pained outcries and tears, pouring His heart out to His Father. Even though Jesus was God, He had to endure this type of discipline in order to become an inspiring example to those who seek maturity and spiritual freedom (see Hebrews 5:7-10).

The call to revival prayer is a call to the Priesthood of Melchisedec. Those who are called to this order pray the heart-cry of God. This is a lifestyle of total obedience in intercessory prayer. This action of pressing into God is always followed by a desperation for our own lives and for the lives of others.

Revival is essentially a spirit of prayer that rests on a person at all times. The Holy Spirit reveals the Father Heart of God - especially His great burden for lost souls. The spirit of prayer, or soul travail, begins to rest on a person with such magnitude and frequency that he can easily say, "I pray in the Spirit at all times."

In such a state, God will sanctify the person entirely - body, soul and spirit - so that he comprehends and experiences the holiness of God. The fulness of Christ then begins to overflow the person; God, who is infinite, goes on to sanctify everything around Him, using the individual saint as a channel of His love.

I have spoken with only a few people who can claim to have experienced this type of revival. In most cases, these experiences lasted only for a short time - a few days, a few weeks, or at most a few months. There is little of the more powerful type of revival that shook our nation in past centuries. Often when a church experiences a revival, the duration is short and it seems easy to grieve the Holy Spirit. The Presence of God lifts as easily as it descends.

Even so, I am sure that the Body of Christ as a whole can obtain revival. It is God's desire for his whole body to experience a revival that never needs to be revived - to fill the whole earth with His glory.

The Cost of Revival

When this type of revival comes, not only will it have cost something to obtain - it will cost something to keep. If you truly desire this type of experience, know that there is a price to pay.

To keep the revival fires burning you will have to adopt the lifestyle of the early church. According to Acts 2:42-46, the early Church met daily for prayer and praise, for the breaking of bread, and the teaching of the apostles - and they remained in the harmony of the Spirit at all times. This is what the early church did - they met daily - this is what you must do if you are to cultivate revival and keep it alive.

Finally, if your heart hungers and thirsts for more of Jesus, then go to Him and eat and drink as much as you possibly can. Then ask God to enlarge your heart so you can receive more. Don't wait for church leaders to organize prayer meetings - start them yourself! Don't wait for the rest of the Church to experience revival - go for it yourself! Be a leader in the next Great Awakening!

Seek a deeper relationship with Jesus than your brothers and sisters. Do not be discouraged if not everyone shares your new found devotion. Some may be unmoved by your zeal for prayer or even mock it. But know that Jesus has promised to fill all who hunger and thirst for His holiness.

See to it that you hear the word of the Lord and obey Him! God Himself has promised us, "As surely as I live, I am going to fill the whole earth with my glory." Do you desire to be a part of that glory? Then go to Jesus' feet and worship Him in reverence and awe.

Wesley and Whitefield

By Jay Rogers

John Wesley and George Whitefield first met when they were students at Oxford. Wesley was the leader of the "Holy Club," a group dedicated to the pursuit of holiness. Wesley's little band was derided at Oxford; they were ridiculed by being dubbed "Methodists" because of their vigorous discipline. It was Whitefield who first received a revelation of grace which powerfully equipped him to be a great evangelist. He enjoyed great popularity among the common people, until the churches he preached in became so packed that he had no choice but to preach outdoors. Crowds of over ten thousand people would often gather to hear him preach. John Wesley soon followed Whitefield's example at his friend's invitation and had the same spectacular results. Tens of thousands were converted and the awakening spread throughout England.

The styles of the two preachers were quite different. Whitefield was a flamethrower; his words were like a burning fire, like a hammer smashing a rock into pieces. But Wesley was a wise master builder; he carefully laid out the foundations of the faith in the hearts of his hearers. In fact, many of those converted through Whitefield's preaching later became known as Methodists through Wesley's continual ministry. Both Wesley and Whitefield regarded preaching as the primary means which God used to save souls. Both were ready to preach at any time the fundamental doctrines of Christianity - sin, repentance, salvation, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, repentance, faith, holiness - and they preached these truths unceasingly.

"Wesley, however, was very unlike Whitefield in one important respect. He did not forget to organize as well as to preach. He was not content with reaping the fields which he found ripe for harvest. He took care to bind up his sheaves and gather them into the barn. He was far superior to Whitefield as an administrator and as a man of method, as he was inferior to him as a mere preacher.

"A writer in the North British Review described the difference: 'All force and impetus, Whitefield was the powder-blast in the quarry, and by one explosive sermon would shake a district, and detach materials for other men's long work; deft, neat, and painstaking, Wesley loved to split and trim each fragment into uniform plinths and polished stones'" (J.C. Ryle, Christian Leaders of the 18th Century).

The Almost Christian - By John Wesley

"The Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (Acts 26:28).

And there are many who go thus far; ever since the Christian religion was in the world, there have been many in every age and nation, who were "almost persuaded to be Christians." But seeing it avails nothing before God, to go only thus far, it highly imports us to consider,

First, What is implied in being almost:

Secondly, What in being altogether a Christian.

What is implied in being almost a Christian?

Now, in the being almost a Christian is implied, first Heathen Honesty. No one, I suppose, will make any question of this; especially, since by heathen honesty here, I mean, not that which is recommended in the writings of their philosophers only, but such as the common heathens expected of one another, and many of them actually practiced.

By the rules of this they were taught, that they ought not to be unjust: Not to take away their neighbor's goods, either by robbery or theft: Not to oppress the poor, neither to use extortion toward any: Not to cheat or overreach either the poor or rich, in whatsoever commerce they had with them: To defraud no man of his right; and if it were possible, to owe no man anything.

Again, the common heathen allowed, that some regard was to be paid to truth as well as to justice. Yet, again, there was a sort of love and assistance, which they expected one from another.

A second thing implied in being almost a Christian, is having a Form of Godliness, of that godliness which is prescribed in the gospel of Christ; the having the outside of a real Christian. Accordingly, the almost Christian does nothing which the gospel forbids. He takes not the name of the Lord in vain. He blesses and curses not ; he swears not at all, but his communication is yea, yea; nay, nay. He not only avoids all actual adultery, fornication, and uncleanness, but every word or look, that either directly or indirectly tends thereto.

And in doing good, he does not confine himself to cheap and easy offices of kindness, but labours and suffers for the profit of many, that by all means he may help some. He hath the form of godliness, uses the means of grace; yea, all of them, and at all opportunities. He constantly frequents the house of God; and behaves with seriousness and attention.

To this, if we add, the constant use of Family Prayer, by those who are masters of families, and the setting times apart for private addresses to God, with a daily seriousness of behavior: he who uniformly practices this outward religion, has the form of godliness.

There needs but one thing more in order to his being an almost a Christian, and that is, Sincerity. By Sincerity, I mean a real, inward principle of religion, from whence these outward actions flow. And, indeed, if we have not this, we have not heathen honesty; no, not so much of it as will answer the demand of a heathen Epicurean poet. Even this poor wretch, in his sober intervals, is able to testify: Good men avoid sin from the love of virtue: Wicked men avoid sin from a fear of punishment.

So, that, if a man only abstain from doing evil in order to avoid punishment, to avoid the loss of his friends, or his gain, his reputation, should not also abstain from doing evil, but also do ever so much good; yea, and use all the means of grace; yet we could not with any propriety say, "This man is even almost a Christian." If he have no better principle in his heart, he is also a hypocrite altogether. Sincerity, therefore, is necessarily implied in the being almost a Christian.

But here it will probably be inquired, Is it possible, that any man living should go as far as this, and, nevertheless, be only almost a Christian? What more can be implied, in the being a Christian altogether? I answer first, That it is possible to go thus far, and yet be almost a Christian, I learn not only from the Oracles of God, but also from the sure testimony of experience.

I did for many years, as many of this place can testify; using diligence to eschew all evil, and to have a conscience void of offence; redeeming the time; buying up every opportunity of doing all good to all men; constantly and carefully using all the public and private means of grace; endeavoring, after a steady seriousness of behavior, at all times, and in all places: and God is my record, before whom I stand, doing all this in sincerity; having a real design to serve God; a hearty desire to do His will in all things; to please Him who had called me to "fight the good fight," and to "lay hold on eternal life." Yet my own conscience bears me witness, in the Holy Ghost, that all this time I was but almost a Christian.

What more than this is implied in the being altogether a Christian?

First, the love of God. For thus said the Lord in His word, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." Such a love of God is this, as engrosses the whole heart, as takes up all the affections, as fills the entire capacity of the soul, and employs the utmost extent of all its faculties. He that thus loves the Lord his God, His spirit continually "rejoice in God his Saviour."

The second thing implied in being altogether a Christian, is, The love of our neighbor. For thus said our Lord in the following words, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." If any man ask who is my neighbor; we reply, every man in the world; every child of His Who is the Father of the spirits of all flesh. Nor may we in any wise except our enemies, or the enemies of God and their own souls, but every Christian loves these also as himself, yea, "as Christ loves us."

There is yet one thing more that may be separately considered, though it cannot be actually separate from the preceding, which implies in the being altogether a Christian, and that is the ground of all, even faith.

Now, whatsoever has this faith, which purifies the heart, (by the power of God Who dwells therein,) from pride, anger, desire, from all unrighteousness, from all filthiness of flesh or spirit; which fills it with love stronger than death, both to God and to all mankind; love that does the works of God, glorying to spend and to be spent for all men, and that endures with joy, not only the reproach of Christ, the being mocked, despised, and hated of all men, but whatsoever the wisdom of God permits the malice of men or devils to inflict: whosoever has this faith thus working by love, is not almost only, but altogether a Christian.

Do good designs and good desires make you a Christian? By no means, unless they are brought to good effect. "The road to Hell is paved (said one) with good intentions." The great question of all, then, still remains: Is the love of God shed abroad in your heart? Can you cry out: "My God and my all!" Do you desire nothing but Him? Are you happy in God? Is He your glory?, your delight, your crown of rejoicing?

And is this commandment written in your heart: That he who loves God love his brother also? Do you then love your brother as yourself? Do you love every man, even your enemies, even the enemies of God, as your own soul? As Christ loved you? Do you believe that Christ loved you, and gave Himself for you? Have you indeed redemption through His blood, even the remission of thy sins? And does His Spirit bear witness with your spirit, that you are a child of God?

May we thus all experience what it is, to be not only almost, but altogether Christians! Being justified freely by His grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus: knowing we have peace with God through Jesus Christ: rejoicing in hope of the glory of God, and having the love of God shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost given to us!

John Wesley - The Highway of Holiness

By Jay Rogers

"And a highway will be there, a roadway - And it will be called the highway of holiness. The unclean will not travel on it, but it will be for him who walks that way - And fools will not wander on it" (Isaiah 35:8).

The following article - "The Highway of Holiness" - is John Wesley's plan of salvation according. In this article, I will be making repeated reference to the sermons of the 18th century revivalist John Wesley. Although I am not Wesleyan or Methodist in background, I make use of Wesley's sermons because he was the first Christian leader in modern times to develop a systematic plan of salvation which included the biblical doctrine of sanctification - or holiness. The singular use of Wesley's sermons is not intended to exclude nor detract from any other Christian movement which came before his time or after it. I use Wesley's quotes merely because they are biblically sound and useful in this study.

Sin ... The Problem

"For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Romans 3:23).

It is pleasing for us to hear about the love and forgiveness of God, but it is wrong and unscriptural to preach nothing else. We are all born sinners, first and foremost; we must be purged before we can receive God's love. If we are not cleansed of all the filth of the flesh, any gospel of God's love will only feed the disease.

We must first be awakened to the reality of sin. The unawakened will only have a false sense of security. As full of diseases as they may be, they will see themselves as being in perfect health. Simply stated: We cannot truly be saved until we realize that we are sinners.

You don't have to be a Christian to realize that there is something seriously wrong with the human race. Yet few people can see to the heart of the problem. Some would say that if we could change our habits, change our environment and learn to love our fellow man, then we could solve the problem. The problem is not found in society, however, the problem is in man's heart. We are full of a deadly disease that human ability cannot cure.

In addition to this, the disease is universal - all have sinned. Even decent people who have lived respectable, moral lives are filled with the worst kind of iniquity. The doctrine of "moral depravity" is almost absent in our society today. This message cuts across the grain of modern thinking. Wesley wrote: "It is now quite unfashionable to say anything to the disparagement of human nature."¹

The world tries to deny the reality of sin, while the Church softens the term by saying, "nobody's perfect," or by calling it a mistake, a problem, a habit, etc. Yet in the 20th century we have seen some of the worst acts of moral depravity ever known to man.

The Bible does not say we are sinners because we commit acts of sin; it says we commit acts of sin because we are sinners. As painful as this may be, we must become fully awakened to this fact: there is no good thing in us. If we do not accept this, we will continue to grow worse and worse until we die and are eternally separated from God.

A Short Word on Grace ...

Before we examine the different stages of grace in salvation, understand that they are merely stages and not categories. Grace is grace. The stages are put into categories merely to illustrate the nature of spiritual pilgrimage in the conversion experience of the believer. Grace is the love and power of God that continually draws us toward Himself and away from sin and the world.

Prevenient Grace ... The Power to Begin

"But God demonstrates His own love for us in this: while we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Romans 5:28).

Prevenient grace is leading grace. It is the grace that operates in us before the conversion experience. It means literally: "the grace that comes before." We have already seen that man is hopelessly lost and sinful. He is like a drowning man in a vast ocean, a thousand miles from outside help; unless he receives supernatural intervention he will die. There is nothing this man can do to save himself. His only hope is a supernatural move of God.

It is God's grace that keeps the unconverted sinner from sliding into the pit of hell at this very moment. The sinner is kept alive, although he deserves to die, because of God's great love for him. It is prevenient grace - this grace that comes before - that enables anything resembling the image of God to remain in us. Many say that we are all God's children. This is not the case! We are all born with an adamic, sinful nature that is more akin to the devil than to God! Were it not for God's grace, life on earth would be a living hell for all people. There is no good thing in us - there is only One who is good!

How does prevenient grace work in us to draw us toward God?

First, it is God's grace that creates an awareness in us that He even exists. We see this through God's imprint in nature. The great work of nature declares that God is alive today. He created the world and is Ruler, Lord and Judge over it.

Second, prevenient grace works through the LAW. Through the Law we are able to see that we are sinners. While we are never able to be justified by keeping the Law, it gives us the knowledge of our great need for a Savior and Redeemer.

Third, God loved the world so much that He gave His only Son to die for us and pay the penalty for the sin of the world with His blood. This blood exists today as a payment for the sins of all people. In His great love, God also gives us the right to choose - to accept or reject His grace.

Before a sinner can be converted, he must be strongly convicted. He must realize: (1) God is a holy God who is coming to judge this world; (2) There is no good thing in him; (3) God is a loving God who sent His only Son to become sin on our behalf and was nailed to a cross to pay the penalty of our sin. The sinner must come to a position in which he fully believes this before he can be saved.

Converting Grace ... The Turning Point

"Repent and be converted" (Acts 3:19).

"Believe in the Lord Jesus and you shall be saved" (Acts 16:31).

"Repent and believe the gospel" (Mark 1:15).

Converting grace is saving grace. Whenever Wesley spoke of prevenient grace, he always said to his hearers, "If you stir up the spark of grace which is in you, God will give you more grace."² Converting grace is salvation empowered by equal thrusts of repentance and faith. Saving grace focuses on two terms: repentance and belief (faith). Together they constitute salvation. However, repentance always precedes faith.

Picture in your mind, if you will, the Space Shuttle taking off from the launching pad. The first stage of the rocket, the booster stage, propels the shuttle upward, upward until it reaches the outer atmosphere. At this point, it is far from the earth, but not yet in orbit. To accomplish this, the shuttle orbiter ejects itself from the booster stage and ignites its own engines thus giving it the additional thrust needed to be propelled into orbit.

In the same way, repentance gives us the power to be free from sin, the world and the devil. Repentance, however, is not enough. We also need faith to receive the grace - a supernatural ability from God which enables us to overcome sin in our daily lives - and walk out our salvation in a way pleasing to God. Without repentance we will never be able to get off the the launching pad. Without faith, we will lose our momentum and our shuttle orbiter will come crashing down to the earth. We need equal thrusts of each to really soar and become true converts. But repentance must always precede faith.

Repentance

What does it mean to repent? In Wesley's own words, it is "a change of heart from all sin to all holiness."³ There are essentially three aspects of repentance: knowledge, conviction and change.

First, know yourself to be a sinner. Know that you are corrupted in every way. Know that you are miserable and lost without God. Apart from God no one is "O.K." You are in a desperate situation.

Second, we must experience conviction. Conviction is threefold. We are convicted of our sin; of God's righteousness; and of God's eternal judgment (John 16:8). Conviction means that the Holy Spirit has dealt with us. In our hearts, we are convinced that we are guilty and deserving of eternal destruction. Conviction is not all negative, however, since it leads us to change.

Third, we must be changed. To repent is to turn away from sin. This is the true end result of having repented. If we were merely to have been convicted of sin, then we would have remained in a most miserable state! But repentance leads us to want to change. Repentance is an attitude of the heart but it also requires action. To say that we have truly repented means that we must have turned 180 degrees away from sin and toward God.

Faith

But repentance is not enough! Repentance alone cannot save anyone! We must also believe the good news. Belief means the same thing as having faith. Faith is not a mere intellectual acknowledgement that God exists. Faith is belief, but belief that provokes a response. Faith is an action word. As we turned away from sin in repentance, we also need to turn toward God in faith. Faith is also threefold: confidence, assurance, reliance.

First, we must have confidence in the mercy and forgiveness of God. This means that we trust in God alone for righteousness. Through prevenient grace we saw the exceeding sinfulness of our own hearts, but through converting grace we see God's great love for us! "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1:9). This means that God cleansed us from all unrighteousness. There is no unrighteousness left. In God's eyes, we are righteous! But we must always remember that the confidence we have comes from Jesus. It is His righteousness that saves us.

Second, in order to be saved, we must have assurance of our salvation. Consider Wesley's famous conversion experience at Aldersgate Street:

"I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt that I did trust Christ, Christ alone for salvation: And an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sin, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."⁴

What more can we say about assurance? Through faith we have assurance that Jesus Christ is the only foundation on which we can stand.

Third, reliance means that we are dependent on the Lordship of Jesus. We are standing on the Rock, now and forever. In the past we relied on our own strength and our own works; now we must rely on Jesus.

True faith is at the heart of the declaration - "Jesus is Lord!" True faith is the expression of the Lordship of Jesus in every area of our lives. Jesus Christ is the supreme authority. In this way, reliance is further expressed by obedience. This is not in terms of legalism, but by a joyful obedience - the intense desire to obey and to please God. It is from Christ alone that we get our direction and power to live a holy life. This reliance on Christ for our salvation never changes.

Saving grace is repentance and faith walking hand in hand. We need God's prevenient grace to enable us to repent. But repentance always comes before saving grace. Repentance without faith is false repentance; and faith without repentance is dead faith. The Bible requires us to look at ourselves (Galatians 6:1) - this is repentance - and also look to Jesus (Hebrews 12:2) - this is faith.

Salvation can be compared to a house. Repentance is the porch of salvation; justification by faith is the door; and all the rest of the house and all its rooms are your sanctification. You are now standing at the door. Before we go on to explore the house, ask yourself the following question:

"Am I saved?"

To be saved means that you have truly repented from all known sin and that you have faith in Jesus Christ and His death on the cross alone for your salvation. We hear countless testimonies from people who were saved "X" years ago. Sadly, many of these were counterfeit conversions. Many of these people accepted Jesus "by faith" but they did not repent. These are the "Almost Christians."

In addition, salvation is a day by day process. We have been saved; we are being saved; and we will be saved. How about you? You may claim to have been saved "X" number of years ago, but are you saved today in this moment? Are you continuing to grow and walk in the Lord Jesus by faith?

Before you continue on the highway of holiness - take a good look at your own heart. Is there known sin in your life? If so, you need to turn away from sin - NOW! Pray that God would give you a true hatred for all sin, not just a hatred for the guilt of sin, but for the sin itself. You need to repent before you can receive the faith to live a holy life.

Do you have true faith? Are you relying on Christ, and Christ alone for your salvation - or does guilt and condemnation rule your life? Have you fallen into a "works" mentality? If so, then you need a good dose of God's mighty grace and His holy love. This alone is sufficient. Pray that God would birth this revelation of faith in your heart.

Take a moment now and examine yourself. The rest of this article cannot benefit you unless you fully understand the nature of your salvation. I pray that you will let these truths sink into your heart.

Transforming Grace ...
The Effects of Salvation

"Therefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creation; old things have passed away. Behold! All things have become new" (2 Corinthians 5:17).

Assuming that you have been saved, you must have been changed. Converting grace begins it all, but then there are the effects of salvation. In order to be saved, you must be: (1) Justified by Faith. (2) You must be Born-Again. (3) You must bear the marks of Initial Sanctification.

This teaching cuts across much of the established religious teaching of our day. It is possible to be born, baptized and raised in a church, live a respectable and moral life, die a church member in good standing and still split hell wide open!

The teaching that the "new birth" is something you need in order to be saved is the very essence of Christianity. Yet it is sadly neglected or repudiated in many circles. Criticism is also leveled at the doctrine of initial sanctification. Many so called believers in Jesus Christ cling to the belief that they remain fallen, though Christian. They say, "We still sin every day in thought, word, and deed." They simply refuse believe that it is possible to live a holy life. May God use this study on "Transforming Grace" to deliver us from this warped and shallow view of salvation!

Justification by Faith

"By grace ye are saved through faith" (Ephesians 2:8).

As we saw earlier, faith puts us in a position to receive the empowerment of God's grace which enables us to walk out the Christian life. We are justified by the shed blood of Jesus Christ on the cross. This alone has the power to save us from all sin and all unrighteousness.

This is how Wesley defined faith: "It is not barely a speculative, rational thing, a cold, lifeless assent, a train of ideas in the head; but also a disposition in the heart ... it acknowledges His death as the only sufficient means of redeeming man from death eternal, and his resurrection as the restoration of us all to life and immortality; inasmuch as He was delivered for our sins, and rose again for our justification. Christian faith is, then, not only an assent to the whole gospel of Christ, but also a full reliance on the blood of Christ; a trust in the merits of His life, death and resurrection; reliance upon Him as our atonement and our life, as our wisdom, righteousness, and redemption, or, in one word our salvation. Ye are saved ... from sin. This is the salvation which is through faith. Ye are saved ... both from the guilt and the power of it."

No longer does guilt and condemnation rule the lives of those justified by faith, nor does any habitual sin reign in their lives. They desire continually the holy and perfect will of God.

Regeneration

"Whoever believes that Jesus is the Christ is born of God" (1 John 5:1).

"Unless a man is born again he cannot see the kingdom of God" (1 John 3:3).

All those who are justified by faith or saved by faith, are born-again. Jesus spoke of being born-again of the Spirit (John 3:1-8). All those who have been saved have died to sin through faith in the blood of Jesus Christ. They have been raised to new life through the Spirit; they are born again into a new life which is hid with Christ in God. "All things have become new." Newborn babies desire milk; even so those born of the Spirit desire the sincere milk of the Word (1 Peter 1:23-2:3). They feed themselves voraciously on the Word and grow mightily in the power of God, from faith to faith, grace to grace, until they become mature and measure up to the stature and fulness of the life of Jesus Christ.

In studying the scriptures on regeneration, you may ask: "Why must I be born-again?"

Man was created in the image of God, but when Adam sinned, death entered the world. This speaks of spiritual death as well as physical death. In Adam all died - all mankind. All the children of Adam came into this world spiritually dead - dead to God, and dead in sin. We came into the world entirely void of the life of God, and void of the image of God. Everyone that is born of Adam is born in sin.

All those who are born in sin must be born-again of God. Therefore, everyone who has ever been born into this world, must be born-again before they can even see the kingdom of God. Understanding the depravity of man in the light of the holiness of God, you should not be surprised at the mandate: "You must be born-again."

Initial Sanctification

"What then? Shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid!" (Romans 6:15)

Many of the reformers preached salvation by faith, and faith alone. Wesley believed this, but also added: "To preach salvation, or justification, by faith only, is to preach against holiness and good works. But we speak of a faith that is not separate from these, but productive of all good works and all holiness."5

This question was posed in Paul's time: "Shall we go on sinning that grace may abound?" The answer: "NO!" Or as J.B. Phillips translates - "What a ghastly thought!"6

This is one of the most confusing points of salvation theology for most people. The Roman Catholic Church, the Eastern Orthodox Church and almost every Protestant denomination holds to the belief that sin nature remains in a believer even after he is converted. The fact that Christians continue to sin after salvation is merely a reality speaking both from experience and biblical precedent. However, some have carried the corruption of the heart too far. They view remaining sin nature to such an extreme that the believer is still in bondage to sin and there is hardly any outward distinction between a believer and a sinner. How do we define initial sanctification?

First, initial sanctification does not mean that we cease to sin altogether when we are converted. "I do not suppose any man who is justified is a slave to sin; yet I do suppose sin remains (at least for a time) in all that are justified."⁷

Second, God never provides a license to sin - sin nature may remain in you and you may remain a child of God. But if you walk after the flesh, you are a child of the devil. This doctrine does not encourage you to sin, but to resist it with all your might. The blood of the cross justifies you. At that very moment, sin nature is under your feet. It has no dominion over you, but it still exists. "Sin can exist but it cannot reign." This is not a license to sin. It is merely a reality. Believers are delivered from the guilt of sin and the power of sin, but not from the being of it.

"Christ gave himself for the Church, that it might be holy and without blemish" (Ephesians 5:25-27).

This is an encouragement to press on. Though it never was - and is not yet - so it will be in the end. The believer goes on, conquering to conquer all sin. Every babe in Christ is holy if he is holy in part, yet not altogether so. This is initial sanctification: Sin may remain, but it must not reign.

Growth in Grace ... Pressing on to Perfection

"But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. To Him be the glory both now and forever. Amen" (2 Peter 3:18).

Grace is the supernatural power of God that enables us to grow in Christ and live a holy life. This study on salvation is a study on grace. Grace means infinitely more than just forgiveness or "God's unmerited favor." Grace is power over sin. Grace preceded our salvation; it was the means of our salvation; and it is our means of growth in faith and holiness.

A tiny acorn falls to the ground. The earth receives many acorns, but only a few will grow to be mighty oaks. In order for an acorn to sprout and grow, the conditions need to be right. First, the ground needs to be soft enough for the acorn to put down roots. Second, the sprouted acorn needs to be watered. Third, the soil needs to provide enough nutrients for the young tree to grow. These conditions provide the growth - yet they are not the growth itself. The means of growth are not the same thing as growth.

Means of Grace ...

In the same way, there are many means of grace in the life of a believer. It is important to understand that these means of grace are not grace in and of themselves. If it were so, then grace would no longer be grace, and our salvation would be one of works. There are, however, means by which God moves through grace to help us grow. Here we will study six means of grace: assurance, prayer, the Word of God, the Lord's Supper, fasting and fellowship.

Assurance

How do we know that we are saved? This is an important question - for how can we begin to grow in our salvation without first having assurance of our salvation? According to Romans 8:16: "The Spirit himself testifies that we are God's children." Here we find the law of two witnesses:

First, there is the testimony of the Holy Spirit. The first move is always of God since it is He who loved us first (1 John 4:10). Salvation is God's gift to us and we have the Holy Spirit inspired Word of God as evidence of these promises. We are indeed the children of God.

Second, there is the testimony of our own spirit. We examine ourselves to see that we have repented of all known sin; that there is an outward change in our lives; that there is the fruit of the Spirit being manifested in a renewed character; that we find joy in the service of God. Once we have ascertained the positive testimony of these two witnesses, we are to put ourselves in position to receive more grace.

Prayer

Prayer is a relationship with God. If we have disciplined prayer lives, we will grow in grace with God. If we do not pray at all times, every day, spiritual dryness will result. In Wesley's words: "Such is the nature of what many have termed, and not improperly, 'the wilderness state.' ... What are the causes of it? These indeed are various ... God never repenteth of what He hath given, or desires to withdraw them from us. Therefore He never deserts us, as some speak: it is we only that desert Him ... Perhaps no sin of omission more frequently occasions this than the neglect of prayer."8

The Word of God

John Wesley knew the power of the Word of God. A casual perusal of his sermons will prove that he saturated himself with the scriptures. His writing is soaked in biblical allusions, quotations and analogies. To Wesley, wisdom began with the knowledge of the Word. He advocated his Methodists to read the whole Bible and not just portions of it. He himself read from both the Old and New Testaments every day. He had little use for dry, distant interpretations of the Scriptures. Instead, he wanted readers to ask, "What does this mean for me? - How shall I then live?" The practical application of the Word of God to daily life is by far the greatest means of grace.

The Lord's Supper

The taking of communion is to be understood as a means of grace. Matthew 26:29 should be taken literally: "But I say to you, I will not drink of this fruit of the vine from now on until that day when I drink it new with you in My Father's kingdom." In other words, when we receive communion, Christ eats and drinks with us. Christ manifests His presence through the elements. Not that the Bread and the Cup actually become the Body and the Blood of Christ - by no means! We must stop short of any notion of transubstantiation. But communion is not just symbolism either - (as many Protestants believe). The Body and Blood of Christ are present during the time when Lord's Supper is taken as Christ exercises His divine authority from heaven. Thus, communion exists as a means of grace for those believers participating in the Lord's Supper.

Fasting

In the beginning of his ministry, Wesley kept regular fasts twice a week on Wednesday and Friday. Later, he dropped Wednesday but encouraged his followers to keep regular fasts every Friday. This was not an act of suffering or mortification; it was merely a time set aside for prayer. Wesley would fast after his last meal on Thursday evening and break it at tea time on Friday afternoon. Although he often did longer fasts, it was not the length of the fast that mattered, but the quality of the time consecrated to God. The weekly regular fasts were viewed as a sufficient means of grace.

Fellowship

As it turned out, fellowship groups, or as Wesley termed them, "Christian conferences," were the primary means by which the Methodists gained power as a "little church" within the Church of England during the 18th century. These were the primary instruments by which the Methodists worked for reformation of doctrine and restoration of New Testament Church experience. The Methodist revival was maintained with great power for as long as they kept up this practice. The structure of the Christian conference was organized into three units: bands, classes and societies.

Bands

These were groups of four to eight people of the same sex and as near the same maturity level in Christ as possible. These were led by a "band leader" who was a more mature Christian. This was a response to a felt need that almost every Christian experiences - to have a small, intimate place to confess our sins one to another, to share our concerns, to find common spiritual experience so that we can relate to one another, and to encourage one another.

Classes

These groups were about a dozen men and women ranging in maturity from the leaders of the church to those new-born in Christ. This group proved to be the most effective place for nurturing spiritual life. The class leader was termed the "undershepherd" and was responsible for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the group.

Societies

Societies were church meetings of about forty. They met weekly for praise and worship, testimony, expository Bible preaching, and prayer. These groups were led by ordained clergy as well as by laymen.

It was rare to find a Methodist Society meeting that was "large" by today's standards.

On each level, the dynamic was different, but together the groups functioned as an effective means of grace for nurturing and discipleship. Wesley was constantly organizing and reorganizing these groups with advice and input from his friends in the Moravian societies. The Moravians had kept up a similar practice in Europe for years with great success and had trained some of the first Protestant missionaries through these groups. Wesley would interview almost every new Methodist convert personally and expected that spiritual experience in Christ would be upheld with great fervor within each group.

The effectiveness of Wesley's conferences was due to the great importance he placed on them as a "means of grace." On one occasion Wesley visited a church that had yet to implement this structure and remarked: "The consequence is that nine out of ten once awakened are now faster asleep than ever." Wesley further warned that "preaching like an apostle without joining together those who are awakened and training them up in the ways of God, is only begetting children for the murderer."

Christian Perfection ...
The Heart of Holiness

"Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be holy: for I am the Lord your God" (Leviticus 20:7).

This was John Wesley's vision: God Himself had raised up the Methodists to proclaim the doctrine of Christian Perfection - "to spread scriptural holiness across the land." This was a special mandate which God had given the Methodists. It was Wesley's most important contribution to the Church.

What is meant by - perfection? There is hardly any expression in the Word of God that is more offensive to the carnal mind than the words perfection and holiness. The very thought is enough to make us cry out, "But nobody's perfect!" And yet the scriptures command us again and again, "Be ye holy ... be ye perfect."

By "perfection," we do not mean absolute, total, outward perfection. Even the Apostle Paul speaks of himself as not perfect: "Not as though I had attained, either were already perfect" (Philippians 3:2). So what does it mean to be perfect?

"Christian perfection, therefore does not imply (as some men seem to have imagined) an exemption either from ignorance, or mistakes, or infirmities, or temptations. Indeed, it is only another term for holiness. They are two names for the same thing. Thus, every one that is holy is, in the Scripture sense, perfect. Yet we may, lastly, observe, that neither in this respect is there any absolute perfection on earth. There is no perfection of degrees, as it is termed; none which does not admit of a continual increase. So that how much soever he is perfect, he hath still need to 'grow in grace,' and daily to advance in the knowledge and love of God his savior."⁹

In what sense, then, are Christians perfect? Christian perfection is bound up in the action of "pressing toward the mark." If we are in the process of doing this, then in God's eyes we are already perfect, although we have not obtained its fullness.

There is an initial sanctification, evidence that the person had been born-again; a gradual sanctification, a growth in grace leading to greater holiness; which in turn could lead to an entire sanctification, a total separation from all known sin. It is at least possible by grace to abstain from all known sin. Involuntary, or unknown sin, is not excluded in the life of the one who is entirely sanctified. Thus, no one has reached sinless perfection.

But it is possible for a believer in all cases to abstain from known sin. This is a result of the grace that God gives to us to have power over sin. It is not a holiness of works; it is a holiness of heart. We are saved by faith which produces all inward and outward holiness.

* Perfection also speaks of maturity. There are stages in the Christian life and perfection is the aim of our spiritual pilgrimage. There are those who have grown up into the fulness of Christ. They are mature and, in a sense, perfect.

* Perfection also entails purity of the heart or singleness of intent. The heart of holiness is a will that is bent toward God. And while outwardly we may make mistakes, our intent is always to please God, our heart being pure. This also entails purity of the mind from evil thoughts. Our hearts and minds are entirely consecrated for service to God.

* Perfection also requires perfect love. Our intentions are empowered by the grace that that is found in a loving God. We receive this grace through faith and understanding that we are accepted by God on the basis of His love, not by the level of perfection we have reached. This revelation makes it easy; we do not have to be afraid to fail or be devastated by our failures. We can confess our sins and then move on again to perfection.

Believers aim toward perfection and expect to attain it by the power of the Spirit. We should acknowledge the problem of sin in believers, but firmly resist the notion that "we are bound to sin every day in thought, word, and deed," as some teach.

Failure is not a loss of personal holiness. It is merely a reminder of our own incapability to be holy outside of the grace of God. And no matter what level of perfection we have reached, our own holiness is still "as filthy rags" in comparison to the holiness of God. This is Christian perfection: We can live a holy life and still grow in holiness - "Let us go on unto perfection."

Glorification ...

The Power of the Kingdom and Eternal Judgment

"Beloved, now we are sons of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we shall be. But we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is. And every man that has this hope purifies himself even as He is pure" (John 3:2,3).

Glorification is the end result of our Christian life. Once we have been justified, we are born again and can receive the grace to live a holy life. Holiness, in turn, results in eternal life. This is a life that exists not only in heaven, but here on earth as well. The mandate Christ gave to the Church was to advance His glorious kingdom forcefully through the preaching of the gospel. Each individual believer's personal holiness ought to affect every area of society and a holy Church ought to right every social wrong.

Central to this teaching is Jesus Christ's command to His disciples to pray: "Thy Kingdom come; Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven" (Matthew 6:10).

John Wesley once proclaimed: "Give me one hundred men who love only God with all their heart and hate only sin with all their heart and we will shake the gates of hell and bring in the kingdom of God in one generation."

The Kingdom of God goes forward every time the gospel is preached. One day the whole earth will be filled with the knowledge of the glory of God. This does not mean, however, that everyone who hears the gospel preached will become a part of the Kingdom.

"Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only he who does the will of my Father who is in heaven" (Matthew 7:21).

"Knowest thou not that the wages of sin is death ? - death, not only temporal, but eternal ... This is the sentence, to be punished with never-ending death, with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power."¹⁰

While he fully accepted the doctrine of eternal judgment, Wesley preached to emphasize the grace and love of God, believing that love was a more powerful and sincere motivator to commitment than the fear of judgement. Wesley concluded that, although the wrath of God should be taught, an overemphasis on this type of preaching "generally hardens them that believe not, and discourages them that do."

Eternal hell exists only in the light of the infinite love of a holy God. Hell exists for those who reject the promises of God. Eternal judgment awaits the children of disobedience. Not everyone is going to respond to the high calling of the Kingdom of God. Not all who say, "Lord, Lord," truly embrace the Lordship of Jesus Christ. And there will always be those who flatly reject the life of righteousness, peace and joy found in Jesus Christ.

The message of salvation in Christ is offered on the basis of love. Yet, at the same time, hearers are urged to give up the notion that they can remain in sin and "make heaven." The Word of God is very clear about what makes you fit for heaven: "Without holiness no one will see the Lord." Instead of asking: "Will I make it to heaven?" - you should rather be asking: "Am I holy?" Only the pure in heart shall see God.

Conclusion

John Wesley saw the Kingdom of God advance in his own lifetime, but he also understood that only the eternal power of God would remain when the Kingdom came in its fullness. Wesley's accomplishments during his lifetime were indicative of this belief. Regarding earthly wealth, he often encouraged his followers to: "Earn all you can; save all you can; give all you can."

Wesley lived an abundant life in full assurance of his salvation. Shortly before he died at age 88, he sang a hymn: "I'll praise my Maker while I've breath; And when my voice is lost in death, Praise shall employ my noblest powers; My days of praise shall ne'er be past, While life, and thought, and being last, Or immortality endures." He raised out his arm and proclaimed: "The best of all is, God is with us!" Then he said, "Farewell," and died. Wesley had this assurance because he believed and practiced what he preached.

Millions of English pounds passed through his ministry, which he used to build orphanages, print Bibles and books, and give to the poor. He died with the following possessions: several silver spoons, six one pound notes - "Give one each to the pall-bearers who carry my casket to the grave" - and a handful of his books, sermons and commentaries.

But the spiritual accomplishments of his life - millions of changed lives the world over - are riches that defy comparison.

Campus Revivals of the Past

by Nick Pappis

Could a Christian revival come to your campus? Many people today laugh at the idea. After all, they suppose, students on American campuses in the 1980s are far too sophisticated to want religion. And besides, they have adopted a new set of materialistic values that leave no room for God or the Bible.

Students at Yale College in the late 1700s also scoffed at the idea of Christian revival. Yale was at that time a hotbed of rationalism; the French philosophers had become popular among the students, along with the moral infidelity that men like Voltaire and Rousseau espoused. Students even called each other by the names of French intellectuals.

But, as history records, a revival did sweep Yale which "shook the institution to its center." God's instrument was Timothy Dwight, a grandson of the great preacher Jonathan Edwards. When Dwight became president of the college in 1795, the students handed him a list of subjects for class disputation, claiming that free discussion was limited in the classroom. To their surprise, Dwight chose one of their subjects: "Is the Bible the Word of God?"

Most of the students involved in the discussion took the side of infidelity. But when the debate was over, Dwight's appraisal of their arguments convinced them that they were wrong. Dwight then preached a famous series of sermons in the college chapel. Most devastating was his 1796 sermon on "The Nature and Danger of Infidel Philosophy."

The effect was immediate. "From that moment infidelity was not only without a stronghold," wrote one student, "but without a lurking place. To espouse her cause was now as unpopular as it had been before to profess a belief in Christianity."

That same year, 26 Yale students founded the Moral Society of Yale College. It discouraged profanity, immorality, and intemperance. By 1800, it included "between one-third and one-half of all the students in its membership." Its influence laid the foundation for four revivals at Yale in the opening decades of the 19th century.

What had come upon one of the leading universities of that day has historically been called revival. A genuine awakening had come and turned the tide of humanism and ungodliness for a generation of young people. The seeds sown by infidel philosophers had dominated all of university life. Immorality, drunkenness, and the excesses of all forms had prevailed. One of America's greatest universities had been brought down, reduced to nothing more than a haven of lust and debauchery.

How much different was Yale College prior to Timothy Dwight's first sermon when compared to the universities of America today? Our classrooms are likewise filled with humanistic philosophy. Professors are endorsing humanism, Marxism, and Eastern ideas - while at the same time ridiculing Christianity as outdated and irrelevant. Students have thrown themselves wholeheartedly into sexual revolution, drug abuse, and the endless pursuit of more money and possessions.

The Yale College revival should serve to remind us that God can bring awakening into the darkest place. Can we look through the eyes of faith - as did Timothy Dwight - and believe that God can bring revival into the campuses and cities of this nation?

Prophetic Preaching

When the spirit of revival arrives, God always raises up men and women to speak for Him. They do not preach mere sermons - they speak as prophets of God. Their preaching does not come with persuasive words, but with power and conviction.

When the Apostle Peter preached at Pentecost, it was the multitude that gave the invitation. The Bible says that they were "pierced to the heart and cried out, 'Brethren, what must we do to be saved?'" These people were not simply embracing a new philosophy. Their hearts had been eternally changed as the power of God broke through the darkness of sin in their lives.

Arthur Wallis states, "To aim at 'decisions' or 'results' before this work of convicting has been done is to build one's castle on the sand. What is the good of offering a man a pardon when he has never been convicted of the crime? What is the good of urging a man to come to Jesus when he has no sense of his 'lostness'?" This is the difference between preaching and revival preaching: it always grasps the consciences of men.

Prophetic revival preaching always goes deeper than a message by a well-prepared evangelist. To those who are on the receiving end, the reality of their sin and separation from God is overwhelming. Their consciences are smitten, and they cannot rest until they surrender to the lordship of Christ.

Charles Finney's ministry is a good example of preaching that was immersed in a prophetic spirit. It has been said that for many years Finney would devote himself to prayer and intercession before he preached. He would then go to the meetings full of the Holy Spirit, and trust the Holy Spirit to anoint him.

On one occasion, Finney said, "I had not taken a thought with regard to what I should preach. The Holy Spirit came upon me, and I felt confident that when the time came for action, I should know. As soon as I found the house packed, I arose and, without any formal introduction or singing, opened upon them with these words: 'Say to the righteous that it will be well with them; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe to the wicked! It shall be ill for him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him.'

"The Spirit of God came upon me with such power that it was like opening a battery upon them. For more than an hour the words of God came through me to them in a manner that I could see was carrying all before it. It was like a fire and a hammer breaking the rock, and as a sword that was piercing ... I saw that a general conviction was spreading over the whole congregation."

Is it too much to believe that such power could be released once again in our day? Is it too much to believe that God could raise up an army of men and women like Timothy Dwight or Charles Finney, who can stand in the boldness of Christ and proclaim the truth of God to the university students of America once again?

Are the students on our campuses today any harder to reach with the gospel than the students at Yale in 1800? I believe that there is a wave of students emerging in this hour who will challenge every vain philosophy and turn our universities from humanism to the living God. Professors will once again call students to repentance. Students will gather by the thousands in university facilities to hear and respond to the Word of God. Similar events have happened in our nation's past - we can expect them to happen again.

Heirs of a Haystack

By David L McKenna

They huddled under a haystack. Ordinarily the five college students met under the protective branches of a large maple tree and under the cover of night to read the Word of God, confess their sins, sing a song of forgiveness and pray for revival on their campus. Even the minutes of their meetings were kept in secret.

Tonight was different. The small, beleaguered company had been driven from their secret sanctuary by thunder that drowned out their prayers, lightning that crackled around them and rain that drenched them to the skin. An old barn with the comfort of a haystack became their refuge. There, with the storm symbolizing the hostility of their campus against them and their faith, they intuitively knew that their moment had come. God would answer their prayers. With the mysterious wind of his Holy Spirit, he would bring convicting and cleansing power to Williams College, a school founded through spiritual revival but now a seedbed for sin and skepticism. A Great Awakening was on the way!

The time was 1806, when our American ancestors struggled to establish the democracy that had been won in the War of Independence. The place was Williams College in Massachusetts, where Christian students had to meet in secret in order to avoid public ridicule. The people were a non-descript band of five students, who seemed to be too serious for their own good. As unlikely as the time, place and people may seem, one of the Great Awakenings in American history can be traced back to 1806 at Williams College when a thunderstorm drove five students to prayer while huddled under a haystack. In fact: American history can be written through its Great Awakenings.

The First Great Awakening: Fueling Our Freedom

Whether they knew it or not, the students under the haystack were the heirs of an earlier awakening in our history before independence from England. Although the colonies of New England had been founded by Puritans, who led a disciplined life and shared a biblical vision for their new homeland, the natural erosion of sin and self-interest took its toll. Spiritually, the oncoming generation assumed that their salvation was secure no matter how they lived. Socially, a combination of political oppression, personal degradation and philosophical skepticism led the nation into a wilderness of despair. Notes of hope had a hollow ring, and the future boded worse than the tormented past.

Out of that wilderness came a prophetic voice. The Reverend Jonathan Edwards, a Puritan preacher in the tradition of John the Baptist, put out a call to personal repentance which eventually cost him his pulpit. Edwards's sermon "Sinners in the Hand of an Angry God," preached at Enfield, Connecticut, in 1741, still serves not only as a model of empowered preaching but also as a turning point in the history of Great Awakenings. With an eloquence honed by the Holy Spirit, Edwards depicted hell so vividly for his hearers that sinners, by eyewitness report, hung onto the pews with whitened knuckles for fear of sliding into the flames of hell that very moment! Revival followed, not just on the confession of sin, but on the promise of joy that Edwards also preached. He reported hundreds of conversions sealed by public confession among the churches of New England.

Awakening spread, however, under the impetus of a 23-year-old itinerant preacher from England named George Whitefield. Fresh from the experience of the Evangelical Awakening in England where he had convinced John Wesley to take the open fields for his preaching, Whitefield traversed the colonies - against the opposition of the Anglican clergy - to take the gospel to unchurched people. Benjamin Franklin, though an avowed deist, became a fast friend of Whitefield. Almost in awe, Franklin estimated that Whitefield's voice had the volume and the resonance to reach 30,000 people in the open fields. More amazingly, Benjamin Franklin built Whitefield a "preaching house" in Philadelphia, which gave him a pulpit for evangelism outside the Anglican Church. The "preaching house" later became the first building for the University of Pennsylvania.

For us, however, it is even more notable that Whitefield had been a member, with John and Charles Wesley, of the Holy Club at Oxford University in the early 1730s. And although the Holy Club never left England, it is fair to say that this small group of Christian students had a share in the beginnings of the First Great Awakening in American history through the agency of its alumnus George Whitefield. Thousands were converted under his preaching. He became identified with Jonathan Edwards as one of the New Lights, who spoke prophetically of political freedom from the oppression of England, as well as the spiritual freedom from the slavery of sin.

The First Great Awakening came to its culmination when religion served as the vehicle for a moral consensus which could not tolerate the heavy hand of George II, king of England. A Great Awakening fueled our freedom, and the revolution that followed forever changed the course of our history.

The Second Great Awakening: Ensuring Our Democracy

Spiritual awakenings usually take a full generation to work themselves through to a new moral consensus out of which social transformation is born. Likewise, the turn of just one generation under the catalyst of speeding social change can undo the moral consensus and kill the vitality created by a spiritual awakening.

The worst happened after we won our independence in 1776 and wrote our Constitution in 1787. In the aftermath of revolution, our forefathers forgot the spiritual roots from which their freedom sprang. Instead of returning to the biblical vision of the moral community which Governor Winthrop proclaimed to the Pilgrim band in a sermon just before they left the Mayflower, the new generation of Americans identified with the seething caldron of infidelity and deism in prerevolutionary France. To say the least, the future of American democracy teetered in the balance, with the scales tipped toward anarchy.

Colonial colleges, in particular, took the brunt of moral corruption and philosophical despair. Harvard,

Princeton and Yale, schools which were founded to prepare Christian leaders in religion, government and medicine, became seedbeds of atheism and anarchy. One historian of American higher education likened the climate of the college dormitories to "secret nurseries of every vice and the cages of unclean birds."

Blasphemy followed heresy. In one college, students performed a mock communion with a parody of the sacred ritual at the chapel altar. In another, a deck of playing cards fell out of a hole cut in the pages of the president's Bible as he stood to address the students. In still another college, the students organized a drinking society with the name H.E.O.T.T. in parody of Isaiah's promise, "Ho, everyone that thirsteth." No wonder that any student who professed to be a Christian became the target for open ridicule and subtle discrimination. Quite in contrast with the evangelistic beginnings of the colleges, small bands of Christians now met in secret to pray.

Into this climate of corruption God called Timothy Dwight, grandson of Jonathan Edwards, to be the president of Yale in 1795. Fearlessly, Dwight chose his first baccalaureate sermon to invite all students to an open forum on the Christian faith. After hearing their attacks, he followed with a chapel series in which he spoke the "truth with love" - so much so that one-half of the Yale student body professed Christ before the year was out. One by one, spontaneous stirrings of the Spirit took place on college campuses.

Williams College, however, remained a hard-core center for heresy, blasphemy and ridicule - until the five students prayed under a haystack in 1806. With the mystery of the wind, the Spirit of God swept over the campus bringing repentance and redemption to scores of students who, in turn, took the witness of revival from campus to campus, church to church and city to city until "Awakening" became the watchword for the struggling nation. No one contests the genuine nature of that movement as infidelity gave way to vigorous faith and deism when bankrupt against the revelation of a personal God who loves and redeems all humankind.

Francis Asbury stands in rugged contrast to the image of the scholarly president of Yale or one of the cultured priests of the Anglican Church. Sent to America by John Wesley with the mandate "Offer them Christ," Asbury took his charge seriously by becoming a traveling Methodist preacher on the fast and ever-moving Western frontier. Enlisting impassioned and unusually unlearned men, he created a mobile system of circuit-riders. Pastors on horseback, these men made the frontier their parish, establishing evangelistic outposts with camp meetings that reached thousands of people at a time.

Although Francis Asbury died in 1816, the momentum of his ministry was carried on by such a rough-and-tumble circuit rider as Peter Cartwright. In the book The Democratization of American Christianity, Nathan Hatch describes the genius of Asbury on the frontier as leading a "military mission of short-term agents" - itinerant preachers armed with the gospel. Critics of Asbury scoffed when he built a church for Methodists, saying that the movement could be "contained in a corncrib." Late they had to eat their words. Between 1820 and 1830 alone, Methodism doubled in size to become one of the most formidable forces for spiritual regeneration and social reform on the American frontier.

Once again, the ideals and morals of the American people were turned upside-down. Alexis de Tocqueville, the French historian who chronicled our history in his classical work Democracy in America, expressed serious doubts that democracy could survive in the American experiment because freedom requires a moral base. He observed what we must not forget: Democracy depends on a moral foundation of revealed truth mediated through religious institutions.

In 1831 de Tocqueville visited the United States to observe first-hand our experiment in democracy. He found a transformed nation. The moral foundations of revealed truth were strong and the religious institutions were vigorous - evidence of a Great Awakening. At a barn-raising in Pennsylvania de Tocqueville saw the symbol of transformation. Neighbors from far and near voluntarily came to help another neighbor build a barn in one day. In the evening, they celebrated their achievement with supper and song. To de Tocqueville, the event represented democracy at its best. He went home to write, "America is a nation with the soul of a church." What began on a college campus became the energizing force that transformed a nation. It took a Great Awakening to ensure our democracy.

The Prayer Revival of 1858

After the Great Awakening at the turn of the nineteenth century, another generation passed and America was in trouble again. As the new nation grew by spreading south and west, the unity of the 1820s was torn apart by the deepening hostility between the industrial North and the agricultural South. Slavery became the issue of freedom on which our democracy would again rise or fall. Not since the tumultuous days preceding the Great Awakening of the 1740s had the division been deeper and the conflict more volatile. The threat of secession by the southern states in the nineteenth century more than matched the threat of those who sided with the English king in the eighteenth century.

An expanding network of intercessory prayer among businessmen, particularly in cities such as Philadelphia and New York, is usually cited as the source of the 1858 revival. Skeptics, of course, suggest that the fervency of the prayers equaled the panic over a crumbling economy which threatened to bankrupt their businesses and lower their quality of life. Such skeptics fail to recognize the extension of those prayers beyond individual self-interest. Out of those prayer groups came the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), an organization founded to take the gospel to the campuses of the developing system of state universities and to serve the social, educational and spiritual needs of young men in the burgeoning cities of the nation.

Again, the stir of awakening on college campuses preceded the revival of 1858. In the 1840s Charles Finney, an educator-evangelist, spoke as the president of Oberlin College, where students were in the midst of a campus revival. President Finney, not unlike Timothy Dwight of Yale, used the chapel platform to condemn the institution of slavery as antithetical to the spiritual freedom that the students found in Christ.

The message and the spirit of revival sped from campus to campus and fueled the abolition movement with biblical meaning and evangelistic fervor. If a revival requires social reform to qualify as an Awakening, the Emancipation Proclamation leaves no doubt about the lasting impact of the Great

Awakening that began on a college campus in the midst of revival. Gilbert Barnes, an historian of the anti-slavery movement, concludes: "In leadership, in method and in objective, the Great Revival and the American Anti-slavery Society now were one."

The World Missions Movement

In the 1890s another turn of the generations brought with it another time of decline and conflict in American culture. While we euphemistically remember the Gay Nineties as a decade of hedonistic happiness, the truth is that we were a troubled people.

A second line of spiritual movement can be drawn from campuses in England to America in the 1890s and on into the twentieth century. In 1882 D.L. Moody spoke at Cambridge University in England. The evangelist might have been disheartened by the ridicule he received from the student body, but out of that meeting seven students responded to the call to give themselves wholly to the will of God.

Gathering together, they called themselves the Cambridge Seven and can rightfully be linked with the Holy Club, the Haystack Prayer Meeting and the YMCA of earlier years. God answered their prayers by a visit of his Spirit, who gave them a vision of the unevangelized world and its multiplied millions. Providentially their vision connected with students at twenty state university campuses in the United States who had also banded together in prayerful submission to the Holy Spirit.

As their forces converged and connected with students on other campuses, the Student Volunteer Movement came into being as the forerunner for such groups as InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and the Student Mission Association. The list of student leaders who came out of a revival spirit on those campuses reads like a "Who's Who" of world missions: John R. Mott, E. Stanley Jones, Robert Wilder, Samuel Zwemer and Robert Speer. No one laughed when they spoke of their watchword, "The evangelization of the world in this generation."

Mott himself wrote, "Next to the decision to take Christ as the Leader and Lord of my life, the watchword has had more influence than all other ideals and objectives combined to widen my horizon and enlarge my conception of the kingdom of God." His words were backed by the evidence that the watchword served as a motivating and mobilizing vision. To him and his college friends goes the credit not only for offering Christ to millions of people overseas but also for breaking the protective isolationism of America by the 1890s by making the connections with spiritual awakening around the world.

The Welsh revival in 1904 is the best example. When the Spirit of God moved through the masses of that nation of poor and illiterate miners, the conversions were so complete that the pit-ponies in the mines did not respond when given orders without the profanity of their masters. Even more notable, the Welsh revival illustrates the fact that whenever there is a true spiritual awakening, the leaders and the people become advocates for the poor by founding institutions to serve them and initiating legislation to protect them.

What conclusion can we draw from this hasty journey through two centuries of awakenings in American history? In the beginning we learned that the history of America can be written through the turning points of spiritual awakenings. Now we know that those awakenings often began and came full cycle among Christian students on college campuses. Especially in the Great Awakenings in the closing decade of each century, college students led the way in moral reform and world evangelism.

Is it too much to expect that God will pour out his Spirit on all flesh in the 1990s? Will he begin with Christian students on the college campus? Will he bring the stirrings of the Spirit which we have seen in the last half of the twentieth century into the full cycle of a Great Awakening?

Revival and Young People

by Wendell Smith
12/89

"I will pour out My Spirit on all flesh, your sons and your daughters shall prophesy ... your young men shall see visions" (Joel 2:28).

In every generation, God has been faithful to bring revival to His people and spiritual awakening to nations. In almost all cases, those movements of the Spirit were most evident among young people. Most modern day surveys indicate that up to 85 percent of all people who get saved are converted before age 30, and most before age 25. One preacher described young people as "kindling" which helps set fire to "old logs."

As we see the following accounts, history records the role of young people in the revivals which have occurred over the centuries.

Old Testament Revivals

* Joshua and the generation under 20. "Your little ones and your children, who you say will be victims, who today have no knowledge of good and evil, they shall go in there; to them I will give it, and they shall possess it" (Deuteronomy 1:39).

* David the young hero. "You are not able to ... fight with him; for you are but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth ..." (I Samuel 17:33).

* Josiah, the boy King who started a Revival. "In the eighth year of his reign, while he was still young, he began to seek the God of his father David ... and he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem of the high places ..." (II Chronicles 34:3).

* Jeremiah, the young prophet. "Ah, Lord God! Behold, I cannot speak, for I am a youth. But the Lord said to me: 'Do not say, I am a youth. For you shall go to all to whom I send you, and whatever I command you, you shall speak'" (Jeremiah 1:6, 7).

New Testament Revivals

* John the Baptist and his radical message. "Now John was clothed with camel's hair and with a leather belt ... and he ate locusts and wild honey" (Mark 1:6).

* The original Jesus Movement. "Now Jesus Himself began His ministry at about 30 years of age." The disciples who followed Jesus probably ranged in age from 21 to 35 and many others followed Him including teenagers and children. From these young leaders, the Lord established a Church that "turned the world upside down."

Church History

* The Great Reformation - 1500s

John Calvin - He was converted at age 25 and within a year had completed the first draft of a now famous book, Institutes of the Christian Religion - a book called "the single most influential book on theology in Church history."¹

Martin Luther - Himself a young man, he was joined by Philipp Melanchthon, a 21 year old scholar, as they lectured to hundreds of University students during the years of the Reformation.

* The Great Awakening - 1700s

George Whitefield - One of the greatest preachers of the 1700s, he began to preach at age 21 and often spoke to crowds in excess of 30,000 people with no amplification.

Johnathan Edwards - A young preacher in Northampton, Massachusetts, Edwards had a great influence on the youth of his day. In 1734, some exciting things began to happen among the young people of New England.

"It seemed to be a time of extraordinary dullness in religion; licentiousness prevailed among the youth of the town. These church kids ignored their parents ... walked the streets and partied all night ... When two young people died unexpectedly, some of Edward's sermons began to get through ... the young rebels of the town began to turn to Christ, and ... it became the Jesus Movement of its generation."²

Yale College - In 1796, 26 Yale students founded an organization on campus called the "Moral Society" which discouraged profanity, immorality and drinking. By 1800 nearly one half of the college students were members and this group is credited with laying the foundation for four revivals that occurred later on that campus in the first few decades of the 19th century.

* The 1857 Revival

D.L. Moody - In 1858, Dwight Moody began an outreach to young people in Chicago. He started a Sunday school for youth in a vacant tavern which soon grew into a church filled with young believers. This was the launching pad for one of the great ministries of the 1800s.

C.T. Studd - A convert under Moody's ministry at Cambridge University in England, Studd "was the toast of the nation, captain of their champion cricket team ... top sportsman, and inheritor of a small fortune." He became part of the "Cambridge Seven." This group consisted of Moody's helpers or his converts, who toured universities and challenged students for missions. They were called "holy madmen, launched out to redeem another generation of spiritual warriors."³

Wales - From a report in 1859, "one of the most striking characteristics of the movement was its effect on young people and even on children. The youth of our congregations are nearly all the subjects of deep religious impressions. Very young people ... children from 10 to 14 years of age, gather together to hold prayer meetings, and pray very fervently. In many places, the young people hold a prayer meeting of their own, and these sometimes proved instrumental in bringing the powerful influences of the revival to that particular locality. The majority of all converts of the revival ... were young people."⁴

The 20th Century

* Evan Roberts - A movement known as the Welsh Revival began in 1904 when Evan Roberts, at the age of 26, said to his college principal, "I keep hearing a voice that tells me I must go home to speak to our young people in my home church." So began a sweeping revival in which 100,000 people were converted in five months throughout Wales.

"The revival seems to work especially among young people. Its form, which is that of prayer, praise and personal testimony, and its absence of method make it the most methodical expression of the emotions of young hearts aflame with the love of God."⁵

* Yale - In 1905, nearly one-fourth of the college's students were part of campus prayer meetings and Bible studies.

* 1948 Canadian Revival - In a Bible College in Northern Canada, an outpouring of the Spirit took place that started a revival around the world. Young people were overwhelmed by the presence of God as spontaneous worship broke out among the students and the power of God was demonstrated.

* Billy Graham - One of the greatest worldwide evangelists of all time, Dr. Graham started crusades in Los Angeles, California, in 1949 and was one of the first speakers for a new movement among young people called "Youth For Christ." They "attracted tens of thousands of high schoolers for their 'rallies.'"⁶

* Jesus People Movement - Out of the "hippy" culture that arose among American youth in 1967, came a second counter-culture called the "Jesus People." Baptized by the hundreds in the Pacific Ocean, they brought a strange and unique youth awakening to the streets of the nation. Many of the young people converted in this move of God are now leaders in today's churches.

* Charismatic Revival - In 1967, a small group of Catholic college students were baptized in the Holy Spirit at the "Duquesne Weekend," an event regarded as the start of the Catholic Charismatic movement.

* 1970s - Many youth-related Christian organizations began in the '60s and '70s, including the Institute in Basic Youth Conflicts, A.C.E. Schools, Teen Challenge, Campus Crusade, Agape Force, Youth With A Mission, Maranatha Campus Ministries, Last Days Ministries and others.

The Future of Christian Revival

There are many young Christian leaders who sense that another awakening among young people may be just around the corner as we step into the last decade of this century. There are encouraging signs of revival and moving of the Spirit.

In a nation that is experiencing perhaps the greatest growth in the Christian faith, for example, come these reports:

"According to a recent estimate, more than half of China's one billion population are under 20! China is a nation of young people, so it is not surprising that the house churches have a preponderance of people in their 20's and 30's. Some of them are ex-Red Guards."⁷

Some sources estimate over 72,000 people a day are being converted in Red China! All across the world there are indications of a significant move of the Holy Spirit in our generation.

We must believe that the Lord is going to help us influence our generation for the Kingdom of God. We must pray and act to see a revival and an awakening in our time, in our nation.

In the United States of America, for example, there are approximately 45 million young people between the ages of 14 and 24. Nearly 20 million are teenagers going through some of the most difficult days of their lives.

If we could see a revival among the certain percentage of those who are Christians, they in turn could affect a spiritual awakening among hundreds of thousands of other young people who are not yet converted to Christ. If God moved sovereignly among both believers and unbelievers at the same time, we might witness the greatest youth revival the world has ever known.

Our generation may have the greatest opportunity in all of history to experience revival, awakening and the supernatural power of God.

Depending on our vision, our ability to conquer our enemies and our desire to achieve our destiny, we could see a dynamic demonstration of the Holy Spirit's power in our generation.

Let it be recorded in the history books of Heaven, that the young Christians of this generation respond in radical obedience and dedication to the revelation of the purposes of God for their lifetime. Let us be like David who "served the purpose of God in his generation." Perhaps we will discover that we came to the Kingdom "for such a time as this"!

Revival - Amherst College

By Jay Rogers

Amherst College was founded and was maintained for many years with the aim of educating young men to serve God. The school's Latin motto, "Terras Irradiant," is an allusion to Isaiah 6:3: "The whole earth is full of His glory." Graduates of Amherst College have included the radical social reformer Henry Ward Beecher (brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe), and Daniel W. Poor, the pioneer missionary to Ceylon. In the early years of the school, powerful revivals were frequent. The following are eyewitness accounts of one of these revivals by three students then studying at Amherst:

"The most remarkable and important event of our College course, was the revival of 1827. I was away from College on account of ill-health at the time it commenced. In my absence of three weeks, not out of town, I was visited by two of my classmates who came to talk to me in relation to my duty to become a Christian.

"And when I returned to the College, the stillness and seriousness pervading the whole Institution ... the meetings for prayer among the students, held by the classes, ... and the more general meetings held by the faculty, were so frequent, solemn, earnest, and pervaded by the evident presence of God, that I could not but be strongly impressed.

"Two or three, or it may be four, of the class, did not seem to be much moved, all the rest were manifestly. The whole College was so influenced in that time that through the rest of the year it had an entirely different aspect from any time before. Our class (1828), then Juniors, was essentially changed in character.

"Two who had been decidedly skeptical, Kidder and Winn, became decided and earnest Christians. Humphrey, the President's son, had been altogether irreligious, wild and negligent of all study. He became, for the rest of his College course, correct in his conduct, serious and earnest as a Christian, diligent and faithful as a student. The class united with the College church or other churches as the result of this revival.

"Of the class before us (1827), I suppose McClure was the most remarkable instance of conversion - I mean publicly the most remarkable. In the class after us (1829), the most marked and externally wonderful change was in Henry Lyman who was afterwards the martyr missionary killed by the Battas of Sumatra. Lyman had been one of the worst, of the boldest in wickedness, apparently defying the authority of God; but when he came under the power of God's truth and Spirit, he became as ardent and bold for Christ as before he had been in opposition to all good."¹

"An incident illustrative of strong faith in prayer, was this: In the south entry of South College there were a number of our most godly young men, while the majority were impenitent. After mature deliberation, the former resolved to hold a daily prayer-meeting of one hour for the conversion of the unconverted in that entry. The meetings were sustained with vigor and faith, the Holy Spirit wrought powerfully in their midst, and only a few weeks passed away before every student in the south entry of the old South College was converted to Christ."²

"The students made frequent calls on each other to converse upon the greatest of all subjects, the welfare of souls, and usually joined in prayer before they separated. The meetings of literary societies were turned to prayer-meetings, and frequently the instructors united with their classes in prayer in their recitation rooms. At these meetings, which were well attended, the impenitent were warned and urged to accept the Savior by those who had formerly been their companions in sin.

"It was a deeply affecting scene to witness the love of Christ proclaimed from lips so lately addicted to profanity. Many of the subjects of this work have been those who were farthest from God and all good, not only unbelieving, but wild and reckless. About nine tenths of the Senior and Sophomore classes are now the hopeful subjects of renewing grace."³

For the next 50 years, spontaneous moves of the Holy Spirit came frequently to Amherst College, attested to by many other accounts. The results of these revivals included the emergence of the world missions movement, the temperance movement, and the anti-slavery movement.

Revival - Yale College

By Jay Rogers

In the 1700s, the First Great Awakening came to an end because of the influx of rationalistic thinking from Europe in the form of literature. Revival waned because books containing the philosophy of the Enlightenment were disbursed on the college campuses by the ton. Books containing rationalistic principles which mocked the Bible, such as Thomas Paine's Age of Reason, were given out to the students for a few pennies. If the students wouldn't buy them they would be given to them for free.

Dr. Timothy Dwight, then the President of Yale College, described the literature as "the dregs of humanity vomited on us ... the whole mass of pollution emptied on this country."

The effect on U.S. colleges was disastrous. Students looking for an excuse to rebel against Christianity embraced rationalism. Bible colleges became centers of skepticism. Students formed societies calling themselves by the names of the French philosophers of the Enlightenment. In radical movements, similar to the 1960s, students took control of entire campuses. Students held mock communion services. One group forced the resignation of a Bible college president. Another group attempted to blow up a campus building.

But God had a surprise in store. Timothy Dwight, the grandson of Jonathan Edwards, became the president of Yale in 1795. Under his administration the whole moral and religious atmosphere of the college was changed for the better.

He met the students on their own ground and in a series of frank discussions in the classrooms treated subjects such as "The Nature and Danger of Infidel Philosophy," "Is the Bible the Word of God?" He gave a notable series of lectures in which he grappled with the principles of deism and materialism. Soon he had the admiration of the students and in 1802 a revival began in which a third of the student body professed conversion, to be followed at frequent intervals by other awakenings.

Dartmouth, Williams and Amherst colleges experienced similar spiritual awakenings while the movement spread to other parts of the United States. The "Infidel Movement" was checked and the resulting awakening became the impulse for the founding of numerous academies and colleges.

The 18th Century Awakening:

What we in the 1990s can learn from it

Evangelicals in the United States today feel frustrated because they have failed to transform American society in recent years. English and American evangelicals in 1730 felt much the same way. Many years of political and social effort had not succeeded in bringing reform. Yet within a decade they experienced what is now called "The Great Awakening," during which time their nations' political and social cultures were radically impacted by Christian values. The following ten characteristics of the revivals that took place in America, England and Europe are instructive:

1. Prayer. Evangelicals in the 1700s learned that corporate prayer was a prerequisite for outpourings of God's Spirit. The revivals in many places were preceded by days of prayer and fasting. Jonathan Edwards believed that corporate prayer was more effective than just the combined prayers of individuals.
2. Leadership. God raised up strong leaders to guide the movement. Jonathan Edwards was the theologian of the awakenings and his writings were a powerful influence even until the end of the following century. George Whitefield was a dramatic and powerful orator, able to deeply move audiences with his sermons. John Wesley was an administrative genius who established an extremely effective small-group structure of "class meetings" which kept the revival fires burning.
3. Doctrine. Revival preachers of the time focused on the great Reformation doctrines of justification by faith and the atonement. They emphasized God's judgment and then his grace.
4. Emotionalism. The revivalists unashamedly appealed to people's emotions. They felt that their listeners' problem was not a lack of knowledge but a need to take action. They abandoned the formality of manuscripts or notes and preached as the Spirit led.
5. Music. As one aspect of that emotionalism, evangelicals noted that music was an effective way to stir religious affections and they made frequent use of it.
6. Open-air meetings. Whitefield preached in open spaces where large crowds could gather. Wesley took the message to jails, inns and ships, as well as outdoors.
7. Persecution. At times these preachers faced fierce opposition from hecklers, gangs of attackers and the press.
8. Testimonies. Reports of revival in other places often sparked new outbreaks as lay people who had been there first shared firsthand accounts of what the Holy Spirit was doing.
9. Holy Spirit. The 18th-century revivalists expected the Spirit to manifest His presence in powerful, visible ways.

10. Social action. A greater concern for the poor and downtrodden often resulted from these revivals. Jonathan Edwards taught that it was the Christian's duty to be charitable. Whitefield devoted a great deal of his energy to an orphanage he founded in Georgia.

The conclusion can be drawn from the 18th-century experience that a deep and powerful spiritual renewal can be more effective in transforming a culture than political action.

Charles G. Finney

By Jay Rogers

"When he opened his mouth he was aiming a gun. When he spoke bombardment began. The effects of his speaking were almost unparalleled in modern history. Over half a million people were converted through his ministry ... in an age when there were no amplifiers or mass communications, he spearheaded a revival which literally altered the course of history"¹

Charles Finney was born the year after Wesley died; appropriately, because the revival events of Finney's life became the link from the First Great Awakening of one century to the Second Great Awakening of the next. His life and writings influenced more people toward revival and social reform than any other preacher of the last century. He hated slavery with a passion and became a champion of many social reform issues of the 18th century. His convictions were born in the fires of revival and shaped by a keen lawyer's mind committed to the full authority of the Bible. So effective were his writings that they have been the impetus for revivals around the world since his death.²

Extravagant and emotional in his preaching, perhaps no other revivalist of his day was as effective and controversial as Finney. Everywhere he went tumult followed him - it was either revival or riot - reminiscent of the power that followed the first century apostles in the Book of Acts. His most controversial measures included allowing women to lead prayer during meetings, appealing by name to sinners while preaching, long protracted meetings without a planned format, and teaching the possibility, even the necessity, of totally eradicating sin both in the individual and in society. Some estimate that over 80% of his converts during the revivals stayed true to Christ without ever backsliding. This was due to his urgent message stressing holiness and purity. In later years, he moved away from sensationalism and put more emphasis on the power of the Holy Spirit through prayer.

As a theologian, he is best known for his Revival Lectures. No other books have been so mightily used of God to promote true biblical revival. In it, he explains what a revival is and treats at length related subjects as the place of faith and prayer in relation to revival; the need for the baptism in the Holy Spirit; methods to be used in the quest for souls; hindrances to revivals; instructions to new converts; and how to grow in grace.³

Lectures on Revival: What is a Revival?

by Charles G. Finney

TEXT: - "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make it known; in wrath remember mercy" (Habakkuk 3:2).

It is supposed that the prophet Habakkuk was contemporary with Jeremiah, and that this prophecy was uttered in anticipation of the Babylonish activity. Looking at the judgments which were speedily to come upon his nation, the soul of the prophet was wrought up to an agony, and he cries out in his distress, "O Lord, revive thy work." As if he had said, "O Lord, grant that thy judgments may not make Israel desolate. In the midst of theses awful years, let the judgments of God be made the means of reviving religion among us. In wrath remember mercy."

A need for revival presupposes that the church is sunk down in a backslidden state, and revival consists in the return of God's Church from her backslidings, and in the conversion of sinners.

A revival always includes the conviction of sin on the part of the Church. Backslidden professors cannot wake up and begin right away in the service of God, without deep searchings of the heart. The fountains of sin need to be broken up. In a true revival, Christians are always brought under such convictions; they see their sins in such a light, that they often find it impossible to maintain a hope of their acceptance with God. It does not always go to that extent; but there are always, in a genuine revival, deep convictions of sin, and often cases of abandoning all hope.

During a revival, backsliders will be brought to repentance. A revival is nothing else than a new beginning of obedience to God. Just as in the case of a converted sinner, the first step is a deep repentance, a breaking down of the heart, a getting down into the dust before God, with deep humility, and forsaking of sin.

During a revival, Christians will have their faith renewed. While they are in their backslidden state they are blind to the state of sinners. Their hearts are as hard as marble. The truths of the Bible only appear like a dream. They admit it to be all true; their conscience and their judgment assent to it; but their faith does not see it standing out in bold relief, in all the burning realities of eternity.

But when they enter into a revival, they no longer see men as trees walking (Mark 8:22-26), but they see things in that strong light which will renew the love of God in their hearts. This will lead them to labor zealously to bring others to Him. They will feel grieved that others do not love God, when they love Him so much. And they will set themselves feelingly to persuade their neighbors to give Him their hearts.

So their love to men will be renewed. They will be filled with a tender and burning love for souls. They will have a longing desire for the salvation of the whole world. They will be in agony for individuals whom they want to have saved; their friends, relations, enemies. They will not only be urging them to give their hearts to God, but they will carry in the arms of faith, and with strong crying and tears beseech God to have mercy on them, and save their souls from endless burnings.

A revival breaks the power of the world and of sin over Christians. It brings them to such a vantage ground that they get a fresh impulse towards heaven. They have a foretaste of heaven, and new desire after union with God; and the charm of the world is broken, and the power of sin overcome.

When the churches are thus awakened and reformed, the reformation and salvation of sinners will follow, going through the same stages of conviction, repentance, and reformation. Their hearts will be broken down and changed. Very often the most abandoned profligates are among the subjects. Harlots, and drunkards, and infidels, and all sorts of abandoned characters, are awakened and converted. The worst part of human society are softened, and reclaimed, and made to appear lovely specimens of the beauty of holiness.

War Cry! - The Salvation Army

By Jay Rogers

While women weep as they do now -
I'll fight!
While little children go hungry as they do now -
I'll fight!
While men go to prison, in and out, in and out -
I'll fight!
I'll fight to the very end!

- General William Booth
Founder of the Salvation Army

It was the summer of 1865, and London, England was the focal point of the world. Great Britain was the most powerful nation on earth - as it was said - "the sun never set on the Victorian Empire."

Yet the city of London was fast growing from a rural city into a travesty. Almost a million souls crowded into alleys and tenement buildings. Parts of London held over 200 people to the acre; 370 sewers flushed into the River Thames; three million chimneys poured soot and smoke into the air; rats filled grimy, brick buildings; the warm summer air of market places reeked of decaying vegetables, gin, animal dung and smoke. The whole city stank. Cholera epidemics sprang up now and again taking the highest toll on the poor.

The Victorian Empire was sharply divided between the one-fourteenth of the population which comprised the English Lords of the upper class, and the cockney paupers of the destitute lower class. In the alleys and by the docks often lay the dead, the sick, and the dying. Human refuse went untended by the Lords of the richest nation on earth.

Amidst the drunks, the prostitutes and dirty street urchins strode a lone figure. He was tall and thin with a long straight nose and a firm jaw. But dominant among features were his piercing grey eyes which glared with frightening intensity. He held a black Bible in one hand and cried, "There's a heaven in London for everyone! - For everyone who will stop and think and look to Christ as a personal Savior!"

He magnetically drew the rapt attention of American sailors, of soldiers on furlough, of bearded Jewish merchants, and London street girls in red blouses. Thirty-six-year-old William Booth strode alone toward home at night to the haven of his sweet wife Catherine, who was, as always, waiting anxiously. As he moved quickly by the bare-footed flower girls and the street children who begged for money, he felt his hearty well up with compassion for these lost souls and a tingling sensation overcame his body.

Around midnight, he walked into his living room and gazed at his wife Catherine, his face aglow and his eyes shining, "Tonight, my darling," he announced, "I've found my destiny!"¹

The Salvation Army

"Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners." Song of Songs 6:4

By all accounts, the one most obvious example of Christian social compassion and practical concern by any group in contemporary history is the Salvation Army. The works of the holy army launched by the young Methodist William Booth (1829-1912) and his astonishing wife Catherine Mumford Booth (1820-1890) are legendary. Almost every type of outreach and care for the poor and downtrodden imaginable were both attempted and usually successfully implemented by this radical band.

William's In Darkest England And The Way Out outlines a grand scheme for the rehabilitation of an entire nation, a grand social reconstruction plan a century ahead of its time. Catherine's brilliant preaching and writing affected hundreds of thousands. Her temperance tracts, written under an assumed name, were widely distributed throughout Europe.

Though suffering from curvature of the spine, never to know a pain-free day in her life, and often lonely and confined, she read the entire Bible straight through eight times by the time she was twelve years old. Shortly after, at 14, she mastered Finney's Systematic Theology, along with other volumes by Butler, Fletcher, Wesley, and other holiness writers. These famous works led to her strong messages on Christian perfection which were to characterize the Army's motivation for service to the world.

The nine Booth children followed their parents into full time service for the Lord. The oldest, Bramwell, became his father's successor as "General." Young Evangeline, with her fiery red hair and sparkling eyes, preached publicly with even fierier oratory. The Salvation Army's symbol, a shield surrounded by a banner, proclaimed the "Blood and Fire" of God to the world and the devil. They met social injustices head on, sometimes caused riots and public outrage, but everywhere the lost were restored and revival followed in their wake.

But one of the most radical challenges the Salvation Army made to sin in society came from one of their sons, Bramwell, in a controversial media exposure that rocked a nation. Bramwell Booth's young and pretty wife, Florence, blue-eyed and normally serene, flinched as the full horror of the truth she had uncovered struck her sensitive spirit. Managing the "Refuge," a temporary haven for streetwalkers, and hookers, she was prepared for evidence of widespread prostitution. But she was not prepared for what she discovered: a terrible network entrapping young girls - innocent children often younger than thirteen or fourteen.

The network posed as employment agencies, condoned hideous initiations, and then shipped the young girls as human sexual slave traffic to rich debauchers throughout England and sometimes (drugged and nailed alive into coffins) to the Continent. The "age of consent" in "moral" Victorian England was then only thirteen in contrast to the Continent's twenty-one. Yet three times legal efforts to raise this age in England were met with defeat. London was steeped in prostitution; one in every fifty English women were hookers, with 80,000 prostitutes in the city and 2000 pimps working Charing Cross alone.

Their clients were "men in high places; not only members of Parliament, but Queen Victoria's cousin, the King of the Belgians who spent 1800 pounds a year debauching English girls."² One home near Farnham for "fallen children" housed forty girls under twelve years of age. One at Newport housed fifty under ten.

With her own baby daughter beside her, thinking of other little girls anguish and degradation, Florence cried herself to sleep night after night. Bramwell, her tenderhearted husband, was shocked but secretly doubted it could be so bad. Determined to check it out, he shortly after met a seventeen-year-old girl, Annie Swan, who had escaped during the entrapment process. Further questioning of other rescued girls confirmed the horrible truth - a slave-traffic that "could not be matched by any trade in human beings known to history."

The twenty-six-year-old Salvation Army Chief Of Staff then wrote, "I resolved - and recorded the resolve on paper - that no matter what the consequences might be, I would do all I could to stop these abominations, to rouse public opinion, to agitate for the improvement of the law, to bring to justice the adulterers and murderers of innocence, and to make a way of escape for the victims!"³

Working with a new convert, Rebecca Jarrett, a thirty-six year old ex-drunkard and brothel keeper for twenty years, and the famous London editor, William T. Stead, the Salvation Army launched a fantastic plot to confirm and expose the children's slave traffic - one that was eventually to embroil the Army in bitter controversy, and result not in the arrest and conviction of the child traders, but of Jarrett and Stead!

Jarrett posed as a procurer and Stead as "one of the wealthy debauchers to whom so many hundreds of the children of the poor were annually sacrificed." Obtaining a pretty child called Eliza Armstrong for two pounds from her mother, they played out and documented the entire process, releasing it in the July 6, 1885 issue of the Pall Mall Gazette. It took the British public by storm, in a way that can hardly be paralleled in newspaper history. It was in such demand that enterprising newspaper boys sold the last copies at exorbitant prices.

The "dead" Criminal Law Amendment Bill was suddenly resurrected before a packed and excited House of Parliament. Within seventeen days, over 343,000 signatures filled the Salvation Army's "monster petition" to the House of Commons. Two miles in length, the petition was carried by eight Salvationists onto the floor of the House. In a month, the Bill was law, and the age of consent was raised to sixteen.

But the underworld, outraged at their exposure, counterattacked. They took Stead and Jarrett to court indicting them under an 1861 abduction act! This "most sensational trial of the nineteenth century" ended in Bramwell's acquittal, but Stead and Jarrett respectively received three and six month sentences. They had succeeded. It cost them dearly, but they broke the back of one of the most vile and vicious practices in England's history.⁴

Scottish Revival

EDINBURGH, Scotland (FR) - A billboard in the Scottish capital city of Edinburgh reads "Scotland Awakens to God! Thirty Years of Decline Are Over!" One might expect such a message to be broadcast from a small, enthusiastic church. But this billboard sits in front of the headquarters of the Church of Scotland. Christian spokesmen within the mainline denomination as well as evangelical leaders from other churches all agree that Scotland is now experiencing the beginnings of a national revival.

Scotland has experienced revival in every century since 1500. According to church leader David Anderson, "Apart from minor and more limited awakenings such as the Welsh Revival of 1904 and the Lewis Revival of 1949-50, this is in fact the first century since the Reformation when Britain has not known the outpouring of the Spirit." Anderson then added, "Is this mere coincidence, or could it be that in the last decade of the 20th century we are going to witness across the face of our land a movement of God on a greater scale than any experienced in a previous time?"

Although church attendance has been on the decline in Scotland in recent years, reports are now surfacing that the growth of Christian churches and ministries is now accelerating. This has been accompanied by a renewal of interest in prayer for national revival. For example, plans are now being implemented to set up weekly and monthly prayer breakfasts for Christians in each of the 56 local government districts in Scotland. In Edinburgh each month hundreds of Christians meet together to pray for the city and revival. Just last Easter the city's largest concert hall was filled with more than 2000 Christians praying for revival.

Anderson, who leads a congregation in the Gorgie area of Edinburgh, reports that an early morning prayer meeting in his church - which began in January of this year - has now moved to a large hall because of the increased interest in prayer. Miraculous events have accompanied the movement; in Sutherland, a mother was recently converted after hearing her small son pray for her for almost two hours. In the Highlands, a man with no church connection was literally "smitten by the power of God and deeply convicted of his sins."

Anderson, who released this report added, "The fact is that, during the past 20 years and all over Scotland, in villages, towns, and cities, hundreds of praying groups have sprung up on a scale unprecedented in this century."

Asbury Revival 1970

WILMORE, Kentucky - One morning in 1970, without warning, all heaven broke loose during Asbury College's 10 a.m. chapel service.

"When you walked into the back of Hughes Auditorium ... there was a kind of an aura, kind of a glow about the chapel," said Dr. David Hunt, a Louisville physician who was then a student.

"I always have been reminded of the verse 'Take off your shoes, for you are standing on holy ground.' You just walked in and sensed that God had indeed sent His Spirit."

The service, a routine meeting, was scheduled for 50 minutes. Instead, it lasted 185 hours non-stop, 24 hours a day. Intermittently, it continued for weeks. Ultimately, it spread across the United States and into foreign countries. Some say it is being felt even today.

This year marks the 21st anniversary of the landmark 1970 Asbury College revival, an unplanned, unled display of fervor that has been compared to the Great Awakenings of 1740 and 1800. This year is also the 41st anniversary of a strikingly similar revival Asbury experienced in 1950.

A bigger outbreak - a global revival, in fact - will begin soon, says David McKenna, president of adjacent Asbury Theological Seminary, in his new book, The Coming Great Awakening.

The revival might not start at Asbury, but it probably will begin on campuses, says McKenna, a noted author. He travels to many colleges and says, "I see the signs wherever I go."

Those signs include a generation of students wounded by family breakdowns and searching for spiritual fulfillment. Much of the coming revival will be a delayed reaction, McKenna thinks, to what happened at Asbury College 20 years ago.

A Baptism of Love

On February 3, 1970, students and faculty members had shown up at the college's chapel, Hughes auditorium, for what they assumed would be one more routine meeting.

Students were required to attend chapel services three times a week. Asbury, in Wilmore, a city of 4,300 about 16 miles south of Lexington, is an interdenominational Christian college whose roots are in the Wesleyan tradition of the Methodist church. (John and Charles Wesley, brothers, were 18th century revivalists.)

On that Tuesday morning in 1970, Custer Reynolds, Asbury's academic dean and a Methodist layman, was in charge. President Dennis Kinlaw was traveling. Reynolds did not preach. Instead, he briefly gave his testimony, then issued an invitation for students to talk about their own Christian experiences. There was nothing particularly unusual about that.

One student responded to his offer. Then another. Then another.

"Then they started pouring to the altar," Reynolds said. "it just broke."

Gradually, inexplicably, students and faculty members alike found themselves quietly praying, weeping, singing. They sought out others to whom they had done wrong deeds and asked for forgiveness. The chapel service went on and on.

Asbury, like many evangelical organizations, held annual, scheduled "revivals" with guest ministers and services booked in advance. This, however, was not the same. No one had planned it. No one was leading it.

There was just a different feeling about that day," said Marilyn Blackburn, who was the a junior at the college. She is now a substitute schoolteacher in New Jersey.

People didn't want to leave she said. They were afraid they would miss something wonderful. J.T. Seamands vividly remembers. Seamands, now retired, was then a professor at adjacent Asbury Theological Seminary, which is a separate institution from the college. He and his wife, author Ruth Seamonds, were waiting for their daughter to come home from lunch.

Sandra Seamonds, an undergraduate at the college, was late. She burst through the door and exclaimed, "You simply wouldn't believe what's happening at the college," according to J.T. Seamand's book, On Tiptoe With Love.

She was right. Her dad didn't believe. Eventually, he went to Hughes Auditorium to investigate. The 1,500 seat chapel was packed. When he entered, J.T. Seamands felt as if he had been baptized in an unaccountable spirit of love, he said. His skepticism vanished.

"I said to myself, 'This is not of man,'" he recalled recently. "'This is of God.'"

'The Lord walked in'

Reynolds, the dean, called Kinlaw, the president, who was at a conference in western Canada. Kinlaw, like Seamands, had reservations about the revival. He returned to the campus two days later, in the wee hours of the morning. The meeting, he found, was still going.

"I was scared," Kinlaw said.

That is, he knew he would be held responsible if matters got out of hand. At the same time, he didn't want to intervene and quench an authentic move of God.

It was after 2 a.m., but Kinlaw walked to Hughes Auditorium and sat on the back pew. He was approached by a student who asked for his counsel. Though no one knew it, she said quietly, she had been a habitual liar. She needed to make reparations to people on campus she had wronged.

Soon Kinlaw, too, was convinced that the revival was legitimate. Later, a reporter asked him to explain the outbreak.

"I said, 'Well, you may not understand this,'" Kinlaw recalled, "'but the only way I know how to account for this is that last Tuesday morning, about 20 of 11, the Lord Jesus walked into Hughes Auditorium, and He's been there ever since, and you've got the whole community paying tribute to His presence.'

"It got real quiet," Kinlaw said, chuckling at the memory of the reporter's response.

Twenty years later, Kinlaw acknowledges that people might reasonably think the revival was the result of contagious emotions among students. It was after all, the Age of Aquarius, a time of runaway emotions of many kinds.

"There's psychological factors involved," Kinlaw agreed, "because we're psyches.... But there's something beyond that."

One remarkable thing, given the youthfulness of the worshipers, he said, was that the marathon service was uncannily orderly. Worshipers did not become loud, did not speak out of turn, did not fall down on the floor in religious ecstasy.

The feelings were subtle yet, in their own way, overwhelming. Blackburn, the schoolteacher, said she had always been too meek. "I became aware that I needed more boldness in sharing my faith."

The Revival Spreads

News of the revival spread in newspapers and on television. Strangers flocked to Wilmore to worship with the students. Asbury officials dismissed classes. By Thursday, a revival had broken out at the seminary, across the street from the college.

Leaders of other institutions read of the service in publications as far-flung as The Indianapolis Star, the Chicago Tribune, The Seattle Times and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and heard of it by word of mouth. They invited Asbury students and faculty members to come and tell what was happening.

One of those who went out to speak was Blackburn, the woman who had been shy about her beliefs.

Wherever the Asburyians traveled, revival followed. By the summer of 1970, the revival had reached more than 130 other colleges, seminaries and Bible schools, and scores of churches, according to published accounts. It spread from New York to California, and even to South America.

When several Asbury students gave their testimonies at the Meridian Street Church of God in Anderson, Indiana, for instance, the church experienced a spontaneous revival that lasted 50 consecutive nights. According to old clippings from Indiana newspapers, the Anderson church soon became so packed that the services had to be moved to a school gymnasium. Up to 2,500 people a night flocked to the gym in hopes of being touched by God.

A Look at History

Putting the 1970 Asbury revival in proper perspective is not easy, although America's history is peppered with similar phenomena.

The Great Awakenings of 1740 and 1800, for instance, helped change the course of American society by turning a rowdy frontier into the bedrock of Christianity. There also have been many revivals on American college campuses, dating back at least to 1795, when a famous one erupted at Yale.

"I would say that I think that revivals are here to stay in this country," said David E. Harrell, an Auburn University historian who is perhaps the foremost secular scholar on the subject.

Several have struck Asbury. During a 1905 revival, E. Stanley Jones, an Asbury student, felt called to become a missionary, he later wrote. Jones has since been hailed as among the most influential missionaries of the century.

In February 1950, another spontaneous revival roared through Asbury College. At the same time, revivals touched Wheaton College in Illinois and other campuses. A smaller revival followed in 1958.

The 1970 Asbury revival seems slightly larger in scope than, say, the one in 1950, Asbury officials say. The 1970 movement lasted longer and spread farther. Still its primary explosion was shorter-lived and more localized than history's biggest revivals, said Mark Knoll, a professor of history at Wheaton College and an expert on evangelical issues.

On the other hand, Harrell said, the Asbury revival occurred simultaneously with a massive neo-Pentecostal renewal in the 1960s and 1970s. The Asbury revival was not itself Pentecostal, in that there was no speaking in tongues or healing by faith. But if lumped with that charismatic movement and the "born-again" revivals of the mid-70s, the Asbury outbreak might be part of the most influential world-wide renewals of the century.

Really, said Noll, Harrell and other scholars, it is too early to gauge the revival's true place. It often takes a generation or more for a religious renewal to be fully felt throughout society.

Learned Behavior?

Another complicated question is how such revivals happen.

"If you take a non-religious perspective, obviously, it's sociological factors ... learned behavior, patterned response," said Randall Balmer, a historian of religion at Columbia University. His book on evangelicals, Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory, is being made into a PBS television series.

"If on the other hand," Balmer said, "you are inclined to attribute it to the Holy Spirit, as the people involved are, then it's a miraculous visitation."

Pressed, Balmer said he wasn't sure which view was correct. "I guess I'm not jaded enough to dismiss that it might be something, a work of the Holy Spirit," he said. "At the same time, I think I recognize that the Holy Spirit works through specific cultural and sociological circumstances.... I honestly don't know."

Asbury in 1970 certainly was conducive to a revival. The college had a Wesleyan tradition and a history of unexpected revivals. Students were not strangers to the idea. A number had, in fact, been praying for an outbreak.

In addition, the campus was in an upheaval. There was the general distress of the times, and there were tensions specific to the college, stemming from a messy change in administrations a few years before.

Revivals often occur in times of discord.

A Coming Awakening?

That's partly why McKenna, the seminary president, thinks a major revival could sweep college campuses in the 1990s. However, those campuses might as easily be in Eastern Europe, Africa or Latin America as in the United States.

Those societies, perhaps more than this country's, he said, are suffering breakdowns of moral consensus and of institutions of authority. Today in this country, too, countless thousands of students have been hurt - by broken homes and childhood abuse.

"You're really talking to a stressful, wounded group of young people," McKenna said. "They become the ones who are needy and responsive."

In December, 18,000 students from many different nations gathered at the University of Illinois for "Urbana 90" a triennial rally sponsored by InterVarsity Missions. McKenna thinks that the meeting might spark another Great Awakening, a multinational, multiethnic one. Some of its leaders might be the same people who were touched by the 1970 revival, who now are middle-aged and hold positions of church and college leadership.

An Open Matter

In the end, it is impossible to say empirically what happened at Asbury College in 1970, or in the many great revivals throughout Western history. Or what will underlie any revival to come.

Experts say revivals result when cataclysmic religious, cultural and historical movements collide. Whether God is present in those collisions is less clear.

Noll, the Wheaton professor, said that the truest test of that is whether the revivals produce lasting changes in people's lives. Super Bowls create mass excitement, he said, but they don't alter human beings forever. Unfortunately, the long-term effects of revivals on individuals have received little academic attention.

If permanent change is indeed the test, then the issue was decided long ago for many of the people who witnessed the Asbury revival.

"It was a real turning point, I think, where I sensed that God really desired more of a commitment on my part of my life to Him," said Hunt, the doctor. "You stand in that kind of presence and that kind of awe ... it's very difficult, I think, for a mortal man not to really look and examine and say, 'What does this God want of my life?'"

In the 1970 book One Divine Moment, Jeff Blake, then an Asbury history major, described the revival as a 20th century day of Pentecost. In the Bible, the day of Pentecost was when God poured out the Holy Spirit on His apostles and created the Christian Church.

Today, "I believe that's true," said Blake, now with Goodwill Industries of the Bluegrass. "It was the kind of moment that only God could create," Blake said. "It's just the kind of experience that lives on with you always."

Blackburn, the formerly meek woman, agreed. "I changed," she said. "I was different." She remains awed that she was allowed to see with her own eyes the outpouring, she said. It left her confident that God is in control of the world and of her life.

Kinlaw, the Asbury College president, started that long-ago week as a doubter of the revival. He ended as a believer in the revival's power and truth. He is a believer now.

"There was this sense of the divine presence that one doesn't have often in his life," he said. "And when you do have it, you never quite get over it ...

"You know. You know. You know it in your bone marrow."

Concerts of Prayer

By Jay Rogers
5/92

OVER 200 YEARS AGO, JONATHAN EDWARDS prophesied that the glory of God would come to our nation and that the whole world would be evangelized as ministers and Christians around the world came together in a concerted effort to pray as a unified body. March for Jesus 1992 is only one such event. God is orchestrating a greater work to bring his Church together in concerts of prayer. Here are a few of the parts which comprise the whole:

* Prayer for revival is becoming a centerpiece instead of preaching and programs in many urban centers such as New York, Los Angeles, Baltimore and Boston. In each area, one or several churches emerge as showcases for a renewal of monthly prayer concerts attended by many local area pastors.

* Times Square Church recently shut down all local programs and activities in order to concentrate exclusively on prayer for the desperate needs of New York City. The 5000 member church, led by pastor David Wilkerson has initiated an effort that is being promoted throughout New York City.

* In Boston, Hispanic, Chinese, Haitian, and African American believers united to pray for racial unity and revival during a concert of prayer in Boston three months ago. The gathering attracted 700 people from over 75 churches, representing 16 denominations.

* In Philadelphia, Christians are uniting in prayer for spiritual awakening as churches prepare for an upcoming Billy Graham crusade. The city has been divided into 35 regions, and each region has its own prayer committee.

* Hundreds of thousands of believers gathered in municipal buildings to pray for America on May 7, just days after tragic incidents erupted in Los Angeles and other cities. The American Family Association organized the "Meet at City Hall" events in cities all over America.

* Groups of 70 pastors each gathered in four different cities (Spokane, Washington, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and Colorado Springs) last Fall to pray for nationwide revival. One group met for just half a day, while another spent four full days in prayer and fasting. No one in any of the groups knew that similar meetings had been planned at the same time.

* Southern Baptist leaders are uniting their congregations across the country in what they call "solemn assemblies." Based on Joel 2, the meetings are calls for repentance and revival.

* Church of God pastors have united to pray for revival. To date the number of participants has climbed to 5000.

* Last Fall, an estimated one million junior and senior high school students prayed for revival during "See You at the Pole," an event taking place in a circle around public school flag poles before the school day. The event was sponsored by Youth for Christ, Student Venture, and other groups.

Professor says U.S. needs another "Great Awakening"

1/89

WASHINGTON, D.C. (FR) - A former philosophy professor at Columbia University recently told U.S. News & World Report that he sees the potential for another "Great Awakening," like those that swept America during the 18th and 19th centuries. A non-believer, Prof. Robert Nisbet explained as a historian and sociologist that without such a spiritual awakening the nation may never regain its special place in the secular world.

Curious about his remarks, we called Prof. Nisbet recently to discuss his views. He resides in the nation's capital, where he has been affiliated with the American Enterprise Institute.

"The worship of sheer wealth is prevalent in America," Nisbet said. "But I believe we're approaching another crisis - a religious upheaval which will turn the love of mammon away." Nisbet explained that he noticed an increased interest in Christianity on college campuses after the 1950s. "Prior to the 1950s Christianity was considered a thing of the past. Science and rationalism were thought to have driven it off campus. However, after the 1950s students seemed more interested in religion than in scientific conclusions."

Nisbet taught at the University of California/Berkeley during the outbreak of the "Jesus Movement" in the late 1960s and early '70s. "I noticed that along with the dirty clothes and virtual consecration to anything anti-bourgeois, there was a distinct religious character on campus. However, I've been impressed with the recent outburst of Christianity on different college campuses."

Nisbet noted that the philosophical basis of the American form of government is based on Christianity. "The American belief in progress is based on strong Christian beliefs. Progress is a secularized idea of Christianity." Science and socialism are not as powerful as Christianity, he added.

"Men will fight with their lives for religion, but not for scientific conclusions. The Soviet government for the last 75 years has not been able to destroy religion. But our form of government is based on the acknowledgement of the existence of God."

Although skeptics predicted that evangelical Christianity would suffer a decline after the recent televangelist scandals, U.S. evangelical churches have enjoyed a steady increase in members. "Every televangelist could be wiped out tomorrow, but religion would be just as powerful," Nisbet added.

University Campuses to be focus of Spiritual Awakening in '90s from The Coming Great Awakening

By David McKenna

8/92

Recalling that all of America's historic Great Awakenings began on college campuses, David L. McKenna (President, Asbury Theological Seminary) boldly suggests how today's youth can be in the vanguard of another, crucial reform of church and culture.

The Coming Great Awakening (InterVarsity Press) chronicles the cycles of historical revivals and cites current trends in an offering of hope. It is a fast-moving, hard-hitting field manual for college students who wait on edge for a spiritual awakening in our generation. "I am a realistic optimist," says McKenna. "I do not believe that God has given up on our world."

Throughout history, the pattern of revival and spiritual awakening is seen among small cell groups of young people praying for God to pour out His Spirit in an atmosphere of spiritual darkness.

* In 1734, a revival commenced under 31-year-old preacher Jonathan Edwards who led many of the teenagers of Northampton, Massachusetts out of moral degradation. Youth who were converted in 18th century America became known as the "New Lights."

* The Great Awakening in the American colonies spread during the 1740s under the influence of a 23-year old itinerant preacher from England - George Whitefield - who, together with John and Charles Wesley, had formed a small prayer band at Oxford University ten years earlier. This group was derided at Oxford, being called the "Holy Club" and the "Methodists" by the other students in scorn.

* By the 1790s, American colleges had backslid into an atmosphere of blasphemy, drunkenness and attacks on the Christian faith. Small bands of Christians were forced to meet secretly to pray. Into this climate, Yale President Timothy Dwight, the grandson of Jonathan Edwards, began a series of lectures as an open forum on the Christian faith. Under his influence one half of the student body of Yale was converted.

* In 1806, a group of five students at Williams College gathered under a haystack to pray for revival and world evangelization. This small western Massachusetts college had become a seedbed of blasphemy, ridicule and heresy. But in a short while the Holy Spirit was poured out and many students were saved. This revival spread from college to college throughout America and gave rise to the American world missions movement.

* In the 1890s, the culture of America had sunk into materialism, hedonism and conflict. In England, American revivalist, D.L. Moody was ridiculed by students at an evangelistic meeting at Cambridge University. However, seven students gave their lives to Christ and became known as the "Cambridge Seven." They networked with American students at twenty state universities and spawned the "Student Volunteer Movement." Out of this revival came groups such as InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and the Student Mission Association. As a result, thousands of young people were released onto the mission field for the goal total world evangelization.

The decade of the 1990s, not unlike the 1790s and 1890s, may well be the decade of destiny for our century. If the pattern of history holds, a Great Awakening in the 20th century would be confirmed by an outpouring of God's Spirit on Christian students on the college campuses who see a redemptive vision for our moral pigsty.

Looking for Revival? Check College Campuses

by David L. McKenna

Are we looking for revival in all the wrong places? With high anticipation, we look to world conferences, city-wide crusades, local church meetings and small prayer groups as starting points for the revival of the church. Certainly, they are often the instruments through which the Spirit of God moves to call for revival and change lives in local settings. But when the Spirit of God has swept our nation with the signs of a great awakening, where has revival begun?

Our history shows that the starting point is a small group of students who meet together on a college campus to give themselves to the discipline of prayer and holy living for the sake of revival. Through them, the Spirit of God moves across the campus with convicting power and redeeming grace until the prevailing tone of the campus is literally transformed spiritually and morally. From there, the witness is taken from campus to campus by the contagious witness of Spirit-filled student messengers. In turn, other students carry the flame from campus to church, from church to church and from community to community.

The pattern goes back to the beginning of American history. In the 1740s, a group of students at Williams College in Massachusetts formed the "Haystack Group," similar in purpose to the "Holy Club" at Oxford, which had been the catalyst for the Wesleyan Revival in England. Like John and Charles Wesley, the students at Williams bonded themselves together in the discipline of Bible study, prayer, holy living and help for the needy. Their target for transformation was none other than Williams College, a campus community whose moral and physical quality had been likened to the "bottom of a bird cage."

As God moved upon the "Haystack Group," the students moved upon the campus. The spirit of revival spread through the dormitories, into the chapel and out into the classroom. Then, as the students carried their witness to the church and community, they met a synergism of the Spirit. The conviction for sin prompted by the preaching of such a prophet as Jonathan Edwards and the thirst for righteousness among the congregations came together with the dynamic witness of the students to spread from congregation to congregation, community to community and from colony to colony.

By the turn of the century, the social and moral transformation of the new nation stood as an evidence of spiritual revival. Not only had our forefathers broken the tyranny of political bondage in the American Revolution, but Alexis de Tocqueville, who chronicled our early history, concluded that America was a nation with the "soul of a church."

In the middle 1800s, a similar pattern of revival sprang from the campus of Oberlin College, converged with the preaching of Charles Spurgeon and provided the impetus, not only for the abolition movement, but also for the volunteer movement in such community agencies as United Way, YMCA, Red Cross and others, which arose out of compassion to serve in the Spirit of Christ. Later, in the same century, the campus again became the catalyst for the spiritual revival that led to the modern missionary movement.

Then, in the middle of the 20th century, J. Edwin Orr noted the beginnings of revival on Christian college campuses such as Asbury and Wheaton, which synergetically connected with Billy Graham, led to such parachurch ministries as Youth for Christ and Campus Crusade for Christ and peaked in the "born-again movement" of the 1970s.

No one can stereotype the stirring of the Holy Spirit. To assume that the college campus is the place where the revival of the church must begin is to deny the truth of Christ. "The wind blows where it wishes, and you hear the sound of it, but cannot tell where it comes from and where it goes. So is everyone who is born of the Spirit" (John 3:8).

At the same time, there are reasons why the wind of the Spirit has blown on the college campuses. As a person who has been a part of the Christian college, university and seminary scene as a student, professor and president for the past 40 years, I think that I know why the Holy Spirit chooses to work among the young. First and foremost, college students are idealists. Hope for a bright future still sparkles in their eyes. College students, since they haven't yet encountered the bumps and bruises of reality that may later lead to disillusionment, stagnation and burnout, are the chosen vessels of the Holy Spirit for seeing the visions which are promised by the prophet Joel and fulfilled whenever God's Spirit is poured out on all flesh.

Coupled with the idealism of the young is their discontent. For some reason, young people of college age are the special victims of the sins and ills of society at any given time. They are also blamed for behavior which is undermining the moral foundations of the past. In my view, they are more victim than culprit. At a recent conference on drug abuse among teenagers, adults identified crack and cocaine as the problems.

Students at the conference listened for awhile and then spoke. The real problem, they said, was the "entry drug" of alcohol. In one of the most telling indictments that I have ever heard on the problem of drug abuse, they laid the blame on the media, which sends the message, "You can't have fun without alcohol," and upon their parents who model the message with their own drinking. No rancor poisoned their words. Rather, we heard a cry for help from those who suffered from the message and the model of alcohol abuse. My experience with college students is that they are equally sensitive and discontented with the sins of the culture and the sin in their own lives.

The idealism and discontent of the young are followed by a refreshing openness to the winds of the Spirit. Theological and denominational litmus tests are still ahead of them. Rather, like the members of the "Holy Club" and the "Haystack Group," they have a drive for quintessential spirituality based upon the disciplines of Bible study, prayer, holy living and sacrificial service. Of course they are always accused of "enthusiasm" by those of us who require that the Holy Spirit comes on our own terms. The sad note is to hear adults call for toleration because "they will grow out of it." I hope not. Until the openness to the Holy Spirit which characterizes the young moves through all age groups, there will be no revival.

All of these qualities are put into action by the energy of the young. Let's face it. Most of us are too tired to be on the front edge of spiritual revival. Not only are we "running down" physically, but we show the symptoms of spiritual fatigue. According to the prophet Isaiah, our contribution to spiritual revival will be a prophetic word from the middle-aged and past dream for the old-aged.

Not that we have no role in revival. If the church is to be revived, Joel assures us that it will be a multigenerational experience which brings together the visions of the young, the prophecies of the adult and the dreams of the elderly. So, rather than stifling the energies of the young, we should set them free with the balance of the prophetic Word and a sense of history. They are the fuel for the engine of revival.

With these thoughts in mind, I have been on a "campus watch" this year. Whether speaking on a Christian college campus or listening to reports of presidents, faculty and students, my ears are tuned for the stirring sounds of spiritual revival. They can be heard. Like the rustling in the mulberry trees, the Spirit is moving among small groups of students on campus after campus across the nation.

Therefore, when we come together in world congresses, national conferences, city-wide crusades and local church meetings with revival in mind, perhaps the priority of our agenda should be to hear reports from the campus. If history holds, this is where revival begins.

David McKenna is president of Asbury Theological Seminary in Wilmore, Kentucky. This article was first printed in Action magazine, published by the National Association of Evangelicals, March 1989.

Tom Wolfe expects religious awakening

3/89

Novelist Tom Wolfe, author of the best-seller The Bonfire of the Vanities, says he is expecting a spiritual revival in the 1990s. In a recent interview with a Time magazine bureau chief, the author predicted that the next decade will be a time of "relearning moral values" for college students. "I think there will be a lot of discussion in the '90s about morality. It has already begun. I pick it up in talking to college students."

Wolfe explained that college students are voluntarily "putting the brakes on the sexual revolution." In a speech at Harvard University, Wolfe said he was concerned about the emphasis on freedom from religion and ethical standards because of excesses.

Wolfe, viewed by many as a chronicler of American society, defined the '60s as "the whole crazed, obscene, uproarious, Mammon-faced, drug-soaked, Mau Mau, lust-oozing" decade and the '70s as "sexed-up, doped-up, and hedonistic." He has dubbed the 1980s as "the decade of money fever ... (which is) not likely to produce heroic figures."

However, Wolfe says the close of the 1980s gives a clue to what lies in the 1990s. He explained that he sees the signs of awakening in the rising interest in Christianity as well as other religions, especially with the "sweeping aside of standards." When asked if he saw an erosion of standards, he replied, "Erosion, no. It's been much faster than erosion. There's been a sweeping aside of standards. Every kind of standard."

Wolfe is only one of several prominent public figures who have recently predicted a major spiritual revival in America in the next decade.

Reagan to Religious Broadcasters: "America is in the midst of a spiritual revival."

WASHINGTON DC (FR) - "America is in the midst of a spiritual revival." That was the theme of a stirring address given by President Ronald Reagan in early February of this year during the annual convention of the National Religious Broadcasters (NRB).

"From the growth of your radio and television stations to the polls of George Gallup, we see the signs of Americans turning to God. On our campuses the political activism of the '60s has been replaced with the religious commitment of the '80s. Organizations like Campus Crusade for Christ, the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, and Youth for Christ have grown in popularity. And why not. Their message - your message - is rooted in one sure guide for life, the guide for our founding fathers and every generation of Americans as much as for ourselves, the infallible wellspring of our national goodness - the Bible, the inspired Word of God," Reagan proclaimed amid bouts of applause from the enthusiastic NRB audience.

"But how ironic that even as America returns to its spiritual roots, our courts lag behind. They talk of our constitutional guarantee of religious liberty as if it meant freedom from religion - freedom from, actually a prohibition on, all values rooted in religion. Well, yes, the Constitution does say that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion.' But then it adds 'or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.'"

Reagan decried certain court decisions in recent years which have misinterpreted the First Amendment, restricting rather than protecting individual rights of conscience. He also touched on several other themes in his speech, including appeals for pro-life legislation, school prayer, and the need for a strong national defense policy.

Jesus Film

SAN BERNARDINO, CA. (EP) - The Jesus film, a major motion picture about the life of Christ which has been played thousands of times since its release nearly a decade ago, was translated into 20 new languages during 1988, bringing the total number of translations to 123.

Since the time of its release, used by Campus Crusade for Christ and over 160 missions agencies in evangelistic outreach efforts, an estimated 325 million people have seen the film worldwide and more than 30 million people have indicated decisions to trust Christ as their personal Savior after viewing the film, according to a news report from Campus Crusade for Christ International.

The motion picture has been shown in virtually every situation, from modern U.S. theaters and television to Asian villages where film teams carry projection equipment and generators to people who have never seen a film, and often have never heard of Jesus Christ.

Shortly before the release of "The Last Temptation of Christ" last August, Campus Crusade founder and president Bill Bright offered to buy the film from Universal Studios in an attempt to block the blasphemous depiction of the life of Christ from release. The movie company refused, running a full-page advertisement in the New York Times in response to Bright's offer.

When "Last Temptation" was released in Chicago, WCFC-TV aired "Jesus" three times to counter the Universal film. A half-page advertisement in the Chicago Tribune sponsored by 35 churches challenged readers "Don't resist the temptation to see the true story." According to reports, over 800 callers responded to an invitation to phone the station where counselors answered phones; 202 indicated decisions for Christ.

"I have long followed the work of missions and national church efforts striving to win people for Christ," said Ted Engstrom, president emeritus of World Vision. "I have never seen a tool so effective, so wonderfully penetrating to the heart of man, as this film." Currently, the film is being translated into 46 more languages.

Washington for Jesus 1988

WASHINGTON, DC (FR) - They came from the far corners of the earth - 1200 delegates from over 114 nations. They were joined by thousands of Christians from around the U.S., a crowd which the National Park Service estimated at 200,000. These determined believers braved chilly winds and occasional rain to attend the second Washington for Jesus Rally held on the historic Mall in front of the U.S. Capitol.

During one of the key moments of the event, African Archbishop Benson Idahosa of Nigeria led the multitude in prayer for the world. The Christians turned north, south, east, and west with their arms outstretched ... agreeing together for all nations to experience a true spiritual awakening.

"We are not here to pray just for Washington, D.C.," Idahosa proclaimed. "We are asking God for Europe for Jesus ... Africa for Jesus ... Asia for Jesus!" Rally organizers said that international delegates at the rally came to learn how to coordinate one in their home countries. Many of them stayed in Washington for several days to attend the "Lord of the Nations" conference, sponsored by Youth With a Mission, in which leaders were challenged to take their regions of the world for Christ.

The first Washington for Jesus rally, held in 1980, drew somewhere between 200,000 to 700,000 participants. The themes emphasized in that historic prayer gathering were the Iran hostage crisis, a failing economy, and the erosion of the nation's moral foundations. It was shortly followed by the election of Ronald Reagan, deemed one of the most conservative presidents elected in the last two decades.

At the 1988 gathering, which was held on April 29, President Reagan addressed the gathering by way of a videotaped message, which was a first for a U.S. president. The President also signed a bill during the week of the rally setting aside May 5th as the National Day of Prayer.

John Giminez, pastor of the 5,000-member Rock Church in Virginia Beach, Virginia, was the organizer of Washington for Jesus in 1980 and 1988. After eight years, Giminez said, Christians have made much progress. They have seen the need for not only affecting the political process through election of godly officials, but for personal holiness followed by civic action.

Although there was much prayer for Washington officials during the 12-hour prayer vigil, Giminez and other organizers said that the 1988 event was purposefully kept apolitical. "We're not here to point the finger at the world," Giminez told reporters. "But the Church needs facing up. We're seeking improvement in ourselves. We didn't show up to elect anybody ..." There were occasional prayers for the upcoming presidential elections during the course of the prayer meeting, but most of the emphasis was placed upon humility and moral integrity in the Church.

The Church has seen several scandals within the last decade which Giminez says are signs of human frailty. "If it's the PTL situation, or Jimmy Swaggart, we need to recognize the element of human frailty. We've always had problems, but the church just needs to get right." The new PTL director, David Clark, agreed, saying, "Washington For Jesus is primarily a spiritual event. The fruit of repentance here will be translated into action, because there are social consequences of the gospel."

The 1988 event was indeed marked by humility. Christian believers huddled together throughout the day in small groups to pray, and there were often visible signs of weeping and repentance. Others marched around the Capitol Mall area with signs, banners, and declarations of Christ's lordship over the nation.

Giminez said the main goals of the event were to foster interdenominational unity, and to encourage repentance of personal and corporate sin. "We've seen a breakdown of denominational barriers," said Dee Jepsen, a former White House staffer and outspoken Christian leader who addressed the crowd. "And we've seen groups that were not formerly involved, such as the Episcopalians and Lutherans, turn out to participate."

Although dubbed as an apolitical event, several key Christian leaders had private hopes that it would launch the Christian movement towards action on social issues such as abortion and pornography. "Every Christian needs to be involved in the abortion issue," said Melody Green, president of Americans Against Abortion.

"My desire is to see every Christian take a stand and to write letters, picket, do something," Green added. Jepsen agreed, saying, "I personally want to see abortion outlawed. The women are the second victim. It's a great travesty that it's done in the name of 'rights for women.'"

Jepsen also said she would like to see more activism against pornography. "It is so degrading to womanhood, we need to stand up and say, 'Stop!'" Dr. James Dobson, radio host and author, said he was very concerned about the pornography issue: "It bothers me that Christians are not bothered about the porn industry."

To demonstrate the social implications of the gospel, Giminez suggested that food and clothing be donated by rally participants. A semi-truck and two vans full of food were collected to distribute to the poor in the Washington, D.C. area. The food was then distributed by Networkers, an ecumenical organization headed up by Dr. John Stagg.

"Dr. Stagg's long-range plan is to link black churches in the city with suburban white churches, which together will serve as a conduit for surplus food," said Jepsen. "The churches will distribute the food directly as well as to channel it to existing agencies which currently administer food distribution programs."

About $1.3 million was raised from contributions and over 1,000 volunteers served in the Washington for Jesus event, according to John Cucuzza, chairman of logistics. The remaining funds, after operating expenses, will be given to the poor.

Jepsen said she doesn't know if there will be a Washington for Jesus in 1992, and the committee isn't planning on holding another one. Instead, WFJ organizers hope that the international delegates will take back what they've learned and hold it in their countries.

The 1980 WFJ was the first major demonstration of strength of the Christian movement. The political nature of the event sent Christians scurrying back to their states to elect godly officials and form organizations and coalitions. The answer to our national ills was thought to be in more political action.

Although inroads have been made since that significant year, such as election of a conservative president, the message of the 1988 event was vastly different from the 1980 call to the nation for repentance. "The emphasis was on holiness," said Gary Bergel, director of Intercessors for America. "The problem is that American Christians are not spending time before God and seeking His strategy on issues. If we were, the elderly and the babies would be cared for."

After the PTL and Swaggart scandals, Christian leaders are recognizing that the Church needs to be on the judgment stand before affecting the political scene. "Before pointing the finger at the nation, the Church needs to have greater purity and holiness," stated another Christian leader involved in the event. Holiness, said a number of ministers who addressed the gathering, will prepare God's people in the U.S. to have the proper attitude as they seek to serve and lead the nation.

Billy Graham's Largest North American Audience

NEW YORK, N.Y. - Evangelist Billy Graham spoke words of hope to 250,000 New Yorkers who had gathered on a sunny afternoon at the Great Lawn in Central Park. Preaching from John 3:16, "For God so loved the world," Graham said, "There is one thing I want you to take from the park when you leave here today - it is this - God loves you and is interested in you."

New York Mayor David Dinkins gave Billy Graham a special welcome from the platform saying, "This is the largest multi-cultural revival meeting the world has ever seen." Reporters described the crowd as a mixture off white, black, Hispanic, Asian American and a surprising number of teenagers and young people. Graham said he wanted to bring the city together in a new way as a Judeo-Christian witness and to promote racial unity. "Our social problems are basically mortal and spiritual problems, and moral problems require a religious solution," Graham said. "Some ask, 'Why has God abandoned us?' God has not abandoned us, we have abandoned Him."

Billy Graham's largest meeting ever was in Seoul, Korea with over 1 million.

The Most Hopeful Sign of Our Times

A Growing National Prayer Movement Points America Toward Spiritual Revival
by David Bryant

Is it possible that God could kindle the fires of spiritual revival in our nation at this critical point in our history?

In my travels around the country in recent months, I've witnessed an unprecedented grass-roots prayer movement that I'm convinced will prove to be the precursor of a sweeping moral and spiritual rebirth in America. Something extraordinary is taking place. It may be the most hopeful sign of our times. Let me share a few examples:

- * Times Square Church recently shut down all local programs and activities in order to concentrate exclusively on prayer for the desperate needs of New York City. The 5,000-member urban church led by evangelist David Wilkerson is one of America's fastest growing.
- * Ben Patterson, a spiritual leader in New York City, has recently made prayer for revival a centerpiece of his preaching and leadership in the Presbyterian church (USA). As a result, New Providence Presbyterian church is quickly becoming a renewal center for the entire New York metropolitan area. For Patterson, it's a return to his first love. He made revival a priority some 20 years ago while still in seminary.
- * Hundreds of thousands of believers gathered at municipal buildings to pray for America on May 7, the National Day of Prayer, just days after tragic incidents of racial violence erupted in Los Angeles and other cities. The American Family Association said the "Meet at City Hall" events were organized in more than 2,500 locations.
- * Groups of 70 pastors each gathered in four different cities (Spokane, Minneapolis, Cleveland, and Colorado Springs) last fall to pray for nationwide revival. One group met for just half a day, while another spent four full days in prayer and fasting. No one in any of the groups knew that similar meetings had been planned at the same time.
- * In Philadelphia, Christians are uniting in prayer for spiritual awakening as churches prepared for a Billy Graham crusade. The city has been divided into 35 regions, and believers in each area have organized their own prayer effort.
- * Southern Baptist leaders are uniting their congregations across the country in what they call "solemn assemblies." Based on the book of Joel, the meetings essentially are calls for repentance and denomination-wide renewal. Meanwhile, the Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.) has set out to recruit retired pastors to pray for spiritual revival. The original goal of the strategy was to enroll 1,000 clergy.

Today, the number of participants in the program, called "The PrayerBorne," has climbed to nearly 5,000.

* Last Fall, an estimated 1 million junior high and high school students prayed for revival during "See You at the Pole," a prayer event sponsored by national youth ministries.

* College students also are joining the move. At Stanford University, from 300 to 500 students from all campus ministry organizations meet regularly to pray for revival and evangelism.

* A prayer movement has been brewing in Cleveland, Ohio, for almost nine years. In the last two years, between 6,000 and 7,000 people (including 1,000 teen-agers) have taken part in city-wide prayer rallies. In Minneapolis, 300 congregations have committed themselves to pray for revival for seven years, just "to see what God will do."

* In Los Angeles, between 300 and 1,000 pastors gather every quarter to spend half a day in prayer for their city and the nation. Just days after the recent LA riots, about 700 area pastors from assorted backgrounds united in prayer at First Presbyterian Church in Hollywood.

* In New England, a prayer movement is growing on many levels in a five-state area. Some region-wide prayer rallies have attracted thousands of participants.

* On May 23, hundreds of thousands of Christians marched through the streets of 125 American cities, while simultaneous processions were staged in 29 European countries. The March for Jesus event is being planned in 1994 to coincide with "A Day to Change the World," a gathering of 1 million Christians in Seoul, Korea.

Many evangelical leaders have stated that they believe this increase in united prayer foreshadows spiritual awakening. Paul Cedar, president of the Evangelical Free Church of America, recently wrote:

"Without a doubt, the major opportunity before us is the potential of a historic revival akin to the First and Second Great Awakenings. ... The encouraging 'sign' of an impending awakening is the grass-roots prayer movement God is raising up throughout this nation among pastors, denominations, congregations, families, and individuals. There is an unusual openness among church leaders for cooperation and great movements of prayer and evangelistic outreach in the decade of the 1990s."

Those who are students of revival are encouraged because they see a divine pattern repeating itself. Robert Coleman of the Association of church Missions Committees noted in a recent interview that he feels we are on the threshold of revival due to three developments: (1) the increase of citywide concerts of prayer, (2) the gathering together of pastors in concerted prayer, and (3) the growing concern for revival among our young people.

On this last point, David McKenna, president of Asbury (KY) Seminary, reached a positive assessment of the future based on his study of what God has done and is doing among young people. His conclusion is found in the title of his latest book, The Coming Great Awakening.

J. Edwin Orr summarized for me in one sentence his 60 years of study on prayer and spiritual awakening when he wrote: "Whenever God is ready to do something new with his people, He always sets them to praying."

This was certainly true during the First Great Awakening. In 1746, Jonathan Edwards published a book on "concerts of prayer" - a term used in his day and repeated in subsequent prayer movements over the last 250 years. Well aware from biblical and historical accounts that united prayer was the only way to sustain the spiritual awakening that already had begun in the colonies, Edwards called for Christians on both sides of the Atlantic to pray for revival.

The title of his book summarizes what is happening throughout the Body of Christ at this hour in the growth of the prayer movement: "A Humble Attempt to Promote Explicit Agreement and Visible Union of God's People in Extraordinary Prayer, for the Revival of the church and the Advancement of Christ's Kingdom on Earth."

Edwards' book, along with such classic texts as Andrew Murray's Key to the Missionary Problem and Timothy Smith's Revivalism and Social Reform, suggest there usually are five phases in every historic revival:

1. Intercession - God's people begin to unite in prayer for revival;
2. Revelation - God answers prayer by pouring out a fresh new manifestation of the person of Christ;
3. Consecration - as a result, God's people consecrate themselves to Him, to each other, and to the work of Christ in the world;
4. Revitalization - ministries are purified and rejuvenated and become more fruitful, both locally, nationally, and beyond;
5. Expansion - out of revival the gospel is advanced further, the church makes a greater impact upon the surrounding culture, and a general spiritual awakening takes place on many levels.

Why Today's Prayer Movement is Unprecedented

Though it certainly has not risen to the level of a great awakening, the movement of united prayer occurring in so many parts of the world today is unparalleled in several respects:

1. It is unprecedented in numbers. Mission statistician David Barrett, who has researched the magnitude of the prayer movement, claims there are approximately 170 million Christians who are committed to praying every day for spiritual awakening and world evangelization. In addition, there are 10 million prayer groups that focus on those priorities. Also, according to Barrett's figures, 20 million Christians worldwide believe their primary ministry calling is to pray daily for revival and for fulfillment of the Great Commission.

Barrett also suggests there may be as many as 1,400 prayer networks around the world that are mobilizing Christians to pray for revival. Such groups include International Intercessors, the Global Prayer Network of the Lausanne Committee, and the Anglican Prayer Fellowship. In the past few months, tens of thousands of Christians have participated in citywide prayer rallies. In some instances, they have joined together in prayer from coast to coast via television. Pastors are gathering together by the hundreds in prayer groups in various communities nationwide, seeking God for renewal in their own lives and within their churches.

In January, pastors in Corvallis, Oregon sponsored a citywide rally that attracted residents from throughout the Willamette Valley region. Afterward, the church leaders spent three days praying and fasting together at a retreat site. At the same time, almost 200 pastors from the Portland area took part in a four-day prayer retreat. When it concluded, they led a prayer rally that drew 15,000 people. Such events are uniting believers in prayer throughout the Pacific Northwest.

2. It is unprecedented in breadth. The prayer movement crosses many borders. It is multi-denominational and multiethnic. It is breaking down walls between Christians in Los Angeles, New York City, Cleveland, and other major urban centers. The prayer movement also knows no age boundaries. At a high school in Houston, a group of 150 students has gathered twice a week in the early morning throughout this year to pray for revival.

In Boston, a recent multilingual prayer rally brought together 800 Christians from 75 churches from throughout the center city. It took place in historic Park Street Church, itself the outgrowth of a concert of prayer in the early 1800s involving three other congregations.

3. It is unprecedented in scope. Entire denominations are involved. The Assemblies of God, for example is seeking to mobilize one million intercessors. The Christian and Missionary Alliance decided to devote much of this year's national meeting to mobilizing concerted prayer within all C&MA congregations. The prayer movement is clearly national in scope, as evidenced by the increased interest in the National Day of Prayer. This year, the entire nation was linked in united prayer through a one-hour Day of Prayer radio broadcast.

The prayer movement also is international in scope. In South Africa, for example, tiny multiracial prayer groups are scattered throughout the nation, and they have had a part in preventing a wholesale bloodbath there. Last summer in Korea, 800 university prayer leaders gathered for three days of training to mobilize concerts of prayer on every campus. That same week, 100,000 Korean high school students met for three days of praise and prayer at the Olympic Stadium. These events were preceded by a prayer march that drew 500,000 participants.

United prayer is a major explanation for the phenomenal changes in the former Soviet Union. In 1987, the 70th anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution, a call for united prayer for spiritual and political liberation was circulated among the churches there. Russian Christians took their cue from a passage in the Book of Daniel, which describes how the prophet discovered that the 70 divinely appointed years of Jewish captivity had lapsed. The Russian believers were convinced that if they would unite in prayer and fasting, God would set them free. Subsequent events in 1988 and 1989 attest to what God is willing to do with a year of united prayer.

4. It is unprecedented in strategy. Prayer movements increasingly are being linked to specific evangelistic events, such as crusades by Billy Graham, Luis Palau, and John Guest. In Atlanta, organizers of an impressive outreach effort known as Quest '96 will involve 400 churches in evangelism during the 1994 SuperBowl, the World Cup, and the 1996 Summer Olympics. The prayer effort is called G.A.P. - "Greater Atlanta Pray."

In Taiwan, the "Year 2000 Gospel Movement" is uniting denominations from all over the island. These groups have developed a comprehensive evangelistic thrust anchored in a national movement of prayer that includes citywide and regionwide events. Japanese church leaders recently formed the All-Japan Prayer Movement to mobilize 100,000 in prayer for the full evangelization of the 100 million people in that country.

5. It is unprecedented in leadership. In past spiritual awakenings, single categories of leadership seemed to propel prayer movements. In the early 1700s, for example, the first Great Awakening was led personally by the clergy. In the late 1700s, the second Great Awakening was steered by those who were mission-minded, such as William Carey and William Wilberforce. In the third Great Awakening, with central figures such as Charles Finney, groups we would describe as para-church ministries set the pace. In the mid-1800s, in what is sometimes called "the businessman's prayer revival," prayer was encouraged mostly by lay people.

Young people in student-led prayer bands have been at the forefront in almost every awakening, as J. Edwin Orr has documented in his book, Campus Aflame.

But the leadership of today's prayer movement is coming from all of these levels. In the past year alone, national level consultations on prayer have been held for denominational leaders, youth ministry leaders, missionary executives, city prayer movement leaders, and even directors of Christian foundations. Prayer coalitions have been organized, such as the Denominational Prayer Leaders Network and the National Youth Leaders Prayer Forum. The sole purpose for these groups is to develop strategies for united prayer. Never before has such a constellation of leaders come together like this. Never before has a united call to prayer been issued by such a wide cross-section of denominations and church groups.

Has God Begun to Answer?

Is there any evidence that God is responding to this great increase in prayer? His revival begun? From one perspective, the response is simple. That God is expanding the prayer movement is itself an answer to prayer for revival. When He is ready to unleash spiritual awakening, He will have the full attention of the whole church.

We have seen some specific, immediate answers to united prayer in many communities and nations, but they are not the ultimate answers. The immediate answers have come in many shapes and forms. After nearly 12 years of involvement in the prayer movement, I cannot think of one instance when immediate answers were not apparent.

These answers have included: (1) a greater revelation of who Jesus Christ is; (2) an expanded vision of what God desires to do in our cities and our world; (3) spiritual revitalization; and (4) unity among those who are praying, as they learn to trust and respect each other. All of these answers become evident whenever Christians pray for spiritual awakening.

But then there are the ultimate answers, for which we still wait: (1) the intensification of the grace and work of God in the midst of his Church (this is already occurring in some local congregations and in parts of the developing world, particularly in Latin America); (2) the renewal and transformation of the church; (3) the accelerated expansion of the work of the church within our cities, our nation, and in foreign lands; (4) the consummation of all things, since all of our prayers ultimately are answered in the return of Christ.

Our Puritan forefathers understood the importance of waiting for ultimate answers. They took courage from a passage in Revelation 5 which describes prayer as incense ascending before the throne and before the Lamb. They concluded that even if it took 40 years for their prayers for revival to be answered, not one prayer would be forgotten. They understood that every prayer and every concert of prayer would linger like incense before the Father until all had been answered.

We Have Every Reason to Hope

Can we really be sure that if we unite and pray together, God will truly give us the ultimate answers? Remember that seekers are the secret of God's Kingdom. Seekers are the ones who ultimately become the receivers. And when they receive, it is never for their sakes alone, but for the sake of many others. This is how God's Kingdom expands. Whenever we find a band of earnest seekers, we can expect the rest to follow.

Also, God has given us substantial reasons why we should pray for revival with full expectation that He will answer:

1. Because we know God intends for Jesus Christ to be at the center of everything, and that He is committed to working unrelentingly toward that goal. This, after all, is the heart of revival. It is also why God answers our prayers for revival.

2. Because God is faithful in all his ways. We know from Scripture that He has been pleased over and over again to raise up a people of prayer and then to answer them in revival. What He has done before He is willing to do again.
3. Because God knows that unless He answers our prayer for revival there is no other hope for the world. He must act powerfully on behalf of a praying church if the world is ever to come to know Jesus Christ and his saving power.
4. Because He knows that there is no hope for the church unless He answers our prayers for revival. The Church today is paralyzed and impotent before internal and external challenges. Apart from God's empowerment, and apart from a renewed vision of Christ and His Kingdom, we will never be liberated sufficiently to fulfill our potential in Christ.
5. Because He is showing us dramatic preparations for revival on every hand already. If God is preparing the way, He will definitely bring to completion what He has begun.
6. Because the Holy Spirit is teaching God's people how to pray as we ask Him to fulfill His great promises for revival. If God is stirring us to pray this way, our prayers won't be in vain.
7. Because God is raising up a great company of people throughout the Church who are devoted to Christ and His Kingdom. These people are determined to pursue God for revival, and they refuse to waiver in unbelief until God answers. Their fearlessness and boldness is a gift from God, and it is a sign of things to come.

I believe we have hope. Based on my years of observation at both a local and a global level, I believe we can make the following conclusions:

1. Ultimately, revival will come to the Church. God will answer our prayers;
2. It will result in a "second conversion," as it were, among millions of God's people, as this prayer movement releases in us a new passion for Christ and his Kingdom and a new sense of hope for His ultimate purposes. As D.T. Niles articulated many years ago, we who have been converted out of the world through Christ will now be converted with Christ back into the world;
3. We will see more and more the integration of prayer into all facets of Christian experience and community, until the whole church will become known as a movement of prayer. Prayer will be one of the church's chief hallmarks. It will be the fountainhead out of which flows our worship, theology, community, and mission;
4. A new dynamic in evangelism will emerge because of local, visible expressions of unity in the Body of Christ - a unity that is based upon scripture with Christ at the center;

5. A vast new missionary force will emerge from the church in North America (and out of the church world-wide) that will focus its energies primarily on the 2 billion people who are beyond the reach of the Gospel. It may be appropriate to say that the prayer movement is designed by the Holy Spirit, above all else, for the purpose of fulfilling the Great Commission.

Some Practical Steps

What are the practical steps we should take in response to these phenomenal developments around the world? Here are some suggestions:

1. Believe that God wants revival. Pray that God would bring revival. Pray that God will give you faith and a genuine vision for revival, until you know you are committed to be a part of this great movement of prayer.
2. Join a small prayer group with friends and associates who share your vision. As you pray, seek to recruit still others. Begin to set the pace in prayer for the Body of Christ.
3. Work at integrating the prayer movement into these four "C" areas of your Christian experience: closet prayer (personal prayer life); cluster prayer (in small group settings); congregational prayer (when an entire church convenes for intercession); and concerts of prayer (when several congregations gather to pray comprehensively for revival).
4. Seek out "pools of renewal" in churches and organizations within your community. Identify which churches and ministry groups are concerned for revival, especially those that already are praying. Then try to "dig the trenches" between them, enabling them to flow together and form a vast reservoir of renewal that can make a difference throughout your entire community.
5. Be equipped in your prayer life and in your efforts to mobilize prayer. The many resources available include books, tapes, conferences, and local and national prayer ministries.
6. Get involved in a communication network that will keep you informed about developments in the broader prayer movement. Historian Richard Lovelace says one of the most important factors in the great spiritual awakenings of the past was communication about what God was doing in other localities. Various Christian publications, Christian radio and TV broadcasts, and revival-report telephone hotlines of national prayer ministries can keep you in touch.
7. Whenever possible, visit other places where the prayer movement is flourishing. Talk to the leaders and learn from them. Then bring back a report to your own church or prayer group.
8. The most important step you can take: don't give up until the answer comes. It is by faith and patience that we inherit the promises, according to Hebrews 6:12.

Listen to the entreaty offered in the 1840s by British preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon: "Oh God, send us the Holy Spirit! Give us both the breath of spiritual life and the fire of unconquerable zeal. You are our God. ... The Kingdom comes not, and the work is flagging. Oh, that you would send the wind and the fire! And you will do this when we are all of one accord, all believing, all expecting, all prepared by prayer."

Spurgeon lived to see God answer his prayer. God is ready to do it again in our day.

A Glimpse of World Missions Today

UNITED STATES - As many as 10,000 student led Bible clubs are operating in American public schools, according to "Youth America," and a surge of prayer and evangelism is taking place. "Youth America" rallies are turning out thousands of teens at a time. Youth America rallies are scheduled for Los Angeles, Tulsa and Washington, D.C.

CUBA - A group of ministers in Cuba have been praying for the downfall of Fidel Castro since last Fall. The nation is now in the third year of a spiritual awakening with a growing missionary movement. Ironically, the Castro regime has done little to oppose it. Missionaries in Cuba predict that the communist nation will be completely open to foreign missionary activity by the end of the year. Approximately 250 Assemblies of God churches have sprung up in Cuba. Methodist missions are also burgeoning.

HAITI - Churches in this turbulent country are growing vigorously under indigenous leadership. Many foreign missionaries fled the country after the Haitian President Aristide was overthrown by a coup last year. However, church leaders say that this has created an atmosphere of prayer and revival among the Haitian churches.

BRAZIL - Just 20 years ago, Brazil was known as a traditional Roman Catholic country and culture. But this is no longer the case. Today the number of charismatics within the Catholic Church has grown to over five million. Renovacao Carismatica Catolica, the official charismatic renewal organization in Brazil, has the allegiance of almost 15% of the nation's Catholic priests. Over a half million Brazilians join evangelical churches every year.

ALBANIA - Muslims in this former communist bloc nation are extraordinarily open to the gospel. One of the last nations to implement democratic reform after the dismantling of the iron curtain two years ago, Albanians are increasingly spiritually open and are requesting Bibles from foreign missionaries.

UKRAINE - Jews for Jesus has opened an outreach base in Odessa and reports that Ukrainian Jews are the "most receptive in the world to the gospel" because they have not been indoctrinated against Christ by their rabbis. Large numbers of Ukrainian Jews have been converted to Christ every week since the outreach base opened last Fall.

GERMANY - The decrease of Christian influence bottomed out in Germany and the Church is again beginning to incrementally increase. Over one million evangelicals gathered for an annual week of prayer in over 1,500 locations in February throughout the German speaking countries of Europe.

MIDDLE EAST - The Islamic nations of the Middle East have been targeted for intercessory prayer by Brother Andrew's Open Doors Ministries. Christians around the world will pray for the Middle Eastern Muslim nations as a part of a prayer campaign known as "Evangelism on the Final Frontier." Existing churches in Muslim nations all over the world will receive prayer for ten years. Open Doors Ministries previously proclaimed "Seven Years of Prayer for the Soviet Union" in 1983. The doors opened seven years later in 1990.

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA - Chinese house churches are baptizing 27,000 new converts every day. The number of Christians in China far exceeds the number of Communist Party members. An estimated 90 to 100 million Christians have been added to the Chinese church in the last 20 years. Not only are the villagers of China's countryside being converted en masse, but Christianity is becoming popular among students and professionals. An estimated ten percent of China's university students have been converted to Christianity since the Tienanmen Square massacre three years ago.

MONGOLIA - One fourth of Mongolia's population will see the evangelistic film Jesus in 1992. Approximately 300 members of congress and Mongolia's Vice President attended the film's premier. The increasing influence of the gospel has come with the dismantling of the Soviet Union. Mongolia was formerly tied to Moscow.

World Evangelization Toward A.D. 2000:

Are we reaching closure?

By Jay Rogers

5/92

According to the U.S. Center for World Missions, Christian evangelism in the last 100 years has reached a growth curve which is now increasing exponentially. Comparing the ratio of Christians per unconverted people in the world, the following statistics have been noted:

* In the year 100 A.D. (70 years after Jesus Christ's ministry began), there was a total of one believer for every 360 unbelievers on the planet Earth (or .27% of the world's population).

* In the year 1000, the ratio became 1 to 220 (or .45% of the population).

* In 1900, the ratio became 1 to 27 (or 3.7%).

* In 1980, the ratio became 1 to 11 (or 9.1%).

* In 1990, the ratio was 1 to 7 (or 14.3%).

The U.S. Center for World Missions defines a Christian as a person who has had a "born-again" experience, attends a church service at least twice a week, and prays at least once a month for world evangelization. In viewing these ratios on the graph below, one can see a rapid increase of Christians toward the year 1900. This dramatic increase shows the impact which the Protestant Reformation of the 1500s, the First and Second Great Awakenings of the following centuries, and the Holiness and Pentecostal Revivals at the turn of the 20th century have had on world evangelization.

The 20th century, however, has shown the greatest growth period of conversions to the Christian faith. Remarkably, this exponential growth has occurred at an even higher rate than the staggering world population explosion. With a tremendous increase in world population has come an even greater increase in the total number of Christians. This great number of conversions has occurred despite great violence and persecutions against the Church.

The 20th century has been termed: "The Violent Century" by some historians, referring to the two great world wars, the holocaust, abortion, Soviet and Chinese communism killing millions of their own people, famine in Africa, the AIDS epidemic, etc., all happening on a global scale. Despite all of these obstacles, the Kingdom of God has grown and multiplied.

The U.S. Center for World Missions has numbered at least 24,000 distinct ethnic groups which can be viewed in biblical terms as the ETHNE, "the nations," or "peoples groups," that must be reached with the gospel in order to fulfill the Great Commission of Jesus Christ (Matthew 28:18-20).

Of these 24,000 peoples groups, there are 10,000 which have an indigenous witness in the form of a New Testament church made up of people from their own culture. This leaves 14,000 peoples groups which still must be reached with the gospel in order for the Great Commission to be fulfilled. With the exponential growth indicated on the graph below, it is mathematically possible that these remaining groups could be reached within the decade of the 1990s. But we should remember the words of Jesus Christ, which have been borne out in the experience of the 20th century: "And from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force" (Matthew 11:12).

Rushing Wind - an excerpt from No Compromise: The Life Story of Keith Green

By Melody Green

One evening, in February 1979, Keith was poking through his bookshelf - pulling books out, scanning a few pages, then putting them back. I noticed that he kept at it, until one book seemed to capture his interest. Keith carried it over to his favorite chair - a $5 Naugahyde recliner we "scored" at the resale store - and kicked back to read for a while. I smiled and shook my head. Keith was always tackling books that frightened me off just by their size.

It seemed like he was only a chapter into it when he called me over.

"Mel, do you remember this book?"

It didn't look familiar. "No what's it about?"

"It's all about revivals! Real ones!"

I did remember what he was talking about now. The book was called Revival Lectures and it was written by a 19th century revivalist named Charles Finney. One night about a year ago, Keith had phoned me from the road, sobbing into the phone. He had read me a whole chapter of that book over the phone! Keith had been reading more Finney lately and, tonight, he had rediscovered this particular book.

He went back to reading now - no long passages to read out loud, I guessed - and I got ready for bed.

When I walked out into the living room to say goodnight Keith was still engrossed in his reading. But by this time his expression had changed to total sobriety. Keith was so absorbed that he barely looked up as he mumbled a goodnight to me. I went in our room and turned out the light.

The next thing I knew Keith was shaking me awake. I was so groggy I could hardly understand what he was saying.

"Mel, wake up. You need to get up."

"Uh ... why?"

"It's happened! Get up. We're gonna have a special meeting right away."

Our voices woke Josiah up and he started to cry for my attention. It was barely daylight and through the haze of grogginess I wondered what on earth Keith was going on about.

"I've got to go to the other houses," he was saying. "I'll be back."

As I turned my attention to Josiah, the front door slammed and Keith took off in the gray morning light. One of the first places he went was one of the men's dorms. Wayne Dillard and a few other guys were awakened the same way I'd been. Later on Wayne told me what happened when Keith shook him awake.

"As soon as I got my eyes half-way opened, I could see his face - it was like he was smiling from the inside out. He was radiant."

"Wayne, wake up!" Keith said. "We've got to have a meeting."

"Okay," Wayne mumbled, "but what time is it?"

It's about six. Listen, I was up praying all night. And I just got saved."

"You what?"

"I just got saved!"

By the time all seven houses heard about the special meeting, our community was buzzing with curiosity. Having an early morning meeting was in itself a shock. Usually, no one even saw Keith before 10 a.m. because of his late night schedule. I watched everyone quietly drift into The School House - throwing questioning glances at each other. It looked like all seventy of us were there - crammed into the living room, and spilling over into the hall and kitchen, anxiously waiting to find out what was going on.

As soon as I saw Keith's face I knew something big was going on. His eyes were clear and bright and his whole face was lit with a broad grin. Something had happened to him!

"You know I've been struggling with a lot of questions about my ministry and the Lord's will for my life," he began, "I've been really wanting God to be more real. Well, I was up all night and God showed me so much sin in my life that I spent the whole night weeping and crying to Him. I told the Lord I wasn't going to leave until I had a breakthrough - no matter how long it took. Finally, it happened. I had a touch from the Lord like I've never had in my whole life. And I know I just got saved - I just got saved last night."

Keith's words stunned everyone just as much as they stunned me. I could see it on their faces. Just got saved? I thought, What have you been if you haven't been saved? But Keith just kept talking, either ignoring or not noticing the wide-eyed surprise on everyone's face.

"Last night I was reading Finney, and I just couldn't get past a chapter called 'Breaking Up The Fallow Ground'. God convicted me of so much fallow ground in my life - ground that's hard and crusty and needs to be broken up for Him ..."

Now the happiness in Keith's eyes clouded over as they started to fill up with tears. Blinking them back, Keith pulled some sheets of paper out of his Bible and unfolded them as he kept talking.

"I've already gotten these things right with God, now I want to confess them to you and ask for your forgiveness because my sins have affected you. First of all, I know I haven't been a very good leader. I've wounded some of you with my words and my crummy attitudes ..."

Now Keith broke and really started to cry, but he controlled himself enough to go on.

"The Lord has also shown me areas of pride and unbelief in my life. I don't pray enough, either. And I'm so undisciplined. I've been a bad example to all of you. I have no excuse except for being lazy and loving myself more than I really love God ..."

He went on for several minutes, pouring his heart out crying.

"I know my sin has broken God's heart. I know it's hurt you, too - and I'm really, really sorry. I'm not worthy to bear the holy name of a Christian. Please forgive me."

Then Keith picked up his Bible and read a scripture to us from Hosea: "Break up your fallow ground, for it is time to seek the Lord until He comes to rain righteousness on you ..." Keith continued, "Fallow ground is ground that was once tilled, but has gotten hard and unusable. Before it can receive seed it needs to be broken up and made soft again. Finney says to break up the fallow ground of our heart we need to examine our motives, actions, and state of mind carefully." Then picking up the Finney book, Keith read to us:

"Many people never seem to think about doing this. They pay no attention to their own hearts, and never know whether they are doing well in their walk with the Lord or not - whether they are bearing fruit or are totally barren. There are many professing Christians who are willing to do almost anything in religion that does not require self-denial. They are so far from realizing that self-denial is a condition of discipleship, that they do not even know what it is!"

As Keith was talking an awesome sense had been coming over me. Instead of thinking that the things he had done were so terrible, I found myself starting to search my own heart, thinking, if God put the searchlight on Keith, what does all this mean for me? By now I was starting to make a mental list. A long one.

Keith went on to read the whole chapter out loud to us. It was a real "outline" for a point-by-point examination of our own hearts. Finney said that "general" confessions of our sins were not good enough. Since our sins were committed one by one, as much as possible they needed to be repented of one by one - confessing to God those sins committed against Him, and confessing to others the sins committed against them. No short cuts allowed! Then Keith paused and seemed to take a deep breath before he continued.

"I believe God wants to do something powerful in all our lives. What God did for me, He wants to do for you. He wants all of us to have pure hearts that are soft and open to Him. We all need to humble ourselves and break up the 'fallow ground' of our hearts so God can be glorified. I believe we all need to have breakthrough with God. I really think we all need to pray now."

Everybody bowed their heads and closed their eyes. Then Keith started praying a very powerful prayer and a hush fell over the room. In just a moment something began to happen.

Suddenly one of the women burst into tears. She'd been sitting on the floor and now she was on her face, her whole body heaving with uncontrollable sobs. A few others started to weep, and the next thing we knew we were all on our faces., crying, and calling out to God. Actually, some of us could do little more than moan. The feelings were so deep it was hard to even put them into words. It was a gut-wrenching time of conviction and soul-searching. The sound of wailing started to rise and fill the room - and it went on and on.

We met again later that evening and over the next few days - day and night. We had hours of prayer, weeping, and humble open confession. Everyone was being broken. They had read their list of sins and asked forgiveness of God and those who had been affected. There was such an awesome sense of God's presence in the room, sometimes overwhelming. And more often than not after someone shared, tears of sorrow ignited into tears of joy - and even as many broke through to God at deeper levels than ever before. They said they felt cleansed and refreshed in a brand new way - like their souls had just come alive and the weight of the world was lifted off their shoulders. It seemed like, one by one, this was happening to everybody.

Jesus Commands Us to Go!

By Keith Green

This article originally appeared in The Last Days Newsletter in the Fall of 1982, formerly entitled: "Why You Should Go to the Mission Field." It was Keith's final message from the Lord.

An Introduction By Melody Green

I want to encourage you to read the following article by Keith with an open heart. It was completed only a few days before Keith and two of our children, Josiah and Bethany, went home to be with Jesus in a fatal plane crash. The following message was a real expression of the fresh burden the Lord had put on his heart. As Keith explains, this is so much more than "just another article." It was something that the Lord had put burning in Keith's heart and was to be his new emphasis of message to Christians - especially those Christians in America.

I know that most of you are aware of the fact that Keith's message, almost from the start of his ministry, was "get right with God!" He wasn't very shy about preaching it, and I know that because of his boldness many hearts opened to the Holy Spirit's conviction and the reality of God. Keith wanted to see every Christian totally sold-out to the Lord.

I believe the vision for missions is a completion of Keith's message for Christians to really be right with God. The question is this - once you are right ... then what? Do you sit around in your "rightness," or do you seek God's direction to see how and where you can be used most effectively for the Kingdom of God? What the world is dying for is hundreds and thousands of believers who are determined to see the lost find out who their Creator is before they stand before God on that great and awesome day.

I know it would be Keith's greatest desire (aside from the salvation of the lost) for you to take this matter seriously before the throne of God. If you will lay all your personal goals at the foot of the cross, and ask Jesus what He wants you to do with your life, then I know Keith's burden from the Lord will be born your heart - and carried to the ends of the earth.

- Melody Green

Part 1: The Call of the Lord

A Biblical Look At the Missions Call

I recently returned from visiting some overseas missionary bases, and I must say that since returning, my life has not been quite the same. The vision and goals of our ministry have suddenly changed. The Lord definitely did something to my heart on that trip. Besides showing me how small my vision had been, He began to give me a great burden to see the ranks of His army on the field swell!

One of the greatest things God opened my eyes to was how tremendously evangelized my own country was, while the rest of the world was barely being reached. As I traveled from country to country, I thought of the millions of people I was passing through who needed to have the Gospel of Jesus shown to them in a real way - and yet there was hardly anyone there to reach them.

As I visited each mission base, I spoke with different missionaries, and picked up various pieces of literature that told the story of the Kingdom of God. As I read the statistics, I was shocked - I really had never known how little the need was being met!

When I returned home, I got hold of some of the leaders of different missionary organizations and set up some meetings to find out more about what was being done to fill the need. After these meetings, I decided to do a study of God's Word (to see what He had to say about reaching the lost in other countries), and I also read through some more of the missions literature I had been given.

This article is the result of that study, and also a burning desire in my heart to see 100,000 young people released to the mission field.

So ... why should you go to the mission field?

1. Because Jesus has told you to go.

"Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to all creation" (Mark 16:15).

With these words, Jesus made it clear exactly what His disciples were to do - they were to spread His teachings in His name, preaching salvation unto the ends of the earth (Romans 10:18). If you consider yourself a "believer," then you must consider yourself a disciple of Jesus - no less called and chosen than the very first 12 Apostles.

There are no "first class" Christians and "second class" Christians - every believer is called to spread the Good News about Jesus to those who have not yet heard. Jesus' command is definite and clear - it is His great mandate, His "Great Commission" to the soldiers in His holy army. We must go, because our great General has commanded us to go.

2. You should go because the need is so great.

"The harvest is plentiful, but the workers are few. Therefore, beseech the Lord of the harvest to send out workers into His harvest (Matt. 9:37-38).

Ever since Jesus first spoke these compassionate words, the supply of workers in the fields of soul-harvest has always been horribly low. But today the need is the greatest it has ever been in the history of mankind. Remember, Hell is not just for the weekend! More people are alive today, and more souls are at stake, than the total number of people who have ever lived on the face of the earth in all of human history! This simply means that we can populate either Heaven or Hell by our obedience or our laziness.

There are over 2,700,000,000 people who have never heard the Gospel at all, and there are only 5,000 to 7,000 missionaries worldwide, working directly with these totally unreached people.¹ That means there is approximately one missionary for every 450,000 of these people! There are over 16,000 different and distinct cultures and people groups - even whole countries, where not one single church is in existence.² There are 7,010 distinct living languages, and 5,199 of them still have no Bible or Scripture translations available in their own language!³

Do these figures move you at all? Does it matter to you that an estimated 80,000 unsaved people die every day (approximately 3,333 every hour ... 55 people every single minute!) to face the judgment seat of Christ?⁴

3. You should go because so few Christians are obeying the call, making the need even greater!

"Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ ... how shall they hear without a preacher?" (Rom. 10:17,14).

Right now worldwide there are probably 85,000 workers on the mission field - working mainly among those who have heard the Gospel before.⁵ This figure includes missionaries from all over the world of every nationality.

When you compare this number with the staggering amount of Americans selling Avon or Amway products, it is staggering. Just in America alone there are over 435,000 Avon sales people⁶ (with 1,280,000 worldwide), and over 750,000 Amway products distributors⁷ (with over a million world wide)! Do you realize that these two companies combined have 14 times more representatives in the United States alone than the Church of Jesus Christ has in the whole world outside of America?

And what about the Christian representatives we do have in the world? Only 9% of the world's population speaks English, and yet 94% of all ordained preachers in the whole world minister to the 9% who speak English. And 96% of all Christian finances are spent in the United States on 6% of the world's population. Only 4% of all Christian money is spent on missionary efforts to reach the other 94% of the world's population!

There are over 1,000,000 full-time Christian workers in the United States; while over one half of the world's population (3 major groups - Moslem, Hindu, and Chinese), 2,200,000,000 people, have only 2,417 full-time Christian workers.⁸ As you can see by these figures, something is definitely wrong. While we in America have approximately one worker for every 230 people - those who have never heard the Gospel even once have one worker for every 450,000 souls!

Please forgive us Jesus, for being too timid to obey You and reach out into all the world like You have commanded us to!

4. You should go because God gives special anointing and grace to those who leave their own land, people, and culture to do God's will and spread the Gospel.

"And the Lord said to Abram, 'Go forth from your own country and from your relatives, and from your Father's house ... and I will bless you and make your name great; and so you shall also be a blessing; and I will bless those that bless you, and the one who curses you I will curse. And in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed'(Genesis 12:1-3).

Abraham is only one of the many people in the Bible who God used mightily only after he left his own people, his own land, and his own culture. Look at the travels and ministry of people like Jacob and Moses - both of whom had to go into other lands to learn from God and be used by Him.

No matter where you look in the Bible, God always gave a great anointing and blessing to those who served Him in a foreign land. Look at Joseph and Daniel. They were the only two men in the Bible who God raised up as successful, secular officials in foreign and heathen cultures - and they remained faithful witnesses and servants of God to the very end, and often at the risk of their very lives!

What about Jonah? He was a good example of someone who didn't want to go to the mission field and preach to heathens! Stubborn, rebellious, and selfish - and yet God "made him an offer." (I pray that God would freely move like that in all our lives, "helping" us to make the right decisions about going).

And then there's the Apostle Paul - who had such a burden for his own people and his own country, Israel. Oh, how he would have loved a ministry among the Jews! But what did God say? "Go! For I will send you far away to the Gentiles" (Acts 22:21). That's what God commanded, and 'go' he did. Never was there a missionary like Paul. Take a look at 2 Corinthians 11 if you'd like to see a list of his qualifications: beatings, imprisonments, stonings, mobs, shipwrecks, the list goes on and on - and so did Paul, obeying his Master who bought him.

From Noah to Abraham, from Moses to Jonah, from Daniel to Paul, God has always given a special blessing to those who, leaving the comforts of home and relatives, cross the boundaries of their little worlds to bring God's message and blessing to the nations.

Remember Jesus' words about this subject, "A prophet is not without honor except in his home town" (Matt. 13:57).

5. You should go because America (and some other western nations) is literally drenched with the Gospel, while most other countries and cultures of the world do not have any continual, relevant witness at all.

"And thus I aspired to preach the Gospel, not where Christ was already named, that I might not build upon another man's foundation; but as it is written, 'They that had no news of Him shall see, and they who have not heard shall understand'" (Rom. 15:20-21).

It is so true that we here in America are continually bombarded with Christian witness and ministry. Almost at every turn there's a billboard or a bumpersticker proclaiming something about Jesus. Turn the dial on your radio at any time of the day or night, and you've got non-stop preaching. There are several Christian satellite and cable networks. And there are over 250 different Christian magazines and publications. In most cities there's a church on almost every corner.

I am not trying to say that this is all bad - a lot of it is good, winning many souls to Jesus - but as I've traveled overseas, it is hard for me to believe that it is God's will for there to be so much Gospel preaching and literature available here, while there is comparatively little or even none in many places outside of this country.

The world is going to Hell on every continent! Is it God's fault that so few are hearing the Gospel - or is it the Church's? Aren't we who love Jesus accountable to reach our generation with the Gospel? A friend of mine has written, "This generation of Christians is responsible for reaching this generation of sinners." If this is true, then each one of us must take a good, long look at our lives and priorities - finding out where God would have us begin to get ready to go!

6. You should go because, as Oswald J. Smith said, "No one has the right to hear the Gospel twice, while there remains someone who has never even heard it once."

"But if our Gospel be hidden, it is hidden to them that are lost: in whom the god of this world has blinded the minds of them which believe not, that they might not see the light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:3-4).

Has it occurred to you that Jesus wants every creature to hear the Gospel? If you had 20 children to feed and plenty of food to feed them all with, do you think it would be right to give 3 of the children 10 meals, 7 children only 1 meal, and the remaining nothing - causing them to die of starvation? That's exactly what we're doing with the Gospel in the world today!

Because we believers are so deaf to God's call to go into all nations, we keep most of God's resources to ourselves! We keep feeding and reaching the same people over and over again. I am not saying that there should be no Gospel preached in America, I am saying that there needs to be a spreading out of the soldiers of God, to fight the enemy where his greatest strongholds are - "where Christ is not named!"

7. You should go because the Holy Spirit is speaking to Christian leadership all over the world that it is God's desire for there to be a great final missionary thrust with the Gospel before the end of the age. It is His desire that every people should have the Gospel preached to them, and that the Gospel should be published in every nation and in every language. And unless YOU get involved personally, there is no hope of that ever happening in our generation!

"... And you shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and even to the remotest part of the earth" (Acts 1:8). "And this Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in the whole world for a witness to all the nations, and then the end shall come" (Matt. 24:14). "The Lord is ... patient toward you, not wishing for any to perish but for all to come to repentance" (2 Peter 3:9).

Is there any doubt in your mind that God wants everyone to be saved? If you believe this, and you really love Jesus, then WHY are you so timid about getting involved in this great thrust to bring the Gospel to all the nations? Do you think that while you're reading this, God isn't grieved that His Church is being so lazy and disobedient about fulfilling His commission? He knows that you agree with the Scriptures, and He's listening to every excuse you're turning over in your mind like, "Yes, I know that more people need to go ... but He just couldn't mean ME! I'm ... I'm just not the missionary type ..."

The Most Commonly Heard Excuses

The following objections are just a few of the many that Christian groups and missionary societies constantly hear from prospective recruits for the mission field. Although many may be merely excuses, we have heard them spoken so many times as serious statements from well meaning Christians in response to the question, "Why don't you get trained to go into full time Christian service in a foreign country?"

1. "But I'm not called."

You don't know how many people I've met who have said to me, "Keith, I agree that more people need to go to the mission field, but I've never heard God tell me to go."

Well, the truth is that God has already told you to go in His Word. In fact, He commands us to go ... "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15). That's right ... YOU ARE CALLED!

In fact, if you don't go, you need a specific calling from God to stay home. Has God definitely told you not to "go" somewhere outside your country to preach the Gospel? If He hasn't, then you'd better start praying WHERE to go, instead of IF you should go - for again, you're already called!

2. But God needs people to stay here to be a witness to those lost in America. There's enough need right here!"

It is true that God has called some people to stay right where they are to be witnesses for Jesus in their daily lives and professions. But again, God is merciful and just. Since America has only about 5% of the world's population, then only about 5% of the believers would really be called to stay in this country as a witness (that's only 1 out of 20) while the rest of us should go into the parts of the world where there are almost 0% believers. (In Albania, for instance, there are only "a handful" of known believers in the whole country of 2.7 million people - less than 1/2 of 1/1000th percent!!)9

3. "But God needs people to stay home and financially support those ministries and missionaries who are already all over the world. In fact, my church is already supporting some missionaries with my tithes and offerings."

You should never have to worry about there not being enough Christians staying home to support missionaries! There will always be enough people around who will not answer the call to go - who will stay home and gladly just send a check (instead of themselves) to reach the lost. After all, nothing is easier to give than money (except nothing!)

This does not mean that everyone who stays home is selfish and disobedient. As I've already said, there are some who know they are definitely called to stay, and they are doing exactly what God would have them do here, while they greatly support other ministries. I'm just saying that there will always be plenty of people around to financially support the pitifully few who answer the call and obey God.

4. "But my family and friends would frown on me going."

"He who loves father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me ..." (Matt. 10:37).

God is very clear about whose approval we should seek. It's shocking to me how even Christian parents react when their children say that they'd like to go for training as a full time Christian worker. "A missionary! Are you crazy?!" It's as if they've announced they'd like to be a thief or a prostitute.

It is true that God wants us to honor our parents and love our friends, but He has also made it clear in His Word that this honor and love must not exceed our love and obedience to Him and His calling on our lives. We should always try our best to explain God's call to our families, lovingly and patiently, but the bottom line must be that we will obey Christ no matter what the cost.

We should always try to get our family's understanding and blessing when God makes our ministry clear to us, but we also always must be ready to leave "houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or children or farms" for His sake "and for the Gospel's sake" (Mark 10:29).

5. "But I need to stay here and lead my relatives to the Lord first. If I go somewhere else, how can they get saved?"

There once was a man who wanted to follow and obey Jesus, but he said to Him, "Lord, permit me first to go and bury my father." Jesus' answer to him was, "Follow me; and allow the dead to bury their own dead" (Matt. 8:21,22).

This may sound cruel of Jesus not to allow the man to have a funeral for his dead father - but most likely, the man's father had not yet died. The phrase "wait until I bury my father" was sometimes used to say "wait until my father has died." What he was really saying was, "I'd like to follow You now, but You see, my parents wouldn't understand. Please wait until after they've died and then I'll be more than happy to follow You!"

Jesus' answer was appropriate ... "Allow the dead to bury their own dead." In other words, "allow unbelievers to take care of themselves and follow Me!" Jesus doesn't want us to throw our usefulness away because our relatives are not yet saved. The greatest witness they can see is you fully obeying the call of God on your life.

Jesus didn't want this man's father to be buried - He wanted the young man to follow him, and then maybe even the man's father would come to know Him too. Obedience is truly greater than sacrifice (1 Samuel 15:22) - when we obey God, He takes care of all our other obligations (Matt. 6:33).

6. "But I need to get an education first."

I don't believe that God wants every Christian to go to college just because, "Well, everyone goes to college now, unless they're too dumb!" You shouldn't go to college unless God has definitely called you to go. Just like everything else in our Christian lives, He's the Master, we're the servants. He's the General, we're the soldiers. If you're really a Christian, you're at the beck and command of the King. If you're not at His command, then you're really not a Christian.

Yes, God does call some people to go to college. Sometimes it's to get training for a ministry He's made clear to them. For instance, if you know what country you're called to, perhaps God would lead you to learn the language and culture somewhat before you go (although the very best place to learn is within the country itself - it's a definite "crash course!")

Of course, another reason God might lead you to college is to minister to people right there on the campus - as well as to mature emotionally and spiritually. But be careful! Make sure you're there in direct obedience to God, or else you're wasting your time - and His.

7. "But I need to get married first, and then my mate will want to serve God full-time on the field rather than me going alone."

Nothing could be a more foolish reason for putting off obeying God now. God does not want you to look for a husband or wife, He wants you to be married to Him, and trust Him for any mate He may bring into your life. I know of many single Christians serving Jesus overseas who are trusting Him for everything. And some of the most beautiful stories of God's grace I've ever heard are told by couples who went to the mission field single, and then God led them to marry another whose heart was also fully devoted to serving Him there.

Remember, "Your Father knows what you need before you ask Him" (Matt. 6:8). Trust Him!

8. But have a family to support. God doesn't want me to neglect them, does He?"

The Word of God says, "Seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. 6:33).

If you can trust God for your needs, you can certainly trust Him for your family's needs. You would never be foolishly "neglecting" your family's needs by obeying God's call to go. God will show you the way. I know of so many families - some with many children - who are on the field right now, trusting God for their needs while they minister in His name. I have never heard of ONE occurrence where God didn't meet the needs of one of His servants and their families. As King David said ...

"I have been young, and now I am old; yet I have not seen the righteous forsaken, or His descendants begging bread. All day long he is gracious and lends; and his descendants are a blessing" (Psalm 37:25,26).

9. "But the mission field is dangerous. God would not have me put myself or my family in danger of disease or native hostilities, would He?"

"Why is the Lord bringing us into this land, to fall by the sword? Our wives and our little ones will become plunder; would it not be better for us to return to Egypt?" (Numbers 14:3)

It is all a matter of our priorities - do we look at the temporary or the eternal in making our choices? It's true that you will probably be in more physical danger on the mission field than you would be in the suburbs in America, but that is part of the cost that we need to count when it comes to serving God. The question should not be, "Will I be kept safe wherever I go? but rather, "What is on the Lord's heart for me to do?"

If Jesus decided to go the way of least pain, He would have never gone to the cross. There is no place of greater blessing for you than in the center of God's will. You must stop to count the cost, but remember one thing - the privilege of serving God always outweighs the price!

"If anyone wishes to come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me. For whoever wishes to save his life will lose it; but whoever loses his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall save it" (Mark 8:34-35).

10. "But I could not afford to get the training, and raise the necessary finances to place myself (or my family) on the field."

Don't worry, God will help raise the money you need. Wherever God guides, He supplies - even if it means helping you get a job! Problems and worries about finances are usually only a surface excuse when it comes to obeying God to go. In your heart you know He'll make a way for you!

11. "But I don't have any special talents or abilities that would qualify me to be a missionary."

Then you're just the person God is looking for! Sure God can use nurses, teachers, accountants, and mechanics on the field, but it always blesses God to greatly use the one who seemingly has nothing to offer. It is this person who has the opportunity of purely representing Jesus in the endless "common" tasks that are part of the daily life of the missionary. "When I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor. 12:10; also 1 Cor. 1:26-31).

12. "But how could I commit myself for four years to go to the field without having a chance to see what it would be like?"

It is true that in past generations a foreign missionary had to make almost a lifetime commitment before he could go to the field. In most cases, he had to go to college for at least four years, and then seminary for two to four years before he could even begin his missions training and service. But today there are missionary organizations that have short term programs for people who want to receive training and find out what serving God in other countries is like. These programs last from a few weeks to a few years in length. So now there is an opportunity to "take a look" before making a much longer commitment.

13. "But God wants me to stay in this country and prosper. The reason the rest of the world is so poor and unconverted is because their heathen religions and idolatry have caused them to live in ignorance and poverty, without God's blessing."

This has to be THE most selfish reasoning I've ever heard for not going - and I've heard it! Of course they live in ignorance and poverty, that's just the very reason you should go - to bring the enlightenment that comes from knowing the truth about Jesus, and to bring them the true riches of knowing Christ. If you don't believe that the reason God has blessed you with an abundance in this country is so you can be a blessing to others - then you have never understood the Gospel of Jesus Christ! "Freely you received, freely give" (Matt. 10:8).

14. I'm just not ready to make that kind of a sacrifice and commitment."

Ah! That's just the point. That's probably the underlying reason for almost every one of the above objections. In fact, you might just as well have said, "I'm not willing." You need to decide whether or not you are a disciple of Jesus - that is the question. If you are His disciple, then "you are not your own ... you have been bought with a price" (1 Cor. 6:19-20).

And if you truly love Him, then you will not feel bondage, you will feel incredible excitement at being chosen to represent Him in the world! To be a servant of Jesus Christ, an ambassador, a missionary, is the highest calling a man or a woman can attain to!

Now what are you waiting for??

Missions Book List

12/90

The following is a suggested list of excellent books that will help you to learn more about missions - the need, the burden, the lifestyle, and the ministry. Check with your local bookstore - they can order them for you if they don't have them in stock.

Bruchko - The remarkable story of Bruce Olson. As a 19-year-old American boy, he followed the call of the Lord against incredible odds into the jungles of Venezuela. Near death after being shot with an arrow, he recovered and, all alone, without the help of any missionary society, he evangelized the savage Motilone Indians.

- by Bruce Olson; Creation House.

Peace Child - The contemporary story of a man who went into a tribe of stone-age cannibals whose source of tribal pride was seeing "who could be the most treacherous." Don Richardson and his family lived an incredible adventure among these people and brought them to know and love the true Peace Child.

- by Don Richardson; Regal.

Operation World: A Handbook For World Intercession - As well as describing the economic and religious status of each nation, this book tells you what is currently being done to bring these people to Christ. It is an effective prayer tool since it is full of statistics and specific prayer requests for each nation.

- by P.J. Johnstone;

Send The Light Publications.

The General Next To God - The moving and exciting story of William and Catherine Booth and the founding of the Salvation Army in the slums of England.

- by Richard Collier; Fontana.

Eternity In Their Hearts - This book gives a remarkable insight into the vast opportunities of world evangelism. It shows many factual instances of groups of people who, through their ancient folklore, are totally prepared to receive the Gospel. They are literally waiting for and expecting God to show up. all they need is someone to lead them to the truth.

- by Don Richardson; Regal.

Hudson Taylor's Spiritual Secret - Hudson Taylor was the pioneer of modern faith missions. His life is and incredible adventure as we follow the story of the founding of the China Inland Mission in the 1800's..

- by Dr. & Mrs. Howard Taylor;

Moody Press.

Key To The Missionary Problem - Although written as a response to the Missions Conference of 1901, this summons to action for missions is as burning and contemporary as when first issued. This is a book of great intensity, which sounds forth a rousing and solemn call to new activity, fresh consecration, and more abundant prayer for the cause of missions..

- by Andrew Murray;
Christian Literature Crusade.

God Smuggler - The exciting, true account of one man's dedication to Christ, and burden to bring God's Word to those behind the "closed doors" of the Iron Curtain.

- by Brother Andrew; Spire.

The Path of Revival

By Jeff Ziegler

In traveling across the United States and Great Britain, I have had opportunity to hear many a serious inquiry concerning the nature of revival and spiritual awakening. Most often these questions revolve around what our expectations should be when revival indeed comes to the Church and what effects spiritual awakening brings when it dawns upon the nations.

The views which I shall present are in harmony with those of the great Puritan expositor Matthew Henry and the revivalist Jonathan Edwards, whose ministry spanned the First Great Awakening. I take this approach because many of the modernistic approaches to interpreting the prophecy of Isaiah, especially chapter 60, willfully ignore any application of its principles to the Church, thus robbing from the Church the glory and grandeur of her inheritance and absolving her of responsibility for revival and spiritual awakening.

This approach not only rightly includes the Church's participation in Isaiah's picture of revival, but shows that it is only through the Church and the dynamic power of the Gospel that there can be any hope of seeing the great blessings of this chapter brought to fruition. As you read this, my hope and prayer is that you will begin to pray for a revival that affects every sphere of society and establishes a dramatic increase in the kingdom of God on earth.

"Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee" (Isaiah 60:1).

Oh, what an awe inspiring vision this sweet sentence gives! Can you see it? Does it capture your heart? God's people, the elect, the Church of God, rising in the light of Christ's holy perfections, to exhibit and be animated as a testimony upon the earth! I can think of no greater more beautiful picture of revival coming to the Church, than the glory of God coming to the people of God!

Yet even in the light of such resplendent vision, many Bible scholars and historians depreciate and limit the value of this verse and the entire sixtieth chapter of Isaiah. They do so by declaring the sum of all which is spoken of in these passages as a foretelling of Israel's deliverance from the Babylonian captivity and her subsequent restoration in the land.

There can be no doubt that Israel was indeed delivered and restored from her captivity under great and inspired leaders such as Nehemiah and Ezra, but the scope and vision of these passages are far greater than this single event. Their magnitude and force are of such a spiritual dimension that only a revived Church working exploits in the power of the Gospel could ever bring a comprehensive fulfillment of Isaiah's all encompassing declarations.

Thus to relegate Isaiah's far-reaching global vision to a past age and one specific event can only spell disaster for a generation of Christians who so desperately need revival.

Isaiah's vision contains many revival principles that we can expect to be fulfilled by the Church when revival and awakening come in the fulness of God's power. We will consider just four of these principles.

"Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people: but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and His glory shall be seen upon thee" (Isaiah 60:1-2).

Revival Principle #1

In a time of deep spiritual decline, the glory of the Lord Jesus Christ dawns upon the elect in unusual power and His character is recovered and expressed among His people.

Revival is not a planned evangelical meeting! Rather it is a unique and dynamic out raying of the Father's glory through Christ toward the Church as a testimony of His supremacy upon the earth. Winkie Pratney describes revival as, "God springing a convicting surprise upon His creation."

If you genuinely long for revival, then begin seeking the glory of God - His divine character. Pray with faith and the unction of Moses, "Lord, show me Thy glory." The Lord Jesus Christ, by the very nature of His loving character, will grant you a mighty transfiguring and reviving, for the Lord Himself has always shown His desire in regards to His beloved ones seeing the glory of God.

Revival Principle #2

Revival comes when moral decline is rampant among the nations and there is a gross or greater spiritual darkness among the people.

This gross darkness is a hellish numbing agent which parches the sinner's conscience, leading both individuals and whole nations into a senseless, demonic stupor, seemingly impervious to Gospel light. This malignant malaise is hell's most potent weapon for it atrophies the Church, thus leaving whole people groups spiritually neutered. Nevertheless, it is in the midst of such carnal chaos that God sends revival to cheer and to guide His downcast, despairing remnant.

Consider 18th century England just before the Great Awakening. On the average every third house was a gin house or affected by drunkenness. Violence and sexual promiscuity was widespread and having dramatic increase. The Church was morally corroded and consistently ignored by the masses. Yet under these deplorable, nation-ruining influences, God sovereignly raised up uncompromising men having revival vision, both in England and America, thus heralding unprecedented spiritual awakening.

The testimony of Christ was recovered and held high in that generation. Will not the God of the Great Awakening, the God of revival perform the same in our day? For all who are despairing at the disrepair of spiritual life in the Church, take heart and pray in faithful anticipation for the King of Glory to revive the house of His glory.

Revival Principle #3

When the greatness of Christ's glorified testimony is revived in the Church, the lost are awakened in large number.

"And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising. Lift up thine eyes round about, and see: all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side" (Isaiah 60:3-4).

Our third revival effect is that of power evangelism or Great Awakening. "The gentiles (the unsaved) will come into thy light." Notice that because the Church is alive with the light of Christ's character, she now shines as an ascended beacon of righteousness! No longer scorned or ignored, a great harvest of souls is wrought. The triumph of an awakening is always loosed through a revived Church.

Jonathan Edwards once wondered aloud at the prospect of the First Great Awakening continuing unabated, with the glorious consequence being that there would be no one left in 18th century America to save. Such is the the overwhelming dynamic of revival and spiritual awakening upon our vision. Do you have the faith to pray with this vision before you?

Revival Principle #4

Revival also brings a restoration of those who have backslidden in the quagmire of soulish, selfish living and have left the Church for the attractions of worldliness.

"Lift up thine eyes round about, and see: all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side" (Isaiah 60:4).

Can there be any greater heart joy to see the Church's prodigal sons and daughters return to the God of their Fathers? In the day of revival, the Church again becomes a relevant and distinctly spiritual voice both to those who have rejected and spurned Christ's love and to those sincere children who have tired of lifeless religion and have left the fold.

If you have a genuine concern for the heritage of the Church, I can think of no greater reason to pray for revival in the Church! Revival is the surest way to prevent and arrest decline and worldliness in our families and churches. It is time to pray for a revived Church receiving her wayward sons and daughters back into the fold.

It is time to prepare the fatted calf for a feast of revival joy for the return of those dead in trespass and sin that they may be alive again in Christ - that the Church will once again be enlarged and nurse her sons and daughters at her side!

In a future issue we will continue to examine Isaiah 60 and see how revival affects economics, government and the kingdom of God.

The Path of Revival - Part Two

By Jeff Ziegler

In the May issue of The Forerunner, we began a point by point discussion of the path that revival takes upon the earth using Isaiah 60 as a framework for our study. Having progressed through the first four verses, I will briefly recapitulate the principles we covered.

Revival Principle #1

In the time of deep spiritual decline, Christ radiates the Father's glory in unusual power and demonstration toward the Church, thus recovering His testimony and advancing the revived Church to triumph in her struggle against sin, and in doing so eradicate spiritual darkness.

Revival Principle #2

This dynamic out-raying of the Father's glory coincides with a marked decline in the spiritual and moral fabric within a nation or people's group. Therefore, the Church being "revived" under such deplorable conditions, becomes a distinct witness of holiness and righteousness to convict the impenitent and arrest moral atrophy

Revival Principle #3

As Christ's divine imperial rule is evidenced through a revived Church, the lost are now drawn irresistibly to the perfect love of God now clearly displayed by the Church. The result being spiritual awakening or power evangelism, a great harvest of souls!

Revival Principle #4

Even as great spiritual awakening is loosed through a revived Church, so to the fresh spiritual vitality of such a Church reawakens her wayward sons and daughters, bringing great joy to the family of God, as they turn their hearts to the Father.

Completing our overview, let us press forward in beholding the ever-increasing scope of revivals in the earth.

Revival Principle # 5

"Then thou shalt see, and flow together, and thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged. Because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee. The multitude of camels shall cover thee, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah; all they from Sheba shall come.

"They shall bring gold and incense; and they shall show forth the praises of the Lord. All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered together unto thee, the rams of Nebaioth shall minister unto thee. They shall come up with acceptance on mine altar, and I will glorify the house of my glory" (Isaiah 60:5-7).

Just as a revived Church triumphantly testifies of the glorious perfections of an exalted Christ to the helpless masses of depraved humanity, so too, revival and spiritual awakening affects righteous societal change. In the above verses we read, "the forces (societal change) of the Gentiles shall come to thee." These same verses speak of gold, flocks, dromedaries, rams, in other words, the very economic life of Gentile nations being brought to the feet of a revived Church.

There can be no question, that the mass conversion of whole people groups or large population within a given nation, could not help but to righteously leaven a given society. This is not to suggest that every aspect of a culture can be reconciled. Indeed, certain areas of society are born in diabolical designs which promote idolatry and anti-Christian agendas. These elements are judged purged, and shaken out of a spiritually awakened and reformed society.

Revival Principle #6

"And the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee. For in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favor I had mercy on thee" (Isaiah 60:10).

Our sixth revival principle is what I commonly refer to as the Nehemiah factor. Notice our verse describes the sons of strangers (those not in covenant with God) helping to rebuild and restore the Church's place in society. One could legitimately ask, "What fellowship hath light with darkness?" or "How could the depraved lend any help or value to that which is distinctly holy? The answer is found in Nehemiah 2:5-9.

"And I said to the King, 'If it please the king, and if your servant has found favor before you, send me to Judah, to the city of my father's tombs, that I may rebuild it.'

"Then the king said to me, the queen sitting beside him, 'How long will your journey be, and when will you return?' So it pleased the king to send me, and I gave him a definite time.

"And I said to the King, 'If it please the king, let letters be given me for the governors of the provinces beyond the river, that they may allow me to pass through until I come to Judah, and a letter to Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the fortress which is by the temple, for the wall of the city, and for the house to which I go.'

"And the king granted them to me because the good hand of God was on me. Then I came to the governors of the provinces beyond the River and gave them the king's letters. Now the king had sent me officers of the army and horsemen."

Notice that King Artaxerxes, a stranger, one alien to the ways of Jehovah, nevertheless gives Nehemiah, the one charged with recovering the Lord's testimony, physical supplies and equipment in his divine task of restoration. Given to Nehemiah was a governmental decrees, papers served to all governors and magistrates giving secular authority to what heaven had already mandated, as well as raw materials, finance for construction, and an army to protect Nehemiah's mission, all this was marshalled on behalf of the work of God.

This scriptural precept is repeated often throughout the Scriptures and is common in the day of God's power. Consider King Cyrus, King of Persia, who gave charge charge to Ezra and the Israelites in captivity to go out and rebuild the temple of God, to restore the priesthood, and effectively pave the way for Nehemiah's mission (Ezra 1:1-11). Or look upon the favor granted Joseph as he ascends in prominence in Pharaoh's royal court, eventually becoming the Prime Minister of the Egyptian Kingdom (Genesis 39-47).

A more recent example can be found in the annals of American history, in the friendship of Benjamin Franklin and George Whitefield. Despite the attempts of many Christian historians to Christianize the life of Benjamin Franklin (posthumously), factual evidence gives no public record of Franklin's acceptance of Christ as Savior and Lord.

We also know the dynamic testimony and uncompromising separation of the life of George Whitefield, whose sermons struck through the hearts of men like bolts of lightning through dried timbers. Despite the potential for conflict that two so markedly different men might have, Franklin was captivated by the powerful oration of this gifted man of God.

So great was his admiration that Franklin was quick to publish Whitefield's sermons as well as give large amounts of financial assistance to help Whitefield build orphanages for boys. Why did Franklin, this stranger to the evangelical work of God, a devout humanist, support the labor of Whitefield? Simply put, he saw it as good for the Country!

Revival Principle # 7

For brass I will bring gold, and for iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron. I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness (Isaiah 60:17).

Here find spiritual awakening in its ever-increasing influence, bringing a civic or governmental righteousness. "I will make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness." Many Christians have poured enormous energy, both time and money, in efforts to bring moral and spiritual influence to reform our government. While these efforts have been large, with laborious lobbying, rising rhetoric, and feverish fund raising, the impact made upon the government can be measured only in the smallest of increments.

This is not to say these efforts are in vain or without worth. However, one must realize these efforts, even when raised to a higher ration of success, can only at best bring a reformation of public policy. On the other hand, a nation which is influenced by a revived Church, with large numbers of "spiritually awakened" countrymen, will not only reform public policy, but will transform the entire structure of government including the lives of our public servants.

Thus to behold a transformed government in our desperate day requires more prayer aggression and less political action! It is better to define the battlefield for public policy in the womb of desperate prayer, than to lower our higher spiritual (and thus more powerful) position to the level of egocentric politicians who like the sons of Ninevah, cannot discern between their right hand and their left.

One could say, "Faith if it hath not works is dead." True enough, and at no time will this author ever suggest an abandonment of civic participation! However, the witness of a revived Church requires tremendous spiritual resources especially in time spent with God, marked by corporate purging and power enduing visitations of the Holy Spirit.

Thus if we are not making our priorities conducive to an increase of spiritual life, then the Church will never be that distinctly holy witness which will challenge the corruptions of man's governmental institutions. Make no mistake; it is the Church alone which is the light to expose governmental corruption, the salt to preserve godly government, and the leaven by which government is to be pervaded with.

Revival Principle #8

"A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation. I the Lord will hasten it in His time" (Isaiah 60:22).

Finally revival and spiritual awakening promote a dramatic increase in the kingdom of God on earth. Notice our verse declares, "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation." This depicts an immutable law or principle of the kingdom of God. That is, this principle is always true of Christ's kingdom whether or not the Church may find herself in times of spiritual decline or prosperity.

This principle is repeated in Matthew 13:31-33.

"He presented another parable to them, saying, "The kingdom of heaven is like a mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field; and this is smaller than all other seeds; but when it is full grown, it is larger than the garden plants, and becomes a tree, so that the birds of the air come and nest in its branches."

While this testimony of the kingdom transcends the spiritual condition of the Church, nevertheless, revival "hastens" the path of the kingdoms increase in the earth. "I the Lord will hasten it in His time!" Thus to speed this witness of the kingdom in righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit, to every tribe and kindred on this terrestrial ball, not only in word but with power, requires the hastening of revival and spiritual awakening upon the Church!

"Thy people shall be willing in the day of Thy power" (Psalm 110:3).

My hope and prayer is that the patterns of revival as depicted in Isaiah 60 will become a practical tool in your life of intercession. Below I have given a simple outline to assist your prayers for revival. Share it with a burdened friend!

Revival Praying

Revival (Church Life)

1. Pray for the Church to behold and exhibit Christ's glory on earth (Isaiah 60:1).
2. Pray for the testimony to arrest spiritual darkness (Isaiah 60:2).
3. Pray for power evangelism to be evidenced due to the increased testimony of a holy Church (Isaiah 60:3).
4. Pray for the backsliders to return to a distinctly spiritual and relevant Church (Isaiah 60:4).

Spiritual Awakening (Societal Life)

5. Pray for the revived Church to awaken a slumbering society and leaven every aspect possible (Isaiah 60:5-7).
6. Pray for the sons of strangers, though still unsaved, to recognize the need of the moral influence of the Church in society (Isaiah 60:10).
7. Pray for spiritual awakening to transform government (Isaiah 60:17).
8. Pray for a dramatic increase in the witness of Christ's kingdom, hastened by spiritual awakening (Isaiah 60:22).

What is Revival?

By Jeff Ziegler

Dynamic outpourings within the church and its corresponding effects upon a given society - or a "spiritual awakening" - has long been the great divine means by which Christ has dramatically advanced His redemptive purposes in the earth.

Throughout the scriptures and church history the Lord of heaven and earth can be seen radiating His glorious perfections with unusual power to particular generations of the elect, who under God's influence perform great exploits against sin and iniquity, often transforming entire nations with heavenly glory.

To most evangelicals, the life and testimony of the reformers of a bygone era are quite familiar. Names such as Luther, Knox, Edwards, Whitefield, Wesley, and Finney to name just a few, are generally synonymous with large sweeping movements of Christianity which engulf entire generations. Yet this familiarity often makes the discussion of revival difficult in that any inquiry into revival becomes personality based. This in turn hinders the discovery of the underpinning theology and immutable principles which foster such movements of holy grandeur.

The purpose of our inquiry concerning revival is to uncover the biblical foundations of such awakenings that we may practically implement these principals in our present generation. My hope is that revival will no longer be viewed as a mysterious capricious act of the sovereign Christ but instead seen as part of His overall purposes in maturing the church and advancing His rule among the nations.

REVIVAL - To restore from a depressed, inactive, or unused state. A restoration of force or validity. (Websters)

"Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence." Isaiah 64:1

In order to understand revival and spiritual awakening in a biblical context with all of its high and lofty dimensions, one must inquire beyond fundamental dictionary explanations and preconceived cultural ideas concerning revival. There must be a renewed effort to embrace a theological, historic and global appreciation for this otherworldly phenomenon, if revival is to be more than a byword in our generation.

Three Misunderstandings About "Revival"

Before a proper definition of revival can take place there are three major misunderstandings concerning revival which must be overcome.

The first of these barriers is the all too common cultural understanding of revival which exists among the majority of American evangelicals. Such understanding generally sees revival in terms of a given local church holding a set of special evangelistic meetings usually scheduled in the spring and fall. This sort of meeting would ordinarily include special speakers and varied musical presentations in order to make an appeal for unregenerate sinners to be converted to Christ. That this kind of meeting has value and at times can even assist in the expansion of revival once it is already in progress there can be no doubt. However, evangelistic meetings do not represent authentic biblical revival! Evangelism should be an ongoing function of the church whether the dynamic of revival is present or not.
